MAY 10, 1779. Commo. Sir George Collier descends upon Portsmouth (Virginia) with his 64-gun flagship Raisonnable, 44-gun frigate Rainbow, 14-gun sloops Otter and Harlem, and 8-gun galley Cornwallis, bearing 2,500 troops under Major General Matthew. The Patriot base goes up in flames, the Elizabeth and the Chesapeake being secured as prizes. By the time Collier returns into New York on May 28, he is able to report the capture or destruction of 130 American vessels.

MAY 18, 1779. Madrid secretly advises its Spanish American officials that war will soon be declared against Britain.

JUNE 1, 1779. British columns push out of New York and take the fort at Stony Point, plus Fort Lafayette at Verplanck's Point on the far side of the Hudson River. Guarding the nearest ferry into New York City, these strongholds are of strategic importance to the Americans' east-west lines of communication, so Washington instructs Brig. Gen. Anthony Wayne to study the possibility of retaking Stony Point (see "July 15, 1779" entry).

JUNE 5, 1779. After several months' blockade of Martinique, Admiral Byron's fleet bears away south toward Grenada to escort a large merchant convoy north to Saint Kitts and then on to England. His Royal Navy warships reach Saint Kitts's capital of Basseterre by June 10 and remain five days to effect repairs and reprovision; then they exit to protect the departure of a large general convoy headed toward Europe, afterward beating back upwind to resume their station off Martinique by June 30.

JUNE 9, 1779. Seizure of Saint Vincent. Availing himself of Byron's absence during his leeward cruise to Saint Kitts, French admiral d'Estaing detaches the 35-year-old lieutenant Charles Marie, Chevalier de Trolong du Romain and commander of the corvette Lively, to sortie in the opposite direction and attack Saint Vincent.

Trolong du Romain quits Fort Royal (modern Fort de France) with three corvettes and two sloops bearing 400–450 troops, progressing south slowly because of scanty winds and strong countercurrents.

On June 16, his expedition sights and captures two English vessels, then the next day approaches Saint Vincent. The Martinican militia officer Laroque Perein has already infiltrated the island and primed its Carib inhabitants to rise up against the English. As soon as Trolong du Romain's troops come ashore on June 17 and occupy the high ground above the capital of Kingstown, the English garrison of 464 men of the 60th (Royal American) Foot Regiment under Lieutenant Colonel Etherington surrenders without a fight, the capitulation being signed by Gov. Valentine Morris.

JUNE 15, 1779. Near Charles Town (modern Charleston, South Carolina), General Prévost—British commander in chief out of Georgia—decides to halt his invasion northeastward when he learns that General Lincoln is marching to the capital's relief. To cover his retreat, Prévost leaves a 900-man rearguard under Lt. Col. John Maitland at Stono Ferry on James Island, which boasts three strong redoubts, an abatis, and a boat bridge across to Johns Island. By June 15, Maitland is ready to withdraw as soon as ships can be made available; but before they arrive, he is set upon five days later by 1,200 Americans from the Charles Town garrison under Brigadier General Moultrie. Having crossed the Ashley River, Moultrie marches eight miles until he arrives within 300 yards of the foremost British defenses at Stono Ferry, his presence screened by woods. With Brig. Gen. Jethro Sumner commanding the right and recently promoted Brig. Gen. Isaac Huger, the left, the American attack goes forth on June 20, catching Maitland completely off guard. In one hour's heavy fighting, his Highland corps suffers comparatively heavy losses, and his Hessians begin to retreat. However, with the Americans already on the abatis, the British commander rallies his Hessians and throws in his reserves from Johns Island. This counterattack compels the attackers to withdraw, having suffered 150 killed or wounded, plus another 150 men missing. Maitland's losses are 130 killed or wounded plus a single man missing, and he is able to successfully evacuate his command on June 23, sailing to Beaufort on Port Royal Island (South Carolina).

JUNE 21, 1779. In Europe, Spain officially declares war against Great Britain.

JUNE 27, 1779. The 58-year-old commodore Toussaint Guillaume Picquet de La Motte (better known as the Comte de Lamotte Picquet) reaches Martinique with his 74-gun flagship Annibal; the 74-gun, 1,550-ton Diadème; the 64-gun Réfléchi; the 64-gun, 1,260-ton Artésien; and the 50-gun, 900-ton Amphion; plus the frigates Blanche, Amazone, and Fortunée; escorting a 60-vessel troop convoy. Admiral d'Estaing finally decides to use this strength to attack one of the major British West Indian bases, and he sorties on June 31 with 25 ships of the line and numerous auxiliaries in hopes of falling upon Barbados.

The next morning, July 1, Admiral Byron returns into Saint Lucia from his digression to Saint Kitts and learns of the French occupation of Saint Vincent during his absence. Meanwhile, contrary winds have prevented d'Estaing from reaching his original objective, hence his fleet instead veers around toward Grenada, coming within sight of that island the next day.

JULY 2, 1779. Capture of Grenada. D'Estaing anchors off Beauséjour Point, near its capital of Georgetown, and leads his 2,500-man army ashore. The English under their governor Lord Macartney adopt a defensive posture, entrenching themselves atop their Hospital Hill strongpoint with several hundred men and field artillery. The French advance that same evening in three columns under colonels Arthur Dillon, Édouard Dillon, and de Noailles, while d'Estaing's ships launch a diversionary attack from out at sea. By 11:00 p.m., the assault columns come into contact with the defenders, driving them off Hospital Hill in confusion so that the heights are in French hands by the next morning. On July 4, Macartney sues for terms, Grenada's capitulation netting d'Estaing several hundred prisoners, 118 artillery pieces, and 30 merchantmen lying offshore.

During the night of July 5–6, the French admiral learns of the approach of a large British fleet. Byron has quit Saint Kitts on July 3 with 21 ships of the line, the frigate Ariadne, and 28 troop transports to recoup Saint Vincent from the French (see "June 9, 1779" entry). While en route, he is informed that Grenada is also under attack, so he instead sails to its rescue. Not realizing that d'Estaing has been forewarned, Byron makes the signal for a general chase once he sights the French fleet assembling under sail off Georgetown at sunup on July 6, believing that he has caught them unprepared. The lead English ships open fire upon the French vanguard by 7:30 a.m., yet are badly mauled, Barrington's vice-flagship Prince of Wales, Captain Sawyer's Boyne, Gardner's Sultan, Collingwood's Grafton, Edwards's

Print commemorating d'Estaing's seizure of Grenada. (Library of Congress)

Cornwall, Cornwallis's Lion, and Fanshaw's Monmouth receiving the brunt of this concentrated French fire.

Byron consequently regroups his scattered fleet and by 9:00 a.m. proceeds into Georgetown's harbor, only to be surprised again when its batteries hoist French flags and open fire. Reversing course, the English engage d'Estaing's fleet once more as they exit, before breaking off and standing back out to sea by noon. The English have suffered 183 killed and 346 wounded during this encounter, and the French, 190 dead and 759 injured; yet, only a single vessel has actually changed hands, an English transport bearing 150 soldiers. HMS Monmouth is detached from Byron's fleet to proceed independently toward Antigua to effect repairs, while other Royal Navy vessels—notably the Lion, the Cornwall, and the Grafton—also report considerable damage as they limp toward Saint Kitts. On the French side, captains de Champorcine of the Provence, Ferron du Quengo of the Amphion, and de Montault of the Fier Rodrigue are all dead. D'Estaing is nonetheless able to dispatch the corvette Diligente toward France with news of Grenada's conquest and Byron's retreat, after which de Suffren occupies the Grenadines, and the victorious French fleet retires from the region by July 15 (the same day on which Byron reaches Saint Kitts, followed by the Monmouth the next day, while the Lion seeks shelter at Saba).

After touching at Guadeloupe on July 19, d'Estaing continues for Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) with a merchant convoy, passing before Saint Kitts on July 21–22 and reaching Saint Domingue by the last day of this month. There, he receives word that the English have made great gains against the Americans in both Georgia and the Carolinas, so he sets sail north with his entire fleet on August 16.

JULY 15, 1779. At Sandy Beach (near Fort Montgomery, New York), General Wayne begins a march around noon with 1,200 Patriots and two field guns to attempt to retake the fort at Stony Point from its 625 British defenders under Col. Henry Johnson. By 8:00 p.m., the Americans have approached within one and a half miles of their objective and maintain strict silence as they subdivide into two columns, planning to launch a simultaneous surprise attack from both north and south. Each will be preceded by a party of 20 men to kill the sentries and hack through the abatis, while two, 150-man storming parties will follow them inside. A company of light horse under Major Murfree is to create a diversion in the center, being the only troopers authorized to open fire.

Shortly after midnight, the attacking columns ford the marsh around this fort and commence their assault. Colonel Johnson is deceived by Murfree's noisy feint, leading half his garrison down the hill, where they are cut off and captured. After 15 minutes' further turmoil, the British begin to surrender in isolated groups, the captives eventually totaling 470, plus 95 killed or wounded. The Americans suffer 100 casualties during this bold stroke, which proves a great boost to the revolutionaries' morale. Nonetheless, the victors are obliged to evacuate Stony Point on July 18, for Clinton quickly reinforces nearby Fort Lafayette and it cannot be carried by Brig. Gen. Robert Howe's subsequent attack. Unable to remain in this untenable position, Wayne's garrison therefore withdraws, losing the 12 British guns they have captured, in the American galley, which transports them toward West Point.

AUGUST 14, 1779. Commodore Collier breaks the American blockade of Penobscot (Maine) with his 64-gun flagship Raisonnable, the 32-gun frigates Blonde and Virginia, and the 20-gun sloops Greyhound, Camilla, and Galatea.

AUGUST 18, 1779. At 10:30 a.m., the 23-year-old major Henry Lee—a 1773 graduate of Princeton and better known as “Light Horse Harry”—sets out from Paramus (New Jersey) with two companies and some wagons as if on a foraging expedition. But at New Bridge, four miles away, he is joined by the rest of his irregulars, bringing his total strength to 300 men, and at 4:30 p.m. he strikes south toward Bergen. It is Lee's intent to surprise, under cover of darkness, the 200 British and Hessians under Maj. William Sutherland garrisoning the fort at Paulus Hook, a low point of land protruding into the Hudson River one and a half miles opposite New York City. If it can be captured, this stronghold might help solve Washington's communications problems.

Lee's subordinate, Capt. Allen McLane, has earlier reconnoitered the fortification, finding it protected on its landward side by a salt marsh, tidal moat, and Harsimus Creek. The Americans decide to launch their attack a half hour after midnight, before the moat can become filled by high tide at 2:00 a.m. Boats for their retreat are to wait on the Hackensack River, west of Bergen. However, a guide misdirects Lee, and this detour costs his assault columns three hours. As they reach the marsh, Major Clark reports half his Virginia troops still missing; by now the ditch is also almost full, but Lee nonetheless chooses to press home his attack, reorganizing his force into two contingents under Clark and Captain Forsyth, with a reserve under Capt. Levin Handy.

The Americans wade through the marsh with their muskets unprimed, so the defense is not alerted until Lee's men enter the ditch. They then rush it, find an opening in the main work, and capture a blockhouse and redoubt, with Handy feeding men into the fight from his reserve as firing dictates. A number of British and Hessian troops are captured in 30 minutes of battle, although Captain Schaller is able to hold out in the fort's round redoubt.

With dawn now approaching, and the alarm being sounded in New York across the river, Lee orders a retreat with his 150 prisoners, most of the remaining 50 defenders having been killed or wounded. (One of the few exceptions being the commanding officer, Major Sutherland, who has taken refuge within a blockhouse.) Upon retiring, Lee finds that the boats on the Hackensack have been withdrawn on the assumption that his raid has been called off, so he is faced with a long march back along the Bergen route. Fortunately for the Americans, reinforcements arrive just before they are attacked by Lieutenant Colonel van Buskirk and his Loyalists, who are driven away.

Although failing to hold the fort on Paulus Hook, Lee's venture nevertheless fires American morale. Both he and Anthony Wayne receive gold medals from a grateful Congress.

AUGUST 27, 1779. Despite having lost accumulated supplies and boats during a hurricane nine days previously, Spain's 33-year-old governor for Louisiana, Bernardo de Gálvez, departs New Orleans with a mixed force of 170 regulars from the España, Havana, Mallorca, and Príncipe infantry regiments; 330 untested troops of his Fixed Infantry Regiment of Louisiana; 20 carabineers; 60 white militiamen; 80 free blacks and mulattoes; and 7 American volunteers. They are accompanied by a flotilla of gunboats bearing 10 artillery pieces as they travel northwestward up the Mississippi to attack the advance British outpost of Fort Manchac. De Gálvez presses on ahead of his expedition to recruit another 600 volunteers among the Acadian and German settlements, as well as 160 Indian warriors.

AUGUST 31, 1779. Defense of Savannah. D’Estaing drops anchor off the South Carolina coast, setting the military officer de Fontanges ashore to consult with American officials at Charles Town about a combined effort against the English in neighboring Georgia. On September 2, five French men-of-war—including the flagship Languedoc—are damaged by an unexpected gale, yet d’Estaing’s strength remains sufficiently impressive that the mere appearance of his 39 vessels off Charles Town creates a sensation the next day. (Even as far north as New York, the British high command shows some concern at this French expedition’s sudden materialization. It rescinds Cornwallis’s orders to sail toward Jamaica, while recalling the Rhode Island garrison into New York. Washington, for his part, is equally irritated by d’Estaing’s failure to come directly to support him.)

On September 6, the first French troops begin disembarking on Tybee Island at the mouth of the Savannah River, from which a British outpost hastily withdraws. General Prévost, commanding the English forces in Georgia, orders Lt. Col. John Cruger to march from Fort Sunbury and join him in the capital, while Lieutenant Colonel Maitland is to do the same from Port Royal. On September 11–12, d’Estaing lands his main body at Beaulieu (13–14 miles south of Savannah), bringing allied numbers to 6,000 men when joined with American units under brigadier generals Lachlan McIntosh and Casimir Pulaski on September 15. The next day, d’Estaing demands the surrender of Savannah, and Prévost asks for 24 hours in which to reply. During this time, Maitland arrives with another 800 men, raising the defenders’ strength to 3,200, so this offer is rejected.

On September 16, General Lincoln arrives to assume command of the American contingent, and siege preparations begin (over the objections of Brig. Gen. William Moultrie, who calls for an immediate assault). Bad weather slows the arrival of siege ordinance until September 24, and the bombardment does not commence until October 3. D’Estaing is already under pressure from his naval captains to withdraw because of the impending hurricane season, so it is decided on October 7 to attempt an assault the next dawn. The main Franco-American thrust is aimed against Spring Hill, with diversionary actions on both flanks under Gen. Théobald Dillon and Brig. Gen. Isaac Huger. Both flank actions are driven back by heavy fire, while the principal assault proves poorly coordinated, the French arriving at their positions late, then attacking early.

Repulse at Savannah, by A. I. Keller. (U.S. National Archives)

D’Estaing’s troops suffer severely while covering 500 yards of open ground toward the English abatis, the only success being scored by Lt. Col. Francis Marion—the fabled “Swamp Fox”—who breaks through the southwestern abatis to take the Spring Hill redoubt. He is soon driven back by an English counterattack, while Pulaski’s cavalry suffers heavily (their commander being mortally wounded), and McIntosh’s force is misdirected into a swamp and fired upon by the Royal Navy brig Germain from the river. After the American and French assault columns withdraw, a heavy fog prevents any English pursuit. French and American casualties total 800 (of which 650 are French, including an injured d’Estaing), plus 120 prisoners; the British sustain 60 killed or wounded.

The attackers lift their siege on October 18 and go their separate ways: Lincoln retiring toward Charleston, while the French admiral prepares to regain France, first subdividing his command. The frigates Fortunée, Blanche, and Boudeuse, along with the corvette Ellis, are to carry reinforcements to Grenada and Saint Vincent; troops belonging to Saint Domingue (Haiti) are to be returned aboard Lamothe Picquet’s division; while de Grasse’s squadron is to reprovision at Chesapeake Bay before making for Martinique. The latter sets sail on October 26 with the Robuste, the Fendant, the Diadème, and the Sphinx, followed shortly thereafter by the Vengeur, the Dauphin Royal, and the Artésien. On October 28, bad weather parts the Languedoc’s, the Provence’s, and the Tonnant’s cables off Georgia, obliging d’Estaing to sail alone for France, followed four days later by his subordinate de Broves with the César, the Hector, the Guerrier, the Protecteur, the Vaillant, the Zélé, the Marseillais, the Sagittaire, the Fantasque, and the 50-gun English prize Experiment (captured by d’Albert de Rions on September 24). (The 32-gun Amazone of Capt. Jean-François de Galaup, Comte de Lapérouse, also sights the 26-gun British frigate Ariel of Capt. Thomas Mackenzie off Savannah on October 7 and takes it three days later.)

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1779. Lt. Col. José Rosado leads 800 Spanish troops out of Bacalar (Yucatán), attacking the English logwood establishments in neighboring Río Hondo (Belize). Capturing two sloops, a schooner, and numerous lesser prizes, he then arms them with swivels and 300 men to sail farther south and attack the main English concentration around “Cayo Cocinas” (Saint George’s Key).

SEPTEMBER 6, 1779. Spain’s Mississippi Campaign. Governor de Gálvez’s expedition, now reduced to less than 1,000 effectives after an 11-day march over 105 miles, comes within sight of 27-man Fort Manchac. Next dawn, the Franco-Spanish militia under Gilberto Antonio de San Maxent storms it by surprise, killing a single English soldier and capturing 20, while the remaining 6 escape.

After resting his small army for a few days, de Gálvez presses on to nearby Baton Rouge by September 12. It is defended by Lt. Col. Alexander Dickson with 146 British regulars, 201 Waldeckers, 11 Royal Artillery gunners, plus 150 armed settlers and black auxiliaries. The defenders have erected an earthen redoubt on Watts’s and Flowers’s plantations, defended by 13 cannon plus a ditch 18 feet wide by 9 feet deep. His Franco-Spanish army now reduced to only 400 regulars and 400 militiamen, de Gálvez resorts to a clever ruse. On the night of September 20, he sends a work detail into some nearby woods to draw the defenders’ fire with their noise, while stealthily installing his 10 siege guns on the opposite side. When the latter open fire at 5:45 a.m. next dawn, within point-blank range, they pound the British fortification into submission within three and a half hours. Dickson surrenders not only his own stronghold but also 80 Waldeck grenadiers holding Fort Panmure (Natchez). Capt. Juan de la Villanueva proceeds there with 50 Spanish soldiers by October 5 to accept its capitulation.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1779. Belize. At dawn, Rosado’s 300-man Spanish expedition appears off Saint George’s Key (Belize), having slipped landing parties ashore the previous night to surprise the English settlements from both sides. Many logwood cutters are captured, their dwellings burned, and their slaves and vessels seized, at a cost of four Spanish dead and five wounded.

While the Spaniards are gathering up their booty, two Royal Navy frigates and a brigantine arrive off the coast on September 20, under Commo. John Luttrell. Their presence compels Rosado to retire toward Yucatán, although carrying away his prisoners plus destroying every settlement in his path.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1779. In retaliation for the Spanish descent against Belize, Luttrell appears in Honduras's Gulf of Omoa with his 44-gun flagship Charon, the 32-gun Lowestoft of Capt. Christopher Parker, the 28-gun Pomona of Capt. Charles Edmund Nugent, the 20-gun sloop Porcupine of Cmdr. John Pakenham, the schooner Racehorse, and a number of lesser consorts. They bear a contingent of troops from Jamaica under Maj. William Dalrymple, a company from his own Royal Irish Regiment, plus another from the 79th Regiment and numerous militia volunteers.

OCTOBER 16, 1779. Omoa. Having probed the approaches to this port and deemed its San Fernando harbor castle too formidable, Luttrell and Dalrymple disembark their Irish troops, many Royal Navy Marines and sailors, plus 250 baymen overnight on nearby Puerto Cabello Peninsula (modern Puerto Cortés) to march nine miles into Omoa proper under cover of darkness and surprise its 200-man citadel under Capt. Simón Desnaux from the landward side. Progress proves impossible because of dense mangroves, the dawn of October 17 revealing the English still six miles short of their destination. It is not until midafternoon that they storm the town, easily scattering the 50–60 defenders stationed outside Fort San Fernando. However, the citadel itself continues to hold out, even when the Charon and the Lowestoft bear down to open fire. (The latter soon runs aground, being badly mauled before it can be refloated and towed out of range.)

As a result, some of the Pomona's guns are landed and manhandled into position as a siege battery by October 18, after which the besiegers launch another diversionary attack from out at sea on the night of October 19–20. While Desnaux's garrison is distracted by this demonstration, four British storming parties slip over the walls carrying the building before its defenders can react, at a cost of five English fatalities. Out in the roadstead, the Spanish galleon San Carlos and another ship are seized, bearing approximately 3 million pesos in treasure. Dalrymple installs English troops to hold San Fernando, then sails away toward Roatán and Jamaica with Luttrell.

(On November 28, the new garrison is obliged to evacuate when a 500-man Spanish relief column arrives from the interior under Guatemala's governor, Matías de Gálvez.)

OCTOBER 28, 1779. Lt. Col. Francisco Pineiro sallies from San Felipe de Bacalar (Yucatán) with 390 troops aboard 5 captured English sloops, 10 piraguas, and 8 dories to again assault Saint George's Key (Belize) and its surrounding district. A second Spanish expedition of 120 men under Capt. José Urrutia sets sail aboard 9 piraguas and 4 dories by November 2 to raze other English settlements in this territory.

EARLY DECEMBER 1779. Lamotte Picquet reaches Martinique from North America with the Annibal, the Réfléchi, the Vengeur, the Magnifique, the Diadème, the Dauphin Royal, and the Artésien, his squadron so worn that the latter four immediately undergo extensive repairs.

DECEMBER 18, 1779. Hyde Parker's squadron intercepts a 26-vessel French convoy approaching Martinique, escorted by the frigate Aurore. Lamotte Picquet sorties from Fort Royal with the only ships available to him—the Annibal, the Réfléchi, and the Vengeur—but is powerless to prevent the English from capturing 10 merchantmen and driving another 4 aground.

DECEMBER 21, 1779. Rear Adm. Joshua Rowley's 74-gun ships, the Magnificent, the Suffolk, and the Vengeance, plus the 64-gun Stirling Castle, intercept the 32-gun French frigates Fortunée and Blanche and the 28-gun Elise off Guadeloupe, capturing all three by the next morning.

DECEMBER 26, 1779. Clinton decides to leave 10,000 troops under Knyphausen in winter quarters at Sandy Hook (New York) to keep an eye on Washington, while he takes a large contingent to campaign farther south in the Carolinas. Quitting New York the day after Christmas with 7,550 troops aboard 90 transports, he is escorted by Vice Adm. Marriot Arbuthnot's 64-gun flagship, the Europa, under William Swiney, as well as the 74-gun Russell of Commo. Francis Samuel Drake and Robust of Phillips Cosby; the 64-gun Defiance of Maxwell Jacobs and Raisonné of Thomas Fitzherbert; the 50-gun Renown of George Dawson; the 44-gun frigates Roebuck of Sir Andrew Snape Hammond and Romulus of George Gayton; the 32-gun frigates Richmond of Charles Hudson, Blonde (French prize) of Andrew Barkley, and Raleigh (American prize) of James Gambier; the 28-gun frigate Virginia of John Orde; the 20-gun sloops Perseus of George Keith Elphinstone and Camilla of John Collins; plus the armed ships Sandwich and Germaine.

This expedition endures such a rough passage that it does not reach Georgia's Tybee Island until the end of January 1780, much of its horses and artillery having been lost. This delays the start of Clinton's southern campaign, as he has to summon further reinforcements and equipment from New York and Savannah.

JANUARY 11, 1780. De Gálvez at Mobile. Governor de Gálvez departs New Orleans with 43 regulars of the 2nd Battalion of the España Regiment, 50 of the Havana Regiment, 141 of the Louisiana Regiment, 14 artillerymen, 26 carabineros or "riflemen," 323 white and 107 mulatto or black militiamen, 26 American auxiliaries, plus two-dozen slaves. They are traveling aboard the royal frigate Vólante; the merchant frigate Misericordia; the galleys San Vicente de Ferrer, San Francisco de Paula, Merced, and another unnamed galley; the packet Rosario, which doubles as a hospital ship; the brigantines San Salvador de Orta, Gálvez, and another unknown brigantine; the galliot Válenzuela; and the royal brig Kaulicán.

After pausing at the Mississippi River mouth, this expedition strikes eastward on February 6, working into Mobile Bay four days later despite foul weather. Six vessels run aground upon its bar, so de Gálvez experiences some difficulty assembling his small army ashore. He then receives some requested reinforcements on February 20: 549 soldiers of the Navarra Regiment, who arrive from Havana aboard the 22-gun frigate Caimán of Cmdr. Miguel de Goicoechea, the 18-gun storeship San Pío of Lt. Pedro Obregón, the 14-gun brigantine Santa Teresa of Lt. Manuel Bilbao, the 18-gun brigantine Renombrado of Lt. José María Chacón, plus an unnamed Catalan galley. This flotilla is also accompanied by the American sloop Terrible of Capt. Joseph Calvert.

On February 24, the Spanish move from Mobile Point to Dog River (nine miles below Mobile), then three days later begin probing the British outer perimeter. Fort Charlotte is invaded by February 29, de Gálvez calling upon its commander—Capt. Elias Durnford—to surrender the next day, but he is rebuffed. After an 11-day siege during which a heavy Spanish battery is emplaced within point-blank range, Durnford sues for terms by sundown of March 12. The capitulation occurs two days later when 267 prisoners surrender to the Spaniards: 98 regulars of the Royal American Regiment, 4 Maryland Loyalists, 60 sailors, plus 54 white and 51 black militiamen. A 500-man British relief column approaching from Pensacola with three guns under Col. John Campbell turns back upon learning of Mobile's fate.

FEBRUARY 3, 1780. The 21-year-old captain Horatio Nelson quits Port Royal (Jamaica) with his frigate Hinchinbroke, escorting the transport ship Penelope, two brigs, three sloops, and the tender Royal George, bearing 100 regulars of the 60th Royal American Regiment under acting Lt. Col. John Polson, 140 of the 79th Liverpool Blues under Capt. Richard Bulkeley, 240 Royal Jamaica volunteers under Maj. James Macdonald, 250 members of the Jamaica Legion, 125 of the Royal Bateaux Corps, plus an unspecified number of black volunteers.

This expedition is intended to cross to the Mosquito Coast, be reinforced by several hundred logwood cutters and Indians under militia Maj. James Lawrie, then advance up Nicaragua's San Juan River to attack the Spaniards. On February 9, Nelson and Polson pause at Providencia Island to secure a Central American pilot, before continuing toward Cape Gracias a Dios to rendezvous with Lawrie's contingent.

FEBRUARY 10, 1780. Having refurbished his army, Clinton sails for the Edisto River and Saint John's Island (near present-day Charleston), to march overland toward the Ashley River and eventually invade South Carolina's capital.

MARCH 7, 1780. The 70-gun, 600-man Spanish flagship San Gabriel of Joaquín de Cañaveral departs Havana with the 70-gun, 551-man San Juan Nepomuceno of José Perea and the 64-gun, 577-man San Ramón of José Calvo de Irrazábal; the 42-gun, 284-man frigates Nuestra Señora de la O of Gabriel de Aristizábal; the 36-gun, 265-man Santa Matilde of Miguel de Alderete and the 271-man Santa Marta of Andrés Valderrama; the 10-gun, 24-man brigantines San Francisco Xavier of Juan Vicente Carta and San Juan Bautista of Pedro Imán; and the 14-gun, 44-man galley Santo Peregrino of Lt. Juan de Herrera and the 88-man sloop Nuestra Señora del Carmen of Lt. Miguel de Sapiáin. They are escorting 26 transports bearing 2,150 troops under Lt. Gen. Juan Bautista Bonet to unite with de Gálvez's force at Mobile and attack the English at Pensacola.

On March 27, this Spanish expedition inadvertently comes within sight of Pensacola, provoking panic among its English defenders, who spike the cannon in their batteries and retreat inside Fort George, anticipating an invasion. Instead, Cañaveral and Bonet steer toward Mobile, straggling into port by March 30–31. After lengthy consultations, the Spaniards decide not to attack Pensacola that spring, their fleet instead returning into Havana by May 20.

MARCH 13, 1780. Lamotte Picquet quits Martinique with his squadron to reinforce Saint Domingue (Haiti).

MARCH 22, 1780. While cruising along northern Saint Domingue, Lamotte Picquet's Annibal (flag) of 74 guns, Diadème of 70, Réfléchi of 64, and Amphion of 50 chase three large sail. They prove to be Commo. Sir William Cornwallis's Lion of 64 guns, Bristol of 50, and Janus of 40, who flee before this superior French force. Because of scanty winds, only the Annibal can overtake the English ships, fighting the trio that evening and the next morning until the latter make good their escape. A wounded Lamotte Picquet puts into Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) that afternoon.

MARCH 23, 1780. The 67-year-old vice admiral, Luc Urbain du Bouëxic, Comte de Guichen, reaches Martinique with a squadron, incorporating de Grasse's division into his command.

MARCH 24, 1780. San Juan River. After lengthy delays while awaiting the arrival of Lawrie's irregulars—who fail to appear—Nelson and Polson arrive off San Juan del Norte (also known as Greytown or Saint John's) to begin their offensive into Nicaragua. All 1,500 of Polson's troops are assembled aboard boats by March 27, advancing upriver in two contingents. On April 8, Nelson overruns a small Spanish battery on Bartola Island, then two days later, British scouts come within sight of 20-gun Inmaculada Concepción Fort—called “San Juan Castle” by the invaders (modern El Castillo, Nicaragua)—which bars their progress.

On April 11, Polson and Nelson's boats approach this stronghold, disgorging their army and four small 4-pounders. Nelson opens fire with the latter two days later, to little effect because of their light caliber. Nevertheless, after two weeks' close siege, the

Horatio Nelson at 19 years of age; the portraitist, John Rigaud, later added Nicaragua's Fort San Juan in the background. (National Maritime Museum, London)

Spanish garrison commander, Juan de Ayessa, requests terms on the evening of April 28 and the next afternoon surrenders his 160 men (60 of them Spanish regulars). While British colors are being hoisted above the fort, a 500-man relief column appears on the far bank under Guatemala's governor, Matías de Gálvez, who promptly withdraws. Disease is already decimating the British ranks, however, so they do not pursue, merely remaining in possession of their prize while dying by the hundreds, until eventually they evacuate this stronghold six months later.

MARCH 29, 1780. Charles Town Siege. Clinton's 11,200-man army slips across South Carolina's Ashley River, four miles farther north than the outnumbered American defenders have expected. By the next day, the first British columns are within 800 yards of Charles Town's defenses, driving 5,600 Patriots inside its walls and instituting a full invasion within the coming fortnight.

On April 10, Clinton calls for Lincoln's capitulation, which the American commander refuses, so three days later the invaders detach Loyalist lieutenant colonel Banastre Tarleton with his so-called British Legion to attack the vital American supply depot at Monck's Corner (30 miles to the north). Capturing a messenger en route, from whom he learns of General Huger's dispositions, Tarleton falls upon this place at 3:00 a.m. of April 14 and takes its Patriot defenders by surprise. The 300 American cavalrymen before Biggins' Bridge are routed, and the militia guard scattered, with only 3 men and 5 mounts killed or wounded among the British, as opposed to 20 American casualties and 67 prisoners. Tarleton's stroke not only nets 42 loaded wagons and 185 horses but, more importantly, cuts off the last important American supply route into, and possible avenue of retreat from, Charles Town.

Before the beleaguered capital, Maj. James Moncrieff accelerates British siege operations by using prefabricated mantelets, so that by April 19 lines have advanced within 250 yards of the American ramparts. Lincoln offers to surrender two days later, but his demand for full honors of war is rejected by Clinton. At dawn on April 24, Lieutenant Colonel Henderson of the British right overruns Charles Town's outer line of works. Some 75 miles farther northwest, Tarleton also continues to be active, checking the movements of a mixed Patriot force under Col. Anthony White, which crosses the Santee River at Dupuis' Ferry on May 5 and captures one of Tarleton's Loyalist officers and 17 men.

Knowing that another 350-man American force is waiting nearby at Lenud's (or Lanneau's) Ferry under Col. Abraham Buford, Tarleton cunningly circles southeast and falls upon this place at 3:00 p.m. of May 6 with 150 British Legion dragoons, just as White is joining Buford. Without suffering a single casualty, the Loyalists disperse both American contingents, inflicting 40 casualties and capturing another 65. Tarleton returns into the siege camps around Charles Town with his prisoners and a large number of horses, raising British morale while deflating that of the defenders. After heavy bombardments from both land and the river, the city council (which until now has opposed surrendering) agrees to give up on May 11, and the next day, 5,500 Americans march out of Charles Town to capitulate—including seven generals. Patriot casualties total 230, compared to 270 British losses. Clinton prepares to return to New York with one-third of his army for spring campaigning, leaving 41-year-old lieutenant general Charles Cornwallis in command of South Carolina.

APRIL 11, 1780. Two British sloops and nine merchantmen carry supplies into Pensacola from Jamaica.

APRIL 13, 1780. De Guichen's fleet quits Martinique, covering the departure of a merchant convoy bound for Saint Domingue (Haiti), escorted by the 50-gun Fier and the frigate Boudense. But it is the French admiral's real intent to attempt a descent upon Barbados, for which he is accompanied by transports bearing 3,000 troops under the Marquis de Bouillé. On April 16, as this expedition stems the Martinique Passage opposite Dominica, it sights the battle fleet of the 62-year-old admiral Sir George Brydges Rodney, which closes to engage.

APRIL 17, 1780. Encounter off Martinique. This morning, Rodney's fleet maneuvers to overtake the French. In his van are the 64-gun Stirling Castle under Carkett; the 74-gun Ajax of Uvedale and Elizabeth of Maitland; the 90-gun vice-flagship Princess Royal of Hyde Parker under Flag Captain Hammond; the 74-gun Albion of Bowyer and Terrible of Douglas; as well as the 64-gun Trident under P. Mollo. The center is composed of the Grafton of 74 guns under Collingwood; the 64-gun Yarmouth of Bateman; the Cornwall of 74 guns under Edwards; Rodney's 90-gun flagship Sandwich under Flag Captain Young; the 74-gun Suffolk of Crespín; the 68-gun Boyne of Cotton; the 64-gun Vigilant of Home; and the 74-gun Vengeance of Hotham. The rear division consists of the 60-gun Medway under Edmond Affleck; Rear Adm. Joshua Rowley's 74-gun Montague under Flag Captain Houlton; the 74-gun Conqueror of Watson; the 64-gun Intrepid of Saint John; the 74-gun Magnificent of Elphinstone; as well as the 64-gun Centurion.

The English vessels do not sail as well as their opponents, so it takes some time to close upon de Guichen's fleet. His van is made up of the 74-gun Destin of François Louis, Comte Dumaitz de Goimpy Feiquières; the 64-gun Vengeur of de Betz; the 60-gun Saint Michel of d'Aymar; the 74-gun Pluton of de Lamarthonie; the 80-gun vice-flagship Triomphant of Hippolyte Augustin, Comte de Sade, under Flag Captain de Gras Préville; the 74-gun Souverain of Jean-Baptiste de Glandevès; plus the 64-gun Solitaire of de Cicé Champion. The French center division consists of the 74-gun Citoyen of de Nieul; the 64-gun Caton of de Framond; the 74-gun Victoire of d'Albert Saint Hippolyte and Fendant of Commodore de Vaudreuil; de Guichen's 80-gun flagship Couronne under the flag captain, Pierre-Louis François Buor de la Charoulière; the 74-gun Palmier of Commo. François Aymar, Baron de Monteil; plus the 64-gun Indien of de Balleroy and Actionnaire of de Larchantel. The rear division is composed of the 74-gun Intrépide of Duplessis Parfeau; the 64-gun Triton of Brun de Boades; as well as the 74-gun Magnifique of de Brach, Robuste under Rear Admiral de Grasse, Sphinx of de Soulanges, Artésien of de Peynier, and Hercule of Claude François Renart de Fuch Samberg, Marquis d'Amblimont.

Having formed into roughly parallel battle lines and overhauled the French rear and center, at 11:50 a.m. Rodney signals his men-of-war to bear down upon their opposite numbers. Unfortunately, this hoist is misinterpreted by some to mean their literal opposite number—that is, the sixth British ship versus the sixth French ship, and so on—consequently, his fleet disintegrates into a straggling mass while attempting to carry out this unintended command.

The French open fire at 1:00 p.m., as Rodney's flagship veers down and tries to burst through their line, accompanied by a few consorts. The British admiral eventually succeeds after the Actionnaire staggers out of the battle, only to then become enveloped by numerous French warships as de Guichen gives the signal for his fleet to haul their wind. The two formations drift apart and cease fire at 4:30 p.m., the English having suffered 120 killed and 354 wounded during this indecisive clash, the French, 222 dead and 537 injured. Rodney is obliged to transfer aboard the Conqueror because of extensive punishment absorbed by the Sandwich. He then draws off to berate his captains. De Guichen claims a victory but is constrained to abandon his Barbados plan, instead retiring into Basse-Terre (Guadeloupe) to refit.

MAY 9, 1780. While de Guichen's expedition is preparing to invade Saint Lucia, Rodney's fleet materializes off Guadeloupe, drawing the French out to sea. Over the next fortnight, both fleets circle warily, seeking an advantage. Fighting erupts on the evening of May 15, as well as on the afternoon of May 19, but produces no decisive result before Rodney stands away and de Guichen retires into Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique) on May 22.

MAY 18, 1780. Cornwallis leads 2,500 British troops inland to stamp out the last vestiges of armed Revolutionary resistance in South Carolina—specifically,

Colonel Buford's 350 survivors from the Lenud's Ferry disaster (see "March 29, 1780" entry), who are retiring north at Huger's prompting. It soon becomes apparent that Cornwallis's cumbersome army cannot overtake their more nimble foe, so the British general detaches Loyalist colonel Tarleton with 40 dragoons, 130 cavalrymen, and 100 infantrymen (mounted double with his riders) to press ahead of the main body.

Tarleton covers 105 miles in 54 hours, catching up with Buford shortly after noon of May 29 at Waxhaw (North Carolina). The Loyalist sends an officer forward under a flag of truce to call upon the Patriots to surrender, who refuse. The British vanguard thus meets and mauls the American rearguard under Lieutenant Pearson at 3:00 p.m. Buford then halts his retreat and draws his remaining 250 men up in a single line under cover of an open wood, while Tarleton deploys his attackers 300 yards away in three columns: 30 under himself on the left, 50 infantrymen and 60 dragoons under Major Cochran on his right, plus another 60 in the center. (His other 70 men are to form up as they arrive upon a small hill to the rear, acting as a reserve.) The Americans hold their fire too long as Tarleton's men charge across the field and are broken by its impact. The British commander's horse goes down, leading his men to assume he is dead, thus precipitating a slaughter of the surviving Patriots. A total of 113 Americans are killed and 203 captured, 150 of them too badly wounded to be moved, while British casualties total 19 men and 31 horses dead or injured.

MAY 26, 1780. Capt. Emmanuel Hesse descends the Mississippi River from Mackinac (Michigan) with 1,000 British and Indian fighters to assault the Franco-Spanish forces at Saint Louis (Missouri). The latter is defended by 25 regulars, 289 colonists, and 20 cannon under Capt. Fernando de Leyba, who, two and a half weeks previously, received warning of the enemy's approach. Finding its defense well primed, the English and their native allies retire without accomplishing anything.

EARLY JUNE 1780. A Spanish frigate enters Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique), bringing word that Adm. José Solano y Bote is arriving in the West Indies with the San Luis of 90 guns; the San Nicolás of 80 guns; the Gallardo (officially designated the San Juan de Sahagún), the Guerrero (also called the San Raymundo), the San Agustín, the San Francisco de Asís, the San Francisco de Paula, the San Genaro, and the Velasco of 74 guns; the Arrogante of 68 guns; the Astuto (officially designated the San Eustaquio) and the Dragón of 60 guns; the frigates Santa Cecilia and Santa Rosalía; the ex-English sloop Duque de Cornwallis; the xebec Andaluz; plus the storeship San Gil. This fleet is furthermore escorting 62 transports bearing 12,400 soldiers under Lt. Gen. Victorio de Navía Osorio, plus 38 merchantmen and 7 privateers.

De Guichen sorties with 15 French ships of the line, meeting this Spanish armada on June 8, and the next day he persuades its commander to put into Martinique with his main body, while simultaneously refreshing his convoy at Guadeloupe. Despite the offensive possibilities available to this combined host, however, the two admirals cannot agree upon a concerted plan of action against the English, and disease begins to spread aboard the crowded transports. Eventually, the two fleets sail together—but simply to deliver reinforcements to Puerto Rico before Solano proceeds on toward Havana, arriving early in August with 1,200 sick, while de Guichen visits Saint Domingue (Haiti).

JUNE 20, 1780. The veteran French admiral de Ternay appears southwest of Bermuda with the Duc de Bourgogne (flag) of 80 guns; the Neptune and the Conquérant of 74 guns; the Provence, the Éveillé, the Jason, and the Ardent (English prize) of 64 guns; plus the frigates Surveillante and Amazone. They are escorting 30 transports bearing 6,000 troops under 54-year-old lieutenant general Jean-Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, Comte de Rochambeau, destined to bolster the Americans.

Five sails approach out of the northeast, proving to be Commodore Cornwallis's 74-gun Hector and Sultan, 64-gun Lion and Ruby, 50-gun Bristol, and 32-gun frigate Niger, which are returning to the West Indies after escorting a British convoy northward. Mistaking this French expedition for a more lightly protected merchant convoy, the Ruby charges ahead of its British consorts, only to be nearly cut off by de Ternay's Neptune, Jason, and Duc de Bourgogne. After exchanging several broadsides, both squadrons continue on opposing courses, Cornwallis not wishing to engage a superior force, while de Ternay is reluctant to expose his troop convoy to unnecessary dangers.

The 74-gun Spanish ship of the line San Genaro, drawing by Berenguer. (Museo Naval, Madrid)

JULY 4, 1780. De Ternay and Rochambeau's expedition appears off Chesapeake Bay around sundown, sighting 10–12 ships inside, which they fear might be a British fleet. The French therefore stand out into the Atlantic that same night and, next morning, sail on toward Rhode Island, anchoring at Newport in piecemeal fashion between July 10 and 12 (except for one troop transport, which becomes separated and enters Boston on July 8). Rochambeau's army remains inactive for a year, reluctant to abandon de Ternay's fleet, which, as of July 21, is blockaded inside Narragansett Bay by the British under Arbuthnot and Graves with 11 ships of the line.

JULY 12, 1780. A half mile outside Williamson's Plantation (now Brattonville, South Carolina), a 400-man Loyalist camp—including some of Tarleton's cavalry—under British captain Huck is surprised by 90 American partisans under colonels Bratton and McClure. The British are pinned down between two wooden rail fences and quickly routed at point-blank range, suffering 90 dead and injured (including Huck, who is killed), as opposed to one American death. Such raids hamper General Cornwallis's preparations for a major offensive northward.

JULY 25, 1780. American major general Gates arrives at Coxe's Mill, assuming command over Patriot forces throughout the South and incorporating Maj. Gen. Johann Kalb's 1,200 men into his army. Refusing to support colonels William Washington and Anthony White, who are trying to build up a cavalry force for partisan raids against British lines, Gates orders his troops to immediately march upon the advance enemy base of Camden (South Carolina). Two days later on July 27 he directs his army to take a shortcut through barren country rather than advance by the longer route around Salisbury and Charlotte.

JULY 30, 1780. In an effort to further hamper British movements in South Carolina, 600 Patriots set out under Brig. Gen. Thomas (the "Carolina Gamecock") Sumter to attack the English outpost at Rocky Mount, on the vital Charleston–Camden Road. Arriving on August 1, the Americans find three log cabins protected by a ditch and abatis and manned by 150 British soldiers under Lt. Col. George Turnbull. Sumter calls upon the defenders to surrender, who refuse, sparking a general assault. The Patriots' lieutenant colonel Thomas Neal breaks through the abatis, only to be killed along with five of his men. Switching tactics, Sumter's men set fire to the buildings with burning wagons, and a white flag is hoisted—but promptly withdrawn when a sudden shower extinguishes the flames. After eight hours, Sumter breaks off and withdraws to the Catawba River, a dozen men being killed or wounded on both sides. Although he has failed to carry his objective, such harassment compels British forces to keep their forces scattered, protecting a vast expanse of territory.

AUGUST 3, 1780. Gates's advancing American army is joined by 100 South Carolina Patriots under Colonel Marion and Lt. Col. Charles Porterfield. Although despised by regulars, these guerrillas are dispatched into the interior to watch and report upon British movements, furnishing valuable intelligence.

AUGUST 5, 1780. American partisans under Maj. William Davie attack a Loyalist band under Col. Morgan Bryan, lodged in a farmhouse near Hanging Rock (South Carolina). This encounter, in which the Patriots capture 60 horses and 100 muskets, escalates the next day into a much larger clash when Sumter's contingent also arrives from assaulting Rocky Mount (see "July 30, 1780" entry).

The latter forms three columns and attacks Bryan and Col. Thomas Brown's Loyalist forces, driving them in on the British center. Loyalist major Carden attempts a counterattack from the right but is defeated by accurate Patriot fire. At this point, Carden seems to lose his nerve, resigning command to Captain Rousselet. Some 40 mounted infantrymen of the British Legion join in the fight, only to be driven back by Davie. While Sumter's men plunder the Loyalist camp, Carden pulls himself together and forms his men into a square, which holds out for the remainder of this engagement, supported by a pair of guns. By the time the Americans melt back into the woods, the British have suffered 190 killed or wounded, as opposed to 50 Patriot casualties.

AUGUST 6, 1780. Gates's army is joined by 2,100 militia under Maj. Gen. Richard Caswell and continues its drive toward the British base at Camden (South Carolina).

AUGUST 13, 1780. Cornwallis arrives at Camden with 2,120 British troops to reinforce its garrison under Lt. Col. Lord Rawdon, who has advanced 15 miles northeast in a vain attempt to check Gates's approaching American army at Lynch's Creek.

AUGUST 15, 1780. An American militia regiment under Col. Thomas Taylor surprises Fort Carey, a small fortification west of Wateree Ferry (South Carolina) protected by a redoubt. The Patriots overrun this outpost, capturing its commander, Col. Isaac Carey, along with 30 men plus 36 wagonloads of provisions. The Americans subsequently take another 56 wagons and 700 cattle and sheep, which had been driven from Fort Ninety-Six, before retreating upriver to avoid an approaching British relief column.

AUGUST 16, 1780. Camden. At 2:30 a.m. Gates's Patriot vanguard under Colonel Armand clashes with 40 British Legion irregulars from Cornwallis's Royalist forces at Parker's Old Field (northeast of Camden, South Carolina). Although 4,000 strong, Gates's army is ravaged by dysentery, and retreat is now impossible given his proximity to the enemy. At sunrise, the Americans discover Cornwallis's 2,100 men drawn up with light infantry on his extreme right, the whole British right wing being under Lt. Col. James Webster and its left, under Lord Rawdon. Gates places his militiamen on his left flank, opposite the British regulars, while his right is commanded by General Kalb. Six American guns are in the center, with the commanding general stationed 600 yards farther back.

Action commences when Webster attacks the American left, the Patriot militiamen throwing down their unfired weapons and fleeing in disarray. Tarleton pursues this throng, while Webster wheels upon the American main body. The American generals Gates, Caswell, and William Smallwood are swept away in this stampede; only Kalb's right wing mounts any sort of effective resistance. Although wounded, Kalb even mounts a brief counterattack before being mortally injured. The battle ends when Tarleton returns from chasing the broken militiamen and Webster drives the last American reserves from the field. Patriot losses total 800 killed plus 1,000 captured, as opposed to 324 British dead or wounded. Cornwallis subsequently advances toward Rugeley's Mill and prepares to invade North Carolina, while Gates retreats 200 miles into Hillsborough by August 19, eventually being succeeded as commander of the American southern forces by 38-year-old major general Nathanael Greene.

Fighting at Camden, based upon an oil painting by Alonzo Chappel. (U.S. National Archives)

On this same day of August 16, the French admiral de Guichen quits Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) to escort a Spanish merchant convoy toward Europe, leaving Commodore de Monteil in command of the 10 French warships at Saint Domingue.

AUGUST 17, 1780. Following the Camden victory, Cornwallis detaches Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton with 350 British Legionnaires and a cannon to fall upon Brigadier General Sumter's partisans as they retreat after disrupting British communications. Advancing up the Wateree River's eastern bank, Tarleton sights partisan encampments on its opposite side this evening. He bivouacs his own men without fires in hopes that the Americans will attempt to cross. But the next morning, Sumter continues north, so a still-undetected Tarleton follows to Fishing Creek.

By this time, the Loyalist foot soldiers are exhausted, so Tarleton uses 100 dragoons and 60 infantrymen to make a surprise descent. Catching Sumter's men while resting, the Loyalists charge. Sumter leaps coatless onto an unsaddled horse and flees (arriving at Maj. William Davie's camp two days later), while some of his men put up a fight from behind wagons, during which Capt. Charles Campbell is killed. The British suffer 16 killed or wounded during this assault, as opposed to 150 American dead and 300 captured. Almost 100 British prisoners are liberated, plus 44 wagonloads of supplies.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1780. Cornwallis takes Charlotte and prepares to penetrate deeper into North Carolina.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1780. Resentful at his failure to be fully exonerated after eight months of trial at Philadelphia on some petty charges of misconduct, Maj. Gen. Benedict Arnold—commander of the key American stronghold of West Point in New York's Hudson Valley—defects from the Patriot to the Loyalist cause. He flees into New York City when his treasonous secret correspondence with British major John André is discovered.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1780. Despite the British belief that revolutionary ardor is winding down in the Carolinas, 1,000 Patriots muster from both sides of the Blue Mountains, meeting up with several hundred South Carolinians and marching under Col. William Campbell toward the enemy base at Gilbert Town (behind Cornwallis's advance base). Loyalist major Patrick Ferguson sends for reinforcements and makes his stand on October 6 at King's Mountain (South Carolina).

OCTOBER 7, 1780. King's Mountain. Atop a position of considerable natural strength—a rocky ridge with wooded and boulder-strewn slopes—Ferguson becomes overconfident, detaching 200 of his 1,100 men to forage, while maintaining such poor watch that he does not notice eight Patriot columns bearing down upon him until Colonel Shelby's force comes to within a quarter of a mile. Ferguson then compounds his errors by ordering bayonet counterattacks each time the 900 Patriots storm the slopes, thus needlessly exposing his men to partisan counterfire.

Eventually, the Loyalists are pushed back and surrounded in their camp at the east end of this ridge. Ferguson is killed, and Capt. Abraham de Peyster assumes command. The Loyalists are overrun and massacred, 157 being killed, 163 severely wounded, and 698 captured; American casualties total a mere 90 men. This defeat compels Cornwallis to postpone his North Carolina offensive for another three months, while American morale soars.

OCTOBER 16, 1780. Bernardo de Gálvez, the Spanish victor at Mobile (see "January 11, 1780" entry), departs Havana with a new expedition comprised of 3,800 troops aboard 49 transports, escorted by seven warships, five frigates, a storeship, a brig, and an armed lugger. Two days later, however, this convoy is struck by a storm and compelled to turn back.

NOVEMBER 9, 1780. Learning that Brigadier General Sumter is at Moore's Hill (South Carolina) with 300 Americans, Cornwallis sends Maj. James Wemyss with 100 mounted infantrymen and 40 cavalrymen from the British Legion to disperse this group. The English encounter Sumter's outposts at 1:00 a.m. on November 9, five miles south of Moore's Battle of King's Mountain.

Hill. Wemyss is wounded in an arm and knee during this skirmish, after which Lt. John Stark leads a cavalry charge directly into Sumter's camp at Fishdam Ford. But the attackers are silhouetted against the American campfires, and they suffer heavy casualties that compel them to withdraw. Sumter also manages to escape, hiding by the Broad River until the British retire.

NOVEMBER 19, 1780. Advised that Sumter is marshalling 1,000 Patriots for an attack against a Loyalist outpost commanded by Col. James Kirkland on Little River (15 miles from Fort Ninety-Six), Cornwallis sends Tarleton to drive these partisans away. Sumter retreats, and to overtake him, Tarleton pushes forward with 190 dragoons and 80 cavalrymen, leaving his infantry and a 3-pounder to follow. The Americans reach the Tyger River by November 20, and when the Loyalists catch up with their rearguard, Sumter turns to fight at Blackstocks. On the American left is a hill with five log houses held by Col. Wade Hampton. Sumter also posts troops upon a wooded hill on his right, while Col. Richard Winn's men are held in reserve.

When Tarleton sees the strength of this positioning, he waits for his infantry to join. At the start of this battle, Sumter orders Col. Elijah Clarke to turn Tarleton's right, while he himself attacks the British center with 400 men. Both assaults are driven back, as is a subsequent try by Col. William Lacey against Tarleton's left. Sumter is seriously wounded in both a shoulder and the spine, after which Tarleton leads an unsuccessful cavalry charge and both sides withdraw. British Legion losses total 50 killed or wounded as opposed to 3 Patriots killed and 5 wounded; nonetheless, it is Tarleton who resumes his pursuit the next two days, as far as Pacolet River and Fishdam Ford, before Sumter's force eventually disperses. The Loyalists return to Brierley's Ford by December 1, but Sumter quickly recuperates from his injuries and resumes campaigning.

DECEMBER 12, 1780. Britain withdraws its ambassador from The Hague to protest against the support being offered to the American rebels by Dutch commercial houses. It officially declares war against the Netherlands eight days later.

JANUARY 1781. To counteract Arnold's activities (see "January 5, 1781" entry), and because a storm has driven Admiral Arbuthnot's blockading squadron off station, Capt. Armand Le Gardeur de Tilly

Benedict Arnold

Benedict Arnold V was born on January 14, 1741, in Norwich, the last of six children of a long-established Connecticut family. His merchant father had lost heavily in business, so young Benedict was taken out of school at Canterbury. At the age of 14, he became an apothecary's apprentice under his successful cousins Daniel and Joshua Lathrop. Arnold also joined a militia unit the next year, serving around Albany and Lake George early in the French and Indian War. He had apparently seen the native massacre of British prisoners after the surrender of Fort William Henry in August 1757, which may have instilled a lifelong hatred of the French.

When Arnold's mother died in 1759, the teenager was left to care for his alcoholic father and sister Hannah. When his father died two years later, young Benedict began to restore the Arnold name. With help from his cousins, he set up an apothecary and bookstore in New Haven by 1762. He bought back the family homestead the next year, which his father had lost against his debts. Arnold then sold it again for a substantial profit in 1764, using the money to buy three ships and begin a lucrative West Indian trade partnership. His sister managed the apothecary, while he sailed as far as the Caribbean, England, and Quebec.

Arnold had grown rich, but he was still arrested on the night of January 31, 1767, amid an angry protest against the Stamp Act. He was fined, released, and then married Margaret Mansfield three weeks later. He also rose in the militia to captain of the Royal Governor's Second Company of Guards. An ardent supporter of colonial rights, when news of the Battle of Lexington reached New Haven at noon of April 20, 1775, Arnold marched his 60 men to join the rebel army at Cambridge. Soon after arriving, he proposed the capture of forts Ticonderoga and Crown Point, which was approved by the Massachusetts Committee of Safety.

Although this plan was carried out, Arnold was disappointed when most of the credit went to his co-commander, Ethan Allen. By the time Arnold regained Cambridge in early July, his wife had also died. His winter campaign in 1775–1776 against the British stronghold at Quebec City was defeated, and Arnold was wounded in a leg. Still, he was promoted to brigadier general, placed in command of Montreal, and enjoyed Washington's trust. Despite fighting bravely in several more battles, though, he was also maliciously prosecuted for malfeasance and other minor financial irregularities, passed over for major general in February 1777, and fell out with General Gates.

Badly wounded at the Second Battle of Saratoga in October 1777, Arnold was given command of Philadelphia by Washington when he returned to active duty next June. Unhappy with the new alliance with France and at odds with various Patriot colleagues, Arnold was welcomed into the city's Tory elite. Engaged to the wealthy Margaret Shippen, his desire to resign his commission was delayed by more charges. All but two minor infractions were eventually dismissed on January 26, 1780, and Washington offered Arnold a high position for his spring offensive.

Yet the bitter former hero instead asked in July to be put in command of West Point, secretly scheming to hand it to the British. When this plot was uncovered, Arnold fled to New York City, forever disgraced. After the Revolutionary War, he settled in 1787 in St. John's (New Brunswick) before leaving four years later to live out the rest of his days in London.

sorties from Rhode Island with the ship of the line Éveill  , the frigates Gentille and Surveillante, and the cutter Gu  pe. They take a few English prizes, including the 44-gun Romulus, but otherwise effect little before being recalled.

JANUARY 5, 1781. The turncoat brigadier general Benedict Arnold appears before Richmond (Virginia), having reached Hampton Roads in December 1780 with Clinton's orders to destroy American depots throughout this theater, to obstruct the passage of Patriot reinforcements to Greene in North Carolina, and generally to encourage Loyalists to rise up against the Revolution. Although a major American supply center and seat of the Virginia legislature, Richmond has only 200 troops under Thomas Jefferson so cannot mount much resistance to Arnold's advance. Lt. Col. John Simcoe's Loyalist Rangers drive the defenders back from Richmond Hill, and Arnold offers to spare the town if British ships can come up the James River and remove tobacco from the warehouses. Jefferson refuses, and Arnold's army enters Richmond at 1:00 p.m. on January 7, burning its buildings before leaving that same day.

JANUARY 7, 1781. This Sunday morning, Hessian colonel Johann Ludwig Wilhelm von Hanxleden attacks the 150 Spaniards holding Mobile (on the eastern shores of this bay) under Lt. Ram  n del Castro. The raiding force, out of Pensacola, consists of 60 soldiers from the Waldeck Regiment, 100 from Britain's 60th Royal American Regiment, 200–250 Pennsylvania and Maryland Loyalists, 300 Choctaw Indians, and 11 militia cavalymen. Despite inferior numbers and the lack of any warning, del Castro repels this assault, his garrison suffering 14 killed and 23 wounded.

JANUARY 16, 1781. In South Carolina, Tarleton emerges from the rough country between Fort Ninety-Six and King's Mountain with 1,100 British Legionnaires, intending to fall upon the 1,050 Americans who have been disrupting the British rear under Brig. Gen. Daniel (the "Old Wagoner") Morgan, in conjunction with a pincer movement by Cornwallis's main body. Arriving five miles behind the American encampment, Tarleton finds Morgan forewarned and prepared to make a stand upon the Cowpens high ground. The Patriot general is joined that same evening by Col. Andrew Pickens's 70 men. He posts a forward line of 150 concealed riflemen with instructions to fire upon the British when they come within 50 yards, then to withdraw to Pickens's line, drawn up on the first crest of high ground 150 yards behind the riflemen. Again, this combined force is to fall back under Loyalist pressure to the left flank of a third formation, entrenched 150 yards up the hill and commanded by Maj. John Howard with captains Triplett and Tate on his left and right, respectively, and Captain Beale on the extreme right. A reserve waits a half mile farther back. In this way, Tarleton's men are to be lured into a succession of prearranged defensive positions.

JANUARY 17, 1781. Cowpens. At 3:00 a.m., Tarleton's Loyalist army sets out on a four-mile march toward Cowpens. As soon as cavalry patrols make contact, Captain Ogilvie is sent out to reinforce them and probe the American positions. Tarleton then draws up his main force 400 yards from Morgan's forward line and orders Ogilvie's 50 dragoons to drive in the enemy skirmishers. Accurate counterfire quickly empties 15 British saddles, but the Patriots nonetheless retreat. Unaware that this retirement is a trap, the Loyalists advance at 7:00 a.m., only to be checked by Pickens's line, thus suffering many casualties. Again, the Americans withdraw in a prearranged maneuver, although this time more precipitately. Nevertheless, when the British dragoons attempt a charge on the right, they are checked by Triplett's riflemen, then driven back by a counterattack from Patriot captains George Washington and James McCall. A second assault launched at 7:15 by Tarleton in person is slowed, but not entirely halted, by Howard's third American line, thus by 7:30 a.m. the Loyalist commander rides back and orders Maj. Archibald McArthur to envelop the American right.

The Patriots, while defending their flank, suffer a momentary disorder, and a general flight begins, promptly controlled by Howard. Still, the British follow the Patriots down the hill's reverse slope, only to be repelled when the Americans turn and fire a volley at 50 yards, followed by a bayonet charge. Simultaneously, Washington and McCall hit the British flank and rear, obliging Maj. Timothy Newmarsh's regiment to throw down its arms and surrender. The Loyalist right tries to escape toward the rear but is rounded up by American cavalry. On the left the Highlanders continue to engage Howard's entire line, until Pickens's militia joins this fight from the other flank, compelling McArthur to surrender as well. Tarleton, notwithstanding these reverses, rides back to order his British Legion reserve to charge into the dispersed American forces, only to have them turn and flee. Fifty men rally around the defeated Loyalist leader, who rushes to save his guns, only to arrive too late and see all his gunners slain.

Tarleton thereupon retires and is pursued by Washington, whom he turns back on and mauls before riding from the field and recrossing the Broad River with 200 dragoons, regaining his camp by January 18. Behind him lie 100 British dead, 230 wounded, and 600 captives; the Americans have only suffered a dozen killed and 60 wounded. This defeat proves a serious hindrance to Cornwallis's strategy and a great boost for American morale.

JANUARY 30, 1781. Sweep of the Dutch Antilles.

The Rodney quits Saint Lucia with 3,000 soldiers under Gen. John Vaughan to occupy Dutch possessions throughout the West Indies. After detaching a squadron under Rear Adm. Francis Samuel Drake to maintain watch over four French ships of the line lying in Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique), the main body proceeds toward Sint Eustatius, arriving by February 3.

Seven English men-of-war stand into its principal harbor of Orange Bay under Rear Adm. Samuel Hood, followed closely by the main force under Rodney himself, fanning out to prevent escape. Fourteen English ships of the line, three frigates, and several lesser consorts are already inside the harbor by the time the startled captain of its lone guard ship—the 38-gun Dutch frigate Mars—sends an officer out to inquire about the intruders' intentions. Even before this emissary can arrive, a British officer goes aboard the Mars to demand the Dutchman's surrender. The latter refuses to give up while his guns are still loaded, so he opens fire, only to strike after a token exchange of shot.

Meanwhile, Rodney sends another messenger ashore to demand the surrender of the entire island within an hour. Gov. Johannes de Graaff—with only 60 soldiers under his command—has no choice but to comply, the only resistance, which is quickly subdued, coming from a handful of American merchantmen in the roadstead. Rodney then detaches Hood in pursuit of a 24-ship Dutch convoy that has departed Sint Eustatius a few days earlier under escort by a 60-gun warship under Rear Adm. Willem Crul. The warship is overtaken and captured on February 4, along with all but one of its two-dozen charges. Rodney increases his haul by leaving the Dutch flag flying over Orange Bay for another month, luring many more ships—including a convoy out of Guadeloupe—into port to be seized. Altogether, 150 ships are taken, 60 of them American-owned, plus 2,000 American sailors.

On February 4, four of Rodney's warships occupy nearby Sint Maarten and Saba, commandeering another 40 ships. Smaller contingents are detached to occupy Essequibo, Demerara (late February), and Berbice in the Guianas, although Curaçao is not attacked, its Fort Amsterdam being considered impregnable.

FEBRUARY 1, 1781. Advancing across the Catawba River at Cowan's Ford into North Carolina, Cornwallis sends Tarleton with some British dragoons to attack an American militia band at nearby Tarrant's Tavern. They smash into the unwary Patriots, routing them, and narrowly failing to capture General Greene. Nevertheless, the latter is able to reunite with Brigadier General Morgan and retreat before Cornwallis as far as the Dan River before the British, in turn, are eventually forced to turn back south with a larger American army in pursuit. Although outnumbered, Cornwallis hopes to bring these rebels to battle.

FEBRUARY 12, 1781. This morning, a small Hispano-Indian expedition out of Saint Louis (Missouri) surprises the English garrison at Saint Joseph (Michigan), plundering and destroying it.

FEBRUARY 18, 1781. Greene detaches recently promoted Brigadier General Pickens and Lt. Col.

"Light Horse Harry" Lee across the Dan River to break up a Loyalist insurrection in North Carolina's interior. Hearing that several hundred men are marching to join the British at Hillsborough, Lee awaits them at the Haw River, with Pickens's force hiding in a nearby wood. On February 25, Loyalist colonel John Pyle arrives with 300 men, mistaking Lee's troops for members of the British Legion. Posing as Tarleton, the Patriot commander even convinces Pyle to pull his followers to one side of the road to allow his own soldiers to pass. Lee advances with his column and is in the very act of shaking Pyle's hand when the Loyalist left observes Pickens's force in the woods and opens fire. In a one-sided fusillade, the Loyalists suffer 90 killed and the rest wounded, while Lee and Pickens experience no losses.

FEBRUARY 28, 1781. Bernardo de Gálvez quits Havana with the 74-gun, 410-man flagship San Ramón of Capt. José Calvo de Irrazábal; the 36-gun, 290-man frigates Santa Clara of Cmdr. Miguel de Alderete and Santa Cecilia of Cmdr. Miguel de Goicoechea; the 20-gun, 154-man frigate Caimán of Cmdr. José Serrato; and the 18-gun, 110-man storeship San Pío of Lt. José María Chacón. They are escorting 28 transports bearing more than 1,500 soldiers of the Rey, Príncipe, España, Navarra, Soria, Guadalajara, Hibernia, Aragón, and Flandes regiments for an assault against the British stronghold at Pensacola. Spanish dispatch vessels are also detached toward New Orleans and Mobile to request additional contingents.

MARCH 8, 1781. The 53-year-old commodore Charles René Sochet, Chevalier Destouches, quits Rhode Island at sundown with his 80-gun flagship, two 74-gun ships, four ships of 64 guns, the 44-gun English prize Romulus, and a 32-gun frigate to escort a troop convoy to Virginia. The transports are carrying American reinforcements under 23-year-old major general Marie-Joseph Paul Yves Roch Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de Lafayette, and the 50-year-old, Prussian-born major general Friedrich Wilhelm Augustus Heinrich Ferdinand, Baron von Steuben. Next morning, however, Destouches's squadron finds itself alone on the sea, so proceeds toward its Delaware rendezvous.

MARCH 9, 1781. Pensacola. At 6:00 a.m., de Gálvez's expedition appears off Santa Rosa Island, disembarking its grenadier and light-infantry companies that same night, six miles east of the Punta Sigüenza battery, without opposition. When Col. Francisco Longoria's column approaches the next morning, this English redoubt is found abandoned, although some fire is then drawn from the anchored frigates HMSS Mentor (Capt. Robert Deans) and Port Royal, as well as from Red Cliffs Fort. De Gálvez responds by bringing two 24-pounders ashore and replying on the afternoon of March 11, obliging the English frigates to retire out of range.

Infantryman and cavalry trooper from Mexico's Príncipe Regiment, which took part in the capture of Pensacola. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

Shortly thereafter, the Spanish fleet tries to cross Pensacola's bar, but Captain Calvo de Irrazábal's flagship San Ramón draws too much water, so this attempt is deferred and supplies begin to be offloaded on Santa Rosa Island. After a week of vainly importuning the Spanish commodore to make a second attempt, de Gálvez boards his private brig Gálveztown, the sloop Valenzuela, and two armed launches and dashes past Red Cliffs on March 18. Shamed by his example, the entire fleet except the San Ramón enters the harbor between 2:00 and 3:00 p.m. the next afternoon, Calvo de Irrazábal's heavy flagship instead standing away toward Havana.

At 9:30 a.m. on March 22, 905 Spanish reinforcements under Col. José de Ezpeleta reach de Gálvez overland from Mobile, followed the next afternoon by 1,348 more sailing from New Orleans aboard 14 vessels, thus raising his total strength to 3,553 men. Such numbers allow his army to ferry across from Santa Rosa Island on March 24, landing on the mainland behind Barrancas. Meanwhile, British governor Peter Chester and garrison commander Col. John Campbell have already abandoned Pensacola in favor of their defenses around Fort George. Indian allies of the British harry the Spaniards when they march from Tartar Point (Punta Agüero) the evening of March 26 to circle around Moore's Lagoon and encamp southwest of Sutton's Lagoon. Another Spanish advance occurs on March 30, when they move their base still closer to the British citadel.

Still, de Gálvez does not attempt to institute a close siege of Fort George until after April 19, when Admiral Solano materializes from Havana with the warships San Luis (flag), Astuto, San Nicolás, Asís, Paula, Magnánimo, Guerrero, Gallardo, San Gabriel, Spanish capture of Pensacola.

Dragón, and Arrogante; the frigates Nuestra Señora de la O and Mexicana (hospital ship); plus the brigantines Pájaro and Renombrado. They are accompanied by a French squadron under the 55-year-old commodore François Aymar, Baron de Monteil: the 74-gun flagship Palmier of the Chevalier de Monteil, Destin of Dumaitz de Goimpy, and Intrépide of Duplessis Parfeau; the 64-gun Triton of Deidier de Pierrefeu; the 40-gun frigates Andromaque of the Chevalier de Ravenel and 22-gun Licorne of (possibly) Saint Urse; plus the brigantine Levrette and cutter Serpent. Some 1,600 Spanish and 725 French soldiers are traveling aboard under mariscal de campo Juan Manuel de Caxigal, as well as brigadier generals Gerónimo Girón and Manuel de Pineda. Admiral Solano furthermore contributes 1,350 of his crew members, swelling de Gálvez's host to more than 7,400 men.

On April 28, Spanish engineers commence digging a covered trench or tunnel toward a small hill, which commands Fort George's advance or Queen's Redoubt. This is completed three days later, allowing the besiegers to install a battery of six 24-pounders by May 1 while continuing their trench toward Pine Hill. The English destroy the latter with a sudden sally, killing 18 Spanish soldiers, wounding 16, capturing others, and spiking four fieldpieces, although operations press on regardless. On May 8, a chance Spanish round detonates the Queen Re-doubt's magazine, leveling it with a blast that claims 76 lives and wounds two-dozen others. Spanish light troops under Girón and de Ezpeleta immediately occupy its ruins, installing a new siege battery within point-blank range, which compels Chester and Campbell to request terms by 3:00 p.m.

The actual capitulation is effected two days later, on the afternoon of May 10, when 1,113 Englishmen surrender, yielding 193 artillery pieces, 2,100 muskets, and other booty. This campaign has cost the Spanish 74 dead and 198 wounded. Prisoners set sail for Havana on June 1, eventually being repatriated into New York by July 12. De Gálvez installs Col. Arturo O'Neill of the Hibernia Regiment as the new governor of Pensacola and west Florida before departing.

MARCH 15, 1781. Guildford Courthouse. In North Carolina, Cornwallis's 1,900 British troops turn and engage the pursuing 4,300 Americans under Greene. After a 12-mile march, the Loyalist vanguard under Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton clashes at 7:15 a.m. with a Patriot force under Brig. Gen. William Campbell and "Light Horse Harry" Lee. Tarleton distinguishes himself during this fight, despite a seriously injured right hand, while Cornwallis uses the distraction to draw together his other 10 columns and prepare to fall upon the enemy. The Americans deploy in three defensive lines, although not close enough to effectively support each other. Their front consists of a militia screen under brigadier generals John Butler and Pinketham Eaton, which stands behind a rail fence with its flanks supported by infantry and riflemen. The second line consists of 1,200 irregulars drawn up in woods under brigadier generals Edward Stevens and Robert Lawson, while the third, 550 yards farther to the rear, is commanded by brigadier generals Otho Williams and Isaac Huger. There is no reserve.

After an ineffectual artillery exchange, the British advance at 2:00 p.m., and the American front line flees after delivering a pair of volleys. The second Patriot line holds better, momentarily encouraged by a counterattack by Col. William Washington, until Lawson is wounded on the left and their will wavers. British colonel James Walker's first assault against the third line is repelled by accurate musketry, followed by a bayonet charge, although Greene demurs from attempting anything bolder. On the British right, Lieutenant Colonel Stuart then makes a final attack, driving back Washington's and Capt. Robert Kirkwood's men after some fierce

Hibernia Regiment

Irish soldiers of fortune served in European armies for centuries. Spain formed a Tercio de Irlanda or “Ireland Regiment” in 1698. When the Habsburg dynasty died out two years later, war against its new French Bourbon monarch ensued. Two more Irish regiments were therefore authorized as of November 1, 1709. Brought from France, they were read into the Royal Spanish Army on December 3. They became the Hibernia Regiment of Lt. Col. Randall MacDonnell, placed under the command of Col. Lucas Patiño, Marqués de Castelar, and the Ultonia Regiment of Col. Dermot MacAuliffe. All three units served bravely in the battles of Zaragoza, Brihuega, and Villaviciosa.

Once peace had been restored, the Hibernia Regiment was re-formed as the Primer Regimiento de Infantería Extranjera or “First Foreign Infantry Regiment” in 1714. Four years later, it was designated as the 2nd Hibernia Infantry Regiment. While fighting in Spain’s Italian campaigns, a young subaltern named Richard Wall transferred out of the Spanish Marine Corps to join the regiment as an ensign. He eventually became Spain’s chief minister, one of many Irish officers to rise high in the service.

Hibernia’s uniform had a distinctive green waistcoat, breeches, and turn backs, topped with a black tricorner hat and red tunic, plus white ceremonial gaiters. The regiment had been at the 1727 siege of Gibraltar, as well as landing in the North African enclave of Orán five years later. Irish refugees and new recruits fed its ranks. Hibernia’s crucial intervention during the Italian battle of Camposanto on February 4, 1743, was rewarded with a new regimental motto: In homnen terram exhivit sonus eorum, or “Their renown has spread into all lands.”

When the Royal Spanish Army was reorganized in 1749, the regiment’s designation was changed to the 28th Hibernia. It fought as such during the invasion of Portugal in 1762. Seven years later, Hibernia’s number again was changed to the 26th. Its soldiers shone during the disastrous assault against Algiers in 1775 led by a former officer, Gen. Alejandro, Conde de O’Reilly. Two years later, Hibernia took part in the much more successful Brazilian campaign.

For its prominent role in the capture of Pensacola, during which the regiment would suffer 16 killed and 27 injured, Hibernia’s commander, Col. Arturo O’Neill, was named as governor of west Florida. Most officers were also recommended for promotion. The regiment later helped defend Spain against French Revolutionary offensives and Napoleon’s invasion from 1808–1814. Four years later, Hibernia was dissolved, and its last battalion of Irish troops was absorbed by the Mallorca Regiment.

fighting so that, by 3:30 p.m., Greene orders a general retreat. The American commander retires three miles to await stragglers, then withdraws his army into Speedwell Ironworks at Troublesome Creek. Cornwallis remains at the Guildford battlefield until March 18, then draws back toward Wilmington. This mauling proves a Pyrrhic victory, though, for the English general’s smaller army sustains 532 total casualties, as opposed to only 78 killed and 183 wounded among the American pursuers.

This same day, March 15, in the West Indies, a small English squadron under Cmdr. Lawrence Graeme of the 18-gun Sylph is detached from Sint Eustatius by Admiral Rodney to occupy French Saint Barthélemy two days later.

MARCH 16, 1781. Commodore Destouches’s French squadron sights Vice Admiral Arbuthnot’s 90-gun flagship London in fog off the Delaware Capes, accompanied by two Royal Navy ships of 74 guns, four ships of 64 guns, a 50-gunner, and three frigates. Both formations close, running past each other and exchanging broadsides before separating, then breaking off the action at nightfall. Three British ships sustain considerable damage, and Arbuthnot retires south toward Chesapeake Bay. The French Conquérant of Capt. Pierre Marie, Vicomte de la Grandière, and the Ardent of Capt. Charles René Louis Bernard, Vicomte de Marigny, are also crippled, suffering the bulk of the 72 killed and 112 wounded in Destouches’s squadron; they oblige him, after a hasty conference aboard his flagship Duc de Bourgogne, to retrace his course north into Newport (Rhode Island).

APRIL 20, 1781. While Cornwallis’s army drives northeast through the Carolinas, his subordinate Lieutenant Colonel Lord Rawdon remains behind to fend off partisan thrusts by Greene. The latter detaches Brig. Gen. Francis Marion—also known as the “Swamp Fox”—and Lt. Col. “Light Horse Harry” Lee to operate in the east, while he himself marches 140 miles toward Camden, the principal British stronghold in South Carolina. Learning that Rawdon is prepared to receive him, Greene retires with his 1,550 men to Hobkirk’s Hill by April 20 to await reinforcement and resupply.

After some desultory maneuvering, the British commander decides to assault this position with 800 troops, finding the main American force drawn up on a hill with Capt. Robert Kirkwood’s regiment to the southeast covered by a pair of outposts under captains Perry Benson and Simon Morgan. Greene has kept his dragoons and North Carolina militia in reserve. Rawdon approaches from the southeast on the morning of April 25, Greene countering with an attempted double-flanking movement. The British are temporarily checked by close range fire from three guns, but as soon as the American line advances, Rawdon moves up his second line while extending his first. Thus, Greene is in danger of being outflanked, especially when Capt. John Gunby's regiment collapses on his left. The latter withdraws and tries to re-form, but the British right seizes this opportunity to break the entire American left. If the 5th Virginia Regiment does not hold at right center, Greene's army might be annihilated. A general retreat successfully ensues, followed by a gallant rescue of the three Patriot guns.

The next day, the American army moves back to Rugeley's Mill, taking their artillery and supply train with them. Although Rawdon has achieved a victory, his losses almost equal the Patriots'—38 British dead and 220 wounded, as opposed to 18 Americans killed and 248 injured—hence his smaller force is compelled to evacuate Camden and retire toward Charleston.

APRIL 22, 1781. Some 200 English settlers and Indians under John Blommart at Natchez, disgruntled by Fort Panmure's tame surrender to the Spaniards (see "September 6, 1779" entry), rise up against their occupiers. Although forewarned, Captain de la Villanueva and his 76-man garrison surrender the next day, after repelling the opening assault.

APRIL 25, 1781. Baffled by Greene's resistance in the Carolinas, as well as convinced that Virginia must also be reduced in order to put down the rebellion, Cornwallis marches out of Wilmington (North Carolina) with his remaining 1,400 redcoats to strike northward.

APRIL 28, 1781. Twenty ships of the line and three frigates arrive off Martinique from Brest under the veteran admiral de Grasse, accompanying a French convoy. Shortly before sundown, they learn that Fort Royal (Fort de France) is blockaded by 18 English warships under Hood, so they pause off Salines Point until they can gather greater intelligence from an officer set ashore at Sainte Anne. The French expedition then resumes its progression the next morning and sight Hood's formation at 8:00 a.m., which bears down to attack. De Grasse adopts a defensive posture, while the 74-gun Victoire and 64-gun Caton, Solitaire, and Réfléchi slip their cables to sortie from Fort Royal in support.

Broadships are exchanged by 11:00 a.m., just as de Grasse's convoy safely enters port. Despite his numerical superiority, the French admiral is satisfied to hug Martinique's coastline and fight a delaying action. At 6:30 p.m., Hood draws off, his 74-gun Russell and Centaur, as well as the 64-gun Intrepid, having endured the heaviest damage. Both sides suffer some 300 casualties, and no prizes are taken. On the evening of April 30, the British furthermore retire toward Saint Kitts, pursued briefly by de Grasse before he returns into Fort Royal by May 6.

APRIL 29, 1781. The Marquis de Lafayette reaches Richmond (Virginia) by sea with reinforcements, superseding General von Steuben as commander in chief of this theater.

MAY 8, 1781. The French 74-gun Pluton under the veteran captain d'Albert de Rions, accompanied by the 50-gun Expérimente and several frigates, quits Fort Royal (Martinique) with 1,300 troops under the 45-year-old colonel Philibert François Rouxel de Blanchelande to conquer Tobago.

That same day, another French squadron probes the eastern side of Saint Lucia, disembarking 1,200 men after nightfall under Governor General Marquis de Bouillé, who makes a brief reconnaissance before retiring with 100 English prisoners, regaining Fort Royal by May 15.

MAY 10, 1781. The 61-year-old commodore Louis-Jacques, Comte de Barras de Saint Laurent, arrives at Newport (Rhode Island) aboard the frigate Concorde to supersede Destouches in command of this French squadron.

MAY 20, 1781. Cornwallis reaches Petersburg (Virginia) from North Carolina. After joining his troops with those that have been operating under William Phillips and Benedict Arnold, plus further reinforcements from New York, his total strength is brought to more than 7,000 men.

That very same day, George Washington meets Rochambeau at Wethersfield (near Hartford, Connecticut) to devise a strategy whereby this British concentration might be destroyed by a convergence of Franco-American contingents, before Clinton can react from New York.

MAY 22, 1781. Admiral de Grasse learns that Hood has put to sea from Saint Kitts, so he dispatches a fast frigate to warn d'Albert de Rions and Blanchelande at Tobago, while simultaneously preparing to sail in support of this expedition with his fleet, plus the Marquis de Bouillé's troops.

MAY 24, 1781. French Occupation of Tobago. The expedition of d'Albert de Rions and Blanchelande disembarks at Scarborough, compelling Tobago's governor general Ferguson to retire into a defensive position atop Concordia Hill with 400 troops, 500 militiamen, 10 guns, and many noncombatants. Meanwhile, Rodney rejoins Hood at Barbados with his 90-gun flagship Sandwich and 74-gun Triumph. He learns on the evening of May 26 that Tobago has been attacked, so he orders Rear Admiral Drake to sail immediately to its relief with six ships of the line.

Such strength proves inadequate, as more French forces are also concentrating off Tobago's coast under Admiral de Grasse and Governor General de Bouillé. English and French squadrons meet and circle warily, while on Tobago proper, Blanchelande feels that he has lost the element of surprise so re-embarks his army the night of May 31. (That same night, the French ship of the line Hector loses its bowsprit in a collision with the César, being obliged to retire toward Grenada.) However, by noon on May 31, de Bouillé arrives overland with an additional 1,200 men, to take Ferguson from the rear. The French governor general sends his subordinate the Comte de Dillon to call upon the British to surrender, whose morale collapses, leading to the desertion of their regulars and capitulation by June 2. Meanwhile, Drake has rejoined Rodney at Barbados and informed him of the increased French presence off Tobago. The admiral sorties with 21 sail, coming within sight of de Grasse's anchored 23 ships on June 4. After observing the French from a distance throughout June 5, Rodney retires to his base.

Print commemorating the French capture of Tobago, May–June 1781. (Library of Congress)

LATE MAY 1781. In South Carolina, 1,000 Americans under Greene close in upon Fort Ninety-Six, a key garrison held by 550 Loyalists under Col. John Cruger and protected by a star-shaped redoubt with a stockade and abatis to its east and smaller Fort Holmes (for protection of watering parties) to its west. The Patriots institute a formal siege under the 35-year-old Polish-born military engineer, Col. Tadeusz Andrzej Bonawentura Kosciuszko, whose initial effort starts too close—70 yards—so is promptly wiped out by a sally. The Americans start afresh 400 yards away and by June 3 are close enough to the star redoubt to demand its surrender, yet are refused. The besiegers then bring a tower into action, but Cruger counters by raising his ramparts' height. Flaming arrows are fired into the fort, but the Loyalists strip the roofs off the buildings.

On June 8, Col. "Light Horse Harry" Lee arrives with some British prisoners from Fort Augusta and attempts to open new siege operations to the west, only to be repelled by yet another sally. At this point, Greene receives word that British reinforcements are on the march from Charles Town, so he orders brigadier generals Sumter, Pickens, and Marion to attempt to delay their advance. In the meantime, he launches a coordinated attack against Fort Holmes and the star redoubt by forces led by Lee and Col. Richard Campbell, respectively, both of which are repulsed. On June 19, Greene begins withdrawing toward Charlotte (North Carolina), and two days later the British relief column reaches Fort Ninety-Six under Lieutenant Colonel Lord Rawdon. American casualties during this siege have totaled 185 men, as opposed to 85 Loyalists.

JUNE 22, 1781. Natchez is reoccupied, without opposition, by a French force out of New Orleans under Etienne-Robert de la Morandière.

JULY 5, 1781. Having returned to Martinique from conquering Tobago, Admiral de Grasse sets sail with his fleet, escorting a 200-ship convoy as far as Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien), which he reaches three days later. Here he finds messages from the combined Franco-American leadership in North America requesting that he strengthen that theater. De Grasse duly takes aboard 3,200 troops furnished by Saint Domingue's Governor de Lillancourt, plus a small siege train, and sets sail on August 5, pursued by a 14-ship English fleet under Admiral Hood.

JULY 6, 1781. In Virginia, the British general Cornwallis decides to discontinue his northerly progression, retiring from Williamsburg to south of the James River with his army, so as to dispatch reinforcements by sea toward New York. Aware that he is being shadowed by an American army under the Marquis de Lafayette, the British commander tricks his opponent into believing that his main body is already across the James River by the afternoon of July 6, whereas in reality only Lt. Col. John Simcoe's rangers have traversed with the baggage train, leaving 7,000 redcoats concealed in the woods a mile along the Williamsburg-Jamestown Road.

American brigadier general Anthony Wayne's 500-man vanguard gradually drives back Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton's rearguard, little realizing that he is actually being lured into a trap near Jamestown Ford. Further forces join Wayne at 5:00 p.m., but just as he closes in upon the British position, Lafayette—at last grown suspicious—holds back some reserve troops, leaving Wayne only 900 men and three guns. The marquis thereupon makes a personal reconnaissance from the riverbank and sends Wayne a belated warning. At this moment the trap is sprung, and finding himself confronted by the entire British army, Wayne charges through a hail of grapeshot and musket fire, desperately holding off this enemy host for 15 minutes until his army can retreat in fair order to Green Spring. From here, he is eventually able to extricate his column under cover of darkness, having suffered only 130 casualties during this close call, as opposed to 75 killed or wounded among the British.

JULY 14, 1781. Threatened by American partisan forces under Brig. Gen. Francis Marion and Lt. Col. "Light Horse Harry" Lee, the British colonel John Crates withdraws his 19th Regiment and a company of mounted rangers from their outpost at Monck's Corner (South Carolina) into Biggin Church, then continues his retirement 18 miles farther, reaching Quinby Bridge on the Cooper River by July 17. After loosening the planks of this bridge, the British colonel waits for his rearguard to cross, only to then be overtaken by Lee. Captain Armstrong and Lieutenant Carrington lead an immediate American cavalry charge across the bridge, driving the English back; but the bridge's boards are so loosened that Captain O'Neal's force is unable to join, so the Patriots are compelled to retreat. When Marion arrives, he agrees with Lee that this British position is too strong to assail, but this verdict is then reversed when Brig. Gen. Thomas Sumter arrives at 5:00 p.m. and overrules them.

The British form a square, with their front covered by a howitzer and their flanks protected by buildings and fences on Capt. Thomas Shubrick's plantation. The Americans deploy with Marion's infantry on the left, Col. Thomas Taylor's militiamen in the center, and Colonel Horry's cavalry on the right. Taylor renews the action by attacking across a field, but is driven back by accurate counterfire. Marion charges diagonally, but after suffering 50 casualties and running low on ammunition, he must withdraw also. The American assault finally falters when Sumter fails to bring up his artillery, leaving Taylor furiously swearing he will never again serve under this brigadier general, while Marion and Lee begin their retirement, taking their dead and wounded with them. Sumter draws off, too, when he learns of 700 British reinforcements approaching, leaving the field to Crates.

JULY 21, 1781. While patrolling off Cape Breton (Canada) with the 32-gun frigates Astrée and Hermione, the veteran 39-year-old French campaigner Jean-François de Galaup, Comte de Lapérouse and Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, intercepts a British convoy escorted by the 28-gun frigate Charleston (ex-American Boston) of Capt. Henry Francis Evans; the 16-gun sloops Allegiance of Cmdr. David Phips and Vulture of Cmdr. Rupert George; plus the 14-gun armed ships Vernon and Jack. After a long chase, Lapérouse's pair engages the British escorts between 7:00 and 8:00 p.m., eventually compelling the Jack and another vessel to strike. The French then put into Boston to refit with their prizes.

AUGUST 19, 1781. After feigning an attack against New York to keep its British defenders under Clinton occupied, Washington and Rochambeau begin wheeling the bulk of their armies south to crush Cornwallis's redcoats before the British can react.

AUGUST 25, 1781. Barras quits Newport (Rhode Island) with 8 ships of the line, 4 frigates, 10 transports, and 8 American consorts to sail toward Chesapeake Bay.

AUGUST 27, 1781. Hood's fleet appears off Chesapeake Bay, but seeing no sign of de Grasse's expeditionary force (which he has unwittingly passed during his voyage), the British admiral sails on toward New York the next day, anchoring off Sandy Hook with his 14 ships of the line and 4 frigates by the evening of August 28.

AUGUST 30, 1781. De Grasse's fleet arrives off Cape Henry, at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay. He finds that Washington and Rochambeau are already hastening their armies south from New York by forced marches to reinforce Lafayette and von Steuben and attack Cornwallis before Clinton or the Royal Navy can intervene. The French admiral duly disembarks his troops under the Marquis de Saint Simon, who travel upriver toward Jamestown and join Lafayette's 1,800 men, awaiting them at Williamsburg. Once all these contingents begin coming together on September 7, they will eventually hem in Cornwallis at Yorktown.

AUGUST 31, 1781. Having been joined by Hood, Adm. Thomas Graves sets sail from New York with 19 ships of the line and 7 frigates for Chesapeake Bay to prevent any juncture between the French fleets under Barras sailing from Newport (Rhode Island) and de Grasse.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1781. Chesapeake Bay (Also Known as the Battle of the Virginia Capes or Cape Henry). This morning, Graves comes within sight of his objective.

BRITISH FLEET

Name	Guns	Commander
Van
Shewsbury	74	Robinson
Intrepid	64	Molloy
Alcide	74	Charles Thompson
Princessa	70	Charles Knatchbull
Ajax	74	Charrington
Terrible	74	Finch
Europa	64	Child
Center
Montague	74	George Bolven
Royal Oak	74	Ardesoif
London	90	Graves
Bedford	74	Graves
Resolution	74	Lord Robert Manners
America	64	Samuel Thompson
Centuar	74	John Inglefield
Rear
Monarch	74	Francis Reynolds
Barfleur	90	John Knight
Invincible	74	Saxton
Belliqueux	64	Brine
Alfred	74	William Bague
Adamant	60	Johnstone
Solebay	64	?

Besides his warships, the British admiral is furthermore accompanied by seven frigates. He is greatly surprised to discover a superior French force already anchored inside the bay. De Grasse immediately gives the order for all his ships except the Expérimente, the Triton, the Glorieux, and the Vaillant to exit, beginning this operation around noon. Contrary north-northeasterly winds hamper his sally, and Graves misses a golden opportunity to attack and destroy the enemy fleet piecemeal as it emerges and before it can form up into a cohesive line of battle. Instead, overawed by de Grasse's vast numbers, he reverses course out to sea and tightens up his own formation for the impending clash. Gradually, the French fleet exits and assumes an easterly heading.

FRENCH FLEET

Name	Guns	Commander
Van
Pluton	74	d'Albert de Rions
Marseillais	74	de Castellane Masjastre
Bourgogne	74	de Charitte
Réfléchi	74	Cillart de Suville
Auguste	80	Castellan
Diadème	74	de Monteclerc
Saint Esprit	80	de Chabert
Caton	74	de Framond
Center
César	74	Coriolis d'Espinouse
Destin	74	Dumaitz de Goimpy
Ville de Paris	104	de Saint-Césaire
Victoire	74	d'Albert Saint Hyppolite
Sceptre	80	de Vaudreuil
Northumberland	74	de Briqueville
Palmier	74	d'Arros d'Argelos
Solitaire	64	de Cicé Champion
Rear
Citoyen	74	d'Ethy
Scipion	74	de Clavel
Magnanime	74	Le Bègue
Hercule	74	de Turpin de Breuil
Languedoc	80	Duplessis Parscau
Zélé	74	de Gras Préville
Hector	74	Renaud d'Aleins
Souverain	74	de Glandevès

By afternoon, Graves edges downwind, and both vans converge into range and open fire around 4:00 p.m. At this point the wind dies away, leaving both fleets only partially engaged, yet a furious fight nonetheless erupts between the two advance divisions over the next couple of hours, during which HMSS Terrible, Montague, Shrewsbury, Intrepid, and Ajax receive considerable damage (the former being set afire and abandoned five days later) while the British suffer 79 killed and 230 wounded. The French also sustain punishment, with a total of 220 casualties.

Yet it is Graves who breaks off the action and retires, hovering in the middle distance over the next three days in hopes of gaining some advantage over de Grasse's larger fleet. Despite repeated maneuverings, however, the British are unable to find any significant opening, so by the evening of September 9, Graves decides to sail away for New York (which he reaches 11 days later), thus leaving Cornwallis's army isolated in Virginia. On September 10, the French fleet is joined off Chesapeake Bay by Barras's squadron from Newport, and the next day the British frigates Isis and Richmond are captured by de Grasse while attempting to reach the beleaguered British soldiers ashore, after which the French admiral returns to anchor.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1781. Eutaw Springs. In South Carolina, General Greene's Patriot army—now strengthened to 2,200 men—resumes its offensive, determined to surprise and overwhelm the last major British concentration in this theater: Lt. Col. Alexander Stewart's 1,800 men at Eutaw Springs.

The British commander learns of Greene's approach when one of his foraging parties brings in two North Carolina deserters. Stewart sends out a reconnoitering party under Loyalist captain John Coffin, who is lured into an ambush four miles outside camp, losing 5 men killed and 40 captured. Nevertheless, he manages to return and warn Stewart, who draws his troops up for battle. Maj. John Marjoribanks is posted on the British right (in a blackjack thicket as protection against American cavalry charges), while Coffin's foot and horse soldiers are held in reserve on the left and Major Sheridan serves as reserve in the right rear, holding a brick house. Stewart assembles the remainder of his forces facing south, at right angles to the Santee River.

At the onset of this engagement, Stewart seeks to merely hold his ground, but his left wing inadvertently advances, driving back the American militia. Greene plugs this gap with Brig. Gen. Jethro Sumner's troops, who drive the British back again, only to be in turn repelled themselves by Stewart's reserves. Greene thereupon commits his own reserves and, in fierce hand-to-hand fighting, the British left and center are driven back among their tents. However, Marjoribanks's flank holds, and Patriot assaults by both colonels William Washington and Wade Hampton are badly mauled. The American center meanwhile disintegrates as they swarm over the British encampment, while on the right, "Light Horse Harry" Lee hopes to link up with Maj. Joseph Eggleston and defeat Coffin, only to find that Eggleston has already been driven from the field.

The battle finally centers around the brick house, where Marjoribanks counterattacks against the Americans, first capturing their guns, then driving them back toward the woods (though himself mortally wounded during this latter action). Although driven from the field, Greene is better able to replace his 520 casualties than Stewart can raise replacements for his 690 killed, wounded, or missing. The British army is therefore obliged to withdraw into Charles Town, leaving South Carolina's interior once more in Revolutionary hands.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1781. Yorktown. A huge force of 20,000 American and French troops gradually begins coming together under Washington and Rochambeau—a large portion being transported down Chesapeake Bay by water—to begin invading Cornwallis's 9,750 British and Hessians, already cornered upon the Yorktown Peninsula by Lafayette, von Steuben, and Anthony Wayne. Realizing the seriousness of his plight, the British commander detaches lieutenant colonels Tarleton and Thomas Dundas to hold the town of Gloucester across the York River, while concentrating his main forces to dig defensive works close to Yorktown proper (not having enough troops to fully man a perimeter longer than 1,000 yards).

Eventually, Yorktown's inner line of defenses sprouts 14 batteries, 65 guns, and 10 redoubts, its principal strongpoint being the "Horn Work" to its south. Ahead of this defense are outworks to dispute the flat ground, while to the west—covering the Williamsburg Road—is the Fusilier Redoubt, with Redoubt Nine and Redoubt Ten on its opposite flank. A French force under Brigadier General de Choisy bottles up the British troops within Gloucester, while the main American army begins its investment of Yorktown on October 6 by commencing a

Washington consulting with his American and French staff officers at Yorktown. (U.S. National Archives)

2,000-yard parallel trench. Three days later, the besiegers' bombardment starts, and work gets under way on a second parallel.

At this point, it becomes necessary for the Americans to eliminate Redoubt Nine and Redoubt Ten, hence the former is attacked by a French force under Col. Guillaume Deuxponts and the latter by a mixed force under Lt. Col. Alexander Hamilton. (Simultaneous diversionary attacks are also mounted against the Fusilier Redoubt and Gloucester.) The British defenders of Redoubt Nine under Lieutenant Colonel McPherson inflict heavy casualties as the French penetrate their abatis and surrender after a bayonet charge; Hamilton's assault on Redoubt Ten is carried out successfully with few casualties.

There is no British counterattack, but the defense trains all its available guns upon these redoubts, now in enemy hands. The completion of the second parallel allows Franco-American siege batteries to be installed perilously close to the fortifications. A sally by British lieutenant colonel Robert Abercrombie's men is made at 4:00 a.m. on October 16 but proves only partially successful, and Cornwallis's desperate attempt to ferry his army across to Gloucester this same night is balked by a sudden storm and lack of boats.

On the morning of October 17, an even fiercer bombardment begins by 100 Franco-American fieldpieces, hence, by 10:00 a.m., the British commander requests a truce to discuss terms. The capitulation is signed at noon on October 19, the Americans and French having sustained merely 400 casualties during this brief siege as opposed to 600 British and Hessians—although 8,080 of them then march into captivity, effectively ending Britain's hopes of suppressing the American Revolution by dint of arms.

OCTOBER 19, 1781. Admiral Graves's fleet, reinforced by the arrival of six more Royal Navy ships at the beginning of this same month, quits New York with a troop convoy bearing 7,000 reinforcements for Virginia under Clinton.

OCTOBER 27, 1781. Clinton arrives off Chesapeake Bay with his 7,000 soldiers, too late to save Cornwallis, who has surrendered a week earlier.

NOVEMBER 5, 1781. All of Admiral de Grasse's fleet sets sail from Chesapeake Bay for Martinique, save the Romulus and two frigates, which are left in Virginia. The Victoire, the Vaillant, the Provence, the Triton, and the frigates Gentile and Railleuse are detached during this voyage toward Saint Domingue to escort a merchant convoy home to France.

NOVEMBER 16, 1781. French Reconquest of Dutch Antilles. A 1,200-man expedition sets sail from Martinique under Governor General de Bouillé aboard the frigates Amazon and Galathée, the corvette Aigle, and several privateer craft, to wrench Sint Eustatius back from the English (see "January 30, 1781" entry). Because of contrary winds, this island is not reached until the evening of November 25, and by 3:00 the next morning, only 400 Frenchmen have managed to struggle ashore through its high surf.

De Bouillé nonetheless leads the force in a march toward Sint Eustatius's capital, arriving at 6:00 a.m., just as part of the British garrison is exercising upon the beach. Mistaking the red tunics of an Irish contingent marching at the head of de Bouillé's column for friendly forces, the English are mowed down by an unexpected volley at point-blank range, promptly scattering. The English governor is seized as he returns from an early morning ride, while 200 French troops under the Comte de Dillon quickly overrun the barracks and another 100 under Major de Frêne capture the citadel. Soon, 700 captives are rounded up, after which de Bouillé sends detachments to re-occupy nearby Sint Marten and Sabá as well, before returning to Martinique.

NOVEMBER 26, 1781. Admiral de Grasse's fleet reaches Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique) from Virginia.

JANUARY 5, 1782. Saint Kitts Offensive. De Grasse and Governor General de Bouillé set sail from Martinique with 26 ships of the line and a troop convoy, reaching Salines Bay just south of Basseterre on the western coast of Saint Kitts by January 11. The British have already retired into their Brimstone Hill stronghold under General Frazer, so the French landing forces disembark without opposition and institute a siege.

On January 24, 22 English warships are sighted near Nevis under Admiral Hood, evidently intending to reinforce Saint Kitts with troops from Barbados and Antigua. De Grasse exits to intercept, but by the next dawn, Hood has veered toward Montserrat. Contrary east-southeasterly winds then impede the French fleet from reaching the British before they can circle north around Nevis and drop anchor in Frigate Bay, off Basseterre. De Grasse attempts some attacks against the anchored British expedition on both the morning and afternoon of January 26, which are beaten off, the disembarkation proceeding apace. During these naval engagements, the French suffer 107 killed and 207 wounded, compared to 72 dead and 244 injured among the British.

Hood's anchored warships prevent de Grasse's fleet, at right, from disrupting the British troop disembarkation in Frigate Bay, Saint Kitts. (National Maritime Museum, London)

On January 28, the 1,500-man British vanguard advances against the town of Basseterre under General Prescott, while its French occupiers fight a delaying action under Colonel de Fléchin until the Marquis de Bouillé can hasten reinforcements across the island. Prescott's drive is eventually held and repelled, but otherwise French efforts are hampered by the loss of their field artillery—a result of a wreck while approaching Saint Kitts—plus the capture of an ammunition ship by one of Hood's frigates. The Caton's 24-pounders are therefore disembarked and used by de Bouillé to batter Brimstone Hill into submission by February 12.

The next day, de Grasse ventures toward Nevis to escort an arriving convoy of French victuallers, while Hood avails himself of this opportunity to escape in the opposite direction with his smaller fleet on the morning of February 14. Saint Kitts is now in French hands; de Grasse and de Bouillé install a garrison and return to Martinique by February 26.

JANUARY 22, 1782. The former Dutch colony of Demerara is recaptured by the French naval captain Armand Guy Simon de Coëtnempren, Comte de Kersaint, with his 32-gun flagship Iphigénie and four lesser consorts. This conquest is followed by one at Berbice on February 5 and at Essequibo three days afterward. Five Royal Navy auxiliaries are seized during this operation as prizes: the 20-gun Orinoque of Cmdr. William Tahourdin, the 16-gun Barbuda of Cmdr. Francis Pender, the 18-gun Sylph of Cmdr. Lawrence Graeme, the 16-gun Stormont of Cmdr. Christmas Paul, and the 16-gun brig Rodney of Lt. John Douglas Brisbane.

FEBRUARY 22, 1782. The English island of Montserrat surrenders to a French squadron under Admiral de Barras.

LATE FEBRUARY 1782. Admiral Rodney reaches the Lesser Antilles with 17 ships of the line to reinforce Hood against an anticipated Franco-Spanish junction. Assuming overall command of this combined force, Rodney spreads his fleet between La Désirade in the north to Saint Vincent in the south so as to sight any vessels arriving by the trade winds across the Atlantic.

MARCH 14, 1782. Spanish commodore Enrique Macdonell sets sail from Trujillo (Honduras) with an expedition comprised of the royal frigates Santa Matilde and Santa Cecilia, the privateer frigate Nuestra Señora de la Concepción, four gunboats, and 16 troop transports bearing 1,000 soldiers. This force falls upon Roatán and bombards its three main batteries before storming ashore and exterminating this British outpost.

MARCH 20, 1782. A French convoy under escort by the 56-year-old captain Claude Mithon de Genouilly's 80-gun, 2,200-ton flagship Couronne and seven other warships reaches Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique), having eluded Rodney's blockade by circling north of La Désirade, then hugging the coastlines of Guadeloupe and Dominica. This evasion prompts the British admiral to regroup his fleet off Saint Lucia.

APRIL 8, 1782. At dawn, a 123-ship French convoy sorties from Martinique, escorted by the 50-gun ships Expérimenté and Sagittaire, plus the frigates Railleuse, Engageante, and Richmond (English prize). A few hours later, Admiral de Grasse also stands out to sea with his 33 ships of the line to protect these merchantmen against any pursuit by Rodney.

The British admiral sorties from nearby Saint Lucia with a similar-sized force as soon as his spotting frigates advise him of de Grasse's departure. Both fleets sail slowly up Dominica, becoming becalmed in its lee overnight. The next daybreak, Hood's van uses a faint breeze to overhaul the French rear, at which point de Grasse signals his whole battle fleet to turn and fight. Only 8 British and 15 French ships become engaged in the ensuing melee before the wind dies away; the Auguste, the Northumberland, the Sceptre, and the Citoyen bear the brunt of the fighting for the French, in which both HMSS Royal Oak and Montague are dismasted. But when another breeze springs up after several hours, allowing Rodney's main body to begin to close, the French break off the fight and return to guard their convoy. The British maintain their pursuit over the next two days in faint east-northeasterly winds, until de Grasse notices the Magnanime and the Zélé lagging astern at nightfall of April 11, near the Saintes island grouping between Dominica and Guadeloupe. Reversing course to provide cover, de Grasse's flagship Ville de Paris collides with the Zélé at 2:00 a.m. on April 12, destroying its bowsprit and mizzenmast and obliging the French admiral to delegate his frigate Astrée to tow the Zélé toward Guadeloupe.

APRIL 12, 1782. Les Saintes. At first light, the French fleet finds itself scattered, with the damaged frigate Zélé lagging astern and in plain view of the pursuing British. De Grasse, fearful that this laggard will fall easy prey, signals his fleet at 5:45 a.m. to reverse course and form a line of battle to intercept the approaching enemy. Learning of this maneuver from his scouting frigates, Rodney also gives the order to marshal his own column for an impending encounter, just as he is clearing Point Jacques on Dominica.

Because of the gentle easterly breezes, it takes the French an hour and a half to form up, and they do not steer southward until 7:15 a.m., with their van comprised of the 74-gun Hercule of Jean Isaac Chadeau de la Clochette, Souverain of Jean Baptiste de Glandevès, Palmier of Joseph Jacques François de Martelli Chautard, Northumberland of de Saint-Césaire, and Neptune of Laurent Emmanuel de Renaud d'Aleins; Commo. Louis Antoine, Comte de Bougainville's 80-gun Auguste under Flag Capt. Pierre Joseph de Castellan; the 64-gun Ardent of Jean Guillaume Michel de Gouzillon; as well as the 74-gun Scipion of Pierre Antoine de Clavel, Brave of Claude François Renart de Fuch Samberg, Marquis d'Amblimont, and Citoyen of Alexandre d'Ethy.

De Grasse's center consists of the 74-gun Hector of Claude Eugène Chauchouart de LaVicomté and César of Charles René Louis Bernard, Vicomte de Marigny; the 70-gun Dauphin Royal of Pierre Antoine de Montpérour, Chevalier de Roquefeuil; the 80-gun Languedoc of Jean-François d'Argelos, Baron d'Arros; the 104-gun flagship Ville de Paris under Flag Capt. Jean-Baptiste François de Lavilléon; the 80-gun Couronne of Claude Mithon de Genouilly; the 64-gun Éveillé of Armand Le Gardeur de Tilly; as well as the 74-gun Sceptre of Commo. Louis de Rigaud, Comte de Vaudreuil, and Glorieux of Baron d'Escars.

Commo. Louis Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, in the rear leads the 74-gun Diadème of Louis Augustin de Monteclerc, Destin of François Louis, Comte Dumaitz de Goimpy Feiquières, Magnanime of Jean Antoine Le Bègue, Réfléchi of Charles de Médine, Conquérant of Charles Marie de La Grandière, and Magnifique of Jean-Baptiste de Marcarty Mactaigne; the 80-gun vice-flagship Triomphant under Flag Capt. Jean-François du Cheyron, Chevalier du Pavillon; the 74-gun Bourgogne of Charles de Charitte; the 80-gun Duc de Bourgogne of Commo. Charles Régis Coriolis d'Espinouse, and Flag Capt. Pierre Joseph François Samson de Champmartin; plus the 74-gun Marseillais of Henri César de Castellane Majastre and Pluton of François Hector, Battle of Les Saintes.

Comte d'Albert de Rions. The French fleet is accompanied by the frigates Amazone of Ens. Charles Elzéar Bourgarel de Martignan (acting as captain in place of de Montguyot, slain earlier), the 26-gun Aimable of Lt. Jean-Baptiste François de Suzannet, Galathée of Lt. Joachim de Roquart, and Richmond of Lt. Victorien Henri Elzéar de Rochechouart, Vicomte de Mortemart; the corvette Cérès of Lt. Louis Jean-Marie, Baron de Paroy; plus the cutter Clairvoyant of Ens. François Robert, Vicomte Dach.

Forging northward to meet them is Rodney's fleet, another 10-mile-long column of warships led in the van by Rear Adm. Samuel Drake with the 74-gun Marlborough of Taylor Penny, Arrogant of Samuel Cornish, and Alcide of Charles Thompson; the 64-gun Nonesuch of William Truscott; the 74-gun Conqueror of George Balfour; Drake's 70-gun Princessa under Flag Capt. Charles Knatchbull; the 90-gun Prince George of James Williams; the 74-gun Torbay of John Gidoin; the 64-gun Anson of William Blair; plus the 74-gun Fame of Robert Barber and Russell of James Saumarez.

Rodney's center consists of the 64-gun America under Samuel Thompson; the 74-gun Hercules of Henry Savage; the 64-gun French prize Prothée under Charles Buckner; the 74-gun Resolution of Robert Manners; the 64-gun Agamemnon of Benjamin Caldwell; the 98-gun Duke of Allen Gardner; the 90-gun flagship Formidable under Flag Capt. Charles Douglas; the 90-gun Namur of Cranston Inglis; the 64-gun Saint Albans of William Cornwallis; the 74-gun Canada of Thomas Demarest; the 64-gun Repulse of Charrington; as well as the 74-gun Ajax of Robert Fanshaw and Bedford of Commodore Affleck.

Bringing up the rear is Hood with the 64-gun Prince William of George Wilkinson; the 74-gun Magnificent of Robert Linzee and Centaur of John Inglefield; the 64-gun Belliqueux of Alexander Sutherland; the 74-gun Warrior of James Wallace and Monarch of Francis Reynolds; the 90-gun vice-flagship Barfleur under Flag Capt. John Knight; the 74-gun Valiant of S. G. Goodall; and the 60-gun Yarmouth of Anthony Parry. The 74-gun Montague of George Bowen and Royal Oak of Thomas Burnett are limping along astern under jury-rig, while the Alfred has no commander, Captain Bayne having been killed in a clash on April 9.

Shortly before 8:00 a.m., HMS Marlborough and the French Hercule arrive opposite one other and open fire, so that the battle is joined. Traveling at two miles an hour, each fleet creeps past the other within 100 yards, exchanging broadsides. Shortly after 9:00 a.m., the wind begins shifting around to the southeast, bringing several French ships up short and thus opening gaps in their line, while not affecting British sailing. Rodney immediately takes advantage of this opportunity by leading his flagship Formidable through an opening astern the French Glorieux, followed by HMSS Duke, Namur, and Canada. He also signals Drake in the van to attempt the same, yet it is Hood who actually pierces de Grasse's line for a second time, astern of the César. These ruptures produce a confused melee, in which the Royal Navy ships—many armed with powerful carronades—pound their opponents at close quarters over the next several hours.

By 3:30 p.m., the Glorieux, the Hector, the César, and the Ardent have struck, while de Grasse's Ville de Paris is surrounded by British warships, which finally compel the 104-gun French flagship to surrender at 6:15 p.m., with almost 400 dead on board. The Royal Navy suffers 237 killed (including captains Blair and Manners) and 766 wounded during this encounter, but it loses no ships; French casualties are estimated at more than 3,000, mostly aboard their five lost vessels, although fatalities also include captains de Saint-Césaire of the Northumberland, du Pavillon of the Triomphant, and de La Clochette of the Hercule.

A wounded Commodore de Vaudreuil assumes command of the remaining French ships, detaching the Conquérant to carry word of this defeat to Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien), and arriving there himself on April 25 with his flagship Triomphant, the Bourgogne, the Réfléchi, the Magnanime, the Destin, the Diadème, the Sceptre, the Languedoc, the Dauphin Royal, the Citoyen, the Brave, the Scipion, the Northumberland, the Palmier, the Souverain, and the Neptune. (The Duc de Bourgogne, the Couronne, and the Magnifique are already at anchor, along with the convoy.) Meanwhile, Bougainville's Auguste puts into Curaçao to effect repairs, along with the Éveillé, the Hercule, the Marseillais, and the Pluton. They do not rejoin Vaudreuil's main body until one month later. The victorious Rodney remains off the Saintes for three days refurbishing his vessels, before detaching Hood with 10 ships to precede his fleet into Jamaica.

APRIL 19, 1782. While stemming the Mona Passage, Hood's 10-ship squadron sights 5 sail running before the wind, which prove to be the French 64-gun ships Caton and Jason, the frigates Astrée and Aimable, plus the corvette Cérès, which are fleeing Guadeloupe. Unable to resist against such overwhelming odds, all save the Astrée surrender to the British.

APRIL 22, 1782. Fall of the Bahamas. A Hispano-American expedition begins standing out of Havana. It is comprised of 59 vessels (12 of them American) escorted by the 40-gun frigate South Carolina of Commo. Alexander Gillon. They bear 1,500 sailors, plus a small Spanish army under Lt. Gen. Juan Manuel de Caxigal, governor of Havana, that includes 668 regulars of the Guadalajara Regiment, 594 of the España, 326 from Mexico's Corona Regiment, 140 artillerymen and support staff, 50 light infantrymen, plus 202 black militiamen. It takes the convoy a week to clear port, Matanzas not being sighted until April 30, Bimini on May 2, then Nassau itself by the evening of May 5.

The next afternoon, a surrender demand is set ashore, which Gov. John Maxwell accepts on May 7; the actual British capitulation is signed the next day. Although the defenders number more than 1,400 men—274 regulars, 338 militiamen, and 800 sailors—wealthy plantation owners fear hazarding their properties and goods in an all-out battle and, furthermore, distrust the loyalty of many of their retainers. Therefore, without enduring a single casualty, the Spaniards gain 153 artillery pieces, plus 77 prizes lying in the roadstead.

Gillon, disgruntled by the fact that the Spanish have claimed the victory and all spoils, quits the venture at this point, preferring to sail directly for Philadelphia on May 14 rather than escort the Spanish expedition back to Havana or Haiti, as he had promised. Caxigal also departs Nassau a few days later, leaving behind a 300-man garrison under Capt. Antonio Claraco y Sanz, plus 7 small Spanish men-of-war crewed by 150 sailors under Capt. Raymundo Andrés.

MAY 31, 1782. The veteran captain Lapérouse sets sail from Cap-François (modern Cap-Haïtien) with his new command, the Sceptre, plus the frigates Astrée and Engageante under Lieutenants de Langle and de La Jaillie, respectively, bearing 250 soldiers, 40 artillerymen, four fieldpieces, and two mortars to campaign against the British in Hudson's Bay (Canada).

JULY 4, 1782. The Marquis de Vaudreuil quits Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) with his fleet, escorting a Spanish contingent as far as Havana before steering north up the Atlantic Seaboard with his 13 ships of the line.

AUGUST 8, 1782. The French commodore Lapérouse, having circled into Hudson's Bay (Canada) by mid-July with his ship of the line, the Sceptre, as well as the frigates Astrée and Engageante, arrives this day within sight of the entrance to Churchill River (Manitoba). The next day, he disembarks his few hundred troops and calls upon the chief English factor for this outpost, Samuel Hearne, to surrender. The latter immediately complies, and Fort Prince of Wales is partially destroyed after its supplies and furs are taken. Nearby York Factory is also successfully attacked on August 24, after which Lapérouse—his presence now pressed by bad weather—departs toward Europe, having carried out his commission without losing a single man and treating his captives with great kindness.

AUGUST 10, 1782. Vaudreuil's French fleet anchors off Boston for repair and resupply, except the Magnifique, which is wrecked while being piloted into Nantasket Bay. (A grateful American Congress will offer to replace their allies' loss with the brand-new, 74-gun USS America.)

SEPTEMBER 4, 1782. The 60-year-old British admiral Hugh Pigot reaches New York from the West Indies, having followed Vaudreuil northward.

OCTOBER 17, 1782. Commo. James Kempthorne is cruising off Saint Domingue (Haiti) with his 98-gun, 743-man flagship HMS London; the 82-gun, 594-man Torbay of Capt. John Lewis Gidoin; and the 14-gun sloop Badger, when two sail approach, which prove to be the 74-gun, 734-man Scipion of 39-year-old captain Nicolas René Henri, Comte de Grimoüard, and the 32-gun, 275-man frigate Sibylle. After a prolonged chase, the French pair succeeds in crippling their larger British pursuers, although the Scipion then strikes a rock while attempting to anchor in Samaná Bay on October 19 and sinks the next day.

DECEMBER 6, 1782. British rear admiral Sir Richard Hughes intercepts a small French convoy off Martinique. During this action, the 72-gun HMS Ruby of Capt. John Collins captures the 64-gun, 1,521-ton Solitaire of 49-year-old Jean-Charles de Borda, killing 35 and wounding 55 of its crew members.

DECEMBER 20, 1782. The 54-gun, 297-man, 891-ton HMS Diomedé of Capt. Thomas Lennox Frederick, supported by the 40-gun, 217-man, 699-ton frigate Quebec, sight the 40-gun, 450-man South Carolina of Capt. John Joyner off the Delaware, chasing it for 18 hours. The powerful American vessel eventually surrenders after a two-hour fight.

JANUARY 20, 1783. The preliminaries to the Treaty of Versailles are signed between French and British plenipotentiaries, coming into effect one month later in Europe and two months later in the Americas.

MARCH 2, 1783. The 44-gun Royal Navy frigate Resistance of Capt. James King, along with the 14-gun sloop Duguay Trouin of John Fish, captures the 28-gun French frigate Coquette of the Marquis de

Loyalists

About 15–20 percent of the white population in the 13 colonies stayed loyal to the British Crown during the Revolutionary War, some 500,000 out of 3 million inhabitants. Members of this Tory minority were on average older, wealthier, and better educated than the 40 percent who came to fully embrace the Patriot cause. The other 40 percent of the population remained neutral.

Some Tories were merchants, but many were also people of simple means. When fighting first flared in the spring of 1775, thousands of the richest Tories began moving to England or elsewhere in the empire. Patriot administrations quickly took over every colony, as all royal governors were withdrawn by London. The harsh measures that had previously been used against Patriot agitators were now turned against outspoken Tories. Their properties were confiscated, critics were jailed, and some were even subjected to abuse. As the war deepened, the Continental Congress passed a resolution in October 1775 calling for the arrest of any Loyalist deemed a danger to "the liberties of America." Documents known as "association tests" were circulated to be signed in a public show of support. Some neutrality was tolerated, although always viewed under a cloud of suspicion.

By the time the Declaration of Independence was passed on July 4, 1776, the plight of Loyalist civilians had become very difficult. Many simply chose to endure passively. After a British seaborne expedition seized New York City in September, many also fled there. Later offensives created similar coastal enclaves at Savannah (Georgia) and Charles Town (South Carolina). Some 50,000 Loyalists eventually served in British North American regiments or militia units.

After liberty was won early in 1783, some 100,000 Loyalists left the United States altogether. New York saw the largest exodus, the last ships leaving there by November 25. About 60,000 of these displaced Tories resettled in Canada. Another 20,000 departed from southern states for the Bahamas or the British West Indies.

Grasse Briançon. From his prisoners, King moreover learns that French forces have recently occupied Turk's Island north of Santo Domingo and informs his colleague Horatio Nelson.

Although hostilities are plainly winding down, Nelson sails toward this objective with his 28-gun frigate Albemarle, Cmdr. Charles Dixon's 14-gun sloop Drake, and one other vessel, arriving by March 7. After sending an officer inshore with a surrender demand, which is refused, Nelson bombards the island overnight, then sends Dixon to disembark with 167 men the next dawn. The 150 well-entrenched defenders easily repulse this assault, wounding 8 Englishmen and obliging Nelson to reembark his men by the morning of March 9 and to sail away.

MARCH 30, 1783. Bahamian Reconquest. A 24-year-old Loyalist militia colonel named Andrew Deveaux—exiled from Beaufort, South Carolina, because of the Patriots' victory—sorties from St. Augustine with 70 followers, to be joined at sea two days later by the 26-gun privateer brigantine Perseverance of Thomas Dow and 16-gun, 120-man brigantine Whitby Warrior of Daniel Wheeler. This expedition anchors off Harbour and Eleuthera islands by April 6, recruiting another 170 volunteers for an attempt against the Spanish garrison at New Providence (Nassau). Four days later, the Cuban sloop Flor de Mayo also reaches the Bahamian capital with a message from the new governor of Havana, Luis de Unzaga, advising that peace preliminaries have been signed back in Europe and that the Bahamas are to be restored to British rule in exchange for Florida.

When Deveaux's flotilla draws near to New Providence on April 13, the Spanish commander, Claraco, mistakes them for petty smugglers. His customs patrols are surprised the next dawn to find—rather than clandestine traders—a heavily armed landing party storming ashore to occupy Fort Montague and seize the three guard boats. Claraco retreats into his citadel, and a brief truce is arranged, which Deveaux rescinds the next day. The Spaniards then scuttle their remaining warships on April 16 and huddle within their fort until they decide to give up two days later and are repatriated to Cuba.

LESSER HOSTILITIES (1780–1790)

NOVEMBER 4, 1780. Tupac Amaru Rebellion. While returning into Tinta (Peru) from a banquet celebrating the king's feast day, 38-year-old Gabriel de Condorcanqui, Marqués de Oropesa—an Inca better known as Tupac Amaru, Chief of Tungasuca—captures the cruel Spanish corregidor Antonio de Arriaga and executes him in Tungarica six days later. A popular uprising immediately explodes, Tupac Amaru leading 20,000 Indians and 300 mestizo followers in an invasion of Quispicanchi Province, slaughtering the hastily assembled forces of corregidor Fernando Cabrera at Sangarará. The distant viceroy, Agustín de Jáuregui y Aldecoa, attempts to placate these rebels from his capital of Lima by banning forced native labor on December 7, while simultaneously dispatching 200 troops into the Andes.

The insurrection sweeps heedlessly on toward Cuzco, which is defended by 3,200 men under colonels Manuel Villalta and Gabriel de Avilés y del Fierro. Although they have few trained soldiers, an advance unit under sargento mayor or “garrison commander” Joaquín Valcarce nonetheless inflicts some 300 casualties upon Tupac Amaru's host in January 1781 where it is hesitating six miles outside Cuzco. More Crown reinforcements arrive on February 23 under mariscal de campo José del Valle y Torres, who sets about reorganizing Cuzco's militias, until this district has more than 15,000 royalist defenders. Going over onto the offensive on March 9, del Valle's army is attacked at dawn of the 22nd by Tupac Amaru after a heavy snowfall, which dampens the Spaniards' powder. No decision is reached in this skirmishing until Friday, April 6, however, when the rebels are defeated and del Valle occupies their headquarters at Tinta. Tupac Amaru flees to Langui, only to be betrayed to the Spaniards, who draw and quarter him on May 18—along with his wife, Micaela Bastidas, son Hipólito, and other adherents.

The rebellion continues under the leadership of Tupac Amaru's brother Diego Cristóbal or “Tupac Katari” and surviving son Mariano. Chucuito is overrun, and Puno is hard-pressed, although a royal-ist force under Lt. Col. José Reseguín then defeats the mestizo rebel Luis Laso de la Vega at Tupiza. The final campaign is launched by Diego Cristóbal, who attacks Sorata and lays siege to La Paz (Bolivia), with perhaps as many as 40,000 Indians. After 109 days, this city is relieved by a royalist column in June 1781, and when Diego Cristóbal attempts a second siege, his forces are scattered by 7,000 reinforcements from Oruro under Reseguín. The Inca leader finally accepts the general amnesty offered by the Spaniards on September 10 and surrenders.

When Felipe Velasco—better known as Tupac Inca Yupanqui—mounts another short-lived uprising at Huarochirí (near Lima) a year and a half later, he is quickly arrested and hanged on July 7, 1783. Twelve days later, Diego Cristóbal and other past rebel leaders are also executed, their tongues being cut out before they are drawn and quartered.

MARCH 16, 1781. Comunero Revolt. Amid growing discontent throughout Nueva Granada (Colombia) due to increased royal taxes imposed by the inspector general, Juan Francisco Gutiérrez de Piñeres, plus the precedent of Tupac Amaru's rebellion in Peru farther to the south, a mob led by José Delgadillo runs riot in the town of Socorro. Other towns quickly follow suit, and by April some 6,000 comuneros or "commoners" have gathered at Socorro, electing Juan Francisco Berbeo as their leader. Inspector General Gutiérrez sends a company of troops under Captain Barrera to put down this mutiny, but they are defeated at Puente Real outside Vélez, further inflaming this uprising. Berbeo next marches on the distant capital of Santa Fe de Bogotá, gathering more adherents every step of the way and prompting Gutiérrez to flee toward Honda on May 13. At the end of that same month, the comuneros are joined by the Zipa Indian chieftain Ambrosio Pisco, who is proclaimed Lord of Chía and Prince of Bogotá.

On June 4, the rebels present their demands—Gutiérrez's dismissal, repeal of all taxes, and greater Creole participation in government—to the remaining viceregal authorities, who accede and sign the so-called Zipaquirá Pact three days later. Berbeo's tens of thousands of followers disperse, but another leader named José Antonio Galán persists with the revolt north of Bogotá, while at Neiva the royal governor Policarpo Fernández is slain. Meanwhile, 500 regular troops reinforce Bogotá on August 15, and Viceroy Manuel Antonio Flores declares the Zipaquirá Pact null and void. The natives of Nemo-con rise and kill their overseer, provoking military reprisals, and the revolt collapses. Galán is forsaken by his last few adherents and escapes to Chagónuete, only to be captured by soldiers and executed on February 1, 1782. Many other executions and arrests follow, marking an end to this insurrection.

JULY 17, 1781. In northern Mexico, Yuma Indians rise up against Spanish rule, eradicating the newly established outposts of Colorado, Purísima Concepción, and San Pedro y San Pablo de Bicuñer. This setback brings an effective halt to Spanish expansion into this territory.

NOVEMBER 11, 1781. The 52-year-old colonel Juan de Ugalde, governor of the borderland province of Coahuila, leads 175 soldiers on a two-and-a-half month sweep through the arid Bolsón de Mapimí south of Texas's Río Grande and Pecos rivers, searching in vain for Mescalero Apache raiders; despite skirmishing with isolated bands four times, he only slays 7 warriors, while Indian parties assault Alamos, Parras, and other lesser settlements during his absence, killing 80 Spanish residents.

MARCH 9, 1782. Ugalde launches a second campaign through the Bolsón de Mapimí with 194 soldiers and 2 Lipan scouts. He slays 10 Mescaleros and captures 38, as well as 517 horses, before finally returning into his base camp on June 24.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1782. Ugalde quits the Hacienda de Sardinias in eastern Coahuila with 220 soldiers, 9 Apache scouts, 48 Lipan allies, 250 porters, and 2,000 horses and spends the next six months crisscrossing 3,300 miles through the Bolsón de Mapimí without sighting any more than a handful of its elusive Mescaleros. Nevertheless, by the time he reenters Monclova on March 15, 1783, Ugalde's remorseless pursuit has obliged many of these raiders to retire north of the Río Grande with their families.

JUNE 11, 1784. A Spanish expedition quits Havana under Brig. Gen. Vicente de Céspedes, escorting several thousand settlers who are to reoccupy St. Augustine.

JANUARY 1786. A major Spanish expedition quits Cartagena under mariscal de campo or "field marshal" Antonio de Arévalo to pacify the untamed shoreline of the Gulf of Urabá and northeastern Panama.

This effort proves successful, the new town of Caimán is established, and Forts San Rafael and San Gabriel are erected in April and May, respectively, to protect the newly created settlements of San Elías (Mandinga) and Nuestra Señora de la Concepción in the Gulf of San Blas. By August, the Spaniards reach Caledonia Bay (formerly occupied by the Scots; see “Darien Disaster” in Volume 1), where they found Carolina del Darien, then later build Príncipe Fort at the mouth of the Sabana River on the Pacific coast.

FEBRUARY 23, 1786. Now promoted to rear admiral, Lapérouse reaches Concepción (Chile) with his frigates Astrolabe and Boussole, having rounded Cape Horn. This peacetime expedition is funded by the French government and the Académie des Sciences to explore the Pacific. By April 9 he reaches Easter Island, then Maui (Hawaii) in May. On June 23, the Astrolabe and Boussole site Mount Saint Elias (on the modern Alaska–Canada border), before veering down the west coast of America, taking surveys. By September 14 they reach Monterey, refreshing in this California port before Lapérouse strikes out into the Pacific, eventually being lost with all hands in June 1788.

JULY 21, 1787. With help from the Englishman Henry Hooper, the Spanish authorities in Colombia are able to sign a peace treaty with the natives in the Gulf of Urabá.

SUMMER 1790. Britain’s “Spanish Armament.” In retaliation for a Spanish expedition sent to Vancouver to eject a new English trading settlement, the British government authorizes a massive naval buildup to pressure Madrid into reversing this action, which becomes known as the “Spanish Armament.” Eventually swelling to 29 ships of the line, 9 frigates, 2 sloops, 4 cutters, and 2 fireships under Adm. Richard, Lord Howe, this fleet puts to sea—without any declaration of war—during August and September of this same year, while Rear Adm. Samuel Cornish sails to the West Indies with 6 ships of the line in October. The Spanish government finally bows to Britain’s terms on October 28, agreeing to restore Nootka Sound and compensate its dispossessed English settlers.

French Revolution

By 1787, excessive spending and an outdated tax system had sapped France’s royal finances. King Louis XVI was informed that he should rewrite the antiquated laws by convening the Estates-General, a legislative body that had not met since 1614. The aristocracy and clergy were opposed to this strategy, but attempts to impose new taxes—while France’s lower classes were in the midst of suffering hardship and famine—sparked protests, the worst at Grenoble on June 7, 1788. Alarmed foreign creditors threatened to withdraw their loans, so that the king reluctantly agreed on August 8 to call the Estates-General for the next May.

Great expectations were raised, as well as unease in certain sectors. Members of the ruling elite favored retention of the absolute monarchy, as well as feudal rights for the nobility and clergy. They wanted only rubber-stamp approval of the king’s requests. But pent-up frustrations, resentment, and distrust grew among the urban bourgeoisie, rural peasants, and intellectual exponents of the Enlightenment. Six weeks after the Estates-General opened at Versailles on May 5, 1789, the Third Estate—comprised of delegates from the middle class and peasantry—voted themselves as a “National Assembly.” They then invited the other two Estates to merge with them, which many clerical and some noble representatives also joined.

Concerned by these developments, Louis XVI brought regiments into the capital and—on the advice of conservative counselors such as his Queen, Marie Antoinette—dismissed his reformist minister Jacques Necker on July 11, 1789. Believing that these acts were a prelude to military intervention, a Parisian mob stormed the hated Bastille prison three days later, killing its governor and several guards. The mayor of Paris was also murdered, to which the king failed to react. Soon, nobles began fleeing, while violence swept through the countryside. Many chateaux were torched, and uncertainty grew so rampant that this period was remembered as the Grande Peur or “Great Fear.”

The Assembly struggled to guide matters, abolishing all feudal privileges as of August 4, 1789, and issuing a “Declaration of the Rights of Man” three weeks later (based upon the American Declaration of Independence). Popular sentiment compelled the king and royal family to relocate from Versailles into Paris on October 6, escorted by 20,000 National Guards. All church properties were also confiscated as of December 2, and aristocrats were systematically removed from the army, navy, and government starting the next year. Eventually, such reforms turned increasingly radical, until the nation was plunged into war and the “Reign of Terror.”

DISCORD IN THE EARLY AMERICAN REPUBLIC AND OLD NORTHWEST INDIAN WARS (1786–1795)

In the immediate aftermath of U.S. independence from Great Britain, there ensues a period of economic hardship for the young nation because of its lost export markets, felt especially severely in New England. Against a backdrop of monetary collapse and depression, bankrupt state governments further impose a heavy taxation burden, provoking a brief flurry of armed protests.

A more protracted struggle ensues in the inland wilderness, where 250,000 square miles west of the Alleghenies and north of the Ohio River (modern Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, and part of Minnesota) pass under American control from the British as of July 1787. A confederacy of Miami, Shawnee, Pottawatomie, and Chippewa tribes resist this transfer, disputing American settlement in the “Northwest Territory.”

LATE AUGUST 1786. In an attempt to prevent any more foreclosures, forfeitures, or imprisonments for debt, a mob of 1,500 armed men closes the courthouse at Northampton (Massachusetts). Over the next few weeks, similar actions are carried out in neighboring Middlesex, Bristol, and Worcester counties, while antigovernment sentiment also spreads into Rhode Island, Vermont, and New Hampshire. Gov. James Bowdoin is powerless to control these self-styled Massachusetts “Regulators”—their name derived from an earlier Carolinian revolt (see “May 16, 1771” entry in “Boundary Disputes,” Volume 1)—so the governor raises a regiment of state militiamen under Major General Lincoln.

NOVEMBER 1786. Capt. Job Shattuck of Groton (Connecticut) attempts to close the courthouse in Middlesex County and is subsequently defeated, wounded, and imprisoned in Boston along with his two lieutenants by Massachusetts state militiamen. His rebel followers disperse westward.

EARLY DECEMBER 1786. Shays’s Rebellion. After closing the supreme court at Worcester, a Regulator mob is reinforced by 350 men under 39-year-old Daniel Shays of Pelham, a Revolutionary War veteran risen from the ranks and now a retired captain of the 5th Massachusetts Regiment. He petitions the state legislature with a list of grievances, then disperses his followers.

Late in January 1787, Shays again marches from Wilbraham with 1,200 rebels, this time to prevent the Hampshire County court from opening in nearby Springfield. Approaching out of the southeast on the afternoon of the 25th, he hopes to overwhelm its 1,100 militia defenders under Gen. William Shepard with the support of another 400 Regulators out of West Springfield, led by ex-major Luke Day. However, the latter fails to appear, so Shays is confronted by Shepard’s full strength. Two warning shots are fired by the militia cannon, then a third round smashes into the insurgent ranks, killing 4 and causing the remainder to flee.

Lincoln arrives and pursues this demoralized throng northeastward into Petersham, surprising the Regulators at dawn of Sunday, February 4, after an all-night march through a snowstorm. Some 150 rebels are captured to stand trial, while Shays escapes northward. The militia army subsequently moves across the Connecticut River to disperse seditious nests in the Berkshires, so that, by the end of this same month, only scattered resistance remains. Most Regulators—including Shays—are eventually pardoned, and Governor Bowdoin is voted out of office in favor of John Hancock.

LATE SUMMER 1790. The 37-year-old general Josiah Harmar departs Fort Washington (Cincinnati, Ohio) with 320 U.S. regulars and 800 militiamen to crush the dissident Indians who—encouraged by the British—are refusing to allow American settlers into their territory.

OCTOBER 18, 1790. Harmar’s 1,100 men come upon 2,500 Indians under the Miami chief Little Turtle in Ohio at the Miami River. The Americans are defeated in a sharply contested fight. Four days later, the U.S. forces are beaten again and have to retreat into Fort Washington after the loss of 200 men. In both engagements, the militiamen run away, leaving the regulars to be slaughtered.

OCTOBER 1791. The newly appointed governor for the Northwest Territory, Gen. Arthur St. Clair, departs Fort Washington with 600 U.S. regulars, and 1,500 militiamen.

NOVEMBER 3, 1791. St. Clair's Defeat. After marching 100 miles northward and suffering numerous desertions, St. Clair's army arrives on the banks of the Wabash River, camping 40 miles southwest of modern Lima (near Fort Recovery, Ohio). The next dawn, the Americans are surprised by 2,200 Indians under Little Turtle; most of the ill-trained militiamen run away, while the U.S. regulars are overwhelmed. Approximately 900 men and women are slaughtered by the exultant warriors. St. Clair and his surviving followers escape into Fort Jefferson, 22 miles away, before eventually regaining Fort Washington. The next year, the general resigns his commission.

JULY 1794. After having been promoted major general and given command over the western army two years previously, then failing to sway the Indians by a diplomatic mission in 1793, "Mad Anthony" Wayne's 2,000 regulars are joined at Greenville (Ohio) by 1,600 Kentucky militiamen, advancing north to Fort Defiance on the Miami River. From here, Wayne makes a final effort to treat with the Indians but, upon being rebuffed, advances with his army.

JULY 15, 1794. Whiskey Insurrection. At midday, a group of angry farmers fire upon U.S. Marshal David Lenox and 63-year-old federal excise inspector John Neville when they attempt to serve a writ in Washington County in western Pennsylvania for failure to pay taxes on whiskey distillation. Being a commonly accepted barter item in frontier society, local residents resent the distant government's three-year-old efforts to impose a duty upon this farm product. Forty protestors attack Neville's mansion at Bower Hill the next dawn and are bravely repelled by this Revolutionary War veteran, resulting in 5 wounded. Eleven soldiers then arrive under Neville's brother-in-law, Maj. Abraham Kirkpatrick, but—despite slaying the ringleader, Maj. James McFarlane—they prove powerless to prevent a mob of 500 men from destroying Bower Hill on the evening of the 17th.

Now thoroughly inflamed, as many as 5,000 rebels muster on August 1 under "Major General" David Bradford to continue their protest at Braddock's Field, eight miles outside Pittsburgh (population, 1,000). However, beyond burning the homes of several prominent citizens over the next couple of days, no more violence ensues, although word of this rebellion soon spreads as far as South Carolina, causing numerous revenue officers to be manhandled.

President Washington responds on August 7 by issuing a proclamation from Philadelphia denouncing these activities as treasonous and instructing the governors of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia to call out their militias. Eventually, 11,000 reluctant infantrymen, 1,500 cavalymen, and 450 gunners—derisively dubbed the "Watermelon Army"—assemble at various concentration points; the contingent at Carlisle (Pennsylvania) is inspected by the president on October 4, Williamsport (Maryland) seven days afterward, and Fort Cumberland (Maryland) on October 16. During the last fortnight of this month, the army advances into rebel territory under Gov. "Light Horse Harry" Lee of Virginia, reoccupying Pittsburgh without opposition early in November. Bradford succeeds in escaping southwestward into Spanish territory, and although hundreds of cowed insurgent suspects are subsequently arrested, only two are actually sentenced to death in a court of law, although ultimately pardoned by Washington.

AUGUST 20, 1794. Fallen Timbers. Having been overtaken during their retreat, 1,300 Indians make a stand on the banks of the Maumee River (near modern Toledo, Ohio) behind a barricade of trees blown down by a storm. Wayne pins them with his infantry, while sending his cavalry around their flanks. The warriors are routed, several hundred being killed or wounded, while American casualties total 33 dead and 100 injured. (This action takes place within sight of a British garrison still illegally upon American soil; some of its garrison allegedly fight on the side of the Indians.)

This victory at Fallen Timbers effectively ends native resistance, and hostilities are concluded by the signing of the Treaty of Greenville on August 3, 1795, which permits the first wave of American settlers to begin occupying the Northwest Territory in peace.

HAITIAN REVOLUTION (1789–1803)

The 1789 upheavals in Paris have a profound impact upon France's overseas colonies, most especially for its largest possession: Saint Domingue. Many of the island's elite white grand blancs have already felt alienated by their lack of political or economic influence with the home government—although the radical new administration emerging from the French Revolution soon comes to frighten them even more. Some 32,000 bourgeois whites, known as petit blancs, and 28,000 free Creoles, mulattoes, and blacks, known as affranchis, selectively embrace certain egalitarian ideals in hopes of personal advancement, while ignoring the needs of a half-million slaves. The result will be a dozen years of chaotic civil war, during which Saint Domingue is torn between monarchism, republicanism, patriotism, racism, and a desire for liberty.

NOVEMBER 14, 1789. A reinforcement of 100 soldiers reaches Cayenne in French Guiana, increasing its permanent garrison to 700 regulars. Imbued with republican ideals, these newcomers will lead an outburst shortly thereafter, which cows the recently installed governor, Jacques Martin de Bourgon.

FEBRUARY 21, 1790. At the port city of Saint Pierre on the island of Martinique, an excited mob seizes two officers for having allegedly trampled upon a Revolutionary cockade. As its military garrison has previously been withdrawn into Fort Royal, uneasy municipal authorities request support from the neighboring island of Guadeloupe, which arrives—but fails to assuage the growing tensions.

JUNE 3, 1790. The troops garrisoning Fort Louis and Fort Bourbon outside Martinique's capital of Fort Royal proclaim their allegiance to the Revolutionary ideals being espoused at Saint Pierre, adding to the fears of monarchists on that island.

AUGUST 9–10, 1790. At Cayenne in French Guiana, disputes between libertarian deputies of the newly created Assemblée Coloniale and their more conservative predecessors from the royal Conseil Supérieur culminate in numerous arrests.

Sugar and Slavery

According to the treaty that ended the French and Indian War in 1763, France was forced to give up its major colonies in India, Canada, and Louisiana. To counter such losses, the chief royal minister, Étienne François, Duc de Choiseul, quickly began upgrading the remaining outposts in the Antilles and Guyana. Reforms were enacted to attract migrants and improve trade. More than 100,000 coffee trees were imported by the Crown two years later to create a valuable new cash crop. Foreign imports were also allowed for the first time in 1767, broadening the volume of sea traffic. Four years later, virtually every port in France was allowed to trade directly with the Antilles, vastly augmenting the flow of goods. Small and medium farms on the islands became supplanted by plantations harvesting industrial quantities of sugar, indigo, cotton, and coffee. To achieve such increased production, tens of thousands of slaves were imported from Africa.

No colony received as much stimulus over the next couple of decades as Saint Domingue. By the late 1780s, it had become France's premier overseas possession, 100 ships a month putting into its main seaport of Cap François. In 1787 and 1788 alone, over 60,000 slaves were imported. The city's population tripled from 6,353 residents in 1771 to 18,850 by 1789.

By the eve of the French Revolution, Saint Domingue was recognized as the richest commercial colony in the world. It exported roughly half of all the sugar and coffee consumed in Europe and netted more profit than all the Spanish American viceroalties combined. It was estimated that one person in eight in France derived a living from the island's traffic. Yet this rich business was entirely dependent on a half-million black slaves toiling amid Saint Domingue's 7,800 plantations, warily watched by only a few thousand white overseers.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1790. As a joint contingent of Martinican and Guadeloupan revolutionaries march upon the capital of Fort Royal, they are confronted near Acajou Plantation outside Lamentin by an army raised by local planters, who kill or capture 900 of their opponents and seize their artillery train.

OCTOBER 21, 1790. Ogé's Insurrection. The 35-year-old mulatto coffee merchant and minor plantation owner Jacques Vincent Ogé, backed by his colleague Jean-Baptiste Chavannes, lands a small contingent to raise a mulatto revolt. Ogé was in Paris during the Revolution and requested funds from its National Assembly for his cause. When these were denied, he arranged financing from the British abolitionist Thomas Clarkson, buying arms and ammunition in the United States.

His attempt is repressed, however, obliging Ogé and Chavannes to flee into Santo Domingo, from where they are extradited by unsympathetic Spanish authorities.

JANUARY 24, 1791. Some 200 black slaves arm themselves around Port Salut near Les Cayes, being quickly dispersed and their leaders being hanged.

FEBRUARY 25, 1791. Ogé and Chavannes are broken alive on the wheel, yet despite their dreadful executions, resistance in the south continues to smolder under the 30-year-old mulatto goldsmith and militia officer André Rigaud, who wins a provisional understanding from whites that they will not oppose acts from the Parisian National Assembly on behalf of freemen.

MARCH 3, 1791. Commander de Village's 74-gun, 1,665-ton flagship Fougueux and Captain de Grimouard's vice-flagship Borée, the Chevalier de Bataille's 40-gun frigate Uranie, and Villaret-Joyeuse's 32-gun Prudente (soon to be followed by the transport Nantais) arrive at Port-au-Prince bearing slightly more than 1,000 soldiers of the Revolutionary Artois, Normandie, and Des Colonies regiments. Governor General Blanchelande hesitates to allow these firebrand troops ashore, suggesting that they instead be disembarked at distant Saint Nicholas Môle.

However, galvanized by the arrival of these radical units, the Port-au-Prince Colonial Regiment (renamed 16 months later as the 110th Demi-Brigade) mutinies the next day, killing its autocratic commander, Col. Thomas Aintoine Mauduit, Chevalier du Plessis, and parading his head through the streets atop a spike, while Blanchelande flees to Le Cap (modern Cap Haïtien). The troops forge ashore and several more days of turmoil ensue, until Village dies of disease on March 19 and is succeeded by Grimouard, who restores a modicum of discipline.

MARCH 12, 1791. A new governor general for the French Antilles—Jean-Pierre Antoine de Béhague—reaches Fort Royal on Martinique and temporarily restores some measure of stability by deporting its most mutinous troops. However, embittered island planters refuse to send any more trade through Saint Pierre, instead routing all their traffic through Fort Royal, which creates such economic hardships for the northern city that they send a delegation to protest before the National Assembly in Paris.

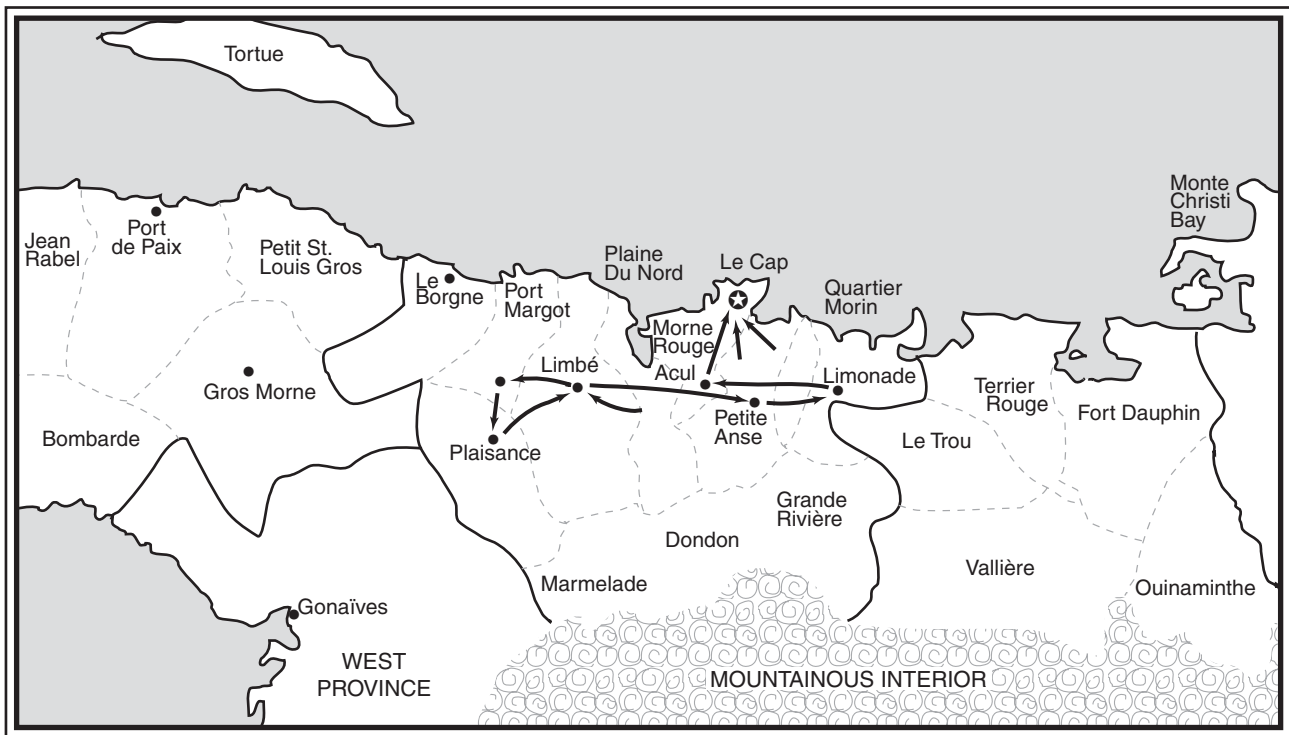

MAY 15, 1791. A black revolt being plotted by Jean-Louis at Sainte Anne on Guadeloupe is foiled.

JULY 8, 1791. News reaches Saint Domingue that the General Assembly in Paris has enfranchised free mulattoes and blacks on May 15, despite preserving the institution of slavery, sparking a white backlash.

AUGUST 14, 1791. Bois Caïman. After several weeks of clandestine meetings, 200 blacks gather secretly at Lenormand de Mézy Plantation in Morne Rouge in north central Haiti under their leaders "Zamba" Boukman Dutty, Jeannot Bullet, Jean François, and Georges Biassou. They hold a voodoo ceremony in nearby Bois Caïman, at which it is decided to rise up against their masters by August 22.

AUGUST 16, 1791. Some slaves in the Limbé District begin their uprising prematurely and are arrested while setting fire to the Chabaud Estate.

AUGUST 22, 1791. At 10:00 p.m., slaves gather at the Clément Plantation under Boukman and destroy the nearby Tremes Estate and Noé, Molines, and Flaville plantations by sunup, thus sparking a general insurrection on Saint Domingue's north-central plain. Boukman marches westward from Acul on August 23, his numbers swelling to 2,000 upon entering the Limbé District. Whites and loyal blacks are slaughtered; equipment and buildings are burned. Port à Margot is attacked early on the evening of August 24. Armed resistance is encountered the next day at Plaisance, where French militia units scatter the rebels, who fortify themselves within Champagne Ravine.

First successful Haitian uprising.

Despite this lone setback, the rebellion is too widespread and whites too few and isolated to contain it. Within a few days, Governor General Blanchelande recalls his militiamen and noncombatants into Le Cap, which is threatened on August 30–31 by Boukman with 15,000 followers. They are unable to penetrate its defenses, though, so content themselves with leveling the surrounding 50 miles of countryside. By mid-September, 200 sugar and 1,200 coffee plantations are destroyed, and 40,000 of northern Haiti's 170,000 blacks are in open rebellion.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1791. In southwestern Saint Domingue, after several minor clashes between whites and mulattoes—the latter seeking greater rights—a column of Normandie regulars and some militiamen set out from the capital of Port-au-Prince with a few cannon to disperse a mulatto concentration in the nearby Charbonnière Mountains under Louis-Jacques Bauvais, Pierre Pinchinat, Lambert, and Rigaud. The latter attempt to shift camp, but when they are intercepted near Croix des Bouquets, they defeat the French units.

At this juncture, the local royalist leader Hanus de Jumécourt offers the mulattoes an alliance against the radical French representatives in Port-au-Prince, an agreement between them being signed by September 7. Four days afterward, the radical French representatives make the mulattoes a counteroffer, and a multifaceted struggle ensues, with mulattoes shifting their allegiance between whites and blacks, royalists and Republicans, as expediency demands.

(Outside sources also begin playing a role. The British on Jamaica, fearful of France's spreading revolution, quietly support Saint Domingue's monarchists against the Republicans, as well as efforts to suppress its slave revolt. The Spaniards of Santo Domingo, by way of contrast, openly encourage the slave uprising in hopes of weakening the French hold over their half of the island.)

SEPTEMBER 13, 1791. The royalist governor and assembly on Guadeloupe dissolve the mulatto municipal government elected at Basse Terre.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1791. HMS Centurion and a small auxiliary visit Port-au-Prince, bringing an arms shipment for its French defenders.

OCTOBER 22, 1791. The French authorities at Port-au-Prince repair their uneasy truce with mulatto forces in their district under Bauvais and Pinchinat by admitting 1,500 troops into the capital the next day as part of its garrison.

OCTOBER 28, 1791. Under the pretext of issuing them better weapons, black troops are sent aboard the merchantman Emmanuel at Port-au-Prince, which instead sets sail five days later to maroon them on Central America's Mosquito Coast. The mulattoes and free blacks similarly herded aboard ships at Jérémie fare even worse, as most die of smallpox.

NOVEMBER 20, 1791. On Guadeloupe, the dissolved mulatto government is reelected at Basse-Terre.

NOVEMBER 21, 1791. This Monday, Port-au-Prince erupts in flames at dawn, burning over the next two days as white troops turn their weapons against mulattoes and blacks, driving them out of the city. This outburst produces a backlash in the surrounding district, where further uprisings occur in support of the rebel cause, so that a few weeks later, the black leader Romaine la Prophétesse occupies Jacmel with 1,300 followers.

NOVEMBER 29, 1791. The civil commissioners Frédéric Ignace de Mirbeck and Philippe-Rose Roume et d'Edmond de Saint Léger arrive on Saint Domingue from Revolutionary France, soon opening up dialogues with local black rebel leaders. Around this same time, Boukman is killed in a minor skirmish; his insurrection nevertheless survives him.

DECEMBER 11, 1791. When a delegation of mutinous troops and sailors attempt to wrest command of Grimoüard's flagship Borée, anchored off beleaguered Port-au-Prince, the admiral repels them. Discipline nonetheless continues to deteriorate.

JANUARY 15, 1792. Giving up on negotiations, Jean-François "Papillon" Petecou's band of Haitian rebels recaptures the Ouinaminthe district.

JANUARY 23, 1792. A rebel army under Biassou attacks Le Cap to secure ammunition and replenish their diminished resources.

Grimoüard quashes a mutinous attempt to seize the Borée off Port-au-Prince, December 11, 1791. Less than two years later, after returning to France and being promoted to rear admiral, he will be condemned to death by a revolutionary tribunal as "an aristocrat and traitor." (L'Amiral de Grimoüard au Port-au-Prince, 1937)

MARCH 4, 1792. France's Assembly issues a decree recognizing the equality of mulattoes with whites, which will create a stir on Saint Domingue.

MARCH 22, 1792. Croix des Bouquets. The wealthy, 50-year-old Jean-Baptiste, Comte de Caradeuc de la Caye—notorious for cruelty to his slaves—marches out of Port-au-Prince into Cul de Sac Plain to put down its mulatto-black-royalist combination. Instead, he is defeated at his Croix des Bouquets Estate by 10,000–15,000 untrained black insurgents, inspired by their 22-year-old voodoo leader Hyacinthe. This setback precipitates more uprisings around Mirebalais, Arcahaye, Petite-Rivière, Verettes, and Saint Marc.

APRIL 20, 1792. In Europe, France declares war against Austria. The semi-captive Louis XVI, his monarchist Feuillant followers, and the liberal Girondin Republicans in the National Assembly each support this action for different reasons. The Republicans hope to export Revolutionary doctrines throughout Europe, while the king believes that France's population will rally behind him during a foreign war. Prussia joins the Austrians a few weeks later. French cross-border thrusts prove ineffectual, and a stalemate ensues.

LATE JULY 1792. While visiting the Platons region in the southwestern part of the island, Governor General Blanchelande attempts to placate its 2,000 black rebels operating around Les Cayes under Armand and Martial. During a sudden storm on July 29, however, they attack Bérault Plantation—one of the white colonists' major military camps—destroying it, before rampaging through the Torbeck region and gaining hundreds of more adherents.

AUGUST 4, 1792. Blanchelande advances into the Platons' southwestern hills in three columns, searching for Armand and Martial. They confuse and ambush his forces piecemeal, obliging him to retreat back into Les Cayes four days later, having suffered 200 killed and lost two artillery pieces. By August 10, he sets sail for Le Cap and later is deported to France to be guillotined in 1793.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1792. The 28-year-old Jacobin commissioner Léger Félicité Sonthonax reaches Saint Domingue with 6,000 soldiers, bearing instructions to reimpose government order. At first, he favors the mulattoes, making no concessions to either rebel-

Valmy

On the night of August 10, 1792, in Paris, the French Revolution took a more violent turn. Backers of a radical new municipal administration known as the Commune stormed the Tuileries Palace, seizing the king and queen. In a special session of the National Assembly—attended by only a third of its deputies, mostly Jacobins—the monarchy was suspended. In a purge of opponents, the Commune also sent gangs into the prisons to “try” and butcher 1,400 prisoners. Other cities were urged to do the same.

Alarmed by these developments, the 150,000 Prussians, Austrians, Hessians, and French émigrés massed off northeastern France under Karl Wilhelm, Duke of Brunswick, were ordered two days later to intervene. They pushed easily across the border, French resistance being weakened by repeated Revolutionary upheavals. The road between Longwy and Montmédy was severed on August 15, 1792, and the garrison at Fontoy was overrun four days later by 22,000 Austrians. After a three-day shelling, Longwy also surrendered on August 23. Some 60,000 Prussians then descended upon Verdun six days later, where the defenders agreed to capitulate by September 2. The road into Paris now lay open. The Revolution seemed doomed.

Desperate to halt this advance, the Jacobin Assembly removed the noble-born Rochambeau and Lafayette from command because of their suspect loyalties. Instead, Lt. Gen. Charles François Dumouriez was hastened from Valenciennes to the hamlet of Valmy near Châlons-sur-Marne with 28,000 troops. Digging in atop a nearby plateau, he urged Gen. François Christophe Kellermann to join him with 19,000 more from Metz. These reinforcements crossed the Aube River on September 19, reaching Dumouriez just in time.

The next dawn, Brunswick's vanguard of 35,000 Prussians groped through the fog, encountering a determined foe. A daylong artillery exchange failed to break the French ranks, enflamed by Revolutionary ardor. Although only 184 attackers and 300 defenders were slain by this “cannonade of Valmy,” the invaders thereupon retired, fearful of other approaching armies. The Revolution was saved. This seemingly inconsequential clash allowed the First French Republic to emerge and flourish, consequently it is today regarded as one of the Sir Edward Shepherd Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World (1851).

lious slaves nor disgruntled whites (whom he suspects of being royalists). Despite his partiality, the slave rebellion nonetheless persists in the north.

The 37-year-old commissioner Donatien Marie-Joseph de Vimeur, Vicomte de Rochambeau (son of the Count of Rochambeau; see “June 20, 1780” entry in “American Revolutionary War”) encounters even sterner opposition at Martinique, being initially refused permission to disembark with his men. Instead, the island authorities write directly to the powerless king to reassert their loyalty to the Crown, while arresting proponents of change, thereby causing a flight of refugees from Martinique’s principal city of Saint Pierre to the safety of Dominica.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1792. Inspired by news of the Revolutionary victory at Valmy, the National Assembly in Paris abolishes the monarchy and proclaims the First French Republic.

DECEMBER 1, 1792. A naval expedition led by the 30-gun flagship Félicité of 37-year-old lieutenant Jean-Baptiste Raymond, Baron Lacrosse, appears off Martinique with explicit orders from the Convention in Paris to impose Republican rule upon the French Antilles. However, the monarchists on Martinique and Guadeloupe prove openly defiant, even declaring war against the new government. Lacrosse is therefore obliged to retire to Saint Lucia and begin issuing a stream of proclamations to the general populace, extolling the benefits of liberty.

JANUARY 5, 1793. Now promoted to captain, Lacrosse lands at Pointe-à-Pitre on Guadeloupe to receive the temporary title of governor from this island’s Republican faction, mostly comprised of free mulattoes. Four days later, the Colonial Assembly on Martinique—uneasy at its isolation—also votes to recognize the Republic, so that the monarchist governor general de Béhague and his adherents must seek sanctuary with the Spaniards on the island of Trinidad.

JANUARY 9, 1793. Platons. Irish-born Republican colonel Olivier Harty of the 88th Berwick Regiment from Bar-sur-Aube marches out of Les Cayes (Haiti) with nearly 2,000 troops—including 200 armed blacks under the ex-slave Jean Kina—to exterminate Armand and Martial’s rebel encampment at Platons. The latter resist desperately but are powerless to prevent four columns from closing in upon their hideout three days later. Some 3,000 black insurgents disperse higher into the mountains around Macaya, while a few hundred noncombatants—women, children, the aged, and infirm—are left behind to be brutally massacred by the French on January 13.

JANUARY 21, 1793. Revolutionary France’s execution of Louis XVI and declaration of war against England, as well as against Spain on March 7, add confusing new undercurrents to the Haitian insurrection.

LATE JANUARY 1793. Independent maroons of Baboruco rise up in revolt, descending upon the area of Fond Parisien, while Jean Pineau leads another insurrection in the Crochus region, just outside the Cul de Sac Plain. Both uprisings are secretly incited by Hyacinthe.

FEBRUARY 3, 1793. Commissioner Rochambeau is greeted euphorically at the city of Fort Royal (Martinique), which is renamed Républiqueville in honor of the occasion, while its main defenses of Fort Louis and Fort Bourbon are changed into Fort-de-la-République and Fort-de-la-Convention, respectively. The city and its district will become generally known as Fort-de-la-République. Despite such submissiveness or the fact that Rochambeau installs his headquarters there, the city is nonetheless punished for its former monarchist sentiments by the designation of its rival Saint Pierre as the only port on the island authorized to receive merchant traffic.

APRIL 4, 1793. Dispute for Port-au-Prince. With Saint Domingue’s trade at a standstill because of France’s declaration of war and other radical measures, a new white leader—Auguste, formerly the Marquis de Borel—has been able to forge an alliance with rural black rebels to expel the mulatto garrison from its capital. The Jacobin commissioners Sontho-nax and Étienne Polverel respond by dispatching a half-dozen warships from Le Cap to bolster the desultory siege maintained by its 2,000 expelled mulatto troops.

The squadron anchors on April 4, yet is unable to intimidate its 3,000 mostly black defenders. The warships therefore bear down upon the defenses at dawn of April 12, unleashing a seven-hour bombardment that kills 33 people (including a dozen women and children). Fearful of the outcome, the city’s merchant guild bribes Borel to depart for Jamaica, allowing the besiegers to enter the next evening and the commissioners to disembark triumphantly by the morning of April 14.

Port-au-Prince is then purged of its most intractable white elements, almost 1,000 individuals being detained or deported over the next few weeks, while many others simply flee. Mulattoes are rewarded with municipal and military appointments, and the city regiment is reconstituted as of April 19 into a 2,000-man légion de l'égalité or “equality legion” under Col. Alexandre Montbrun, named the Légion de l'Ouest or “Legion of the West.” Yet blacks will continue to be excluded from advancement, their alienation contributing to Republican setbacks elsewhere on the island.

MAY 30, 1793. In the Spanish capital of Santo Domingo, Gov. Joaquín García Moreno officially promulgates Madrid’s declaration of war against Republican France and authorizes hostile operations against northern Saint Domingue.

SUMMER 1793. A joint army of rebellious blacks under generals Petecou and Biassou, plus Spanish militiamen out of Santo Domingo, invade northern Saint Domingue.

JUNE 20, 1793. Le Cap Revolt. Political prisoners held aboard ships off Le Cap (modern Cap Haïtien) rise against the Republican commissioners, being joined by almost 2,000 sailors. Together they make an armed disembarkation, capture the main arsenal, and compel Sonthonax and Polverel to flee the next day for the protection of Bréda Plantation outside the city. Behind them, fierce fighting rages through the streets, as prisons are flung open and thousands of slaves become embroiled in the carnage.

Desperate to regain control, Sonthonax and Polverel promise freedom and full French citizenship to any slaves willing to fight for the Republican government. A 3,000-man contingent under the maroon leader Louis Pierrot, part of the Hispano-black invasion force encamped in the hills beyond Le Cap, responds to this call, and on June 22—after pledging allegiance to France—Pierrot fights his way into the burning city. The commissioners themselves return by June 27, only to find many blacks skeptical of their offer. Consequently, while some abandon their Spanish allies, major leaders such as Biassou refuse to be swayed to the French because black noncombatants will remain as slaves.

AUGUST 1793. The Hispano-black forces reach Le Cap.

AUGUST 29, 1793. In a final desperate bid to reestablish Republican control, Sonthonax proclaims the total abolition of slavery throughout northern Saint Domingue, without approval from the Convention in Paris. Although this tactic wins him some additional black support—slaves forming so-called Legions of Equality—it also alienates many whites and mulattoes when announced in the west on September 21.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1793. British Intervention. Commo. John Ford quits Port Royal (Jamaica) with the 64-gun HMS Europa (flag) of Capt. George Gregory, the 14-gun French prize sloop Goéland under Cmdr. Thomas Wolley, and the schooner Flying Fish to conduct 36-year-old lieutenant colonel John Whitelocke’s 13th Foot Regiment across to Jérémie in support of its white French monarchists. This English force arrives 10 days later to a peaceful reception, Whitelocke going ashore with his 700 men to take possession of the port in the name of the French Crown.

On September 21, he and Ford continue north toward Cap du Môle, which is gripped with fear about a possible attack by black rebels. The English therefore induce its garrison—largely comprised of the 87th Dillon (Irish) Regiment—to switch sides and admit them by September 22.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1793. In a gesture of Revolutionary solidarity, Port-au-Prince is renamed Port-Républicain.

OCTOBER 4, 1793. Whitelocke and Ford attempt to seize Cape Tiburon, but the promised cooperation by white French landowners fails to appear, so the English are repulsed.

DECEMBER 1793. Black troops overrun the French outpost at Gonaïves, while shortly thereafter Spanish forces also seize Le Limbé and Port à Margot.

JANUARY 2, 1794. Ford detaches the 32-gun frigate Penelope of Capt. Bartholomew Samuel Rowley to offer terms of capitulation to Port-au-Prince, which are refused. Rowley therefore blockades its harbor.

JANUARY 28, 1794. A small Spanish squadron under Commo. Gabriel de Aristizábal stands into the port of Bayahá, compelling its French garrison to surrender without a struggle; booty includes 1,031 prisoners, 40 artillery pieces, and its arsenal. Santo Domingo's governor García Moreno subsequently arrives overland on February 3 with a column of troops to convert this port into his advance headquarters for a drive against Le Cap and Port-au-Prince.

FEBRUARY 2, 1794. Having been reinforced with 800 men from Jamaica, Whitelocke and Ford again make an attempt against Cape Tiburon, this time being successful and installing a small garrison the next day under Lt. George Bradford of the 23rd (Royal Welsh) Fusiliers.

FEBRUARY 4, 1794. In Paris, the Convention officially abolishes slavery throughout France's overseas colonies.

FEBRUARY 11, 1794. Whitelocke and Ford advance against Fort Acul at Léogâne, carrying it by storm on February 19.

MARCH 16–17, 1794. Upon learning of the Convention's abolition of slavery, Colonel Montbrun and his mulatto legion garrisoning Port-au-Prince—feeling that their hard-won status is being capriciously sacrificed to assuage black sentiment—kill or capture the depleted remnants of the 48th d'Artois Regiment overnight, as well as temporarily detaining Sonthonax. Numerous white noncombatants are also slaughtered.

LATE MARCH 1794. The African-born Alaou joins Sonthonax's Republican cause, but he is assassinated shortly thereafter along with 200 of his followers by the rival mulatto chieftain Bauvais. The black leader Hyacinthe is also murdered by mulattoes around this same time.

MAY 6, 1794. The 50-year-old black brigadier general Toussaint Louverture withdraws his 4,000 soldiers from the combined Hispano-rebel army in the north, preferring to join the French Republican cause—which at least promises freedom for his people, a policy that in all likelihood will be nullified by an English, Spanish, white, or mulatto victory. Toussaint's army gains control over the Artibonite region within the next two weeks, and he withdraws briefly into Mirebalais.

MAY 8, 1794. García Moreno leads his Spanish troops out of Bayahá to march upon Le Cap.

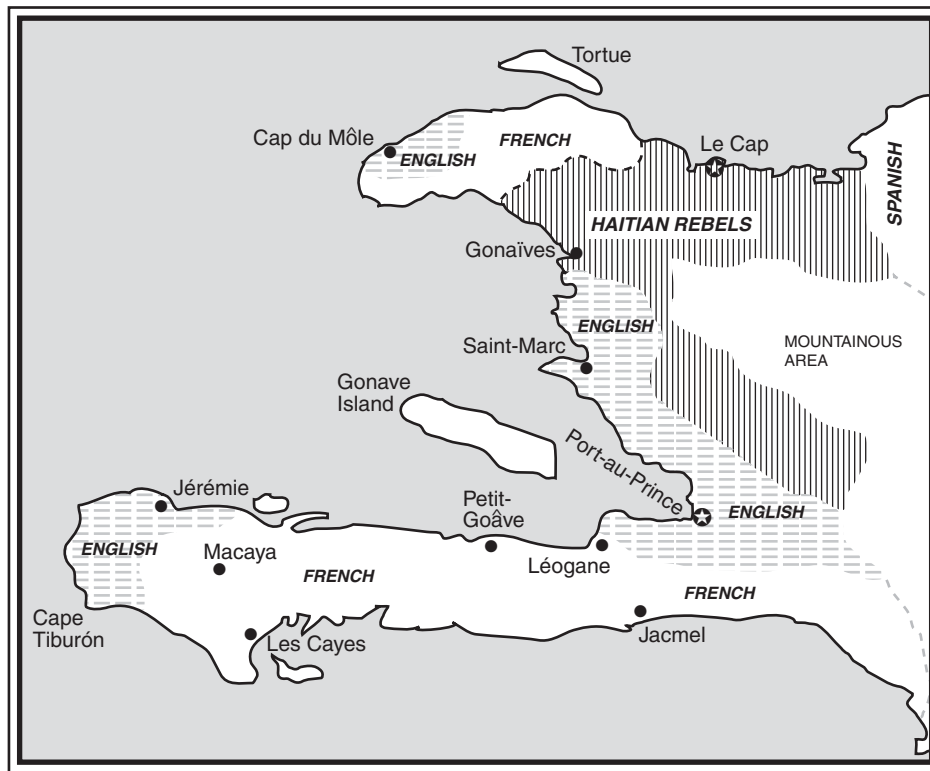

Checked by a French concentration at Yaguessi, though, he must retreat back into Bayahá four days later.

MAY 19, 1794. Brig. Gen. John Whyte arrives off Saint Domingue with three regiments aboard a dozen transports, superseding Whitelocke as British commander in chief for this theater. Together with French royalist forces ashore, they plan on overrunning the island capital.

MAY 30, 1794. Port-au-Prince Assault. Commodore Ford appears outside the capital's harbor with his 64-gun flagship Europa, the 74-gun Irresistible of Capt. John Henry, the 64-gun Belliqueux of James Brine and Sceptre of James Richard Dacres, 3 frigates, plus 3 sloops, escorting the 12 transports bearing 1,465 redcoats under Brigadier General Whyte. They are to assault Port-au-Prince in concert with two approaching land columns raised by exiled French monarchists: 1,000 troops being on the march from Léogâne under Col. Jean-Charles, Baron de Montalembert, plus another 1,200 from l'Arcahaie under the former planter de Jumécourt and his black adjutant Jean-Baptiste Lapointe.

The garrison has only 1,200 mulatto defenders, 400 of whom are detached the next day by Montbrun to prevent an immediate British disembarkation north of the city—two frigates and some transports having anchored menacingly at Fossé Cove. Montbrun personally reinforces Fort Bizoton on the capital's southern perimeter and assigns 24-year-old Alexandre Sabès Pétion to hold Fort l'Islet within the bay. Sonthonax meanwhile clandestinely summons Montbrun's bitter rival Martial Besse from Jacmel to assume the position of second-in-command, which will complicate matters.

On June 1, 1794, HMSS Belliqueux and Sceptre, plus the frigate Penelope, forge into Port Sallé Bay and pound Fort Bizoton for four hours, while 300 redcoats disembark and link up with 500 monarchist militiamen under Montalembert. A heavy downpour apparently ends fighting at 6:00 p.m., but the British clamber through a breach and carry Fort Bizoton at bayonet point. Thrice wounded, Montbrun retreats into Port-au-Prince with a few survivors, being succeeded the next day by Besse. His Légion de l'Ouest refuses to obey Besse's orders, though, and with the English and monarchists massing to press home their attack, it is decided to abandon the capital. Refugees stream out of the landward gates by noon, mostly 2,000 mulatto noncombatants fleeing toward Nérètte and Jacmel.

Maximum extent of the British occupation in Haiti.

On June 3, 1794, the 32-gun frigates Hermione of Capt. John Hills and Iphigenia of Patrick Sinclair bear down upon Pointe-à-Fortin (modern Pointe-de-la-Saline) to create a diversion for Whyte's overland thrust by bombarding Fort Touron. Its garrison scarcely resists, though, as Port-au-Prince's defenders are now openly on the verge of flight, while scared white residents congregate inside Fort Saint-Joseph on its northern fringe or board some of the 22 merchantmen anchored in the harbor to avoid the anticipated orgy of house-to-house fighting and looting. Entreaties are sent out to the besiegers, while outlying fortifications begin surrendering by nightfall. The next morning, the British disembark along the city waterfront, while monarchist columns press through the Léogâne and Saint-Joseph Gates—exacting vengeance until the English intervene and reimpose order.

Whitelocke is honored by being sent to London with dispatches announcing this victory, while Commissioner Sonthonax retreats into Jacmel. Within a month, he, too, will be driven into British hands and repatriated to France. Yet despite this capture and many conciliatory gestures, the British occupation will be doomed to failure because poor whites, mulattoes, and blacks cannot abide any return to pre-Revolutionary practices in which they enjoyed no role beyond servitude. The redcoats are also too few in number to subdue the hostile hinterland, especially after being reduced by tropical diseases. Within two months, 40 officers and almost 600 troops perish, and of the 828 soldiers still alive by the end of this year, most lie in the hospital.

JUNE 25, 1794. Louverture officially allies his army with the embattled French general Étienne Maynard Laveaux, who is fighting against English and Spanish invasions, plus monarchist and mulatto resistance. Yet only a few guerrilla skirmishes will ensue, little active campaigning being conducted, as both the British and Spanish forces are being decimated by disease, while the diverse island factions are concentrating on holding onto their individual territories.

DECEMBER 25, 1794. At dawn, a French force from Les Cayes attacks the small English garrison at Cape Tiburon, sinking the armed transport King George and obliging the invaders to retire to Cape Doña María.

Toussaint Louverture. (Library of Congress)

MARCH 1795. Léogâne having been reclaimed by Rigaud, he allies himself with Bauvais to besiege the English defenders holding Fort Bizoton outside Port-au-Prince. Two months' investiture will fail to dislodge its garrison.

However, the black guerrillas who dominate Cul de Sac Plain and the heights east of the capital subsequently press in as close as La Charbonnière and l'Hôpital, interrupting the city's vital water supply. The British are eventually reinforced and sally from Port-au-Prince to chase them away.

JULY 22, 1795. In Europe, Spain withdraws from the coalition against France, signing the Treaty of Basle, which—among other things—cedes all of Santo Domingo to the French in exchange for the return of other conquered territories. Paris, however, insists that the Spanish half of Santo Domingo must be surrendered to a French army rather than to black militia forces, so the actual transaction is to be deferred for a few years.

OCTOBER 17, 1795. News of Santo Domingo's transfer to French rule reaches the island, provoking massive Spanish emigration.

MARCH 20, 1796. In Le Cap, a mulatto faction arrests French general Laveaux, feeling that he is too closely aligned with the interests of black ex-slaves. Laveaux is rescued by Louverture, who marches from Gonaïves at the head of his 10,000-man army. Louverture is rewarded by being appointed deputy governor.

MARCH 21, 1796. Some 2,000 redcoats and 1,200 monarchists under Maj. Gen. Gordon Forbes have emerged the previous day from occupied Port-au-Prince aboard transports to attempt to recapture nearby Léogâne. Their flotilla is escorted by the 74-gun Leviathan of John Thomas Duckworth and Swiftsure of Robert Parker; the 64-gun Africa of Roddam Home; the 32-gun frigate Ceres of James Newman and Iphigenia of Francis Farrington Gardner; the 18-gun sloop Cormorant of Cmdr. Francis Collingwood; plus the 16-gun sloops Lark of Cmdr. William Ogilby and Sirène (French prize) of Cmdr. Daniel Guerin.

Léogâne proves to be much more strongly defended than anticipated by its mulatto garrison under Pétion, however, and the British assault is repelled on the morning of March 21 and forced to retire, with the Leviathan and the Africa considerably damaged. Nevertheless, Port-au-Prince's plight is alleviated by Forbes's thrust, so that some monarchist planters even begin reclaiming estates on Cul de Sac Plain. Re-sumed cultivation will in turn attract merchantmen into port, creating a temporary boom.

MAY 1796. Sonthonax and other commissioners return to Saint Domingue from France, now openly backing its black factions. When the mulatto general Rigaud is unwillingly compelled to attack the English at Cape Tiburon later this summer with his "Legion of Equality"—four columns of 1,200 troops apiece—they are defeated, and the French blame his leadership.

Some of his lieutenants are subsequently arrested at Les Cayes, provoking widespread rioting, with blacks and mulattoes fighting each other and its few remaining whites being massacred. Rigaud returns from his base camp near Cape Tiburon to put down this fighting with 3,000–4,000 mulatto followers, then deposes the commissioners in his district. Shortly thereafter, Toussaint Louverture does the same to

Toussaint Louverture

François Dominique Toussaint is believed to have been born on May 20, 1743, one of eight children. His father, Gaou Guinou, was a captive Dahomey commander from Benin in West Africa, sold into bondage as “Hyppolite.” Toussaint was raised on Breda Plantation near Haut du Cap, one of several properties owned by Louis Pantaléon, Comte de Noé. Although this nobleman was often absent, the small Toussaint apparently enjoyed a humane childhood. He received a rudimentary education from the free black priest, Pierre Baptiste, as well as extensive knowledge of medicinal plants and herbs from his father. Toussaint therefore became a trusted retainer to the estate manager, Bâillon de Libertat, serving as healer, coachman, and steward.

When the count married in February 1776, he freed his household servant, who took the name of Toussaint Breda. Over the next three years, he saved enough money to lease a small coffee farm with 13 slaves. Toussaint was a fervent Catholic who lived simply, was abstinent, and was a vegetarian. Around 1786, he married a woman named Suzan Simon Baptiste, who already had a five-year-old son. Together, they had a second son.

When the slave insurrection exploded in August 1791, Toussaint played no part. Instead, he helped his former master’s family escape, sent his own loved ones to safety, and prevented the burning of plantations. The first mention of his name as a rebel is not found until the next January, as the last signatory on a petition sent to Paris by the leaders Jean-François and Biassou. During these troubled times, Toussaint patiently built up an armed following. When the Spanish governor of Santo Domingo pushed across the border in early summer 1793, Toussaint was commissioned on July 9 as “colonel” of a force around La Marmelade. He also issued a recruitment call to blacks on August 29, signed “Toussaint Louverture, General of the armies of the King.” His choice of surname was never fully explained. Seeing his Spanish service as a betrayal, Jean-François and Biassou attempted to assassinate Louverture early the next year. But only his younger brother Jean-Pierre was killed.

Louverture therefore arranged for his family to depart Santo Domingo, then changed his allegiance on May 6, 1794. It is assumed that the French Assembly’s abolition of slavery on February 4 was his prime motive. British forces in the south of the island had already begun restoring former Crown policies, including slavery, while Spain’s forces in the north did not honor their promise of emancipation. Madrid’s surrender to Revolutionary France by signing a treaty on July 22, 1795, drained many more blacks into Louverture’s ranks.

By the time he moved with 10,000 men in March 1796 to rescue the French general Étienne Maynard Laveaux, seized by mulatto dissidents at Le Cap, Louverture had become the most powerful commander on the island. The grateful general appointed him lieutenant governor. Yet Louverture resisted radical measures. When the extremist commissioner Sonthonax returned from France two months later, the black warlord reacted with disgust to his proposal of massacring whites as suspect monarchists. A mature man and devout Catholic, Louverture was offended by the Jacobin’s atheism, immorality, and coarseness. Sonthonax was deported by August 1797.

The next year, the British occupiers withdrew, another commissioner was expelled, and Louverture prepared for a show-down against his southern mulatto rivals. He signed an arms and trade deal with the American administration on May 22, 1799, which was embroiled in its own quasi-war against France. After ruthlessly crushing the mulattos, Louverture, at the peak of his powers, started to resurrect colonial Saint Domingue. White émigrés were invited to return, plantations were reactivated, paid laborers were conscripted, and the Catholic faith and French customs were revived. Only slavery disappeared. Yet there was no going back. Two years later, a huge French expedition appeared, seized Louverture by treachery, and sent him to die in a lonely Alpine fort.

Sonthonax in his northern region, deporting him to France on August 22, 1797.

MID-FEBRUARY 1798. Determined to expel all foreigners from the south, Louverture helps a 2,000-man mulatto army under Pétion eradicate the 300 isolated black monarchist militiamen holding Fort de La Coupe. All British outposts are consequently withdrawn inside Port-au-Prince.

MARCH 1798. After losing 25,000 British troops in five years—mostly due to disease—Brig. Gen.

Thomas Maitland reaches Port-au-Prince and on April 23 enters into negotiations with Toussaint Louverture for the evacuation of all remaining forces from Saint Domingue.

MARCH 29, 1798. A new commissioner, Gen. Thomas Hédouville, reaches Le Cap from France. Whereas previous commissioners have favored blacks over mulattoes, Hédouville reverses this policy because of the growing power of Louverture’s black army. Louverture resists by forming a united front with the mulatto leader Rigaud in the south.

MAY 8, 1798. British Withdrawal. At Port-au-Prince, Maitland's last redcoats and monarchist allies row out to a waiting convoy, setting sail the next day as the 1st and 8th Demi-Brigades march in under Col. Christophe Morney to reclaim the capital under its old Revolutionary name of "Port-Républicain."

Saint Marc and Les Cayes are also evacuated, along with whatever French or mulatto inhabitants wish to accompany the departing British, in a bargain struck with Louverture. All evacuees are temporarily conveyed to Cape Saint Nicholas Môle by Royal Navy warships for eventual emigration elsewhere. On August 31, the British general will also cede Cape Saint Nicholas Môle to Haitian control, completing the British withdrawal.

However, southern mulattoes have meanwhile resented the intervention of northern black forces, especially as Morney orders Pétion to withdraw his Légion de l'Ouest from the recaptured capital Léogâne so that Louverture might make a triumphal entry on May 14 and install his own garrison.

SUMMER 1798. Hédouville presses his anti-Louverture machinations by ordering the arrest of the black leader's adopted nephew Moïse, who resists and is shot at while escaping. Furious, Louverture orders his brutal 40-year-old general, Jean-Jacques Dessalines—originally a slave born as Jean-Jacques Duclos, now nicknamed the "Tiger"—to march upon Le Cap and crush all military support for the French commissioner, who flees the island by October 22. In a parting gesture, Hédouville spitefully appoints Rigaud as "General-in-Chief of the South," thereby making this mulatto leader nominally independent from Louverture, a move sure to foment future trouble. Louverture names Roume to succeed in office as commissioner.

JANUARY 1799. At a meeting between Roume, Louverture, and Rigaud, the latter's claim to control Petit Goâve and Grand Goâve is rejected, prompting him to walk out.

MID-FEBRUARY 1799. War of the Knives. Rigaud announces that he wishes to reassume command over Léogâne and Jacmel from Louverture appointees, prompting the black warlord to deliver a menacing speech to a mulatto assembly in Port-Républicain's cathedral on February 21 and then to travel northward to prepare for war.

Rigaud's rebellion actually erupts on June 15–16, when two of his subordinates attack Petit Goâve, putting many of its black defenders and residents to death. A general uprising ensues in the south against northern black rule, Rigaud's mulatto army doing quite well at first, capturing Grand Goâve and Jacmel. However, the capital Port-Républicain remains firmly under the control of Louverture's garrison, and the rebels will soon be beset by other powerful armies invading out of the north, tacitly backed by American support and local black sentiment. They will suffer so cruelly from wholesale massacres that this conflict becomes known as the "War of the Knives."

By October 1799, northern general Henry Christophe (originally born a slave on Grenada) arrives to besiege Rigaud's forces within Jacmel, while Louverture himself campaigns throughout southern territory, along with Dessalines. Jacmel resists under its garrison commander Pétion, until starvation obliges them to evacuate across enemy lines on March 11, 1800, effectively ending organized resistance. Rigaud's mulatto army virtually disintegrates while vainly awaiting a relief force, which never arrives from France.

After being pressed back upon Les Cayes in July 1800 by Dessalines's triumphal advance, Rigaud flees the next month into exile in France, leaving Louverture to appoint Dessalines as governor for the occupied south. Louverture butchers hundreds of mulattoes on suspicion of having supported the rebellion and even suppresses local black laborers.

JANUARY 25, 1801. Santo Domingo Coup. Learning that First Director Napoleon Bonaparte is contemplating the dispatch of an army from France to occupy the island's Spanish half (see "July 22, 1795" entry), Toussaint Louverture moves preemptively by sending an army across the border from Le Cap under Moïse, then joining it and appearing himself near the half-deserted Spanish capital by January 25 with 10,000 troops—much to the consternation of its remaining inhabitants and French refugees. Governor García Moreno, with only 650 Spanish soldiers still left under his command, evacuates Jaina and requests terms.

The next day, Fort San Gerónimo and the city of Santo Domingo are surrendered without bloodshed, a small garrison being installed. The Spanish governor will sail away with his soldiery by February 22. Having thus assumed overlordship of this territory, abolished slavery, and appointed his brother Paul as governor, the "black Spartacus" returns to the western half of Saint Domingue to continue his reconstruction work. But, in fact, this invasion and Louverture's growing independence will goad Bonaparte into preparing a full-bore expedition to fully reestablish French control over the entire island.

LATE OCTOBER 1801. Louverture, Dessalines, and Christophe suppress a rebellion by black laborers in the Le Cap district, which has been backed by General Moïse. He is therefore executed in mid-November, along with scores of other ringleaders.

JANUARY 29, 1802. Leclerc's Campaign. The 29-year-old general Charles Victor Emmanuel Leclerc arrives at Samaná Bay accompanied by his wife—Bonaparte's youngest sister, Pauline—and a 20,000-man military expedition to reassert France's grip over Saint Domingue. Leclerc appears before Le Cap (modern Cap-Haïtien) with part of this force four days later and threatens to come ashore on February 3 with his 5,000 soldiers. Christophe, in command of its garrison, requests 24 hours to consult with Toussaint Louverture, but the French general refuses. Christophe therefore evacuates Le Cap, putting it to the torch—starting with his own home—before retiring into the interior.

Meanwhile, other French contingents are disembarked at different points around the island to begin its reconquest. One column marches directly upon the Spanish city of Santo Domingo, capturing it with little difficulty (its inhabitants regarding the French as liberators). Another 3,000-man division under Gen. Jean Boudet anchors off Port-au-Prince on the afternoon of February 3 aboard six ships and two frigates under 56-year-old rear admiral Louis René Levassor, Comte de Latouche-Tréville. The surprised garrison commander, Gen. Pierre Agé, is willing to capitulate the next day, but not his subordinate, Brig. Gen. Louis Daure Lamartinière. Boudet consequently disembarks at Lamention with 3,500 men on the morning of February 5 and advances rapidly upon the capital. Lamartinière can only muster scant resistance with his 2,400 troops, not all of whom are loyal, and receives no support among the city's roughly 20,000 inhabitants. The French enter by that same evening to find that the black northern soldiers have butchered white and mulatto residents alike and set numerous fires before retreating.

Clash between Rochambeau's French troops and Louverture's Haitian guerrillas in Ravine à Couleuvre, a mile outside Gonaïves. (Author's Collection)

The black general Dommage prepares to resist at Jérémie but is betrayed and his stronghold overrun. On February 11, Boudet sends 2,000 men to re-occupy Croix des Bouquets without resistance. Two days afterward, he disembarks at Saint Marc with 2,400 men from three ships and a frigate, the Aigle, the latter damaged by counterfire. With the 56 French and 13 colonial Demi-Brigades in the van under 32-year-old colonel François Nivard Charles Joseph, Vicomte d'Hénin, he seizes Mirebalais and Trianon two weeks later. This effectively ends resistance in the south, but Louverture and Christophe continue to hold out with some 10,000 black troops dispersed throughout the north, while in the west, 1,500 black guerrillas under Dessalines occupy Crête à Pierrot. Leclerc sends Boudet to besiege the latter. The French are bloodily repulsed twice before Dessalines cuts his way out and vanishes into the hills.

Resistance quickly erodes. Christophe gives himself up to the French with his 1,200 men and artillery train by April 26, followed by Louverture on May 6, and Dessalines shortly thereafter. Saint Domingue's revolutionary fortunes appear to be waning as Leclerc—his own forces now reduced by more than a third because of disease—treacherously has Louverture seized on June 7 by General Brunet (despite promises of clemency) and begins the process of disarming the black populace. Louverture is deported four days afterward to Brest aboard the ship Héros to die in exile.

LATE JULY 1802. Reports reach Saint Domingue that the French government has officially restored slavery on Guadeloupe, as well as reopened the transatlantic slave trade, while denying persons of color the title of “citizen.”

AUGUST 1802. Black resistance on Saint Domingue flares anew despite Leclerc's attempts to crush it through fearsome massacres and gruesome executions, such as crucifixions and being torn apart by dogs. The captive Louverture arrives in France on August 17 to die of pneumonia in the Alpine fortress of Joux, while Christophe—after serving briefly with the French—rejoins the insurrection in October, along with Dessalines and the mulatto exile Pétion. Yellow fever rages through the French ranks, killing Leclerc himself on Tortuga Island near Le Cap by the night of November 2. General Vicomte de Rochambeau succeeds him as governor and commander in chief.

JANUARY 16, 1803. After pressing French troops back inside their garrisons, Dessalines's subordinate Nicolas Geffard briefly occupies the southern port of Anse à Veau. This victory is followed shortly thereafter by a successful assault on Cape Tiburon by 2,000 guerrillas out of its hills under the combined leadership of Gilles Bénéch, Nicolas Régnier, and Goman. When Col. Louis Marie Berger subsequently assembles the Port Salut mulatto militia to march to Tiburon's relief early in February, they also rise up in rebellion against French command.

MARCH 5, 1803. Geffard's northern army joins forces with Férou's guerrillas at Plaine des Cayes, besieging Berger's French forces within Les Cayes. A relief convoy of 1,200 freshly arrived troops from France, including the 3rd Polish Demi-Brigade under Gen. Jean Sarrazin, pauses at Cape Tiburon during its passage to attempt to secure this peninsula. Instead, they suffer 300 killed before staggering into Les Cayes, where many of them become infected with yellow fever.

MAY 1803. England renews its war against France and blockades French ports on Saint Domingue as early as June.

AUGUST 1803. Surrounded by insurrection on all sides, cut off at sea, and ravaged by disease, the French forces abandon Jérémie.

SEPTEMBER 1803. Dessalines, emerging as victor in the struggle against the French, has himself proclaimed governor general of the island for life.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1803. Facing massacre at the hands of Dessalines, the French brigadier general d'Hénin's 850-man Saint Marc garrison surrenders to Capt. James Walker of HMS Vanguard, being evacuated aboard three prizes for Cape Saint Nicholas Môle.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1803. Capt. John Bligh bombards the French fort guarding the entrance into Port Dauphine with his 74-gun HMS Theseus, then sends boats into its harbor to seize the 28-gun Sargasse and five other lesser prizes. Shorn of their defenses, the French garrison of General Dumont subsequently agrees to be evacuated to Cap François.

Fort La Ferrière

Traumatized by France's brief reconquest of Haiti, in 1804 the black emperor Jacques Dessalines ordered that each department erect a stronghold to resist any future invasion. Clearances began for Fort des Trois Pavillons at Port-de-Paix, Fort Campan at Léogâne, Fort Cap-Rouge at Jacmel, and so on. However, none matched the size and impregnability of the citadel envisioned by General Christophe.

A lookout point high up in the jungle was chosen, on the grounds of La Ferrière or "The Smithy" property, 17 miles south of Cap Haïtien. To reach its summit, a 5-mile uphill trek was required from the town of Milot. Christophe planned a formidable stone fortress atop this 2,600-foot limestone ridge, which was known as Mount Bonnet-à-l'Évêque or the "Bishop's Miter." By early 1805, he already had thousands of laborers stockpiling bricks and materials nearby to commence its foundations. Skilled specialists were gathered to supervise the efforts of hundreds of masons and carpenters. All work was directed by the general's chief military engineer, Henri Barré.

Despite a promising start, labor was interrupted by the emperor's assassination on October 17, 1806. The young nation was plunged back into civil war. Christophe invaded the south with 10,000 men, seeking to wrest full control of the government. After being repelled at the capital's gates by the mulatto leader Pétion, he returned to Cap Haïtien in January 1807 to assume power as president of only the "Republic of the North."

Still, he hoped that by transforming his territory into a showpiece, he would win over reluctant southerners. Economic development was therefore stressed, and work was made compulsory. Foreign experts were hired to help revive agriculture, establish schools and hospitals, and complete the extremely difficult La Ferrière project. The fort's design became grandiose: four great towers protected by eight batteries, in tiered casements of 20 guns apiece. Only its west front had no artillery because of its sheer 200-foot precipice. Some walls measured 10 feet thick. Inside were quarters for 1,500 troops, a chapel, magazines, wells, a huge cistern, and a sewage system. Christophe also commenced work in 1810 on the ornate Sans Souci Palace at nearby Milot.

When Pétion was reelected as president of the South the next March, Christophe created a monarchy in the North and declared himself "King Henry I." Cap Haïtien was renamed Cap Henry, the strict Code Henry was promulgated in February 1812, and when the fort was sufficiently complete to be garrisoned the next year, it was called La Citadelle Henry. All work was finished four years later. Its distinctive prow was christened the "Coidavid Tower" in honor of Henry's queen consort, Marie-Louise Coidavid. She was once the innkeeper's daughter at the Auberge de la Couronne, where the king waited tables as a slave in his youth.

It was said that Christophe spent many hours on the citadel battlements, gazing across the North Plain through a brass telescope. The view extended for at least 30 miles on a clear day, as far as Monte Christi. When the fortress was struck by lightning at 6:00 p.m. on August 25, 1818, starting a dangerous fire, he and his staff galloped through the rain from Sans Souci to battle the blaze, which was eventually put out. Damages were repaired by early October.

Ironically, though, this remarkable structure never saw action. Instead, it was pillaged and abandoned after Henry's suicide two years later, then was heavily damaged by the earthquake of May 7, 1842. Its roofs finally collapsed from neglect. Still, 163 guns and more than 30,000 cannonballs were found intact when the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) declared it a World Heritage Site and restoration work commenced in 1980.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1803. French general Brunette requests that the Royal Navy evacuate his surviving troops from Les Cayes.

OCTOBER 17, 1803. The mulatto general Geffard takes possession of Les Cayes.

LATE NOVEMBER 1803. French Evacuation. Given that more than 50,000 of the 58,000 French troops transferred to Saint Domingue within the past two years have died—mostly due to disease—

France's cause is lost. A massive flight of white residents occurs from Le Cap (modern Cap Haïtien), effectively ending French rule. Governor Rochambeau's ship is intercepted while leaving by the Royal Navy, resulting in his imprisonment for eight years.

On January 1, 1804, Dessalines proclaims the new Republic of Haiti (its ancient Arawak name) and orders a convention celebrated at Gonaïves to draft a new constitution. The island's population has been reduced to about half of its 1790 total by more than a dozen years of genocidal warfare.

FRENCH REVOLUTIONARY WARS (1793–1802)

In Europe, the opening round of hostilities between Revolutionary France and an Austro-Prussian coalition in 1792 soon begins to spread when the radical new French rulers execute Louis XVI on January 21, 1793, then also declare war against Great Britain, Spain, and the Netherlands. Given Great Britain's maritime might, plus the purging of royalist elements from France's naval officer corps and its lack of any significant territorial holdings in the New World, most of the subsequent fighting is confined to European waters. Nevertheless, certain expeditions are dispatched into the Americas, especially to vie for control over the commercially rich sugar islands of the Caribbean.

FEBRUARY 1, 1793. Britain officially counters by declaring war against France.

MARCH 7, 1793. France declares war against Spain.

MARCH 18, 1793. Gen. Georges Henri Victor Collot arrives at Guadeloupe to officially assume office as its Republican governor.

APRIL 11, 1793. Nicolas Georges Jeannet-Oudin, nephew of the formidable head of Paris's "Committee for Public Safety," Georges-Jacques Danton, arrives at Cayenne from France as Commissaire to "republicanize" this colony. Nineteen months later, he will flee to North America after learning that his uncle has been guillotined and that slavery has been abolished by the Directorate.

When this measure is eventually promulgated in French Guiana three months later, it will cause an utter economic and social collapse as most planters flee into the city of Cayenne, while their slaves devastate the plantations and scatter into the jungle.

APRIL 12, 1793. At Bridgetown (Barbados), British troops of the 86th "Shropshire Volunteers" Regiment of Foot under Maj. Gen. Cornelius Cuyler go aboard the 50-gun HMS Trusty of Vice Adm. Sir John Laforey (and its flag captain John Drew), the 16-gun sloop Nautilus of Cmdr. Lord Henry Paulet, the armed schooner Hind, and the hired merchantman Hero, to attack French Tobago. Arriving off that coast two days later, they call upon its governor Laroque de Monteil to surrender, but he refuses. The troops are therefore disembarked in Great Courland Bay on the evening of April 14, and at 1:00 p.m. the next day, Fort Scarborough is carried by assault, the English suffering 3 killed and 25 wounded. The entire island then capitulates, and William Myers is installed as military governor.

This seizure is followed by a British attempt against much larger Martinique, in conjunction with some French loyalists, which proves unsuccessful. Naval support consists of the recently arrived, 50-year-old rear admiral Alan Gardner's 98-gun HMS Queen (and its flag captain John Hutt); the 90-gun Duke of Commo. George Murray; the 74-gun Hector of George Montagu and Monarch of Sir James Wallace, bearing a large contingent of troops from Barbados under Major General Bruce. This attack miscarries, and many of the French monarchists are left to their fate.

MAY 7, 1793. A small British military force is embarked at Halifax (Canada) to proceed toward the nearby French islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon, escorted by the 28-gun frigate Alligator of Capt. William Affleck and armed schooner Diligente. They capture the French outposts without resistance on May 14.

LATE JANUARY 1794. A large British expedition under 59-year-old vice admiral Sir John Jervis and 64-year-old lieutenant general Sir Charles (later 1st Earl) Grey reaches Barbados from England to spearhead a renewed offensive against French possessions in the West Indies.

FEBRUARY 5, 1794. Jervis's Sweep. Three days previously, Vice Admiral Jervis has set sail from Barbados with his 98-gun flagship Boyne under the flag captain George Grey; the 74-gun vice-flagship Vengeance of Commo. Charles Thompson under the flag captain Lord Henry Paulet and the 74-gun Irresistible of John Henry; the 64-gun Asia of John Brown and Veteran of Charles Edmund Nugent; the 40-gun frigate Beaulieu of John Salisbury (later Edward Riou); the 36-gun frigate Santa Margarita of Eliab Harvey; the 32-gun frigates Blonde of John Markham, Solebay of William Hancock Kelly, Quebec of Josiah Rogers, Ceres of Richard Incleton, and Winchelsea of Viscount Garlies; the 28-gun frigate Rose of Edward Riou (later Matthew Henry Scott); the 16-gun sloops Nautilus of Cmdr. James Carpenter, Rattlesnake of Cmdr. Matthew Henry Scott, Zebra of Cmdr. Robert Faulknor (later Richard Bowen), and Avenger of Cmdr. James Milne (later Henry William Bayntun); the 8-gun bomb vessel Vesuvius of Charles Sawyer; the 24-gun storeship Dromedary of Sandford Tatham; and the 44-gun store ship Woolwich of John Parker. They are furthermore escorting transports bearing 6,100 troops under General Grey.

This expedition arrives off Martinique by February 5, finding only the 32-gun French frigate Bienvenue anchored before Fort Royal (modern Fort de France), and an 18-gun corvette at Saint Pierre. The troops are therefore disembarked at three different places against little opposition, and by March 16 they have General Rochambeau's 600 defenders besieged within forts Louis and Bourbon, the rest of the island being in English hands (at a cost of 71 dead redcoats and 196 wounded or missing). The capital's main citadel of Fort Louis is stormed by March 20, Commander Faulknor working his sloop Zebra in so close during its bombardment that he leaps ashore with a landing party and carries a crucial part of its works. Once this garrison falls, Rochambeau surrenders Fort Bourbon on March 22, and Martinique passes entirely into British hands. (The frigate Bienvenue is incorporated into the Royal Navy as the Undaunted, and Faulknor is promoted as its new captain.)

By March 31, most of the British army is reembarked, and Jervis and Grey strike out toward Saint Lucia. They arrive the next day and again disembark their forces at three different places by evening, obliging General Ricard to surrender by April 4. A garrison is installed under Sir Charles Gordon, and the greater part of the troops thereupon return to Martinique the next day, gathering greater strength for an assault against Guadeloupe. Reinforcements continually swell the British fleet, including the 44-gun frigates Assurance of Capt. Velters Cornwall Berkeley and Roebuck of Capt. Alexander Christie; the 44-gun storeships Experiment of Cmdr. Simon Miller and Ulysses of Cmdr. Richard Morice; the 32-gun frigates Terpsichore of Capt. Sampson Edwards and Blanche of Capt. Christopher Parker (later of Robert Faulknor); the 28-gun frigate Resource of Cmdr. (acting captain) Charles Herbert; the 16-gun sloop Inspector of Cmdr. Wyndham Bryer; the 14-gun sloop Bulldog of Edward Browne; the 14-gun cutter Seaflower of Lt. William Pierrepont; plus the gunboats Tickler of Lt. Henry Wray, Vernon of Lt. Thomas Henry Wilson, Teaser of J. Hope, Vexer of R. Smith, Spiteful of John Hindes Sparkes, and Tormentor of William Wells.

Faulknor captures Fort Louis, Martinique, under covering fire from his 16-gun sloop Zebra; oil painting by William Anderson. (National Maritime Museum, London)

On April 8, Jervis sets sail for Guadeloupe, detaching the frigates Quebec, Ceres, and Rose, plus a sloop, to occupy the adjoining Saintes two days later, without loss. That same evening of April 10, the first contingent of Jervis's main fleet anchors in Guadeloupe's Gosier Bay, some troops disembarking the next day under covering fire from the frigate Winchelsea. The transports arrive on April 12, Fleur d'Épée being taken by Major General Dundas and Captain Faulknor. Fort Saint Louis, Pointe-à-Pitre, and the Islet à Cochon battery are abandoned shortly thereafter by the French, whereby Grande Terre passes entirely into British hands. The army reembarks and circles around westward to Petit Bourg (Basse-Terre) on April 14, again landing without opposition and compelling General Collot to surrender the entire island by April 20. Dundas is installed as military governor, after which Jervis and Grey's expedition withdraws to Saint Kitts.

MARCH 27, 1794. The fledgling American government, threatened by the depredations of Algerine corsairs and further informed that the Royal Navy will prohibit all neutral trade to the French West Indies, authorizes the construction of six large frigates to reconstitute the U.S. Navy. Three will be launched three years afterward: the 44-gun United States at Philadelphia and Constitution at Boston, as well as the 36-gun Constellation at Baltimore.

JUNE 2, 1794. Hugues's "Brigand War." The frigates Thétis and Picque, the "brick" or brig Espérance, plus six transports arrive in the Windward Islands from Aix at La Rochelle under the 35-year-old commodore Corentin Urbain de Leissègues, bearing the expedition of radical commissioners Jean-Baptiste Victor Hugues and Pierre Chrétien, which is intended to recuperate the French Antillean possessions. Deciding to start with Guadeloupe, they begin by disembarking the 1,100 troops of Gen. Claude Aubert, Brig. Gen. Jean-Baptiste Jacques Cartier, and the adjutant general Charles Étienne Rouyer at Pointe des Salines in Gosier Bay the next day, completing this operation by the afternoon of June 4. Two nights later, Aubert directs a nocturnal assault by 25-year-old lieutenant colonel Jean Boudet's column against the nearby 16-gun Fort Fleur d'Épée, whose enfeebled garrison retreats beyond the Salée River.

The 21-year-old British commander for Guadeloupe's Grande Terre region, Lt. Col. Gordon Drummond, is subsequently obliged to withdraw all his men by boat to Basse-Terre. However, news of this French counteroffensive has reached Jervis and Grey at Saint Kitts by June 5, and they immediately set sail to the island's relief with what forces they can muster, arriving two days later. Grey disembarks, while Jervis proceeds with HMSS Boyne, Vanguard, Vengeance, and Veteran to assist the 4,000-man garrison holding the main port city of Pointe-à-Pitre—too late, though, as Hugues has carried it by storm on June 6, slaughtering more than 800 of its British and 900 French royalist defenders (of whom 100 are black). The English will nonetheless mount a counterattack by disembarking 2,000 men in Gosier Bay on June 10, but they cannot win around Boudet's 200 defenders at Fort Fleur d'Épée.

Nine days later, two battalions of British seamen under Capt. Lewis Robertson of HMS Veteran also counterattack by landing at Anse à Canot on Grande Terre. After several minor skirmishes, they reembark by July 3, having suffered 7 killed—including Robertson—29 wounded, and 16 missing. Neither side is sufficiently strong to drive the other off the island, hence several months of desultory campaigns ensue, during which Chrétien and Cartier die of yellow fever, along with numerous other French officers and men. On July 30, French forces reoccupy the nearby island of La Désirade.

Finally, after freeing and recruiting large numbers of local mulattoes and blacks, as well as receiving an additional 2,000 reinforcements on September 27 from France, Hugues disembarks several contingents the next day at Basse-Terre's Guyonneau and Lamentin to attack the main British encampment at Berville. Its 2,000 defenders hold out until October 6, when they agree to surrender the next day; the English commanders are deported 14 months afterward to France aboard the Andromaque. Some 300 of their 800 French royalist allies are massacred outright, along with 100 of 900 mulatto troops. Hugues will furthermore proclaim the abolition of slavery on November 1, as voted by the Convention in Paris as of February 4, 1794, which will attract even more mulatto and black volunteers into his ranks.

Only besieged Fort Saint Charles or Mathilde remains in British hands, finally being evacuated by Capt. Richard Bowen of HMS Terpsichore during the night of December 11–12, 1794, thereby leaving Guadeloupe once more entirely in French possession. Hugues thereupon installs a Revolutionary tribunal, renames Pointe-à-Pitre as “Port-la-Liberté,” and pursues his radical measures with such ruthless zeal—aided by a guillotine brought from France—as to earn himself the sobriquet of the “Colonial Robespierre.” Given the limited military and naval resources at his disposal, he opts to discomfit the British throughout this theater by encouraging slave uprisings with promises of freedom, a policy dubbed the “Brigand’s War” by his outraged foes. Lt. (later Gen.) William Dyott, for example, described the brigands as “emancipated slaves, and whites of extreme democratic principles.”

NOVEMBER 1794. Jervis returns home to England, being relieved in the Lesser Antilles by Vice Adm. Benjamin Caldwell.

JANUARY 1795. In Europe, French Revolutionary armies overrun the Netherlands, helping to install a satellite government known as the “Batavian Republic.”

Also in January, French forces make a raid upon the British island of Saint Vincent.

JANUARY 4, 1795. At daybreak, the 32-gun, 198-man frigate HMS Blanche of Captain Faulknor sights the 36-gun, 265-man French frigate Picque of Captain Conseil outside Pointe-à-Pitre (Guadeloupe), which advances beyond range of Fort Fleur d’Épée’s batteries at 12:30 p.m. upon perceiving Blanche’s interception of an American blockade-running schooner arriving from Bordeaux. Both warships maneuver warily until an hour past midnight, when a heated engagement erupts and persists until 5:15 a.m. on January 5, when the dismasted Picque strikes. The Royal Navy warship suffers the death of its captain, plus another 7 dead

Jay Treaty

Great Britain’s declaration of war against Revolutionary France early in 1793 set the stage for resolving Britain’s disputes with the United States. Ever since the United States had won its independence a decade earlier, frictions had simmered. American vessels did not enjoy access to British ports, most especially in the West Indies, once a lucrative destination. Differences also emerged regarding the exact border with Canada, while southern plantation owners were still demanding compensation for the slaves that they had lost.

The detention of some 350 U.S. merchantmen by Royal Navy blockaders during 1793–1794 brought matters to a boil. Thomas Jefferson and James Madison called for “commercial hostility” against British interests, believing that London could not retaliate militarily. President George Washington and Treasury Secretary Alexander Hamilton, though, preferred to send Chief Justice John Jay to London to negotiate a settlement.

Although the new nation could not pose a serious naval challenge, London wished to retain the neutrality of its large merchant marine. For his part, Hamilton desired to restore normal trade relations with England and its empire.

The Jay Treaty of November 19, 1794, between Great Britain and the United States, which permitted the Royal Navy to confiscate French goods found aboard American vessels, was viewed in France as a “betrayal and violation” of the 1778 accord between Paris and the Continental Congress. American vessels in French ports were consequently ordered to be impounded, and French privateers were authorized to begin making captures on the high seas.

and 21 wounded; French losses totaled 76 dead and 110 injured.

JANUARY 5, 1795. Off Désirade, the 74-gun Belona of Capt. George Wilson and the 32-gun frigate Alarm of Charles Carpenter intercept a French troop convoy bound from Brest toward Guadeloupe under escort by the 50-gun Hercule, 36-gun frigate Astrée, two corvettes, and some armed ships. The Royal Navy pair is only able to capture the 20-gun, 70-man Duras, bearing 400 troops as passengers, thereby allowing 3,000 reinforcements to reach Hugues at Pointe-à-Pitre the next day. Of these troops, some 700 are former French West Indian residents—500 whites and 200 mulattoes—organized into the so-called Bataillon des Antilles.

MARCH 2, 1795. At dawn, several hundred slaves—inspired by promises of freedom sent by the French commissioner Hugues and led by the mulatto planter Julien Fedon—revolt on the British-occupied island of Grenada, overrunning the towns of Marquis (modern Grenville) and Gouyave (Charlotte Town), massacring their detachments, and seizing Gov. Ninian Home, his family, and entourage. British garrisons are nonetheless able to resist elsewhere throughout the island, so a stalemate ensues, with the rebel slaves operating from Fedon's remote estate of Belvedere atop Mount Saint Catherine.

MARCH 8, 1795. Gov. James Seton calls for a Carib assembly on the formerly French island of Saint Vincent; a revolt erupts when the Garifuna or “Black Carib” inhabitants sweep down through the British plantations along its leeward coast under their chieftain Joseph Chatoyer, while the “Yellow Carib” natives of Chief Duvalier do the same down its windward side. A French contingent from Martinique joins the rebels at Chateaublanc, and all their forces muster at Dorsetshire Hill in anticipation of an attack against the island capital of Kingstown.

Chief Joseph Chatoyer of Saint Vincent with two of his wives, by Agostino Brunias. (Institute of Jamaica)

However, a recently arrived battalion of British troops advances against this rebel position on March 14, and Maj. Alexander Leith slays Chatoyer during a clash that evening. The rebels therefore retire into the island's interior, and a guerrilla struggle ensues over the next 15 months.

MAY 3, 1795. The British sloop HMS Zebra arrives at Stabroek (Essequibo, Guiana), bearing a letter from the exiled Prince of Orange that directs its colonial authorities to recognize England as Holland's ally. Gov. Albertus Backer is willing to comply, yet the planters demur, so the vessel retires with the Dutch official aboard.

Toward the end of this same month, nine British warships appear off the Demerara River mouth to renew this offer, which is again refused, although the pro-Batavian planters soon regret their decision as a blockade is imposed and the French commissioner Hugues begins enacting measures in the region to free and arm slaves.

MAY 8, 1795. During a rainstorm on Grenada, a surprise British offensive against Fedon's mountain strongholds fails, during which the captive governor Home, his family, and 47 other British hostages are murdered.

JUNE 19, 1795. After being invaded the previous day by French forces from Guadeloupe, the tiny English garrison on Saint Lucia under Brigadier General Stewart—still holding Vieux-Fort and Rabot but severely depleted because of disease and guerrilla strikes by runaway French slaves and soldiers—is evacuated by the armed storeship Experiment of Lt. John Barrett and another transport.

JULY 22, 1795. In Europe, Spain and Prussia cease hostilities against the French.

AUGUST 17, 1795. On the Knip Plantation in western Curaçao, a few dozen slaves led by one named Tula refuse to commence work at dawn; instead, they begin marching upon the island capital Willemstad to lay their complaints before the Dutch governor, in the process freeing other slaves on adjoining estates and taking up arms. Soon numbering more than 1,000 strong, they position themselves at Porto Marie, from where they are dispersed on August 20 by a column of troops (including free black and mulatto militiamen) under Captain van Westerholt.

The rebels subsequently flee into the hills near Fontein, then later ensconce themselves atop the steep heights of St. Christoffelberg, until finally forced to surrender when van Westerholt launches a large-scale sweep on August 31. Tula—with a price upon his head—is captured by another Knip slave on September 19, thus bringing this rebellion to an end.

OCTOBER 10, 1795. The three-month-old French campaign on Grenada is hampered when Capt. Henry Warre's 32-gun frigate, the Mermaid, intercepts the 10-gun sloop Brutus, as well as the 18-gun Républicaine four days later, as they are bearing a French general and troops toward that contested island. Enough reinforcements nevertheless win through that the rebels are able to seize several boats and press in upon its capital of Saint George's by February 1796.

MARCH 22, 1796. A British counterattack on Grenada led by General Nicholls retakes Post Royal Hill from the French rebels, during which clash their leader, Fedon, is wounded.

APRIL 21, 1796. The 48-year-old rear admiral Sir Hugh Cloberry Christian, having recently been created a knight of the Bath, reaches Carlisle Bay (Barbados) with two ships of the line and five lesser men-of-war, escorting the remnants of a convoy—scattered by a storm—bearing a large contingent of troops under 61-year-old lieutenant general Sir Ralph Abercromby (a graduate of both Rugby College and Edinburgh University). After uniting with Vice Adm. Sir John Laforey, commander in chief of the Leeward Islands, this fleet proceeds the next day to Marin Bay (Martinique), where it drops anchor by April 23. Laforey resigns his command to Christian the next day and sails for England aboard the 74-gun HMS Majestic.

APRIL 23, 1796. Commo. Thomas Parr appears off the Dutch colonies of Demerara and Essequibo with his 54-gun flagship Malabar, the 64-gun Scipio of Francis Laforey, the 40-gun frigates Undaunted of Henry Roberts and Pique of David Milne, plus the auxiliary Babet of William Granville Lobb. This squadron has been detached eight days previously by Vice Admiral Laforey to convey a contingent of troops under Maj. Gen. John Whyte to occupy these Dutch possessions. The force easily accomplishes this mission, furthermore seizing Berbice on May 2, along with the 24-gun frigate Thetis and 12-gun sloop Zeemeeuw plus several richly laden merchantmen.

APRIL 26, 1796. Offensive down the Windward Islands. General Abercromby's expedition quits Martinique aboard a large number of transports, escorted by Admiral Christian's 74-gun flagship Thunderer under Capt. James Bowen, Canada of George Bowen, Vengeance of T. M. Russell, Minotaur of Thomas Louis, Ganges of Robert McDowall, and Alfred of Thomas Durry; the 54-gun Hindustan of Thomas Bertie, Madras of J. Dilkes, and Abergavenny of Edward T. Smith; the 44-gun frigate Charon of J. Stevenson; the 40-gun frigate Beaulieu of L. Skinner; the 38-gun frigates Arethusa of Thomas Wolley and Hebe of M. H. Scott; the 36-gun frigate Undaunted of H. Roberts; the 32-gun frigate Astrea of R. Lane; the 28-gun frigate Laurel of Robert Rolles; the 16-gun brigs Fury of H. Evans, Bulldog of G. F. Ryves, Pelican of John Clarke Searle, Victorieuse of Jemmett Mainwaring, and Beaver of S. G. Warren; the 44-gun storeship Woolwich of Daniel Dobree; the 20-gun Tourterelle of Edward Fellows; and the 8-gun bomb vessel Terror of D. Douglas.

The next morning, this fleet appears off French-held Saint Lucia, a disembarkation being effected at once in Longueville Bay under covering fire from the Ganges and the Pelican. Another landing is made at 10:30 a.m. on April 28 in Choc Bay—the same day on which Morne Chabot is carried—and by the next day, a third disembarkation is completed in Anse La Raye. The French nonetheless continue to resist vigorously, repelling an attack against some of their advance batteries on May 3, then against Vigie on May 17, with heavy losses to the invaders. After being driven back atop Morne Fortunée, though, 2,000 Frenchmen have no choice but to offer to surrender on May 24, the entire island capitulating at noon two days later.

Abercromby and Christian detach the Arethusa, the Hebe, the 32-gun frigate Mermaid of Capt. Robert Waller Otway, the Pelican, and the Beaver to the British West Indian island of Grenada with a contingent of troops to bring an end to its French-inspired rebellion, while the main fleet pauses to do the same at Saint Vincent. (In late June, Christian will be relieved by Rear Adm. Henry Harvey, returning to England in October aboard Beaulieu.)

Abercromby reaches and reconnoiters Grenada on June 9. The encampments of Fedon atop Mount Qua Qua are surrounded and compelled to request terms the next day, surrendering on June 11. The leader disappears, but 38 of his followers are executed on July 6–8, while 120 French soldiers are deported to England. To extirpate any seeds of future rebellion, most blacks or Caribs are subsequently hunted down, and 4,644 are deported to Baliceaux Island by October. A little more than half of them later are allowed to resettle around Sandy Bay in the northeastern corner of Saint Vincent, while the 2,026 most defiant are taken aboard eight transports and marooned on distant Roatán Island in the Gulf of Honduras on April 11, 1797.

AUGUST 18, 1796. In Europe, France and Spain sign an alliance at Madrid, which is ratified in Paris as of September 12. Immediately thereafter, Great Britain imposes an embargo upon all Spanish shipping.

AUGUST 28, 1796. The 38-year-old French rear admiral (and former nobleman) Joseph de Richery arrives unexpectedly off Newfoundland with a squadron, finding only Capt. Thomas Graves's 32-gun frigate Venus inside Saint John's. The British brace for an immediate assault, but Richery instead bears away southward, entering Bay Bulls on September 4 to destroy its fishing camps. The next day, he detaches his 34-year-old rear admiral Zacharie Jacques Théodore, Comte Allemand, to raid the Bay of Castles in Labrador with the Duquesne, the Censeur, and the Friponne, while Richery himself proceeds to Saint Pierre and Miquelon with his main body to visit a like treatment upon its shore establishments. Because of contrary winds, Allemand does not gain Labrador until September 22, then burning its largely deserted fishing bases. Both French contingents then recross the Atlantic safely, Allemand entering Brest by November with numerous prizes and 1,800 prisoners taken from a British convoy out of Quebec City, which he has intercepted.

OCTOBER 1796. Revolutionary France, angry at American ratification of John Jay's treaty with Great Britain—despite American insistence that the 18-year-old Franco-American alliance is still in effect—begins harassing U.S. shipping. Over the next eight months, 316 American vessels are seized upon the high seas.

OCTOBER 6, 1796. Spain, as an ally of France, declares war against Great Britain. Maritime traffic to and from its Spanish American colonies will be seriously hampered by Royal Navy blockades, opening up trade opportunities for American and other neutral carriers.

NOVEMBER 25, 1796. The 28-gun British frigate Lapwing of Capt. Robert Barton hastens out of Saint Kitts, having been summoned to help repel a French disembarkation on nearby Anguilla. The next day, it obliges the invaders to attempt to retire aboard their 20-gun sloop Décus and 10-gun Vaillante, the former being captured after a one-hour firefight during which 120 of the 336 men aboard are either killed or wounded. The Vaillante is beached and destroyed by the Lapwing's guns.

FEBRUARY 12, 1797. Trinidad. Admiral Harvey sets sail southward from Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique), being reinforced off Carriacou Island two days later, thereby bringing his total strength to the 98-gun Prince of Wales (flag) of Capt. John Harvey; the 74-gun Bellona of George Wilson, Vengeance of Thomas Macnamara Russell, and Invincible of George William Cayley; the 64-gun Scipio of Charles Sydney Davers; the 38-gun frigate Arethusa of Thomas Wolley; the 32-gun frigate Alarm of Edward Fellowes; the 16-gun sloops Favourite of Cmdr. James Atholl Wood, Zebra, and Thorn of Cmdr. John Hamstead; the 12-gun sloop Victorieuse of Cmdr. Edward Stirling-Dickson; plus the 8-gun bomb vessel Terror of Cmdr. Joseph Westbeach. They are moreover escorting 40 transports bearing 6,750 soldiers under General Abercromby, who has returned after visiting England for an attempt against the Spanish sugar island of Trinidad.

The British sight their objective early on February 16, steering for the Gulf of Paria by way of Boca Grande or the Dragon's Mouth. At 3:30 p.m., just as the expedition clears the channel, they discover Spanish rear admiral Sebastián Ruiz de Apodaca anchored inside Chaguaramas Bay with his 80-gun flagship San Vicente of Commo. Jerónimo González de Mendoza; the 74-gun Gallardo (official name, San Juan de Sahagún) of Gabriel Sorondo and San Dámaso of José Jordán; the 68-gun Arrogante of Rafael Benazar; the 34-gun frigate Santa Cecilia (alias Concha) of Manuel Urtizabal; plus the brigantine Galgo. This Spanish squadron has recently arrived in reply to Gov. José María Chacón's request for reinforcements, but their crews have been so decimated by disease—suffering more than 700 deaths—that the Gallardo and the Arrogante have not even been able to continue to Cartagena as planned.

Given that the batteries on Gaspar Grande Island cover both entrances into Chaguaramas Bay with 20 guns and 2 mortars, Harvey anchors offshore in the Gulf of Paria, while directing Abercromby's transports to find a berth about five miles from the island's capital of Puerto España or "Port of Spain" and the Arethusa, the Thorn, and the Zebra to patrol overnight. The outnumbered Spaniards are so demoralized that, during these hours of darkness, Ruiz de Apodaca holds a council aboard his flagship and orders the batteries spiked and the warships scuttled before retreating inland to join Governor Chacón. The British are surprised to see the Spanish men-of-war burst into flames at 2:00 a.m. on February 17, managing to save only the San Dámaso the next morning and incorporate it into the Royal Navy.

Meanwhile, Abercromby disembarks three miles outside Port of Spain, without any opposition from Chacón's troops—reduced from the expected 2,000 to fewer than 600 because of the failure of the island militias to muster. The capital is therefore occupied that same evening, and, on February 18, the Spanish governor agrees to capitulate the entire island nine days later. Losses total 7 Spaniards killed and a single Briton wounded. For the feeble resistance, both Chacón and Ruiz de Apodaca are subsequently cashiered upon their repatriation to Spain, while their subordinates are suspended for four years.

APRIL 8, 1797. Puerto Rico. After being reinforced by the 74-gun Alfred of Capt. Thomas Totty, the 38-gun frigate Tamer of Thomas Byam-Martin, plus several lesser craft, Harvey's fleet steers toward Puerto Rico, escorting Abercromby's transports. These 60 vessels arrive on April 17, probing San Juan's shoreline before anchoring off Cangrejos Beach that same evening, then disembarking numerous troops under Abercromby the next morning against slight opposition.

The Spanish governor, Brig. Gen. Ramón del Castro—although commanding only 200 regulars—nonetheless mounts a vigorous defense on the basis of his capital's natural impregnability and some 3,800 volunteers. The San Antonio Bridge is fortified in addition to the city's other major defenses, while a half-dozen floating batteries are launched out in the harbor under frigate captain Francisco de Paula Castro. Even 100 French privateersmen under captains Barron and Paris are pressed into service ashore.

After reconnoitering San Juan's defenses, Abercromby institutes formal siege proceedings, yet is unable to discomfit its garrison. Castro makes a sally with 800 militiamen and two troops of cavalry on the night of April 29–30, compelling the British to break camp and lift their siege the next day, sailing away by May 2 after suffering 31 killed, 70 wounded, and 124 captured or missing.

XYZ Affair

The French Revolutionary government was angered by Washington's signing of the Jay Treaty, which smoothed Anglo-American relations while war was raging between both European powers. President John Adams's criticism of some of the more radical actions of the "Reign of Terror," which brought the Directory into power, further soured relations between Paris and Washington. As a result, France refused to receive Charles Cotesworth Pinckney as U.S. ambassador in 1796. French warships and privateers also began seizing neutral American vessels on the high seas for steering toward British ports or bearing British goods. Soon, more than 300 vessels were intercepted in the Atlantic, Mediterranean, and Caribbean.

Even some leading figures in Adams's own Federalist Party, such as Alexander Hamilton, called for a declaration of war. But given the United States's naval weakness, the president instead sent John Marshall and Elbridge Berry in 1797 to join Pinckney in Europe to attempt to patch up matters diplomatically. After several deliberate delays, the U.S. delegates were approached in Paris in October by three agents of French foreign minister Charles Maurice de Talleyrand Périgord—later identified only as "X," "Y," and "Z," but actually Jean Conrad Hottinguer, Pierre Bellamy, and Lucien Hauteval. They demanded a large bribe simply to initiate talks. They also indicated that Washington would have to provide a huge loan to France and that President Adams would have to issue a formal apology for his offensive comments. The commissioners rejected these demands and instead offered France many of the same provisions granted to Britain in the Jay Treaty. The Directory responded by sending the American delegates home.

In the aftermath to this humiliating rebuff, the president's political opponents suggested that his delegates might have been at fault, so they insisted that all the official papers be made public. When Adams released his report in April 1798, a firestorm of anti-French sentiment erupted. Insulted by the mistreatment suffered during the so-called XYZ Affair, the U.S. Congress authorized the president to acquire 12 more warships. One month later, a bill was passed creating the Department of the Navy. Many Americans' former affection for France was greatly weakened by these revelations, paving the way for hostilities.

MAY 20, 1798. A Spanish squadron—except Capt. Sancho de Luna's 40-gun royal frigate Minerva (flag), which turns back—reluctantly quits Campeche to sail to Cozumel, there detaching the 8-gun sloop Feliz of the senior lieutenant Francisco de Fuentes Bocanegra and the brigantine Príncipe de la Paz of the junior lieutenant Pedro Grajales to proceed into Chetumal by July 28 with a troop convoy. This force is to attack the English logwood establishments in Belize.

MAY 28, 1798. Quasi-War with France. As a result of continuous maritime frictions, the U.S. Congress authorizes American warships to capture armed French vessels hovering off the coast of the United States. Diplomatic relations with Paris are also severed on July 7, and that same Saturday evening the 20-gun U.S. sloop Delaware of Capt. Stephen Decatur captures the 12-gun, 70-man French privateer schooner Croyable near Egg Harbor (New Jersey).

The scope of American naval operations is expanded two days later when warships are authorized to make captures anywhere on the high seas and the issuance of privateer commissions is sanctioned—although neither Washington nor Paris openly declares war against the other. Because of the distance separating both belligerents, the resultant hostilities will prove to be a low-grade commercial struggle, with American warships protecting traffic from French commerce raiders.

JUNE 3, 1798. Spanish governor Arturo O'Neill de Tyrone marches out of Mérida de Yucatán with four militia companies, plus two half-companies of black troops, to reinforce San Felipe de Bacalar and launch an offensive into Belize.

AUGUST 30, 1798. Disgruntled because of the eight months' arrears in their pay, the garrison at Cayenne in French Guiana mutinies, being placated five days later by a forced contribution extorted by the desperate authorities from the town's unhappy merchants.

AUGUST 31, 1798. Belize. O'Neill's 2,000-strong army advances from Bacalar (Yucatán), skirmishing its way into Belize, which is garrisoned by detachments of the 63rd and 6th West Indian regiments under Lt. Col. Thomas Barrow. The Spanish expedition is soon reinforced by a flotilla that joins it off the coast, the only Royal Navy warship in these waters being the 16-gun sloop Merlin of Cmdr. John Ralph Moss, although the colony also boasts the gunboats Tickler, Towzer, and Mermaid, plus the schooners Teaser and Swinger, and eight other gunboats. They are sufficient to repel attacks off Montego Key on September 3, 4, and 5, and off Saint George's Key on the 6th.

On September 10, O'Neill orders naval lieutenant de Fuentes to lead his flotilla into battle against the English vessels anchored off Saint George's Key, but that officer refuses. The governor therefore delegates de Fuentes to command the transports, while he personally leads an attack with four gunboats crammed with troops under junior naval lieutenant Pedro Grajales, artillery lieutenant colonel Leandro Poblaciones, naval ensign Feliciano Mallón, the Yucatecan militia captain Manuel de Negroe, José Díaz, Sub Lt. José Maldonado, Capt. Juan Bautista Wall of the Castilla Battalion, and Capt. Pedro de Elizalde. They are supported by the sloop San Román of Capt. Manuel Meléndez; the schooners Santa Isabel of Lt. José María Rosado, Concepción of militia captain Juan José Gálvez, and San Joaquín of Lt. José Román, as well as two launches under Lt. Joaquín Traba.

At 2:00 p.m. on September 10, the Spaniards advance, passing between Saint George's and Cocina keys to open fire against a portion of the British flotilla. When the Merlin and others weigh to join this action, Grajales hoists the withdrawal signal after an hour's fighting, the attackers retreating until nightfall. The Spaniards remain off Chapel Key until September 15, when their land contingent draws off for Bacalar and de Fuentes's flotilla returns toward Campeche.

DECEMBER 1798. Having largely driven French raiders out of American waters, 21 U.S. Navy warships are assigned by the secretary of the navy, Benjamin Stoddert, to rid the West Indies of these privateers.

FEBRUARY 9, 1799. At noon, Thomas Truxtun's 36-gun, 1,280-ton USS Constellation sights the 36-gun Insurgente of "Citizen" Michel-Pierre Barreaut 15 miles east-northeast of Nevis and engages two and a half hours later, just as a sudden squall snaps the Insurgente's main topmast. The hapless French vessel strikes by 4:30 p.m., having suffered some 70 casualties, compared to 1 killed and 2 injured aboard the Constellation.

JULY 31, 1799. Vice Adm. Lord Hugh Seymour sets sail from Fort Royal (Fort de France, Martinique) with his 98-gun flagship Prince of Wales under Capt. Adrian Renou; the 74-gun Invincible of George William Cayley; the 38-gun frigates Tamer of Thomas Western and Unité (French prize) of John Poo Beresford; the 32-gun frigate Siren of Thomas

Thomas Truxtun's USS Constellation battles the Insurgente, by Henry Scott. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

Le Marchant Gosselin; the 28-gun frigates Lapwing of Thomas Harvey and Amphitrite of Charles Ekins; the 20-gun sloop Daphne of Richard Matson; and the 12-gun sloop Requin (French prize) of Lt. William Wood Senhouse. They furthermore carry numerous troops under Lt. Gen. Thomas Trigge for an operation against the last remaining Dutch colony in South America, Suriname.

Seymour and Trigge arrive off Suriname by August 11, convincing its Dutch governor to capitulate on August 20. Fort Amsterdam's garrison marches out the next day with full honors of war. By August 22, all important points in Suriname—including its capital, Paramaribo—are occupied, and the 16-gun brig-sloop Kemphaan and the 20-gun French Hussard are seized, becoming incorporated into the Royal Navy.

FEBRUARY 1, 1800. This evening, Truxtun's USS Constellation brings to action the 52-gun Vengeance of Captain Pitot, outward bound from Guadeloupe toward France. The Americans kill 28 and wound 40 of the French crew during five hours of nocturnal exchanges before the Vengeance limps off toward Curaçao. The Americans suffer 14 dead and 25 injured, as well as losing their mainmast, sailing to be repaired at Port Royal (Jamaica).

MAY 11, 1800. An American boat party under Lt. Isaac Hull penetrates the harbor at Puerto Plata (Hispaniola), cutting out the French privateer Sandwich and spiking the guns of the Spanish fort.

JULY 23, 1800. Two French brigs and three schooners from Guadeloupe attempt to enter Santa Anna Bay (Curaçao), supposedly to reinforce their Dutch allies against an English threat but actually to secure this island; instead, they are rebuffed by suspicious governor Johan Rudolph Lausser. Negotiations between both groups drag on uneasily for several weeks, while the French gradually build up their strength offshore to more than 1,200 men aboard 13 vessels.

Since the Dutch outpost refuses to endorse arrangements made in the name of the puppet "Batavian Republic," the French finally move up the coast on September 3 and seize St. Michiel Bay, disembarking their troops to march overland and occupy Otrobanda four days later. From there they open a bombardment against the capital, Willemstad, opposite it. On September 13, the Dutch are relieved by the blockading frigate HMS Nereide of Capt. Frederick Watkins, whom they have contacted out at sea—preferring to surrender to the British Navy rather than to the French Republican privateers. With Watkins's help, the defenders eventually compel the French to lift their siege by dawn of September 23, leaving behind much destruction and 200 dead (mostly due to disease). The English remain in possession of Curaçao until peace is declared two years later.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1800. After seven months of negotiations between William Murray and First Consul Napoleon Bonaparte, the United States and France sign the Convention of Mortefontaine, which will halt the “Quasi-War” as of January 1, 1801. It will be officially ratified as of December 21. The French give up their insistence that the 1778 treaty of alliance is still in force, which would have required the United States to refrain from dealing with British interests and to defend French colonies in the West Indies, while the Americans drop their demand for $20 million in compensation. Public displeasure in the United States about these terms nonetheless proves so profound that John Adams loses that autumn's presidential election to Thomas Jefferson.

EARLY 1801. In Europe, Britain reacts against the “League of Armed Neutrality,” organized during the previous winter by Czar Paul I as a counter-measure against the Royal Navy's blockade of France. Consequently, the English take action against Russia, Denmark, Sweden, and Prussia.

MARCH 20, 1801. On instructions from London, an expedition under 53-year-old rear admiral John Thomas Duckworth, veteran commander of the Leeward Islands's station (see “March 21, 1796” entry in “Haitian Revolution”), and General Trigge occu-

First Barbary War

Until the American Revolution, American merchantmen sailing the Mediterranean were protected by the Royal Navy. A year after gaining independence in 1783, though, the new U.S. government began to prepare for extortion from the “Barbary State” rovers. These were four port cities in North Africa that had preyed upon non-Muslim shipping ever since the religious conflicts of previous centuries. They included the independent sultanate of Morocco, plus the semi-autonomous regencies of Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis. Although all were nominally part of the Ottoman Empire, they acted on their own.

In 1785, the Bey of Algiers took two American ships, demanding $60,000 to release their crews. Despite protests from Thomas Jefferson, then the U.S. ambassador in France, this sum was paid. More ransoms ensued; the American government was soon obliged to pay as much as $1 million a year to ensure safe passage. By 1800, these payments totaled 20 percent of the government's annual revenues.

Shortly after Jefferson was inaugurated as president early in 1801, Pasha Yusuf Karamanli of Tripoli demanded $225,000 from his new administration. Jefferson refused, so the pasha launched hostilities by having the flagstaff outside the U.S. Consulate cut down on May 14. The other Barbary States followed suit. The president did not respond with a declaration of war. Instead, he dispatched Commo. Richard Dale to Gibraltar with the new, powerful frigates President of 54 guns, Essex of 46 guns, and Philadelphia of 36 guns, plus the 12-gun schooner Enterprise, to protect American interests.

Four years of blockades, ship duels, and bombardments ensued. American warships were rotated regularly to the Mediterranean, yet they could not subdue the Barbary States. Finally, a land offensive threatened the pasha's rule at Tripoli. William Eaton, the U.S. consul who had been expelled from Tunis, had contacted Karamanli's exiled elder brother Hamet in Egypt. He proposed a joint expedition to restore him to the throne. Escorted by seven U.S. marines under Lt. Presley N. O'Bannon, Eaton marched across the Libyan desert with 500 mercenaries to be joined by three American warships under Capt. Isaac Hull. On April 27, 1805, they stormed the town of Derne, or Derna. When the pasha's counterattack of May 13 failed to dislodge this foothold, he sought terms.

A treaty was therefore signed by Jefferson's delegate Tobias Lear aboard USS Constitution on June 4, 1805, and ratified six days later by the pasha. The First Barbary War had ended. Although terms were disappointing and captures soon resumed, the United States greeted Eaton, O'Bannon, and other returning officers as heroes. Because the marine lieutenant was presented with a “Mameluke” sword by Hamet, graduating officers are still today given a similar sword, with the engraved words “The Shores of Tripoli.”

pies the tiny Swedish colony of Saint Bartholomew, then Saint Martin four days later. The Danish outposts of Saint Thomas and Saint John (Virgin Islands) are seized by March 29, and Saint Croix capitulates to the English as well two days later.

APRIL 16, 1801. The French are obliged to evacuate the islands Sint Eustatius and Sabá of their Dutch allies. The islands are then seized by Capt. John Perkins of the 20-gun sloop Arab, with a few troops under Colonel Blunt of the 3rd Buffs. (Perkins is apparently a mulatto naval officer commissioned in the West Indies, known as “Jack Punch” because one of his earliest commands was the schooner Punch.)

MAY 29, 1801. Lacrosse, now promoted to rear admiral and bearing an appointment as captain general of Guadeloupe, reaches that island with 400 French regulars and immediately begins to reorganize its 4,100 defenders. Numerous black militia officers and troops, which were raised during its lengthy blockade, quickly come to resent Lacrosse’s wholesale dismissal of their services, as well as reductions in pay, deportations of those adjudged as too radical “neo-Jacobins,” and the return of white landowners. When the black troops’ commander, General Béthencourt, dies on August 5 and Lacrosse refuses to promote the 35-year-old ex-slave, Col. Magloire Pélage, to fill his post, a brief mutiny erupts three days afterward among conscripts assembled at Basse-Terre.

OCTOBER 12, 1801. In Europe, Britain and France agree to a temporary cessation of hostilities.

OCTOBER 21, 1801. Suspicious of the designs of Colonel Pélage and other black officers at Pointe-à-Pitre, Lacrosse moves to arrest them. However, a popular insurrection three days afterward frees the captives and instead deposes Lacrosse in favor of Pélage.

NOVEMBER 5–6, 1801. This night, Lacrosse is deported from Guadeloupe toward France aboard a Danish ship, which is intercepted by a Royal Navy man-of-war. The British authorities deposit him on Dominica, from where he issues a series of proclamations denouncing the black “rebels” who have removed him from office on Guadeloupe.

JANUARY 5, 1802. The 35-year-old mulatto officer Louis Delgrès deposes the white port captain and other French functionaries still at Basse-Terre (Guadeloupe), accusing them of collusion with Lacrosse. Two days afterward Delgrès assumes office himself.

FEBRUARY 13, 1802. A small naval expedition under the 45-year-old ex-privateer Charles Cathérin Serizat arrives out of the Atlantic to seize the island of Marie-Galante and restore French rule. He is soon joined from Dominica by Lacrosse.

FEBRUARY 15, 1802. Fearful of a French invasion intended to undo Guadeloupan autonomy, the mulatto officers Delgrès and Massoteau arrest a dozen or so of the remaining white officers at Basse-Terre, deporting them the next day, after which the mulatto leaders also muster numerous black troops to resist a potential invasion. However, Pélage will order them to stand down by the next month, worried by their radical methods.

MAY 6, 1802. Reoccupation of Guadeloupe. The 32-year-old general Antoine Adolphe Richepanse and his 41-year-old, Guadeloupan-born subordinate, Brig. Gen. Jacques Nicolas Gobert, arrive off Grande-Terre from Brest with 3,500 soldiers to restore French rule over the island and disarm any unauthorized black formations. Some mulatto officers such as Pélage are willing to acquiesce, but others such as Delgrès, Massoteau, and the 33-year-old Joseph Ignace decide to resist. On May 8, the 800-man Merlen Battalion advances overland to directly invest the main rebel stronghold of Basse-Terre.

Major combat erupts two days later when Richepanse’s remaining soldiers disembark at Baillif and fight their way across the Pères River, in the face of spirited opposition. Black rebel troops under Palerme and Jacquet meanwhile check the Merlen advance at Dolé, but Richepanse drives all rebel forces out of the lower portions of Basse-Terre and forges past République Battery to reach the Herbes River banks by May 11, while Merlen also seizes Palmiste. Serizat having in the meantime arrived from Marie-Galante, his own contingent presses inland from Pointe-à-Pitre on that same date, uniting with Merlen by May 13. Fighting rages along the Herbes River until Serizat overruns Morne Houël and drives a rebel band under Louis Isseris from L’Espérance Manor on May 14, thus linking up by sundown with Gobert’s column at Vermont. This junction allows Richepanse to officially assume office as island captain general, while leaving Delgrès trapped inside Basse-Terre’s citadel of Fort Saint Charles. Rebel thrusts by Palerme to break this stranglehold on May 18, directed against the L'Espérance and Ducharmoy manors, are repelled by Serizat.

The French siege of the main stronghold climaxes when four batteries open fire against Fort Saint Charles's hapless defenders on May 21, and Delgrès and Ignace must evacuate overnight. The loss of their principal citadel (today renamed Fort Louis Delgrès) effectively dooms all organized black resistance on Guadeloupe, as French columns hunt down poorly armed rebel bands. Fleeing from Dolé, Palerme's group is defeated by Gobert's pursuers on May 25 near Baie Mahault, scattering into the Lamentin Forest. Ignace torches numerous inland plantations and assembles a mass of raw recruits at Baimbridge, only to himself suffer defeat the next day, at the cost of his life. The last rebel concentration under Delgrès is smashed when d'Anglemont Manor near Matouba is carried by assault on May 28, Delgrès dying when its magazine is blown up.

Summary trials and executions then ensue, while even loyal mulatto officers such as Pélage—who has fought on behalf of Richepanse—and 34 others are arrested on June 28, to be deported to Brest a fortnight later aboard the warships Fougueux and Redoubtable. French units and native auxiliaries continue to hunt the few small, half-starved rebel bands hiding in the mountains, the rebels powerless to prevent the virtual reintroduction of slavery and revocation of all mulatto rights to citizenship as of July 17. On September 3, Richepanse dies of yellow fever and is succeeded as captain general by Lacrosse.

In Europe, the Treaty of Amiens has been signed as of March 27, 1802, marking a temporary halt to hostilities. By its terms, the islands of Saint Pierre, Miquelon, Tobago, Martinique, and Saint Lucia are to be restored to France, while the Netherlands are to receive back Demerara, Essequibo, Berbice, Suriname, and Curaçao. The tiny Swedish and Danish colonies in the Virgin Islands are also to be returned by Great Britain—which thus only retains Trinidad for its efforts. This truce will last less than 14 months before fighting flares anew.

NAPOLEONIC WARS (1803–1810)

Hostilities resume between Britain and France on May 16, 1803—the Netherlandic “Batavian Republic” joining their French allies on June 25—and the Royal Navy reimposes its blockade upon Continental ports and transatlantic traffic.

JUNE 17, 1803. Late this evening, the 41-year-old commodore Samuel Hood reaches Barbados with an English squadron to escort Lt. Gen. William Grinfield's expeditionary force against objectives in the West Indies. The commodore immediately detaches Capt. James O'Bryen of the 36-gun frigate Emerald to blockade French Saint Lucia with some consorts, while Grinfield's troops are being embarked.

JUNE 19, 1803. Saint Lucia. Hood sets sail from Barbados with his 74-gun flagship HMS Centaur and the Courageux, the 44-gun Argo and Chichester, plus the 16-gun Hornet and 18-gun sloop Cyane, escorting Grinfield's troop convoy toward Saint Lucia. HMS Emerald and the 18-gun Osprey join the next morning, bearing the 36-year-old major general George Prevost (governor of Dominica and eldest son of Franco-Swiss-born Augustine Prevost; see “December 23, 1778” entry et seq. in “American Revolutionary War”). The whole British flotilla anchors in Choc Bay by 11:00 a.m. on June 21.

The 2nd Battalion of the Royals under Brig. Gen. Robert Brereton is landed by 2:00 p.m., along with two fieldpieces, followed by Grinfield with the rest of his small army, while a contingent of marines occupies nearby Gros Islet. After emplacing themselves at La Vigie and Castries, the invaders call upon the island's French governor, Brig. Gen. Jean Francois-Xavier Noguès, to surrender. Being rebuffed, the British carry the main Morne Fortunée stronghold by storm at 4:30 a.m. on June 22, leading to a general capitulation of the entire island. Brereton is installed as military governor.

JUNE 31, 1803. Hood and Grinfield capture Tobago.

JULY 24, 1803. At 6:00 p.m. on this squally Sunday, the French 74-gun Duquesne and Duguay Trouin slip out of Cap François (modern Cap Haïtien) with the frigate Guerrière in an attempt to elude Capt. John Loring's 74-gun HMS Bellerophon and the rest of his blockading squadron. The 74-gun HMS Elephant of Capt. George Dundas pursues this trio westward, along with the 32-gun frigates Æolus and Tartar, while the English Theseus and Vanguard of 74 guns lag behind.

During the night, Captain Kerrangel's Duquesne doubles back eastward and surrenders at 3:30 the next afternoon to the Theseus and the Vanguard, after a token exchange of shot during which a single English seaman is killed and another wounded. Loring's squadron also snaps up Lieutenant Druault's 16-gun, 60-man schooner Oiseau between Tortuga and Saint Domingue.

AUGUST 31, 1803. Capture of Demerara. Having learned at Barbados of the month-old rupture in Anglo-Batavian relations, General Grinfield leads a small army aboard Hood's Centaur (flag), Chichester, Alligator, transport Brilliant, auxiliaries Heureux and Netley, plus several smaller store ships, to set sail the next morning and attack the Dutch settlements on the Wild Coast.

This British expedition arrives off Demerara's roadstead by the evening of September 18, Lieutenant Lawrence's Netley probing its shoreline and capturing 24 boats to disembark the troops. A surrender demand is also sent ashore to Gov. Gen. A. Meerteks, who requests terms the next morning. The Hornet and the Netley then sail upriver by evening of September 19, taking possession of Fort Willem Frederick, the 18-gun Batavian corvette Hippomenes, and a dozen prizes, the actual capitulation of Demerara and Essequibo being formalized the next day.

Immediately, Capt. Loftus Otway Bland of the Heureux departs to obtain the surrender of Berbice as well, with a detachment of troops and marines under Lt. Col. Robert Nicholson aboard the Alligator, the Netley, and the Brilliant.

OCTOBER 19, 1803. Spain signs a secret alliance with France, which is to be made public once its treasure ships arrive safely from the Americas.

JANUARY 6, 1804. Diamond Rock. This evening, Hood's 74-gun flagship HMS Centaur under Capt. Murray Maxwell anchors off Diamond Rock—a small strategic islet a mile southwest of Martinique—and the next morning sends a party of British seamen ashore to occupy it and begin installing heavy batteries to hold it against an enemy counterattack.

By February 3, a 120-man garrison is installed, and for administrative purposes the British commission this outpost as "His Majesty's sloop of war Fort Diamond" (later changed to the Diamond Rock). Martinique's governor—the 56-year-old vice admiral Louis Thomas, Comte Villaret de Joyeuse—is unable to muster any effective countermeasures.

MARCH 1804. Fearful of a possible invasion of Haiti by France—which has not yet relinquished its claims to this island—Governor General Dessalines massacres almost all its remaining whites, plus numerous mulattoes.

APRIL 5, 1804. Commodore Hood departs Barbados with HMS Centaur (flag), the 44-gun frigates Pandour and Serapis, the 28-gun Alligator, the 14-gun Drake, the 16-gun sloops Hippomenes and Guachapin, as well as the 10-gun schooner Unique, escorting a convoy bearing 2,000 troops under Maj. Gen. Sir Charles Green to attack Dutch Suriname. Captain O'Bryen's HMS Emerald joins en route.

APRIL 25, 1804. Suriname. Hood and Green arrive off this Dutch colony, and an advance division of 700 men is immediately disembarked under Brigadier General Maitland at Warapa Creek. The next evening, HMSS Emerald, Pandour, and Drake cross the bar and bombard the seven-gun Dutch battery at Braam Point, allowing Brigadier General Hughes's division to wade ashore and capture its 43-man garrison (3 of whom are wounded).

On the morning of April 27, Hood and Green transfer from the Centaur aboard the Emerald and proceed to the mouth of Suriname's river to call upon its authorities—inland at Paramaribo—to surrender. The French commissioner-general, or governor Pierre Berranger, Lt. Col. B. A. Batenburg, and Willem Otto Bloys van Treslong refuse the next day, so the English squadron slowly forges upstream.

Hughes's division also presses overland, overrunning Leyden Redoubt on the morning of April 30, after being disembarked at Resolution Plantation by a Royal Navy boat party. The Dutch garrison fires the magazine and withdraws, inflicting numerous casualties when the British enter unwarily and it detonates. Meanwhile, Maitland closes in from the west, and Hood's shallow-draught warships arrive off Fort New Amsterdam by evening of May 5. Batenburg has already requested terms the previous evening, and on the 6th the Dutch capitulate, surrendering their colony along with the 32-gun frigate Proserpine, 18-gun corvette Pylades (captured from the English earlier in this war), three merchantmen, the 10-gun sloop George, and seven gunboats.

Diamond Rock. (Department of Tourism, Martinique)

OCTOBER 5, 1804. Capt. Graham Moore, with the Royal Navy frigates Amphion, Lively, Medusa, and Indefatigable, intercepts the Spanish frigates Medea, Clara, Mercedes, and Fama as they approach Spain from the Americas under Brig. Gen. José Bustamante y Guerra, governor of Montevideo. The latter are bearing treasure from Manila, Callao, and the River Plate, which Moore demands they surrender. When the Spaniards resist, the English open fire, and the Mercedes explodes before the other three give up.

OCTOBER 8, 1804. Dessalines proclaims himself Emperor Jacques I of Haiti.

DECEMBER 2, 1804. In Paris, First Consul Bonaparte crowns himself Emperor Napoleon I.

DECEMBER 12, 1804. Spain officially declares war against Great Britain.

FEBRUARY 19, 1805. The British frigate HMS Surveillante captures the Spanish schooner Guadalupe and brigantine San Román off Campeche, then two days later enters the Mexican port itself and cuts out the anchored vessels Icaro, Aurora, San Rafael, and Bautista.

FEBRUARY 20, 1805. The 48-year-old French rear admiral Edouard Thomas de Burgues, Comte de Missiessy, appears off St. Lucia with his 120-gun flagship Majestueux; the 74-gun ships of the line Jemmapes, Lion, Magnanime, and Suffren; the 40-gun frigates Armide, Gloire, and Infatigable; the 16-gun corvettes or brigs Acteon and Lynx; as well as a schooner. His squadron has exited Rochefort on January 11 and eluded its British blockading squadron.

Missiessy chases a British convoy being escorted by HMS Alligator into St. Lucia and receives an exaggerated account from a prisoner as to the strength of the island defenses. The French therefore steer for Martinique to consult with Governor Villaret de Joyeuse. Missiessy's squadron is also bearing 3,300 troops, with which he is to conduct diversionary attacks in the West Indies before disembarking them and hastening back to Europe.

FEBRUARY 22, 1805. Assault on Dominica. Before dawn, British lookouts manning the small, five-gun fort at Scott's Head on the southernmost tip of this island sight some approaching vessels, so they fire a warning shot to rouse the defense. Dawn reveals Missiessy's squadron, flying false English colors and guided by Martinican pilots. The defenders under Major General Prevost are not deceived, their batteries opening fire when Missiessy bears down on the capital of Roseau.

Shortly after 7:00 a.m., 19 boats begin pulling toward shore, bearing 900 French troops under General Lagrange. Their landing three miles south of Roseau near Michel is at first thwarted by St. Luke's Independent Militia Company, the 1st West India Regiment's light company, and the 46th Regiment of Foot's grenadier company. However, when 3 French frigates bear down to offer supporting broadsides, these British troops must fall back closer to Roseau. The town is already being bombarded by Missiessy's main squadron, despite heavy counterfire from the five-gun Melville Battery along the waterfront and the eight-gun Fort Young on the high ground behind the capital. Blazing wads discharged from the latter's muzzles soon set fire to many wooden homes below.

Lagrange meanwhile comes ashore, but his initial advance upon the capital is checked by a British concentration under Maj. A. A. Nunn of the 1st West India Regiment, bolstered by two, 6-pounder fieldpieces. A second French landing at 9:00 a.m. under Colonel Barbot, a mile and a half north of Roseau, succeeds in overrunning the 120 militiamen and single 3-pounder holding Morne Daniel. By early afternoon, Prevost realizes that his outnumbered force cannot hold off both French thrusts, so he orders his troops to evacuate Roseau and re-concentrate at Fort Cabril, at Dominica's northwestern harbor of Prince Rupert's Bay. It will take the bulk of his small army four days to make this march, over very rough trails.

The French meanwhile spare the civilian population of Roseau in exchange for a levy of £7,500, while Missiessy seizes 22 anchored prizes. Lagrange then throws down the capital's defenses and moves up the coast to demand the surrender of Fort Cabril on February 26. Prevost refuses, and after Missiessy probes the defenses around Prince Rupert's Bay the next day, the entire expedition sails away for Martinique on February 28.

LATE FEBRUARY 1805. Haitian Offensive. To attack French general Jean-Louis Ferrand, still holding out in Santo Domingo, black emperor Jacques I (formerly Dessalines) advances along both northern and southern shores of this island toward the Spanish capital. Santo Domingo is reached on March 8 by 21,000 Haitian troops and besieged for three weeks.

Only the chance appearance of Missiessy's small squadron on March 26 breaks this siege, as Jacques I fears that it portends a French invasion of Haiti during his absence. (Actually, though, Missiessy is simply homeward bound for France, having quit Martinique on March 22, and will exit the Caribbean six days later.) The Haitians nonetheless raise their siege and fall back through the interior, laying waste to Monte Plata, Cotui, and La Vega, while also slaughtering the inhabitants of Moca and Santiago.

MARCH 1805. Local French forces launch raids against Saint Kitts, Nevis, and Montserrat.

APRIL 3, 1805. The 46-year-old rear admiral Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane (Knight of the Bath and uncle to Thomas, Lord Cochrane; see "November 28, 1818" entry in "Latin American Insurgencies") reaches Barbados with the 74-gun HMS Northumberland and four other British ships of the line, having traversed the Atlantic in pursuit of Missiessy. Within two days, he incorporates another ship and four frigates into his command, then stands away toward Santo Domingo. Finding his foe already gone, Cochrane proceeds to Jamaica to reinforce Rear Adm. James Dacres.

APRIL 25, 1805. Cochrane quits Port Royal (Jamaica) with his squadron to take up station in the Leeward Islands.

MAY 14, 1805. Villeneuve vs. Nelson. A Franco-Spanish fleet arrives at Fort de France (Martinique) from across the Atlantic under the 41-year-old vice admiral Pierre Charles Silvestre de Villeneuve and his 34-year-old second-in-command, Rear Adm. Pierre Étienne René, Comte Dumanoir Le Pelley. The French contingent has escaped from the Mediterranean port of Toulon and consists of the 80-gun Bucentaure (flag), Neptune, Formidable, and Indomptable; the 74-gun Pluton, Mont Blanc, Berwick, Atlas, Swift-sure, Scipion, and Intrépide; the 40-gun frigates Cornélie, Rhin, Hortense, Hermione, Sirène, and Thémis; plus two gun brigs and the British sloop Cyane

Nelson's pursuit of Villeneuve through the Lesser Antilles.

(captured 150 miles to windward of Barbados). The French crews are fleshed out with several hundred soldiers and, furthermore, carry 3,332 troops under Gen. Jacques Lauriston. The 48-year-old admiral Federico Carlos Gravina y Nápoli has joined out of Cadiz and leads the Spanish ships of the line Argonauta (flag), Terrible, América, España, San Rafael, and Firme, with 1,930 soldiers over and above their usual complements.

This formation's objective is to lure a major British fleet across the ocean in its wake, then immediately return to Europe and gain a temporary advantage in the Channel for a projected invasion of England. Over the next two weeks, Villeneuve remains at anchor in Fort de France, blockading its offshore English base of Diamond Rock while awaiting the arrival of an additional fleet from Brest under 49-year-old vice admiral Honoré Joseph Antoine, Comte Ganteaume.

MAY 29, 1805. Reclamation of Diamond Rock. At 5:30 p.m., the French Pluton of 43-year-old commodore Julien Marie, Baron Cosmao-Kerjulien, the Berwick of Captain Carmas, the frigate Sirène of Captain Chabert, the brig Argus of Captain Taillard, and the schooner Fine of Captain Meynard tow 11 gunboats out of Fort de France (Martinique), bearing 240 troops under Major Boyer to attack Diamond Rock. After circling that small islet, the French squadron closes at 7:00 a.m. on May 31, opening fire an hour later. Capt. James Wilkes Maurice offers a spirited resistance with his 128-man garrison, destroying 3 gunboats and continuing to shell the French troops once they wade ashore. Finally, although having suffered only 2 killed and 1 wounded, the exhausted British magazines oblige the defenders to request terms at 4:30 p.m. on June 2, capitulating the next day and being repatriated to Barbados by June 6.

Meanwhile, the French frigate Didon has reached Martinique on May 30 with new orders from Napoleon I, instructing Villeneuve to land his troops as reinforcements for the West India garrisons, ravage the British colonies as a further diversionary tactic, then steer quickly for Europe. On June 4, the French 74-gun Algésiras and Achille also arrive under the 41-year-old rear admiral Charles René Magon de Médine, having escaped from Rochefort, and at 4:00 a.m. the next morning the combined fleet weighs for Guadeloupe. Several hundred local troops are taken aboard there on the afternoon of June 6 before the expedition presses on toward Antigua.

JUNE 8, 1805. At 10:00 a.m., while rounding Antigua, the combined Franco-Spanish fleet spots 15 British merchantmen setting sail for Europe. These are easily captured, but upon interrogating some of its crew members, Villeneuve learns that Nelson's fleet has arrived four days earlier at Carlisle Bay (Barbados). Assuming that the British admiral has brought 12 to 14 ships of the line with him—rather than the 10 Nelson actually commands, plus 3 frigates—the French commander fears they will be added to Cochrane's 6 in the Windward Islands to produce a force equal to his own.

Villeneuve therefore holds a hurried conference with Gravina, at which both agree to abandon their diversionary scheme and return forthwith to Europe. The colonial volunteers are rapidly disembarked, no regular troops are landed, prizes are dispatched toward Martinique, and the Franco-Spanish fleet (now including the ship of the line Aigle) disappears into the Atlantic by June 11.

Nelson has meanwhile incorporated Cochrane's only two ships of the line at Barbados—plus 2,000 local troops—into his force, but because of faulty intelligence, he steers southwest toward Trinidad under the impression that he will find his enemy there. Dawn of June 8 reveals his mistake, and it is not until the next afternoon when he calls at Grenada that the British admiral finally discovers the combined fleet's true heading. Racing northward, he arrives off Antigua by June 12, only to learn a

Trafalgar

When Admiral Villeneuve's storm-tossed fleet, homeward bound from its Caribbean foray, sighted Cape Finisterre off northwestern Spain on July 22, 1805, it found 15 British ships of the line waiting under Vice Adm. Sir Robert Calder. They fought an indecisive battle in poor visibility that same evening, during which two Spanish ships were captured. After hovering within sight of each other for another two days, Calder retreated. He was later relieved, court-martialed, and reprimanded for not having crippled the combined fleet.

Villeneuve meanwhile anchored in Vigo Bay on July 27, 1805. His combined fleet reemerged four days later, its Spanish ships entering Ferrol, while the French went into La Coruña. While resting there, Villeneuve received a stream of messages from Napoleon I urging him to move quickly. The combined fleet was to help Ganteaume's blockaded French squadron escape from Brest, then mass together before the emperor's invasion camp at Boulogne. His 160,000-man army, already assembled, needed only a few days of naval dominance in the Straits of Dover to board its 2,350 small boats and disgorge in the British Isles.

Villeneuve, however, became very uncertain. Orders written to him by the more cautious French naval minister, Denis Decrès, allowed the option of steering for safety in Cadiz. When Villeneuve exited on August 13, 1805, he veered around southward only two days later, perhaps misled by false reports of British strength in the Bay of Biscay. The combined fleet therefore entered Cadiz on August 20, and three days later an angry Napoleon I cancelled his invasion. He instead departed Boulogne with his army on August 27 to campaign against Austria. One month later, Villeneuve received fresh orders to lead the combined fleet into the Mediterranean.

Nelson, in the meantime, enjoyed leave in England, and on September 29, 1805, assumed command over the blockading fleet outside Cadiz. Hoping to lure his opponents out to sea, he kept only a few frigates close in, with the bulk of his warships hidden 50 miles below the horizon. Nelson also instructed his captains to charge directly into an enemy line in two columns so as to produce a general fight in which the superior British gunnery and seamanship would tell. When Villeneuve learned on October 18 that Vice Adm. François Rosily had reached Madrid, coming to relieve him, he ordered the combined fleet to prepare to sail immediately.

Demoralized, his 33 French and Spanish ships of the line did not head southeast toward the Strait of Gibraltar until two days later. On the morning of October 21, 1805, they were overtaken by Nelson with 27 of the line. Shortly after noon, twin British columns drove into the Franco-Spanish line and annihilated the combined fleet by evening. Villeneuve lost 22 ships, representing the deaths of 4,480 crewmen, 2,250 wounded, and 7,000 captured. British casualties totaled 449 dead and 1,214 wounded, and no ships were lost. Although Nelson was among the fallen, the crushing nature of his final victory ensured that no more major expeditions could come out from Spain or France to the West Indies for the remaining 10 years of this conflict.

few days later that Villeneuve and Gravina have forsaken the West Indies altogether. Nelson thereupon disembarks his own colonial forces and refreshes supplies before sailing in Villeneuve's wake.

JANUARY 12, 1806. Duckworth—now a vice admiral and Knight of the Order of the Bath—arrives at Carlisle Bay (Barbados) with a Royal Navy squadron, having vainly chased a small French force across the Atlantic. He is joined by Cochrane with the Northumberland and the Atlas, reaches Saint Kitts by January 21, then on February 1 learns that his enemy is off the coast of French-held Santo Domingo so sails to overtake. After passing through the Mona Passage, Duckworth is joined on the afternoon of February 5 by the frigate Magicienne bearing intelligence, then steers toward Santo Domingo.

FEBRUARY 6, 1806. Duckworth's Action. At dawn, British scouts sight a French squadron anchored off Santo Domingo, so Admiral Duckworth stands in to engage with his weather division consisting of the 74-gun flagship Superb under Capt. Richard Goodwin Keats, Cochrane's vice-flagship Northumberland, and the Spencer under the Hon. Robert Stopford, as well as the 64-gun Agammemnon of Sir Edward Berry. Rear Adm. Thomas Louis follows with his lee division, comprised of his own 84-gun Canopus (formerly the French Franklin), the Donegal (ex-French Hoche) under Malcolm, and the Atlas of Pym. They are trailed by the 40-gun frigate Acasta of Dunn, the Magicienne of McKenzie, as well as the 16-gun Kingfisher of Nathaniel Day Cochrane and the 14-gun Epervier.

Surprised and outnumbered, the 47-year-old French vice admiral Corentin de Leissègues orders his ships to slip their cables at 7:30 a.m. and run westward before the wind past Point Nisao, to shelter under the Ocoa Bay batteries. French strength consists of the 120-gun flagship Impérial (ex-Vengeur) of Captain Le Pigot, the 84-gun Alexandre of Garreau and Diomède of Henri, and the 74-gun Brave of Condé and Jupitre of Laignel. Closer inshore are the 40-gun frigates Félicité and Comète, plus the corvette Diligence.

Shortly after 10:00 a.m., the Superb overhauls the lead French ship Alexandre, and battle is joined.

Leissègues's Impérial (center) losing its mainmast as his squadron is defeated by Duckworth off Santo Domingo. (National Maritime Museum, London)

After an hour and a half of fighting, Leissègues steers his flagship—only its foremast still standing—in toward land, deliberately running aground near Punta Catalán by 11:40 a.m. The Diomède soon follows, while the Brave, the Alexandre, and the Jupitre have already struck to the British, suffering 760 total casualties. Duckworth sustains 74 killed and 264 wounded. He burns the beached Impérial and Diomède on February 8, then detaches Stopford to sail to Jamaica with the vessels Spencer, Donegal, Atlas, and his three prizes, while Cochrane returns to the Leeward Islands with a jury-rigged Northumberland and Agamemnon.

MARCH 1806. Commo. Louis de la Marre, Vicomte de la Meillerie, having survived the Battle of Trafalgar and escaped out of Cadiz in late February with his 40-gun frigates Hortense, Hermione, and Rhin and the 36-gun Thémis, briefly visits Cayenne (French Guiana) before returning to France.

APRIL 27, 1806. Miranda's Landing. The wealthy, 51-year-old, Caracas-born revolutionary, Sebastián Francisco de Miranda Rodríguez, arrives west of Puerto Cabello (Venezuela) aboard Captain Lewis's Leander, hired in New York with the help of American backers Col. W. S. Smith and S. G. Ogden. He is accompanied by two schooners chartered at Santo Domingo.

Having participated as a Spanish military officer in the conquest of Pensacola and the Bahamas during the American Revolutionary War, as well as rising to maréchal in the French Revolutionary armies, it is Miranda's dream to raise a similar revolt against Spanish rule in his homeland. But when he attempts to disembark at Puerto Cabello with 150 followers, they are repelled by its local garrison, and two vessels and 60 men are lost. Miranda therefore retires toward Barbados to ask for help from British rear admiral Cochrane.

JUNE 8, 1806. River Plate. The 43-year-old English commodore Sir Home Riggs Popham arrives off Cape Santa María (Uruguay) with the 32-gun frigate HMS Narcissus to reconnoiter the approaches to Buenos Aires for an impending assault. When he earlier helped conquer the Cape of Good Hope from the Dutch, Popham had learned from Capt. T. Wayne of the American slaver Elizabeth that the River Plate's residents are resentful of Spanish rule, so he has persuaded Gen. Sir David Baird to lend him a contingent for an independent campaign.

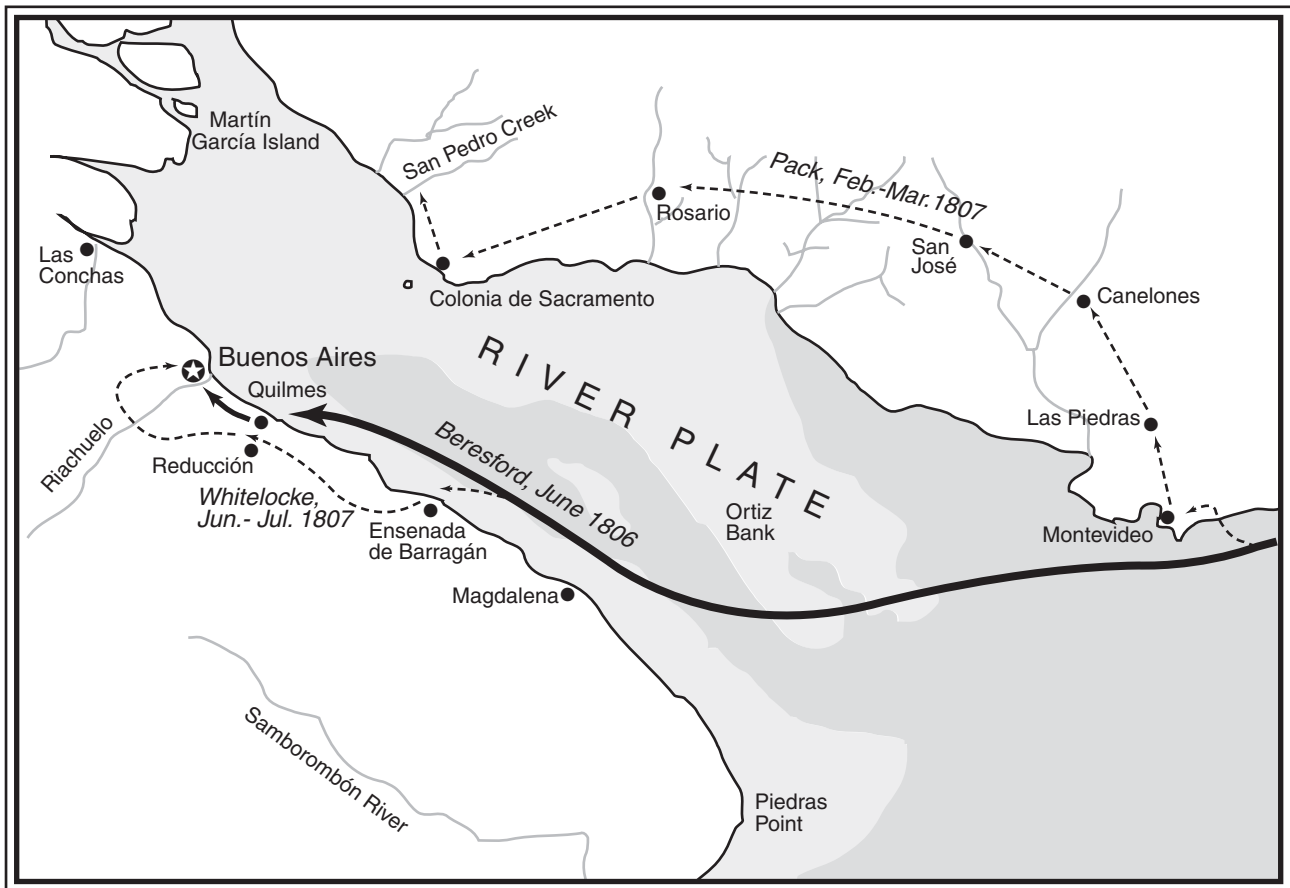

Great American Brotherhood

The first Masonic "lodges" met in England in 1717. They were groups of men from a common profession or background who would gather regularly in private to pursue a particular goal or ideal. Their purpose was to encourage one another, and they were morally bound by principles of "brotherly love, relief, and truth." Lodges soon spread into Ireland, France, Scotland, and North America. Because of their origin in Protestant Britain, though, they were banned from most Catholic countries by papal bulls as early as 1738.

As the 18th century advanced, the secretive nature of these societies proved well-suited for discussion of new ideas. Many Masons came to embrace the Age of Reason, some even referring to their meetings as "temples of Philosophy and the Arts." The Venezuelan exile Francisco de Miranda became a Mason at Philadelphia in 1783. After a dozen years of travel, he approached the Grand Lodge in Paris in March 1795 and—amid the euphoria of change unleashed by the French Revolution—asked permission to found a lodge for Latin American members. Because of the many uncertainties in that turbulent time and city, he could not actually do so until he regained London in June 1797.

Miranda's aim was to create a private forum for individuals to plan the independence of Spanish America. This forum was to be known as the Logia de Caballeros Racionales or "Lodge of Rational Knights." Miranda sponsored Bernardo O'Higgins as a new member early the next year. When O'Higgins returned to Cadiz in late April 1798, he founded another new lodge there. It took the name Logia Lautaro, in honor of the 16th-century Chilean chieftain who resisted the Spanish conquistadors. Miranda meanwhile sustained the movement from London, raising funds and chartering more lodges. His organization became known as the Gran Reunión Americana ("Great American Gathering") or the Gran Hermandad Americana ("Great American Brotherhood").

After Napoleon I invaded Spain and toppled its monarchy in spring of 1808, the number of Masonic lodges grew. Given the alliance with Britain, lodges for Spanish Americans were able to operate more openly and recruit more actively. Among the many Masons who played a significant future role in the liberation of Latin America were José de San Martín, Carlos María de Alvear, José Matías Zapiola, Juan Martín de Pueyrredón, and Bernardo de Monteagudo of Argentina; Bernardo O'Higgins of Chile; and Santiago Mariño, Andrés Bello, Luis López Méndez, and Simón Bolívar of Venezuela. Once independence was achieved, many lodges transferred to Latin America where their members exerted considerable influence on national politics.

British invasions of the River Plate estuary.

One week later, Popham's main body joins him near Montevideo, consisting of the 64-gun flagship HMS Diadem and Raisonnable, the Diomedé of 50 guns, the 38-gun frigate Leda, and the brig Encounter, escorting the transports Triton, Melantha, Willington, and Walker with 1,200 soldiers under 37-year-old brigadier general William Carr-Beresford. Beresford's army consists mostly of the 1st Battalion of the 71st Highland Light Infantry Regiment under 34-year-old lieutenant colonel Dennis Pack, plus a dragoon squadron, artillery company, and other auxiliaries. This expedition is furthermore accompanied by the merchantman Justina.

Popham convinces Beresford that, to take advantage of the element of surprise, Buenos Aires must be assaulted first, so they transfer all marines and troops aboard the lighter vessels by June 16, then—after detaching the Raisonnable and the Diomedé to blockade Maldonado (Uruguay) and the Diadem to do the same off Montevideo—advance deeper into the fog-shrouded River Plate.

On the evening of June 24, Buenos Aires's viceroy—Rafael, Marqués de Sobremonte—is summoned from the theater by the arrival of pilot José de la Peña from Montevideo with news that an English expedition is about to invade. The next morning, the regional militia is mustered, only to behold the small English army already coming ashore in the distance at Quilmes, bolstered by 340 marines, 100 sailors, 16 horses, and 8 fieldpieces. Beresford marches quickly upon Buenos Aires, brushing aside the ill-equipped contingents sent to bar his path. By the morning of Sunday, June 27, he easily crosses the Riachuelo, despite the presence of 400 Spaniards manning a six-gun battery under the military engineer, Lieutenant Colonel Gianini.

The very swiftness of this English approach unmans Sobremonte, who exits Buenos Aires with his remaining 600 troops—allegedly to attack the English from the rear but actually to flee inland to Córdoba. Command is left to Brig. Gen. José Ignacio de la Quintana, who surrenders to Beresford that same afternoon. At 4:00 p.m. on June 27, English troops peacefully occupy strongpoints throughout the city in a driving rainstorm, seizing more than 90 guns, 7,000 firearms, and other goods. The official capitulation is signed on July 2, and two weeks later an exultant Popham dispatches the Narcissus to England with glowing accounts of this land's wealth, plus more than a million pesos' worth of booty.

JULY 2, 1806. French raiders strike the West Indian island of Montserrat.

AUGUST 1, 1806. Having perceived the weakness of the English forces occupying Buenos Aires, Spaniards from outlying districts begin mustering outside the city to expel these invaders. Warned of this plan after returning from the theater, Beresford sallies at 1:30 a.m. with 550 soldiers under Pack and six fieldpieces, defeating one such force under 30-year-old Juan Martín de Pueyrredón at Perdriel Manor outside Buenos Aires at 8:00 that same morning.

AUGUST 3, 1806. Reinforced with British contingents from both Barbados and Trinidad, the revolutionary Francisco Miranda returns to Coro (Venezuela) with 10 vessels and 500 men, disembarking 300–400 of them and occupying its port, while the defenders flee inland. His call for a South American revolt falls upon deaf ears, though, being perceived as a British stratagem. Ten days later, after being attacked by Coro's regional militias, Miranda is forced to retire toward Aruba.

AUGUST 4, 1806. Argentine Reconquest. The 53-year-old, French-born naval captain and commander of the Ensenada de Barragán garrison—Santiago de Liniers y Bremond, Knight of the Order of Malta—disembarks 20 miles outside Buenos Aires at Las Conchas with another Spanish relief force, transported from Montevideo by a flotilla under Juan Gutiérrez de la Concha. Once ashore he joins de Pueyrredón's defeated contingent. Together, they muster 2,500 troops, with which de Liniers marches against Buenos Aires through a cold rain. On August 11, he encounters Beresford's defenders at Retiro, so he installs his Spanish siege artillery and throws a cavalry screen around the city.

The next day, in a sharp two-hour fight during which the Spaniards suffer 205 casualties (as opposed to 157 British), the Spanish fight their way into Buenos Aires, pressing back the outnumbered English. By 3:00 p.m. on August 12, Beresford and his 1,300 men have no choice but to surrender, eventually being interred at Luján in Argentina's interior. Popham's vessels retire from the roadstead, and—because of this Spanish victory—de Liniers is popularly acclaimed acting viceroy of Buenos Aires in place of the disgraced Sobremonte.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1806. Having reunited off Cape Henry (Virginia) after an Atlantic storm, the 74-gun HMSS Bellona and Belleisle, and the 36-gun frigate Melampus, sight the 74-gun French Impéteux limping toward Chesapeake Bay under a jury-rig. The British give chase, compelling Captain Belair to run Impéteux ashore and strike his colors; the wreck is then burned. Later, the French warships Eole and Patriote gain refuge in the Chesapeake, while the Valereuse enters the Delaware.

OCTOBER 12, 1806. Maldonado. A belated English relief convoy appears off the River Plate from the Cape of Good Hope under Lieutenant Colonel Backhouse: 913 soldiers from the 38th Infantry Regiment, 770 from the 47th, 116 in one company of the 54th, 215 troopers in two squadrons from the 20th Dragoons, 158 troopers from the 21 Dragoons, plus 6 gunners. Their four transports are escorted by HMS Lancaster of 64 guns, the 32-gun frigate Medusa, the sloop Howe, the brig Protector, and the detained American brig Rolla. Popham advises this force of Buenos Aires's fall and persuades Backhouse to attempt an assault against smaller Montevideo. The English fleet (the vessels Triton, Hero, Royal Charlotte, Columbine, Fanny, Encounter, Protector, Leda, Medusa, Diomedes, and Lancaster) approaches Montevideo's harbor by the morning of October 28 but, finding its waters too shallow to approach and silence its batteries, withdraws after a three-hour exchange of shots.

Popham next steers for Maldonado (Uruguay), setting 400 soldiers of the 38th Regiment ashore southeast of this place under Lieutenant Colonel Vassal on October 29, backed by a company of marines and sailors. At a cost of 2 dead and 4 wounded, they overwhelm Captain Borrás's 230 militia defenders, inflicting more than 50 casualties, and capturing two of the Spaniards' four guns. Vassal thereupon overruns the 12-gun battery at Punta del Este on October 30, while Popham seizes the 20-gun battery on Gorriti Island; the English thereby secure a defensible encampment at Maldonado to await further reinforcements.

Some time later, the Spanish naval lieutenant Abreu is sent from Montevideo with 400 riders to invest the British base, only to be defeated and killed near San Carlos. Lt. Col. José M. Moreno subsequently inaugurates harassing raids with gaucho cavalry, preventing the invaders from foraging inland.

DECEMBER 4, 1806. Rear Adm. Charles Stirling reaches Maldonado from England aboard HMS Sampson of 64 guns, with the Indiamen Earl Spencer, Sir Stephen Lushington, and some victuallers, relieving Popham, who returns to England to stand trial for his unauthorized campaign into this theater (eventually being “severely reprimanded,” which does not affect his popularity or subsequent career).

DECEMBER 23, 1806. Less than a month after a sortie from Port Royal (Jamaica), Capt. Charles Brisbane’s 38-gun frigate Arethusa, Lydiard’s 44-gun Anson, and Wood’s 38-gun Latona rendezvous off Aruba with the frigate Fisgard in anticipation of surprising the Dutch island of Curaçao at dawn on New Year’s Day.

JANUARY 1, 1807. Curaçao. At 1:00 a.m., Brisbane’s frigates pause outside the strongly defended entrance to Santa Anna Bay, which leads past the island capital Willemstad into the Schottegat. Having distributed a landing force into boats, the Royal Navy quartet resumes its advance four hours later and tows these craft into the channel at sunrise, catching the Dutch defense completely unprepared.

Despite sporadic counterfire from 60-gun Fort Amsterdam, Fort Republic (modern Fort Nassau atop Sablica Hill), several lesser batteries, plus the moored 36-gun frigate Kenau Hasselaar of Captain Evertsz and the 22-gun corvette Suriname of Captain van Nes, the English warships anchor opposite their preselected targets and send a surrender demand ashore. When no answer is forthcoming, Brisbane orders his vessels to open fire at 6:15 a.m., carrying all the defenses after several point-blank broadsides plus a half-hour bombardment of more distant Fort Republic. British losses total 3 killed and 14 wounded, compared to 200 Dutch casualties. Thanks to Brisbane’s boldness (for which he is later knighted), Curaçao will remain in English hands for the next nine years.

JANUARY 5, 1807. British reinforcements arrive off Maldonado (Uruguay), totaling 3,600 troops under 50-year-old brigadier general Sir Samuel Auchmuty (a New York-born American Loyalist) and escorted by the 64-gun HMS Ardent, the 32-gun frigate Unicorn, and the sloop Cherwell. His army consists of 706 troopers of the 17th Dragoons; 215 of the 20th; 158 of the 21st; 1,125 infantrymen from the 40th Regiment of Foot; 901 from the 87th; 116 from the 54th; 258 in three companies from the 95th Rifles; plus 131 artillerymen for six fieldpieces.

Capt. Charles Brisbane’s quartet of Royal Navy frigates surprise the Dutch defenders of Willemstad at dawn on New Year’s Day. (Author’s Collection)

Finding Colonel Backhouse's Maldonado base hard-pressed by gaucho guerrillas, Auchmuty orders it evacuated on January 13, leaving only a small garrison behind to hold Gorriti Island offshore with support from the Lancaster and the Diomedé. Escorted by Stirling's Diadem (flag), Raisonné, Ardent, and Lancaster; the frigates Leda, Unicorn, Medusa, and Daphné; the sloops Pheasant (of 16 guns), Howe, and Cherwell; plus the brigs Encounter, Protector, Staunch, and Rolla, the main English body then veers westward to attack Montevideo.

JANUARY 8, 1807. Haitian Civil War. This island nation has been plunged into conflict between the black General Christophe, Dessalines's successor in command of its northern armies, and the 36-year-old southern mulatto leader Anne-Alexandre Sabès Pétion. Christophe, who invaded with 10,000 men, has bloodied a surprise sally out of Port-au-Prince by Pétion with 3,000 men at Sibert on January 1. He now closes in to besiege the capital.

The guerrilla chieftain Yayou mounts a desperate defense until Pétion can return and repulse Christophe's major assault on January 8. The northerners thereupon withdraw, sowing a path of destruction as they recross Cul de Sac Plain toward Cap Haïtien to acclaim Christophe president of the "Republic of the North." Pétion is meanwhile proclaimed president of a southern republic as of March 9, and he strengthens Port-au-Prince's defenses and augments its garrison to 8,000 men. Christophe, however, hopes that by transforming his northern territory into a model state, he might win over reluctant southerners. André Rigaud, moreover, will return from exile in France in 1810 and create a third division around his southern birthplace of Les Cayes.

JANUARY 16, 1807. Montevideo. Around noon, Auchmuty disembarks his troops at Mulata or Verde Beach, between Manzo and Gorda points, six miles east of this Uruguayan capital (population 10,000). Viceroy Sobremonte detaches Colonel Allende with 800 lancers and six fieldpieces to bolster the few defenders resisting atop Carretas Point, but they are unable to make much effect. Over the next two days, the British bring their entire 5,500-man army ashore, plus six guns and 800 marines and sailors. Opposing them are 3,500 troops inside Montevideo under Gov. Pascual Ruiz Huidobro, consisting of four companies of regulars, a militia battalion, four volunteer battalions (three called Carlos IV under Maj. Nicolás de Vedia), Catalan irregulars, three squadrons of Buenos Aires dragoons, Mordeille's "hussars"—from the French privateers Reine Louise and Orient in the harbor—180 regular gunners, a battalion of militia artillerymen, plus numerous seamen. Outside the city, another 2,500 Uruguayan riders muster under Viceroy Sobremonte.

By January 19, Auchmuty strikes toward Montevideo in three columns. Sobremonte with 1,300 troops falls upon the English vanguard, supported by Allende's cavalry on both flanks. Lieutenant Colonel Brownrigg drives off this attack with a brilliant countermaneuver, which captures a piece and compels the Spaniards to retire inside their city with 100 casualties, as opposed to 25 British losses (Auchmuty having a horse shot out from beneath him). This skirmish allows the invaders to gain Tres Cruces Heights by that afternoon, overlooking the city. The next dawn, Ruiz Huidobro sends out 270 Buenos Aires foot, 260 dragoons, 650 volunteer infantrymen, 422 artillerymen, 300 hussars, 200 militiamen, 60 chasseurs, and 200 seamen under Brig. Gen. Bernardo Lecoq to launch a coordinated assault against the English in conjunction with 1,700 riders under Sobremonte, who are to attack from inland. The resulting pincer movement is intended to cut Auchmuty off from the sea. The Spanish infantry collide with the British left flank at Cristo del Cordón, its trailing columns hurrying toward this objective even as Auchmuty deploys his Light Brigade and 95 riflemen in cornfields along the line of march, ambushing the Spaniards in a crossfire. Lecoq's troops stream back into Montevideo, having suffered 200 killed, 400 wounded, plus 200 men and a gun captured, as opposed to 149 English casualties. Sobremonte's cavalry—viewing this action from a safe distance—retire into their Las Piedras encampment without engaging, from whence many subsequently desert.

That same afternoon of January 20, the British seize the Aguada Wells outside Montevideo and begin constructing siege works. Without sufficient strength to entirely surround the city, nor equipment to dig through its flinty subsoil, Auchmuty hopes to batter Montevideo into submission. Stirling sends hundreds of sailors ashore to install and man heavy batteries, the first of which opens fire on January 23. On February 2, more than 500 Spanish reinforcements slip into the city from Buenos Aires under Brig. Gen. Pedro de Arce; however, seeing that an 11-yard-wide breach has been pounded along Montevideo's southern ramparts, Auchmuty decides to storm this spot the next dawn regardless.

Auchmuty's troops storming Montevideo's ramparts before dawn. (National Maritime Museum, London)

The assault commences at 3:30 a.m. on February 3. Spaniards Ruiz Huidobro and de Arce are captured after fierce hand-to-hand combat during which 800 Spaniards are killed and another 500 wounded. The entire garrison capitulates by 5:20 a.m., another 2,000 Spanish troops surrendering. British losses total 121 dead and 276 wounded. The 22-gun Spanish frigates San Francisco de Paula and Fuerte, 10-gun brigs Héro, Dolores, and Paz, and another 52 vessels are seized by Stirling, while a 28-gun frigate and 3 armed launches lie scuttled in the harbor. Military booty includes 345 guns, 2,500 muskets, and much ammunition.

FEBRUARY 1807. A mulatto-dominated assembly at Port-au-Prince results in conflict and divided rule. President Christophe governs the "State of Haiti" in the north, while Pétion and a mulatto clique hold sway in the "Republic of Haiti" to the south.

FEBRUARY 6, 1807. Auchmuty is reinforced at Montevideo by another 711 troopers of the 9th Dragoons, who arrive from Cape Verde (West Africa) aboard four transports and three hired merchantmen escorted by the frigate HMS Nereide.

FEBRUARY 10, 1807. Because of his ineffectual actions outside Montevideo, Sobremonte is deposed as viceroy of the River Plate.

FEBRUARY 25, 1807. Beresford and his staff reach Montevideo, having escaped from their imprisonment in Uruguay's interior.

FEBRUARY 26, 1807. Auchmuty dispatches Lieutenant Colonel Pack west from Montevideo with six companies of the 40th Foot, four companies of light infantry, three companies of the 95th Rifles, and a squadron of the 9th Dragoons to seize Colonia (Uruguay) and impede any possible Spanish counterattack from Buenos Aires. Pack succeeds, overwhelming Colonia's 2,800 inhabitants without opposition.

MARCH 25, 1807. After 20 years of lobbying by committed abolitionists, the British Parliament passes "An Act for the Abolition of the Slave Trade." As of May 1, any British vessels caught carrying slaves on the high seas will be treated as pirates.

A similar American law is to come into effect on January 1, 1808. However, Royal Navy efforts are concentrated in other theaters, and frictions will soon escalate between Washington and London; hence, no effective steps are immediately taken.

APRIL 22, 1807. At 1:00 a.m., Col. Francisco Javier de Elío—recently arrived from Spain with fresh troops—attempts a surprise attack with 1,500 men against Pack’s garrison inside Colonia (Uruguay). The English repel this assault after suffering 1 dead and 3 wounded, as opposed to 8 Spaniards killed and 8 injured. Elío’s retreating columns are pursued as far as Real de San Carlos.

MAY 10, 1807. The veteran lieutenant general John Whitelocke (see “September 9, 1793” entry in “Haitian Revolution”) and his second-in-command, Maj. Gen. John Leveson-Gower, reach Montevideo from England aboard the frigate HMS Thisbe, superseding Auchmuty in command of all British expeditionary forces in this theater the next day.

JUNE 7, 1807. At 3:00 a.m. this Sunday, Pack steals out of Colonia (Uruguay) with 541 infantrymen of the 40th Regiment, 225 of the 95th, 278 skirmishers, 61 troopers of the 9th Dragoons, 34 gunners, and 2 fieldpieces to surprise Colonel Elío’s encampment at San Pedro. The British arrive four hours later to find 2,000 Spaniards drawn up in battle array with 16 guns. Without pause, Pack drives straight into Elío’s army, scattering it with a loss of only 5 English dead and 40 wounded. Spanish casualties total 120 killed, numerous wounded, and 105 captives, plus 8 guns and 250 muskets lost.

JUNE 15, 1807. The 43-year-old brigadier general Robert Craufurd (having been diverted from an expedition against Chile) reaches Montevideo with 940 soldiers of the 5th Infantry Regiment, 925 of the 36th, 956 of the 45th, 898 of the 88th (Connaught Rangers), 410 (five companies) of the 95th Rifles, 336 troopers of the 6th Dragoons, 273 gunners, and 18 fieldpieces. They are traveling aboard 33 transports escorted by 48-year-old rear admiral George Murray’s 64-gun Polyphemus (flag) and Africa, the 36-gun frigate Nereide, the 16-gun sloop Saracen, the brig Haughty, the schooner Flying Fish, and the storeship Camel. The frigates Medusa, Unicorn, and Daphne are awaiting them at Montevideo.

General Whitelocke, having decided to attack Buenos Aires immediately upon the arrival of these reinforcements, does not allow them to disembark but, rather, leaves 1,500 men—the 47th Regiment, two companies from the 38th, part of the 20th and 21st Dragoons, and a company of marines—to garrison Montevideo under Colonel Dean of the 38th Foot. He then goes aboard ship with another 4,000 soldiers by June 21 to steer toward his objective.

JUNE 22, 1807. Off Chesapeake Bay, the 50-gun HMS Leopard intercepts 39-year-old American commodore James Barron’s frigate USS Chesapeake of 40 guns, firing three heavy broadsides and compelling it to strike 15 minutes later for refusing to allow a party aboard to search for Royal Navy deserters. Three Americans are killed and 18 wounded, this incident provoking a downturn in Anglo-American relations.

JUNE 26, 1807. Colonel Pack’s garrison abandons Colonia (Uruguay), joining Whitelocke’s expedition against Buenos Aires.

JUNE 28, 1807. Buenos Aires. This Sunday, Whitelocke disembarks 9,000 men, 350 horses, and 16 fieldpieces at Ensenada de Barragán to march the 30 miles southeastward against Buenos Aires. Five fieldpieces and many horses are left behind, mired in the muddy terrain. Leveson-Gower’s vanguard reaches Reducción de Quilmes by July 1 in a steady rain, finding its Spanish battery already withdrawn. While Whitelocke’s main body and rearguard recuperate, Leveson-Gower advances from Bernal and fords the Riachuelo River the next day at 9:30 a.m., with 2,600 men and 4 fieldpieces.

South of this river, de Liniers waits at Barracas with 6,900 men and 53 fieldpieces, having sortied from Buenos Aires to offer battle. Realizing that Leveson-Gower is now between him and his capital, the Spanish commander rushes his vanguard to Misere Ranch to prevent an immediate assault against Buenos Aires. His men dig in with 11 pieces by 5:00 p.m., only to be displaced by Craufurd in a clash in which the Spaniards suffer 60 casualties, 80 prisoners, and the loss of all their artillery. The English, in contrast, suffer only 14 dead and 30 wounded.

However, the English vanguard—unaware that Buenos Aires lies defenseless—remains encamped at Misere awaiting the arrival of their main body, which gives de Liniers time to recall his other troops and organize resistance amid the capital’s barricaded streets. By July 3, the English have gathered 6,900 men in the western suburbs, probed the defenses, then called upon the Spaniards to surrender the next day. Being rebuffed, Whitelocke sends eight battalions—comprising 5,800 men in 13 columns—into the streets at 6:30 a.m. on July 5. The invaders underestimate the Spanish garrison at 6,000 men rather than the more than 7,000 actually under arms, and they overestimate the urban population at 70,000 civilians instead of the actual 42,000. The invaders' aim is to avoid Buenos Aires's central core around its citadel and great square, while panicking the population into stampeding out of their city. The British right wing gets possession of Hospicio de la Residencia, and their left wing gains the bullring; but the 88th Regiment and the Light Brigade under Craufurd then meet stout resistance in the city center from Spanish regulars and militiamen firing from rooftops. Gradually, this column becomes surrounded and surrenders, the day costing Whitelocke 311 killed, 679 wounded, 208 missing, plus 1,600 prisoners. The defenders suffer 600 casualties and 700 prisoners.

That same evening of July 5, de Liniers proposes a cessation of hostilities and the mutual restoration of captives if the defeated British will evacuate the entire River Plate—including Montevideo—within two months. Whitelocke accepts after consulting with Leveson-Gower and Auchmuty, convinced his remaining strength is insufficient to subdue Buenos Aires and the viceroyalty's inland provinces. His army therefore gathers at Retiro and begins reembarking by July 9, sailing away on the 12th—much to the disgust of Whitelocke's men, who take to toasting, "Success to gray hairs, but bad luck to white locks."

JULY 24, 1807. General Ackland reaches Montevideo with more than 1,800 British troops—1,125 of them from the 89th Foot—but given Whitelocke's recent debacle and retirement before Buenos Aires, they are dispatched directly toward India one week later, along with the 47th and the 87th.

JULY 27, 1807. A small British squadron appears before Baracoa, hoping to take this small Cuban port by surprise. However, its garrison commander, Capt. José Repilado—with only 20 Spanish regulars, 70 militiamen, and 100 French allies, plus 6 cannon in Punta and Matanchín forts—has been forewarned of this enemy's approach, so he ambushes them on the beach. A dozen raiders are slain and another 84 captured, the rest retiring out to sea.

AUGUST 8, 1807. The 88th (Connaught Rangers) and 95th Rifles evacuate Montevideo for England.

LATE AUGUST 1807. In Europe, a British fleet opens hostilities against Denmark for once more having joined the "Continental System," designed by Napoleon I to hamper English commerce.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1807. Whitelocke evacuates Montevideo with his remaining 6,500 men, returning to England with his defeated army by November 7, where he is court-martialed and cashiered.

OCTOBER 17, 1807. The hated Jacques I—formerly General Dessalines—is murdered at sunrise by mutinous troops at Pont Rouge (Haiti), and his body is defiled.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1807. In Europe, a French army marches through Spain and attacks Britain's ally, Portugal.

DECEMBER 15, 1807. Early this Tuesday morning, the British sloop-of-war Fawn reaches Barbados with dispatches announcing the official declaration of war against Denmark. The next day, Rear Admiral Cochrane has Gen. Henry Bowyer's final troops embark—this expedition having been preparing for some weeks—and orders other contingents from Saint Kitts, Antigua, and Grenada to assemble off Danish Saint Thomas. He then sets sail on December 16 with his 74-gun flagship Belleisle and consorts.

DECEMBER 21, 1807. Danish Virgin Islands. After touching at Sandy Point (Saint Kitts), Cochrane and Bowyer arrive off Saint Thomas, sending Brig. Gen. Sir Charles Shipley and naval captain William Charles Fahie close inshore with HMS Ethalion to call upon Gov. W. von Scholten to capitulate. The Dane does so the next day, terms being agreed upon in negotiations with Maj. Gen. Frederick Maitland and Ramillies's Capt. Francis Pickmore. A 300-man garrison from the 70th Regiment is then installed under Brigadier General Maclean and 67 prizes seized in the roadstead. The British expedition then steers toward nearby Saint Croix by the evening of December 23, repeating this procedure and occupying the latter island by Christmas Day, gaining another 21 vessels from Christiansted.

EARLY MARCH 1808. The French island of Marie-Galante is captured by the British, followed by La Désirade.

JULY 4, 1808. The 20-gun British sloop Wanderer of Capt. E. Crofton, plus the 12-gun schooners Elizabeth of Lt. Charles Finch, 10-gun Subtle of Lieutenant Senhouse, and 4-gun Ballahou of Lt. George Mills, make an abortive 135-man disembarkation on the French West Indian island of Saint Martin, being repelled with heavy losses.

DECEMBER 1808. An Anglo-Portuguese expedition led by Rear Adm. Sir William Sidney Smith's subordinate, Capt. James Lucas Yeo of the 22-gun sloop HMS Confiance, and the Portuguese artillery lieutenant colonel Manoel Marques occupies Oiapoque in the border region between French Guiana and Brazil.

DECEMBER 12, 1808. Less than a month after departing France as escort for four supply ships, the 18-gun, 140-man “brick” or brig Cygne of Captain Defresne is sighted off Martinique by a Royal Navy blockading squadron led by the 32-gun frigate HMS Circe of Capt. Francis Augustus Collier. As the Cygne and two schooners are being towed along the coast by troops toward the anchorage at St. Pierre, the Circe attacks along with the 18-gun brig Stork of Capt. George Le Geyt and the 12-gun brig Morne Fortunée of Lt. John Brown, so the French brig beaches near some batteries to resist. An evening assault by three boatloads of 68 boarders is repelled with the deaths of 9 British seamen, 21 wounded, and 26 missing.

Collier nonetheless resumes the pursuit the next morning, December 13, the 18-gun brig Amaranthe of Capt. Edward Pelham Brenton closing in when the Cygne is again beached beneath some more batteries near Prêcheur. Upon fighting their way aboard, the Royal Navy sailors discover that the ship has already been set ablaze and is taking on water, so they retire and watch the Cygne burn down to its waterline.

JANUARY 6, 1809. This morning, Yeo and Marques appear outside the roadstead of Cayenne (French Guiana) with 550 Portuguese troops and 80 British marines and sailors crammed aboard the brigs Voador and Infante, the cutters Lion and Venganza, plus several smaller boats. Pushing upchannel under cover of darkness, they surprise two French batteries at Grande Cane and Fort Diamant the next dawn, carrying them by storm, along with another pair of batteries a mile away that same afternoon.

Meanwhile, Brig. Gen. Victor Hugues, France's colonial governor, sorties from Cayenne—a dozen miles upriver—with several hundred defenders, but he is unable to recuperate his lost batteries, despite a three-hour firefight that afternoon. On the morning of January 8, the invaders overrun Hugues's fortified plantation, then press on toward the town of Cayenne proper, arriving outside it the next day.

British boat parties fighting their way aboard the burning French brig Cygne off Martinique. (Author's Collection)

The French request terms and agree to capitulate by January 12, Yeo and Marques entering the gates two days afterward as 400 French regulars, 600 militiamen, and 200 black auxiliaries lay down their arms. (For this exploit, Yeo is subsequently knighted.)

On January 13, the 48-gun, 330-man frigate Tôpaze of Captain Lahalle appears off the coast with 100 troops as belated reinforcements from France, only to be chased away. This vessel is intercepted nine days later south of Pointe Noire (Guadeloupe) and captured by HMSS Cleopatra, Jason, and Hazard under Capt. Samuel John Pechell, suffering 12 killed and 14 wounded. British losses are only 2 dead and 1 injured.

JANUARY 28, 1809. Martinique. At noon, Rear Admiral Cochrane departs Barbados with the ships of the line Neptune (flag), Pompée, Belleisle, York, Captain, and Intrepid; the frigates Acasta, Penelope, Ethalion, Æolus, Circe, Ulysses, and Eurydice; and the lesser warships Gorée, Wolverine, Cherub, Stork, Amaranthe, Haughty, Express, Swinger, Forrester, Recruit, Star, Éclair, Ringdove, and Frolic. They are escorting a troop convoy bearing the 12,000-man army of Lt. Gen. George Beckwith, to attempt the conquest of Martinique.

On the morning of January 30, Capt. Philip Beaver of the Acasta leads the principal British contingent into Cul de Sac Bay, dropping anchor and disembarking 4,500 redcoats by sunset. The rest of Beckwith's and Maj. Gen. Sir George Prevost's main body comes ashore the next morning, while a second unit under Major General Maitland is also landed at Sainte Luce under the supervision of Captain Fahie of the Belleisle. As both columns push inland, a further 600 men disembark from HMS York under Major Henderson of the Royal York Rangers to secure the French batteries on Salomon Point and Pigeon Island (Ilot aux Ramiers) so the invasion fleet might anchor in safety.

On February 1, Beckwith—while advancing upon the commanding Surirey Heights—defeats a French concentration under the island governor and captain general Villaret de Joyeuse, thereby gaining this strategic high ground and compelling the defenders to evacuate Fort de France in favor of 113-gun Fort Desaix (formerly Fort Bourbon). Meanwhile, Maitland encounters no resistance, so he reaches Lamentin by February 2, effecting a juncture with Beckwith's main body. Brigadier generals Shipley and Edward Stehelin simultaneously besiege the isolated, 136-man French garrison left on Pigeon Island, obliging it to surrender by sunrise of February 4, thanks to fire from two, 5-gun naval batteries installed by Commo. George Cockburn of the Pompée. Beckwith subsequently institutes a formal siege against Villaret de Joyeuse's 2,250 defenders inside Fort Desaix (their backbone being provided by regulars of the 26th and 82nd regiments). Heavy rains slow the British deployment until their first four batteries can open fire from its western side at 4:30 p.m. on February 19. Over the next three days, captains Robert Barton and Christopher J. W. Nesham employ 400 seamen and marines from HMSS York and Intrepid to manhandle another four 24-pounders and four mortars atop Mount Surirey on the fort's eastern side. Before they can join the general bombardment, Villaret de Joyeuse requests terms on February 23, the capitulation being arranged the next day.

The French officially lay down their arms on February 25, Martinique passing under British control at a cost of more than 400 casualties among the invaders' ranks, plus 435 sick. For this success, Beckwith is created a knight of the Order of the Bath, and Cochrane is promoted to vice admiral.

APRIL 12, 1809. The Saintes. The 74-gun French ships of the line Courageux, Polonais (ex-Glorieux), and d'Hautpoul of Commo. Aimable Gilles Troude, plus the frigates Félicité and Furieuse, are intercepted while bringing reinforcements out from Lorient, then blockaded at the Saintes by Cochrane's fleet. These actions prompt a British expedition to depart Fort Royal (modern Fort de France) on occupied Martinique to subdue the outpost on the Saintes. The invasion force consists of 2,000–3,000 men of the 3rd and 8th West India, the 15th, 60th, and 64th regiments, the Royal York Rangers, and the York Light Infantry Volunteers, plus an artillery train, all under the command of Major General Maitland.

Their convoy is led by Captain Beaver of the Acasta. After examining the Saintes's shoreline on April 13 and being scattered by a brief storm, the British make their disembarkation—virtually unopposed—at 10:00 a.m. on April 14 in Bois Joli Bay under covering fire from HMSS Intrepid, Gloire, Acasta, Narcissus, Circe, and Dolphin. The invaders easily push their way up 800-foot Mount Russel, gaining a commanding view over the three small French forts and harbor. As two British eight-inch howitzers commence a galling fire against the French squadron that same evening, Troude's three ships of the line weigh at 10:00 p.m. and stand out of the west channel, followed the next morning by the two frigates via the eastern exit, all hoping to elude Cochrane's blockaders. On April 15, Maitland reembarks part of his army and disgorges it in Vanovre Bay, to outflank the French defenders under Col. M. Madier. By the next day, the British have the island's 700–800 defenders bottled up inside forts Napoléon and Morelle, so Madier requests terms at noon on April 17. The next day, his garrison surrenders, Maitland having suffered 6 killed and 68 wounded during this campaign.

Meanwhile, Cochrane pursues the fleeing three French ships as far as Puerto Rico's Cape Rojo, bringing the sternmost—the brand-new, 74-gun d'Hautpoul of Capt. Amand Leduc, Knight of the Légion d'Honneur—to battle at 3:30 a.m. on April 17. This vessel is battered into submission within less than two hours by Captain Fahie's 80-gun HMS Pompée, plus Commander Roberts's sloop Castor, inflicting 80–90 casualties among its 680-man crew. British losses total 11 killed and 41 wounded. The other two ships get away.

JUNE 7, 1809. Santo Domingo. Maj. Gen. Hugh Lyle Carmichael quits Jamaica with the 2nd West India, the 54th, the 55th, and the Royal Irish regiments to aid Britain's newfound Spanish allies in reducing the isolated French garrison besieged in southeastern Hispaniola (see "September 28, 1808" entry in "Latin American Insurgencies"). His convoy is escorted by Capt. William Price Cumby's HMSS Polyphemus (flag), Aurora, Tiveed, Sparrow, Thrush, Griffin, Lark, Moselle, Fleur de la Mer, and Pike.

Carmichael disembarks 30 miles west of Santo Domingo at Polingue on June 28, hastening ahead of his army to confer with his Spanish counterpart—General Sánchez, commander of a Puerto Rican regiment plus numerous local guerrillas—who for the past eight months has been investing the 1,200-man French garrison of Brig. Gen. Joseph David, Comte de Barquier. Despite having 400 of their 600 regulars sick, the Spaniards nonetheless advance on June 30 at Carmichael's behest to seize San Carlos Church on the outskirts of the capital. They also cut off communications between the city of Santo Domingo and Fort San Jerónimo two miles to its west, and simultaneously secure a beach from which to be supported by Cumby's squadron.

The demoralized French defenders have already requested an armistice and been rebuffed; they repeat this suggestion on July 1, just as the first British troops arrive overland (having been hampered in their march by torrential rains). As negotiations progress, Carmichael maintains pressure by installing heavy siege batteries around the city circuit, then masses his forces for an assault. As a result, the capitulation is finalized on July 6, Barquier pointedly surrendering to the British rather than to the Spaniards. The next day, redcoats occupy the city and Fort San Jerónimo, and the French defenders are transported directly to Port Royal (Jamaica), without any loss of life on either side.

JANUARY 22, 1810. Guadeloupe. Beckwith and Cochrane quit Fort Royal (modern Fort de France, Martinique) with units from the 3rd, 4th, 6th, and 8th West India regiments, plus the 13th, 15th, 25th, 63rd, and 90th Foot, the Royal York Rangers, the York Light Infantry Volunteers, 300 artillerymen, and a siege train to conquer the last major enemy outpost in the West Indies—Guadeloupe—which has been blockaded over the past several weeks by the Royal Navy. After rendezvousing with further contingents in Prince Rupert's Bay (Dominica) on January 24, the British move against their primary objective two days later in two divisions: Brig. Gen. George William Richard Harcourt and Commodore Ballard of HMS Sceptre lead one such 2,450-soldier convoy toward the nearby Saintes Islands to await the French defenders' reaction, while Beckwith and Cochrane sail their 3,700-man main army directly against Guadeloupe.

At noon on January 27, the flagship HMS Pompée drops anchor off the port of Gosier. The next dawn Maj. Gen. Thomas Hislop of the 8th West India Regiment leads the first wave of redcoats ashore at Sainte Marie, landing without resistance. That same afternoon, the 3rd Brigade strikes south toward Capesterre, while the 4th drives north on Grande Rivière, and the British reserve protects this beachhead. Bananiers River is forded by January 29, and Trou-au-Chien Pass is breached the next day by the invaders, who thus threaten the main town of Trois Rivières.

The previous afternoon, Cochrane has directed Ballard's squadron to make a feint against the far side of this latter place, before depositing Harcourt's division nine miles north of the town of Basse-Terre at dawn of January 30. The outnumbered French subsequently abandon Trois Rivières without a fight, leaving behind some of their artillery. After being resupplied, Beckwith resumes his advance on February 2, the strategic Palmiste and d'Olot Heights being occupied uncontested by his twin columns, along with Morne Hoüel by Brig. Gen. Charles Wale's Royal York Ranger vanguard at 8:00 that same night. Everywhere else, the French defenses are found empty, their guns spiked.

British troops fighting their way across the Bananiers River, on the island of Guadeloupe. (Author's Collection)

Under cover of darkness, Wale further turns the French left flank in the heights above Matouba on the evening of February 3, suffering 40 casualties and receiving a severe wound himself. Basse-Terre is occupied by Commodore Fahie around that same time, using a detachment of marines from his fleet offshore. As a result of all these swift penetrations, Capt. Gen. Manuel Louis Jean Baptiste Ernouf requests terms the next morning. By 8:00 a.m. on Monday, February 6, all resistance ceases, and 3,500 defenders lay down their arms. The British win control over the entire island and claim the Imperial Eagle of the French 66th Regiment among their booty.

FEBRUARY 14, 1810. Following the fall of Guadeloupe, Brigadier General Harcourt appears off the island of Saint Martin with a large detachment of troops, convoyed by Fahie's HMSS Abercrombie (flag), Vimeira, Snap, Morne Fortunée, Frolic, Surinam, Supérieure, and Ringdove. A company of the 25th Regiment under Captain Beattie is disembarked in Mari-got Bay by Captain Scobell's brig Vimeira to demand the surrender of its 18-man French garrison, which promptly capitulates.

A similar disembarkation in Little Cool Bay this same evening persuades the 76 soldiers on the Dutch half of the island to also give up two days later, just as Harcourt is closing in upon their principal town of Phillipsburgh. After securing the island, Fahie weighs anchor at dawn of February 21 for nearby Sint Eustatius, arriving at midday and demanding the surrender of its Dutch garrison. They comply at 9:00 the next morning, Maj. J. N. Karesboom's 56 soldiers laying down their arms as the 25th Regiment's grenadier company occupies their lone fort.

Although Napoleon I is not to be crushed in Europe and sent into exile on Elba until the spring of 1814, the Royal Navy's dominance in the Atlantic precludes any further hostilities in the New World for the remaining four years of this Anglo-French conflict. Upon the ascension of Louis XVIII to France's throne, most of France's overseas colonies are restored by Britain. When Napoleon I subsequently escapes from confinement and briefly regains power in March 1815, only Guadeloupe comes to his support in the Americas, replacing the Bourbon white fleur-de-lys with the tricolor flag on June 17. The next day, Napoleon I is defeated at Waterloo and again abdicates by June 22.

A British envoy eventually reaches Guadeloupe on August 3, calling for the island's resubmission to the French king. Colonel Boyer refuses to comply, but a strong British force disembarks on August 9, and after some skirmishes—during which few losses are inflicted on either side—the disheartened defenders finally capitulate by August 10.

LATIN AMERICAN INSURGENCIES (1808–1826)

Early in November 1807, a 23,000-man French army under Gen. Andoche Junot marches through Spain to attack Portugal, which has refused to implement Napoleon's "Continental System" by closing its ports to English vessels. The ensuing winter will witness a series of pivotal events for both Central and South American history. Lisbon is occupied by December 1—its royal family having escaped to Brazil only two days previously—and the marshal Joachim Murat then brings another massive French army into Spain by March 1808 and overruns its major cities and captures its monarchs, who dally too long before attempting flight.

On March 19, King Charles IV of Spain officially abdicates in favor of his son Ferdinand VII, but both Bourbon monarchs are soon imprisoned in France—sparking a short-lived anti-French uprising in Madrid on May 2—after which Joseph Bonaparte is installed as Spain's new ruler on June 7. Although this crude usurpation of power is initially resisted by most of Spain's American vassals, it will eventually lead to a weakening of the traditional bonds between the home country and its empire.

For many years, Spain's American citizens have been growing disenchanted with governance from distant Madrid, whose self-serving dictates have not only thwarted their own commercial development but whose positions of influence have been routinely denied to Creoles in favor of peninsular-born Spaniards. Nevertheless, there is at first little sentiment in favor of outright New World independence but, rather, support for the liberal junta or "council" formed at Aranjuez on September 25, 1808, to spearhead resistance against the French and uphold the incarcerated Bourbons' cause. However, out of the ensuing years of uncertainty and turmoil, there will emerge a new Latin American will for freedom.

JANUARY 22, 1808. The 40-year-old Portuguese prince regent João (later King João VI) arrives at the Brazilian port of Salvador in Bahia to a warm reception, having fled Lisbon aboard his flagship Príncipe Real, accompanied by 8 other warships, 8 lesser men-of-war, and 30 merchantmen, and further escorted by the 98-gun HMS London, plus the 74-gun Marlborough, Monarch, and Bedford of Rear Adm. Sir Sidney Smith. Virtually the entire Portuguese court, government, treasury, and 1,600 marines are aboard this expedition, totaling 10,000–15,000 refugees. Six days later, the prince proclaims Brazil's ports open to British merchantmen, helping start a trade boom.

After a few weeks, João transfers to his Brazilian capital of Rio de Janeiro, arriving on March 7 to install his imperial government (as well as to offer a permanent naval base to his British allies, complete with Royal Navy-controlled storehouses and support facilities). The escape of Portugal's ruling family has a profound effect not only upon Brazil but also on surrounding South American regions, for the prince regent is accompanied by his Spanish-born, domineering wife, Carlota Joaquina—sister of the imprisoned Ferdinand VII—who offers to rule Spanish America temporarily on behalf of her brother, adding to the confusion already gripping its authorities. Soon, Spanish officers in the River Plate will become especially concerned by Brazilian designs upon its Banda Oriental or “Eastern Shore” (that is, modern Uruguay).

Royalist medal of the Order of Isabel la Católica. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

JULY 14, 1808. The French brig-of-war Serpent reaches the Venezuelan port of La Guaira, and the next day its captain Paul de Lamanon ascends to the capital of Caracas to present Gov. Juan de las Casas with the announcement that Joseph Bonaparte has been crowned king of Spain. This usurpation is rebuffed by a popular outburst, and when Lamanon returns to La Guaira, he finds the 48-gun British frigate HMS Acasta of Capt. Philip Beaver at anchor, who informs the Venezuelans of Spain’s resistance against the French and seizes the Serpent.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1808. In Mexico City, 300 armed peninsular Spaniards led by the conservative merchant Gabriel de Yermo penetrate its vice regal palace at night and depose José de Iturrigaray, fearful that he is about to declare total independence from Madrid. The retired, octogenarian mariscal de campo or “field marshal” Pedro de Garibay is instead temporarily substituted, so that the peninsulars can shift Mexico’s financial and logistical support behind the Spanish factions opposing France in Europe.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1808. An ultraloyalist junta is established at Montevideo by the 41-year-old Spanish officer Francisco Javier de Elío, who not only upholds the rule of Ferdinand VII but furthermore doubts the loyalty of Buenos Aires’s acting viceroy—French-born Santiago de Liniers—simply on account of the latter’s birth and his having been approached by a Bonapartist agent the previous month. When the trusted admiral Baltasar Hidalgo de Cisneros y Latorre (a 50-year-old veteran of Trafalgar) is sent out from Seville some months later to replace de Liniers, the Montevideo junta is dissolved.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1808. Dominican Reconquest. After a couple of months quietly preparing the Spanish residents of Santo Domingo to rise against their French occupiers, the rich hacendado or “estate owner” Juan Sánchez Ramírez is informed by a message from the governor of Puerto Rico, Gen. Toribio Montes, which reaches Macao aboard the schooner Monserate, that military supplies will soon arrive. In concert with the guerrilla bands already operating with Haitian assistance in southwestern Santo Domingo under their chieftains Ciriaco Ramírez and Cristóbal Uber Franco, Sánchez Ramírez peacefully gains several Dominican towns, then enters the town of Seibo on October 26. Three days afterward, the hired brigantine Frederick, the schooner Reindeer, and two gunlaunches arrive at the mouth of the Yuma River from Puerto Rico with 200 Spanish volunteers, 400 muskets, 200 sabers, plus munitions.

At this juncture, Governor Ferrand sorties with 600 French soldiers from the city of Santo Domingo, hoping to smother the rebellion in its incipient stages. Sánchez Ramírez therefore contacts Capt. Charles Dashwood of the 36-gun frigate HMS Franchise and requests British assistance in securing the port of Samaná, in cooperation with the guerrilla chieftain operating in the Sabana de la Mar district, Diego de Lira. Sánchez Ramírez meanwhile continues his march back toward Seibo (“Seybo” to the French), organizing and arming his inexperienced throngs of volunteers. Upon regaining the town on November 5, he receives a threatening ultimatum from Ferrand, who has now drawn near with his small army. The next day, therefore, the 2,000 Dominican insurgents advance through heavy rains to take up defensive positions at Sabana de Palo Hincado, a plain a mile and a half west of Seibo.

At dawn of November 7, Sánchez Ramírez deploys his volunteers in a battle line extending from his command post atop a hillock, held by 300 musketeers under one of his few experienced military officers, Lt. Francisco Díaz. The outnumbered French appear, and their cavalry attacks the Dominican left at noon, only to be engulfed by a countercharge led by Capt. Antonio Sosa. A horde of Dominican riders under Capt. Vicente Mercedes on the right thereupon smashes into the French, and although both these officers are slain, the French are quickly decimated in close-quarters combat. Ferrand reels backward in defeat, his few surviving troops eluding the pursuing Dominican cavalry under Col. Pedro Santana by crossing the torrents in Guaquía Canyon, after which the shaken French governor commits suicide by shooting himself in the head.

Latin America on the eve of independence.

The victorious Sánchez Ramírez will subsequently march upon the capital, but its remaining French defenders mount a desperate resistance under Brigadier General Barquier, which the Dominicans—without any siege artillery—cannot overcome. An eight-month encirclement therefore ensues, supported by a Royal Navy blockade out of Jamaica. (This campaign becomes known as Santo Domingo's guerra de la reconquista or “war of reconquest.”)

NOVEMBER 11, 1808. Captain Dashwood, having chanced upon the British frigates Aurora and Dædalus, plus the brigs Reindeer and Pert, leads them this morning along with his own Royal Navy frigate Franchise to mount a surprise descent against Samaná Bay, which French privateers have been using as their base of operations. Its 900 startled inhabitants offer scant resistance, instead streaming board the 100-ton schooner Échange and 90-ton Guerrier to attempt to row away. They are intercepted by four boatloads of British sailors and boarded, while the harbor castle and three other prizes are also seized. Dashwood thereupon hands the port over to the Dominican guerrilla chief Diego de Lira, sailing for Port Royal (Jamaica) a couple of weeks later with his captures.

NOVEMBER 24, 1808. This evening, a group of disgruntled wealthy Caracans reiterate their proposal to Governor de las Casas for the establishment of a Venezuelan junta, similar to the “Supreme Junta” spearheading resistance against the French from Seville. With the support of four companies of black rural militiamen, they are arrested and confined, and this incident is remembered as the Mantuano Conspiracy.

JANUARY 1, 1809. A coup is attempted against Viceroy de Liniers in Buenos Aires and is easily put down.

MAY 25, 1809. At Chuquisaca, the provincial capital of “Upper Peru” (modern Sucre, Bolivia), a university conference has considered and rejected the offer made by the Spanish-born Portuguese queen, Carlota, to rule Spanish America on behalf of her captive brother Ferdinand VII. Afterward, the uneasy local intendant—80-year-old Ramón García de León y Pizarro—attempts to muster troops against any further deliberations and also requests military aid from Gov. Francisco de Paula Sanz of Potosí.

Instead, the elderly Pizarro is deposed by a popular uprising, and a provisional junta is established on May 25 at Chuquisaca under the leadership of agitators such as Argentine-born Bernardo de Monteagudo. Military command is bestowed upon the 38-year-old general Juan Antonio Álvarez de Arenales.

JULY 7, 1809. Santo Domingo's exhausted French garrison surrenders to its British blockaders rather than to its Dominican besiegers (see “June 7, 1809” entry in “Napoleonic War”). The latter are then annoyed to learn that they will have to pay the English to recuperate their capital.

JULY 16, 1809. After the annual religious procession honoring the Virgen del Carmen, a group of political activists led by Pedro Domingo Murillo occupy the government offices at La Paz (Bolivia), deposing the regional governor-intendant Tadeo Dávila, the bishop, and most peninsular-born officials in favor of Creoles. A municipal junta is subsequently founded eight days later, whose membership—while recognizing the legitimacy of Ferdinand VII—nonetheless aspires to greater self-government.

AUGUST 10, 1809. This dawn, Manuel Urries, Conde Ruiz de Castilla—president of the real audiencia of Quito—is deposed by a group of 45 local Creoles, who establish their own junta soberana or “sovereign assembly” headed by the wealthy landowner Juan Pío María de Montúfar y Larrea, Marqués de Selva Negra, whose desire to exercise regional power in the name of Ferdinand VII eventually prompts the Peruvian viceroy José Fernando de Abascal y Sousa to dispatch troops up into the Andes under Gen. José Manuel de Goyeneche y Barrera for its suppression, as well as against the junta operating in La Paz (Bolivia). The Quito assembly finally dissolves amid internal bickering; Ruiz de Castilla reassumes office by October 25.

OCTOBER 1809. General Goyeneche, now acting in his additional capacity as president of the audiencia of Cuzco, approaches La Paz (Bolivia) with a small but disciplined army of 3,200 troops, obliging its outlaw junta to collapse and flee. Murillo organizes some rural bands of armed Creole adherents into an extemporized “army” and clashes with the royal troops on October 19.

NOVEMBER 11, 1809. Goyeneche and his army confront Murillo’s Creole throng at Irupana in the Yungas Valley (Bolivia) and easily best and disperse their untrained foes. Murillo and numerous ring-leaders are captured and subsequently hanged, while the rebel general Álvarez de Arenales is spared, although he endures 20 months of incarceration. Goyeneche installs a strong royalist garrison under Col. Juan Ramírez at La Paz before departing.

A similar royalist expedition under the field marshal Vicente Nieto, comprised of troops of the Patriotics Regiment, has also been dispatched up into the Andes from Buenos Aires. They are received without resistance by the audiencia of Charcas, and Nieto assumes office as its intendant.

DECEMBER 4, 1809. His authority now bolstered by the royalist contingents that have arrived from Lima and Santa Fe, the restored president of the audiencia of Quito—Ruiz de Castilla—orders the arrest of 70 participants in the unauthorized junta of August 10.

FEBRUARY 14, 1810. Spain’s supreme junta having been driven almost completely out of that country and onto León Island near Cadiz, a general legislative assembly called the cortes is convoked with membership throughout its overseas empire. The process of electing these delegates reinforces many Creoles’ desire for full independence.

APRIL 19, 1810. Leading Caracan Creoles—made desperate by the imminent collapse of Spain’s junta general before Bonaparte’s advancing armies—depose the royal captain general Vicente Emparan and establish their own junta. Initially, they vow continued loyalty to the captive Ferdinand VII, but they also resolve to act independently of the mother country until such time as he can be set free. Most of Venezuela soon follows suit, only Coro and Maracaibo remaining loyal to the Spanish junta in Cadiz.

MID-MAY 1810. An expedition of 3,000 men prepares to quit Caracas under Brig. Gen. Francisco Rodriguez, Marqués del Toro, to advance through the Aragua Valleys, Barquisimeto, Carora, and Urumaco to subjugate the recalcitrant province of Coro.

MAY 22, 1810. A three-man junta is formed at Cartagena (Colombia).

Also on this day, bowing to popular demand, Viceroy Hidalgo de Cisneros authorizes the establishment of a Creole junta at Buenos Aires, with himself as its president. This entity is constituted two days later; but on May 25 he is deposed, and control passes to militia colonel Cornelio Saavedra and the radical politician Mariano Moreno in the so-called May Revolution. A circular is then sent throughout the viceroyalty on May 27, calling for delegates to attend a congress.

JUNE 20, 1810. When the royalist intendant Nieto at Charcas (Bolivia) learns of Viceroy Hidalgo de Cisneros’s deposal by a Creole junta at Buenos Aires, he confers with his colleague Sanz of Potosí, then rejects the revolutionaries’ overtures and instead proposes transferring Upper Peru to the authority of the viceroy at Lima.

JULY 9, 1810. Realizing that not all provinces of the Viceroyalty of the River Plate are willing to acknowledge the authority of the newly proclaimed junta at Buenos Aires, 1,150 Argentine volunteers depart the capital under Col. Francisco Ortiz de Ocampo and Lt. Col. Antonio González Balcarce to spread their revolutionary policy into the interior.

JULY 20, 1810. A junta is set up at Bogotá, initially including New Granada’s (modern Colombia’s) viceroy Antonio Amar y Borbón, but dispensing with his services five days later.

JULY 24, 1810. At a meeting chaired by Gov. Bernardo de Velasco y Huidobro in Asunción (Paraguay), local functionaries and citizens refuse to acknowledge the authority of the junta at Buenos Aires, instead agreeing to obey the Regency Council in Spain.

AUGUST 2, 1810. This afternoon, the royalist troops from Lima and Santa Fe, who have been occupying Quito (Ecuador) since the previous year, conduct a purge of its jails and streets searching for insurgent sympathizers, massacring some 200 civilians.

AUGUST 8, 1810. Ortiz de Ocampo and González Balcarce's small army gain Córdoba (Argentina) and arrest the leaders of a loyalist counterrevolutionary conspiracy centered around the ex-viceroy de Liniers. On direct orders from the radical Buenos Aires junta, the ringleaders—including de Liniers—are shot by firing squad on August 26 at Cabeza de Tigre, after which González Balcarce succeeds Ortiz de Ocampo in command of the patriots' so-called Army of the Andes, which presses on toward Upper Peru (modern Bolivia).

AUGUST 19, 1810. The junta at Buenos Aires severs all traffic upriver to Asunción (Paraguay), which has refused to recognize its authority. Secret instructions are also sent to Paraguayan conspirators, who are arrested by Governor de Velasco the next month.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1810. The Buenos Aires junta appoints one of its members—the wealthy, 40-year-old lawyer Manuel Belgrano—to lead a body of cavalry over to the Banda Oriental or “Eastern Shore” of the River Plate estuary and persuade its inhabitants to resist the blandishments from the royalist enclave at Montevideo. Eighteen days later, though, Belgrano receives new instructions to penetrate Paraguay and execute Governor de Velasco, the bishop, and other members of Asunción's recalcitrant leadership.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1810. In the city of Querétaro (Mexico), a seven-month-old Creole conspiracy—hatched by the wealthy 57-year-old village priest at Dolores, Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, and aimed at sparking an uprising on October 2 that will lead to outright independence—is revealed to the authorities by one of its plotters, Capt. Joaquín Arias, and confirmed three days later at Guanajuato by the drum major Juan Garrido. The Spanish intendant for the province, Juan Antonio Riaño y Bárcena, consequently orders Hidalgo's arrest.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1810. Hidalgo's Uprising. Learning the previous night from Lt. Juan Aldama that his insurrectionist plans have been discovered by the royal authorities at Guanajuato, Hidalgo leads his workmen before sunrise of September 16 in seizing the local jail and armory. He then rouses a few hundred local supporters at Sunday dawn by pealing Dolores's church bells and calling for Mexican independence (becoming known as el grito de independencia).

Numerous local monarchists are thereupon arrested, and by 11:00 a.m., 400 riders and 400 men on foot have formed up under 41-year-old captain Ignacio María de Allende y Unzaga of the “Reina” Dragoon Regiment to march with Hidalgo to nearby Atotonilco and San Miguel el Grande. The insurgents encounter no resistance and, in fact, are joined by hundreds more adherents as they advance.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1810. An independent Chilean junta is established at Santiago.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1810. Having stripped San Miguel el Grande's church and royal offices, Hidalgo's throng departs to occupy Celaya by the next day. Here, he is acclaimed “Captain General” of his movement, installs a rebel government, and calls upon Intendant Riaño to surrender the provincial capital of Guanajuato—which is rejected.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1810. A second junta is founded at Quito (see “August 10, 1809” entry).

SEPTEMBER 23, 1810. Hidalgo's followers quit Celaya, overrunning Salamanca, Irapuato, and Silao as they advance upon the city of Guanajuato. Four days later, they reach the Burras Hacienda, again vainly calling upon Riaño to surrender.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1810. Alhóndiga de Granaditas. After swarming through the towns of Venta de la Purísima, Santiaguillo, Puenteillas, Estanco del Pulque, Retiro, and Marfil, Hidalgo's 20,000–25,000 badly armed and undisciplined adherents circle around Cuarto and San Miguel Hills to fall upon the city of Guanajuato by 1:00 p.m. As the insurgents surge down Nuestra Señora de Guanajuato Avenue, Intendant Riaño seeks shelter inside its recently completed granary—a formidable stone building called the Alhóndiga de Granaditas—with a few loyal troops and all of Guanajuato's peninsular-born Spaniards.

After a desperate resistance, they are overwhelmed when a young miner named Juan José María Martínez (alias the “Pípila”) crawls through a hail of bullets with a stone slab tied to his back, setting the granary's wooden doors ablaze with a torch. As evening falls, they crumble, and the insurgents fight their way inside, slaughtering some 600 monarchists by dawn of September 29. This pitiless massacre will cloud the rebels' reputation, alienating many segments of Mexican society.

Miguel Hidalgo

Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla was born on May 8, 1753, at the Hacienda of San Diego de Corralejo, near Pénjamo (Guanajuato). He was the second of five sons born to that estate manager's first marriage. Young Miguel's mother died when he was nine, and three years later he and his older brother José Joaquín were sent to the Jesuit College of San Francisco Xavier in Valladolid (modern Morelia, Michoacán). Their studies were interrupted when the Jesuit order was expelled from New Spain in the summer of 1767, so their father came to retrieve them.

Yet by the year's end, both boys were re-enrolled in San Nicolás Obispo College at Valladolid. Miguel proved to be such a clever student that he was nicknamed El Zorro or "The Fox" by his classmates. He received his bachelor's degree before the age of 17 and continued to excel while studying toward the priesthood. He learned the native Otomí, Tarasco, and Náhuatl languages in addition to Latin, French, and Italian. He received full religious orders as a presbyter by September 1778, and he taught at San Nicolás for the next 13 years. He rose to become college rector and changed his signature to "Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla" to differentiate himself from an older priest named Miguel Hidalgo in Durango.

He also became quite wealthy; he stocked his personal library with expensive foreign books and bought three ranches near Irimbo for family members. Hidalgo, moreover, sired at least two children out of wedlock and enjoyed gambling. Gossip finally obliged him to renounce the rectorship on February 2, 1792, and to serve for eight months as priest at the Pacific port of Colima. Although the scandal prevented his return to Valladolid, Hidalgo's wealth, urbane education, and local connections ensured a warm welcome at San Felipe parish near Guanajuato. Soon, his parties were being attended by such luminaries as the immensely rich Marqués de Rayas and the royal intendant Riaño.

When Hidalgo's older brother José Joaquín died on September 19, 1802, while serving as village priest at Dolores, he arranged to take over this post himself two weeks later. Hidalgo arrived at Dolores with two more illegitimate daughters, as well as several other family members. He became so immersed in pet projects such as a pottery, a tannery, saddler's works, a forge, a carpentry shop, weavers' looms, and even bee keeping that he delegated religious duties to an assistant.

Still vigorous at the age of 55, Hidalgo was among the Creole leaders who, in the summer of 1808, believed that Mexico could govern itself until the French invaders were expelled from Spain and Ferdinand VII was restored to the throne. From talks over the next year and a half, however, he came to embrace outright independence. He and Captain Aldama secretly visited Dr. Manuel Iturríaga at Querétaro in February 1810, agreeing to lead his proposed insurrection. The revolt was planned for December 1 at San Juan de los Lagos, when more than 100,000 pilgrims would be attending its annual religious festival.

Returning to Dolores, Hidalgo ordered his workshops to begin discreetly producing thousands of blades and spears, as well as experimental cannons (supposedly to accompany religious celebrations). During a second visit to Querétaro in early September 1810, the plotters agreed to move up their date to October 2. But when their plans were revealed, Hidalgo responded boldly. The result was a massive outpouring of pent-up anger, which he scarcely was able to control. Even his execution 10 months later failed to quench the struggle for liberty that he had unleashed.

EARLY OCTOBER 1810. Having brought an Argentine revolutionary army of 950 men and six field-pieces from San Nicolás de los Arroyos and Santa Fe, Belgrano strikes across Bajada del Paraná into Paraguay to attempt to win this province over to the cause of the Buenos Aires junta. Reports lead him to believe that this can be achieved "with paper and ink," rather than by fighting. After traversing the difficult Mesopotamia district and reaching Curuzú Cuatiá on November 7, Belgrano presses on through the Iberá Swamps for San Jerónimo opposite Apipé Island by December 4.

OCTOBER 8, 1810. After returning to Dolores, Hidalgo learns that the Spanish authorities in neighboring Michoacán have been detained at Acámbaro on orders from the woman insurgent María Catalina Gómez de Larrondo, so he sends José Mariano Jiménez with 3,000 men to her support.

Hidalgo soon follows with his main body and occupies its capital of Valladolid (modern Morelia) by October 17 without a struggle. After remaining a day, he continues on toward Zinapécuaro with 80,000 poorly armed, ill-disciplined adherents, being joined en route by 45-year-old José María Morelos—his former seminary pupil and now the village priest at Carácuaro—whom he delegates on October 20 to spread the rebellion into the south.

Meanwhile, Hidalgo enters Maravatío by October 23 and decides to lead his unwieldy host toward Mexico City. Toluca is reached five days afterward, then Tianguistenco.

Interior of the Alhóndiga de Granaditas in Guanajuato. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

OCTOBER 29, 1810. Cotagaita. González Balcarce's 1,500 Argentine invaders, also known as the Ejército Expedicionario al Alto Perú or "Expeditionary Army to Upper Peru" (modern Bolivia), encounter 2,000 royalists under the marshal Vicente Nieto, the intendant of the audiencia of Charcas, and his chief of staff, Gen. José de Córdoba, awaiting them at Santiago de Cotagaita, 240 miles north of San Salvador de Jujuy. The defenders put up a spirited resistance, compelling the revolutionaries to retire southward for Tarija. After a brief rest, de Córdoba is sent off in pursuit of the retreating rebels, skirmishing almost daily with the Argentine rearguard of Lt. Martín Miguel de Güemes at El Ojo de Agua, Aloma Hill, San Rafael, Chala, Tupiza, and Suipacha.

OCTOBER 30, 1810. Monte de las Cruces. In a mountain pass leading from Toluca toward Mexico City, Hidalgo and Allende's 80,000 insurgents—the so-called Army of America—find their path into the capital barred by 7,000 loyalists under Lt. Col.

Torcuato Trujillo and 27-year-old artillery captain Agustín de Iturbide. The outnumbered defenders offer stiff resistance, inflicting 5,000 casualties among the rebels' ranks while suffering 1,000 of their own. Nevertheless, after six hours of heavy fighting, the loyalists are forced back through sheer weight of numbers.

Although victorious, Hidalgo's bloodied army advances no farther than Cuajimalpa before veering northwestward on November 2, being unwilling to risk a direct assault against the vice regal capital's defenses. Instead, Hidalgo opts to continue propagating his insurrection through the interior provinces.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1810. Morelos arrives near Acapulco with a few hundred poorly armed followers to raise the banner of revolt. After driving Capt. Juan Antonio Fuentes's royalist company out of Tecpan on November 7, he is joined by brothers José and Antonio Galeana's contingents, then roams through El Zanjón, Coyuca, and Aguacatillo gathering further strength. With Indian allies from Atoyac, he invades Acapulco two days later, then, after withstanding a sally by garrison commander Luis de Calatayud on November 12, leaves 600 men to harry its defenders and visits nearby Veladero with his main body.

NOVEMBER 7, 1810. Aculco. Advancing northwest from the Valley of Mexico toward Querétaro, Hidalgo and Allende's 55,000 followers blunder into 15,000 loyalists headed in the opposite direction under 55-year-old general Félix María Calleja del Rey, who quickly divides his army into five columns and smashes into the undisciplined insurgent throng, wreaking fearful havoc as they flee in utter confusion. The rebels suffer 12,000 casualties, as opposed to 1,000 among Calleja's ranks.

Routed, Hidalgo retires with a portion of his survivors via Villa del Carbón, San Pablo, Arroyo Zarco, Amealco, Coroneo, and Celaya, heading toward Valladolid. Meanwhile, Allende leads another contingent back through Maravatío and Acámbaro toward Guanajuato.

NOVEMBER 7, 1810. Suipacha. Tired of constantly retreating after their Cotagaita setback, the Argentine rearguard—comprised of 600 men from de Güemes's Salta and Tarija regiments, some regular cavalry squadrons, plus two fieldpieces—unexpectedly double back from their overnight encampment at Nazareno to surprise their 700–800 royalist pursuers (with four cannon) under de Córdoba, who are bivouacked a mile and a half away at Suipacha. Caught utterly unprepared at dawn of November 7, the royalists scatter in disarray, abandoning their artillery and baggage train to the revolutionaries.

Félix María Calleja del Rey. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

Two days later, González Balcarce's main army is reinforced by 275 fresh troops from Buenos Aires under the political commissar Dr. Juan José Castelli, hence the triumphant revolutionaries can resume their progression northward into Upper Peru. They enter the immensely rich silver-mining town of Potosí uncontested on November 25, where Castelli and his radical political associates soon offend the local citizenry by their haughty behavior, extremist ideology, and severity toward defeated royalists—de Córdoba is executed, along with Intendant Nieto and Governor Sanz of Potosí.

NOVEMBER 17, 1810. Having learned three days earlier that Guadalajara—Mexico's second largest city—has fallen to the insurgents Antonio Torres and Miguel Gómez Portugal, Hidalgo departs Valladolid with 7,000 riders to establish his new headquarters there and hopefully revive his cause. However, while he is busy promulgating decrees and naming new officials (plus executing 400 royalists), Calleja's monarchist army fights its way through the central highlands, reversing many earlier insurgent gains and reconquering Guanajuato from Allende by November 25.

DECEMBER 1, 1810. Morelos's 3,000 guerrillas clash with the royalist defenders of Acapulco and are scattered with minor losses on both sides. Another 600 rebels nonetheless join Morelos's ranks.

DECEMBER 4, 1810. Bernardo “El Huacal” Gómez de Lara and other Mexican insurgents seize the royal barracks at Tula (Tamaulipas).

DECEMBER 6, 1810. Allende rejoins Hidalgo in Guadalajara, having evacuated Guanajuato on November 24 because of Calleja's royalist advance.

DECEMBER 10, 1810. The Venezuelan exile Miranda returns into the port of La Guaira from London aboard the British brig Avon and is given a frosty reception the next day at the capital Caracas by the ruling junta. With support from Bolívar and others, though, he is soon after appointed lieutenant general.

DECEMBER 12, 1810. Six days earlier, while Belgrano's small revolutionary army rests on the Paraná River banks, his staff officer, Capt. Ignacio Warnes, has been sent with a message for the authorities at Asunción (Paraguay) requesting submission to the Buenos Aires junta. Instead, this emissary is arrested and sent on in chains by Pablo Thompson, Paraguayan militia commander at Concepción.

DECEMBER 13, 1810. At Paso Real de la Sabana (in the modern state of Guerrero, Mexico), Morelos's subordinate Julián de Ávila ambushes a royalist relief column approaching Acapulco under Capt. Francisco Paris, commander of the 5th Oaxaca Militia Division.

DECEMBER 17, 1810. When Paraguayan irregulars strike Belgrano's encamped forces along the Upper Paraná, Belgrano realizes that he must resort to military action. The Argentine revolutionary therefore orders Lt. Gov. Elías Galván of Corrientes to bring 300 riders across Paso del Rey or Itatí Ford.

Shifting his main army into Santa María de la Candelaria, Belgrano slips across the Paraná on the night of December 18–19. At dawn, the invaders disperse the 500 Paraguayans with three fieldpieces gathered under Thompson at Campichuelo Point. The victorious Argentines then follow the retreating Paraguayans into abandoned Itapuá, 12 miles away. After recuperating for a week, Belgrano's revolutionaries traverse Tacuarí Ford on Christmas Day to resume their march toward Asunción. They will reach Tebicuarí Ford by January 7, 1811, finding it ominously empty.

DECEMBER 28, 1810. Royalist brigadier general José de la Cruz reoccupies Valladolid (modern Morelia, Mexico) and takes reprisals against its insurgent sympathizers.

JANUARY 4–5, 1811. Tres Palos. This night, more than 1,000 insurgents under Morelos and the Galeana brothers assault the 3,000 royalists under Captain Paris, who are encamped at Tres Palos Ranch near Acapulco. This attack inflicts 400 casualties and takes 700 royalist prisoners, in addition to 700 muskets, 5 artillery pieces, ammunition, and supplies. Mexican losses total 200 killed and wounded.

JANUARY 12, 1811. Calderón Bridge. In the city of Guadalajara (modern state of Jalisco, Mexico), Hidalgo learns that Calleja's monarchist forces—after a six-week respite following their capture of Guanajuato—have now pressed into nearby San Juan de los Lagos. Over the objections of Allende, the insurgent leader decides to offer battle at Calderón Bridge, 20 miles outside Guadalajara, which Hidalgo orders to be fortified. He reaches the bridge with many of his followers by January 15. Allende arrives the next day with his own forces, bringing total insurgent strength to 35,000 men (although only 1,200 actually bear muskets), plus a few fieldpieces.

On January 17, Calleja's 14,000 royalists begin a series of assaults against these rebel positions, suffering considerable losses before an insurgent grenade accidentally detonates one of their own ammunition wagons, creating widespread panic. The monarchists take advantage with a heavy cavalry charge. Despite being driven from the field after six hours of fighting and sustaining 3,000 casualties, Hidalgo and Allende retire in good order. Calleja, on the other hand—despite having had only 400 men killed or wounded—is slow to pursue, not occupying Guadalajara until four days later. Still, his victory is a serious reverse for the insurgency and earns him ennoblement with the title “Conde de Calderón.”

JANUARY 15, 1811. Paraguarí. His penetration into Paraguay increasingly hampered by the steamy heat, heavy downpours, and complete disappearance of its hostile population with all its cattle and food, Belgrano reaches Ibáñez Creek by this afternoon. Pressing ahead to the top of Fantasma or Rombado Hill with his staff, he sees a throng of 6,000–7,000 Paraguayan irregulars and 16 cannon under Governor de Velasco waiting for the invaders a few miles ahead, on the far side of Yuquerí Creek outside the town of Paraguarí (19th-century spelling is Paraguay).

His own army now reduced to a mere 470 infantrymen, 200 cavalry troopers, and 6 fieldpieces, Belgrano encamps overnight. Concerned about attempting a retirement across such inhospitable terrain with the Paraguayans in pursuit, the Argentine general holds this defensive posture for three days. Then, he launches a surprise attack before dawn of January 19, which overruns the forward Paraguayan battery of five guns. Daylight, however, reveals the revolutionaries' small numbers, so Paraguayan cavalry counterattacks envelop the Argentine vanguard and kill 10, wound 15, and capture 120 by midmorning. Paraguayan losses total 30 dead and 16 prisoners. Belgrano is therefore obliged to retreat, recrossing Tebicuarí Ford on January 22 and regaining the safety of Santa Rosa by month's end.

JANUARY 22, 1811. Texas's royalist governor Manuel María de Salcedo is deposed and confined at San Antonio by militia captain Juan Bautista de las Casas.

JANUARY 31, 1811. A small insurgent force is defeated at San Blas (Mexico).

LATE JANUARY 1811. Hidalgo, Allende, and other defeated insurgents meet at Pabellón Hacienda outside the city of Zacatecas, where the former is stripped of military authority in favor of the more professionally trained Allende.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1811. Allende and Hidalgo retreat northward from Zacatecas with the remnants of their army, reaching Saltillo one month later.

FEBRUARY 8, 1811. Alejo García Conde, the royalist governor of Sonora (Mexico), defeats an insurgent force under José María González Hermosillo at San Ignacio Piaxtla.

This same day, Morelos's guerrillas attempt an assault against Fort San Diego at Acapulco, believing that they have bribed royalist gunner José Gago to cripple its artillery. Instead, they are received with grapeshot, suffering 14 deaths before retreating out of range. Morelos returns to his La Sabana camp and temporarily cedes command to Col. Francisco Hernández, while himself traveling to Tecpán to recuperate.

FEBRUARY 17, 1811. Royalist commander Manuel Ochoa reoccupies the city of Zacatecas (Mexico).

FEBRUARY 20, 1811. The royalist Regimiento de las Tres Villas or "Regiment of the Three Towns" under Capt. Juan Bautista de la Torre attempts to reconquer Zitácuaro (Mexico) from insurgent forces under Benedicto López, only to be repelled.

FEBRUARY 28, 1811. The wealthy 46-year-old José Gervasio Artigas and other rural Uruguayan patriots raise the banner of revolt at Ascencio—the so-called Grito de Ascencio—being supported shortly thereafter by Argentine troops under Belgrano.

MARCH 1811. Royalist forces under sargento mayor or "military adjutant" Nicolás Cosío and Lieutenant Colonel Fuentes resume their sallies from Acapulco against Morelos's guerrillas.

MARCH 2, 1811. In Texas, a dawn counter coup deposes de las Casas at San Antonio and restores royalist rule.

This same day off San Nicolás de los Arroyos (Uruguay), an Argentine flotilla sailing up the Paraná River—having departed Buenos Aires a couple of days previously and comprised of the brigantine 25 de Mayo, sloop Invencible, and schooner América under the 39-year-old, Maltese-born commodore Juan Bautista Azopardo and 31-year-old captain Hipólito Bouchard from Bormes near St. Tropez, France—encounters two Spanish brigantines and two falouches under Capt. Jacinto de Romarate. The raw Argentine crews are easily bested by their more experienced opponents, and Azopardo is taken prisoner. Tried at Montevideo, he will spend the next nine years incarcerated in Spain.

MARCH 5, 1811. Calleja's monarchist army reconquers San Luis Potosí (Mexico) from insurgents.

MARCH 9, 1811. Tacuarí. After a lengthy retreat following his defeat at Paraguarí, Belgrano's 400 surviving Argentine revolutionaries and six field-pieces are encamped on the southern banks of the Tacuarí River, north of its confluence with the Paraná. The several hundred Paraguayan irregulars under Fulgencio Yegros who have been hounding their retirement have been joined by a 2,000-man division under Gen. Manuel Cabañas, plus 400 more troops under Juan Manuel Gamarra.

At dawn of March 9, the Paraguayans probe Belgrano's defenses on the far side of Tacuarí Ford. This action proves to be but a diversion, though; some 400–500 Paraguayans attempt to turn his western flank by traversing aboard four armed boats and a flotilla of canoes. They are repelled by the Argentine major Celestino Vidal. However, Cabañas's 2,000 men meanwhile cross to the east and burst out of a jungle to engulf and capture Belgrano's 150-man right wing under his second-in-command, Maj. Juan José Machain.

Despite being surrounded by this overwhelming force, however, Belgrano is able to enter into negotiations with Cabañas that same evening and arrange a prisoner exchange and then a full-blown truce over the next few days, during which he withdraws southward into Argentina. Although defeated twice during his campaign and subsequently subjected to a two-month court of inquiry at Buenos Aires as of June 6, Belgrano's incursion still provides the spark for an independent local junta to become established in Paraguay.

MARCH 13, 1811. The 42-year-old royalist colonel Joaquín de Arredondo y Muñiz quits Veracruz with 500 troops aboard the brigantine Regencia and schooners San Pablo and San Cayetano to help put down the combination of Mexican insurgents and American settlers who have risen up in Tamaulipas and southern Texas.

MARCH 16, 1811. Leaving 4,000 insurgents to garrison Saltillo under 37-year-old Ignacio López Rayón (who will eventually fight his way southward into Michoacán), Allende and Hidalgo retire north with another 1,300, hoping to gain support in the United States.

The next day, the 30-year-old colonel José Bernardo Gutiérrez de Lara is detached to ride on to Washington, where he will meet with Secretary of State James Monroe. He refuses, however, to agree to any concessions in exchange for American aid.

MARCH 20, 1811. Mexican insurgents under Juan Bautista de la Torre gain a small victory at Zitácuaro.

MARCH 21, 1811. After two days riding with retired militia captain Francisco Ignacio Elizondo's 342 followers, Allende, Hidalgo, and other rebel leaders are treacherously arrested at Acatita de Baján (Coahuila) and conveyed into Monclova the next day to be surrendered to Governor de Salcedo in exchange for a royalist reward.

APRIL 1811. A Creole plot to kidnap the viceroy Francisco Javier Venegas and exchange him for Hidalgo is uncovered in Mexico City.

APRIL 4, 1811. Royalist lieutenant colonel Fuentes defeats some of Morelos's guerrillas at Las Cruces Point outside Acapulco.

APRIL 10, 1811. After a lengthy delay, the Argentine revolutionaries resume their penetration into Upper Peru (Bolivia), entering La Paz.

APRIL 30, 1811. An assault by royalist sargento mayor Cosío against Morelos's positions at La Sabana near Acapulco is repelled. A second attempt the next day is also defeated, costing the royalist his command.

MAY 10, 1811. The royalist colonel Manuel Iturbe, governor of Nuevo Santander (modern Tamaulipas, Mexico), having been driven from office by local insurgents, Colonel Arredondo's royalist expedition arrives from Veracruz and defeats the rebel throng under Fr. Juan de Villerías this morning at Estanque Colorado. Arredondo then presses on and, nine days afterward, also overwhelms the insurgent stronghold at Tula, executing most of its defenders.

MAY 14, 1811. A revolutionary uprising occurs in Asunción (Paraguay), after which its conformist governor de Velasco agrees to share power with Dr. José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia and Capt. Juan Valeriano de Zevallos. Sixteen days later, the Paraguayan contingent occupying the Argentine province of Corrientes is withdrawn.

MAY 16, 1811. After the revolutionary forces have penetrated as far as Huaqui (alternative spelling, Guaqui) and encamped on the shores of the Desaguadero River—the traditional boundary between the viceroalties of Buenos Aires and Peru—the Argentine political commissar Castelli and the royalist commander Goyeneche agree to a 40-day truce.

MAY 18, 1811. Las Piedras. Concerned by the Uruguayan insurgent Artigas's gathering of more than 1,000 rebel riders at Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe de los Canelones, the viceroy-designate de Elío has ordered frigate captain José de Posadas to march 12 miles northward out of Montevideo to entrench his 1,230 royalists around San Isidro de las Piedras mill.

On May 18, a battle occurs that ends in a royalist rout, as 200 of Posadas's troops switch allegiance to the insurgent cause. The victors suffer 70 deaths, as opposed to 100 killed, 60 wounded, and 500 captured among the surviving royalists, who are spared by Artigas. This rebel victory will allow the 38-year-old Argentine revolutionary general José Manuel Rondeau to advance and lay siege to Montevideo by June 1, although its garrison continues to be sustained from the sea.

MAY 21, 1811. Morelos's subordinate Hermenegildo Galeana aids the Bravo family—Leonardo, Miguel, Víctor, Máximo, and Nicolás—at their hometown of Chichihualco (Mexico) in defeating a royalist contingent under Garrote. This victory nets 100 muskets and allows the insurgents to occupy nearby Chilpancingo unopposed, being joined on May 24 by their main body.

MAY 22, 1811. Royalist captain Juan Bautista de la Torre is defeated at Tuzantla (Mexico) and captured by insurgent forces, then killed while being taken prisoner toward Tūxpan.

MAY 26, 1811. Tixtla. Morelos's army overruns Tixtla (with a population of 4,000 inhabitants, present-day Ciudad Guerrero, Mexico), where sargento mayor Cosío and the wealthy landowner Joaquín de Guevara have dug in with 1,500 royalists. This insurgent victory nets 600 prisoners, 200 muskets, and 8 fieldpieces.

JUNE 1811. A minor uprising occurs at Tacna in southern Peru, partially inspired by the presence of Argentine forces in nearby Bolivia (see "November 7, 1810" entry). Nevertheless, this revolt is quickly suppressed.

JUNE 9, 1811. The conformist governor de Velasco is officially deposed at Asunción (Paraguay). Eight days later, a more revolutionary junta is seated.

JUNE 20, 1811. Huaqui. Eight days before a truce is scheduled to expire, royalist general Goyeneche advances at dawn with 6,500 troops in three columns along the shores of Lake Titicaca (Bolivia) to surprise González Balcarce's 5,000 Argentine invaders, plus several thousand Indian auxiliaries. Although Goyeneche's column is at first repelled, Brig. Gen. Domingo Pío Tristán's central column gains control of Yauricoragua Ravine, taking the revolutionaries in the flank and thereby preventing communication with the other half of their army under General Viamonte.

The latter is eventually defeated by Brigadier General Ramírez, and the remainder is completely routed. After being continuously harassed during their retreat, and after leaving a small contingent behind to guard Suipacha Ford, only 800 revolutionaries reach Salta (Argentina), where Pueyrredón assumes command over these shattered remnants and continues their retirement as far as Tucumán.

JUNE 22, 1811. The insurgent general López Rayón captures Zitácuaro, which then becomes the capital of Mexico's new National Congress.

JULY 5, 1811. The First Republic. Venezuela officially proclaims its independence and becomes a republic. A serious counterrevolution soon develops at Valencia, however, supported from Coro. Later this same month, a patriot division marches from Caracas under Francisco Rodríguez, Marqués del Toro, who is repulsed with slight losses and obliged to retire into Maracay. Miranda is then selected by the patriot government to succeed him.

JULY 17, 1811. A 5,000-man Portuguese army under 56-year-old general Diogo de Sousa, governor of Brazil's Río Grande do Sul Province, enters the Banda Oriental (Uruguay) at the instigation of Buenos Aires's Spanish viceroy-designate Francisco Javier de Elío. The latter—unable to cope with spreading revolutionary fervor—has resorted to this desperate expedient, calling upon Spain's traditional regional rival for help.

JULY 30, 1811. At dawn in Chihuahua City, Hidalgo is executed by a 12-man firing squad five days after the executions of his subordinates Allende, Jiménez, Aldama, and numerous others. Hidalgo's body is exhibited to the public all day, tied in a chair, then beheaded after nightfall. Although his corpse is claimed by Franciscan friars, all the insurgent leaders' heads are pickled in salt and forwarded to Guanajuato by October to be permanently displayed upon the four corners of the Alhóndiga de Granaditas (see "September 28, 1810" entry).

Battle of Huaqui.

AUGUST 1811. A second Creole conspiracy is discovered in Mexico City, resulting in a number of executions.

AUGUST 12, 1811. After considerable difficulty, Miranda's patriot army subdues loyalist Valencia (Venezuela), but he is then unable to persuade Congress to impose strong centralized rule upon the country. Loyalist resistance will persist at such hotbeds as Maracaibo and Coro.

AUGUST 15, 1811. Royalist lieutenant colonel Fuentes attempts to recapture Tixtla from Morelos's subordinates, Galeana and 47-year-old Leonardo Bravo. The royalist assault columns are caught in a crossfire and repelled, their retirement being hastened the next day by the arrival of Morelos himself from Chilpancingo with 300 riders. Fuentes's losses total 400 prisoners, 400 muskets, and 3 fieldpieces.

Francisco Javier de Elío, when captain-general of Valencia. (Museo de Bellas Artes, Valencia, Spain)

On August 18, Morelos follows up this advantage by attacking Fuentes's demoralized royalists at Chilapa, compelling them to withdraw from the southwestern theater altogether and retreat into Mexico City.

OCTOBER 21, 1811. In Uruguay, the Argentine revolutionaries come to terms with Spanish viceroy-designate de Elío, agreeing to evacuate this territory if he in turn withdraws his Portuguese allies (see "July 17, 1811" entry). The local Uruguayan leader Artigas feels betrayed by this arrangement, as the royalists will be left in undisputed possession of his district, so he angrily retires inland to the confluence of the Paraná and Ayuí rivers north of Concordia with his 16,000 followers, in the so-called Exodo Oriental or Exodus of the Easterners. His intransigence will furnish the Portuguese general de Sousa with an excuse to delay his own troops' withdrawal.

NOVEMBER 1811. A short-lived Creole insurrection occurs in the city of San Salvador (Central America), starting with demands to create a separate bishopric. This is quickly repressed by the president of the audiencia of Guatemala, José de Bustamante y Guerra.

Meanwhile, New Granada (modern Colombia) creates a weak central union called the "United Provinces of New Granada"—excepting Bogotá, which is ruled by Antonio Nariño. Border disputes soon erupt between both factions.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1811. Having secured most of the modern state of Guerrero (Mexico), Morelos launches a three-pronged offensive inland. Miguel Bravo leads one column toward Oaxaca; Hermenegildo Galeana takes another toward Taxco; while Morelos marches at the head of two companies of insurgents and 800 Indian archers toward Izúcar, overrunning it without opposition by December 10. He then installs 29-year-old captain Vicente Ramón Guerrero Saldaña as its garrison commander.

NOVEMBER 11, 1811. Cartagena (Colombia) declares outright independence from Spain.

DECEMBER 1811. A brief Creole uprising occurs at Granada (Nicaragua) over questions of local misrule.

DECEMBER 18, 1811. At dawn, a royalist force under naval lieutenant Miguel Soto de la Maceda surprises Morelos at Izúcar (Mexico), fighting its way into the main square before being repelled by Leonardo Bravo's division.

DECEMBER 25, 1811. Morelos occupies Cuautla Amilpas.

JANUARY 1, 1812. Zitácuaro. Mexico's National Congress shifts its capital from Zitácuaro to Sultepec, as Calleja's 5,000-strong royalist army begins to approach. General López Rayón meanwhile prepares to defend Zitácuaro with 20,000 poorly armed, ill-trained insurgents.

The next day, Calleja's columns push their way inside the city after heavy fighting, inflicting 7,000 casualties among the defenders, while suffering 2,000 within their own ranks. To then punish Zitácuaro's disloyalty to Spain, the victors sack the town and burn it to the ground.

JANUARY 22, 1812. Morelos falls upon the royalist Porlier at Tenancingo, forcing him to retire into Toluca without his artillery.

JANUARY 25, 1812. Learning that the victorious royalist army of General Calleja is approaching after destroying Zitácuaro, Morelos retreats into Cuautla Amilpas by February 9, occupying Cuernavaca along the way.

JANUARY 29, 1812. The royalist commander Paris defeats 400 insurgents at Omotepec (Mexico) under Miguel Bravo, Valerio Trujano, and Julián Ayala.

FEBRUARY 17, 1812. Siege of Cuautla. Calleja's 7,000 royalists encamp at Pasulco—two and a half miles outside Cuautla—having cornered Morelos inside with 2,000 riders, 1,000 infantry, and 1,300 auxiliaries under his subordinates, colonels Hermenegildo Galeana, Miguel Bravo, and 41-year-old Mariano Matamoros (originally a village priest from Jantetelco). The next day, the royalists advance to probe Cuautla's defenses, only to have Morelos launch a surprise cavalry charge against their rear. In heavy fighting, the insurgent leader is almost captured, but is rescued by Galeana. At dawn of the 19th, Calleja launches a four-pronged attack against Cuautla's San Diego Convent, which is defended by Galeana. The insurgents wait until the royalists draw within 100 yards, then open a withering fire. Despite heavy losses, Calleja's men overrun the city's northeastern trench system, only to be blown off its northern parapets by the heroic 12-year-old gunner Narciso Mendoza, stationed at the Encanto Street battery. After six hours' close combat, the royalists retreat, leaving behind 200 dead (including colonels Conde de Casa Rul and Juan N. Oviedo). Having been thus bloodily repulsed in a direct assault, Calleja opts to impose a siege.

In late February, he is reinforced by 5,000 additional troops, the Puebla Division under Ciriaco de Llano. Royalist batteries also open fire upon Cuautla from Zacatepec and Calvario Hills by March 4, and siege lines are begun from both north and south the next day. Over the next few weeks, Calleja cuts off the city's water supply, the insurgents responding by recapturing Juchitengo Dam and holding it against all royalist counterattacks.

On April 21, Matamoros leads a desperate, 10-dragoon sally from Santa Inés Gate that contacts an insurgent relief column bringing food under Miguel Bravo at Tlayacac Ravine (Barranca Hedihonda). He is unable, however, to escort it back into Cuautla and, instead, is ambushed at Amazingo by Llano's cavalry and compelled to flee toward Tlacalaque (where Matamoros is eventually defeated by Mateo Nieto). By February 28, provisions within the beleaguered city are exhausted, and at 2:00 a.m. on May 2, Morelos leads a dash toward freedom. The starved insurgents quietly wend their way down Cuautla's riverbank until encountering the royalist picket lines, at which point they charge and fight their way through. Losses are heavy on both sides, some of Calleja's divisions mistakenly firing upon each other in the gloom. Morelos escapes to Ocuilco, but his insurgent army is nevertheless broken and dispersed, units being chased for many miles by royalist cavalry, while Cuautla itself is given over to the sack.

MARCH 1812. Máximo Bravo flees toward the coast from Cuautla, helping keep Mexico's insurgency alive by joining forces with Galeana, Ayala, and Father Mariano de Tapia to skirmish with the royalists around Petaquillas, Citlala, and Tlapa.

Meanwhile in Cadiz, the legislative assembly (cortes) promulgates Spain's first-ever constitution, a liberal document that generates much enthusiasm throughout large segments of the empire because of its promises of limited self-rule and other reforms.

MARCH 10, 1812. Monteverde's Counteroffensive. After being reinforced from Spanish-held Puerto Rico, 230 loyalists begin moving east from Coro

(Venezuela) under the 38-year-old, Canarian-born naval captain Juan Domingo de Monteverde, who is joined at Siquisique by Indian chief Juan de los Reyes Vargas.

Before they can resume their progression, an earthquake destroys much of Caracas and other republican-held cities on the afternoon of March 26—Holy Thursday—while leaving the monarchist regions largely untouched. Demoralized and disorganized, the patriots are powerless to halt the expedition's subsequent advance, Monteverde pressing ahead and occupying Barquisimeto without resistance. His numbers soon swell to 1,000 followers, and he penetrates still deeper into patriot territory, despite cautionary words from Gov. José Ceballos (or Cevallos) at Coro.

MARCH 26, 1812. Having been cleared at his court-martial, Belgrano relieves Pueyrredón in command of the revolutionaries' "Army of the North," regrouping at Yatasto in northern Argentina. There are less than half the firearms required for his 1,500 men and only two artillery pieces.

APRIL 5, 1812. This Sunday, royalist lieutenant colonel Francisco Caldelas appears before Huajuapán (state of Oaxaca, Mexico) with more than 2,000 men and 14 fieldpieces, to besiege its insurgent garrison under Col. Valerio Trujano. After his initial assault is repelled, Caldelas institutes a formal siege, camping north of this town on Calvario Heights, while his subordinate Gabriel Esperón occupies its western side, Juan de la Vega, the southern, and José María Régules, the eastern bank of the Huajuapán River with his Batallón de la Mermelada or "Marmalade Battalion" (so-called because of its purple uniforms). Siege batteries are installed by April 10, opening fire against Trujano's defenders, who have no artillery with which to reply. Opposing trenches encircle the town, and the royalists settle down to starve its garrison into submission.

APRIL 23, 1812. In a desperate bid to stem Monteverde's incursion, the Venezuelan Congress grants Miranda dictatorial powers, although this proves to be too little, too late. The Creole rulers have already alienated many blacks by failing to implement their widely touted abolition of slavery. In addition, they have drafted legislation aimed at extending private ownership over the rangelands, thereby reducing the status of its tough llaneros or "plainsmen" to indentured servants. Both groups now provide for-

Llaneros

The first Spanish settlers landed at Coro, slowly expanding east through Venezuela's lush central valleys. Although unsuited for vineyards or orchards, the valleys' flat pastures and moderate climate proved ideal for raising cereal and cattle. Hatos or ranches therefore began to dot this vast landscape as of the late 1500s, and the herds were tended by llaneros. They sprang from a mixture of Spanish, Indian, and African riders and became known as "the first cowboys of the Americas."

By the early 19th century, the plains east of Caracas still remained sparsely populated, despite having 1.5 million head of cattle and mules. The llanero nomads spoke a unique dialect, with a bewildering array of 16th-century idioms and native terms. Born to the saddle, they were proud of their skill and hardy lives. Wearing a distinctive starched hat, llaneros were inured to the harsh savannahs, often going barefoot. They broke in fresh mounts every spring, loosing their horses to run wild once the winter rains came. They hired themselves out to ranchers to drive herds up to higher ground in autumn to avoid the winter floods on the plains. The herds were then returned to the lowlands in the spring, to graze upon the lush summer grasses.

Aristocratic Creoles always viewed the independent llaneros with disdain and distrust. When the First Republic was established in 1811, these landowners tried to extend their proprietary rights over the rangelands, expecting the plainsmen to comply. Instead, angry llaneros rallied to the royalist cause, providing a formidable body of cavalry. Creoles and urban dwellers alike greatly feared this torrent of riders, dubbing them the "Satanic Legion" and telling lurid tales of their cruelty.

The llaneros were so crucial to the republic's defeat, however, that Simón Bolívar realized they must be won over to the patriot cause. His task was made somewhat easier after Ferdinand VII was restored to the Spanish throne in 1814. Bolívar being an aristocratic Creole landowner himself, it was difficult for the llaneros at first to even understand his speech. He persisted, living among the llaneros and sharing their hardships until he gained their trust. Despite being slight of build, he earned the nickname culo de hierro or "iron buttocks" for the long hours he spent in the saddle. They were well worth it. Llanero cavalry proved decisive in winning the Battle of Boyacá in August 1819 and Venezuela's very independence at Carabobo two years later.

Today, llanero culture has become quite popular in Venezuelan society. Their traditional dance known as the joropo has a prominent place in national folklore. Their music, played on a small harp, maracas, and a four-stringed guitar called a cuatro, has also become widely recognized.

midable guerrilla contingents for the royalists, the blacks making an uprising east of Caracas, and the llaneros in the Calabozo Plains. Monteverde two days later defeats the patriot garrison at San Carlos.

MAY 3, 1812. Monteverde's royalist troops occupy Valencia (Venezuela) without opposition, but shortly thereafter slow their advance, intimidated by the large numbers of patriots rallying around Miranda.

MAY 6, 1812. Leonardo Bravo is captured along with two-dozen of his insurgent followers while sleeping at San Gabriel Hacienda (state of Morelos). He is subsequently conveyed into Mexico City to face execution on September 13.

MAY 17, 1812. A hastily assembled insurgent force under fathers Sánchez and Tapia approaches Huajuapán from Tehuacán (Mexico) to lift its royalist siege. This relief column is ambushed near Chilapilla by black royalist troopers under Lieutenant Colonel Caldelas and is scattered and compelled to abandon their nine fieldpieces and supply train.

MAY 19, 1812. Hoping to break the siege of Cochabamba (Bolivia) by 2,500 royalists under Goyeneche, Belgrano reaches Jujuy (Argentina) with only 1,500 sickly and ill-equipped revolutionary troops. The monarchists refuse to be drawn from Suipacha, though, carrying the city by storm.

MAY 23, 1812. The Mexican insurgent leader Torres, captured by loyalists, is hanged, drawn, and quartered.

MAY 30, 1812. Ceballos reaches Valencia from Coro (Venezuela) with reinforcements for Monteverde's royalist army. Shortly thereafter, Miranda attempts a couple of assaults upon the city but is obliged to retire to La Cabrera, on the road leading toward Caracas.

It is then Monteverde's turn to launch three unsuccessful assaults upon the patriot defenses guarding Guaica Pass, before outflanking this position and compelling Miranda to retreat into Victoria. Some 5,000 patriots make their stand there, and the outnumbered royalists must retire upon Maracay to regroup.

JUNE 4, 1812. Having recruited 800 new adherents following his Cuautla disaster, Morelos defeats the royalist Cerro at Citlala (Mexico).

JUNE 30, 1812. Prominent monarchist captives imprisoned in San Felipe Castle at Puerto Cabello (Venezuela)—its garrison commanded by Ramón Aymerich, whereas political governorship is exercised by the inexperienced, 28-year-old Creole militia colonel, Simón Bolívar—rise up and seize this citadel. They turn its artillery against the town, while Bolívar vainly attempts to recapture the fort with only 40 men. Further loyalist forces then arrive under Monteverde to also threaten this key seaport from outside. After six days' futile resistance, Bolívar and Aymerich flee aboard a brig, reaching La Guaira by July 7.

JULY 13, 1812. After lengthy delays and diplomatic threats from Britain, de Sousa's Portuguese army evacuates Uruguay (see "October 21, 1811" entry). The general is nonetheless rewarded for his efforts in this campaign by being named Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Cristo five months later and first Conde de Rio Pardo in 1815.

JULY 22, 1812. Siege of Huajuapán. The first division of Morelos's army appears southwest of Huajuapán under Miguel Bravo in hopes of raising its three-and-a-half-month-old royalist siege (see "April 5, 1812" entry). Caldelas scatters this first relief column with a sharp sally, obliging Bravo to abandon two of his small fieldpieces.

The next day, however, Morelos and Galeana arrive from Tlapa with 1,800 additional men, reinforcing Bravo. Bravo attacks Esperón's camp west of Huajuapán, Galeana assaults Caldelas's positions farther north, and the beleaguered garrison emerges eastward out of Huajuapán to distract Régules.

The divided royalists are quickly overwhelmed, and Caldelas is killed along with 400 of his men, with another 200 captured—along with 14 guns, more than 1,000 muskets, and considerable matériel. Morelos remains here for two weeks before marching toward Tehuacán de las Granadas, entering it triumphantly on August 10.

JULY 25, 1812. Heartened by the Venezuelan patriots' evident disarray, Monteverde resumes his advance, so Miranda is compelled to abandon Caracas this evening, in anticipation of escaping through La Guaira. The First Republic is dead.

JULY 30, 1812. Miranda reaches La Guaira, intending to sail away the next day aboard the British corvette Sapphire. However, he is persuaded by Bolívar and other secretly disgruntled subordinates, who suspect that treason lies behind their leader's departure, to sleep overnight in the home of the garrison commander, Col. Manuel María Casas. At 2:00 a.m., the colonel, Bolívar, and Miguel Peña lead four armed soldiers into Miranda's bedroom, who is handcuffed and surrendered to the loyalists.

Miranda will eventually be sent to Cadiz in chains, dying in La Carraca fortress four years later. Bolívar is rewarded by the royalist commanders Francisco Iturbe and Monteverde by being allowed to flee toward Curaçao aboard the schooner Jesús, María y José on August 27, along with his uncle by marriage, José Félix Rivas (alternate 19th-century spelling, Ribas) plus two other companions. Through lack of skill, though, Monteverde will subsequently fail to reintroduce royalist rule over Venezuela.

AUGUST 11, 1812. Texas Incursion. Insurgent colonel Gutiérrez de Lara (see "March 16, 1811" entry) recrosses the Sabine River into east Texas with 400 American volunteers he has raised at New Orleans and Natchez—helped by ex-U.S. Army lieutenant Augustus William Magee, now promoted to lieutenant colonel in the expedition. This "Republican Army of the North" seizes undefended Nacogdoches on August 11, while royalist support collapses throughout the eastern portion of this province. Trinidad is easily overrun by mid-September, where the invaders then encamp for more than a month.

On November 2, royalist governor Manuel de Salcedo and Col. Simón de Herrera sally east from San Antonio with 1,500 troops, deploying them along the Guadalupe River. Learning of this move, Gutiérrez de Lara and Magee's army (now numbering 800 men) slide south-southwest, overwhelming the tiny Spanish coastal keep at Bahía del Espíritu Santo on November 7. De Salcedo then pursues and traps the outnumbered insurgents within this place, bombarding its ramparts with 14 fieldpieces; but after three failed assaults, a protracted siege ensues.

Magee dies of disease on February 6, 1813. After another two royalist attempts to storm the walls cost them 300 casualties, de Salcedo and Herrera commence a disorderly withdrawal back toward San Antonio on February 19. Two days later, Gutiérrez de Lara's survivors emerge from Espíritu Santo and follow in their wake.

AUGUST 20, 1812. At the head of 200 insurgent guerrillas, Nicolás Bravo (the 26-year-old son of Leonardo and nephew to Miguel, Víctor, Máximo, and Nicolás) ambushes a royalist mule train at San Agustín del Palmar, bound from Veracruz toward Puebla. Most of its 360-man royalist escort under Lt. Col. Juan Labaqui are slaughtered, and 300 muskets and 3 fieldpieces are captured.

AUGUST 23, 1812. Almost a month after ordering all revolutionary sympathizers to evacuate Jujuy (Argentina), Belgrano's army follows suit, retreating 150 miles south over the next five days toward Tucumán because of the approach of superior royalist forces out of the north under General Tristán. At dawn of August 29, Belgrano orders a halt on the banks of the Pasaje River.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1812. While retiring southward, Belgrano makes a brief stand on the Piedras River bank, bloodying a 600-man royalist cavalry patrol under colonels Llano and Huici, who have been hound-

Manuel Belgrano, painted during his 1815 visit to London by the French émigré artist Casimir Carboneir. (Círculo de Armas, Buenos Aires)

Manuel Belgrano

Manuel José Joaquín del Corazón de Jesús Belgrano was born at Buenos Aires on June 3, 1770. He was the fourth son in a family of eight boys and three girls. His Genoese father had arrived from Cadiz 19 years earlier and had become a prosperous merchant. Young Manuel was raised amid wealth and privilege. He attended the Real Colegio de San Carlos until the age of 16, then was sent to study in Spain. He graduated with a law degree from the University of Salamanca in 1793 and was received at the bar of Valladolid.

But he also specialized in economics, so later that same year, Belgrano was appointed as permanent first secretary of the newly created Consulado de Mercaderes or “Merchant Guild” for Buenos Aires. Setting sail for home in February 1794, he threw himself into this post with youthful vigor and idealism. In addition to his official duties, by 1799 he was encouraging the creation of nautical and technical schools. He also helped to found the Telégrafo Mercantil newspaper two years later.

Belgrano’s comfortable existence was interrupted by the British invasion of June 1806. Although an honorary captain in the city militia, his untrained unit was not used to contest the brief occupation of Buenos Aires. Goaded by this failure, Belgrano read military books and was elected second-in-command of the Regimiento de Patricios, or “Patrician Regiment.” During a second British assault the next year, he served on the staff of the quartermaster-general, Col. César Balbiani.

In March 1810, Belgrano founded the Correo de Comercio newspaper. He also became a prominent figure during the “May Revolution” led by Saavedra and Moreno. Because of his political activism, he was given command that same September of the revolutionary expedition into Paraguay. Although eventually defeated, he was cleared of any blame, and in November 1811 was named colonel of the 1st Patricios Regiment. He also designed the Argentine flag, which he hoisted for the first time at Rosario along the banks of the Paraná River on February 27, 1812. His victory at Tucumán that same September won him command of the Army of the North, which he led into the Andes. After being beaten at Vilcapugio and Ayohuma, he was replaced by San Martín.

Exonerated after a lengthy court-martial at Buenos Aires in 1814, he was sent to Europe on a diplomatic mission that same year with Bernardo Rivadavia. Upon his return in February 1816, Belgrano was given command of the inactive “Army of Observation” at Santa Fe, though he never again led troops into battle. His moderate call on July 6—three days prior to Argentina’s declaration of independence—for creation of a constitutional monarchy, was openly derided. Even his wish to marry at Tucumán in January 1819 was denied when he was instead ordered to Santa Fe, hence his only daughter was born out of wedlock. He sickened and died at Buenos Aires on June 20, 1820, so poor that he paid his medical bills with his gold watch.

ing his rearguard (commanded by Argentine brigadier general Eustaquio Díaz Vélez). The pursuers suffer 20 killed and 25 captured, allowing the revolutionaries to resume their retreat into Tucumán undisturbed.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1812. Tucumán. Belgrano learns that his loyalist pursuers have reached Nogales, 10 miles north of Tucumán, and because they are determined to halt his retreat—despite orders from the Argentine junta to continue retiring as far south as Córdoba—he decides to offer battle. His 1,000 cavalymen and 800 infantrymen take up a defensive position just north of Tucumán, only to be surprised the next day by an approach out of the southwest by Tristán’s 1,000 troopers and 2,000 foot soldiers, with 13 fieldpieces, who have circled around the city.

Shifting across to Carreras Field, Belgrano meets Tristán’s opening assault head on, his revolutionary cavalry on the right flank dispersing the loyalist Tarija Cavalry Regiment, thereby allowing his patriot infantry to defeat the Abancay, Cotabamba, and Real Lima battalions. On the Argentine left, however, its black battalion and Santiago del Estero militia cavalry regiment are defeated by the loyalist Paruro, Chichas, and Fernando VII battalions, leading Belgrano to believe that the day is lost. The patriot general therefore gathers some 200 stragglers around him by evening at El Rincón, nine miles south of Tucumán, in anticipation of resuming his army’s retirement southward.

His other patriot formations have won a victory, however, his subordinate Díaz Vélez reentering Tucumán with most of his infantry and artillery, plus 687 captive royalists and five fieldpieces. Tristán has also lost 450 dead, as opposed to 65 killed and 187 wounded among the revolutionary ranks. The next day—September 25—Belgrano realizes his good fortune, so he advances upon the royalist survivors with 500 men, calling upon them to surrender “in [the] name of American brotherhood.” Tristán refuses and retires north toward Salta, while Belgrano mistakenly sends 600 cavalymen that night toward Manantiales, thereby inadvertently losing contact with the enemy. He will nonetheless be promoted to captain general for this victory.

OCTOBER 8, 1812. Buenos Aires's patriot government—known as the “First Triumvirate”—is overthrown in favor of a “Second Triumvirate” comprised of Juan José Paso, Nicolás Rodríguez Peña, and Antonio Álvarez Jonte.

OCTOBER 20, 1812. The vanguard of Gen. Manuel de Sarratea's Argentine army reaches the outskirts of Montevideo (Uruguay) and joins 350 local volunteers under José Culta to lay siege to its royalist garrison.

OCTOBER 29, 1812. Morelos raids the royalist stronghold at Orizaba (Mexico), overwhelms its garrison under Col. José Antonio Andrade, and burns a valuable shipment of tobacco. Two days later, while retiring toward his encampment, the insurgent leader defeats another small royalist force on the Acultzingo Heights.

EARLY NOVEMBER 1812. Nicolás Bravo captures the port of Alvarado (modern state of Veracruz, Mexico), then attacks Jalapa while marching inland.

NOVEMBER 10, 1812. After being joined at Tehuacán (Mexico) by Matamoros and Nicolás Bravo—each bringing in 2,000 new recruits—Morelos marches toward Oaxaca with 5,000 men.

NOVEMBER 24, 1812. Oaxaca. Morelos's 5,000-man army arrives at Etla and calls upon the 2,000-man, 36-gun royalist garrison within the nearby city of Oaxaca to surrender, which is rejected. The next morning at 11:00, his insurgent columns begin an assault, Eugenio Montaña leading a cavalry charge past Xochimilco, which cuts off the road leading toward Tehuantepec. Montaña then penetrates the city via La Merced. Ramón Sesma meanwhile storms the Soledad fortress with his San Lorenzo Battalion, under covering fire from Manuel de Mier y Terán's artillery. Matamoros—now a mariscal de campo or “field marshal”—assaults the fortified Carmen Convent, while Hermenegildo Galeana carries the Santo Domingo Convent.

When Morelos finally enters the devastated city at 2:00 p.m., he orders the execution of its monarchist commanders Régules, Saravia, Bonavia, Aristi, and many others.

DECEMBER 1812. Having fled from Venezuela (see “July 30, 1812” entry) into what is today Colombia and accepted a lowly posting in its patriot army, Bolívar advances from Barranca with 200 men up the Magdalena River, dislodging the loyalist garrison at Tenerife. Mompós (or Mompóx) is overrun by December 27, and after being reinforced by numerous local volunteers, Bolívar occupies El Banco and defeats a Spanish force at Chiriguaná on January 1, 1813.

Tamalameque and Puerto Real de Ocaña fall shortly thereafter, opening the Upper Magdalena to insurgent control. Ramón Correa, the royalist commander at Maracaibo, responds to this thrust by occupying Cúcuta, thus threatening the patriot outposts at Pamplona and Ocaña.

DECEMBER 31, 1812. El Cerrito. At dawn, 2,300 royalists under the new viceroy-designate Gaspar Vigodet sally from Montevideo (Uruguay) with three fieldpieces, surprising Rondeau's Argentine besiegers. Advancing in three columns, the loyalists scatter outlying patriot units before the revolutionary general makes a stand at El Cerrito with his 4th and 6th infantry regiments and Patria Dragoons. The central royalist column under Brigadier General Muelas then succeeds in breaking the black infantrymen of the 6th, but Rondeau gathers sufficient stragglers to mount a counterattack, thus throwing back Vigodet's entire force. The royalists withdraw into Montevideo after suffering 100 dead, 146 wounded, and 30 prisoners; Argentine losses total 90 casualties and 40 prisoners.

Shortly thereafter, the Argentine commander in chief de Sarratea joins Rondeau, closely shadowed by a rival Uruguayan force under Artigas. The latter sends 28-year-old commander Fructuoso Rivera to steal de Sarratea's herd of horses, prompting the latter to return alone into Buenos Aires, leaving Rondeau in command before Montevideo.

JANUARY 12, 1813. His army at Tucumán (Argentina) having been reinforced by 800 infantrymen of the 1st and 2nd Patrician regiments from Buenos Aires, Belgrano marches north toward the Pasaje River at the head of 3,000 well-equipped troops to attack Tristán's royalist army at Salta.

JANUARY 13, 1813. The 24-year-old, aristocratic revolutionary Santiago Mariño and 45 companions, including 18-year-old Antonio de Sucre Alcalá—having earlier sought refuge on the British island of Trinidad—now make a dawn landing at Güiría in eastern Venezuela, quickly establishing a patriot foothold in the Gulf of Paria region.

JANUARY 28, 1813. The 34-year-old revolutionary lieutenant colonel José Francisco de San Martín departs Retiro (Argentina) with 125 troopers of his Mounted Grenadier Regiment, shadowing on land the sea movements of 11 royalist vessels out of beleaguered Montevideo, which intend to forage up the Paraná River for cattle and provisions. Guessing their target, San Martín hurries ahead on the evening of February 2 to stealthily take up position behind San Lorenzo Monastery, 15 miles north of Rosario. His force has been joined by another 50 local patriot irregulars under Celedonio Escalada.

At 5:30 a.m. the next dawn, 250 royalists come ashore with two fieldpieces and advance confidently to pillage the sleeping convent, only to be surprised by twin columns of 60 grenadiers apiece emerging from behind the building under San Martín and

Capt. Justo Bermúdez. The startled raiders are repelled, suffering 40 killed, 12 wounded, and 14 captured, as opposed to 6 dead and 20 injured among the revolutionaries' ranks. In his battle report, San Martín will single out the bravery of French-born Hipólito Bouchard for capturing the royalist flag.

FEBRUARY 7, 1813. Morelos's army exits the city of Oaxaca, slowly wending its way west toward Acapulco.

FEBRUARY 9, 1813. Bolívar quits Mompos (Colombia) with 400 men to attack Correa's 800 royalists in the Cúcuta Valleys (Venezuela). After reaching San Cayetano and being reinforced by 100 patriots from Pamplona, Bolívar crosses the Zulía River.

At dawn on Sunday, February 28, his small patriot formation begins deploying atop the hills west of San José de Cúcuta. Correa is summoned from mass and sorties from the town to engage by 9:00 a.m. However, his columns cannot successfully storm the patriot positions, so royalist morale and cohesion dissipate after a four-hour struggle. Correa's men suffer some 20 dead and 40 wounded, compared to only 2 dead and 14 injured among Bolívar's ranks. The royalists are driven back toward San Antonio del Táchira and La Grita.

Bolívar requests authorization from the patriot government of New Granada under Camilo Torres Tenorio to advance deeper into Venezuelan territory. Permission to take his Colombian army with him will not be granted until April.

FEBRUARY 18, 1813. Salta. Learning that Belgrano has crossed the Pasaje River five days earlier and is marching against this city despite the rainy season, General Tristán takes up a defensive position southeast of Salta on the Portezuelo road with 3,400 royalists and 10 fieldpieces. The Argentine commander sends his vanguard under Brigadier General Díaz Vélez to mount a diversionary attack against Portezuelo, but Capt. José Apolinario Saravia leads the bulk of his 3,700-man, 12-gun army in an encircling maneuver through Chachapolas Ravine that same torrential night.

By dawn of February 19, the main revolutionary force emerges three miles north of Salta at Castañares Hacienda, prompting an astonished Tristán to hastily redeploy into a pair of lines from San Bernardo Hill along the Tagarete de Tineo ditch. Díaz Vélez's contingent rejoins, and after another heavy overnight downpour, Belgrano's reunited army launches its assault at midday of February 20 in five columns. The cavalry on the patriot right under Col. Manuel Dorrego disperses its opponents, then chases them into the very streets of Salta, along with the royalist infantry. Tristán's lines disintegrate, only a small unit resisting atop San Bernardo Hill, which is overwhelmed when Belgrano throws in his reserves. Tristán's army is annihilated, suffering 480 dead, 114 wounded, and virtually everyone else taken prisoner when the 2,800 survivors march out of Salta the next morning to officially surrender—the vast majority of whom are generously paroled by Belgrano. Patriot losses total 103 dead and 433 wounded. Belgrano orders that the fallen of both armies be buried together in a common grave.

Mexican insurgent of the Mixcoac Regiment. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

Battle of Salta.

FEBRUARY 26, 1813. Having temporarily patched up their political differences with officials from Buenos Aires, Uruguayan guerrillas under Artigas join Rondeau's Argentine revolutionary army in besieging the royalist garrison holding Montevideo.

MARCH 4, 1813. In recognition of his military successes, Calleja is appointed viceroy of New Spain (Mexico).

MARCH 28, 1813. Rosillo. In Texas, insurgent colonel Gutiérrez de Lara drives upon its capital of San Antonio from Bahía del Espíritu Santo, his army having been reinforced by fresh American volunteers and Indian warriors. Royalist colonel de Herrera challenges his progress with 1,500 regulars, 1,000 militiamen, and 12 artillery pieces at Rosillo (nine miles southeast of San Antonio, on a ridge along the banks of Salado Creek). The Americans, cleverly using their Indian allies to charge directly into the Spanish cavalry, quickly outflank the royalist infantry and defeat them in 15–20 minutes, inflicting 330 deaths and capturing 60 prisoners. Republican losses total 6 killed and 26 wounded.

On April 1, Governor de Salcedo sends out terms for San Antonio's capitulation to the victorious Gutiérrez de Lara at Concepción Mission, who refuses the terms and even detains the emissaries. The next morning, the capital is occupied, and on April 3, a captive de Salcedo and de Herrera are murdered at Rosillo along with a dozen other royalists by their insurgent escort under Antonio Delgado. The República del Norte or "Northern Republic" is proclaimed three days later, symbolized by a green flag.

Battle of Salta, by Aristene Papi. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

APRIL 1813. Belgrano leads an Argentine army north from Salta into Upper Peru (Bolivia), occupying Potosí by June 21.

APRIL 6, 1813. Fall of Acapulco. Morelos occupies Iguanas and Mira Heights outside this port with 1,500 men, bombarding its buildings for six days with his few fieldpieces. This obliges the royalists to evacuate the Casamata and their hospital bulwark, withdrawing inside 90-gun Fort San Diego under garrison commander Pedro Vélez.

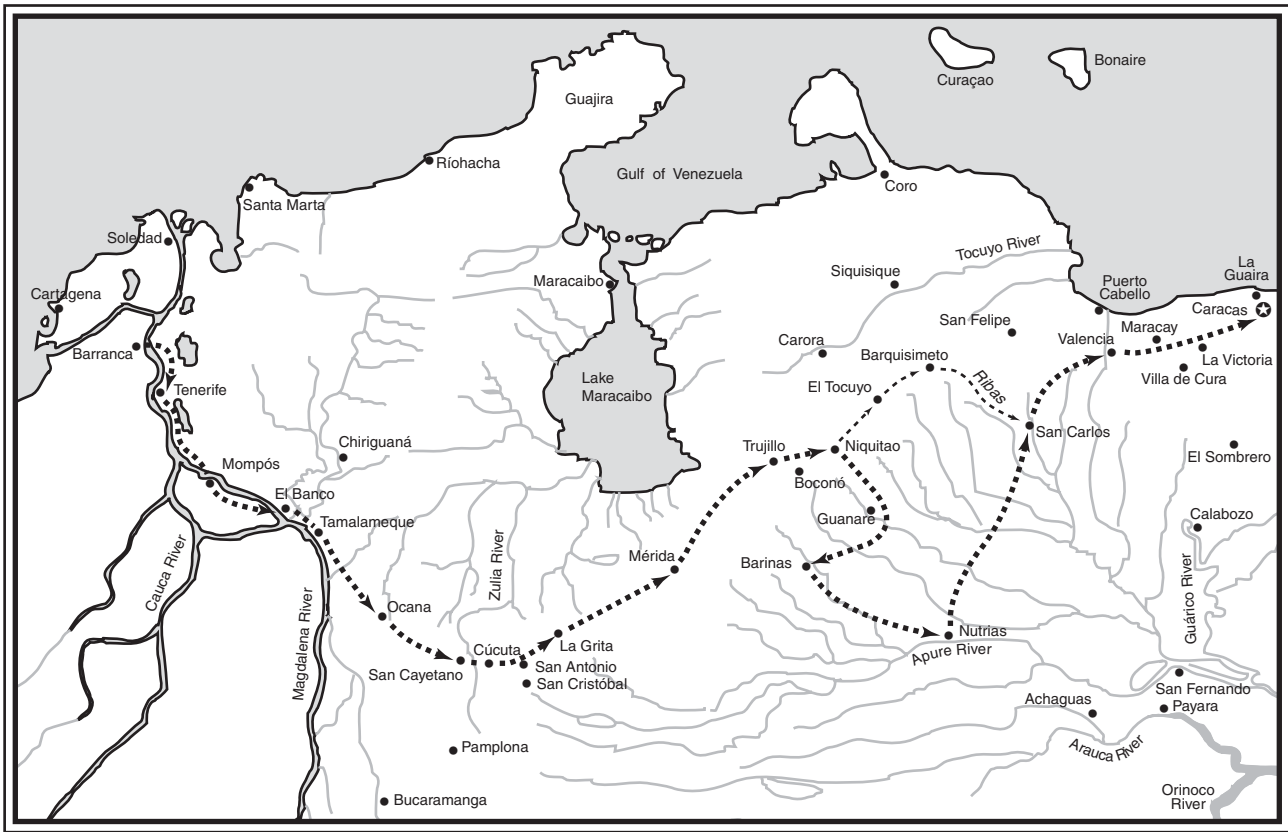

The insurgents settle down for a lengthy siege, seizing Roqueta Island offshore by June 9. It is not until they tighten their siege lines around Fort San Diego on August 17, however, that enough hardship is exerted to compel the defenders to capitulate three days later. This victory proves hollow, though, since it does not threaten any major royalist interest, although it does allow Morelos to address the Mexican Constitutional Congress at Chilpancingo from a position of greater political strength on September 13.

APRIL 19, 1813. An insurgent force under Matamoros defeats the royalist Servando Dombrini at Tonalá (Mexico).

APRIL 23, 1813. Colombian patriot colonel Manuel del Castillo advances against La Grita (Venezuela), defeating its royalist garrison under Correa.

MAY 17, 1813. The “Admirable Campaign.” Having been promoted to brigadier general in the Colombian army and granted citizenship, Bolívar departs La Grita to reconquer Venezuela from out of the west. He enters Mérida unopposed on May 23 and is greeted by its municipal council as El Libertador. On June 8, after learning of the execution of his friend, Col. Antonio Nicolás Briceño, and other patriots, Bolívar calls for a “war to the death” against all peninsular Spaniards. The inclusion of noncombatants in his decree will lead to an increasingly vicious cycle of reprisals by both sides, individual executions soon escalating into wholesale massacres.

Bolívar gains Trujillo by June 14, departing toward the end of that same month to march against the royalist forces gathered at Barinas under Lt. Col. Antonio Tizcar. His army’s sudden appearance surprises the latter commander, precipitating a sudden evacuation that disintegrates into chaos when Tizcar attempts to recross the Apure River, only to have the citizens of Nutria rise against him. The royalist commander reaches San Fernando virtually alone, while his subordinate José Martí is also defeated at Niquitao Heights around that same time by Bolívar's patriot subordinate, Col. José Félix Rivas, all Spanish captives being put to the sword. Rivas then occupies El Tocuyo by July 18, marching on Barquisimeto and destroying the royalist forces stationed at Los Horcones under Col. Francisco Oberto. Without pausing, Rivas crosses El Altar Mountain and rejoins Bolívar at San Carlos by July 30.

Bolívar's "Admirable Campaign."

The next day, the combined patriot contingents destroy a royalist army under Col. Julián Izquierdo on Taguanes Plain, slaughtering all its infantrymen. Upon receipt of this grim news, Monteverde flees Valencia for Puerto Cabello, leaving the road into Caracas open. Bolívar enters Valencia triumphantly on August 2, detaching Col. Atanasio Girardot to watch Monteverde's movements, while himself driving on toward the capital. Caracas's royalist governor, Brig. Gen. Antonio Fierro, offers to capitulate, and the victorious patriots enter on August 6 amid scenes of cruel reprisals. Bolívar's whirlwind offensive becomes labeled the Campaña Admirable or "Admirable Campaign," and he himself is acclaimed as captain general and hailed everywhere as El

Libertador—although once in power he does not restore republican government but, rather, creates a military dictatorship, thinly disguised as a "Second Republic."

EARLY JUNE 1813. Alazán. Royalist lieutenant colonel Francisco Ignacio Elizondo invades Texas with a detachment of 3,000 badly trained Mexican conscripts to avenge insurgent Gutiérrez de Lara's deposal and murder of Governor de Salcedo. Although under orders from his superior, Colonel Arredondo, to advance no farther north than the Frío River, Elizondo progresses to the very outskirts of San Antonio, camping on the banks of Alazán Creek by June 16 to challenge its republican army to battle.

Although outnumbered, the new American leader Henry Perry leads the defenders out after nightfall, charging across the Alazán the next dawn with the sun behind him to crush the royalists in a four-hour fight. Elizondo sustains 400 casualties and flees into Laredo, where he is superseded by Arredondo.

A month and a half later, the unpopular Gutiérrez de Lara is overthrown as insurgent leader by his Cuban rival José María Álvarez de Toledo, with support from the American William Shaler.

AUGUST 3, 1813. The patriot leader Mariño captures Cumaná, ensconcing himself as virtual ruler of eastern Venezuela one month later.

AUGUST 15, 1813. Atascoso. Álvarez de Toledo's 850 American troops and 600 Cochate Indian allies march out of San Antonio (Texas), taking up a defensive position on the Medina River two days later to contest another royalist invasion out of the south. Here they encounter a 180-man cavalry patrol under Lieutenant Colonel Elizondo, who engages and then retreats across the Medina, drawing the republicans toward Colonel Arredondo's main body.

At Atascoso, the pursuers encounter 1,200 royalist riders and 700 infantrymen drawn up with their artillery. A four-hour battle ensues, during which Arredondo crushes the insurgents, then brutally overruns San Antonio on the afternoon of August 18, executing 112 prisoners, including numerous Americans. Álvarez de Toledo, Perry, and other republican leaders flee toward Louisiana, effectively ending Texas's rebellion.

AUGUST 16, 1813. Matamoros's insurgents maul the royalist Asturias Battalion at San Agustín del Palmar (Mexico), executing its commander Cándano.

SEPTEMBER 1813. Having been reinforced from Spain by a 1,300-man division under Col. José Miguel Salomón, Monteverde's loyalists sortie from Puerto Cabello (Venezuela) to attack Girardot's patriot besiegers, who are already retreating toward Valencia.

Simón Bolívar

Simón José Antonio de la Santísima Trinidad Bolívar y Palacios was born on July 24, 1783, in the Venezuelan capital of Caracas. He was the fourth of five children born into an ancient and wealthy Creole family, descended from the earliest settlers. Simón's father died when he was only two and a half, and his mother died a couple of weeks short of his ninth birthday. Raised by his uncles and taught by Simón Rodríguez and other teachers, he received his first militia commission on January 14, 1797. At the age of 16, Bolívar was sent to Madrid.

He set sail from La Guaira on January 19, 1799, as a passenger aboard the 74-gun royal warship San Ildefonso, which ran the British blockade to Veracruz and Havana, then reached Spain on May 13. In Madrid, Bolívar lived with the influential Marqués de Ustáriz. He continued his refinement, and his youth seemingly climaxed when he married María Teresa Rodríguez on May 26, 1802. But when the couple sailed to Venezuela two months later, she tragically died of yellow fever the next January 22.

Bolívar returned to Spain by that same December 1803 and went on to Paris the next April. He witnessed the coronation of Napoleon I, whom he greatly admired. He also absorbed many philosophical lectures regarding liberty. Meeting his old tutor Rodríguez, they traveled into Italy in 1805. One August day, while overlooking Rome, the 22-year-old Bolívar swore to set Spanish America free. He joined the Masons in Paris the next year, then departed Hamburg aboard a neutral vessel for home. He interrupted his voyage by disembarking at Charleston (South Carolina) in January 1807 to visit the United States.

Upon regaining Venezuela that summer, Bolívar resumed life as a wealthy property owner. He was also appointed deputy justice for Yare and named to his father's old rank of militia colonel. When an autonomous junta was formed at Caracas on April 19, 1810, he was one of three delegates sent to London aboard the British corvette Wellington on a two-month diplomatic mission to seek help. He was back by December 10 and persuaded the junta to welcome the return from exile of Francisco de Miranda. Yet after serving for more than a year under Miranda's military leadership, Bolívar was among the plotters who seized Miranda in late July 1812 and handed him to the royal authorities.

Hoping to salvage his reputation, Bolívar traveled to Colombia by the end of that same year. There he secured a humble post under the French adventurer Pierre Labatut, who commanded the 70-man patriot garrison at Barranca. Eager to vindicate himself, Bolívar ignored Labatut's orders and led a series of raids up the Magdalena River. Meeting with success, Bolívar was promoted and allowed to invade his homeland. It resulted in the "Admirable Campaign," which would free Venezuela from royalist control by August 1813 and earn Bolívar the nickname of El Libertador.

He nonetheless was driven from power within a year. After a period of exile on Jamaica and Haiti, Bolívar again disembarked in eastern Venezuela in the spring of 1816 to renew the armed struggle against Crown rule. Through his singular will and self-assurance, he eventually helped secure the freedom of his homeland along with Colombia, Panama, Ecuador, and Bolivia—the Andean nation that still bears his name.

On September 30, the pursuers collide at Bárbula with a relief column arriving under Bolívar, and are mauled and driven back to the protection of Salomón's regulars at Las Trincheras. Monteverde is then wounded at this latter place on October 3, and the Spaniards are driven back inside Puerto Cabello, which is once again encircled by patriot colonel Patricio de Elhuyar (the successor to Girardot, killed at Bárbula). Monteverde—his jaw shattered in the fighting—renounces his command on October 28 in favor of Juan Manuel Cajigal (or Cagigal).

Also in September, to dispute a loyalist occupation of Popayán, north of Pasto (southwestern Colombia), the insurgent Nariño—having forged a temporary alliance with neighboring New Granada—marches out of Bogotá at the head of a small army. He retakes Popayán but, after winning small victories at Palacé and Calbío, is in turn captured while advancing upon Pasto and eventually shipped as a prisoner to Spain.

OCTOBER 1, 1813. Vilcapugio. Argentine general Belgrano—having gained the Bolivian plain of Vilcapugio four days previously—is awaiting the arrival of 1,200 more insurgent troops from Cochabamba under Colonel Zelaya, plus 2,000 Indian auxiliaries from Chayanta under Chief Cárdenas. The latter, however, has been defeated at Ancacato by a royalist force under Castro, and the revolutionaries' rendezvous plans have been revealed to this theater's new commander in chief, Gen. (later Peruvian viceroy) Joaquín de la Pezuela y Sánchez.

Determined to destroy the insurgent factions before they can unite, de la Pezuela leads 4,000 loyalists, with 12 fieldpieces, out of the Condo Condo Range at dawn of October 1 to attack Belgrano's 3,500 men and 14 cannon resting below on Vilcapugio (or Vilcapujio) Plain. The revolutionaries quickly form up, dispersing the cavalry on the royalist left as soon as battle becomes joined. Shortly thereafter, the royalist infantry breaks and flees, abandoning their artillery, so that Belgrano seems on the verge of achieving victory.

But at that moment, Castro's royalist cavalry contingent materializes out of the north, catching the patriots in the flank and rolling up their line. The defeated insurgents divide into two, one contingent fleeing down the Potosí road under Díaz Vélez, another heading toward Macha under Belgrano.

NOVEMBER 7, 1813. Morelos marches northwest out of Chilpancingo, hoping to conquer Valladolid (modern Morelia, Mexico) to serve as the capital for his new republican government.

NOVEMBER 10, 1813. Bolívar reinforces Col. Rafael Urdaneta's patriot division with a small contingent, but nevertheless is repulsed near Barquisimeto by Ceballos's royalist forces and obliged to retire into San Carlos before rebuilding his army and driving this enemy from Vigirima Heights.

NOVEMBER 13, 1813. Ayohuma. Having recuperated from his Vilcapugio defeat, the Argentine general Belgrano marches north from Macha (Bolivia) on November 9 with 3,400 revolutionaries and eight cannon, establishing himself in Ayohuma Plain. Four days later, de la Pezuela appears on the Taquirí high ground with 3,500 royalists and 18 guns, descending into the valley to give battle the next day.

After a half-hour opening bombardment, the loyalists repel Belgrano's cavalry and infantry assaults, then destroy the insurgent army in three hours of brutal fighting, which costs de la Pezuela 500 casualties. Belgrano's army is virtually annihilated by sundown of November 14, only 400 men leaving the field with their defeated general.

Belgrano retreats precipitously southward, unsuccessfully attempting to blow up the Potosí Mint during his retirement into Argentina. De la Pezuela follows up his advantage, reoccupying the cities of Battle of Ayohuma.

José María Morelos

This famed Mexican insurgent was born on September 30, 1765, in the city of Valladolid (modern Morelia, Michoacán), the second son of a native carpenter. It has long been claimed that Morelos was of mulatto descent, although this fact has never been confirmed. Although commonly referred to today as “José María Morelos y Pavón,” his baptismal name was recorded in the cathedral registry on October 4 as José María Teclo Morelos Pavón y Pérez. After his father died in 1779, young José was entrusted to the care of his uncle Felipe, a teamster who operated out of Tahuejo near Apatzingán. The 14-year-old worked as a shepherd on nearby estates until he was old enough to join his uncle on his regular route between Mexico City and the port of Acapulco.

At almost 25 years of age, already the father of three children, Morelos gave in to his mother’s insistence that he accept his great grandfather’s vacant bequest in April 1790 and study for the priesthood. He enrolled in San Nicolás Obispo College at Valladolid, whose rector was Fr. Miguel Hidalgo. The former teamster graduated first in his class in March 1795, then received minor orders. On January 31, 1798, he was temporarily appointed as village priest at Churumuco. Arriving with his mother, Juana, and sister María Antonia, they found this locale so hot and unhealthy that he requested a transfer. By the time he was reassigned to the parish of San Agustín Carácuaru on March 12, 1799, his mother had died.

More than a decade passed in this provincial backwater before word arrived of Hidalgo’s revolt in the autumn of 1810. Morelos immediately returned to his native city to join his former mentor’s cause. During a reunion held while riding between Charo and Indaparapeo on October 20, Hidalgo commissioned his student to “raise troops on the southern coast, acting in accordance with the verbal instructions which I have given him.” Morelos promptly returned to Carácuaru and left with 25 poorly armed adherents. At Coahuayutla, he was joined by several ranchers. The militia cavalry captain Marcos Martínez then added his 50 troopers at Zacatula, as well as all the workers from Petatlán. Morelos appeared with this small force near Acapulco by early November to raise the banner of revolt.

Articulate, passionate, and with the common touch among people he knew ever since his youth, the 45-year-old priest excelled as an insurgent leader. Thousands rallied to his side to besiege royalist outposts and ambush their columns. Even after Hidalgo’s defeat and execution in July 1811, Morelos continued to campaign well in the southwest.

Yet however brave and fervent, his guerrilla throngs proved incapable of defeating large royalist armies in pitched battles. Morelos eventually was defeated and driven into the mountains. Captured on November 3, 1815, he was taken before the Inquisition in Mexico City. After two days of interrogation, Morelos was stripped of his religious orders as a “traitor to God, to the King, and to the Pope.” Handed over to the Crown authorities for execution, he was carried in a closed carriage on December 22 to the abandoned estate of San Cristóbal Ecatepec, made to kneel, and shot in the back by a firing squad.

Jujuy and Salta early the next year. On January 30, 1814, the disgraced Belgrano is succeeded in command of the revolutionary “Army of the North” at Tucumán by San Martín.

DECEMBER 1813. A Creole conspiracy is discovered in Guatemala City, centered around its Bethelite religious order.

DECEMBER 5, 1813. Ceballos’s royalist forces are joined by Col. José Yáñez and engaged at the town of Araure (Venezuela) by Bolívar, who defeats them after a hard-fought struggle.

DECEMBER 11, 1813. In Europe, because Napoleon I’s armies have been driven out of Spain by Wellington, peace is restored between the emperor and Spain through the Treaty of Valençay, which also promises to restore Ferdinand VII to his throne.

DECEMBER 22, 1813. Valladolid-Puruarán. Morelos appears at the Valladolid suburb of Santa María with 5,000 men and 30 artillery pieces. His subordinates Galeana and Bravo attempt to seize its Zapote Gate the next day to prevent the entry of royalist reinforcements. That assault fails, however, and the city’s garrison is strengthened on the morning of December 24 by the Toluca and Guanajuato divisions under Llano and Col. Agustín de Iturbide.

That same evening, Iturbide slips out of Valladolid with 190 cavalymen and an infantry company, stealing upon the unwary insurgent camp as darkness falls. In a brilliant stroke, Iturbide launches a nocturnal attack that startles the insurgents, who fire into each other’s ranks and eventually dissolve into panic-stricken flight.

Morelos flees to Chupío with a handful of followers, hoping to regroup his army at Puruarán. Instead, the disorganized insurgents are once again surprised on the night of January 4, 1814, by Llano's cavalry, being utterly routed and losing 25 guns, 1,000 muskets, and other matériel. Among the prisoners is Matamoros, caught while attempting to cross the Puruarán River; he is conveyed into Valladolid to be executed on February 3.

A royalist column under Gabriel Armijo subsequently continues toward Chilpancingo and defeats the troops of Victor and Miguel Bravo, thereby crushing all insurgent hopes of resuming their offensive.

JANUARY 1814. Manuel José de Arce leads a second Creole uprising at San Salvador in Central America.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1814. Having failed to placate Venezuela's blacks and llaneros following the restoration of Creole rule, Bolívar's republican government is beset by royalist guerrilla raids—the most effective being those organized by 31-year-old José Tomás Boves Rodríguez, a onetime peninsular merchant, privateer, and convicted ex-smuggler, who proves to be an inspired leader of the tough llanero nomads.

After numerous skirmishes, Boves manages to crush the patriot commander Vicente Campo Elías's army at La Puerta southwest of Caracas. His 7,000–8,000 horsemen, known to their foes as the “Satanic Legion,” then drive Bolívar from his San Mateo Hacienda—in the process slaying Campo Elías—while Ceballos's royalists threaten Valencia, and Francisco Rosete closes in upon Caracas from the east. Rosete destroys patriot general Juan Bautista Arismendi's smaller force before finally being checked by Ribas.

Bolívar staves off disaster by compelling Ceballos to raise the siege of Valencia, while Ribas halts Boves's drive by winning a victory at La Victoria on February 12. The frightened republicans nonetheless execute at least 800 monarchist captives between February 14 and 16.

FEBRUARY 23, 1814. His following reduced to 900 demoralized men after the twin disasters at Valladolid and Puruarán, Morelos departs Tlacotepec (Mexico), only to be overtaken the next day by a royalist column and nearly captured as his troops scatter. The insurgent leader eventually straggles into Acapulco by early March with only 100 remaining men.

MARCH 11, 1814. Patriot naval officer William or “Guillermo” Brown—born 36 years earlier in Foxford, Ireland, and raised in Philadelphia—attacks a royalist flotilla under Jacinto de Romarate anchored off Martín García Island in the River Plate estuary. Brown employs virtually all the fledgling Argentine Navy in this action: the corvettes Hércules (flag) and Cefir, the sloops Julia and Fortuna, the sumanca Trinidad, the gunboat América, the auxiliaries San Martín and Luis, plus the schooner Carmen. He is nevertheless repelled after his flagship runs aground.

Four days later, Brown returns and conquers the island, which was occupied by the loyalists four months previously. Romarate's flotilla of two brigantines and three gunboats consequently flees up the Uruguay River, pursued by a patriot squadron under the American-born captain Thomas Notter. The latter runs aground and is checked when the Carmen explodes at Arroyo de la China on March 28, but despite retiring, Notter nevertheless keeps these royalist vessels bottled in.

MARCH 22, 1814. Ferdinand VII returns to power in Spain, and over the next few weeks, he and his absolutist followers heavy-handedly abolish the liberal constitution of March 1812 and restore many of the trappings of their past regime.

MARCH 28, 1814. The patriot garrison holding the Venezuelan city of Valencia under 55-year-old governor Francisco Silvestre Espejo Caamaño is besieged by Boves's royalist horde. The defenders agree to capitulate by July 9, Espejo being executed by a firing squad in its main square six days afterward.

MARCH 31, 1814. The royalist Boves encounters Mariño at Bocachica (Venezuela) while the latter is marching to Bolívar's relief at San Mateo. Both sides endure heavy casualties during this engagement, Mariño retiring toward La Victoria, while Boves withdraws into Valencia.

APRIL 9, 1814. Learning that royalist forces under Armijo are closing in upon his Acapulco stronghold, Morelos burns this place, hangs over 100 royalist prisoners, then disappears into the Atijo Mountains one week later with a few loyal adherents. The monarchists reoccupy devastated Acapulco on April 14.

APRIL 20, 1814. Fall of Montevideo. Following his conquest of Martín García Island, Brown blockades the royalist stronghold of Montevideo with seven Argentine warships, complementing the until now ineffective land siege by 4,000 revolutionaries under General Rondeau.

Faced with this new threat, 13 royalist vessels sortie on May 14 under Miguel Sierra, pursuing Brown farther out to sea, only to have him turn and defeat them near El Buceo in a three-day running fight. Shortly after Brown reimposes his blockade, Rondeau is reinforced by an additional 1,500 Argentine troops under 24-year-old lieutenant colonel Carlos María de Alvear.

On June 20, Spanish governor Vigodet at last requests terms, and three days later Montevideo surrenders. The Argentine patriots seize 500 guns, 9,000 muskets, 100 ships, and 7,000 prisoners (most of whom are repatriated to Spain). However, their subsequent occupation also creates frictions with the local Uruguayan leader Artigas.

EARLY MAY 1814. The Chilean patriot leader Bernardo O'Higgins Riquelme arranges a shaky truce with loyalist forces invading from Peru.

MAY 28, 1814. Bolívar defeats a royalist army under Cajigal and Ceballos on the Plains of Carabobo, while they are advancing upon Caracas.

JUNE 15, 1814. La Puerta (First Battle). Boves's llanero cavalry crushes the combined forces of Bolívar and Mariño at La Puerta, southwest of Caracas, compelling the patriots to retire inside their capital with only 800–1,000 troops. Boves's main body then turns aside to subdue the last republican stronghold under Col. Juan Escalona at Valencia, while detaching a division to threaten Caracas.

JUNE 25, 1814. An Uruguayan militia company reaches Las Piedras under Colonel Ortugués, requesting that Argentine general Alvear give them possession of recently conquered Montevideo. Not only does he refuse, but Alvear dispatches 800 riders during the night to disperse this rival formation, capturing 200 Uruguayans along with all their artillery and baggage.

JULY 6, 1814. Believing the royalist division approaching Caracas to be weak, Bolívar sorties from his capital to give battle. He is defeated with heavy losses, however, and republican noncombatants abandon their capital by the thousands, fleeing toward Barcelona, fearful of the monarchists' vengeance.

JULY 9, 1814. Valencia surrenders to Boves, and a number of executions are carried out.

Martín Miguel de Güemes. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

JULY 31, 1814. The Argentine guerrilla leader de Güemes reoccupies Salta, which was abandoned by de la Pezuela's royalists when they retired north to Jujuy.

AUGUST 1814. The Italian mercenary Giuseppe Bianchi—commissioned as a republican privateer—makes off with three Colombian ships and much silver plate from Caracas.

AUGUST 2, 1814. Pumacahua Rebellion. After almost a year of disputes, the liberal Creole cabildo or “city councilors” of Cuzco escape the confinement imposed upon them by the more conservative oidores or “justices,” then in turn arrest many peninsular Spaniards the next day and call for the full implementation of Spain's constitution of March 1812. The rebels are led by the middle-class citizens José and Vicente Angulo, plus Gabriel Béjar, although their insurrection erroneously becomes better known by the name of one of its military leaders:

the elderly curaca or “Indian official” Mateo García Pumacahua.

Tens of thousands of poorly armed peasants advance quickly against Huamanga and Huancavelica in the north, as well as La Paz and Arequipa in the south. They also ally themselves with the Argentine insurgents who are besieging Upper Peru (Bolivia), and when the latter are defeated toward the end of this same year, Pumacahua’s followers are brutally repressed.

AUGUST 3, 1814. Jujuy (Argentina) is reoccupied by revolutionary forces, as de la Pezuela’s royalists withdraw into Cotagaita (Bolivia).

AUGUST 17, 1814. Royalist colonel Francisco Tomás Morales—Boves’s second-in-command—overtakes Bolívar’s fleeing republican army at Aragua (eastern Venezuela), inflicting stinging losses that compel the Liberator to continue through Barcelona toward Cumaná, escaping out to sea with Mariño by August 25.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1814. The 32-year-old republican colonel José Francisco Bermúdez halts Morales’s royalist drive through eastern Venezuela at Maturín, prompting Boves to march to his subordinate’s aid. Along the way, Boves defeats Bermúdez in an hour-long fight at Los Magueyes on November 9, then combines forces with Morales to bear down upon Maturín.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1814. Rancagua. Weakened by internal fighting between O’Higgins and Gen. José Miguel Carrera, Chile’s patriots belatedly put aside their differences and prepare to check the royalist counteroffensive that has reached as close to their capital as San Fernando. They mount a stand at the Cachapoal River crossings at Rancagua, a town of 2,500 inhabitants lying 50 miles south of Santiago. O’Higgins arrives there on September 20 and begins fortifying its streets with barricades, extemporizing strongpoints for his 600 troops, plus nine artillery pieces. José Miguel Carrera appears one week later and encamps his division nearby, while Gen. Luis Carrera joins on September 29 with a third division, being stationed to the north at Graneros del Conde.

However, the 37-year-old royalist general Mariano Osorio Pardo traverses the Cachapoal undetected on the night of September 30 at Punta de Cortés Ford to the south with 500 cavalry troopers, 4,300 infantrymen, and 120 gunners for 18 field-pieces, surprising the patriots the next dawn by bearing down upon Rancagua in four columns. O’Higgins’s and José Miguel Carrera’s combined strength of 1,900 men crowd inside the town and brace to receive an assault, Luis Carrera’s division being too distant to assist. The initial royalist assaults beginning at 9:00–10:00 a.m. are checked, but exchanges continue throughout that day and night, oftentimes at close range. A dust column approaching from Las Coloradas on the morning of October 2 briefly heartens the defenders, but proves to be royalist irregulars who have to be repelled by a patriot sally. Eventually, Osorio orders outlying houses put to the torch so that his men can launch one final push at 1:00 p.m., and—obscured by smoke—they penetrate past the trenches and barricades into Rancagua proper. Acknowledging defeat, O’Higgins has the church bells rung as a signal to escape, manages to cut his way free with a handful of adherents, and regains Santiago along with some 300 men from Luis Carrera’s battered division.

This stinging defeat temporarily crushes the insurgent cause in Chile, many of the combatants being obliged to flee over the Andes into Argentina, leaving their capital defenseless. Those sympathizers who remain behind are initially treated rather benignly when Osorio enters and assumes the governorship. On direct orders from the Peruvian viceroy de Abascal in Lima, though, an increasingly harsh repression will eventually be imposed.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1814. Bolívar and Mariño reach Cartagena safely.

OCTOBER 6, 1814. In Uruguay, the Argentine general Alvear detaches Colonel Dorrego with 600 men to disperse 1,000 Uruguayan militiamen under Fernando Otorgués gathered at Marmarajá Creek, 18 miles northeast of Montevideo. The latter are surprised and defeated, suffering 70 deaths plus the loss of their artillery and baggage trains.

DECEMBER 4, 1814. Urica. Rather than await Boves’s assault within the town of Maturín in eastern Venezuela, the republican commanders Ribas and Bermúdez sortie with 2,000–3,000 troops to seek an engagement. They reach El Areo and form up their infantrymen in two columns behind twin cavalry squadrons of 180 troopers apiece, led by José Tadeo Monagas and Pedro Zaraza. The republican army thereupon marches into the night.

The next dawn, they come upon Boves's 5,500 royalist riders resting in three large encampments outside the town of Urica. Boves immediately leads a charge, which is checked by Bermúdez, allowing the republican infantry to deploy into a battle line. But this line is shredded by royalist guns and scattered by cavalry charges, so that Ribas's army is almost totally annihilated. He and Bermúdez manage to stagger back into Maturín with only a few hundred survivors—although the royalist champion Boves has been slain by a chance lance thrust during this encounter, so is succeeded by Colonel Morales.

DECEMBER 8, 1814. Having been given command of Urdaneta's division in New Granada (modern Colombia), Bolívar arrives outside Bogotá to subdue its rival republican government under elderly Manuel Bernardo Álvarez (Nariño's successor; see "September 1813" entry). After his call for surrender is refused, Bolívar attacks on December 10 and pushes the defenders back into the main square the next day, accepting its capitulation by the 12th.

DECEMBER 11, 1814. Morales overruns Maturín (eastern Venezuela) in a four-hour assault, defeating its 300–400 demoralized infantry defenders under Bermúdez and Ribas, who are taken prisoner and executed along with most of the town's residents.

JANUARY 10, 1815. Guayabos. Argentine colonel Dorrego, with 800 men (including 200 former royalists) and one small gun, are defeated by 1,200 Uruguayan troops and a single cannon under Bernabé Rivera. The Argentines suffer 200 casualties, plus 400 prisoners or deserters, their few survivors escaping into the night. Dorrego retires inland to Entre Ríos, while the remaining Argentine forces in Uruguay fall back into Montevideo.

Unable to maintain the isolated garrison of that city, Buenos Aires agrees on February 15, 1815, to cede Montevideo to the patriot leader Artigas, so it is evacuated 10 days later. (Determined to leave behind nothing of military value, Alvear's troops are busily dumping gunpowder into Montevideo Bay from Las Bóvedas casements on February 23 when a spark from a shovel striking stone causes a blast, which claims 120 lives and injures scores of others.)

JANUARY 24, 1815. Bolívar departs Bogotá in hopes of raising an expedition to invade western Venezuela and reassert republican rule. This project is abandoned because of lack of support from the divided Colombian government.

Royalist infantryman. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

JANUARY 26, 1815. At El Tejar (Bolivia), royalist riders surprise Argentine colonel Martín Rodríguez, resting with 40 of his men, and capture all of them except Capt. Mariano Necochea.

MARCH 27, 1815. Bolívar's division occupies the Popa high ground outside Cartagena, to besiege its ruling faction under Brig. Gen. Manuel del Castillo. Civil war divides the republican camp at a time when royalist fortunes are reviving.

EARLY APRIL 1815. Royalist Resurgence. In Europe, Napoleon I's fall and the return of stable government allow Spain to concentrate more efforts into subduing the rebellion in its American colonies. An expedition of 10,500 conscripted soldiers aboard 18 warships and 42 transports reaches eastern Venezuela

Waterloo

In Europe, more than 20 years of warfare climaxed with the defeat of Napoleon I. On February 26, 1815, the emperor escaped with 1,000 men from his exile on the Mediterranean island of Elba. Landing in France three days later, he made a triumphal entry into Paris by March 20, cheered by the troops and people. Louis XVIII had fled the previous night.

Yet France lay spent by its years of sacrifice, and the Allied Congress in Vienna had already voted to remove Napoleon I by force. Hoping to beat his foes piecemeal, the emperor left Paris on June 12, 1815, to lead 125,000 men into Belgium. By moving boldly, he hoped to thrust between the 116,000 Prussians mustering near Charleroi under the 72-year-old field marshal Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher and the 107,000 Anglo-Dutch soldiers assembling near Mons under the 46-year-old field marshal Arthur, Duke of Wellington. Large Austrian and Russian armies had not yet entered the theater.

The two allied commanders were indeed surprised when Napoleon I burst across the Belgian border on June 15, driving a Prussian corps out of Charleroi. The next afternoon, the emperor bloodied Blücher's main body at Ligny, while the French marshal Michel Ney battered the advance Anglo-Dutch positions at Quatre-Bras. Wellington held, but he retired north toward Brussels on the morning of June 17, fearing that his Prussian ally was beaten. Napoleon I assumed the same so left 30,000 men under the marshal Emmanuel, Marquis de Grouchy, to chase the injured Blücher's scattered force. The emperor meanwhile joined Ney to crush the English portion.

But his movements were hampered by heavy rain, and the Prussians were not finished. Blücher was reinforced by two fresh corps near Wavre and, at dawn of June 18, set out with 60,000 troops to join the English. Reassured by this news, Wellington positioned his 23,000 British troops, 44,000 allies, and 160 guns into a strong, three-mile-long defensive line at Mont St. Jean, nine miles south of Brussels near the village of Waterloo.

Napoleon arrived that evening with 74,000 men and 250 guns, but he waited until the ground dried before launching his first attack at 11:00 a.m. on June 18, 1815. A titanic battle ensued. French bombardments, cavalry charges, and infantry assaults failed to break Wellington's line. At 7:00 p.m., the first of Blücher's Prussians appeared and helped rout Napoleon. The French army collapsed into the night. Wellington suffered some 15,000 casualties, the Prussians, another 8,000. French losses totaled 25,000 dead or wounded, almost 9,000 captured, and 220 guns lost. Four days later, the emperor abdicated in Paris. A generation of global conflict at long last ceased.

in early April under an experienced, 36-year-old general named Pablo Morillo y Morillo—dubbed pacificador de Tierra Firme or “Pacifier of the Spanish Main,” as he is also to be its governor. He intends to use this easternmost Venezuelan province as a staging area for subsequent attacks upon other strategic theaters.

Finding that insurgents under Arismendi and Bermúdez have transformed Margarita into a patriot outpost, Morillo takes aboard 3,000 loyalists under Morales and subdues this island by April 11 (only Bermúdez and a few followers escape). When his progression resumes, the 74-gun flagship San Pedro de Alcántara accidentally explodes, costing the Spanish expedition 900 lives and much of its money, artillery, weapons, and provisions. Reaching Caracas on May 11, Morillo restores Madrid's rule but then alienates many black royalists when he sets up a virtual military dictatorship to secure provisions and funding for his army.

APRIL 15, 1815. In Buenos Aires, the “Supreme Director” Alvear is overthrown by Rondeau.

APRIL 17, 1815. At Puesto del Marqués (Bolivia), a 500-man Argentine cavalry patrol under Colonel Fernández de la Cruz surprises 300 royalist riders.

MAY 1, 1815. Argentine forces reoccupy Potosí (Bolivia).

MAY 9, 1815. Bolívar quits the fratricidal struggle among rival republican factions within New Granada (Colombia) by sailing for Jamaica aboard an English warship. He arrives there four days later.

JUNE 2, 1815. Morillo quits Caracas for Puerto Cabello (Venezuela) with his main royalist army, leaving Brig. Gen. Salvador Moxó in command of the Venezuelan capital.

JULY 13, 1815. Morillo departs Puerto Cabello with his 5,000 regulars, entering New Granada (Colombia) via Santa Marta. From here, he dispatches two columns to clear the Magdalena River by reinforcing the royalist garrison at Mompos and occupying Ocaña and Antioquia. Meanwhile, Morales advances overland upon Cartagena, where Morillo joins him by landing unopposed on September 1. They besiege Cartagena's defenders.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1815. Zacatlán (Mexico) falls to the royalists.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1815. The guerrilla leaders Morelos, Nicolás Bravo, Páez, Father Carvajal, and Irigaray exit Uruapan, escorting Mexico's National Congress east toward safety at Tehuacán. Royalists get wind of this plan and send cavalry units to intercept; they fail, however, to prevent the congressional caravan under Guerrero from crossing the Mezcala River at Tenango on November 3. Two days later, however, Lt. Col. Manuel de la Concha's cavalry overtakes an insurgent contingent at Tezmalaca.

The latter are defeated, and among the 29 prisoners taken is Morelos. Most are executed on the spot, but he is conveyed to Mexico City, stripped of his religious orders, interrogated, tortured, and shot by a firing squad at San Cristóbal Ecatepec on December 22. The demoralized Congress also disbands before this year is out.

OCTOBER 17, 1815. Insurgent commander Castillo is deposed as governor of beleaguered Cartagena, being succeeded by Bermúdez. Morillo's siege is so tight that eventually residents are starved into submission, fleeing in great numbers by early December. On December 6, the Spanish general makes his triumphal entry into Cartagena's streets, and Morales conducts wholesale executions at the nearby Bocachica fortress.

OCTOBER 20, 1815. An Argentine strike force of 350 infantrymen and 200 riders under Col. Martín Rodríguez—who has been exchanged (see "January 26, 1815" entry)—attempts to surprise a 300-man royalist force at Venta y Media, 12 miles north of Chayanta (Bolivia), only to be discovered and repelled.

OCTOBER 23, 1815. The 28-gun, 200-man Argentine frigate Hércules departs Montevideo under Capt. Guillermo Brown, accompanied by the brig Trinidad under his younger brother Miguel, to round Cape Horn and attack the Spaniards in the Pacific.

NOVEMBER 27, 1815. Sipe Sipe. With 5,100 men and 23 fieldpieces, royalist general de la Pezuela intercepts Rondeau's 3,000–3,500 Argentine rebels and 9 guns as they attempt to gain Cochabamba (Bolivia). Descending onto the plain from Viluma Heights, de la Pezuela spends the next two days maneuvering around Rondeau's right flank before launching his attack on November 29. The royalists shatter the revolutionary army, killing, wounding, or capturing 1,000 invaders along with all their artillery and 1,500 firearms. Survivors flee down the road into Potosí, to eventually be joined by another 1,000 Argentine reinforcements under Col. Domingo French. Royalist losses total 32 dead and 198 injured.

NOVEMBER 30, 1815. Royalist militia colonel Sebastián de la Calzada, after advancing inland with his 5th Division, defeats the patriot general Urdaneta at Chitaga (Colombia).

DECEMBER 15, 1815. Guerrero forces the surrender of the royalist garrison holding Acatlán (Mexico) under Antonio Flon, Conde de la Cadena. Shortly thereafter, though, monarchist reinforcements arrive under Lamadrid, who put Guerrero's company to flight.

DECEMBER 16, 1815. Prince Regent João—having decided to remain in the New World rather than return to Portugal following Napoleon I's fall—elevates Brazil to the status of a kingdom and reorganizes the Portuguese empire as a British-style "United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and the Algarves." Three months later, upon the death of his deranged mother, Maria, he becomes ruler of this agglomeration under the title of King João VI, yet he still refuses to return to Lisbon.

JANUARY 20, 1816. Having been joined off Chile by the 16-gun, 130-man patriot corvette Halcón of Captain Bouchard, Brown's Argentine raiders the Hércules and the Trinidad blockade Callao (Peru). Two days and nights of boat duels ensue, resulting in the sinking of the Spanish merchant frigate Fuente Hermosa, plus other damage. On January 23, the royalist frigate Consecuencia is intercepted approaching port, captured, and renamed the Argentina. On the night of January 24–25, another boat raid is attempted, after which Brown lifts his blockade on the 30th, having suffered 30 losses during this operation.

JANUARY 31, 1816. Retreating before de la Pezuela's victorious royalists, the 21-year-old Argentine captain Gregorio Araóz de Lamadrid fights a delaying action at Culpina (Bolivia), followed by another at Uturango on February 2, and on the banks of the San Juan River 10 days later, as the revolutionaries continue to retire toward their ultimate destination of Tucumán.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1816. Brown and Bouchard's three patriot raiders enter the Gulf of Guayaquil with seven prizes, venturing up the Guayas River with the shallow-draught Trinidad and a boat party. Despite overrunning a small keep and battery near Guayaquil with a nocturnal assault, Brown and his men suffer 50 casualties and are taken prisoner when the Trinidad runs aground. They are then exchanged on February 16, when the Hércules and the Halcón appear off the city.

FEBRUARY 22, 1816. Cachirí. This morning, Spanish colonel de la Calzada—after being reinforced by a contingent sent by Col. Miguel de la Torre—pulverizes a 3,000-man patriot division under 35-year-old general Custodio García Rovira (or Robira) at Cachirí, which is attempting to bar his advance up into Colombia's central highlands. The Spaniards take no prisoners, and the road into the insurgent capital lays open.

APRIL 21, 1816. In Mexico, the insurgent commander Osorio is beaten at Venta de Cruz by Manuel de la Concha, and again two days later at San Felipe.

MAY 2, 1816. Bolívar returns from exile in Haiti to Margarita Island in eastern Venezuela with 250 followers aboard a brig, six schooners, and a Spanish prize. Sighting a royal brig and schooner off Los Frailes, he captures them, killing the Spanish captain Rafael Iglesias before dropping anchor in Juan Griego harbor the next day. Here, the Liberator is greeted by patriot general Arismendi, who has already partially thrown off royalist rule. Although the Spaniards evacuate their capital of Asunción, Bolívar is unable to storm the Pampatar stronghold under Brig. Gen. Juan Bautista Pardo, so he continues his voyage on May 25, leaving this operation to Arismendi.

MAY 5, 1816. De la Torre's Spanish division closes in upon unfortified Bogotá, which is abandoned by its patriot garrison under the French-born colonel Manuel Roergas de Serviez and occupied the next day. De la Torre quickly installs a holding force before continuing in pursuit of Roergas de Serviez's 2,000 patriot troops, who are retreating eastward.

MAY 26, 1816. De la Torre scatters the remnants of Roergas de Serviez's demoralized patriot division at Cáqueza (in what is today eastern Colombia), while Morillo's main army enters Bogotá. Many patriots are subsequently hunted down, arrested, or executed, while Roergas de Serviez's survivors flee into exile in the distant eastern llanos or "plains" beyond the Apure River, placing themselves under the command of Páez. García Rovira, elected president of the fugitive government of the "United Provinces of New Granada," is seized on July 12 and executed by August 8, while Roergas de Serviez is assassinated at Chorrerón in mid-October. By the end of this year, virtually all of the viceroyalty is once again in royalist hands, including Quito.

MAY 31, 1816. Bolívar's small company disembarks at Carúpano (eastern Venezuela), occupying its tiny royalist keep and seizing a brig and schooner from the roadstead. The Liberator then dispatches his mulatto colleagues Mariño and Manuel Piar inland to recruit followers at Güiria and Maturín.

JUNE 19, 1816. Spanish brigadier general Tomás de Cires, advancing from Cumaná through eastern Venezuela to engage Bolívar's beachhead at Carúpano, attacks patriot colonel Francisco de Paula Alcántara's outpost at Esmeralda, forcing it back. Realizing that the royalists are closing in upon his position, the Liberator sets sail on July 1 with 700 followers, shifting operations farther westward.

JULY 5, 1816. Bolívar's 700-man army lands unopposed at Ocumare, 20 miles east of Puerto Cabello (Venezuela). Two days later, he detaches Lt. Col. Carlos Soublette with 300 men to occupy La Cabrera and raise rebellion in the Aragua Valley. This detachment is attacked by Morales marching out of Valencia and driven back to Los Aguacates Hill. From there, Soublette calls for help, and Bolívar sets out with 200 reinforcements.

JULY 9, 1816. The "United Provinces of the River Plate" (Argentina) officially proclaim their independence from Spain.

JULY 12, 1816. Santa Fe Campaign. Buenos Aires's supremacy is challenged by a rival republican government formed at the inland city of Santa Fe. General Díaz Vélez is therefore dispatched up the Paraná River, occupying that mostly deserted city with 1,500 troops by August 4. The enemy refuses to deal, however, so the invaders are constrained to retreat back downriver by July 31.

JULY 13, 1816. At dawn, Morales's loyalists attack Bolívar and Soublette's defenses at Los Aguacates (Venezuela) and, although outnumbered two to one, defeat and drive the patriots back into Ocumare with a loss of a third of their force. Believing his hopes are dashed, the Liberator goes aboard the armed brig Indio Libre that same evening and sails away toward Bonaire, abandoning his followers.

The next day, command is offered to Gregor MacGregor—a tough Scottish mercenary, formerly a captain in the British Army and a veteran of Miranda's campaign—who instantly marches toward the Aragua Valley, skirmishing with royalist forces until he chances upon a patriot cavalry detachment under Col. Leonardo Infante, part of Pedro Zaraza's larger guerrilla band.

EARLY AUGUST 1816. In Brazil, the Portuguese avail themselves of the collapse of royalist rule and the fratricidal rifts between republicans in Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay to launch an offensive—allegedly aimed at restoring peace throughout the region but actually intended to extend their own western borders. The 52-year-old lieutenant general Carlos Frederico Lecor, Barão de Laguna and Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Torre e Espada, launches a two-pronged offensive by marching southwest from Río Grande do Sul along the coast with his main body, while a second army penetrates westward from Pôrto Alegre toward the headwaters of the Uruguay River. The invaders' total strength is some 10,000 troops, half of them Portuguese regulars.

AUGUST 10, 1816. MacGregor's March. Col. Juan Nepomuceno Quero's loyalist division overtakes MacGregor's smaller insurgent company at Quebrada Honda (Venezuela), only to be thrashed. This victory allows the Scottish mercenary to continue his progression, being reinforced at San Diego de Cabrutica by an additional 300–400 men under Zaraza, plus José Tadeo Monagas's guerrillas.

This increased strength enables MacGregor to seize Barcelona, while 27-year-old José Antonio Anzoátegui occupies the nearby port of Píritu. At this point, General Piar's division joins MacGregor, and together they sally and defeat Morales's 3,000 loyalists at El Juncal, scarcely a tenth of the attackers surviving this engagement.

AUGUST 16, 1816. Bolívar returns to Güiria on the Gulf of Paria in eastern Venezuela, only to have Mariño and Bermúdez disavow his authority because of his unseemly flight from Ocumare. Chased down to the beach by the latter, who is brandishing a sword, the Liberator is compelled to sail away for Haiti.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1816. Dissatisfied with the Argentine government's lack of resistance to the Portuguese invasion of the Banda Oriental (modern Uruguay), the 50-year-old rural leader Col. Juan Francisco Borges of Santiago del Estero revolts against Pueyrredón's month-old republican administration in Buenos Aires. This uprising is dispersed within four days by the arrival of his relative, Gov. Bernabé Aráoz of neighboring Tucumán, with a column of troopers.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1816. Royalist forces recuperate Janitzio Island in Lake Pátzcuaro (Michoacán, Mexico).

SEPTEMBER 18, 1816. Lecor's Brazilian army occupies Maldonado (Uruguay) with little opposition.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1816. After his raid into the Pacific, Brown reaches Antigua (British West Indies) with only 53 men remaining aboard his Argentine privateer Hércules, which is auctioned off. Brown then travels to Britain for more than a year, returning to the River Plate by November 1818.

EARLY OCTOBER 1816. Piar marches out of Barcelona (Venezuela) with 1,500 men to cross the Orinoco River and subdue Guayana.

OCTOBER 3, 1816. The 23-man schooner of American mercenary Isaiah Homer—armed with a Colombian privateering commission—is brought into Santiago de Cuba as a prize by the corsair José Cepeda.

OCTOBER 5, 1816. San Borja. Two days previously, the patriot and Guaraní Indian chief of the Misiones district, Andrés "Andresito" Guacararí, with his 2,000 Uruguayan followers, has besieged 200 Brazilian invaders under Brig. Gen. (and military engineer) Francisco das Chagas Santos inside San Borja, opposite Santo Tomé at the headwaters of the Uruguay River. When advised that the Portuguese lieutenant colonel José de Abreu is approaching with a 600-man relief column, Andresito detaches 800 riders to contain it, while still maintaining his siege. However, the Uruguayan militia are unable to check the Brazilians' advance, and Abreu kills 500 of Andresito's followers and scatters the remainder of his forces.

OCTOBER 19, 1816. Portuguese brigadier general Mena Barreto's 500 men, with two fieldpieces, ambush 600 Uruguayan militiamen under Verdún on the eastern shores of Ibiracahy Creek, killing 150 and scattering the rest.

OCTOBER 27, 1816. Carumbé. With 500 foot soldiers and 700 riders, the Uruguayan leader Artigas makes a stand atop Carumbé Hill, west-northwest of the border town of Santana do Livramento, against 800 Portuguese invaders under 39-year-old acting brigadier general Joaquim Antônio de Oliveira Alvares (originally a naval officer and graduate of Coimbra University). The patriots are soundly defeated, Artigas losing approximately half his men during this battle.

NOVEMBER 1816. The Mexican guerrilla leader Guerrero is driven back in a skirmish in Los Naranjos Canyon by the royalist Carlos Moya.

NOVEMBER 7, 1816. Royalist forces reconquer Fort Monte Blanco, next to Córdoba (Mexico).

NOVEMBER 14, 1816. In northern Argentina, a 3,000-man royalist army presses southward under the veteran 46-year-old Spanish general José de la Serna e Hinojosa, and its vanguard under Maj. Guillermo Marquiegui surprises 600 revolutionary troops under Lt. Col. José Fernández Campero at Yavi on November 15. Having seized the Argentine mounts with their opening charge, the royalists then gain an easy victory when they storm this town from two directions, capturing Fernández Campero along with half of his command.

NOVEMBER 19, 1816. India Muerta. In an unavailing attempt to check the Brazilian invasion of Uruguay, the 32-year-old patriot general Fructuoso Rivera's 1,000 followers attack Portuguese brigadier general Pinto de Araújo's 900-man column on the western shores of India Muerta Creek, suffering a resounding defeat. Coupled with their other setbacks, this reversal prompts the Uruguayans to request aid from their political rivals in Buenos Aires.

NOVEMBER 25, 1816. In Mexico, the royalists recover Mezcala Island in Lake Chapala from the insurgents.

DECEMBER 1816. Morillo's regular army reenters Venezuela to try to reassert the royalists' increasingly shaky hold over that country.

DECEMBER 10, 1816. Mexican Royalists Reoccupy Fort Cuiristarán. On this day, Colonel Borges once more enters the town of Santiago del Estero (Argentina) in rebellion against Pueyrredón's government in Buenos Aires. He is repressed when a detachment under Colonel Lamadrid from Belgrano's Ejército del Norte or "Northern Army" surprises Borges's followers at Pitambalá on December 26, defeating them and executing their leader on December 31.

DECEMBER 28, 1816. Recalled from Haiti, Bolívar returns to Margarita Island in eastern Venezuela to find that its Spanish garrison has abandoned Pampatar, and General Arismendi has proceeded to the mainland with 300 troops. Three days later, the Liberator enters Barcelona to a warm reception.

LATE 1816. The Argentine privateer Potosí, commanded by an English mercenary named John Chase, captures the Mexican merchant frigate Ciencia off northern Cuba.

JANUARY 3, 1817. The Portuguese colonel Abreu, with 600 men and two fieldpieces, surprises the Uruguayan leader Artigas with his 400 followers atop a hill north of the Arapey River (60 miles east of Belén), killing 80 patriots while scattering the rest.

JANUARY 4, 1817. Catalán Creek. This morning, after a nocturnal approach, an Uruguayan army under General Latorre attacks 3,000 Portuguese troops and 11 fieldpieces under Lt. Gen. Luís Telles da Silva Caminha e Menezes, 5th Marquês de Alegrete and governor of Brazil's Rio Grande do Sul Province, on the western banks of Catalán Creek at the headwaters of the Guareim River. A brutal, six-hour engagement erupts, during which the attackers suffer 900 killed and 100 wounded before retiring. Portuguese losses are 230 dead.

Alegrete remains in place after this victory and detaches flying columns to exterminate the Spanish towns that have been established in this disputed territory: La Cruz, Yapeyú, Santo Ángel de la Guarda, Santo Tomé, Concepción, Santa María, and Mártires. It is estimated that more than 3,900 people are slaughtered during this campaign.

JANUARY 4, 1817. The llanero guerrilla chieftain Ramón Nonato Pérez leads a descent upon de la Calzada's advancing royalist contingent at Guasdalito (Venezuela), only to be bloodily repulsed.

JANUARY 5, 1817. Bolívar and Arismendi, advancing out of Barcelona (Venezuela) with only 700 men, are repulsed by the loyalist garrison at Clarines.

JANUARY 6, 1817. Royalist forces under the wealthy merchant from Salta, Pedro Antonio de Olañeta, occupy Jujuy in northern Argentina without opposition, but they become bogged down in this district by gaucho guerrilla warfare.

JANUARY 7, 1817. The insurgent garrison holding Fort San Pedro Cópore, outside Jungapeo (in the modern state of Michoacán, Mexico), surrenders to the royalists.

JANUARY 18, 1817. After six months of preparation and psychological warfare—called the guerra de zapa or “sapper’s war”—the revolutionary general José de San Martín’s advance units quit his base at El Plumerillo (Argentina), followed the next day from nearby Mendoza by his small yet well-trained expedition, intending to free Chile from Spanish rule. His 4,000-man “Army of the Andes,” plus more than 1,000 militiamen and auxiliaries, can manufacture their own armaments and ammunition and are accompanied by such prominent Chilean refugees as Bernardo O’Higgins to facilitate their reception. Six Andean passes have already been surveyed by military engineers, and San Martín strikes out along the Los Patos route with his main body to descend into the Putaendo Valley in Aconcagua Province.

This same day in Venezuela, Piar launches an unsuccessful assault against the loyalist stronghold of Angostura, being repulsed and proceeding instead to occupy the rich Capuchin missions on the Caroní River.

JANUARY 19, 1817. Mariño attacks the loyalist garrison of Cumaná in eastern Venezuela, only to be repulsed and to retreat first to Cautaro, then into Cumanacoa.

José de San Martín in 1818, by José Gil de Castro. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

In northern Uruguay, the patriot leader Andresito’s 500 followers are ambushed on the banks of the Aguapey River by 600 Portuguese troops with five fieldpieces under Brigadier General Chagas and are totally routed.

JANUARY 20, 1817. The Portuguese lieutenant general Lecor occupies Montevideo with his 8,000-man army—spearheaded by his Voluntários Reais de El Rei or “Royal Volunteers of the King” Division—while Uruguay’s defeated patriots can do little more than harass detached foraging parties sent out into the surrounding countryside. Soon after, the port of Colonia del Sacramento also surrenders to the Portuguese without a struggle, while several of patriot leader Artigas’s lieutenants either take service with his political rivals in Argentina or are captured by the Portuguese occupiers.

This same day of January 20, the Mexican insurgent Mier y Terán surrenders to royalist forces at Cerro Colorado, near Tehuacán.

José de San Martín

José Francisco de San Martín y Matorras was born on February 25, 1778, at the Jesuit-run Yapeyú outpost in the Misiones district of Argentina. He was the youngest of five children of that region's Spanish lieutenant governor. At the age of three, his family moved to Buenos Aires and then embarked on December 6, 1783, for Spain. Three years later, young José Francisco was enrolled in the Royal Seminary for Nobles in Madrid and studied later in Málaga. At the age of 11, he was entered as a cadet in the books of the Murcia Regiment and saw his first action a few years later in North Africa. After Spain declared war against Great Britain in October 1796, he was promoted to sub-lieutenant the next year and fought outside Gibraltar.

San Martín first gained distinction after France seized the Spanish throne in spring of 1808. As a captain in the Borbón Regiment, he fought so bravely on July 19 at the Battle of Bailén that he was rewarded with a gold medal and promotion to lieutenant colonel. He nonetheless languished in that rank, so he resigned his Spanish commission and departed for London on September 14, 1811, to join the struggle to set Spanish America free. While in the British capital, he met compatriots and future military colleagues such as José Matías Zapiola and Carlos María de Alvear.

All three sailed together in January 1812 for Argentina aboard the English frigate George Canning. Upon reaching Buenos Aires, San Martín's rank of lieutenant colonel was recognized by the revolutionary Triumvirate. On March 16, he was ordered to raise a regiment to help defend the banks of the Paraná. He also took part in the Triumvirate's removal on October 8, and a month later he married 15-year-old Remedios de Escalada. Early the next year he won a minor victory at San Lorenzo, then succeeded Belgrano in command of the "Army of the North" in January 1814 and was appointed governor of Cuyo.

Yet San Martín's greatness would come from leading an army across the Andes. As early as 1800, the British general Thomas Maitland (see "March 1798" entry in "Haitian Revolution") had proposed just such a strategy. After gathering 7,000 troops at Mendoza, San Martín's army struck across the mountains to free Chile from Spanish domination, in concert with local allies. Both forces would then invade Peru out of the south to topple the viceroy. San Martín spent two years in meticulous preparation for this venture.

He and his "Army of the Andes" won a string of victories over the next four years, setting half of the continent free. Yet San Martín was disappointed by the bickering after independence was achieved, so he resigned his titles. Saddened by the death of his wife on August 3, 1823, he set sail the next February with his seven-year-old daughter, Mercedes Tomasa, for Europe. San Martín lived in France for the rest of his days, dying there on August 17, 1850.

JANUARY 25, 1817. A flotilla of insurgent privateers—mostly American mercenaries under Thomas Taylor, bearing an Argentine commission—disembark to ransack the town of Fajardo on eastern Puerto Rico; they are expelled some time later by district militiamen, with loss of life on both sides. The island governor Salvador Meléndez is subsequently obliged to arrange a prisoner exchange with the blockaders on February 12.

JANUARY 28, 1817. Mucuritas. After reuniting with de la Calzada, royalist general de la Torre is marching northeast along the south bank of the Apure River (Venezuela) toward Nutrias with 1,500 infantrymen in three columns, screened by 800 irregular riders on his flanks under Remigio Ramos. At 9:00 a.m. this morning, the royalist force is surprised to find 1,300 llanero lancers barring their path at Mucuritas under the 26-year-old patriot chieftain José Antonio Páez.

Despite having no infantry or artillery—and precious few firearms—Páez scatters the loyalist cavalry with his opening charge, then sets the grassland ablaze around the loyalist infantry. Over the next several hours, de la Torre struggles to retreat three miles through blinding smoke to Frío Ford on the Apure, while enduring 14 patriot charges. By 4:00 p.m., Páez's riders draw off, having inflicted numerous casualties and captured 300 packhorses. The next day, Morillo's main Spanish army overtakes de la Torre, and the llaneros disappear.

FEBRUARY 8, 1817. Siege of Barcelona. This morning, loyalist militia generals Pascual Real and Morales attack Bolívar's 600-man garrison inside Barcelona (Venezuela) with 4,500 followers. The town is occupied without opposition, the Liberator preferring to hold out in its fortified San Francisco Convent while awaiting relief from Mariño. At nightfall, the attackers withdraw to El Pilar, and due to this retirement, patriot reinforcements are able to join Bolívar three days later.

Shortly thereafter, a small Spanish squadron seizes Barcelona's harbor castle, only to be dispossessed by an insurgent counterattack. The loyalists thereupon withdraw, both Real and Morales being deprived of their commands for this failure.

FEBRUARY 9, 1817. Royalist forces wrest San Juan Coscomatepec (state of Veracruz, Mexico) from the insurgents.

FEBRUARY 12, 1817. Chacabuco. After swiftly traversing Los Patos and Uspallata passes, San Martín's insurgent "Army of the Andes" has already defeated unwary Spanish outposts at Salala, Copiapó, and Vega del Campeo (Chile). After reuniting at San Felipe, they then encounter advance elements of the 33-year-old Spanish brigadier general Rafael Maroto's 2,500 royalists on February 11, who are in the process of occupying the hills north of Chacabuco with five fieldpieces to block the road leading into the Chilean capital of Santiago. The defenders' strength consists of the Valdivia Infantry Battalion under Maroto, the Talavera de la Reina Infantry Battalion under Maj. (acting lieutenant colonel) Miguel Marqueli, the Chiloé Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Elorreaga, two companies of the Abascal Carabineers under Lieutenant Colonel Quintanilla, and one company of the Concordia Hussars under Lieutenant Colonel Bananco.

At 2:00 a.m. on February 12, the 3,600-man rebel army advances from Manantiales in two divisions. O'Higgins is to approach on the left to distract the enemy with the fusilier companies of the 7th Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Crámer and 8th Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Conde, three squadrons of Argentine horse grenadiers under 42-year-old colonel José Matías Zapiola, and two cannon. Meanwhile, the 33-year-old Argentine brigadier general Miguel Estanislao Soler is to circle behind Maroto on the right to assault the Spaniards from the rear with the 11th Infantry Battalion under the 36-year-old colonel Juan Gualberto Gregorio de las Heras de la Gacha, the Andean Chasseur Regiment of 24-year-old lieutenant colonel Rudecindo Alvarado, one squadron of horse grenadiers under 24-year-old lieutenant colonel Mariano Pascual Necochea, plus seven guns under Captain Frutos.

Instead, O'Higgins rashly charges without waiting for Soler, nevertheless—supported by effective cavalry charges from Zapiola and Necochea—he destroys the royalist squadrons. When Soler finally attacks from the flank, Maroto's army is routed, suffering 600 fatalities before streaming off in defeat, leaving behind its artillery, ammunition train, 1,000 muskets, and 550 prisoners. Patriot casualties are 11 killed and 110 wounded. Two days later, San Martín enters Santiago without any further opposition from the 46-year-old royal governor and field marshal

Battle of Chacabuco.

San Martín watching his troops march into the Battle of Chacabuco. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

Francisco Casimiro Marcó del Pont, who is captured while attempting to flee to Valparaíso. O'Higgins is installed to govern Chile.

FEBRUARY 17, 1817. Huatusco (Mexico) is reconquered by royalists.

FEBRUARY 26, 1817. Unaware of the recent patriot conquest of Chile, the 220-ton Spanish brigantine Aguila enters Valparaíso, where it is seized by insurgent authorities to be converted into a warship. A crew of 43 men—25 of them being foreigners—and 16 guns are installed under Irish-born lieutenant Raymond Morris, setting sail by March 17 to reconnoiter Osorio's strength in the Juan Fernández Islands. This brigantine will later be renamed the Pueyrredón.

MARCH 1, 1817. Patriot colonel Manuel Eduardo Arias surprises the 130-man, seven-gun royalist garrisson under La Roza at Humahuaca in northern Argentina, via a descent with 150 gauchos on a rainy night. The defenders suffer 24 killed and 92 captured before Arias disappears into the mountains.

MARCH 3, 1817. Patriot colonel Lamadrid departs Tucumán with 250 cavalymen, 150 infantrymen on mules, and two small fieldpieces to bedevil the royalist army occupying northern Argentina. On March 15, he obliges the 294-man garrison of Tarifa to surrender, then evades royalist columns until June 12, when his troops are ambushed and badly defeated, compelling him to retreat.

MARCH 6, 1817. Pernambuco Rebellion. At the port of Olinda (Brazil), Gov. Caetano Pinto de Miranda Montenegro orders the arrest at dawn of several local conspirators, who have been plotting to overthrow Portuguese rule in favor of Brazilian independence. One of them—a sexagenarian militia veteran named José de Barros Lima—kills the officer sent to detain him, then leads an immediate uprising that drives Governor Pinto into hiding within the Brum harbor castle.

Some 800 rebels (a mixed brigade of white and mulatto militiamen, plus half an artillery regiment) quickly release their captive leaders, seize the bridges leading off Santo Antônio Island, and overrun Pernambuco's capital of Recife by sunrise of March 7. Cut off, Pinto arranges safe passage for himself to Rio de Janeiro five days later—only to be incarcerated upon his arrival on Cobras Island within Guanabara Bay at King João VI's behest for having reached an accommodation with the rebels. The monarch then begins raising an army to reconquer his rebellious northern province.

MARCH 10, 1817. The fortified pass of Mesa de los Caballos, near San Felipe (state of Guanajuato, Mexico), is recuperated from the insurgents.

MARCH 29, 1817. The American mercenary Thomas Taylor, with his corvette the Zephyr and more than a dozen other privateers, arrives bearing Argentine commissions. The group attempts a dawn disembarkation in Guantánamo Bay (Cuba), only to be repelled.

LATE MARCH 1817. The Conde dos Arcos, Portuguese governor of Bahia (Brazil), sends two corvettes and a schooner to begin a blockade of the rebel city of Recife. Adm. Rodrigo Lobo follows on April 2 with more warships, and a month later four Portuguese regiments under Luiz do Rego (Pernambuco's new governor designate, recently arrived from Lisbon) set off as well for this mutinous province.

APRIL 3, 1817. With San Martín absent in Argentina, his subordinate colonel Juan Gregorio de las Heras has led a 1,300-man army called the División del Sur or "Southern Division" in a campaign to eliminate the last royalist stronghold in Chile: 1,000 men under Col. José Ordóñez Sánchez, who are occupying the coastal keep of Talcahuano on the narrow Tumbes Peninsula.

On April 3, las Heras reaches Curapaligüe Hacienda, 10 miles east of Concepción. At 1:30 a.m. on April 5, royalist sargento mayor José Campillo slips out of Talcahuano with 600 infantrymen, 109 cavalrymen, and two fieldpieces to surprise the sleeping insurgents. His plan miscarries in the darkness; only 4 patriots are killed and 7 wounded, while Campillo retires with similar casualties. Las Heras follows up the royalists' retreat and this same day occupies deserted Concepción, where he pauses to await an additional 800 Chilean troops and two fieldpieces under O'Higgins.

APRIL 5, 1817. Loyalist colonel Juan Aldama occupies the town of Barcelona (Venezuela) without opposition. Two days later he overwhelms its citadel—the fortified Convent of San Francisco—slaughtering every patriot inside.

APRIL 8, 1817. San Félix. Learning that the royalist governor of Angostura (Venezuela), Nicolás María Cerruti, and militia commander Miguel de la Torre have gone down the Orinoco with most of its garrison, Piar establishes his headquarters at San Félix and waits for this enemy to come to him.

De la Torre does so three days later, appearing on the afternoon of April 11 with 1,350 royalist infantrymen and 150 cavalrymen (mostly dismounted). Piar commands 700 patriot fusiliers, 900 cavalrymen (300 afoot), plus 200 native archers. At 4:00 p.m., the loyalists advance in three columns, firing volleys. Anzoátegui and Pedro León Torres hold the patriot center, while Piar circles behind these assault columns with a company of mounted carabinieri and Pedro Hernández's llaneros worry the Spaniards' flanks. After a half hour, de la Torre's ranks break and head for the hills two miles away; they are pitilessly hunted down until nightfall and suffer 593 deaths and 497 captured—of whom 160 (all peninsular Spaniards) are subsequently executed by decapitation, including Cerruti. De la Torre is among the 260 survivors to escape from the battlefield. Patriot losses total 31 killed and 65 injured.

APRIL 13, 1817. At San Antonio (Venezuela), Jacinto Perera's 300-man royalist garrison repels repeated attacks by 500 llanero lancers under Páez, who retires after suffering 132 men killed.

This same day, royalist general de la Serna departs Jujuy (northern Argentina) with 2,500 men, occupying Salta two days later. However, after two and a half weeks of occupation, he retires north on May 4 because of San Martín's invasion of Chile and other local patriot successes. Jujuy, too, is abandoned by May 21.

APRIL 15, 1817. Mina's Intervention. After a brief storm in the Gulf of Mexico, the 27-year-old Spanish adventurer Francisco Javier Mina y Larrea disembarks unopposed at Soto la Marina (modern state of Veracruz) with 500 foreign mercenaries under Henry Perry (see “August 15, 1813” entry) to bolster the Mexican insurgency’s flagging fortunes. An avowed anti-monarchist, Mina has recruited Spanish, Italian, English, and American followers during a cruise from Liverpool to Norfolk (Virginia), Baltimore, Saint Thomas in the Virgin Islands, Port-au-Prince, Galveston, and New Orleans, sailing aboard the hired American ships Cleopatra, Neptuno, and Congreso Mexicano. He erects a fort on the eastern side of Soto la Marina’s plaza, armed with artillery from his ships.

On May 17, the Spanish frigate Sabina, plus the schooners Belona and Proserpina, appear from Veracruz under Commo. Francisco Berenguer and sink one of Mina’s ships, drive another aground, and force the third to flee. Cut off from the sea, the intruder decides to strike inland one week later with 300 men to join forces with other insurgents, leaving behind a 200-man garrison under Maj. José Sardá.

APRIL 16, 1817. Portuguese admiral Lobo calls upon the Brazilian insurgents holding Recife (Pernambuco Province) to surrender or face summary execution, but they refuse to capitulate, so he tightens his blockade.

APRIL 23, 1817. De la Torre returns into Angostura (Venezuela) with 300 royalists following his devastating defeat at San Félix. He is closely pursued by Piar, who—heartened by this recent victory—attempts to storm Angostura again at 2:00 a.m. on April 25, only to once more be repelled after a stiff four-hour encounter, during which his men suffer 85 casualties. The next day, a Spanish river squadron appears, so Piar institutes a loose siege.

MAY 1, 1817. Colonel Ordóñez’s royalist garrison at Talcahuano (Chile) is reinforced by four ships bearing 1,600 troops. The latter are men who have fled Valparaíso following San Martín’s victory at Chacabuco, only to be turned back upon reaching Callao by the Peruvian viceroy.

MAY 5, 1817. Gavilán. Determined to defeat las Heras’s 1,300-man Argentine army before O’Higgins can join with his Chilean forces (see “April 3, 1817” entry), Ordóñez sorties from Talcahuano to assault the rebel redoubt on Gavilán Hill, northwest of Concepción. The royalists intend to attack in twin columns: 600 men with two fieldpieces coming down Penco Road under Col. Antonio Morgado, while Ordóñez drives from Chepe with another 800 men and three guns.

Action begins at 6:45 a.m., when nine royalist gunboats open fire upon the insurgents within Concepción. Ordóñez appears next and immediately launches his assault against las Heras’s left, without waiting for Morgado—who arrives an hour and a half late. By this time, Ordóñez’s column has been decimated in vainly storming the rebels’ lines, and this same fate befalls Morgado. The royalists are irretrievably broken when two companies of Chilean insurgents appear upon the battlefield, heralding the imminent arrival of O’Higgins’s army. Ordóñez retreats behind his Talcahuano trenches, having lost 118 killed, 80 wounded, 4 guns, and 200 muskets in this sally. Patriot casualties are 6 dead and 62 injured. O’Higgins arrives by nightfall to assume command of the siege operations against Talcahuano.

MAY 15, 1817. Argentine lieutenant colonel Ramón Freyre quits the insurgent siege at Concepción (Chile) with 300 men to capture tiny isolated royalist keeps south of the Bío Bío River, thus preventing refreshments from reaching the beleaguered garrison within Talcahuano. He returns on July 11, having succeeded in his sweep.

MAY 17, 1817. The Brazilian insurgent leader Domingos José Martins, having marched south from his rebel stronghold at Recife (capital of Pernambuco Province), is defeated and captured at Serinhão by 800 loyalist militiamen from Bahia, who call themselves “Scipios” after the famous Roman general.

MAY 19, 1817. The Brazilian rebel chieftain Domingos Teotônio Jorge evacuates Recife with two infantry regiments and straggles inland while Portuguese admiral Lobo reoccupies the port. The insurgents eventually disband at Engenho Paulista, while many are hunted down and executed over the next few months.

MAY 30, 1817. The 34-year-old, Curaçao-born, patriot commodore Philippus Ludovicus Brion—in Spanish, Felipe Luis Brion—sets sail east from Margarita Island (Venezuela) with the brigs Terror, Tártaro, América Libre, Conquistador, and Indio Libre, plus the schooners Diana (under the French privateer Vincent Dubouille), Guayaneja, and Conejo. Brion’s strategic objectives are to travel up the Orinoco and wrest control of this river from the royalists.

JUNE 8, 1817. After seizing 700 horses at Cojo Hacienda, fording the Tamesí River, and emerging into the Valle del Maíz in central Mexico, the intruder Mina defeats a force of 152 royalists under Captain Villaseñor.

JUNE 11, 1817. The royalist commander Arredondo arrives from Veracruz with 666 foot soldiers, 850 riders, and 109 gunners to besiege Mina's garrison, remaining under Major Sardá at Soto la Marina, compelling its 93 men to surrender five days later. The prisoners are conducted into captivity at San Juan de Ulúa and the fortress at Perote near Jalapa.

JUNE 15, 1817. While continuing his march toward San Luis Potosí (Mexico), the adventurer Mina defeats 2,000 royalists drawn up at Peotillos Hacienda under Col. Benito Armiñán.

JUNE 19, 1817. Mina's small army occupies Real de Pinos (modern state of Zacatecas, Mexico), with a surprise night attack.

JUNE 22, 1817. Mina links up with some Mexican insurgents, reaching Fort Sombrero in the Comanja Range (modern state of Guanajuato) two days later to join forces with the guerrilla chieftains Pedro Moreno and Encarnación "El Pachón" Ortiz.

JUNE 29, 1817. Mina and Moreno sortie from Fort Sombrero (Mexico) with 330 followers, mauling a royalist force under Ordoñez at Ferrero Ranch on the San Juan de los Llanos Hacienda, killing this commander and capturing 152 of his men.

JULY 7, 1817. Mina and Moreno attack the Jiral Hacienda, seizing 140,000 pesos in silver bars.

JULY 14, 1817. Margarita Counteroffensive. After being reinforced at Barcelona (Venezuela) by Aldama's division and off Cumaná in late March by an additional 2,600–2,700 regulars from Spain under Gen. José de Canterac, Morillo has detached contingents to attack minor patriot garrisons at Cariaco, Cumanacoa, and Carúpano under Cmdr. Francisco Jiménez. Taking these outposts with ease, the Spaniards fortify this coastline, then proceed against Güiría, while Morillo himself sails from Cumaná with 3,000 men aboard 22 ships under naval captain José María Chacón to personally reconquer Margarita Island, reaching its port of Guamacho by July 14.

Col. Francisco Esteban Gómez, the island's patriot commander, falls back before Morillo's subsequent progression inland, harassing his outriders. Pampatar and Porlamar are occupied without resistance on July 24 and July 31, respectively, but a royalist attack upon the inland capital of Asunción is repulsed with considerable loss. Marching to the island's northern tip, the invaders then take the port of Juan Griego by August 8. Yet they evacuate Margarita nine days afterwards because of news of Bolívar's successful patriot offensive up the Orinoco, and they return into Caracas by early September.

JULY 17, 1817. This night, de la Torre—his 2,000-man royalist garrison starving inside Angostura (Venezuela) because of the recent advance up the Orinoco by Brion's patriot flotilla—decides to evacuate this isolated outpost. Going aboard 30 boats along with 1,800 noncombatants, he retreats west to the last remaining loyalist stronghold on the river, Guayana la Vieja, arriving by the evening of July 19. That previous dawn, Angostura has been occupied by Bermúdez's jubilant land forces.

AUGUST 1, 1817. After unsuccessfully attacking León (modern state of Guanajuato, Mexico), Mina and Moreno are besieged within their Fort Sombrero base camp by 3,500 royalists under mariscal de campo or "field marshal" Pascual Liñán. They storm Fort Sombrero's defenses on August 4, only to be repelled; then the insurgents fail to cut their way out on August 7.

The next night, Mina and Moreno slip out with part of their small army, attempting to rescue their remaining colleagues by attacking Liñán's positions from the rear on August 12. When this fails, Mina and Moreno withdraw five days later to install themselves at Remedios Fort near Pénjamo, their beleaguered associates surrendering to the royalists by August 19.

AUGUST 2, 1817. Cabrián. After vainly awaiting the arrival of a Spanish relief force, the 2,600 desperate royalists crowded into Guayana la Vieja (Venezuela) under de la Torre decide to abandon this outpost, fleeing eastward down the Orinoco and out into the open Atlantic past Brion's patriot flotilla, anchored off Cabrián. Perceiving the garrison's preparations for flight, Anzoátegui's besieging troops storm

The patriot hideout at Fort Sombrero, where Mina was besieged in August 1817. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

Guayana's palisades this same evening and are checked by de la Torre.

The next morning, the Spaniards sail aboard the flotilla of naval captain Fernando Lizarza, comprised of the 14-gun, 93-man corvette Merced (flag) of Captain Costa y Mur; the 12-gun, 98-man schooners Carmen (vice flag) of Lt. Francisco Sales de Echeverría, the 12-gun, 80-man Monteverde, the 6-gun, 42-man Dolores, the 4-gun, 87-man Pancha of José Elorriaga, the 3-gun, 84-man Isabel, the 2-gun, 34-man Guadalupe, the 2-gun, 43-man Guayanesa, and the 2-gun, 66-man Rapelo; the 10-gun, 91-man polacre Carmen of Manuel López; the 12-gun, 88-man brigantine Vigilante of F.A. Casanueva; the 6-gun, 70-man Guayro María of J. A. Pérez; the 1-gun, 34-man sloop Reina Luisa of Commander Burguera; and the 6-gun, 46-man bomb vessel Malagueña of José Bonet. They are furthermore accompanied by a half-dozen gunboats, 4 large native canoes, and a dozen transports bearing an additional 930 sailors and 800 soldiers.

This royalist flotilla dashes downriver through a hail of fire from patriot encampments ashore, forming into a double column to engage Brion's squadron before Cabrián. Having a favorable wind out of the west behind him, Lizarza instantly attacks to give his consorts time to escape, but he is wounded in both legs by a patriot countersalvo. The action thereupon degenerates into a general pursuit, as darkness falls and a storm blows up. The fleeing loyalists are hunted down in numerous channels and byways, 14 of their ships and numerous smaller vessels being captured over the next three days, while 280 of their number are slain, a similar amount wounded, and 1,731 imprisoned.

De la Torre is one of the few to escape, reaching the Antillan island of Grenada by August 9 with the Merced and the polacre Carmen, before proceeding to Cumaná and La Guaira. Brion's casualties total 32 killed and 31 injured, this annihilation of royalist sympathizers ensuring Bolívar undisputed control over the entire length of the Orinoco River.

AUGUST 14, 1817. Páez makes a surprise raid against the royalist stronghold of Barinas (Venezuela) with 1,000 llanero guerrillas, seizing much valuable booty.

AUGUST 15, 1817. Some 1,000 royalists under Olañeta and Marquiegui capture Humahuaca in northern Argentina, but they endure increasing gaucho attacks as they press farther south. They finally retire toward Yavi on January 3, 1818.

AUGUST 27, 1817. Spanish lieutenant colonel Francisco Jiménez crosses the Paria Peninsula in Venezuela from the Caribe River with 800 regulars of the Clarines and Reina Isabel battalions, plus royalist guerrillas under Nacario Martínez, to capture the port of Yaguaraparo. Its patriot defenders under Col. José María Hermoso leave 250 casualties upon the field before fleeing into the surrounding hills.

Three days later, Jiménez also retakes Güiría, killing Hermoso and inflicting a further 140 casualties upon the patriots, whose survivors scatter inland or out to sea aboard the schooner Tigre.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1817. Royalist forces assault the 150-man insurgent garrison within the Chilean coastal keep of Arauco, thereby diverting O'Higgins's attention from the siege of nearby Talcahuano.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1817. To counteract the effects of Morillo's offensive (see "July 14, 1817" entry), Bolívar sends Bermúdez to reorganize the patriot units on Cumaná (Venezuela), while Monagas does the same at Barcelona.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1817. Acting on Bolívar's orders, Gen. Manuel Sedeño and Capt. Remigio Femayor arrest Piar at 4:00 a.m. at Aragua de Maturín (Venezuela) to stand trial for treason. He is executed three weeks later on October 16.

OCTOBER 10, 1817. While returning toward their base camp at Fort Remedios (near Pénjamo, central Mexico) after raiding San Luis de la Paz, Mina and Moreno are defeated in a clash at the Caja Hacienda by royalists under Col. Francisco Orrantía.

OCTOBER 16, 1817. Bolívar—who brooks no rivals—tricks his brilliant mulatto commander Piar into camp, then arrests and executes him for "insubordination."

OCTOBER 25, 1817. Mina, Moreno, and other insurgent leaders attempt to attack the royalist garrison within the Mexican city of Guanajuato with 1,400 men, but they are repulsed. Two days later, while sleeping at Venadito Ranch, the two leaders are surprised with their aides by a monarchist column under Orrantía. All are slain except Mina, who is carried into Liñán's encampment near Fort Remedios and shot on November 11 atop Bellaco Hill. (Because of this royalist triumph, the Mexican viceroy Juan Ruiz de Apodaca is rewarded from Madrid with the title "Conde de Venadito.")

NOVEMBER 27, 1817. Because of the large numbers of British veterans flocking to join the patriot cause (see "January 16, 1818" entry), London is compelled to respond to diplomatic complaints from Madrid by issuing a proclamation forbidding its subjects from taking sides in this Spanish-American dispute.

DECEMBER 2, 1817. La Hogaza. After a four-day forced march from Calvario (Venezuela), de la Torre's 900 loyalist infantrymen and 300 cavalry troopers surprise patriot general Zaraza at La Hogaza—three miles from Murianga Ford on the banks of the Manapitire—as he is resting his 1,000 riders and 1,100 foot soldiers, in anticipation of soon joining Bolívar's army at Santa María de Ipire. Despite his men's fatigue, de la Torre quickly deploys atop a hill overlooking the patriots' camp, with the 1st Castilla and 2nd Navarra Infantry battalions in his center, single squadrons of the 1st and 2nd Fernando VII Hussars on his flanks, plus another of Calabozo Lancers as his reserve. Perceiving the small numbers of their enemy, the insurgents surge forward to meet de la Torre's advance a few minutes later, only to have the patriot cavalry on their right flank suddenly break and flee before their royalist opponents.

Upon seeing this rout, the patriot infantrymen under Pedro León Torres also take to their heels, being almost completely annihilated as they attempt to escape from the battlefield. Patriot casualties are calculated at 350 men, plus a like number captured, compared to only 11 dead and 86 wounded among the loyalist ranks. Dry grass catches fire from the discharges, sparking a general conflagration that burns many of the wounded as well as destroying much matériel. Satisfied with his triumph, de la Torre returns toward Calvario and Calabozo with his royalists, leaving the shaken patriot survivors to reassemble.

DECEMBER 6, 1817. Talcahuano. After seven months of a fruitless siege, O'Higgins's 3,700 Chileo-Argentine troops assault Ordóñez's 1,700 royalists entrenched at Talcahuano (Chile). The defenders enjoy considerable advantages, having 70 cannon and several warships to protect the swampy, half-mile-wide isthmus leading out to Tumbes Peninsula.

Insurgent siege of Talcahuano.

At 2:45 a.m., las Heras assaults the royalists' easternmost bastion of El Morro with four battalions, carrying it despite heavy losses. His subsequent attempt to drive northwest and overrun Cura Hill fails, however, obliging him to retire at dawn. A diversionary attack by the insurgent lieutenant colonel Pedro Conde against San Vicente Castle, at the opposite end of this royalist line, is also repulsed with considerable casualties. Altogether, the attackers suffer 156 killed and 280 wounded; the defenders, 300 casualties. Less than one month later, O'Higgins lifts the siege.

DECEMBER 9, 1817. Royalist general Mariano Osorio quits Callao with 3,276 troops and 10 field-pieces, sailing south toward Talcahuano (Chile) aboard 10 vessels.

DECEMBER 15, 1817. Argentine colonel Montes de Oca departs Buenos Aires with 600 troops, traveling up the Uruguay River to Ibicuy to impose republican rule over that breakaway district. On Christmas Day, he is defeated at Ceballos Creek north of Gualeguaychú by the 31-year-old local leader Francisco Ramírez, then suffers a second reverse at Santa Bárbara Ranch—south of Gato Creek, near this same city—on January 4, 1818.

DECEMBER 17, 1817. Under cover of darkness, the guerrilla chief Páez probes the royalists' Castellano and San Casimiro redoubts outside San Fernando de Apure (Venezuela). When he repeats this operation the following night, however, his llaneros are ambushed at dawn of December 18 by two companies of the Unión and Barinas Infantry battalions, who inflict 100 casualties.

DECEMBER 21, 1817. The Mexican insurgent Nicolás Bravo is captured and his Fort Cópore re-occupied by royalist forces. He is transferred to Mexico City on October 9, 1818, and pardoned two years later.

JANUARY 1818. Osorio's 3,300-man royalist expedition from Peru reinforces Talcahuano (Chile), then initiates its campaign by blockading Valparaíso by sea, while the army marches north.

JANUARY 1, 1818. O'Higgins lifts his siege of Talcahuano (Chile) and retires northward from Concepción, while being harassed by royalist pursuers. A major clash occurs while the insurgents are traversing the Nuble River on January 15, and another skirmish is fought four days later, before O'Higgins passes into safety north of the Maule by January 28.

JANUARY 11, 1818. A new, 2,400-man royalist army under Olañeta surprises Huacalera in northern Argentina, fighting its way into Jujuy three days later against feeble patriot opposition. When the countryside rises against the invaders, though, the Spanish commander abandons his prize on January 16 and suffers 300 casualties while struggling back into Yavi.

JANUARY 16, 1818. The first of four English vessels—the Britain, the Esmeralda, the Dawson, and the Prince (the Indian having succumbed in an Atlantic storm)—reaches Gustavia on the Antillan island of Saint Barthélemy, bearing 800 mercenaries contracted in London by the Venezuelan agent Luis López Méndez, to serve the patriot cause as the "British Legion."

Many of these veterans balk at finding no pay or patriot representatives awaiting them, while their hired transports refuse to brave the Spanish blockade and run across to the Venezuelan mainland. Instead, amid loud complaints, the legion transfers south to Georgetown (Grenada) by February 27, from where only 150 will actually board the schooner Liberty and continue up the Orinoco River to join Bolívar. Col. Gustavus Hippisley and the bulk of the disgruntled Legionnaires will eventually follow in piecemeal fashion.

JANUARY 30, 1818. Having advanced westward from the Orinoco with his army, Bolívar joins forces with Páez at Payara to attack the Spaniards farther north at San Fernando and Calabozo in central Venezuela.

FEBRUARY 6, 1818. Calabozo. Bolívar materializes at the Apure River's Diamante Ford, just east of San Fernando in central Venezuela, with Valdés's brigade, comprised of 600 infantrymen of the Barlovento and Angostura battalions; Torres's brigade, consisting of 635 men of the 1st Barcelona and Valerosos Cazadores battalions; Monagas's brigade, made up of 353 men of the 2nd Barcelona Battalion, plus 342 troopers in three cavalry squadrons; an honor guard of 726 chasseurs and fusiliers; Sedeño's division, consisting of 310 troopers in three squadrons from Lara's brigade, plus another 294 in three squadrons from Martín's brigade; and Sánchez's brigade, comprised of 632 infantrymen of the Bajo Orinoco and Guayana battalions, as well as a squadron of 87 troopers. The patriots are furthermore accompanied by Páez's 1,000 llanero riders and 300 foot soldiers, for a combined strength of 5,200 men.

Having surprised San Fernando's 650-man royalist garrison under Col. José María Quero, Bolívar and Páez quickly throw their contingents across the river, which cuts off the city's communications on the far side. They keep its defenders bottled inside by detaching the Sánchez Brigade to begin siege preparations, while the main body speeds north toward their true objective: the city of Calabozo.

Learning of this invasion shortly thereafter, Spanish general Morillo hastens back from the northwest to bolster the Calabozo's 650-man garrison with an additional 1,800 troops, entering the city on the evening of February 10. Nevertheless, he is caught unprepared by Bolívar's appearance out of the west only two days later, 4,200 patriots advancing at dawn on February 12 to cut off the Spanish outpost lying outside the city's defenses at Trinidad Mission (also known as the Misión de Abajo or "Lower Mission"). This detachment—the Castilla Infantry Battalion, two companies of the Navarra Battalion, plus three hussar squadrons—desperately attempts to regain Calabozo but is cut off and forms a square in an open field. They are quickly overwhelmed and destroyed, suffering 320 killed and a like number captured, as opposed to 200 insurgent casualties.

Lacking a siege train, Bolívar marches his main body 10 miles northward at noon on February 13 to pasture his horses at El Rastro, hoping for Morillo to emerge from behind the city walls. The patriots' Apure Hussar Regiment under Col. Guillermo Iribarren is left to maintain watch over Calabozo. That following night at 11:00 p.m., the Spaniards nonetheless slip undetected out of the city, marching toward La Uriosa on the west bank of the Guárico River in hopes of reaching El Sombrero, 20 miles farther away on the Caracas road.

When Iribarren discovers Calabozo to be empty on the morning of February 14, he informs Bolívar, and both patriot contingents set off in pursuit. Still, Morillo's retreating columns of 1,700–1,800 troops and 7,000–8,000 royalist noncombatants are not found until 4:00 p.m. that evening, when they suffer a couple of hundred stragglers slain before taking up a defensive position at El Sombrero the next morning. The Liberator loses 100 of his own men vainly storming these royalist lines before finally allowing Morillo's army to resume its march unmolested on February 16, escaping to the northeast.

The chastened yet unbeaten Spanish force enters Comatagua by February 18 and arrives at San Sebastián de los Reyes three days afterward, where it is at last reinforced by de la Torre's and Aldama's divisions. Meanwhile, Páez—having fallen out with Bolívar over this bungled pursuit—parts company to return southward with his own followers and press the siege of San Fernando de Apure alone. The Liberator, notwithstanding this defection and his army's reduced numbers, decides to continue north toward Caracas.

FEBRUARY 12, 1818. O'Higgins and San Martín proclaim the independence of Chile, then sally from Santiago to engage Osorio's royalist army approaching from the south.

MARCH 6, 1818. The insurgent stronghold of Fort Jaujilla (located on an island in Zacapu Lake, central Mexico), surrenders to the royalists.

MARCH 14, 1818. Maracay. At dawn, a large detachment from Bolívar's army—1,200 cavalrymen and 370 infantrymen delegated to occupy the town of Maracay (Venezuela)—is surprised by a sudden cavalry charge by two Spanish squadrons of Unión Dragoons and one of Guías del General. The Spaniards immediately fight their way into this town's main square.

Although initially contained by the patriots' Angostura Infantry Battalion and Monagas's cavalry, these Spanish units are quickly joined by royalist chasseurs under Col. Matías Escuté and the Barinas Infantry Battalion under Col. Juan Tello. It soon becomes apparent that this attack is part of a much larger Spanish counteroffensive, spearheaded by General Morales's entire division, so the patriots hastily abandon Maracay for La Victoria, arriving this evening through torrential rains after suffering 80 casualties and 220 missing.

MARCH 14, 1818. Royalist commander Francisco Jiménez, after a swift march westward from Güiría in eastern Venezuela, falls upon the 400 patriots who have recently reoccupied Cariaco under Mariño. The latter are ejected with heavy losses, leaving behind 96 dead and many wounded, although this action also claims Jiménez's life.

MARCH 15, 1818. La Puerta (or Semen Valley). Belatedly realizing that royalist columns under Morillo, Morales, and de la Torre are now closing in from three different directions upon his 2,200 remaining troops, Bolívar hastily retraces his route southward, only to be overtaken and compelled to make a stand near La Puerta in Semen Valley. Action commences at 6:00 a.m. on March 16, when the royalist vanguard of 1,000 infantrymen and 500 cavalrymen under Morales charges into battle. After three hours of confused fighting, Morillo's main body arrives from six miles away, and 1,500 of his Spanish infantrymen immediately join the fighting. (De la Torre's 900 troops are too distant as yet to become engaged.) The insurgent lines begin to waver, and they finally break, leading to a crushing defeat for its infantry. Patriot losses are estimated at 300 killed, 400 wounded, and 350 captured, compared to 500–600 royalist casualties. A crestfallen Bolívar eventually leaves the field at noon. His Spanish counterpart, Morillo, is badly wounded in the final charge, being transfixed by a lance—which doctors will eventually have to pull out through his back.

Correa temporarily assumes command of the royalist forces and continues their pursuit of the fleeing insurgents as far as San Juan de los Morros, inflicting heavy punishment. In addition to most of his infantry and war matériel, the Liberator and his staff also lose all their personal papers, and generals Urdaneta, Valdés, Torres, and Anzoátegui suffer body wounds. Retreating by way of Ortiz and El Rastro, the defeated patriot survivors reenter Calabozo four days later.

MARCH 19, 1818. Cancha Rayada. At dawn, San Martín and O'Higgins—having learned at Quechereguas (Chile) that Osorio's and Ordóñez's 4,600 royalists with 14 cannon are advancing from Camarico toward Talca—make a forced march down Tres Montes Road with 8,000 Argentino-Chilean troops and 33 guns to intercept. The insurgents arrive too late this afternoon to prevent the invaders from gaining Talca, however, so they deploy a mile and a half farther northeast, at Cancha Rayada.

Unexpectedly confronted with this superior force, Ordóñez suggests to Osorio that the royalists launch a surprise nocturnal assault, when their lesser numbers will not be such a handicap. The latter agrees, and at 9:00 p.m. on this same evening, Ordóñez leads three columns toward the revolutionaries' lines, which are in the process of repositioning for the night. This attack hits O'Higgins's Chilean contingent, creating widespread panic among their ranks, only Colonel Alvarado's Andean chasseurs reaching las Heras's waiting Argentine division intact. The 3rd Chilean Battalion disintegrates altogether, O'Higgins is wounded in an elbow, and insurgent units fire wildly upon each other in the darkness. By midnight, the disconcerted rebels are fleeing north in jumbled profusion, having lost 120 killed, 26 artillery pieces, and hundreds of deserters or prisoners. Royalist casualties are approximately 300, and five days later, Osorio resumes his march upon the capital of Santiago.

MARCH 25, 1818. Saucecito. In northeastern Argentina, the 2,400-man army of Buenos Aires general Marcos Balcarce is attacked by a slightly smaller local force under rival republican leader Ramírez. The latter combines a frontal assault with a dual enveloping movement, inflicting 1,000 losses on Balcarce and obliging him to depart hastily down the Uruguay River aboard his flotilla.

MARCH 26, 1818. Ortiz. Having been hastily reinforced by Sedeño's (or Cedeño's) and Páez's divisions following his stinging La Puerta defeat, Bolívar unexpectedly turns upon his royalist pursuers with 2,660 troops. At dawn on the 26th, he catches de la Torre resting his 1,100 weary infantrymen—mostly of the Unión and Castilla battalions under lieutenant colonels Manuel Bausá and Tomás García—at Ortiz (Venezuela), having dispersed another 1,400 to forage throughout its neighboring districts.

Both sides skirmish warily for possession of the La Cuesta heights until 5:00 p.m., when the patriots eventually retire after suffering 12 killed and 30 injured, as opposed to 37 dead and 50 wounded among the royalists. The latter immediately commence retiring northward, before their more numerous opponents should return.

APRIL 3, 1818. At San Carlos, in northeastern Corrientes Province (Uruguay), the Portuguese general Chagas inflicts another defeat upon patriot Indian leader Andresito.

APRIL 5, 1818. Maipú. Quickly regrouping after his Cancha Rayada setback (see “March 19, 1818” entry), San Martín sallies from Santiago on April 1 with 5,300 Chileo-Argentine troops. He takes up position six miles south of the capital atop Blanca Hill to intercept Osorio’s approaching royalists with Colonel las Heras’s division, comprised of the colo-nel’s own 11th Infantry Battalion under his subordinate Maj. Ramón Guerrero, the Coquimbo Chasseurs under Maj. Isaac Thompson, the Patria Infantry Battalion of Lt. Col. José Antonio Bustamante, four squadrons of horse grenadiers under Colonel Zapiola, plus eight guns under the 28-year-old former naval officer, the acting lieutenant colonel Manuel Blanco Encalada y Melián.

Colonel Alvarado’s division consists of the 2nd Chilean Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. José Bernardo Cáceres Gutiérrez de Palacios, the all-black 8th “Los Andes” Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. Enrique Martínez, the Andean Infantry Chasseurs of Major Sequeira, four squadrons of “Los Andes” Chasseurs under Major Arellano, and nine artillery pieces under Lt. Col. José M. Borgoño. Col. Hilarión de la Quintana’s reserve division is made up of the 1st Chilean Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Rivera, the 3rd “Los Andes” Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Conde, two squadrons of “San Martín’s Escort” under Colonel Freyre, plus four cannon under Lieutenant Colonel Plaza.

Osorio hopes to capture Valparaíso first, but after reaching Lo Espejo Hacienda on April 4, he discovers his insurgent enemy to be very close. He thus prepares his 4,900 royalist troops to give battle the next day. Colonel Ordóñez's 1st Brigade consists of the Concepción Infantry Battalion under Major Navia, the "Infante don Carlos" Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel de la Torre, a company of Royal Sappers under Captain Casacana, the "Del Rey" Lancers of Lt. Col. J. Rodríguez, the Arequipa Dragoons under Lt. Col. A. Rodríguez, plus four guns. Col. Lorenzo Morla's 2nd Brigade is comprised of the Arequipa Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. José Ramón Rodil, Colonel Morla's own 2nd Burgos Infantry Battalion, a Chillán cavalry squadron under Lieutenant Colonel Palma, the second squadron of the Frontera Dragoons under Colonel Morgado, as well as four artillery pieces. Col. Joaquín Primo de Rivera's 3rd or Reserve Brigade is made up of mixed grenadier and cazador companies from the Burgos, Concepción, Infante, and Arequipa battalions, plus four cannon.

Patriot infantry charge into the Battle of Maipú. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

After both armies march into position at 10:30 a.m. near Maipó (modern spelling, Maipú), Blanco Encalada's eight guns open a long-range bombardment at 11:30 a.m., and San Martín orders a general advance by his entire line at noon. Las Heras's division engages Primo de Rivera's royalist left and separates it from the rest of the monarchist army, despite heavy counterfire that checks the patriots' advance at the foot of their hilltop positions. Meanwhile, Alvarado's 2nd and 8th battalions penetrate the front lines of Ordóñez's division on the royalist left, before being decimated by a withering fire that sends them reeling back across the field. A counter-attack by the Andean Chasseurs and San Martín's reserve—the 7th Argentine, plus 1st and 3rd Chilean Infantry battalions—then stabilizes the situation and overruns the monarchists' guns. The patriots' 8th Battalion suffers 50 percent casualties during this repulse.

Despite brave resistance by Morla's 2nd Burgos Battalion, the loyalist army disintegrates after a fierce six-hour battle, Ordóñez retreating with 250 riders to mount a rearguard action at his stronghold of Lo Espejo Hacienda. At this moment, O'Higgins—convalescent in Santiago because of his wounded right elbow from Cancha Rayada—joins San Martín with 1,000 militia volunteers, and the allies press on against Lo Espejo. The patriot batteries of Blanco Encalada and Borgoño unlimber and batter the hacienda, after which Ordóñez and most of his officers surrender. The royalist army is annihilated, having sustained almost 2,000 dead and 2,300 taken prisoner (1,000 of the latter being wounded), compared to 800 killed and about 1,000 injured among the patriot ranks, who also seize all the artillery and 3,800 muskets. Only Osorio and Rodil escape this disaster, fleeing toward Talcahuano with slightly more than 600 survivors.

APRIL 16, 1818. Bolívar is nearly assassinated this night at his Rincón de los Toros (Venezuela) headquarters, when the young royalist captain Tomás de Renovales—armed with the patriot password—penetrates the Liberator's sleeping camp with eight chasseurs from the Burgos Battalion and fires into his tent. The Liberator flees on horseback into the night, and the next dawn his 400 leaderless infantrymen and 400-man cavalry escort are attacked by Col. Rafael López's flying column of 500 royalist riders and 360 infantrymen. After a sharp skirmish, Zaraza's patriot troopers are dispersed and the insurgent infantry massacred with a loss of 200 casualties, plus 150 prisoners (most of whom are subsequently executed). López suffers 8 dead and 26 wounded, while Bolívar reenters Calabozo the next day, unscathed.

APRIL 18, 1818. Having been detached by the victorious San Martín, insurgent colonel Zapiola battles the royalists in and around Talca (Chile) with a flying column of 250 mounted grenadiers.

APRIL 23, 1818. Despite Bolívar's absence, Páez assaults the town of San Carlos (Venezuela) with his llanero contingent alone. Its royalist garrison emerges under de la Torre to give battle, but both sides confront each other from a distance without clashing, until the patriots withdraw five days later.

MAY 2, 1818. Cojedes. Royalist general Correa having united two days previously with de la Torre at San Carlos (Venezuela), they sally with 370 men of the 1st Unión, 320 of the 2nd Castilla, 350 of the Barinas, 380 of the Burgos, 380 of the Infante, 150 in two companies of the Victoria, 225 in three companies of the Pardos de Valencia, and 105 in two militia companies of the Aragua Infantry battalions, plus 800 troopers in eight cavalry squadrons. These 3,080 soldiers advance westward into Cojedes (or Cogedes) Plain, searching for Páez's slightly smaller llanero army—composed largely of cavalrymen.

While resting at Seyba, the royalists are provoked by a charge by Páez's vanguard, which disperses three of their cavalry squadrons. When the Spanish main body then advances to offer battle, they are lured out to a preselected site on Cojedes Plain, where the patriot riders can have greater play. Here, the royalists find their enemies drawn up before the town of Cojedes: Anzoátegui's 700 infantrymen (Guardia de Honor del Jefe Supremo and Barcelona battalions) in the center in three-deep ranks, plus 1,900 cavalrymen distributed on both flanks and the rear.

As the Spanish columns march relentlessly toward the insurgent lines, they are greeted at 4:00 p.m. by massed volleys, at a range of 50 yards. Páez then leads a wild cavalry charge that sweeps away their outnumbered opponents on the royalist left and descends upon de la Torre's rear, but without inflicting a crippling blow to his army's fighting capabilities. The patriot infantry is meanwhile destroyed by the Spaniards, despite de la Torre having a foot badly mangled by a shot and turning over command to Correa. By evening, the royalists have killed 300 patriots, wounded 400, and captured several hundred more, along with 1,500 packhorses and all their supplies. Spanish losses total 91 dead, 130 injured, and 76 missing.

Both sides claim victory, Páez remaining upon the battlefield with his llaneros when the Spanish infantry retire toward San Carlos the next morning. However, he soon withdraws to Apure to reorganize his forces, reentering San Fernando by May 21.

MAY 10, 1818. The patriot Mariño seizes Cariaco (northeastern Venezuela), then defeats a royalist column at Cautaro two weeks later.

MAY 15, 1818. The royalist chieftain Reyes Vargas—now promoted to lieutenant colonel—after advancing from Barinas (Venezuela) with 400 men, wrests Nutrias away from its patriot garrison, inflicting heavy casualties.

MAY 16, 1818. Bermúdez besieges the royalist garrison within Cumaná (Venezuela) with 500 patriot infantrymen, 200 cavalrymen, and a pair of fieldpieces. On the night of May 19–20, he attempts to carry its walls by storm, and again during daylight on May 21, only to be repelled on both occasions.

Discouraged, Bermúdez thereupon digs in with his small army three miles away at the port of Madera and hopes to be joined by Brion's patriot squadron, which is bringing reinforcements from Margarita Island. Instead, Spanish governor de Cires sorties from Cumaná with 700 infantrymen of the Granada, Barbastro, and Reina battalions, driving the patriots southward with heavy losses.

MAY 17, 1818. Venezuelan commodore Brion is lying at Gustavia (Saint Barthélemy) with his corvette Victoria (flag), five brigs, and three schooners—having just received partial delivery of a shipment of British arms—when Spanish naval captain José María Chacón arrives outside with his eight men-of-war and 1,400 crew members, instituting a brief blockade. The patriot vessels are eventually allowed to depart unchallenged.

MAY 19, 1818. Los Patos. After abandoning Calabozo (Venezuela) and allowing that city to be reoccupied by the Spaniards under Morales and Col. Antonio Plá, the patriot general Sedeño decides to make a stand in the hill country southwest of this place—beside Los Patos Lagoon, near China— with 1,200 cavalrymen and 300 fusiliers.

Morales approaches with 250 infantrymen of the Navarra, Corona, and Aragua (militia) battalions; 650 lancers of the “Del Rey” Cavalry Regiment; plus 150 troopers from the Sombrero, Tiznados, and Calvario Militia regiments. Awaiting them are Pedro León Torres, commanding the patriot infantry in the center; Col. Francisco Aramendi with the Apure, Guayabal, and Camaguán cavalry squadrons on the right; Jacinto Lara with the Calabozo, Rastro, and Tiznados squadrons on the left; plus four patriot squadrons in reserve, under Juan Antonio Mina and the former loyalist Remigio Ramos.

This encounter proves an unmitigated disaster for Sedeño, his demoralized forces being unwilling to engage. Aramendi refuses to charge on the right when given the order, whereas Lara's troopers on the left melt away before the royalists' advance. The patriot infantry is left alone upon the field, losing two-thirds of their number before escaping. By the time Sedeño resumes his retreat toward Guayabal, only 500 men remain with him.

MAY 30, 1818. After throwing back Bermúdez's assault on the outskirts of Cumaná (Venezuela), its royalist defenders sally and rout him at the port of Madera, obliging him to fall back upon Cumana-coa, then Angostura.

JULY 4, 1818. On the banks of the Queguay Chico River (Uruguay), patriot leader Artigas is defeated by a Portuguese contingent, who are in turn bested by his subordinate Fructuoso Rivera shortly thereafter.

MID-JULY 1818. San Martín's subordinate Zapiola—now commanding a regiment of mounted grenadiers, the Coquimbo Battalion, and two fieldpieces—is bloodily repulsed by the 500-man royalist garrison at Chillán (Chile).

AUGUST 23, 1818. Bermúdez and Brion unite to assault the royalist stronghold of Güiría, facing the Gulf of Paria in eastern Venezuela. Their English naval subordinate, Captain Hill, loses the brig Colombia to a Spanish boarding party during the opening action.

The next dawn, Bermúdez and Sucre disembark at nearby Cauranta, but become pinned down in Chachá Ravine when the garrison sallies in a counterattack. Finally, the patriot naval captain Antonio Díaz recaptures Colombia, and along with Brion, bombards Güiría sufficiently for its divided defender contingents to panic and flee west toward Río Caribe.

SEPTEMBER 1818. Royalist general Osorio strips the defenses at Talcahuano (Chile) of 35 guns and sets sail for Peru with his remaining 700 troops.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1818. The Mexican guerrilla leader Guerrero defeats his royalist pursuer Armijo at Tamo, wresting sufficient arms and ammunition to furbish 1,800 men.

OCTOBER 13, 1818. Repelled in an earlier attempt to seize Carúpano in northeastern Venezuela, Bermúdez retreats and instead captures the royalist outpost of Río Caribe on October 13. Two days later, however, the victorious patriots are surprised by a flying royalist column under Cmdr. Ramón Añés, who inflicts 60 casualties while driving the rest of these startled survivors out to sea.

OCTOBER 31, 1818. Cariaco. Patriot general Mariño advances upon the royalist outpost of Cariaco (Venezuela) with 1,140 infantrymen, 340 cavalrymen, and 40 gunners for his two fieldpieces. Rather than wait to be invaded, however, a portion of its 900-man garrison—after an ineffectual opening assault by the patriot vanguard under Col. Domingo Montes—unexpectedly sallies under Spanish commander Agustín Noguera and sows terror among the disorganized patriot army. Mariño must retreat precipitously toward Catuaro, suffering 400 killed or wounded during this rout.

NOVEMBER 1818. Patriot general Balcarce advances upon Concepción (Chile) with 3,400 men and eight fieldpieces, obliging royalist colonel Sánchez's smaller force to retire inland to Los Angeles.

NOVEMBER 1, 1818. Patriot general Sedeño destroys Hilario Torrealva's royalist stronghold at Quebrada Honda (Venezuela).

NOVEMBER 8, 1818. The Argentine federalist leader Estanislao López of Santa Fe surprises a rival republican army from Buenos Aires under Gen. Juan Bautista Bustos at Fraile Muerto (modern Bell Ville, on the Tercero River). López steals many of Bustos's mounts, yet the republicans press on into his territory regardless.

NOVEMBER 20, 1818. At Araya (Venezuela), Spanish captain José Guerrero—his squadron reinforced by troops from the Granada Infantry Battalion—surprises and defeats a patriot flotilla from Margarita

Thomas Alexander, Lord Cochrane. (National Maritime Museum, London)

Island under Commander Gutiérrez, taking five gunboats as prizes.

NOVEMBER 27, 1818. Aguirre Ford. Republican general Juan Ramón Balcarce of Buenos Aires attacks the outer defenses of Estanislao López's rival federalist capital of Santa Fe (Argentina). A direct assault is attempted at Aguirre Ford, masking a republican enveloping movement around a nearby hill, which outflanks López and compels him to retreat after sustaining heavy losses. Santa Fe is occupied, but the next day a 600-man republican pursuit column under Colonel Hortiguera is massacred at Aguiar Creek (north of this city); only its commander and a handful of troopers survive. This disaster, coupled with fatigue brought on by a lack of supplies or reinforcement, convinces Balcarce to evacuate his prize on December 4, retiring down the Paraná River toward Rosario.

NOVEMBER 28, 1818. The 42-year-old British naval officer Thomas Alexander, Lord Cochrane (later 10th Earl of Dundonald; also nephew to Rear Adm. Sir Alexander Cochrane), arrives in Valparaíso at the invitation of the newly independent Chilean government to assume command over the fledgling navy from Blanco Encalada, who has been transferred over from the Chilean army. Strength consists of the captured 50-gun frigate O'Higgins (ex-Spanish María Isabel), the former Indiamen San Martín of 56 and Lautaro of 44 guns, the 18-gun sloop Galvarino (formerly the British Hecate), plus the smaller Chacabuco, Aracauno, and Pueyrredón.

JANUARY 1819. After sailing northward from Valparaíso with the O'Higgins (flag), the Lautaro, the San Martín, and the Chacabuco, Cochrane attempts to surprise Callao with the former two vessels only, flying American colors. He is prevented by dense

Lord Cochrane

Thomas Alexander, Lord Cochrane, was born on December 14, 1775, at Annsfield, near Hamilton in South Lanarkshire in Scotland. He was the eldest of six sons of the eccentric 9th Earl of Dundonald. During Thomas's youth at the family estates at Culross in Fife, his father squandered his fortune trying to develop one of many inventions. The teenage lord therefore spent a brief spell in the Chauvet Military Academy in London before joining the Royal Navy as a midshipman in 1793 aboard his uncle's 28-gun frigate HMS Hind. Within three years, he was promoted to lieutenant and transferred with Adm. Lord Keith aboard the 98-gun flagship HMS Barfleur in 1798.

Brilliant and haughty, Cochrane was court-martialed for challenging the first lieutenant Philip Beaver to a duel. He was found innocent of this very serious charge and, instead, reprimanded for impoliteness. Cochrane then served in the Cadiz blockade and followed Keith aboard HMS Queen Charlotte to fight in the Mediterranean. In February 1800, Cochrane was sent as prize master aboard the captured 74-gun French warship the Généreux, going aloft with his brother to help sail it through a storm into Port Mahon. Put in command of the 14-gun, 54-man sloop HMS Speedy, he came on the burnt wreck-age of the Queen Charlotte on March 21 off Leghorn.

After rescuing its survivors, Cochrane was free to prowl off the coast of Spain for 15 months. With his tiny Speedy, he captured more than 50 prizes and even took the 32-gun, 319-man Spanish frigate Gamo on May 6, 1801. He was finally intercepted two months later by a French squadron and exchanged after a brief captivity. Although promoted to full captain as of August 8, he was not employed again until 1803 because of having incurred Admiral St. Vincent's displeasure. At last, Cochrane was given the new 32-gun frigate HMS Pallas in December 1804, then the 38-gun Impérieuse three years later. With them, he conducted such brilliant campaigns off the Mediterranean coast of France and Spain that Napoleon dubbed him the Loup de Mer or "Sea-Wolf."

Rich and famous, Cochrane was elected to Parliament in 1806. His drive to end corruption in the navy by embarrassing revelations won him enemies in high places. Society disapproved of his elopement in 1812 with Katherine "Kitty" Barnes, more than 20 years younger than he was. When the Great Stock Exchange Fraud broke two years later, Cochrane was implicated. After an unfair trial, he was sentenced to the pillory, a year's imprisonment, and a £1,000 fine. He was additionally stripped of his knighthood, as well as expelled from the navy and Parliament.

As popular as ever, however, Cochrane's fine was paid by a public fund drive, he was reelected as an MP, and he escaped prison. He traveled abroad to serve in the insurgent navies of Chile, Brazil, and Greece. In 1832, he received a royal pardon and was reinstated into the Royal Navy as a rear admiral. He died on October 31, 1860, and was buried with full honors in Westminster Abbey. His exploits inspired the novels of C. S. Forester's Horatio Hornblower and Patrick O'Brian's Jack Aubrey, as well as the Star Trek series of Gene Roddenberry.

fog, then fired upon once it clears, so he instead blockades Peru over the next five months. Numerous captures are made to obtain supplies, both on land (Huacho and Patavilca) and at sea before Cochrane finally returns into Valparaíso on June 16.

JANUARY 16, 1819. A contingent of Balcarce's retreating republican army under Col. Francisco Pico is overtaken at Pergamino (Argentina) by 600 rival federalist troops—mostly Indians—from Santa Fe under the Irish-born Pedro Campbell and defeated.

JANUARY 17, 1819. After being reinforced at the mouth of the Pao River (Venezuela) by a squadron of English cavalry under Col. James Rooke and 459 infantrymen under Monagas, Bolívar merges with Cedeño's division and other reinforcements from Araguaquén marching to join Páez at San Juan de Payara. This coalescence gives the patriots some 1,000 cavalymen and 3,400 infantrymen, far fewer than the 7,000 royalists assembling at Calabozo under de la Torre. Learning that more English mercenaries are arriving at Angostura under colonels George Elsom and James T. English, the Liberator proceeds there to incorporate them into his "Army of the West."

JANUARY 19, 1819. On the banks of the Bío Bío River (Chile), patriot forces defeat the last scattered remnants of royalist resistance in the region, capturing 70 men and five fieldpieces.

JANUARY 24, 1819. Morillo crosses the Apure River at San Fernando (Venezuela) with 4,700 infantrymen and 1,500 cavalymen, erecting a small fort before advancing without opposition and occupying the vacated patriot headquarters at San Juan de Payara. Páez shadows his movements with llanero cavalry, watching as the Spaniards traverse the Arauca and seize deserted El Caujaral by February 5. Resuming his march four days later, Morillo reaches as far as Cunaviche before retracing his steps and recrossing the Arauca on February 25. After reinforcing San Juan de Payara and San Fernando, he occupies Achaguas (the capital of Apure Province) on March 8.

FEBRUARY 5, 1819. San Nicolás de los Arroyos. Estanislao López's federalist advance down the Paraná River from Santa Fe (Argentina) is at last halted at San Nicolás de los Arroyos, when his 700 troops are repelled by 2,400 republicans marching north

Royalist artillerymen clad in blue coats with red trim, brass buttons, black hats, and white cross-belts and trousers. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico) out of Buenos Aires under General Viamonte. His rear threatened by Bustos, López then retires west.

FEBRUARY 16, 1819. Bolívar is elected president of the Venezuelan Congress at Angostura.

FEBRUARY 18, 1819. Republican general Bustos, holding a defensive position at La Herradura on the Tercero River (Argentina) with 700 troops, is attacked by federalist commander López. The defenders respond to the initial probes with a feeble fire, but then break a federalist cavalry charge with heavy volleys, allowing José María Paz's and Lamadrid's troopers to launch countercharges. This fighting continues the next day, at which point López breaks off the action to deal with Viamonte approaching his rear.

MARCH 10, 1819. While advancing west from Rosario (Argentina), republican general Viamonte's 400-man cavalry vanguard under Colonel Hortiguera is annihilated by federalist Estanislao López at Las Barrancas (18 miles southeast of Fraile Muerto on the Tercero River). This disaster compels Viamonte to retreat into Rosario, where he is besieged by the federalists and eventually agrees to the San Lorenzo armistice signed on April 12.

MARCH 11, 1819. Brion sorties from Margarita Island (Venezuela) with nine patriot vessels manned by 1,300 crew members to challenge a Spanish flotilla recently sighted off that coast: the Cuban-built corvette Ninfa (flag), a brigantine, two schooners, and 14 smaller consorts. The Spanish flee to the protection of the Spanish batteries at Cumaná the next day, leaving Brion to snap up a number of prizes along the coast.

MARCH 26, 1819. A small royalist army under Olañeta and Vigil briefly occupies Jujuy in northern Argentina, retreating soon afterward out of fear of being besieged inside by gaucho guerrilla raids.

MARCH 27, 1819. This morning, while approaching Morillo's army—which is resting in Achaguas (Venezuela)—Bolívar attacks a 364-man Spanish outpost at Gamarra Ranch, 15 miles outside this city. The outnumbered loyalist defenders manage to slip across the Apure River, thus carrying a warning to Morillo. When the Liberator nears Achaguas the next day, the Spaniards advance in battle array, then both armies camp opposite each other on the banks of the Arauca.

On April 2, Páez fords this river with 150 riders for a reconnaissance in strength and lures Morillo's cavalry into the open before turning at Queseras del Medio and inflicting scores of casualties. Two days later, Morillo retires into Achaguas, and Bolívar departs in search of forage.

APRIL 10, 1819. Patriot colonel Antonio Rangel's cavalry regiment attacks 300 Spanish soldiers at Alejo Mill (six miles outside Nutrias, Venezuela), mauling this formation before retiring.

MAY 1, 1819. Morillo's Spanish army recrosses the Apure River (Venezuela), abandoning Achaguas at the approach of the rainy season.

MAY 26, 1819. Bolívar also quits the Apure region (Venezuela) at the beginning of the rainy season, leading three cavalry squadrons (800 troopers) and four infantry battalions (1,300 men) from El Mantecal, to campaign farther west in New Granada (Colombia). On June 4, they cross the Arauca River, entering Casanare Province and reaching the patriot stronghold of Tame by June 11.

JUNE 12, 1819. Cantaura. Patriot general Mariño's 900 fusiliers and 400 llanero lancers collide with Cmdr. Eugenio de Arana's 700 Spanish infantrymen—mostly from the Reina Battalion—and 110 cavalrymen at Cantaura Ranch (south of Barcelona, Venezuela). In a 15-mile pursuit north up the Unare riverbanks, the loyalists suffer 250 killed, wounded, captured, or missing, compared to 24 dead and 47 injured among the patriots.

JUNE 15, 1819. At Itacurupí Ford over the Camacuan River (north of San Borja, Uruguay), the patriot leader Andresito is annihilated by Portuguese general Abreu.

JUNE 27, 1819. Entering the Andes, Bolívar's army disperses 300 royalists guarding the town of Paya (Colombia). After resting five days, they then press on toward the Pisba Plain.

JULY 17, 1819. Patriot general Urdaneta occupies the evacuated town of Barcelona (Venezuela), having disembarked nearby two days earlier with 1,200 troops—mostly British mercenaries, although also including some Germans under Major Freudenthal and Venezuelans under Commander Cala. The unpaid English contingent proves highly refractory, drunkenly looting buildings and refusing to help subdue Barcelona's harbor castle because of disillusionment over their service conditions. Instead, Brion's patriot marines must carry the royalist garrison.

The next day, the Spanish corvettes Ninfa and Descubierta, brig Morillo, schooner Conejito, and two falouches appear outside Barcelona, being chased east-northeastward back into Cumaná by Brion's 12 small men-of-war. Urdaneta is under orders to link up with Bermúdez's army, but it is nowhere to be found.

JULY 20, 1819. Pantano de Vargas. After a number of skirmishes, Bolívar's army meets the 3rd Spanish Division under Lt. Col. José María Barreiro (original 19th-century spelling is Barreyro) in Colombia's Bonza Plains. Both units circle each other warily, probing at long range until noon of July 25 when—after crossing the Sogamoso River and heading toward Salitre—the 2,500 patriots are finally checked while passing east of Vargas Swamp.

British Legion

Tens of thousands of first-rate English servicemen were demobilized at the end of the Napoleonic Wars. Taking advantage of this situation, an agent of Bolívar named Luis López Méndez arrived in London and, in late May 1817, began hiring discharged officers and noncoms to help bolster South America's struggle for independence. Many veterans on half pay were attracted by promotion to a rank above their previous one, with salaries to start as soon as they reached Venezuela.

By August 1817, four regiments and an artillery brigade were raised. This first "British Legion" set sail by December, although much of Colonel Skeene's regiment would be lost when their transport Indian sank in a storm. The other four ships reached Grenada by late February 1818, but the 800 Legionnaires aboard were disappointed to find no patriot welcome. Instead, they had to straggle into Venezuela as best they could.

BRITISH LEGION TROOPS

Name	Men	Materials	Commander
1st Venezuelan Hussars	190	—	Col. Gustavus Hippisley
2nd Venezuelan Hussars	120	—	Col. Henry Wilson
1st Venezuelan Lancers	220	—	Col. Robert Skeene
1st Venezuelan Rifles	237	—	Col. Donald Campbell
—	90	5 six-pounders and a howitzer	Col. Joseph Gilmour

Still, the Legion made such a favorable impression on Bolívar the next month at the Battle of Ortiz that in June 1818 its 36-year-old lieutenant colonel James Towers English was sent back to Britain to recruit a second force. Between January and April 1819, he sent over another 1,050 troops, followed shortly thereafter by another 900 under George Elsom. This second "British Legion" was assembled in stages on Margarita Island under Col. James Rooke. (An Irish exile in the United States named John d'Evereux also raised 1,700 of his compatriots by year's end, becoming known as the "Irish Legion.")

English reached Margarita on April 7, 1819, to assume command as brigadier general of this second British force, under the Venezuelan general Rafael Urdaneta. But English found his Legionnaires in a bad way. Heat, shortages of food and water, and disease had already claimed 250 lives. When the small army pushed across to the mainland on July 15, poor British discipline led to the pillage of Barcelona. Still, the Legionnaires fought bravely the next month in the assault on Cumaná, suffering heavy losses before retiring. And despite such a poor start, more British volunteers continued to reach the Legion. It fought on under Bolívar to his great victory at Carabobo and beyond.

Taking up position on the heights opposite, Barreiro sends his 1st "Del Rey" Battalion under Lt. Col. Nicolás López in an encircling maneuver against Bolívar's left wing, thus seriously discomfiting the Liberator's rearguard. His republican army is only saved from outright annihilation by Col. James Rooke's "British Legion," which bravely dislodges the royalists from these heights, despite seeing their commander fall badly wounded (he dies three days later). Col. Juan José Rondón then smashes Barreiro's counterattack with a llanero squadron before fighting ceases altogether at nightfall, amid heavy rain. Royalist losses are estimated at 300 killed, injured, or missing, compared to 104 dead and wounded among the patriots.

Neither side wishes to renew action the next day. The Spaniards retire toward the town of Paipa, and the patriots, toward the Bonza corrals. Eventually, Bolívar's army is allowed to advance one week later without any further challenges. Paipa is occupied by the patriots on August 3, and Tunja is taken two days later.

JULY 21, 1819. Hoping to surprise the Spanish garrison at Guanare (Venezuela), Páez's 700 llaneros instead stumble upon a 200-man detachment from the Barinas Battalion under Captain Durán stationed at La Cruz, 30 miles northwest of Nutrias. A furious battle erupts in which the patriots suffer 25 killed and 96 wounded, as opposed to 45 dead and 85 wounded among the outnumbered loyalists, who nonetheless manage to make a fighting retreat.

JULY 26, 1819. American commodore Oliver Hazard Perry reaches Angostura (Venezuela) on an official visit to protest Admiral Brion's detention of the merchant vessels Tiger and Liberty. (His USS John Adams drawing too much water, Perry has left it at Trinidad and ventured up the Orinoco aboard his consort, the schooner Nonsuch.) After contacting the Venezuelan vice president Francisco Antonio Zea, the commodore reverses course, only to die of yellow fever at the mouth of the Orinoco on August 23.

AUGUST 1, 1819. Urdaneta abandons Barcelona (Venezuela) with his 1,200 recalcitrant English mercenaries, sailing east-northeast aboard Brion's patriot squadron to invest the nearby royalist stronghold of Cumaná. Disembarking at Bordones the next day, his men unsuccessfully storm Fort Agua Santa's walls on August 5, then after another three days of bloody repulses, retire southeast toward Maturín. Brigadier General English is replaced in disgrace.

AUGUST 6, 1819. Five days after the patriot general Urdaneta has quit Barcelona (Venezuela), this port is occupied by another insurgent contingent under Bermúdez.

AUGUST 7, 1819. Boyacá. After another two weeks of feinting against Bolívar's army, Barreiro is retiring southwest toward Bogotá (Colombia) with two divisions. Col. Francisco Jiménez commands the royalist vanguard—500 men of the 2nd “Numancia” Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. Juan Tolrá, 350 of the 3rd Numancia Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. Juan Loño, plus 160 dragoons under Lieutenant Colonel Salazar—while Barreiro's main body consists of 640 men of the 1st Del Rey Infantry Battalion under Lt. Col. Nicolás López, 400 of the 2nd Del Rey Infantry Battalion under Major Figueroa, 480 Tambo Chasseurs under Lt. Col. Esteban Díaz, 320 Granada Dragoons under Lt. Col. Victor Sierra, plus 90 gunners under Lieutenant Coletes for two howitzers and a fieldpiece.

Learning of this movement, Bolívar intercepts them at 2:00 p.m. while they are recrossing the Boyacá River bridge. Gen. Francisco de Paula Santander commands the patriots' Colombian vanguard: 400 men of Col. Joaquín París's Cazador Battalion, 410 of Lt. Col. Antonio Obando's 1st Line Battalion, plus the 1st Squadron (200 troopers) of Capt. Diego Ibarra's Apure Guides. General Anzoátegui's center division consists of 220 men of Lt. Col. Arthur Sandes's Rifle Battalion, 120 British Legionnaires under Major Mackintosh, 300 infantrymen of Col. Ambrosio Plaza's Barcelona Battalion, 300 of Colonel Cruz's “Bravos de Páez” Battalion, as well as the 2nd Squadron (200 troopers) of Apure Guides under Colonel Mujica. Bolívar brings up the rear with 500 militiamen of the Tunja Battalion under Cmdr. José Gabriel Lugo, 300 of the Socorro Battalion under Commander Soler, 300 lancers of the Llano-arriba (Upper Plains) Regiment under Col. Juan José Rondón, plus 90 carabineers of Capt. Juan Mellado's 3rd Squadron.

After Santander gains the heights, this battle starts with some light cavalry skirmishes. Colonel Jiménez's royalist chasseurs cross the bridge, forming a battle line. At this point, Barreiro orders his main body to withdraw about three-quarters of a mile, thereby allowing the insurgents to come between both contingents. Santander immediately storms the bridge, while Anzoátegui attacks Barreiro's right and center with his lancers. The right flank of the Spanish infantry is encircled, and their artillery captured, while the patriot rifle battalion assaults it from the front. Meanwhile, the royalist cavalry are cut up and flee, abandoning Barreiro to his fate.

Exposed and without either guns or cavalry, the Spanish general surrenders at 4:30 p.m. along with 1,600 of his infantrymen and entire supply train. Lieutenant Colonel Loño and dragoon lieutenant colonel Sebastián Díaz lead the last few royalist survivors off toward Chiquinquirá. This victory opens the road into New Granada's capital. The next morning, the Liberator rides toward Bogotá with the Llano-arriba Regiment, eventually taking control of 12 provinces as a result of this triumph.

AUGUST 9, 1819. This morning, Viceroy Juan Sámano abandons his capital of Bogotá (Colombia), allowing Bolívar to enter triumphantly the next afternoon. After a month and a half spent installing a new administration, the Liberator withdraws to Venezuela, where a coup by Arismendi has challenged his title as president.

AUGUST 11, 1819. Bermúdez's 1,300-man patriot army is driven out of Barcelona (Venezuela) by the approach of the 2nd Navarra and 2nd Valencey Infantry battalions under Spanish colonel José Pereira.

SEPTEMBER 1819. Cochrane's insurgent squadron again returns to blockade the Peruvian port of Callao.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1819. Patriot general Soublette—marching east through the Andes after Bolívar's triumph at Boyacá—clashes with 800 royalists under de la Torre, who are attempting to bar his path at Alto de las Cruces (near Cúcuta, Colombia). Neither side gains any advantage after several hours' combat, during which 60 casualties are inflicted upon each side. The outnumbered Spaniards eventually feel compelled, however, to retire northeast into Mérida de la Grita, temporarily allowing these insurgents passage into northwestern Venezuela.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1819. Patriot naval captain Antonio Díaz—operating far up the Apure with a river squadron—captures 30 loyalist vessels from Nutrias (Venezuela) opposite the town of San Antonio, then destroys a flotilla from San Fernando at the mouth of Portuguesa River, leaving both cities isolated.

OCTOBER 1819. The Spaniards abandon San Fernando, Nutrias, and Barinas (Venezuela), retiring north.

Also in October, exasperated by a week-long sack of Ríohacha (Colombia) by 300 British occupiers under MacGregor, the residents rise and slaughter 250 of these patriot troops, restoring royalist rule.

OCTOBER 11, 1819. In Bogotá (Colombia), Santander orders the execution by firing squad of Barreiro and 38 other captive Spanish officers.

NOVEMBER 11, 1819. Tucumán (Argentina) proclaims itself an independent republic, with Gen. Bernabé Aráoz as its “Supreme Director.”

NOVEMBER 15, 1819. Patriot general Anzoátegui dies at Pamplona (Colombia) at 30 years of age.

DECEMBER 14, 1819. In a desperate bid to free his country from Portuguese occupation, Uruguayan leader Artigas invades southwestern Brazil with a small army, defeating a contingent under Abreu outside Santa Maria (Río Grande do Sul Province). This victory prompts 3,000 Portuguese troops to enter the area, annihilating Artigas’s vanguard at Belarmino Ravine a few days later and scattering his followers back into Uruguay.

DECEMBER 17, 1819. Páez occupies Barinas (Venezuela)—abandoned by its Spanish garrison—with 1,200 llaneros and 1,900 infantrymen of the Colombian Tiradores and Boyacá battalions, the Bravos de Apure Battalion, and an English contingent.

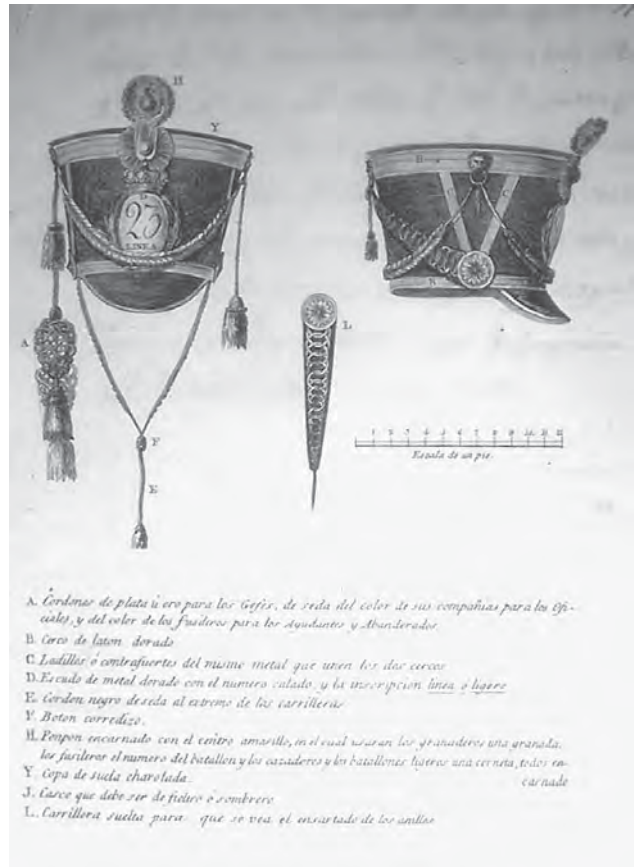

DECEMBER 23, 1819. A royalist contingent under Col. Manuel Lorenzo advances east from Carúpano (Venezuela) and reoccupies Yaguaraparo from the insurgents.

JANUARY 1, 1820. At the town of Cabezas de San Juan (near Seville, Spain), Col. Rafael del Riego of the 2nd Battalion of the Asturias Regiment—rather than take ship with his men for the Americas—mutinies against Ferdinand VII, calling for the restoration of the liberal constitution of March 1812. His example is followed by other contingents of the 14,000-man expeditionary force preparing under Calleja to reconquer the River Plate. Popular support will eventually compel the king to accept this resolution by March 9, its effects soon spreading to the New World.

JANUARY 8, 1820. Civil war having resumed a month and a half earlier between republican Buenos Aires and federalist Santa Fe, a contingent of Argentine troops under Bustos—marching to join Supreme Director Rondeau at San Nicolás—mutinies and withdraws into Córdoba rather than proceed with this antifederalist campaign, and Bustos is acclaimed city governor. The next day, Capt. Mariano Mendizábal’s 1st Battalion of Cazadores de los Andes (“Andean Chasseurs”) does the same at San Juan, rising and proclaiming its leader as governor of that town—although he is soon deposed by Lieutenant Corro.

JANUARY 17, 1820. Cochrane appears outside Valdivia—the last remaining loyalist stronghold in southern Chile—masquerading his flagship O’Higgins as the royal frigate Prueba, which is daily expected by the Spaniards from around Cape Horn. Capturing Valdivia's pilot, along with a Spanish officer and four soldiers sent out aboard a harbor boat because of this ruse, the admiral inspects the harbor entrance and some of its batteries before being driven off by gunfire.

Shakos for the 23rd Royalist Line Regiment. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

Cochrane also learns that the 18-gun sloop Potrillo is anticipated from Callao with the garrison's situado or "payroll," so he intercepts it on January 19. Its charts prove valuable, therefore the British commander hastens to Penco outside Concepción to request a military contingent from its governor, Col. Ramón Freire. He quickly agrees, assigning 250 troops of the 1st Chilean Line Battalion and 3rd Arauco Battalion to this enterprise under the ex-Napoleonic mercenary major George Beauchef. Cochrane separates Potrillo on January 25 to convey dispatches to Valparaíso.

Cochrane then puts out to sea again with his O'Higgins on the evening of January 28, bound for Valdivia with the Argentine brig Intrépido of Capt. Thomas Carter and the Chilean schooner Moctezuma under Capt. Robert Casey. While the British admiral is asleep at night, his flagship strikes a reef north of Santa María Island, flooding the hold and dampening all the powder. The expedition nonetheless continues south.

JANUARY 22, 1820. Tacuarembó Chico. Some 2,000 Uruguayan patriots under General Latorre are annihilated on the western banks of the Tacuarembó River by 3,000 Portuguese troops under Gen. Gaspar de Sousa Filgueiras, effectively ending organized opposition to Brazil's occupation of this country. (On July 18, 1821, Uruguay is annexed into the Portuguese empire as the "Cisplatine Province," and remains so until 1825.)

JANUARY 23, 1820. At Barbacoas Cliff below the Carare confluence on the Magdalena River (Colombia), a 26-vessel patriot river squadron of 100 sailors and 127 soldiers under Lt. Col. José Antonio Mayz y Alcalá confronts 11 Spanish gunboats manned by 300 sailors under naval captain Mier, plus 153 soldiers under Lt. Col. Isidro Barradas. After a lengthy struggle in which Barradas's troops are defeated on land and four Spanish vessels are captured by the patriots (along with 87 prisoners), a badly wounded Mayz wins control over the Magdalena.

JANUARY 24, 1820. At dawn, Calzada's 1,000 royalists—including the Quito and Patía Infantry battalions—surprise the 600 patriots stationed at Popayán (Colombia) under Col. Antonio Obando, utterly routing this garrison.

FEBRUARY 1, 1820. Cepeda. Buenos Aires supreme director Rondeau's 2,000 demoralized men are attacked southwest of San Nicolás on the banks of Cepeda Creek by 1,600 federalists under Estanislao López and Brigadier General Ramírez, who circle behind their enemy and scatter the host. Shortly thereafter, Rondeau retreats into San Nicolás with only 900 effectives and resigns as supreme director on February 10. Two weeks later, the Argentine Civil War officially ends with the signing of the Treaty of Pilar—although the Uruguayan leader Artigas refuses to acknowledge its validity, thereby bringing him into conflict with his former ally Ramírez.

FEBRUARY 3, 1820. Fall of Valdivia. At 4:00 p.m., Cochrane materializes at Aguada del Inglés outside this loyalist port with only the Intrépido and the Moctezuma, which are disguised as Spanish vessels. Suspicious gunners nonetheless open fire from Fort Inglés, upon which the English mercenary major William Miller leads 44 Chilean marines ashore in two launches, securing a foothold for the entire 325-man landing force to disembark. Overnight, Cochrane directs a series of encirclements behind forts Inglés, San Carlos, and Amargos in rapid succession, all of which are hastily abandoned by their uneasy defenders.

Shortly after midnight, the attackers arrive at the rear gate of Fort Corral, the main Spanish stronghold along the southwestern shore. It is carried in a half hour of confused fighting, most of its defenders rowing away for Valdivia, leaving Col. Fausto del Hoyo to surrender. This capture secures possession of all the western peninsula for Cochrane, at a cost of 7 dead and 19 wounded.

When the Intrépido and the Moctezuma anchor off the captured fort at dawn, they are fired upon by nearby Fort Niebla, until the waterlogged O'Higgins slowly enters the estuary. Believing that its lowness in the water means it is full of more troops and weaponry, the demoralized Spaniards also flee Fort Niebla. That same morning, a boatload of Valdivians appeal to Cochrane, saying that the royalists have looted their city, murdered some inhabitants, and dispersed. The insurgent flotilla therefore proceeds upriver to occupy Valdivia uncontested.

Cochrane's audacity has won past the 17 small forts and batteries guarding Valdivia's approaches, which bristled with a total of 128 cannons. The defenders included 166 Spanish regulars of the Cantabria Battalion, 219 gunners of the Royal Spanish Artillery Corps, 417 Valdivian militiamen, and 107 chasseurs of the “Dragones de la Reina” Regiment out of Concepción. The outnumbered attackers’ booty includes the anchored ship Dolores, plus vast amounts of ammunition and stores. The city is stripped bare, then abandoned.

FEBRUARY 27, 1820. Cochrane returns into Valparaíso after conquering Valdivia.

MARCH 6, 1820. A popular uprising in Buenos Aires deposes the interim governor Sarratea in favor of Gen. Juan Ramón Balcarce. Six days later, the former is reinstalled in office by Estanislao López’s and Brigadier General Ramírez’s federalist army.

MARCH 12, 1820. Patriot admiral Brion appears before Ríohacha (Colombia) from Margarita Island (Venezuela) with 10 small warships and 6 transports bearing Col. Mariano Montilla’s contingent—mostly 700 disgruntled Irish mercenaries, raised and brought from Europe by Lt. Col. John d’Evereux—to reoccupy this Colombian port following its inhabitants’ uprising against MacGregor (see “October 1819” entry). The few Spanish defenders under Gov. José Solís flee west toward Santa Marta that same night, allowing the patriots to disembark and enter this empty town unopposed the next day.

APRIL 1820. Spanish general Morillo receives orders from Madrid to promulgate the liberal constitution of 1812. After considerable hesitation, he contacts Bolívar to attempt to arrange a truce toward this end, although realizing that its articles will sap the royalist cause. Desertions to the patriots increase throughout this year.

APRIL 28, 1820. Patriot colonel José Mires, having been detached from Gen. Manuel Valdés’s division at Bogotá to march southwestward with the Albión and Guías de Carvajal battalions, perceives a 310-man royalist unit under Captain Domínguez approaching La Plata (Colombia), which he instantly attacks and outflanks. The Spaniards are routed, suffering 80 casualties and 100 prisoners, as opposed to 28 killed or wounded and 19 missing among the patriot ranks. This small victory opens the way into the Cauca Valley.

MAY 6, 1820. In light of the political upheaval in Spain, royalist general Morillo unilaterally declares a 40-day truce in Venezuela and Colombia, to which all insurgents adhere.

MAY 18, 1820. Laguna Salada. After being forced to the defensive and compelled to retire into Ríohacha (Colombia) by the approach of 1,200 loyalists from Santa Marta under Col. Vicente Sánchez Lima, patriot colonel Montilla is further distracted to learn that his 700 Irish mercenaries under d’Evereux refuse to serve the insurgent cause any longer because of lack of pay and food. Notwithstanding this mutiny, the defenders are able to repel a royalist assault against Ríohacha two days later, although the Irishmen subsequently refuse to sally and chase the enemy away.

Montilla must therefore sortie on May 25 with only 380 marines and local militiamen, two fieldpieces, and 200 loyal Irish lancers under Lt. Col. Francis Burdett O’Connor to give battle against Sánchez Lima’s host, which is waiting at nearby Laguna Salada. Despite being outnumbered, the patriots drive the loyalists back, then smash them at Sabana del Patrón, precipitating a headlong flight toward Santa Marta. Montilla thereupon returns into Ríohacha and, with some difficulty, disarms his refractory Irish mutineers, deporting them to Jamaica on June 4.

MAY 24, 1820. The merchants of Veracruz organize a battalion called the “Fernando VII Volunteers” and compel the garrison commander, José Dávila, to proclaim the 1812 liberal constitution. Similar demonstrations occur at Jalapa and other Mexican towns.

MAY 28, 1820. A 4,000-man royalist army under General Ramírez Orozco—with Canterac, Olañeta, José María Valdéz, Marquiegui, Agustín Gamarra, and Vigil as his colonels—occupies Jujuy in northern Argentina, then enters Salta three days later. Their southward progression grows progressively slower, however, as gaucho guerrilla resistance stiffens.

JUNE 5, 1820. After the departure of his Irish mutineers, patriot colonel Montilla is compelled to abandon his shaky foothold at Ríohacha (Colombia), sailing southwest with Brion to Sabinilla at the mouth of the Magdalena River by June 11, subsequently to proceed upriver and by June 20 join Lt. Col. José María Córdova’s forces, who have captured Mompos.

JUNE 6, 1820. Pitayó. Patriot generals Valdés and Mires, advancing southward down the Cauca Valley

(Colombia) with more than 2,000 troops to put down resistance around Popayán, collide at Pitayó with a loyalist contingent barring the Las Moras Moor approach route. The latter consist of 1,100 troops of the Cazadores and Patía battalions under veteran lieutenant colonel Nicolás López. Royalist general Calzada is meanwhile guarding the Guanas Moor approach route farther to the east—at Piendamó—with 500 men of the Aragón Infantry Regiment, plus 100 cavalymen.

Without waiting for Mires's rearguard to join from Páramo, Valdés storms López's lines with his vanguard at noon, only to be repelled. The royalists counterattack, but over the next three hours their resistance is worn down until a charge by the patriot Albión Battalion and Juan Carvajal's Guías breaks the defenders' will. López's army flees toward Guambia, leaving behind 133 casualties and 150 prisoners, compared to 30 dead and 62 wounded among the attackers. (This victory will soon compel the outnumbered royalists to evacuate Popayán without a fight. Valdés enters it triumphantly—after uniting with Concha at Cali—at the head of 2,400 men. However, the patriot general's subsequent harshness blunts the welcome extended by the inhabitants, so royalist resistance continues to smolder.)

JUNE 8, 1820. Cuesta de la Pedrera. At dawn, a large patriot guerrilla force under colonels Zerda and Zabala attacks a 2,000-man royalist column southeast of Salta (Argentina), bedeviling it until afternoon, when the royalists regain the city's defenses. Shortly thereafter, they begin a general retirement northward, their rearguard being overtaken six days later at Yala, suffering 60 killed and 200 wounded.

JUNE 15, 1820. Guachas. In the Entre Ríos district, south of Tala on the western banks of the Guleaguay River, the Uruguayan patriot Artigas's 2,200 men defeat 500–600 Argentine federalists under Brigadier General Ramírez; heavy casualties are sustained on both sides. The latter retreats downriver, hard pressed by Artigas. Nine days later at Avalos, however, Ramírez takes up a strong defensive position with 900 men and pulverizes his pursuers. Artigas is obliged to make a fighting retreat into Paraguay, which he reaches by September 23, where he is kept a virtual prisoner by its dictator, Dr. José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia, for the next 30 years.

JUNE 22, 1820. Patriot colonel Lara and Lt. Col. Francisco Carmona advance from Tamalameque (northeastern Colombia) with 1,500 troops, coming upon Sánchez Lima's 1,100 loyalists two days later at Chiriguaná and scattering them back toward Santa Marta, thus opening up the way for an offensive against Maracaibo.

JUNE 25, 1820. At dawn, a 100-man patriot river squadron under Lieutenant Colonel Córdova and Cmdr. Hermógenes Maza surprise their Spanish counterparts at Tenerife (Colombia). Approaching aboard 7 boats—after first depositing Córdova's troops ashore—Maza captures 9 of the 11 Spanish craft and slaughters their crews. The loyalist commander Vicente Villa blows himself up with his flagship rather than surrender. Of 300 Spaniards present, only 27 are captured alive, and another 70 grenadiers of the León Regiment (stationed ashore under Cmdr. Esteban Díaz) manage to escape. This victory gives the patriots total control over the Magdalena River.

JUNE 28, 1820. Cañada de la Cruz. In Argentina's renewed civil war, federalist Estanislao López and the Chilean-born brigadier general José Miguel Carrera march upon Buenos Aires with slightly more than 1,500 troops to restore their ally Alvear as governor. At Cañada de la Cruz, 12 miles southwest of Campana, they are confronted by 1,750 soldiers under rival governor Soler, with French and Pagola as his brigadier generals.

While advancing to commence this battle, French's right wing of the Buenos Aires army unwittingly marches into a swamp, compelling this entire unit to surrender without firing a shot. Soler's main body then sustains some 200 killed, obliging him to retreat from the field and to resign as governor a few days later. The federalists are unable to gain the capital, however, and instead Dorrego is named Soler's successor, while Alvear becomes governor of Luján as a consolation.

JULY 1, 1820. Patriot colonel Montilla establishes his 700 troops at Turbaco (Colombia), supported by Admiral Brion's squadron offshore, to harass the royalist lines of communication leading into Cartagena, only 12 miles away. Its 1,150-man Spanish garrison is rent by dissension because of the recent political turmoil in Spain (see "January 1, 1820" entry), so it does not react. Instead, Viceroy Sámano and other officials are deposed by a coup led by Brig. Gen. Gabriel Torres.

JULY 18, 1820. Dorrego's Offensive. This new governor sallies from Buenos Aires with a small army to drive away the rival Argentine federalist force under López. Two weeks later, on August 2, Dorrego makes a rapid nocturnal march to fall upon 700 unsuspecting federalists under Col. José M. Benavente at San Nicolás. At a cost of 7 dead and 42 wounded, Dorrego destroys this unit, killing 60 and capturing 450. The governor then achieves a second victory 10 days later when he crosses Pavón Creek with 1,500 riders and disperses 500 troopers encamped on its north bank under López himself.

At Gamonal (Pavón Creek headwaters), however, Dorrego's good luck runs out on September 2 when he overtakes the fleeing López with 600 riders and a fieldpiece. Not realizing his opponent has been reinforced and now commands 1,000 cavalymen, both armies collide in a frontal charge that sees Dorrego enveloped and forced to surrender after suffering 320 killed and 100 captured.

AUGUST 20, 1820. At Valparaíso, San Martín leads 2,400 Argentine and 2,000 Chilean troops aboard the transports Dolores, Gaditana, Consecuencia, Emprendedora, Santa Rosa, Aguila, Mackenna, Perla, Jerezana, Peruana, Golondrina, Minerva, Libertad, Argentina, Hércules, and Potrillo, planning to sail northward and invade royalist Peru. His Argentine contingent consists of 457 men of Col. Pedro Conde's 7th Infantry Battalion, 478 of the 8th Infantry Battalion under Col. Enrique Martínez, 583 of the 11th Infantry Battalion under Maj. Ramón Antonio Deheza, 418 horse grenadiers under Col. Rudecindo Alvarado, 283 chasseurs under Col. Mariano Necocha, plus 213 gunners under Major Luna. The Chilean contingent is comprised of 630 men of Col. Santiago Aldunate's 2nd Infantry Battalion, 678 of Lieutenant Colonel Sánchez's 4th Infantry Battalion, 343 of Col. Mariano Larrazábal's 5th Infantry Battalion, 52 of Col. Enrique Campino's 6th Infantry Battalion, 30 troopers of Lt. Col. Diego Guzmán's 2nd Dragoon Regiment, 230 artillerymen under Lieutenant Colonel Borgoño, plus 53 sappers. They are accompanied by 35 fieldpieces.

This expedition sets sail the next morning, escorted by Cochrane's 64-gun, 1,300-ton flagship San Martín (formerly the British Cumberland); the frigates 44-gun, 1,220-ton O'Higgins (Spanish prize María Isabel), 46-gun, 850-ton Lautaro (former British Windham), and 28-gun, 380-ton Independencia (ex-American Curiosity); the brigantines 18-gun, 398-ton Galvarino (formerly the Lucy), 16-gun, 270-ton Araucano (former American Columbus), and 16-gun, 220-ton Pueyreddón (the Spanish prize Aguila); as well as another prize, the 7-gun, 200-ton sloop Montezuma. This squadron is manned by 1,600 sailors, of whom approximately 600 are British.

AUGUST 22, 1820. In Mexico City, a general pardon is offered to all insurgents.

AUGUST 24, 1820. In Portugal, popular discontent at the royal family's refusal to return from Brazil sparks a peaceful insurrection at Oporto. It will quickly spread, resulting in calls for a new liberal constitution.

SEPTEMBER 1820. Royalist commander Vicente Benavídez receives a Peruvian armaments shipment in southern Chile, which he uses to mount a short-lived offensive north of the Bío Bío River, eventually being repulsed when he assaults Freyre's patriot garrison at Talcahuano.

This same month, royalist captain Juan Manuel Silva leads a revolt in Venezuela against Morillo's command and is promoted lieutenant colonel upon joining the patriot cause.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1820. Spanish colonel Balbuena leads a midnight sally out of Cartagena (Colombia) with 420 soldiers of the León Regiment and 60 gunners to attack Montilla's patriot siege lines near Turbaco. They disembark at Cospique and at 6:00 a.m. surprise the 1,000-man patriot garrison at Belavista, which consists of the Magdalena and Bajo Magdalena Chasseur battalions, plus a Soledad cavalry squadron, under Col. Ramón Ayala. The startled defenders flee in disarray, suffering 125 killed and 50 wounded, before the Spaniards retire after spiking the guns.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1820. San Martín's Peruvian Campaign. The Argentino-Chilean expedition anchors in Paracas Bay, where las Heras disembarks with the 11th Reinforced Battalion, then marches nine miles northward to seize Pisco. Its 600-man royalist garrison under Col. Manuel Quimper Benítez del Pino withdraws toward Ica rather than resist, hence Pisco falls and the insurgent fleet enters its roadstead four days later, San Martín's main army coming ashore to occupy it along with Caucato and Chincha. Outnumbered by the loyalist forces remaining in Peru, his aim is to avoid battle while winning over the inhabitants. A brief truce is arranged with Viceroy de la Pezuela between September 26 and October 4, after which hostilities resume.

San Martín's Peruvian campaign.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1820. Because of Dorrego's capture (see "July 18, 1820" entry), Gen. Martín Rodríguez is proclaimed governor of Buenos Aires. Five days later, Brigadier General Pagola rises up against him, his faction being put down, however, after two days' heavy fighting in the streets. The 5th Colorados del Monte militia cavalry regiment proves crucial in supporting Rodríguez, winning its 27-year-old commander Juan Manuel de Rosas a promotion to colonel.

OCTOBER 1, 1820. Bolívar enters Mérida (Venezuela) with his staff only, its royalist garrison having fled the previous day.

OCTOBER 4, 1820. San Martín's subordinate Gen. Álvarez de Arenales marches inland from Pisco (Peru) with 2,500 men in two battalions, a half squadron of cavalry, and two fieldpieces, to raise an insurrection in the Andes. Three days later, his cavalrymen under Rufino Guido scatter Quimper's royalist force at Palpa, two companies joining Álvarez de Arenales's army rather than continue serving the monarchist cause.

OCTOBER 9, 1820. A popular uprising occurs at Guayaquil against Spanish rule, and this region's independence is proclaimed.

OCTOBER 12, 1820. News reaches Rio de Janeiro that a populist insurrection has erupted in the Portuguese city of Oporto, demanding the creation of a new liberal constitution and the return of the royal family from Brazil, where the family has lived for more than 12 years. As similar revolts erupt amid Portuguese and liberal enclaves throughout Brazil, pressure will increase upon King João VI to reassume his throne at Lisbon as a restricted “constitutional monarch.” Brazilians resent this pressure, fearing that a resumption of Portuguese preeminence will once more reduce them to colonial status.

OCTOBER 15, 1820. Álvarez de Arenales’s subordinate, Lt. Col. Manuel Rojas, leads 80 patriot cavalrymen and 80 mounted grenadiers in a surprise attack against Colonel Quimper’s royalist base at Nazca (Peru), killing 41 and capturing 86. The next day, the loyalists’ ammunition train is also seized at Acari by Lt. Vicente Suárez with 30 chasseurs. By October 21, Álvarez de Arenales’s insurgent army strikes into the Andean foothills.

OCTOBER 28, 1820. Leaving a small patriot garrison at Pisco (Peru), San Martín’s Chileo–Argentine expedition reembarks and sails northwestward, appearing before Callao the next day, then disembarking 30 miles northwest of Lima at Ancón on October 30. Again, San Martín pursues a non-confrontational policy, sowing revolutionary sedition while avoiding major battles.

This same day, the 500-man “British Legion” mutinies at Achaguas (Venezuela), killing or wounding several of its officers before being put down by Páez.

NOVEMBER 3, 1820. Cochrane arrives outside Callao with the O’Higgins, the Lautaro, and the 28-gun corvette Independencia, two nights later leading 14 boats bearing 160 seamen and 80 marines past its boom—as well as the anchored USS Macedonian and 42-gun HMS Hyperion of Capt. Thomas Searle—to board the 44-gun Spanish frigate Esmeralda of Capt. Luis Coig. At a cost of 11 dead and 30 wounded, the insurgents storm this vessel, inflicting 160 casualties among its sleeping crew within 15 minutes before sailing it out with 200 prisoners still aboard. They eventually rename it the Valdivia.

NOVEMBER 9, 1820. San Martín’s Chileo–Argentine expedition quits Ancón (Peru), sailing farther north to disembark three days later at Huacho and then taking up defensive positions beyond the Huaura River. In response, Viceroy de la Pezuela orders royalist colonel Jerónimo Valdéz to advance with 2,000 troops to check this invasion force.

That same day, the so-called Protectora (Protector) Division formed by the patriots at Guayaquil—while marching inland under Luis Urdaneta and León de Febres-Cordero with the aim of liberating Quito—defeats a royalist contingent at Camino Real near Bilován under Gen. Melchor Aymerich, president of the regional audiencia.

NOVEMBER 11, 1820. In the Andes, royalist brigadier general José Montenegro, the intendant of Huancavelica, digs in at Izcuchaca Bridge with 600 militiamen and two cannon to oppose Álvarez de Arenales’s passage of the Mantaro River with his patriot army. The latter fights his way across at Mayoc Bridge, obliging Montenegro to retire toward Tarma and eventually to flee into Jauja.

NOVEMBER 16, 1820. The royalist Iturbide quits Mexico City for Teloloapan, having been appointed commander of New Spain’s southern district, with orders to subdue the last vestiges of guerrilla activity under Guerrero and Pedro Ascencio Alquisiras.

NOVEMBER 22, 1820. At Huachi near Ambato (Ecuador), the patriot division marching to liberate Quito is crushed by a royalist division led by Col. Francisco González and compelled to retire toward Guayaquil.

NOVEMBER 24, 1820. The Treaty of Benegas is signed in Argentina, intended to bring a halt to the fratricidal struggle between Buenos Aires, Santa Fe, and Córdoba.

NOVEMBER 26, 1820. After four days of meetings at Trujillo (Venezuela), patriot and royalist delegates arrange a six-month truce between Bolívar’s and Morillo’s forces. Shortly thereafter—December 3—the latter turns over command of his remaining 10,000 troops to de la Torre and returns to Spain, where Morillo is eventually invested as Conde de Cartagena and Marqués de la Puerta (see “March 15, 1818” entry) for his New World services.

NOVEMBER 29, 1820. A large contingent of Indian rebels are slaughtered at Huamanga (Peru) by royalist brigadier general Mariano Ricafort, followed by a similarly lopsided encounter at Cangallo three days later.

DECEMBER 1, 1820. News of the constitutional insurrection in Portugal is brought into the Brazilian port of Belém do Pará by the galley Nova Amazonas. As this province is temporarily without a governor, colonels João Pereira Vilaça and Francisco José Rodrigues Barata are persuaded to support the election of a nine-member, pro-Portuguese “provisional constitutional junta” one month later.

DECEMBER 2, 1820. General Carrera, dissatisfied with the terms of the Treaty of Benegas, sacks and burns Buenos Aires’s suburb of Salto in conjunction with Indian warriors, then retires southward. He is pursued two weeks later by General Ramírez in the so-called Expedición al desierto or “Expedition to the Desert,” which fails to catch the renegade. After capturing San Luis and laying siege to Córdoba in March, Carrera is defeated.

DECEMBER 3, 1820. In Peru, the 675-man Numancia Battalion—originally recruited in Venezuela—mutinies and switches allegiance, abandoning the royalist cause to join San Martín’s army. Within the next several weeks, its strength is built back up to a full 1,000 men.

DECEMBER 6, 1820. Cerro de Pasco. High in the Peruvian Andes, Álvarez de Arenales’s insurgent army is checked at Cerro de Pasco by 1,200 royalist infantrymen, 180 cavalrymen, and two fieldpieces under Gen. Alejandro O’Reilly. Early on this snowy morning, a company of patriots drags four cannon atop Pasco’s commanding hill, opening fire when three patriot attack columns finally advance after the weather clears. After being outflanked, the royalists break and flee, suffering 58 killed, 18 wounded, and 380 captured—plus numerous others taken in following days, including O’Reilly himself.

DECEMBER 15, 1820. To avenge a native assault against Salto, Gen. Martín Rodríguez marches southward out of Buenos Aires with 1,600 Argentine troops to scatter any bands of hostile nomads over the ensuing month.

DECEMBER 29, 1820. More than 5,000 poorly armed Indian rebels under patriot colonel Bermúdez and Maj. Félix Aldao are massacred by royalist general Ricafort at Huancaayo (Peru).

JANUARY 2, 1821. Guerrero defeats a small loyalist contingent at Zapotepéc (Mexico).

JANUARY 5, 1821. The Mexican guerrilla leader Ascencio defeats a royalist force at Tlatlaya.

At Tanizahua (Ecuador), meanwhile, a patriot band under Colonel García is surprised and routed by a royalist contingent.

JANUARY 8, 1821. Álvarez de Arenales’s insurgent army rejoins San Martín at the headwaters of the Chancay River, high within the Peruvian Andes.

JANUARY 10, 1821. Iturbide contacts the insurgent leader Guerrero, proposing that, rather than continue skirmishing against each other, they join forces to forge a new alliance for Mexico’s independence based upon Spain’s liberal constitution of 1812.

JANUARY 18, 1821. A group of Maracaibo’s leading inhabitants conspire against Spanish rule, allowing patriot general Urdaneta to close off the lagoon and blockade the royalist garrison inside. On January 26, Urdaneta advances with a battalion of troops to the very edge of this lagoon and, by the evening of the 28th, sends a column under Cuban-born lieutenant colonel José Rafael de las Heras to support a “revolution” within—this offensive being a clear violation of the six-month truce arranged only two months previously. Spanish general de la Torre complains to Bolívar about this breach, to no avail.

José Miguel Carrera. (Library of Congress)

JANUARY 29, 1821. Following a mutiny by the Spanish generals Canterac and Valdés at Asnapuquio (near Lima), Peru’s viceroy de la Pezuela is deposed in favor of royalist general de la Serna.

JANUARY 30, 1821. Cochrane arrives before Callao with 650 insurgent troops under the English mercenary lieutenant colonel William Miller to accept the prearranged surrender of its shore defenses. This surrender fails to materialize, so the patriot expedition returns into Huacho.

FEBRUARY 2, 1821. Patriot general Manuel Valdés, having been ordered by Bolívar the previous November to advance against Pasto (Colombia) and secure it at all costs before any general truce can be arranged with the Spaniards, is instead defeated by the royalist forces of Basilio García at Genoy, south of the Juanambú River. He is thus recalled in favor of the 25-year-old Venezuelan, Brigadier General Sucre.

FEBRUARY 21, 1821. A pro-constitutionalist insurrection erupts at Salvador in Bahia (Brazil). When its royal governor Conde da Palma orders the marshal Felisberto Caldeira Brant Pontes to call out his troops, only 160 prove to be loyal to the king. The governor therefore goes along with the creation of a “provisional constitutional junta,” which contacts the Cortes or “Parliament” in Lisbon directly, recognizing it as sole legitimate representative of the government rather than the king at Rio de Janeiro.

The Cortes will in turn send out 1,200 troops of the Legião Constitucional Lusitana or “Lusitanian Constitutional Legion” to act as a new pro-Portuguese garrison, while the marshal Luís Paulino de Oliveira Pinto de França becomes the city’s military governor.

FEBRUARY 24, 1821. Iturbide, Guerrero, and other Mexican insurgent leaders announce the “Plan of Iguala,” whereby their nation proclaims its freedom from Spain, subject to three conditions or “guarantees”: the predominance of Catholic faith, total independence (although under the continuing symbolic rule of Spain’s royal family), and a union or reconciliation between Mexico’s embittered Creoles and peninsulars. Viceroy Ruiz de Apodaca rejects this arrangement and declares Iturbide an outlaw on March 14.

MARCH 10, 1821. At a conference held at Acatempan (near Teloloapan, Mexico), Guerrero agrees to merge his insurgent forces with Iturbide’s loyalists, thus creating the patriotic Ejército de las Tres Garantías or “Army of the Three Guarantees” (representing Catholicism, independence, and union, better known as the Ejército Trigarante).

That same day in Venezuela, Bolívar informs the Spanish general de la Torre that, because of disputes over certain territories, the six-month truce arranged in November 1820 will be rescinded by the patriots within 40 days.

MARCH 13, 1821. Cochrane departs Huacho (Peru) with three ships bearing 500 patriot infantrymen and 100 cavalymen under Lieutenant Colonel Miller. They disembark one week later at Pisco, being distantly observed by royalist lieutenant colonel García Camba’s 200 troopers in the Chincha Valley. However, neither side campaigns very vigorously due to a malaria outbreak in the region.

MARCH 23, 1821. The 27-year-old loyalist Antonio López de Santa Anna arrives at Orizaba (Mexico) with 200 troopers, arresting Cristóbal Ballesteros for suspected disloyalty. The latter attempts to persuade Santa Anna to join Iturbide and Guerrero’s Ejército Trigarante, but the young officer at first resists, then is defeated in an engagement. He subsequently switches allegiance and accepts appointment as lieutenant colonel under insurrectionist general José Joaquín de Herrera, so that together they overrun Córdoba. Herrera then marches off for Puebla, while Santa Anna subdues Topete at Alvarado (state of Veracruz).

MARCH 24, 1821. Insurrectionist generals Luis de Cortazar and Anastasio Bustamante capture the city of Guanajuato.

APRIL 1821. The Argentine town of Dolores is destroyed by an Indian invasion out of the south, prompting a counterexpedition two years later by

Gen. Martín Rodríguez, who builds Fort Independencia on the banks of Tandil Creek.

APRIL 2, 1821. Cochrane blockades Callao for three days.

APRIL 10, 1821. High in the Peruvian Andes, at Ataura (near Jauja), a royalist army under Ricafort slaughters 500 of 3,000 poorly armed Indian rebels, while suffering only a single man slightly injured among its own ranks.

APRIL 15, 1821. A month after breaking Argentina's northern frontier, the vanguard of Olañeta's royalist army briefly enters Jujuy before pressing southward. On April 23, Olañeta's 500-man vanguard under Marquiegui is annihilated seven miles north of Yala at León by 600 patriots under Gen. José Ignacio de Gorriti. This reversal prompts Olañeta to retire to Mojos, leaving a small garrison at Yalvi under Lt. Col. Jerónimo Valdéz.

APRIL 21, 1821. Patriot general Álvarez de Arenales departs Huaura (Peru) with 2,500 men in three battalions and a cavalry squadron, plus four fieldpieces, to once more campaign against the royalists in the Andes.

This same day farther south at Pisco, 180 of Miller's sick patriot troops are reembarked for return to Huacho aboard two of Cochrane's vessels, while the third—his flagship San Martín—sets sail southwest with the remaining 400 and another 100 black Peruvian recruits to attack Arica (Chile).

APRIL 22, 1821. Bowing to increased pressure on all sides to return to Portugal and reassume the throne there, King João VI crowns his 22-year-old eldest son Pedro as prince regent of Brazil, then four days later sails away with the rest of the royal family. Brazilians remain angry and uneasy, fearing that their semiautonomous status will be rescinded after the king is back under direct control of the Portuguese Cortes.

APRIL 25, 1821. The insurrectionist Mexican general Herrera is defeated at Tepeaca by loyalist colonel Francisco Hevia, but after being reinforced by Santa Anna, the combined forces drive off colonels Juan Horbegoso and Flores, thus gaining Jalapa.

APRIL 28, 1821. This morning, hostilities resume between Venezuela's patriots and loyalists when a cavalry detachment crosses the Santo Domingo River and routs a royalist outpost at Boconó. Patriot colonel Ambrosio Plaza's Guardia Division follows this action up by entering Guanare, then marching upon San Carlos, which is evacuated by the loyalists and taken by Bolívar for his headquarters.

MAY 1821. Sucre reaches Guayaquil with 700 troops to bolster its recently proclaimed independence.

MAY 1, 1821. Iturbide's Ejército Trigarante enters León (state of Guanajuato, Mexico), having marched uncontested from Teloloapan via Tlalchapa, Cutzamala, Tusanla, Zitácuaro, and Acámbaro. Field Marshal Liñán has refused to stir from his Cuernavaca headquarters with the loyalist southern army during this progression.

MAY 3, 1821. Argentine Civil War. Fighting resumes when General Ramírez—deploring Buenos Aires's refusal to declare war against the Portuguese invaders of Uruguay—fords across from Bajada del Paraná with 1,200 riders and advances upon Santa Fe. Three days later, López repels Ramírez's 960 men with four fieldpieces before his capital, obliging the latter to retreat toward Rosario. On May 8, Ramírez meets a similar-sized cavalry force under Lamadrid just north of Rosario, which he defeats and pushes back toward Medio Creek.

MAY 4, 1821. Cochrane's San Martín bombards Arica (Chile), then disembarks Colonel Miller's small regiment at nearby Sama. One contingent under Major Soler occupies Arica one week later, while Miller's larger company takes Tacna on May 14 with little opposition.

MAY 11, 1821. Patriot general Urdaneta occupies Coro (Venezuela), installing Col. Juan de Escalona as governor while chasing its fleeing loyalists as far as San Juan del Tocuyo.

MAY 12, 1821. Guatire. The Venezuelan patriot general Bermúdez—after arriving from Cumaná with 1,200 men—defeats a similar-sized loyalist force under Col. José María Hernández Monagas at Ibarra Mill (near Guatire), suffering 7 dead and 8 wounded as compared to 50 killed, 60 injured, and 100 captured among his opponents.

Two days later, Bermúdez occupies Caracas at 5:00 p.m., while its loyalist residents flee toward Puerto Cabello and Curaçao aboard a flotilla of 70 vessels, escorted by the Spanish frigate Ligera of Capt. Angel Laborde y Navarro. Bermúdez then empties the arsenal at La Guaira, raises a host of volunteers, and proceeds toward the Aragua Valleys by May 18.

MAY 19, 1821. At Lagunetas (Venezuela), Bermúdez's patriot army chases off some loyalist skirmishers, then the next day defeats 700 men under Governor Correa at Consejo, finding the Spanish brigadier general Tomás de Cires among its captives. As the patriots occupy Victoria, the beaten loyalists fall back upon Valencia.

News of Bermúdez's successful sweep persuades Spanish general de la Torre to leave his 1st and 5th divisions (1,700 men) at Araure to watch Bolívar while countermarching toward San Carlos with 2,800 infantrymen to challenge Bermúdez and reconquer Caracas.

MAY 20, 1821. Valladolid (today Morelia, Mexico) surrenders to Iturbide.

MAY 22, 1821. Learning that three royalist columns are converging from Oruro, Puno, and Arequipa (Peru) to contest his invasion of northern Chile, patriot lieutenant colonel Miller surprises the first of these—Lieutenant Colonel La Hera's 250 soldiers—at Mirave with 310 insurgent infantrymen, 70 cavalrymen, and 60 montonero guerrillas. The royalists suffer 44 killed and 106 captured, as opposed to 25 deaths among Miller's ranks.

As this engagement is concluding, royalist lieutenant colonel Rivero arrives with an additional 250 troops, only to immediately retire and be pursued. Two days later, another 30 monarchists are killed at Moquegua, and Rivero's company finally collapses upon the insurgent approach against Callera on May 26, most either being captured or voluntarily joining the rebels' ranks.

MAY 23, 1821. The Peruvian viceroy de la Serna signs a brief truce with San Martín, known as the Punchaica Armistice, which ends on June 30.

MAY 24, 1821. Coronda. Despite his May 8 setback near Rosario, the Buenos Aires general Lamadrid is reinforced and rides with 1,500 troopers to join López in defense of his capital of Santa Fe (Argentina); however, 24 miles south-southwest of that city at Coronda, Lamadrid chances upon Ramírez with 700 cavalrymen, so attacks in hopes of cutting this renegade off from the Paraná River. Instead, though, Lamadrid is outflanked and defeated, leaving Ramírez in possession of the battlefield.

Two days later, López—who has been riding with 700 troopers to meet Lamadrid—incorporates 300 of the latter's stragglers into his ranks. He in turn surprises Ramírez at Coronda, who retreats toward Desmochados, hoping to unite with his fellow renegade Carrera.

MAY 24, 1821. Márquez. Brigadier General Morales's 2,800 loyalists attack Bermúdez's 1,500 patriots, who are well dug in at Márquez (between Las Lajas and Las Cocuizas, near Caracas). The patriots succeed in repulsing their attackers throughout this day, but after nightfall they retire from the field. They evacuate Caracas by the 26th, continuing their retreat toward Guatire pursued by the 2nd Valencey Battalion under Spanish brigadier general Pereira.

JUNE 5, 1821. The patriot leader Reyes Vargas advances upon San Felipe (Venezuela) with 100 cavalrymen and 500 infantrymen, being defeated southeast of this city at Cocorote by loyalist colonel Lorenzo. The patriots leave 80 dead and a like number of wounded upon the field.

Three days later, Reyes Vargas materializes at Tinajas north of San Felipe, only to once again be beaten by Lorenzo at La Candelaria. He then withdraws south.

JUNE 8, 1821. At dawn, royalist lieutenant colonel Valdéz slips into Salta in northern Argentina with 400 riders, capturing this city along with patriot general de Güemes. Two weeks later, royalist general Olañeta arrives with 1,200 troops, but by July 14 he comes to terms with the local patriots and retires into Bolivia.

JUNE 11, 1821. Páez joins Bolívar at San Carlos (Venezuela) with 1,000 infantrymen and 1,500 cavalrymen. When Urdaneta arrives five days later with another 2,000 troops, the total patriot strength is brought to 6,500 soldiers in three divisions.

JUNE 14, 1821. Bermúdez, after a rapid march, surprises Lucas González's 550 loyalists at Macuto Promontory near Santa Lucía (Venezuela) and destroys this force. The loyalist commander loses his life, while his men suffer 148 casualties and 200 taken prisoners, only 260 managing to escape. Patriot losses are 73 dead and wounded.

JUNE 16, 1821. Having joined forces, the renegade generals Ramírez's and Carrera's 700 troopers fall upon 200 Argentine republican cavalymen, 300 infantrymen, and four fieldpieces under Bustos at Cruz Alta (west of Rosario). Unable to overwhelm this position, the attackers withdraw toward Fraile Muerto upon learning of Lamadrid's approach with a relief column. Ramírez then retires north of Córdoba with some 200 followers, while Carrera proceeds toward the Cuarto River with 700 men, hoping to regain his Chilean homeland.

JUNE 19, 1821. Patriot lieutenant colonel Laurencio Silva's cavalry squadron overruns a Spanish picket force at Tinaquillo (near Carabobo, Venezuela).

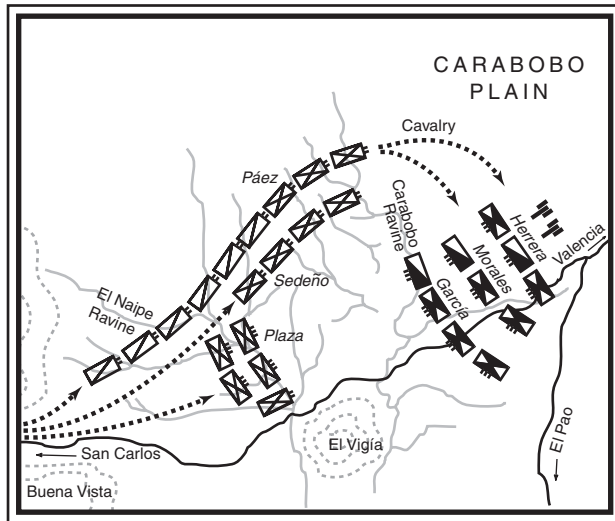

JUNE 22, 1821. Colonel Carrillo's 1,000 patriots enter San Felipe (Venezuela), after its loyalist garrison under Lorenzo was compelled to evacuate because of a threatened encirclement.

JUNE 23, 1821. Calvario. On Calvario Hill just west of Caracas, Brigadier General Pereira makes a stand behind Caruata Creek with 1,200 loyalists against Bermúdez's similar-sized patriot force. The latter attacks ferociously in twin columns until his small army is annihilated by the afternoon, having suffered 500 casualties plus another 500 lost as prisoners or deserters. Bermúdez retreats toward Guaremas with his 200 survivors, briefly pursued by the victorious Pereira.

JUNE 24, 1821. Carabobo. This morning, while advancing northeastward against Valencia (Venezuela), Bolívar crests Buena Vista Heights with General Páez's 1st Division in the van, consisting of the Bravos de Apure Battalion under Colonel Torres, the Cazadores Británicos or "British Legion" under Col. Thomas Farriar, the Honor Infantry Regiment under Colonel Muñóz, Páez's Hussar Regiment under Colonel Iribarren, the Regimiento de la Muerte or

Scene from the Battle of Carabobo, detail from a mural in Venezuela's capitol building, Caracas. (El Capitolio, Caracas)

Battle of Carabobo.

“Regiment of Death” under Colonel Borrás, the Honor Lancer Regiment under Colonel Farfán, the Cazadores Valientes or “Brave Chasseurs” under Lieutenant Colonel Gómez, the “Venganza” Regiment under Major Escalona, plus a reserve under Colonel Rosales. General Sedeño’s 2nd Division is comprised of the Vargas Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Gravete, the Boyacá Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Flegel, the “Tiradores” Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel de las Heras, and the Sagrado Squadron of Colonel Aramendi. General Plaza’s 3rd Division brings up the rear: the Anzoátegui Battalion of Colonel Arguindegui, the “Vencedor en Boyacá” Battalion of Col. Johann von Uslar, the Grenadier Battalion of Col. Francisco de Paula Vélez (under its acting commander, Manrique), the Rifle Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Sandes, the “Primero de la Guardia” Cavalry Regiment of Colonel Rondón, the dragoon squadron of Lt. Col. Julián Mellado, and a hussar squadron under Col. Fernando Figueredo.

These 6,400 patriots sight 5,100 royalists awaiting them three miles away on the Carabobo Plain and its surrounding hills under General de la Torre, Col. Tomás García’s 1st Division consisting of the 1st Valencey Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Riesco, the Barbastro Light Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Montero, the Hostalrich Light Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Illas, and the “Fernando VII” Hussar Regiment under Lieutenant Colonel Calderón. General Morales’s Vanguard Division is comprised of the 2nd Burgos Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Dalmar, the “Infante don Francisco de Paula” Light Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel Sicilia, as well as the Del Rey Lancer Regiment of Lieutenant Colonel Renovales. Colonel Herrera’s 5th Division is made up of the Príncipe Light Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel de Castro, the “Leales a Fernando VII” Dragoon Regiment of Lieutenant Colonel Morales, General de la Torre’s Regiment under Lieutenant Colonel López, plus two horse artillery pieces and 62 men under Capt. Vicente Mercadillo.

The Liberator sends Páez’s division down a track running off to the left of the San Carlos Road, passing through a narrow defile in hopes of outflanking the defenders. The patriots’ Apure Battalion, backed by the British Battalion and several companies of the “Tiradores” Battalion of the 2nd Division, manage to fight their way through after 15 minutes of bloody exchanges, during which they lose a third of their number. At this point, the insurgent cavalry charges out onto the plain, putting the royalist riders to flight, then rolling up their infantry, which surrenders in large numbers. Within an hour, de la Torre abandons his artillery to make an orderly retreat with his reserves and part of his cavalry the 20 miles into Valencia, closely pursued by Páez’s llaneros and the Grenadier and Rifle battalions under Bolívar. The Spanish general succeeds in cutting his way through, although only the royalist Valencey Battalion actually reaches the city intact.

Loyalist losses are estimated at 1,000 dead or wounded, plus another 1,500 captured. Patriot losses total 200 killed, mostly among the British mercenaries, and an unknown number of injuries. Generals Sedeño and Plaza, plus colonels Farriar and Mellado, are among the most prominent of the dead.

JUNE 25, 1821. At dawn, patriot colonel Montilla launches a surprise attack against Cartagena’s beleaguered loyalist garrison, in conjunction with a naval squadron under Commo. José Padilla—which has gained the inner roadstead thanks to the defenders’ earlier retreat from its Bocachica fortress. The royalists mass all their strength to oppose a feint against their landward defenses by Col. Friedrich de Adlercreutz (a Swedish count serving the republican cause), thus allowing Padilla to make off with 11 ships.

JUNE 28, 1821. This evening, Bolívar enters Caracas to a tumultuous reception. The next day he detaches Lt. Col. Diego Ibarra to occupy its nearby port of La Guaira. The latter is at first prevented by the intervention of Col. José Pereira’s loyalist column, but it surrenders upon the appearance of the main republican army. In all of Venezuela, only Puerto Cabello and Cumaná remain in royalist hands.

JULY 1, 1821. Bravo besieges the Mexican city of Puebla.

JULY 2, 1821. Surrounded by patriot forces, loyalist commander Pereira retreats into La Guaira (Venezuela), surrendering his 700 men the next day before sailing with 200 followers for Puerto Cabello aboard a French vessel. He dies shortly thereafter of yellow fever.

JULY 5, 1821. Most of New Spain having joined Iturbide's call for independence, artillery general Francisco Novella mutinies in the isolated royalist capital of Mexico City at the head of a group of officers, deposing the seemingly ineffectual viceroy Ruiz de Apodaca and returning him to Spain. Some 5,000 soldiers are then mustered to defend the city.

JULY 6, 1821. Peruvian viceroy de la Serna has evacuated Lima in favor of the seaport of Callao on the previous dawn because of starvation and disease within the capital (leaving behind only 1,000 troops who are too sick to march). The city becomes the scene of widespread looting as royalist civilians also take flight. The insurgents arrive three days later, proclaiming the country's independence by July 28.

JULY 7, 1821. Santa Anna storms loyalist Veracruz in a failed assault, which costs him half his men. He then imposes a tight siege.

JULY 10, 1821. Renegade Argentine general Ramírez is overtaken at San Francisco del Chañar (110 miles north of Córdoba) by 400 republican cavalymen under the acting governor Bedoya, who defeats and slays him.

JULY 11, 1821. After leading a loyalist revolt in Coro (Venezuela), Spanish lieutenant colonel Pedro Luis Inchauspe sorties with 800 men and attacks patriot governor Escalona at the port of Cumarebo, being repulsed with considerable losses.

JULY 17, 1821. A group of royalists rebel at Guayaquil (Ecuador), seizing the corvette Alejandro and bombarding the city wharf, until driven out to sea several hours later by the shore batteries under Commander Reina. The loyalists are then pursued by the patriot brig Sacramento and two schooners under Commander Luzarraga, who recaptures their boats.

JULY 19, 1821. Patriot commander Nicolás López mutinies with his infantry battalion northeast of Guayaquil at Babahoyo (Ecuador) and marches east up into the Andes to join the royalist general Aymerich at Guaranda. However, López is overtaken at Palo Largo by several of Sucre's dragoon squadrons and must fight his way through, ending up with only 170 survivors.

JULY 22, 1821. Patriot lieutenant colonel Miller evacuates Arica (Chile), his small regiment traveling aboard two brigantines.

JULY 30, 1821. Viceroy-designate and liberal lieutenant general Juan O'Donojú reaches New Spain to find that only three of its cities remain loyal to Madrid—Mexico City, Acapulco, and Veracruz—while the rest of the country has already joined Iturbide's cause. Bowing to the inevitable, O'Donojú obtains a safe conduct from Veracruz's besieger Santa Anna and three weeks later signs the Treaty of Córdoba recognizing Mexico's independence as a limited constitutional monarchy to be governed by a three-member regency (an agreement that the Spanish government later refuses to ratify).

AUGUST 3, 1821. Álvarez de Arenales's patriot army enters Lima from its Andean campaign.

AUGUST 4, 1821. The armies of royalist generals de la Serna and Canterac unite at Jauja (Peru) for a last stand. They total some 4,000 sickly troops.

AUGUST 8, 1821. Loyalist commander Inchauspe has been reinforced at Coro (Venezuela) by 500 Spanish troops from Puerto Cabello under Colonel Tello. Both contingents—now totaling 1,250 men—advance to once more attack patriot governor Escalona at Cumarebo. However, the latter has also been joined by 500 cavalymen under Col. Juan Gómez, so his combined force of 800 men successfully repels this assault.

AUGUST 12, 1821. Yaguachi. Sucre waits on Palo Largo Plain (Ecuador) with his 1,200-man patriot army for the approaching 700 royalist cavalymen and 1,200 infantrymen under General Aymerich advancing from Guaranda. The latter appears this same day, yet refuses to attack, expecting the arrival of a further 1,000 loyalist infantry—Colonel González’s “Constitución” Battalion—from Cuenca that will allow them to threaten the patriots from two directions.

Learning on August 17 that this second loyalist force is drawing near, Sucre retires swiftly to Yaguachi (alternate spelling, Yahuachi), reconnoitering through its surrounding woods for González’s column the next day. On the 19th, he finds it nine miles away at Cone and brings up his main body to interpose across its path, while simultaneously launching a surprise attack with his vanguard: Mires’s “Santander” Battalion plus a squadron of dragoons. González’s startled loyalists form a square in a clearing, only to be pulverized by a cavalry charge, then chased from the field by the Albión and “Guayaquil” battalions. Spanish losses total 152 dead, 88 wounded, and 600 captured, González escaping back across the Río Nuevo with scarcely 120 followers. Sucre suffers 18 killed and 22 injured. He then retraces his steps on August 22 toward Babahoyo, prompting Aymerich to retreat northeast into the Andes a few days later.

AUGUST 14, 1821. Siege of Callao. A month after the occupation of Lima, patriot general las Heras assaults the Pacific port of Callao with 1,200 men, only to be repelled by its 2,000-man royalist garrison under Gen. José de la Mar.

On September 10, another 3,200 royalists under Canterac slip past the 5,900 patriots guarding Lima and help themselves to Callao’s vast quantity of military stores. With the sickly insurgent forces powerless to intervene, Canterac emerges six days later and marches northward into the Chillón Valley with his booty, trailed at a discreet distance by 800 patriot riders under Miller.

De la Mar thereupon offers on September 19 to switch allegiances and surrender empty Callao, his terms being accepted by the patriots two days later.

AUGUST 25, 1821. Inchauspe surrenders to patriot colonel Rangel at Pedregal (Venezuela), thus bringing the brief loyalist insurrection at Coro to an end.

AUGUST 31, 1821. After defeating republican general Bruno Morón on the banks of the Cuarto River, the Chilean-born renegade Carrera is intercepted at Médano Point on the north shore of Guanacache Lake (Argentina) while marching around Mendoza toward San Juan. His contingent is overtaken by Col. José Albino Gutiérrez’s cavalry and annihilated. Carrera is executed in Mendoza four days later.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1821. Mexican forces under Isidro Montes de Oca and 31-year-old Juan N. Álvarez besiege the royalist garrison within Fort San Diego at Acapulco, while Santa Anna takes Perote near Jalapa (state of Veracruz).

SEPTEMBER 12, 1821. Huachi (or Ambato). Having advanced northeast up into the Andes following his victory at Yaguachi (Ecuador), Sucre’s 100 patriot cavalrymen and 900 infantrymen are cornered at Huachi—near the town of Ambato—by 500 loyalist troopers and 1,200 infantrymen under Aymerich. Hoping to fight a defensive battle from behind fences and hedges, Sucre is let down by his second-in-command, Mires, who leads the “Guayaquil” Battalion out into the open during a heated counterattack.

Compelled to support this advance unit or watch it be destroyed, Sucre’s other contingents sally and are defeated after five hours of heavy fighting by a two-pronged loyalist infantry assault, preceded by a heavy cavalry charge led by Spanish colonel José Moles. The patriot army is devastated, suffering more than 300 casualties and 500 captives—including Mires and numerous other officers. Sucre is lucky to escape this rout with 100 men.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1821. At a meeting held between Iturbide, O’Donojú, and Novella at the Pateza Hacienda near Mexico City, the latter agrees to surrender the capital without a struggle.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1821. Insurgent admiral Brion dies in Amsterdam.

Also on this date, the 9,000 infantrymen and 7,000 cavalrymen of Iturbide’s Ejército Trigante occupy Mexico City on his 38th birthday, effectively ending Spanish rule in the viceroyalty and marking the country’s full independence. The next day, Nicaragua also declares its independence, followed by El Salvador on September 29.

OCTOBER 1, 1821. Loyalist brigadier general Gabriel de Torres surrenders the city of Cartagena (Colombia) to its 2,500 patriot besiegers under Montilla. By the terms of this capitulation, more than 700 Spanish officers and men are allowed to sail away to Cuba.

OCTOBER 6, 1821. Cochrane departs Callao, angered by arrears in pay owed to his revolutionary squadron.

OCTOBER 15, 1821. In Mexico, the 31-year-old insurgent leader Juan N. Alvarez officially accepts the surrender of Fort San Diego at Acapulco.

OCTOBER 16, 1821. The Spaniards formally surrender the city of Cumaná (Venezuela) to patriot general Bermúdez, who arranges for their 800-man garrison under Caturla to be transported to Puerto Rico aboard Colombian ships.

OCTOBER 25, 1821. General Dávila, still loyal to Spain's Ferdinand VII, retires across the bay from the city of Veracruz to hold its offshore island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa for the Crown.

OCTOBER 26, 1821. Spanish general Juan de la Cruz Mourgeon departs Panama with 800 regulars as reinforcements for South America, reaching Quito (Ecuador) on the day before Christmas.

NOVEMBER 6, 1821. The loyalist commander Carrera besieges Col. Juan Gómez's patriot garrison within Coro (Venezuela). On the third day of this siege, patriot commander León Pérez fights his way inside with a relief column, then the next day their combined forces scatter the besiegers.

NOVEMBER 12, 1821. Learning that Chiapas has declared its independence from Spain and wishes to become incorporated into Mexico, Iturbide dispatches 5,000 soldiers under the Conde de la Cadena to ensure the peaceful fulfillment of this goal.

NOVEMBER 19, 1821. At Babahoyo (Ecuador), Sucre signs a temporary armistice with Aymerich's representative, Col. Carlos Tolrá, whereby the royalists agree to retire high up into the Andes around Riobamba, while the patriots remain concentrated around their coastal stronghold of Guayaquil.

NOVEMBER 22, 1821. Juan Lindo, insurgent leader at Comayagua (Honduras), announces his country's incorporation into Mexico.

NOVEMBER 28, 1821. Panama declares itself independent from Spain, instead opting to become part of Colombia.

DECEMBER 7, 1821. Royalist colonel Lórida defeats 300 badly armed insurgent militiamen and 5,000 Indians at Cerro de Pasco (Peru).

DECEMBER 9, 1821. Decrees issued by the Portuguese Cortes reach Rio de Janeiro, abolishing Brazil's status as a kingdom and ordering the return to Lisbon of Prince Regent Pedro. A groundswell of support soon coalesces behind the young monarch.

DECEMBER 17, 1821. Royalist colonel Carratalá torches the town of Cangallo (Peru) for rebelling.

DECEMBER 29, 1821. Certain factions in Guatemala City and Quezaltenango request to become incorporated into Mexico.

JANUARY 9, 1822. The former Spanish captain general of Guatemala, Gabino Gaínza, announces the union of all of Central America.

JANUARY 11, 1822. The Spanish frigates Venganza and Prueba contact Sucre at Guayaquil, offering to switch allegiances and join the insurgent cause in return for payments to their crews. Four days later, they receive 80,000 pesos and become incorporated into Peru's navy under orders from San Martín.

JANUARY 12, 1822. Luso-Brazilian Schism. At Rio de Janeiro, the Prince Regent Pedro has refused three days earlier to obey the Portuguese Cortes's recall to Lisbon, as well as their peremptory relegation of Brazil to secondary status within the empire. Lt. Gen. Jorge Avilez's Voluntarios d'El Rei or "King's Volunteers" Regiment—2,000 Portuguese regulars recently returned from service at Montevideo—thereupon proclaims its intention of embarking that same evening for Europe, taking the prince with them.

Thousands of Brazilian militiamen, black Henriques guerrillas, and Indian units mass to contest this threat, prompting Avilez to call for their disbandment. Pedro refuses and in turn attempts to replace the general. When this fails, the prince on January 14 at least orders his regiment's removal from the commanding Flagstaff Hill to across Rio's bay into Praia Grande.

After a lengthy standoff, Pedro will address Avilez through a speaking trumpet from the frigate União on February 9, commanding his men to depart, which the Portuguese general grudgingly obeys six days later. As he sails away, Brazilian legislators gradually begin to pave the way to assume full independence, with Pedro as their monarch.

JANUARY 29, 1822. Cochrane appears outside Acapulco, hunting for the Spanish frigates Venganza and Prueba. Learning three days later that they are at Guayaquil, he steers southeastward.

FEBRUARY 8, 1822. Hispaniola Unified. Resentful and distrustful of the Dominicans' perpetuation of slave holding and many other colonial-era practices, the 45-year-old Haitian president Jean-Pierre Boyer has called upon black and mulatto residents to assert complete freedom from Spanish rule, then has marched to their support with a large army. He and his menacing host arrive this day at the town of San Carlos, just outside the capital of Santo Domingo. The invaders are received the next morning with a 21-gun salute, a Te Deum, and the city keys on a silver platter. For the next two decades, the eastern Dominican half of this island will remain under Haitian rule.

FEBRUARY 9, 1822. Sucre reaches Saraguro (Ecuador) with 1,200 patriot troops under Bolivian-born colonel Andrés Santa Cruz, to be reinforced by two infantry battalions and two cavalry squadrons sent by San Martín. With his strength increased to 3,000 men, Sucre is to advance northward into the Andes and eliminate its royalist defenders headquartered around Quito under Aymerich, while Bolívar brings another army southward out of Colombia in a simultaneous movement.

FEBRUARY 19, 1822. Portuguese general Inacio Luiz Madeira de Melo seizes control of the port city of Salvador (Brazil) at a cost of 100 lives, holding it in Lisbon's name against a rising tide of Brazilian nationalism.

FEBRUARY 21, 1822. Sucre's army occupies the town of Cuenca.

FEBRUARY 25, 1822. Bolívar's army begins marching out of Popayán (Colombia) with 3,000 troops to help push back the royalists in the southwestern theater.

APRIL 2, 1822. The Spanish lieutenant colonel Francisco Buceli rises against Mexican rule at Juchi but is put down the next day.

APRIL 7, 1822. Bomboná. While circling around the Galeras Volcano to approach the royalist stronghold of Pasto (Colombia) from the south, Bolívar's army is confronted by Col. Basilio García's 2,000-strong division (comprised of the 1st Aragón, 2nd Cataluña, and Pasto battalions, plus two fieldpieces and some irregulars) dug in atop the Cariaco Heights. The patriot vanguard—composed of the Vargas and Bogotá battalions under Gen. Pedro León Torres—makes a belated attack against the defenders' center left at noon, only to be repulsed, with Torres mortally wounded. Col. Luis Carvajal thereupon leads a second republican assault, which is also repelled, with its commander injured.

Meanwhile, Gen. Manuel Valdés is leading the patriots' Rifles Battalion in a flanking maneuver around the Yusepe Heights to fall upon García's right. When Bolívar sees Valdés gain this summit, he orders a third frontal assault by José Ignacio Pulido's Vencedor Battalion. Caught between two fires, the royalist right breaks, leading to a wholesale retreat by García's division. Nevertheless, their 250 casualties are many fewer than the republicans' 116 dead and 341 wounded, so the Liberator is forced to retrace his steps across the Juanambú River and await further reinforcements from Popayán.

APRIL 7, 1822. Macacona. Learning of a 2,000-man royalist army advancing westward from the Mantaro Valley (Peru) under Canterac, plus another 500-man contingent under Valdéz approaching from Arequipa, rebel general Tristán—once a staunch monarchist (see “June 20, 1811” entry et seq.)—evacuates Ica on April 6 with his 2,000 troops. At Macacona, north of Ica, he is ambushed at 1:00 the next morning by Canterac, who captures 1,000 rebels while scattering the rest.

APRIL 14, 1822. Three days after advancing from Cuenca (Ecuador), Sucre's cavalry vanguard under Col. Diego Ibarra invests the town of Alausi, thereby opening the road toward Riobamba.

APRIL 19, 1822. Riobamba. Ibarra's patriot cavalry column appears before Riobamba (Ecuador), which is held by 1,500 royalist defenders under Col. Nicolás López. A temporary truce is arranged, and patriot cavalry officers even dine with their royalist counterparts within the city on April 21.

However, their meal is interrupted when fighting unexpectedly erupts between opposing units, prompting Ibarra to quickly storm Riobamba's defenses at the head of his mounted grenadiers and dragoons. Lt. Col. Juan Lavalle distinguishes himself by leading a squadron of 96 Argentine mounted grenadiers in a charge against 420 disorganized royalist cavalrymen under Col. Carlos Tolrá, driving them back upon their infantry in confusion. When Tolrá recuperates and leads a countercharge, Lavalle—his numbers now augmented by 30 Colombian dragoons—scatters this second attack as well, killing 52 royalists and wounding 40, so that they abandon the city altogether. At the cost of only 2 patriots dead and 20 wounded, Riobamba is fully secured by April 22, to await the arrival of Sucre's main army.

MAY 2, 1822. Sucre's advancing patriot army occupies Lacatunga (Ecuador), while royalist forces begin erecting defenses at Machachi to check his progression toward the capital of Quito. Instead, Sucre outflanks their preparations by striking out across the barren eastern plains of Cotopaxi and Sincholagua, reaching the Valle de los Chillos—14 miles from Quito—by May 17. He finds that the royalists have only that morning regrouped into new defenses at Puengasi.

MAY 8, 1822. The United States of America recognizes the independence of Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Mexico, and Peru.

MAY 21, 1822. Pichincha. Opting to slide around the Puengasi defenses barring the road into Quito (Ecuador) by traversing the Turubamba Plain to Chillogallo, Sucre reaches this latter hamlet and braces for a royalist sally. When this fails to materialize, he resumes his advance along the Machachi road to circumvent the entrenched royalists atop Panecillo Heights outside the capital. He gives another order on the rainy evening of May 23 for his patriot army to circle westward around the narrow, slippery road at the foot of the Pichincha Volcano to sever the vital northeastern road linking Quito with Pasto.

Only Sucre's patriot cavalrymen succeed in completing this maneuver before Aymerich and Col. Nicolás López perceive the shifting patriot army and redeploy their 1,700 royalists at 8:00 a.m. on May 24 to parade down from the Panecillo Heights and initiate action west of the city an hour and a half later. Sucre commands 2,600 soldiers: 500 infantrymen of the Trujillo Battalion under Colonel Olazábal, 400 of the Piura Battalion under Colonel Villa, 260 of the Yaguachi Battalion under Col. Antonio Morales, 600 Cazadores del Paya under Lieutenant Colonel Leal, 200 men of Lt. Col. John Mackintosh's Albi6n Battalion, and 200 of the Alto Magdalena Battalion under Col. Jos6 Maríá Córdoba. The patriot cavalry consists of 100 Mounted Grenadiers of the Andes under Lieutenant Colonel Lavalle, a like number of Dragones del Sur under Lt. Col. Friedrich Rasch, plus 100 troopers of Squadron No. 1 under Lieutenant Colonel Arenales.

The difficult terrain impedes both armies from deploying their cavalry, as well as the patriot artillery, which consists of two fieldpieces manned by 40 gunners under the German mercenary captain Adolf Klinger. The 2nd "Cazadores del Paya" Battalion is the first patriot unit to become engaged, soon reinforced by Olazábal's Trujillo Battalion and two companies of the Yaguachi Battalion. Córdoba tries unsuccessfully to outflank the royalist lines with two companies of his Alto Magdalena Battalion but is repelled, after which the Trujillo and Yaguachi battalions begin running low on ammunition so retire up the volcano's lower folds. A royalist pursuit is in turn repulsed by the Paya Battalion, after which a thrust on the left flank by three companies of the royalist colonel Valdéz's 1st Aragón Battalion is smashed at noon by a like number of companies from the Albi6n Battalion, who have been escorting the ammunition train in the patriot rear.

Córdoba is then ordered to follow up this success by launching a counterattack, which routs the royalists and collapses their morale by 12:30 p.m. on May 24. Sucre resumes his advance against hapless Quito, and that same afternoon his cavalry disperses the royalist cavalry reserve, who have been holding a suburb of the capital. In total, the defenders suffer 400 dead and 190 wounded, compared to 200 killed and 140 injured among the patriot ranks. The next day, Aymerich surrenders the Panecillo redoubt along with 160 of his surviving officers and 1,100 troops, 14 cannon, 1,700 muskets, as well as a considerable stockpile of ammunition and stores. In the popular euphoria following this triumph, it is decided to submit on May 29 to Bolívar's wishes, incorporating Quito and its jurisdiction into the newly created Republic of Gran Colombia as the Departamento del Sur or "Southern Department."

JUNE 7, 1822. Spanish general Morales sorties from Puerto Cabello and defeats a patriot force under Soublette at Dabajuro (Venezuela).

JUNE 8, 1822. At 5:00 p.m., Bolívar's 2,000-man army enters Pasto (Colombia) unopposed, its loyalist garrison agreeing to capitulate because of Sucre's recent conquest of Quito.

JULY 14, 1822. San Martín departs Callao aboard the sloop Macedonia to meet Bolívar at Guayaquil.

JULY 25, 1822. Bolívar and San Martín meet at Guayaquil to discuss the future of South America. Generally speaking, the latter favors a constitutional monarchy, the former, republican forms of government. San Martín requests Bolívar's help to eliminate the royalist strongholds high in the Andes, but the latter refuses.

AUGUST 12, 1822. Spanish general Morales is defeated at Naguanagua (Venezuela) by Páez while marching from Puerto Cabello toward Valencia at the head of 1,800 loyalists.

AUGUST 27, 1822. A trio of Portuguese warships arrives off Salvador (Brazil), evading the ineffectual blockade of Brazilian commodore Rodrigo Lamare and disembarking 600 troops to reinforce its loyalist garrison under General Madeira. When Prince Pedro learns of this escalation of hostilities 11 days later, while returning into São Paulo from Santos, he proclaims Brazil's full independence from Portugal.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1822. After sailing with a royalist expedition from Puerto Cabello, Morales disembarks on the Guajira Peninsula and defeats patriot general Lino Clemente at Salina Rica (Venezuela), occupying nearby Maracaibo the next day.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1822. San Martín resigns his office as "Protector of Peru" and the next day sets sail from Callao toward Chile aboard the brigantine Belgrano to go into retirement at his small farm near Mendoza (Argentina).

OCTOBER 17, 1822. Patriot general Alvarado sets sail from Callao to attack the royalist stronghold of Arica (Chile).

LATE OCTOBER 1822. Led by the royalist Benito Boves, Pasto (Colombia) rises against insurgent rule.

NOVEMBER 6, 1822. Portuguese commodore Félix de Campos reaches the loyalist holdouts at Salvador (Brazil) with 1,200 reinforcements, escorted by

Empire of Brazil

Among the South American struggles for independence, Brazil won a unique form of liberty. When the Portuguese prince regent João first arrived at Salvador in January 1808, fleeing Lisbon two days ahead of Napoleon's army, he was given a warm welcome by his colonial vassals. They proved most eager to harbor their overseas ruler. Since João also brought along Portugal's entire government, some 10,000–15,000 retainers, a new imperial administration was installed at Rio de Janeiro as of March 7.

This shift of power was very beneficial to Brazil. In addition to enjoying a trade boom thanks to eased restrictions, its businesses, industries, and agriculture were all encouraged by the resident monarch. Schools were founded, along with scientific, cultural, and banking institutions, while the bureaucracy was also overhauled. Portugal meanwhile endured occupation and war, until the French were finally expelled from the Iberian Peninsula by 1814.

Even then, João stayed in the New World rather than return home. On December 16, 1815, he elevated Brazil from the status of a colony to a kingdom. Three months later, on the death of his deranged mother, Maria, he officially became ruler of Portugal's global empire as King João VI. Yet he delayed returning to Lisbon for five more years.

Portuguese discontent finally erupted into a peaceful insurrection at Oporto on August 24, 1820. The return of the royal family was demanded, along with a new liberal constitution that would limit their powers. A mutiny the next February by the Portuguese troops garrisoning Rio de Janeiro forced João to concede. After crowning his eldest son, Pedro, as prince regent of Brazil, the king sailed for Lisbon in late April 1821. Brazilians were left uneasy, fearful that their new status and privileges might be rescinded by the Portuguese Cortes or "Parliament."

Such decrees did indeed reach Rio de Janeiro by December 9, 1821. Brazil was to be reduced to a colony once more, while Prince Pedro was ordered to sail for Lisbon. But popular support quickly formed behind the young monarch. When a homeward-bound Portuguese regiment threatened to carry him off in January 1822, thousands of Brazilian volunteers mustered in defiance. Thus the first step toward Brazilian independence was to back a young prince who was soon to be elected emperor.

the 74-gun ship of the line Dom João VI and the frigate Perola.

DECEMBER 1, 1822. Throwing off allegiance to Portugal, Pedro I is proclaimed emperor of Brazil.

DECEMBER 6, 1822. A 4,300-man, 10-gun patriot expedition under Alvarado disembarks at Arica (Chile) without opposition, remaining 20 days while gathering mounts to press northward against regional royalist forces.

DECEMBER 23, 1822. Fall of Pasto. After numerous skirmishes, Sucre's 1,500-man patriot army fights its way across Guátara Bridge and advances toward Taindala to put down Boves's loyalist insurrection at Pasto (Colombia). The latter attempts to make a brief stand at Yacuanquer but is brushed aside by Sandes's Rifle Battalion.

The next day, the 2,000-man garrison within Pasto requests terms, but Sucre ignores this overture, instead launching a two-pronged offensive at noon intended to seize both its commanding heights and Santiago Church. After a desperate struggle, the defenders break and flee toward Sebondoy or Juanambú, leaving behind 300 dead. Sucre's losses total 8 dead and 32 injured, and after three days of looting, he offers a general amnesty.

DECEMBER 29, 1822. The vanguard of Alvarado's patriot army—1,000 men under General Martínez—advances north from Arica and occupies Tacna (Peru). Three days later, the royalist commander Valdéz attempts to surprise them with a dawn attack, but after becoming lost in the darkness, his 800 troops arrive well past sunup, so Valdéz instead prudently withdraws into Moquegua by January 10, 1823.

JANUARY 14, 1823. A royalist detachment under Colonel Ameller fails to prevent Alvarado from crossing the Locumba River (southern Peru) with his large patriot army.

JANUARY 19, 1823. Torata-Moquegua. After being driven out of Moquegua or Moquehua in southern Peru by Alvarado's implacable advance, Valdéz's 1,000 outnumbered royalists make a stand at nearby Torata, hoping to be joined in time by Canterac's approaching two infantry battalions and four cavalry squadrons. Alvarado engages and seems on the verge of achieving victory when Canterac's cavalry suddenly materializes and puts the patriots to flight. Alvarado suffers 500 casualties, double the royalists' number.

Two days later, Canterac and Valdéz storm the disorganized patriot army within Moquegua, engaging it with a frontal assault, then winning the day by driving in Alvarado's right flank. More than 1,000 patriots are subsequently taken prisoner—including 60 senior officers—while the survivors flee toward the coast. Lavalle's division of Andean Grenadiers is one of the few patriot formations to maintain cohesion, repeatedly fighting rearguard actions. Alvarado goes aboard ship at Ilo with only 500 survivors, escaping north toward Callao.

JANUARY 28, 1823. Surrounded by mutinies and continued resistance, Chile's dictator O'Higgins resigns.

MARCH 6, 1823. To extend Argentine control into the desert tribe lands southwest of Buenos Aires, Gen. Martín Rodríguez leads 2,500 troops on a campaign that establishes Fort Independencia and the town of Tandil, yet fails to subdue the semi-nomadic inhabitants.

MARCH 13, 1823. Cochrane, having quit the Chilean service amid complaints about official corruption, reaches Rio de Janeiro and agrees to assume command over Brazil's newly independent navy: the 74-gun Pedro I; the frigates Piranga of 62 guns, Real Carolina of 44, and Niterói of 38; the corvettes Maria da Gloria of 26 guns, and Liberal and Maceió of 20; the brigs Caboclo of 18 guns, Cacique of 16, and Real Pedro and Guaraní of 14; plus the 10-gun brigantines Real, Atlanta, and Rio de Plata.

MARCH 18, 1823. To repair Alvarado's disastrous losses in southern Peru, patriot general Valdés leads 2,400 troops aboard the transports Proserpina, Cornelia, San Juan, Bomboná, Flecha, Sacramento, Soñía, and Chimborazo. The bulk of this expedition is comprised of Jacinto Lara's brigade, being the "Vencedor en Boyacá," Voltijeros, and Pichincha battalions.

MARCH 20, 1823. Gen. Gregorio Tagle leads a dawn uprising in Buenos Aires against the anti-ecclesiastical reforms promulgated by Argentina's republican government on November 18, 1822. His 200 followers, including colonels Bauzá and Viera, are quickly crushed.

APRIL 1, 1823. Cochrane sets sail from Rio de Janeiro with the Brazilian Pedro Primeiro (flag), Piranga, Maria de Gloria, and Liberal to blockade the Portuguese garrison holding Salvador (see “February 19, 1822” entry).

APRIL 12, 1823. Sandes departs Guayaquil with 1,250 men of the Bomboná Rifles and 1st “de la Guardia” Battalions aboard the transports Rosa, Perla, Dolores, and Mirlo to take part in a second patriot expedition under generals Santa Cruz and Gamarra against royalist forces in southern Peru. The frigate O’Higgins follows a few days later with another 300 troops, plus another 582 aboard three transports on April 18.

MAY 4, 1823. Cochrane’s Brazilian squadron skirmishes inconclusively with de Campos’s Portuguese warships outside beleaguered Salvador, neither side being able to gain a decisive advantage because of their green and disaffected crews. When the Portuguese commodore withdraws inside the inner roads of Bahia, Cochrane retires 30 miles south to São Paulo fortress and concentrates all his veteran British and American sailors aboard the Pedro Primeiro (flag) and the Maria da Gloria, so as to provide himself with at least two reliable vessels. By the end of that month, he is also joined off Salvador by Capt. James Thompson’s Real Carolina, plus the Niterói and the brig Bahia toward the end of June.

MAY 11, 1823. Col. León Galindo departs Guayaquil with 668 men of his Bogotá Battalion aboard the brig Balcarce, sloop Armonia, and another transport to take part in Santa Cruz’s and Gamarra’s expedition to subdue royalist forces in southern Peru. Galindo’s contingent is followed three days later by another 250 of his men aboard the frigate Brown, plus 200 recruits from Pasto and Chocó aboard the English brig Romeo. (The latter mutiny off Muerto Island, kill or capture their officers, then compel the English master to deposit them at Esmeraldas on the Atacames coast.) On May 15, the brig Chimborazo also sails with 250 cavalymen of the Venezuelan Hussars and Venezuelan Mounted Grenadiers, this whole division being commanded by Col. Luis Urdaneta.

Eventually, Santa Cruz’s expedition swells to 5,100 men and eight fieldpieces. He disembarks at Ilo in mid-June with the main body while detaching his subordinate Gamarra toward Arica with another contingent. The latter establishes his base of operations at Tacna, while Santa Cruz chooses Moquegua.

JUNE 2, 1823. Having gathered 9,000 troops and 14 fieldpieces at Huancayo (Peru), royalist generals Canterac and Valdéz descend from the Andes to drive upon Lima during the absence of the main patriot armies farther south.

JUNE 12, 1823. The Venezuelan-born patriot colonel Juan José Flores sorties from Pasto (Colombia) to subdue yet another local insurrection. Instead, 600 rebels under Col. Agustín Agualongo fall upon his column three miles south of this city at Catambuco, killing 300 and capturing 200 of his troops after ferocious hand-to-hand combat.

JUNE 18, 1823. Royalist Seizure of Lima. Canterac and Valdéz surprise and occupy Lima with their 9,000-man army, while Sucre’s 5,000 patriots must retire inside Callao’s defenses. Despite this easy victory, the invaders are unable to remain inside the capital for want of provisions and begin their evacuation toward Jauja and Huancavelica by July 1, completing it two weeks later.

JULY 2, 1823. Fall of Salvador. After more than a year’s siege and blockade, General Madeira and Commodore de Campos decide upon the evacuation of Bahia, their supplies having become exhausted and Cochrane threatening a fireship attack with his Brazilian squadron. Some 13 Portuguese warships therefore exit, escorting 60–70 troop transports northward with 2,000 surviving soldiers and numerous noncombatants. Behind them, jubilant Brazilian irregulars surge into the empty city of Salvador, while Cochrane’s 5 warships pursue the convoy northward to prevent it from reinforcing the last loyalist holdouts in Maranhão Province.

Because of a lack of skilled prize crews, the chasing squadron must cripple many transports by boarding and cutting down their masts, or staving in water casks, thus obliging them to return into Bahia to be captured. Capt. John Taylor (a 30-year-old Royal Navy deserter, ex–first lieutenant of Sir Thomas Hardy’s flagship HMS Doris) even pursues some fleeing vessels as far as Portugal with his frigate Niterói, burning 4 within sight of Lisbon. Altogether, 16 ships bearing 1,000 troops are taken.

JULY 13, 1823. Sucre sends patriot general Alvarado by ship from Callao with the 2,000 soldiers of Lara's Brigade to reinforce Santa Cruz. They are soon followed by another 1,200 under Gen. Francisco Antonio Pinto, consisting of the 2nd and 4th Chilean battalions plus two cavalry squadrons and four fieldpieces.

JULY 17, 1823. Ibarra. To crush the recurrent Pasto (Colombia) rebellions once and for all, Bolívar marches swiftly northward from San Pablo with 1,500 men to attack its 2,000 rebels gathered at Ibarra (Ecuador) under Colonel Agualongo. He attacks their right flank by 2:00 that same afternoon, driving the rebels precipitately back across Ta-hoando Creek, then up Aluburo Hill. Agualongo's troops finally break and flee, leaving behind 600 dead, as compared to 13 killed and 8 wounded among Bolívar's ranks.

JULY 20, 1823. Sucre sails from Callao toward Arequipa with 3,000 troops, hoping to join Santa Cruz in subduing royalist resistance in Upper Peru (Bolivia).

JULY 23, 1823. Santa Cruz marches inland from Moquegua (Peru), while his subordinate Gamarra does the same from Tacna. Their objective is to ascend the Andes and occupy the royalist stronghold of La Paz (Bolivia), which Santa Cruz reaches by August 8. The next day, Gamarra appears 20 miles farther south at Viacha, turning on August 12 to pursue the outnumbered royalist army under Olañeta, which is retiring toward Oruro.

JULY 24, 1823. The previous evening, Spanish commodore Laborde has anchored north of Maracaibo (Venezuela) between Capitán Chico and Bella Vista with his brigantine San Carlos, the schooners Esperanza, Riego (alias Maratón), Especuladora, María Salvadora, Estrella, Cora, Mariana, Rayo, María Habana, and Zulia, plus 17 lesser auxiliaries, armed with a total of 67 guns and crewed by 670 men. The insurgent commodore José Prudencio Padilla has come to anchor on the eastern shoreline of the lake opposite, off Puertos de Altigracia, with his brigantines Independiente, Marte, Fama, Confianza, and Gran Bolívar; and the schooners Espartana, Independencia, Manuela, Chitty, Emprendedora, Aventina, Peacock, Antonia Manuela, and Leona.

After awaiting a favorable wind, the insurgent squadron weighs anchor shortly after 2:00 p.m. on the afternoon of July 24, gliding across the gap in a single line to engage the anchored royalist squadron by 3:45 p.m. After two hours of intense fighting, the insurgents emerge triumphant, despite suffering 44 dead and 165 wounded. Laborde retreats beneath the batteries of Fort San Carlos at the entrance to the lake with only three surviving schooners, leaving behind 437 prisoners.

JULY 26, 1823. Hastening past the defeated Portuguese troop convoy that has evacuated Bahia (see "July 2, 1823" entry), Cochrane enters the loyalist stronghold of São Luis—capital of Maranhão Province—with false colors flying aboard his 74-gun Brazilian flagship Pedro Primeiro. Once anchored in a position commanding the city, Cochrane bluffs Gov. Agostinho Antônio de Faria into surrendering, for which feat Brazil's emperor will later ennoble the admiral as Marques de Maranhão.

AUGUST 2, 1823. Sucre's expedition reaches Chala, then steers toward Arequipa upon receiving news of Santa Cruz's movements.

AUGUST 3, 1823. Now besieged within Maracaibo by both insurgent land and sea forces, the Spanish general Morales surrenders to the patriots.

AUGUST 10, 1823. Cochrane's 23-year-old flag lieutenant John Pasco Grenfell enters the loyalist port of Belém (eastern mouth of the Amazon), his Brazilian brig Maranhão flying false Portuguese colors until safely at anchor. He then compels its cowed civic leaders to declare for independence.

Five days later, rioters begin looting the warehouses of Portuguese merchants, only to have Grenfell's crew intervene and arrest 261 participants, shooting 5 as ringleaders and incarcerating the remaining 256 aboard a ship out in the harbor. During the ensuing night, 255 die in its stifling hold, the guards misinterpreting their agitation as a prelude to an uprising.

AUGUST 25, 1823. Zepita. After falling back from Carratalá three days earlier, Valdéz's 1,900 royalists are overtaken on the Chua-Chua Plains near the town of Zepita on the southwestern shores of Lake Titicaca by Santa Cruz's 2,500 patriots. Both commanders fight an indecisive battle, however, with only minor casualties being inflicted before the monarchists retire after nightfall. Patriot losses total 28 dead and 84 wounded, while Valdéz suffers 100 killed and 184 prisoners.

AUGUST 31, 1823. Sucre lands near Arequipa (Peru) and occupies the city, contacting Santa Cruz inland to propose a joint operation against the royalists in Upper Peru (modern Bolivia), which is refused.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1823. Bolívar reaches Callao aboard the frigate Chimborazo, accompanied by 1,500 troops, and a fortnight later assumes office as Peru's governor.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1823. Santa Cruz's Flight. Santa Cruz's and Gamarra's patriot armies reunite at Panduro, some 20 miles north of Oruro (Bolivia), marching southward 4,500 strong. Four days later, a 4,000-man royalist army circles east of Sora Sora under Viceroy de la Serna and General Valdéz and, on September 14, joins Olañeta's contingent approaching from Potosí to give a combined strength of 6,500 men.

Learning of this formidable host, Santa Cruz and Gamarra hastily retreat northwestward, hoping to find Sucre near Lake Titicaca. The patriots are overtaken by royalist pursuers near Ayo Ayo on September 17, and Santa Cruz contemplates making a stand. However, when informed that his artillery has not arrived, he opts to renew his retirement, which quickly degenerates into a rout. His troops—now desperate to flee the highlands—fall easy prey to their opponents, some 2,000 being taken prisoner, along with all the patriot guns, plus their artillery and supply trains (taken at Desaguadero Ford on September 20). Santa Cruz reenters Moquegua by September 24 with 900 weary survivors, immediately continuing on toward Ilo to sail away.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1823. Sucre's army is 24 miles northeast of Arequipa (Peru) when informed of Santa Cruz's rout. The patriot general therefore retraces his route back to the coast and sails off with his army by October 12.

NOVEMBER 8, 1823. The loyalist garrison holding out within San Felipe Castle at Puerto Cabello capitulates to the insurgents under Páez, marking an end to Venezuela's struggle for independence.

NOVEMBER 11, 1823. Bolívar departs northwest from Lima with 4,800 troops to put down the mutinous patriot José de la Riva Agüero, headquartered around Huaráz and Trujillo (Peru). Two weeks later, Riva Agüero is arrested at dawn by one of his own subordinates—Col. Antonio Gutiérrez de la Fuente—who believes that he and his ministers are about to strike a pact with the Spanish loyalists at Jauja.

NOVEMBER 12, 1823. Brazil's emperor Pedro I uses troops to dissolve its legislature, many delegates being arrested.

DECEMBER 10, 1823. Spanish brigadier general Juan Loriga occupies Cerro de Pasco (Peru) with 350 loyalist cavalrymen and 300 infantrymen, only to retire toward Jauja shortly thereafter upon receiving word of Riva Agüero's arrest.

FEBRUARY 5, 1824. Callao Mutiny. The Argentine "Río de la Plata" Regiment—performing garrison duty in this Peruvian port—rises in rebellion and detains its colonel, Ramón Estomba, plus fortress commander Rudecindo Alvarado because of arrears in pay. The mutineers are joined the next day by Callao's 11th Infantry Battalion and artillery companies. When threatened with harsh reprisals, they place themselves under the royalist colonel Casariego (who has been confined in one of the fort's dungeons), offering to surrender the place to the loyalists.

When the mounted "Grenadiers of the Andes" Regiment is ordered to ride from Cañete on February 14 to help put down this insurrection, they, too, mutiny at Lurín, arresting their officers and professing loyalty to the Crown.

After first suspecting a trap, royalist general Canterac at last dispatches a column under Brig. Gen. Juan Antonio Monet from Jauja in the central highlands to take advantage of this opening. After a two-day march from Lurín, Monet arrives on February 29, prompting Bolívar's weak, divided government to order the evacuation of Lima in favor of Pativilca. The capital is thus briefly reoccupied by the royalists, who forsake it again on March 18—although Callao is left under Brig. Gen. José Ramón Rodil for another two years.

APRIL 8, 1824. Having been dispatched by Brazilian emperor Pedro I to put down a republican election at Recife (Pernambuco Province), Capt. John Taylor attempts to persuade Gov. Manoel de Carvalho País de Andrade to install a royalist candidate, then—when this is refused—institutes a blockade with his frigates Niterói and Piranha.

JUNE 20, 1824. Royalist general Olañeta refuses to obey Viceroy de la Serna's orders in Upper Peru (Bolivia), who delegates Valdéz to deal with this rebellious officer.

JUNE 28, 1824. Taylor lifts his blockade of Recife (Brazil) to rejoin Admiral Cochrane, who is concentrating his forces against a threatened invasion out of Portugal.

JULY 2, 1824. De Carvalho declares Pernambuco to be an independent republic, then sends two vessels under John Mitrovich (a Maltese deserter from the Royal Navy) to invade Barra Grande. Instead, they are captured on July 25 by an imperial Brazilian schooner.

AUGUST 2, 1824. Cochrane sails from Rio de Janeiro with his squadron, transporting 1,200 Brazilian troops to put down the separatist republican regime in Pernambuco Province. He deposits this royalist contingent at Alagoas (80 miles short of Recife) by August 10, then arrives off that port eight days later to institute a blockade. After failing to come to terms with its leader de Carvalho, the admiral shells the city with his schooner Leopoldina, until the arrival overland of Pedro's 1,200 troops effectively puts an end to this insurrection by mid-September. A few executions ensue, while de Carvalho flees into exile aboard the brand-new, 28-gun frigate HMS Tweed.

AUGUST 5, 1824. Junín. Two days after departing southward from Cerro de Pasco (Peru), Bolívar's 9,600 patriots reach Conocancha, only to learn that Canterac's 7,000–8,000 royalists have been meanwhile circling around the far side of Lake Junín toward the insurgents' previous base and have now reached Carhuamayo. The Liberator therefore turns east toward the hamlet of Reyes, while his opponent Canterac—surprised to discover that the patriots have sallied—hastily retraces his steps southward, hoping to avoid being caught by a flank attack.

On August 6, the patriot army is still advancing through Chacamarca Ravine, with Necochea's 900 cavalymen six miles in advance of Bolívar's main body, when the royalists are sighted in retreat toward Tarma. Hoping to delay their retirement, Necochea disgorges onto Junín Plain and is attacked by Canterac's cavalry screen, 1,300 royalist troopers under Ramón Gómez de Bedoya. These six squadrons overwhelm the two squadrons of Mounted Colombian Grenadiers in the patriot forefront, then drive the remainder back through the ravine's narrow confines.

Battle of Junín.

However, the charging royalist troopers are in turn surprised by a flank attack by Lt. Col. Isidoro Suárez's Peruvian Hussars, who chase Bedoya's men back through the ravine toward the fleeing royalist army. Neither side engages with their infantry or artillery, only cavalry charges being involved, and losses are light on both sides: 248 royalist troopers dead, wounded, or missing, as opposed to a comparable number of patriots. Nevertheless, Canterac's precipitate flight shatters the morale of his followers, some 3,000 dropping out by the time he recrosses the Apurímac River. Bolívar meanwhile proceeds into Chalhuanca, then in early October turns over command of his army to Sucre, so as to travel himself toward Lima.

AUGUST 17, 1824. Spanish general Valdéz's 3,000-man army defeats a column from Olañeta's rebellious royalist faction at Lava (Bolivia), then is recalled toward Cuzco by Viceroy de la Serna to prepare for a forthcoming campaign against Sucre.

OCTOBER 6, 1824. At Callao, the loyalist corvette Ica, plus the brigs Pezuela, Constante, and Moyano—having been reinforced from Europe by the 64-gun Spanish ship of the line Asia and the brig Aguiles of Commo. Roque Guruceta—are challenged by Rear Adm. Martín Jorge Guise’s insurgent frigate the Protector, the corvette Pichincha, the brig Chimborazo, plus the sloops Macedonia and Guayaquileña. This Colombo–Peruvian squadron drops anchor off San Lorenzo Island, provoking the Spaniards into emerging the next day and engaging in an inconclusive, long-range exchange of salvos. Both sides then observe each other until October 22, when they withdraw—the patriots north toward Guayaquil, the Spaniards southward.

(A month and a half later, after the patriot victory at Ayacucho, Asia and Constante attempt to sail across the Pacific to the Philippines; however, their crews mutiny in the Marianas, and Guruceta’s flagship is eventually handed over to the Mexican authorities at Acapulco, the Aguiles’s crew surrendering to the Chileans.)

OCTOBER 10, 1824. Valdéz rejoins Viceroy de la Serna at Cuzco with 3,000 men of the 1st and 2nd Gerona battalions, Imperial Alejandro Battalion, 1st Cuzco Regiment, 2nd Fernando VII Regiment, plus four squadrons of the “de la Guardia” Mounted Grenadiers and one squadron of Peruvian Dragoons. This concentration gives the royalists a numerical superiority over Sucre’s approaching patriot army.

OCTOBER 22, 1824. De la Serna and Valdéz quit Paruro with 11,200 royalists (leaving behind another 1,800 to garrison nearby Cuzco), then cross the Apurimac at Agcha and advance upon Sucre, who at the approach of this vast host 10 days later retires north toward Andahuaylas Province.

OCTOBER 25, 1824. In the Brazilian city of Salvador, its mostly black 3rd Battalion rise against a rumored disbandment of their unit, storming the regional headquarters to slay their commander in chief, Gen. Felisberto Gomes Caldeira. Although the city’s two other battalions and artillery company join in a month-long spree of looting and murder, they eventually surrender to loyal troops without resistance. This uprising is remembered as the Periquitos or “Parakeets” Rebellion because of the distinctive, bright green uniforms of the 3rd Battalion.

NOVEMBER 3, 1824. After Urdaneta reoccupies Lima, a patriot contingent advancing upon the nearby seaport of Callao is ambushed at La Legua by two royalist cavalry squadrons and four infantry companies, who scatter the patriots. Bolívar appears shortly thereafter, however, fresh from his victory at Junín, and soon reimposes a siege upon the isolated 2,700-man royalist garrison inside Callao—comprised of two infantry battalions, a cavalry squadron, artillery brigade, and irregulars—with 3,000 patriot troops.

NOVEMBER 9, 1824. Cochrane intervenes in the civil strife at Maranhão (Brazil), deposing Miguel Bruce in favor of Manuel Lobo, to little effect.

NOVEMBER 20, 1824. Discovering that de la Serna’s larger royalist army has swung southwest behind him, Sucre turns his own 6,000-man army around and digs in on Bombón Heights. Through clever maneuvering, de la Serna is able to trick the patriot general into believing he is about to be attacked from the rear, compelling him to forsake this strong position four days later and slowly retire farther westward.

DECEMBER 3, 1824. In Collpahuayco Ravine (Peru), Valdéz’s royalist cavalry defeat a patriot rifle battalion from Lara’s brigade, serving as Sucre’s rear-guard. The patriots suffer 300 casualties, as well as losing a fieldpiece.

DECEMBER 6, 1824. Ayacucho. Sucre’s 5,800 retreating patriots and single fieldpiece reach Quinua Plain—called Ayacucho by its local Quechua Indians, signifying “Dead Men’s Corner”—seven miles from Huamanga (modern Ayacucho, Peru). The following units deploy into defensive positions: Marshal de la Mar’s Peruvian Division, comprised of Colonel Plaza’s “Peruvian Legion” infantry battalion, the 1st Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Bermúdez, the 2nd Infantry Battalion of Lieutenant Colonel González, and the 3rd Infantry Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Benavides; General Lara’s 1st Colombian Division made up of the “Vencedor en Boyacá” Infantry Battalion under Col. Ignacio Luque, the Vargas Infantry Battalion of Col. José Trinidad Morán, and the Rifle Battalion under Col. Arthur Sandes; Gen. José María Córdo-va's 2nd Colombian Division constituted of the Bogotá Infantry Battalion under Col. León Galindo, the Pichincha Infantry Battalion of Col. José Leal, the Voltijeros Battalion under Colonel Guas, and the Caracas Infantry Battalion of Col. Manuel León; and General Miller's Cavalry Division consisting of two squadrons of Colombian Hussars under Col. Laurencio Silva, two squadrons of Colombian Horse Grenadiers under Col. Lucas Carvajal, two squadrons of Junín Hussars under Lieutenant Colonel Suárez, and one squadron of Argentine Horse Grenadiers under Lieutenant Colonel Bogado.

Battle of Ayacucho.

Two days later, the 9,300 royalist pursuers with 11 cannon approach out of the northeast from Huamanguilla under Viceroy de la Serna to encamp atop Condorcunca Hills. At 9:00 a.m. on the morning of December 9, the royalists drive across Ayacucho Plain in three columns. The first is General Valdéz's Vanguard Division comprised of four infantry battalions: the 1st Imperial Alejandro, the 1st Castro, the 1st Centro, and the 1st Cantabria. The second column is made up of the marshal Monet's 1st Division, five infantry battalions in total: the 2nd Primer Regimiento de Cuzco, the 2nd Burgos, the 2nd Guías (Tacnena Legion), the 2nd Victoria, and the 2nd Infante. The third column is constituted of four infantry battalions from the marshal Alejandro Villalobos's 2nd Division: the 1st Gerona, the 1st Primer Regimiento de Cuzco, the 2nd Imperial Alejandro, and the Fernando VII. The royalist foot soldiers are backed by Brig. Gen. Valentín Ferráz's Cavalry Division: two squadrons of Grenadiers of the Guard, three squadrons of Fernando VII Hussars, three squadrons of Dragones of the Union, two squadrons of Peruvian Dragoons, plus one squadron each of the San Carlos Cavalry Regiment and Viceregal Halberdiers. Their artillery battalion is commanded by General Cacho, and their engineers, by General Atero.

After assembling, the battle is joined at 11:00 a.m., Villalobos's division on the left being repelled by Córdova's Colombians, while the same occurs to Monet's royalists in the center when counterattacked by Suárez's Junín Hussars and Bruix's Mounted Grenadiers. Only Valdéz's division on the royalist right does well at first, driving back de la Mar's Peruvians. However, the patriot cavalry soon bests their royalist counterparts, and when de la Serna commits his reserves—the Fernando VII Battalion—they are also defeated, and the wounded viceroy is captured by 1:00 p.m. Seeing this, Valdéz's division begins a disorganized retirement, and the royalists flee back into the hills, having suffered 1,800 killed and 700 wounded, as opposed to 310 dead and 609 injured among the patriots.

That night, Canterac assumes overall command of de la Serna's defeated survivors and attempts to order the royalists to march back into Cuzco. Instead, his demoralized forces mutiny, and the next day the remaining 1,000 royalists surrender to Sucre, bringing organized resistance to Spanish American independence to a virtual end.

DECEMBER 12, 1824. After a brief pause, Sucre inaugurates a campaign into Bolivia to stamp out the last sparks of royalist resistance in that district. He encounters no opposition, General Alvarez tamely surrendering the 1,700-man royalist garrison at Cuzco to Gamarra two weeks later. The same occurs at Arequipa, where the self-proclaimed vice-roy Domingo Pío Tristán capitulates with 700 troops, followed shortly thereafter by Brigadier General Echeverría at Puno with another 480 men. Only Olañeta continues to pose a threat, with 5,900 troops concentrated around La Paz.

JANUARY 10, 1825. The republican frigate O'Higgins appears off Callao, eventually being joined by the vessels Pichincha, Chimborazo, Moctezuma, Limeña, Macedonia, and Congreso del Perú to blockade this last remaining royalist outpost.

JANUARY 14, 1825. The royalist garrison commander at Cochabamba (Bolivia)—Col. A. S. Sánchez—throws off Olañeta's rule, proclaiming himself in favor of republicanism.

FEBRUARY 1, 1825. Republican guerrilla chief José Miguel Lanza occupies La Paz (Bolivia), obliging Olañeta to fall back upon Potosí.

FEBRUARY 7, 1825. Sucre reaches La Paz.

FEBRUARY 12, 1825. Olañeta's garrison in Valle Grande (Bolivia) mutinies and detains General Aguilera.

FEBRUARY 16, 1825. Gen. Bartolomé Salom's patriot besiegers defeat a sally by Rodil's royalist garrison out of Callao, inflicting 200 casualties.

Mexican caricature of the insurgent triumph over the royalists. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

FEBRUARY 22, 1825. Olañeta's subordinate, Col. Francisco López, mutinies at Chuquisaca (Bolivia) with a squadron of Charcas Dragoons, proclaiming himself governor. This brings the number of soldiers who have switched allegiance from Olañeta's royalist cause to 1,800.

APRIL 1, 1825. Royalist general Olañeta is mortally wounded at Tumusla near Potosí (Bolivia) while attempting to put down a mutiny in favor of republicanism by a chasseur battalion under his subordinate colonel Carlos Medina Celi. Most of the surviving loyalists thereupon switch their allegiance to the patriot general Álvarez de Arenales.

MAY 18, 1825. Cochrane deserts the Brazilian service, sailing from São Luis with the frigate Piranha and reaching Spithead (England) by June 26.

JANUARY 23, 1826. After nearly two years of stubborn resistance, 13 months of close investment, and 12 days of negotiations, the royalist general Rodil finally surrenders his isolated 700-man garrison holding Callao to the Peruvian general Salom, while Chile's last loyalist holdouts under Col. Antonio de Quintanilla also surrender in the remote Chiloé Archipelago that same month, thereby marking an end to Spanish America's 18-year struggle for independence. Ominously, its last few years have been marred by increasingly bitter feuding between republicans, a portent of the civil wars soon to follow.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

Remember our maxim:
it is better to do well late,
than never.

—Sam Houston (1835)

WAR OF 1812 (1812–1815)

Although the United States (population 7.5 million) has already fought a limited “quasi-war” against France (see “French Revolutionary Wars”), the War of 1812 has the distinction of being the first full-scale conflict conducted by an independent New World government against an international foe.

For several years, neutral American shipping has been harassed by England’s Royal Navy, as the latter attempts to throttle Napoleonic France and its satellites. Settlers in the American South and West furthermore complain of British trade restrictions having created economic depressions throughout their regions, while Indian resistance to American expansion inland—especially under the 43-year-old Shawnee chief Tecumseh, whose confederacy encompasses the Great Lakes—is suspected of being fomented out of Canada (population 135,000). The Americans also manifest designs upon Florida, owned by Spain, England’s current European ally.

In the autumn of 1811, after fruitless negotiations, the American governor of the so-called Indiana Territory—38-year-old William Henry Harrison—advances with a mixed force of 900 regulars and militiamen against Tecumseh’s home village of Tippecanoe (near modern Lafayette). Arriving on November 7, Harrison repulses a dawn counterattack by this chief’s brother, Lolawau-chika, “the Prophet,” slaying at least 38 natives before the American forces advance and burn the deserted town to the ground. The next spring, Tecumseh requests aid from the British at Amherstburg (Ontario), as tensions escalate.

Finally, President James Madison succumbs on June 1, 1812, to pressure from “war hawks” in the U.S. government—their rallying cry being “Free trade and sailors’ rights!”—and requests that Congress declare war against London because of British impressment of American sailors, interference with neutral trade, and intrigues involving North American tribes. Although New England and the Middle Atlantic states are reluctant, this measure passes the House of Representatives three days later by a 79–49 vote and—after two weeks of bickering—by 19–13 in the Senate. Hostilities officially commence on June 19.

JUNE 22, 1812. Commodores John Rodgers and Stephen Decatur depart New York with the 44-gun frigates USS President and United States, the 38-gun Congress, plus the sloop Hornet and the brig Argus, of 16 guns apiece, to protect homeward-bound American shipping. Two days later, they intercept a British convoy sailing from Jamaica toward England but fail to capture either its 36-gun escort HMS Belvidera or any prizes, despite a lengthy transatlantic pursuit.

JUNE 24, 1812. Rumors of war reach Montreal, followed five days later at Halifax.

JULY 8, 1812. Capt. Charles Roberts—British garrison commander at the island fortress of St. Joseph in the St. Mary’s River, southeast of Sault Sainte Marie (Ontario)—is ordered to surprise the nearby American outpost of Fort Michilimackinac (upper Michigan).

JULY 12, 1812. The 61-year-old U.S. brigadier general William Hull—governor of the “Michigan Territory” and uncle to naval captain Isaac Hull—crosses the Detroit River with 1,200 troops and 1,000 auxiliaries, occupying the village of Sandwich (western Windsor, Ontario) unopposed. Meanwhile, Lt. Col. Thomas Bligh St. George falls back with 300 British regulars of the 41st Foot, Royal Artillery, and Royal Newfoundland Fencibles, plus 400 Indian allies. Rather than continue south against the main British stronghold of Fort Malden (Amherstburg), however, Hull remains immobile, and his volunteer army soon begins to dissipate.

JULY 16, 1812. This morning, Roberts departs Fort St. Joseph with 45 British regulars of the 10th (Royal Veterans), 180 Canadian militiamen, and 400 Indian warriors aboard the North West Company schooner Caledonia and a boat flotilla, sailing 50

Impressment

For centuries, the Royal Navy was allowed to force or “press” British seamen into its service. This practice was in addition to the usual conscription used in England or other countries. As skilled sailors were always scarce, whenever hostilities erupted and the king’s warships were activated, they had to compete with privateers and merchantmen for trained crews. Therefore, legal authorization of naval impressment simply meant that, in times of war, royal vessels enjoyed precedence in securing “eligible men of seafaring habits between the ages of 18 and 55 years.” Volunteers and recruits were usually gathered up in England by the Impress Service, often through use of bounties or press-gangs. Warships at sea could also scour British vessels, as well as neutral ships, for British subjects.

Private masters felt aggrieved at losing prime hands, as well as being held liable for due wages. Many sailors objected as well, often petitioning the Admiralty to be released, which were granted in numerous cases. Yet a surprising percentage also found conditions better aboard navy ships, and while the pay might be lower, prize money and serving under a popular commander might make up for it. Recruitment abuses nevertheless abounded during Britain’s 20-year struggle against France, as the Royal Navy strained to maintain more than 100,000 prime sailors for its far-flung fleets.

In Atlantic or Caribbean waters, U.S. seamen found themselves in an especially vulnerable position. During the years immediately after American independence, many still looked and sounded British and were often English born. Royal Navy press-gangs therefore ignored their claims of American citizenship and forcibly enrolled almost 6,000 unwilling seamen in the years prior to the War of 1812. Even “protection certificates” issued by U.S. officials failed to halt this practice, which contributed greatly to the outbreak of hostilities.

miles southwestward across Lake Huron to surprise the Americans at Fort Michilimackinac. His expedition disembarks at 3:00 a.m. the next morning, dragging a 6-pounder atop a nearby hill and then calling upon Lt. Porter Hanks to surrender his log fort at the southeastern tip of Mackinac Island by sunup. The unprepared 61-man U.S. garrison surrenders, and the soldiers are paroled.

JULY 17, 1812. At dawn, the 54-gun, 460-man frigate USS Constitution of Capt. Isaac Hull—proceeding from Baltimore to join Rodgers at New York—is pursued off New Jersey by the 64-gun HMS Africa, plus the frigates Belvidera, Guerrière, Shannon, and Aeolus, escaping into Boston 10 days later.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

JULY 19, 1812. A British lake squadron out of Kingston (Ontario) attempts to bombard Sackets Harbor (New York) but is driven off.

AUGUST 1, 1812. A British ship reaches Quebec City from Halifax with news that London has belatedly agreed to stop interfering with neutral American shipping. This report is forwarded to 61-year-old major general Henry Dearborn’s headquarters at Greenbush (across the Hudson from Albany, New York), producing a brief local truce.

AUGUST 2, 1812. Michilimackinac’s paroled American garrison reaches Hull at Detroit, and that same day the local Wyandot Indians switch allegiance, crossing over into Amherstburg (Ontario) to join the British. Three days later, Tecumseh leads two-dozen warriors against an American supply train approaching from Ohio, provoking Hull into contemplating an assault upon Fort Malden.

AUGUST 8, 1812. Reversing his decision to attack Fort Malden (because of the rumored approach of a British relief column under 42-year-old major general Isaac Brock, commander in chief for Upper Canada), Hull recrosses the Detroit River with most of his army.

The next day, he sends 600 men to protect an American supply train arriving from the Raisin River, this escort being ambushed early that afternoon near the Indian village of Maguaga by 150 British regulars and Canadian militiamen under Capt. Adam Muir, plus an indeterminate number of Tecumseh’s warriors. The Americans repel the attack, suffering 18 killed and 64 wounded, compared with 6 dead, 21 injured, and 2 enemy captives. While retiring into Detroit the next day, the Americans are further shelled by the brig Queen Charlotte and the schooner General Hunter.

AUGUST 11, 1812. Hull orders the last of his troops to evacuate Sandwich (Ontario) and return into Detroit, prompting his disgusted subordinates to circulate petitions demanding his recall.

AUGUST 13, 1812. Shortly before midnight, Brock reinforces 25-year-old colonel Henry A. Procter’s garrison at Fort Malden with 50 British regulars, 250 Canadian militiamen, and a 6-pounder. Two days later, he calls upon Hull to surrender Fort Detroit but is rebuffed, so he opens fire with a three-gun battery and two mortars, installed at Sandwich under Capt. M. C. Dixon.

AUGUST 15, 1812. This morning—having previously been ordered by Hull to evacuate Fort Dearborn (modern Chicago)—Capt. Nathan Heald's garrison of 54 U.S. regulars, 12 militiamen, and 27 noncombatants begins retiring toward Fort Wayne (Indiana), when 400 Pottawatomie warriors under Chief Blackbird attack and massacre 26 soldiers, all the militia, 2 women, and a dozen children, while capturing the rest and torching the empty building. Soon the 70-man garrison at Fort Wayne is also besieged.

AUGUST 16, 1812. Detroit. Some 600 warriors under Acting Lt. Col. Matthew Elliott of the British Indian Department, having disembarked the previous night at Spring Wells (three miles below Detroit), are joined this morning by 700 redcoats and Canadian militiamen under Brock, supported by the Queen Charlotte and General Hunter offshore. With 400 of his best Ohio volunteers absent under colonels Lewis Cass and Duncan McArthur, and with Michigan militiamen deserting into their homes, Hull decides he cannot resist. Detroit surrenders, the U.S. commander and 582 regulars being marched off into captivity at Quebec City, while 1,600 Ohio volunteers are paroled. Brock—later created a knight of the Bath for this success—also gains 33 cannon, 2,500 muskets, and the 14-gun brig Adams (renamed the Detroit).

AUGUST 19, 1812. At latitude 41°42' N and longitude 55°48' W (400 miles south of Newfoundland), Hull's Constitution defeats the 48-gun, 244-man frigate HMS Guerrière of Capt. James Richard Dacres in a two-and-a-half-hour duel starting around 5:00 p.m. British casualties total 15 killed and 63 wounded, compared with 7 American dead and a like number injured.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1812. After duly ending the truce of August 1, Dearborn resumes offensive operations.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1812. In the Indiana Territory, Fort Harrison is attacked by hostile warriors but successfully defended by 27-year-old captain Zachary Taylor.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1812. Governor Harrison—now a major general in the Kentucky State Militia—relieves the U.S. garrison trapped in Fort Wayne (Indiana) without opposition from its Indian besiegers.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1812. An American boat party attacks a British supply convoy opposite Toussaint Island (below Prescott, Ontario, on the Saint Lawrence River), only to be repelled by its military escort.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1812. Availing themselves of the absence of part of the Canadian garrison at Gananoque (17 miles below Kingston, Ontario), Capt. Benjamin Forsyth's company of gray-clad U.S. regulars and 30 New York militiamen traverse the Saint Lawrence River from Cape Vincent, disembarking west of this village to overrun it. At a cost of one American killed and another wounded, the raiders wound four Leeds militiamen and capture another eight before withdrawing.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1812. With 500 redcoats and a like number of native allies, Muir—now a brevet major—discovers 2,500 Americans under elderly brigadier general James Winchester advancing northeast along the Maumee River (Ohio). Both sides dig in for a defensive struggle and then withdraw in opposite directions when neither presses home an attack.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1812. Col. Daniel Newnan leads a force of Georgia militiamen 100 miles deep into northern Florida to punish its Seminole and fugitive black residents. In a two-week running engagement between September 27 and October 11, his column is badly mauled by King Payne's subjects and obliged to retreat.

OCTOBER 4, 1812. The elderly British colonel Robert Lethbridge assembles two companies of green-clad Glengarry Light Infantry Fencibles and 600 other Canadian militiamen at Prescott this Sunday to strike across the Saint Lawrence against Ogdensburg (New York). His flotilla is checked in mid-river by American shore batteries under 37-year-old militia brigadier general Jacob ("Potash") Brown. Lethbridge is subsequently recalled to Montreal because of this fiasco and replaced by Lt. Col. Thomas Pearson.

OCTOBER 6, 1812. The 40-year-old U.S. commodore Isaac Chauncey arrives at Sackets Harbor

(New York) to create a naval counterweight against the British squadron at Kingston (Ontario).

OCTOBER 9, 1812. An American boat party under 31-year-old naval lieutenant Jesse Duncan Elliott cuts the British brigs Caledonia and Detroit out from under the guns at Fort Erie (Ontario), burning the latter when it runs aground.

OCTOBER 11, 1812. Queenston Heights. After an abortive nocturnal attempt to invade Ontario across the Niagara River from Lewiston, Maj. Gen. Stephen van Rensselaer of the New York State Militia makes a second try at 3:00 a.m. on October 13, sending over 300 U.S. regulars under Lt. Col. John Chrystie of the 13th Infantry, plus 300 volunteers under Lt. Col. Solomon van Rensselaer aboard 13 boats. Most disembark a bit above Queenston, being pinned down by the British 49th Hertfordshire or “Green Tigers” Regimental Grenadier Company, until Capt. John E. Wool leads a company of the 13th Regiment up a winding path to the top of Queenston’s 350-foot heights.

Here, the Americans overrun a single-gun redan and then slay Brock when he leads an unsuccessful counterattack with 100 redcoats of the 49th Regiment, plus 100 Lincoln militiamen. His successor and aide—British lieutenant colonel John Macdonell—is also wounded and driven back into Vrooman’s Point, after launching a second failed counterattack with two York volunteer companies. Wool now being badly injured as well, he is reinforced and superseded by the 26-year-old American lieutenant colonel Winfield Scott.

By midmorning, 1,300 invaders have ferried across into Queenston, although many others refuse to leave New York. Only 350 U.S. regulars and 250 militiamen are actively engaged against the defenders atop Queenston Heights when British major general Roger Hale Sheaffe—born 49 years earlier in Boston—arrives at noon with reinforcements: 300 redcoats of the 41st Foot, a horse-drawn field battery, plus 250 Canadian militiamen of Niagara

Romanticized depiction of the death of General Brock at the Battle of Queenston Heights. (Metropolitan Toronto Reference Library)

Light Dragoons, Capt. Robert Runchey's "Company of Coloured Men," more Lincoln and York militiamen, as well as Mohawk warriors. At the behest of some Indians, Sheaffe leads them in a flanking maneuver, gathering en route an additional 100 regulars, 150 militiamen, and 300 Six Nations warriors under Chief John Brant. At 3:00 p.m., Sheaffe takes the Americans completely by surprise out of the west, obliging Scott to surrender with 958 men. The invaders have suffered another 300 casualties, compared to only 14 British and Canadian dead, 77 wounded, and 21 missing, plus 14 casualties among their native allies. Van Rensselaer retires across the border and resigns his command at nearby Buffalo to the regular brigadier general Alexander Smyth. Sheaffe, in contrast, is knighted for his timely action.

OCTOBER 23, 1812. At dawn, American militiamen from French Mills (New York) surprise 31 Franco-Canadian militia voyageurs at St. Regis, killing 8 and capturing the remainder.

OCTOBER 27, 1812. The 32-gun frigate USS Essex of Capt. David Porter slips out of Boston, to be followed three days later by Commo. William Bainbridge's Constitution and Hornet for a raid against British shipping in the South Pacific.

NOVEMBER 8, 1812. Chauncey sorties from Sackett's Harbor (New York) with his 18-gun brig Oneida (flag) and a half-dozen armed schooners, chasing the 22-gun British corvette Royal George, plus the schooners Prince Regent and Duke of Gloucester, into Kingston (Ontario) two days later. Although checked by its shore batteries, the Americans mount a blockade. Anglo-Canadian losses are one dead and a few injuries, compared with two killed and eight wounded among Chauncey's crews.

NOVEMBER 20, 1812. Stillborn Invasion. At dawn, advance elements of Dearborn's 3,000 U.S. regulars and 3,000 militiamen break the border near Champlain (New York) in a long-anticipated northern offensive. A screen of gray-clad voltigeurs—French Canadian light infantrymen—and 300 Caughnawaga warriors, stationed at Lacolle (Quebec) under Maj. Charles Michel d'Irumberry de Salaberry, engage in the darkness. Some American units fire upon each other in the resultant melee, after which the Vermont and New York militia furthermore refuse to leave the United States, prompting Dearborn to order a general retirement. Three days later, his troops withdraw into winter quarters at Plattsburgh (New York).

NOVEMBER 23, 1812. British captain Andrew Gray leads 70 redcoats, plus some Cornwall and Glengarry militia companies, in a descent upon the American outpost on the Salmon River near French Mills (New York).

NOVEMBER 28, 1812. Smyth's Offensive. Before dawn, this American brigadier general pushes twin assault columns under Col. William Henry Winder and Lt. Col. Charles G. Boerstler of the 14th U.S. Infantry Regiment across the Niagara River from Black Rock (New York), disembarking two and a half miles below Fort Erie (Ontario). The invaders establish a beachhead by overrunning a small British battery and, by midday, have 1,200 men ashore. However, after being counterattacked by British regulars and Canadian militiamen—whose numbers quickly swell to 1,100—under Lt. Col. Cecil Bishopp, Smyth cancels this operation and retreats back across the river. Redcoat losses total 17 killed, 47 wounded, and 35 captured or missing.

Two nights later, the American brigadier general again attempts an invasion, embarking 1,500 troops, only to abandon this second try at daylight on November 30.

DECEMBER 29, 1812. The Constitution is lying 30 miles off São Salvador (Brazil) waiting for its consort, the Hornet—which has ventured inshore searching for the missing Essex—when Bainbridge sights the 38-gun frigate HMS Java of Capt. Henry Lambert towing the American prize William. The Royal Navy warship casts off its tow and bears down upon the Constitution, which maneuvers away to use its heavier artillery at long range, starting at 2:00 p.m. Once his foe is crippled, Bainbridge closes upon the Java and compels the British to strike after two hours, the latter suffering 22 dead (including Lambert) and 102 wounded. American losses are 12 killed and 22 injured.

JANUARY 18, 1813. Frenchtown. On Winchester's initiative, 660 Kentucky militiamen under lieutenant colonels William Lewis and John Allen advance northeast up the Maumee River to surprise the 50 Essex militiamen and 100 Indian warriors garrisoning the Canadian outpost at Frenchtown (modern Monroe, Michigan). After several hours of fighting, they are driven toward Brownstown—20 miles away—Winchester joining the Frenchtown victors two days later with an additional 300 U.S. regulars under Col. Samuel Wells.

In reaction, Procter crosses the ice from Fort Malden (Amherstburg, Ontario) with 273 redcoats, 275 Canadian militia, 600 Shawnee warriors under the Wyandot chief Roundhead, 28 sailors, plus sleigh-drawn 3-pounders. They fall upon the unwary Americans before dawn on Friday, January 22, quickly breaking their militia contingent (of whom only 30–40 escape through the deep snow). The U.S. regulars resist bravely until called upon to surrender by the captive Winchester—still clad in nightclothes—who fears an Indian bloodbath. British and Canadian casualties total 185, compared to 400 American dead, plus 500 prisoners. Some 30 captives are murdered by drunken Shawnees, this battle being remembered by Americans as the “River Raisin Massacre,” and Procter dubbed as “the Butcher.”

This defeat prompts Harrison to burn his stores, stockpiled at the nearby Maumee Rapids for an anticipated advance against Detroit, and retire south. Procter is promoted to brigadier general by Canada’s governor general (45-year-old lieutenant general Sir George Prevost, himself a veteran West Indian campaigner [see “June 19, 1803” entry in “Napoleonic Wars”]).

FEBRUARY 1813. The 45-year-old militia major general and former senator, Andrew (“Old Hickory”) Jackson reaches Natchez after a month-long trek from Nashville with 2,000 western Tennessee volunteers. His force is intended to occupy Spanish Florida, but instead it is recalled at the last minute by Madison.

Only the disputed borderland between Louisiana and western Florida is to be seized. This operation is carried out by 55-year-old major general James Wilkinson, who leads a contingent from New Orleans to displace the Spanish garrison at Fort Charlotte (Mobile, Alabama) by April 15. The outnumbered Spaniards retire into Pensacola, without bloodshed.

EARLY FEBRUARY 1813. A detachment of U.S. regulars, plus 250 mounted Tennessee volunteers under Col. John Williams, plunge into northern Florida, destroying scores of Seminole villages during a three-week campaign starting on February 7.

FEBRUARY 7, 1813. At dawn, Forsyth’s 200 troops surprise the Canadian militia outpost at Brockville

Canadian Glengarry light infantryman. (Parks Canada)

(formerly Elizabethtown, Ontario), returning across the icy Saint Lawrence into Ogdensburg (New York) with 52 prisoners—most soon paroled—and being promoted to major for this exploit.

FEBRUARY 22, 1813. At 7:00 a.m., recently promoted lieutenant colonel “Red George” Macdonell and Capt. John Jenkins of the Glengarry Light Infantry launch a two-pronged strike from Prescott (Ontario) across the frozen Saint Lawrence with 120 regulars of the 8th (King's) Foot, 30 Royal Newfoundland Fencibles, 350 Canadian militiamen, and sleigh-drawn guns, storming into Ogdensburg (New York) before its defenders are fully alert. After an hour-and-a-half fight, Forsyth's garrison retreats southwest toward Black Lake, having killed seven Anglo-Canadians and wounded 48—including Macdonell and Jenkins. American losses are 20 dead and 70 captured (mostly wounded). Their ice-bound gunboats are torched and Ogdensburg looted before the raiders retire.

Fearing this crossing presages a larger winter offensive, Dearborn hastily reinforces Sackets Harbor with 800 U.S. regulars from Plattsburgh (New York) under 33-year-old colonel Zebulon Montgomery Pike, plus 400 militiamen out of Greenbush.

MARCH 17, 1813. American artillery at Black Rock (New York) bombards Fort Erie (Ontario), apparently to mark Saint Patrick's Day.

APRIL 25, 1813. Little York. This Sunday, Chauncey exits Sackets Harbor (New York) with the 24-gun American corvette Madison, brig Oneida, schooner Julia, and a dozen lesser consorts, conveying Dearborn's army across Lake Ontario to attack Little York (modern Toronto). They bear 1,700 troops, mostly regulars from the 6th, 15th, and 16th U.S. Infantry regiments, detachments from the 14th and 21st, two companies of light artillery, Forsyth's Rifle Corps, plus some volunteers.

The next afternoon, their vessels are spotted off Scarborough Bluffs, and Sheaffe's 750-man British garrison stands to arms: two companies of the 8th Foot, another pair from the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, a company of Glengarry Light Infantry Fencibles, flank companies of the 3rd York Militia, 50–100 Mississauga, Chippewa, and Ojibwa warriors, plus assorted dockyard workers. Around 8:00 a.m. on April 27, the Americans disembark west of York at Sunnyside, Forsyth brushing aside opposition from native snipers and from Capt. Neale McNeale's 8th Grenadier Company (whose commander dies during an American bayonet charge to secure this beachhead). By 10:00 a.m., most of Pike's contingent is ashore, and Chauncey's dozen armed schooners commence bombarding the two-gun Western Battery. One of the battery's magazines explodes accidentally an hour later, killing 20 defenders and wounding many others, compelling the Canadians to fall back once the small American army—now bolstered by its field artillery—pushes east. Briefly checked at 12:30 p.m. by the two 12-pounders of Half Moon Battery, the Americans soon subdue it with their cannon, so Sheaffe (having suffered 62 dead and 94 wounded) orders a general retirement toward Kingston.

However, the defenders delay the invaders by leaving Half Moon's flag flying; they also ignite their main magazine, which lies farther behind this battery, upon departing. The subsequent explosion kills 38 Americans and injures 222, Pike being among the mortally wounded. The Americans hold York for four days, setting many of its buildings ablaze during April 30–May 1, after which they depart toward Niagara.

APRIL 28, 1813. Fort Meigs. Procter arrives from Amherstburg at the Maumee River mouth with 550 redcoats, 61 fencibles, and 464 Canadian militiamen aboard a half-dozen vessels, two gunboats, and a boat flotilla. Quickly erecting batteries on both banks, he is joined by 1,200 Indians under Tecumseh. Procter then advances six miles upriver to invest Harrison's newly constructed Fort Meigs by May 1 (just below the Maumee Rapids, named for Ohio's governor Return J. Meigs). The attackers cannot completely encircle this stockaded American stronghold, so that Harrison is able to contact 1,200 Kentucky militiamen who are approaching out of the southwest in his support under Brig. Gen. Green Clay.

On the morning of May 5, the first 900 Kentuckians arrive to disembark under Col. William Dudley and rush the British siege batteries on the north bank, while Harrison launches a simultaneous sally from inside beleaguered Fort Meigs against the besiegers' southern battery. Three companies of the British 41st Foot and some Canadian militiamen under Muir check the first attack, allowing Tecumseh's warriors to close in behind the Kentuckians, killing or capturing almost all their opponents. Nevertheless, a second disembarkation by Clay overwhelms the southern British battery, after which he and Harrison retire inside the fort, arranging a two-day truce. American losses total 400 dead and 600 captured; Procter suffers 15 killed, 46 injured, and 40 captured.

Yet despite his victory, Procter cannot carry Fort Meigs, and as his weary militiamen insist upon returning home to plant their spring crops, the British general is compelled to abandon his siege by May 9.

MAY 8, 1813. After destroying York and heading south across Lake Ontario, Dearborn and Chauncey's expedition appears outside Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario), but, being “sickly and depressed” because of foul weather, the force sails back east instead of attacking the fort, making toward Sackets Harbor (New York).

MAY 15, 1813. The 31-year-old veteran commodore Sir James Lucas Yeo (see “December 1808” entry in “Napoleonic Wars”) arrives at Kingston (Ontario) with 150 British seamen, soon joined by another 300, to help man the newly launched 23-gun Wölfe, the 21-gun Royal George, the 14-gun brig Earl of Moira, plus the 14-gun schooner Prince Regent (soon renamed Lord Beresford) and the 12-gun schooner Sir Sidney Smith.

That same day on the Atlantic Seaboard, a British naval force disembarks to sack Havre de Grace (Maryland).

MAY 25, 1813. Fort George. This morning, Chauncey’s American lake squadron begins bombarding Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario), quickly setting all its log buildings ablaze. Two days later, Colonel Scott—having been exchanged during the preceding winter (see “October 11, 1812” entry) and now substituting for the indisposed Dearborn—disembarks his vanguard, followed by contingents under brigadier generals John Parker Boyd, Winder, and John Chandler.

To oppose the 4,000 Americans, British brigadier general John Vincent has 1,000 men of the 8th and 49th Foot, Royal Newfoundland Fencibles, Glengarry Light Infantry Fencibles, plus 300 Canadian militiamen. Unable to contain Scott’s beachhead, and having suffered 52 killed and 306 wounded or missing, the British commander spikes Fort George’s guns, then retreats southwest toward Beaver Dam (Thorold). Scott thus secures this strategic outpost, at a cost of 40 American dead and 120 injured.

Around that same time, American lieutenant colonel James P. Preston pushes across the Niagara from Black Rock and occupies deserted Fort Erie (Ontario).

MAY 27, 1813. Sackets Harbor. Availing themselves of Chauncey’s absence at the west end of Lake Ontario, Prevost and Yeo slip southeast out of Kingston (Ontario) with a 750-man assault force aboard the Wölfe, the Royal George, the Earl of Moira, two armed schooners, two gunboats, and 30 lesser craft. Col. Edward Baynes brings a grenadier company of the 100th (County of Dublin) Foot, a section of the Attack on Sackets Harbor.

1st (Royal Scots), two companies of the 8th, four of the 104th (ex-Brunswick Fencibles), one of Glen-garry Light Infantry, and two of Canadian voltigeurs, plus a pair of 6-pounders.

The next morning, this expedition appears off Sackets Harbor (New York) and is unable to close because of contrary winds. The 400 U.S. defenders under militia major general Brown are reinforced by several hundred hastily assembled local militiamen. Shortly after daybreak on May 29, however, Baynes fights his way onto Horse Island (a mile west-southwest), scattering its 500 American defenders, although being checked in the outskirts of Sackets Harbor by U.S. regulars at Fort Tompkins. Fighting then bogs down until Brown finally slips a militia contingent behind the British right, persuading Prevost and Bayne to withdraw three hours later. The Britons and Canadians set sail for Kingston that same night, having suffered 47 killed (including Captain Gray), 194 wounded, and 16 missing. American losses are 21 dead, 85 injured, 154 captured, plus three 6-pounders taken. Brown is promoted to brigadier general in the regular U.S. Army for this defense.

JUNE 1, 1813. The 38-gun frigate USS Chesapeake of Capt. James Lawrence emerges from Boston, being engaged 20 miles out at 5:50 p.m. by Capt. Philip Bowes Vere Broke's 38-gun frigate HMS Shannon. Within 15 minutes, the American vessel is pounded into submission, suffering 61 dead (including Lawrence, who falls mortally wounded, crying: "Don't give up the ship!") and 85 wounded, as compared with 24 killed and 59 injured aboard the Shannon. The Chesapeake is then sailed to Halifax by its captors.

JUNE 2, 1813. This evening, 30-year-old lieutenant Thomas Macdonough's U.S. armed schooners Growler and Eagle anchor at Rouses Point (the north end of Lake Champlain, New York). The next morning, they penetrate the Richelieu River mouth to attack the British garrison at Île aux Noix (later Fort Lennox, Quebec), only to be surprised by a mist-shrouded boat sortie. Both American men-of-war are captured, suffering 1 killed, 19 wounded, and more than 90 prisoners. The defenders' losses are only 3 injured; the prizes are renamed the Shannon and the Broke.

JUNE 3, 1813. Yeo's British squadron sails west across Lake Ontario, bearing 220 redcoats of the 8th Foot, ammunition, and stores to relieve Vincent.

JUNE 5, 1813. Stoney Creek. Having observed American brigadier generals Winder and Chandler's 3,500 men and four fieldpieces bivouac for the night at Stoney Creek (Ontario), Vincent detaches 700 redcoats of the 8th and 49th Foot under Lt. Col. John Harvey to check their westward progress toward Burlington by mounting a nocturnal raid. Armed with the invaders' password, the British column silently penetrates the U.S. encampment at 2:00 a.m. on June 6, surprising the enemy.

Although startled, the Americans react well, ejecting Harvey's outnumbered force by dawn with a loss of 23 dead redcoats, 134 wounded, and 5 missing. U.S. casualties are only 55, with another 100 missing; but among the latter are both American generals, carried off as prisoners. Command therefore devolves upon Col. James Burn of the 2nd Dragoons, who opts to retreat toward Forty Mile Creek (Grimsby).

The American depot at this place is attacked from offshore by Yeo's squadron on the afternoon of June 7, seizing 16 boatloads of supplies, thus causing Burn to withdraw as far as Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario) by June 8.

JUNE 13, 1813. British naval forces sack Hampton (Virginia) but, nine days later, suffer a heavy repulse off Craney Island.

JUNE 22, 1813. This evening, Laura Ingersoll Secord—a Canadian housewife from Queenston (Ontario)—reaches Lt. James FitzGibbon's detachment of the 49th Foot at Beaver Dam to warn it that an American column is advancing southwest from Fort George.

These attackers appear two mornings later, consisting of 575 cavalymen and infantrymen under Lieutenant Colonel Boerstler, plus two fieldpieces. At 9:00 a.m., the American rear is attacked by 300 Caughnawaga warriors under Capt. Dominique Ducharme of the British Indian Department, soon joined by 100 Mohawks under Capt. William Johnson Kerr and Chief John Brant. By the time FitzGibbon arrives at noon with 50 redcoats, the wounded Boerstler is already so discouraged that he surrenders his entire command. The Caughnawagas, having borne the brunt of this fighting, suffer 15 killed and 25 wounded. Some 462 U.S. regulars are marched off into captivity, their militia contingent—mounted partisans under Cyrenius Chapin of Buffalo (New York), better known as the "Forty Thieves"—being paroled.

JULY 5, 1813. An Anglo-Canadian party under Lt. Col. Thomas Clark crosses the Niagara River and raids an American depot at Fort Schlosser (New York), capturing a 6-pounder and numerous other stores.

JULY 11, 1813. Bisshopp raids the American depot at Black Rock (New York) with 250 British regulars and Canadian militiamen, only to be overtaken by Tuscarora warriors while retiring with valuable booty; he is mortally wounded. Redcoat losses total 13 killed and 25 wounded.

JULY 18, 1813. Two American gunboats capture 15 British supply boats near Rockport (Ontario), then repel a rescue mission out of Kingston at Goose Creek (New York).

JULY 20, 1813. Having traversed Lake Erie from Amherstburg (Ontario) with 300 redcoats and 3,000 warriors, Procter invests Fort Meigs (Ohio), withdrawing eight days later when its American garrison under Clay refuses to be lured out into the open.

JULY 21, 1813. Chauncey sorties west from Sackett Harbor (New York) with his new 26-gun corvette General Pike, accompanied by another warship, brig, and 10 schooners. They load a troop contingent at Fort Niagara before probing Vincent's defenses at Burlington (Ontario).

JULY 27, 1813. Creek War. In Alabama, American settlers under militia colonel James Caller attack 300 Lower Creek warriors under Chief Peter McQueen, who are returning home from obtaining arms at Spanish Pensacola. Although this tribe is contemplating hostilities against their Upper Creek rivals—already at war against the Americans around the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers—Caller's men are convinced that the visit to hostile Pensacola portends treachery. This Battle of Burnt Corn Creek ends inconclusively, but drives the Lower Creek to join their brethren in hostilities against the settlers.

JULY 29, 1813. Plattsburgh Raid. This morning, British lieutenant colonel John Murray departs Île aux Noix (Quebec) with 950 troops of the 13th, 100th, 103rd, and Canadian Fencibles, plus two-dozen gunners for a pair of 3-pounders and 35 militiamen. They travel aboard 47 boats, escorted by a trio of gunboats and the captured American schooners Broke and Shannon—now commanded by Cmdr. Thomas Everard of HMS Wasp and Lt. Daniel Pring.

Pushing south into Lake Champlain, this expedition overruns Chazy, then surprises the American depot at Plattsburgh (New York) the next dawn, disembarking without opposition from its few militia defenders—Hampton being absent at Burlington (Vermont) with his main army and squadron. Storehouses both here and at Swanton are destroyed, after which Everard continues toward Burlington with his schooners and a gunboat to capture four American vessels. Murray meanwhile retires north into Canada.

JULY 31, 1813. Chauncey's squadron returns to York (Toronto). Finding no British troops, the Americans pillage its storehouses and then set them ablaze before departing two days later toward Fort Niagara (New York).

AUGUST 1, 1813. Early this morning, after retreating from Fort Meigs (see "July 20, 1813" entry), Procter disembarks 300 redcoats and a like number of Indian allies near the Sandusky River mouth (Ohio) to invest smaller Fort Stephenson. After a preliminary bombardment, the British attackers launch their assault at 4:30 p.m., which this garrison stoutly resists. Although earlier ordered by Harrison—whose large American army lies nearby—to evacuate, Fort Stephenson's 160 U.S. regulars and single 6-pounder under Maj. George Croghan break Procter's columns and oblige him to reembark the next day, having suffered 96 casualties.

AUGUST 7, 1813. Yeo's two British ships, pair of brigs, and two schooners confront Chauncey's larger squadron off Fort Niagara, both commanders circling warily. Two American schooners capsize in a squall that same night, then two more become separated and are captured in the early hours of August 11, before Yeo retires.

AUGUST 25, 1813. The 28-year-old American commodore Oliver Hazard Perry appears outside Fort Malden (Amherstburg, Ontario) with his new 20-gun brigs Lawrence (flag) and Niagara, plus lesser the vessels Ariel, Caledonia, Ohio, Scorpion, Somers, Tigress, Porcupine, and Trippe (mounting 15 guns between them). This 490-man squadron has earlier ventured west from Presque Isle (Erie, Pennsylvania) to establish a base at Put-in-Bay (Ohio). The one-armed, 28-year-old British acting commodore Robert Heriot Barclay has insufficient strength to sortie.

AUGUST 29, 1813. Fort Mims. A black slave reports hostile Indians approaching Fort Mims (40 miles north of Mobile, on the eastern bank of the Alabama River), but is flogged for lying.

The next day at noon, 800–1,000 Creek warriors (known as “Red Sticks”), under chiefs William Weatherford and Josiah Francis, steal up on the outpost’s open gates, surprising its garrison of 100 Mississippi volunteers and 400 noncombatants. After a lengthy struggle, the attackers overrun this blazing structure, massacring 247 people and carrying most of the remainder off as captives. This action not only spreads terror throughout the American settlements but provokes an all-out military counter-effort from neighboring Tennessee and Georgia.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1813. Perry’s American squadron again shows itself off Amherstburg (Ontario), increasing pressure on Barclay to sortie because of disruptions to British lake-borne traffic.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1813. Chauncey’s American squadron sights Yeo’s weaker force off the Niagara River mouth, chasing it across Lake Ontario for five days until the British shelter in a fortified bay five miles west of Kingston, having suffered four killed and seven wounded.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1813. Lake Erie. This Thursday morning, Barclay sallies from Amherstburg (Ontario) with his new 19-gun flagship Detroit, the 17-gun Queen Charlotte under Lt. Robert Finnis, the 10-gun Hunter, plus the Chippawa, the Lady Prevost, and the Little Belt—armed with 19 guns between them—to beat southeast and surprise Perry’s more powerful American squadron at its anchorage 10 miles southwest of Pelee Island.

Because of contrary winds, Perry can see the British slowly approaching the next morning, so he sorties with virtually his entire strength, nine vessels in a straggling line (the Ohio being absent on a cruise). Barclay opens fire around noon with his more long-range guns, but the Americans enjoy the weather gauge so close with the 103-man Lawrence in the van so that their carronades might bear. By 2:00 p.m., both flagships are incapacitated, and Barclay is severely wounded. A half-hour later, the American commodore transfers a half mile from his devastated Lawrence aboard Elliott’s undamaged vice-flagship, the Niagara; he then sails through the British line, splitting it asunder. Barclay’s Detroit and two other battered British schooners are put out of action, and by 3:00 p.m., Finnis is dead, the attackers’ entire fleet being crippled.

Eventually all British vessels strike, their casualties totaling 41 killed and 94 wounded, as opposed to 27 dead and 96 injured among Perry’s vessels—83 lost aboard the Lawrence alone. (Upon taking possession of his prizes, the American commodore makes a famous report to Harrison: “We have met the enemy, and they are ours: two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop.”)

SEPTEMBER 19, 1813. The 59-year-old U.S. major general Wade Hampton pushes across the Canadian border near Odelltown (Quebec) to divert attention from a larger American buildup at Sackets Harbor (New York). The next day, Hampton retires back across the border into Chazy.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1813. Following Barclay’s defeat, Procter torches his supply dump within Detroit, then retreats cross-river into Fort Malden (Amherstburg, Ontario).

SEPTEMBER 26, 1813. As Perry’s victorious warships enter the Detroit River from the south, Procter destroys Fort Malden and then begins slowly retiring eastward into Ontario the next morning, with 800 redcoats—mostly of the 41st Infantry—plus 1,000 Indian allies under Tecumseh.

That same day, Harrison arrives with 4,500 U.S. regular and militia infantrymen, occupying Amherstburg, Sandwich, and Detroit. On September 28, he sets out with 3,000 troops in pursuit of the retreating British.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1813. Chauncey’s American squadron—despite suffering considerable damage—chases Yeo’s warships into Burlington Bay (Ontario), killing 5 British seamen and wounding 13.

OCTOBER 1, 1813. Harrison’s column is reinforced by 500 mounted Kentucky rifles under 32-year-old lieutenant colonel (and congressman) Richard Mentor Johnson, giving his army greater mobility. Late the next day, they rendezvous with Perry’s gunboats at the Thames River mouth (eastern Lake Saint Clair), pressing upstream together on October 3 in pursuit of the retreating Procter and Tecumseh.

OCTOBER 5, 1813. Thames (or Moraviantown).

On the north bank of the Thames River, five miles southwest of Moraviantown (modern New Fairfield, Ontario), Procter's and Tecumseh's retreating columns make a stand against their American pursuers. A rearguard of 500 British troops forms into two lines across the road into some woods, while 500 Shawnee and allied warriors hide in a nearby swamp. Although they are equipped with a 6-pounder, it has no ammunition.

Upon contacting this deployment with his 3,000-man army, Harrison refuses to be drawn into a flanking attempt; instead, he follows Johnson's suggestion and makes a direct frontal charge with his 500 mounted Kentuckians at midafternoon. This scatters the demoralized redcoats within 10 minutes, after which the Americans dismount to attack the Shawnee farther north into the swamp, who hold their ground for an hour until Tecumseh is mortally wounded. They, too, then break and flee, leaving behind 33 dead. British casualties total 18 killed, 22 wounded, and 477 captured, as opposed to 15 Americans dead and 30 injured (among the latter is Johnson, who receives five wounds, but survives).

Procter eventually reaches Burlington with 250 survivors, while the American cavalry retire into Detroit four days later, followed by its infantry on October 10.

OCTOBER 11, 1813. In a diversionary move, American colonel Isaac Clark enters Missisquoi Bay (Quebec) with 200 militiamen, surprising its tiny Canadian garrison at Philipsburg.

OCTOBER 12, 1813. After dispatching his kinsman—42-year-old militia major general John Coffee—south with a cavalry vanguard toward Huntsville (Alabama), Jackson departs Fayetteville (Tennessee) with his 2,500-man main body to invade Creek territory.

OCTOBER 14, 1813. After signing an armistice with the Pottawatomie, Wyandot, Miami, and Chipewia Indians at Detroit, receiving numerous hostages, then appointing Brigadier General Cass as his successor, Harrison departs on a triumphal progression toward Washington. (He is eventually elected ninth president of the United States, serving only a single month before dying. His subordinate, Johnson, becomes ninth vice president under Van Buren—campaigning under the slogan: "Rumpsey, dumpsey, Johnson killed Tecumseh.")

OCTOBER 17, 1813. This evening, Wilkinson departs Henderson's Bay (west of Sackets Harbor, New York) with 8,000 American troops—14 infantry regiments, 2 of dragoons, plus 3 artillery companies—to join Hampton's army farther northeast, then drive upon Montreal. Wilkinson's expedition sails aboard 300 craft, escorted by a dozen gunboats, but is struck by a storm before reaching Grenadier Island (at the Saint Lawrence River mouth); he is further decimated by cold weather and poor supplies. Wilkinson, now quite ill, does not resume his advance until two weeks later.

OCTOBER 21, 1813. This morning, Hampton crosses the Quebec border from Four Corners (New York) with 4,000 American infantrymen, 200 dragoons, and 10 fieldpieces—1,400 New York militiamen refusing to march out of state—to push up the Châteauguay River, join Wilkinson on the Saint Lawrence, then threaten Montreal.

OCTOBER 25, 1813. Châteauguay River. After moving north to within 14 miles of Montreal, Hampton's scouts, early this afternoon, detect 50 Canadian fencibles, 150 voltigeurs, 100 militiamen, and 50 native allies under Lieutenant Colonel de Salaberry occupying a defensive line on the western side of the Châteauguay. Without awaiting Wilkinson—whom he dislikes—Hampton decides to brush aside this formation the next morning with a two-pronged assault, so he detaches Col. Robert Purdy's 1,500-man 1st Infantry Brigade over to the eastern bank for a flanking maneuver—little realizing that another 1,300 Canadian troops under Swiss-born major general Louis de Watteville are dug in upriver.

Purdy's column becomes slowed and disoriented overnight, not arriving opposite de Salaberry's position until noon on October 26. When the main American body moves forward under Brig. Gen. George Izard at 2:00 p.m., it draws fire from hitherto-undetected Canadian militia companies, after which, Purdy is struck by a counterattack led by captains Joseph Bernard Bruyère and Charles Daly. Surprised by this unexpected strength, the 4,000 invaders—having suffered only 50 casualties—withdraw as far south as Chateaugay (New York), without informing Wilkinson. De Salaberry's losses are 2 dead, 16 wounded, and 7 missing.

NOVEMBER 2, 1813. This evening, Coffee fords the Coosa River at Fish Dams with 900 cavalrymen, attacking the Creek village of Tallushatchee (near modern Jacksonville, Alabama) an hour after sunrise on November 3, killing 186 natives and capturing 84—of whom only 40 are marched back into Jackson's main camp. American losses total 5 dead and 41 wounded.

NOVEMBER 6, 1813. This evening, British major general Francis, Baron de Rottenburg, detaches Lt. Col. Joseph W. Morrison—born 30 years earlier in New York City—from Kingston (Ontario) to pursue Wilkinson with 450 regulars (nine companies) of the 89th Foot and 160 of the 49th, plus 20 gunners for two 6-pounders. They sail aboard Cmdr. William Howe Mulcaster's schooners Lord Beresford and Sir Sydney Smith, plus seven gunboats and numerous lesser craft.

NOVEMBER 7, 1813. Wilkinson disembarks at Morristown (opposite Brockville, Ontario) to work his empty boats past Fort Wellington—farther down the Saint Lawrence at Prescott—under cover of darkness. Once past these British defenses, American brigadier general Leonard Covington is set ashore the next morning at Iroquois with 1,200 troops to clear its northern shoreline of snipers; he is then joined on November 9 by Brown's 2,500 men and some fieldpieces to drive upon Cornwall. Although Wilkinson continues to press his advance, he remains worried about his rear, because Morrison's counterexpedition has also reached Prescott that same morning of November 9.

NOVEMBER 8, 1813. Talladega. This evening—after a 30-mile forced march from the Coosa River—Jackson's 2,000 troops arrive within six miles of a village of 160 friendly Creeks at Talladega (east of modern Birmingham, Alabama), who are being besieged by 1,000 hostile Red Sticks. The next dawn, the Americans advance with cavalry on both wings, their vanguard luring the Creek warriors into a counterattack, during which the Red Sticks are enveloped. Indian casualties total at least 299 dead, compared with 17 killed and 80 wounded among Jackson's ranks. Notwithstanding this victory, the Americans are obliged to retire north into Fort Schlosser at Ten Islands because of a lack of supplies.

NOVEMBER 10, 1813. Crysler's Farm. On a rainy afternoon, Morrison's 900 redcoats and three 6-pounders overtake the rear of Wilkinson's much larger American army as it prepares to drive through Cornwall toward Montreal. Headquartered at John

French Canadian voltigeur, or light infantryman. (Parks Canada)

Crysler's farm, the British commander probes the U.S. rearguard the next morning, provoking a minor exchange that goads Wilkinson into ordering brigadier generals Covington, Boyd, and Robert Swartout to swing about with their 2,000 troops, then march in three columns to drive off these pursuers.

The American counterattack begins well, easily pushing back a line of three Canadian voltigeur companies. By 2:00 p.m., however, they are checked by Morrison's main body, which the Americans vainly try to outflank. Boyd suffers heavy casualties charging the British lines in piecemeal fashion, eventually drawing off two and a half hours later in disarray.

His losses total 102 dead (including Covington), 237 wounded, more than 100 captured, plus a lost fieldpiece. The Britons and Canadians suffer 22 killed, 148 wounded, and 9 missing.

On the morning of November 12, Wilkinson learns that Hampton has withdrawn into New York, so he cancels his own operation. His army veers south two days later to recross the Saint Lawrence and enter winter quarters on the Salmon River banks at French Mills (renamed Fort Covington).

NOVEMBER 18, 1813. Militia brigadier general James White—a subordinate of Jackson's bitter eastern Tennessee rival, major general John Cocke—attacks the Hillabee (or Hillabee) towns of the Upper Creek along the Tallapoosa River headwaters, little realizing that these tribes have already asked Jackson for peace. Over the next couple of days, White slaughters more than 60 Indians and captures 250, without suffering a single loss; thus, he unwittingly goads the Upper Creek into renewing hostilities.

NOVEMBER 28, 1813. This evening, Brig. Gen. John Floyd's 950 Georgia militiamen bivouac within a few miles of the Upper Creek village of Auttose (20 miles from the Tallapoosa-Coosa confluence, Alabama). The next dawn, a surprise attack upon this place kills an estimated 200 Indians, compared with 11 American dead and 54 wounded.

NOVEMBER 30, 1813. The 26-gun sloop HMS Raccoon of Cmdr. William Black reaches the American fur-trading outpost of Fort Astoria (Oregon), finding it already flying the Union Jack. Two weeks later, it is renamed Fort George in a formal ceremony ashore.

DECEMBER 10, 1813. With only 100 men left to garrison Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario), American brigadier general George McClure turns 400 Canadian civilians out into the snow, then torches the fort along with the villages of Newark and Queenston before retreating across the Niagara River into New York.

DECEMBER 19, 1813. Riall's Winter Forays. Before dawn, Murray slips across the Niagara River with 550 redcoats, disembarking three miles beyond the U.S. garrison at Fort Niagara (New York). A bayonet charge slays 67 of its surprised defenders and wounds 11, only 20 Americans escaping. Murray thus secures this fort at a cost of 5 British dead and 3 injured.

Murray is followed by the recently arrived 38-year-old Irish-born major general Phineas Riall with 500 men of the Royal Scots and the 41st Foot, plus 500 Indian auxiliaries, who destroy the villages of Youngstown, Lewiston, Tuscarora, Fort Schlosser, and Manchester in retaliation for the burning of Fort George. The raiders then halt at Tonawanda Creek—10 miles north of Buffalo—having secured 422 prisoners, 27 cannon, 3,000 firearms, and copious stores.

Ten days later, Riall again crosses the Niagara under cover of darkness, this time disembarking beyond the Falls with 1,000 redcoats and 400 natives. Lt. Col. James Ogilvie of the 8th Foot leads the vanguard two miles toward Black Rock (New York), securing the bridge over Scajaquada Creek at dawn on December 30 so that Lt. Col. John Gordon can charge through this village at sunrise, fighting his way into neighboring Buffalo. Despite resistance from Maj. Gen. Amos Hall's 1,200-man American garrison, the British take and torch both places, along with four armed schooners and large supply dumps, before retiring into Ontario. The attackers' casualties total 112, whereas the defenders' total 30 killed, 40 wounded, and 69 captured.

DECEMBER 23, 1813. After a 10-day, 100-mile march north from Fort Caroline (Alabama), Brig. Gen. Ferdinand L. Claiborne's 1,000 U.S. regulars, Mississippi militiamen, volunteers, and Choctaw allies fall upon Chief Weatherford's village of Econochaca, killing 30 residents and scattering the rest. American casualties are 1 dead and 6 wounded.

DECEMBER 30, 1813. The British ship Bramble reaches Annapolis (Maryland) with news of Napoleon's defeat at Leipzig, plus a proposal from Foreign Minister Lord Castlereagh to open peace negotiations between London and Washington. Madison accepts 10 days later.

JANUARY 17, 1814. Jackson's Reverse. After his previous army of western Tennesseans has demobilized after the expiration of their enlistments, Jackson is reinforced at Fort Strother by 800 new recruits, setting out with 930 men and a 6-pounder to fall upon a Creek concentration at Emuckfaw Creek (a tributary of the Tallapoosa River, Alabama). En route, his army is bolstered by 200–300 friendly Creeks and Cherokees.

On January 22, hostile Indians ambush Jackson's column, forcing a retreat, then deliver a second deadly

Andrew Jackson

Andrew Jackson was born on March 15, 1767, in a backwoods settlement in the Waxhaws area between North and South Carolina. The third of three sons born to Scottish-Irish settlers, his father died a few weeks before his birth from a logging accident. Andrew's mother therefore moved the family to the home of one of her sisters. All three children served as teenaged volunteers during the American Revolution, Hugh dying after the Battle of Stono Ferry. Robert and Andrew were held captive in April 1781—a British officer ordered them to clean his boots, and when they refused, he beat them with his sword, cutting Andrew's hand to the bone. This brutal act created in Jackson a lifelong enmity.

Robert died soon afterward of smallpox, as did Jackson's mother after she went to nurse American prisoners in Charleston. Orphaned at 14, young Andrew lived for the next year and a half with relatives, apprenticed to a saddle maker. In 1784, however, he went to Salisbury (North Carolina) to study law and was admitted to the bar three years later. Appointed as prosecutor at Nashville early in 1788, he excelled in his rough-and-tumble life on the frontier. As he prospered, Jackson bought slaves and built a mansion called the Hermitage. In 1791 he married a young divorcée named Rachel Donelson, but two years later, they learned that her divorce was not final. After some litigation, they remarried in 1794.

Jackson became such a prominent local figure that, when Tennessee was granted statehood in June 1796, he was elected as its first U.S. congressman. The next year, he also was appointed as senator; instead, he resigned to become a judge on the State Supreme Court in 1798. In 1801, he was elected a colonel in the Tennessee militia and promoted to major general the next year. His judicial term ended in 1804, so Jackson became more involved in military affairs.

A year after the War of 1812 erupted, he started a series of campaigns against the Creek Indians.

attack two days later at Enotachopco. Many recruits panic and flee, the rearguard being saved with difficulty. American losses total two-dozen dead and 71 wounded, compared with 72 slain Creeks.

JANUARY 27, 1814. Calibee Creek. After a nine-day, 50-mile march from Fort Mitchell (located on the Chattahoochee River bank, south of Columbus, Georgia) to attack the Upper Creek village of Tuckaubatchee, Floyd's 1,200 volunteers and 400 Indian allies suffer a dawn attack 10 miles short of their destination. After a bitter engagement around Calibee Creek, the warriors draw off, leaving behind 37 fallen comrades. Floyd's losses are 22 killed and 147 wounded, prompting his expedition to retreat.

FEBRUARY 1, 1814. Wilkinson evacuates French Mills (New York), detaching Brown toward Sackets Harbor with 2,000 men, meanwhile leading the remainder southeast into Plattsburgh (New York).

FEBRUARY 6, 1814. Royal Marines and Canadian militiamen cross the Saint Lawrence from Cornwall (Ontario), plundering Madrid (New York).

FEBRUARY 8, 1814. After a year-long Pacific cruise during which he has captured dozens of British prizes, Porter's USS Essex is blockaded within Valparaíso (Chile) by Capt. James Hillyar's 36-gun frigate HMS Phoebe and Cmdr. Tudor Tucker's 26-gun sloop Cherub. Porter eventually exits on March 28, being partially dismasted by a squall and then defeated three miles down the coast.

MARCH 5, 1814. This evening, a 165-man foraging party under Capt. A. H. Holmes of the 24th U.S. Infantry is attacked near Longwood (Ontario) by 240 redcoats, Canadian militiamen, and Indian warriors under Capt. James Basden of the 89th Foot. The Americans are dug in, so the three-pronged British attack through deep snow fares badly, resulting in 14 dead and 52 wounded. Holmes's casualties are only 7, allowing him to retire unmolested into Detroit.

MARCH 27, 1814. Horseshoe Bend. After being reinforced by the 39th U.S. Infantry Regiment and making a two-week advance south from Fort Strother, Jackson's 3,000 regulars, militiamen, and native allies (including 21-year-old major Sam Houston of the 39th) come upon 1,200 Creek warriors this morning, ensconced with their families upon a 90-acre peninsula called Tohopeka on a horseshoe bend in the Tallapoosa River. The neck of this peninsula is protected by a log breastwork, and canoes are beached at its far end to facilitate escape.

The American commander orders Coffee's riders, plus Cherokee and Creek allies, to take up position opposite this bend to impede flight. Meanwhile, Jackson's two fieldpieces bombard the breastwork until he learns that Coffee's force has attacked the Creeks from the rear. At that point, the 39th launches a frontal assault, and the attackers fight their way into this compound from both directions. By nightfall, 557 Creeks lie dead, and another 350—mostly women and children—are prisoners; several hundred more have drowned or been shot attempting to swim away. American casualties total 26 dead and 106 wounded; Cherokee, 18 killed and 36 wounded; friendly Creeks, 5 and 11.

HMS Phoebe engages the damaged USS Essex outside Valparaíso. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

MARCH 30, 1814. Wilkinson's Last Gasp. After advancing up Lake Champlain with 4,000 troops in three brigades, plus a pair of 12-pounders, Wilkinson breaks the Canadian border and occupies Odelltown (Quebec). But upon proceeding farther north against the 180-man garrison of Maj. Richard B. Hancock at the Lacolle River Ford (10 miles west of Île aux Noix), his army becomes bogged down by heavy snow, then fails to carry the thick stone mill serving as Hancock's blockhouse. Rocket artillery fired by a detachment of Royal Marines inflicts considerable punishment, obliging the discouraged Americans to retire south into Plattsburgh (New York).

Wilkinson requests a court of inquiry, so is replaced on May 1 by the newly promoted 37-year-old major general George Izard.

MARCH 31, 1814. In Europe, allied armies enter Paris. Ten days later, Marshal Arthur, Duke of Wellington, wins the Battle of Toulouse, compelling Napoleon I to abdicate the next day at Fontainebleau. As the emperor goes into exile on Elba Island, Britain will begin diverting troops into the North American theater.

APRIL 7, 1814. A half-dozen British barges ascend eight miles up the Connecticut River, destroying 20 American vessels.

APRIL 14, 1814. At Kingston (Ontario), Yeo launches the 58-gun HMS Prince Regent and the 40-gun Princess Charlotte, which become the most powerful warships on Lake Ontario.

MAY 5, 1814. At noon, Yeo materializes off Fort Oswego (New York), his squadron bearing a British raiding force under the recently arrived 41-year-old veteran lieutenant general Gordon Drummond (see "June 2, 1794" entry in "French Revolutionary Wars"). Because of a heavy northwesterly gale, Swiss-born lieutenant colonel Victor Fischer cannot disembark until the next morning with 140 redcoats, 400 marines, and 200 seamen; however, the 290 American defenders—mostly artillerymen—quickly retire into the interior, having suffered 6 killed, 38 wounded, and 25 missing. British casualties are 18 dead and 73 injured, after which the raiders strip Fort Oswego of its stores, then depart by May 7.

MAY 10, 1814. Capt. Hugh Pigot with the brigs HMSS Orpheus and Shelburne reaches the Apalachicola River mouth (West Florida) to recruit Creeks and Choctaws against the Americans.

MAY 14, 1814. This afternoon, 800 American raiders descend upon Port Dover (Ontario); they torch it the next afternoon. The worst excesses are committed by Canadian turncoats under Maj. Abraham Markle.

MAY 19, 1814. A small American raiding party destroys Port Talbot (Ontario).

MAY 20, 1814. To prevent the Americans from sending heavy artillery from Oswego Falls to arm the recently launched, 62-gun USS Superior at Sackets Harbor (New York), Yeo institutes a close blockade of the latter.

MAY 30, 1814. Soon after daylight, British naval commanders Stephen Popham and Francis B. Spilsbury sight 18 American boats hiding up Sandy Creek under the master commandant Melancthon T. Woolsey—a friend of James Fennimore Cooper—waiting to dash eight miles past them and into Sackets Harbor (New York). Popham moves his three gunboats and four lesser craft, manned by 200 sailors, inshore to steal upon this flotilla—little realizing that it is escorted by brevet major Daniel Appling's 130 U.S. regulars, 120 Oneida warriors, plus a strong contingent of troops out of Sackets Harbor. A half mile from his objective, Popham is ambushed, suffering 14 killed and 28 wounded before surrendering.

JUNE 6, 1814. Having failed to impede American guns from reaching the new U.S. warship Superior, Yeo lifts his blockade of Sackets Harbor (New York) and retires into Kingston (Ontario).

JUNE 21, 1814. A small British expedition under Capt. Robert Barrie captures the American outposts of Thomaston and St. George (west of Penobscot Bay, Maine).

JULY 1814. The recently arrived veteran vice admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane (see “April 3, 1805” in “Napoleonic Wars”) detaches Capt. William Henry Percy with the 28-gun frigate Hermes, the sloop Carron, and two other Royal Navy warships—plus 100 marines, two howitzers, and a fieldpiece, all under Acting Lt. Col. Edward Nicholls—to the Apalachicola River (West Florida) to take aboard Creek and Choctaw warriors and convey them into Spanish Pensacola for a forthcoming assault against American Fort Bowyer (south Mobile Bay, Alabama). Percy eventually recruits 600 warriors for this purpose.

JULY 3, 1814. Early on this rainy morning, Brigadier General Scott disembarks 1,300 New England troops below Fort Erie (near Niagara Falls, Ontario), while Brig. Gen. Eleazer Wheelock Ripley brings another 1,000 U.S. regulars ashore above this stronghold, prompting its isolated garrison of two British companies (137 men) under Maj. Thomas Buck to surrender that same day. Brown—now promoted to major general—then arrives with 325 gunners and 600 Pennsylvania volunteers under American regular line infantryman. (Parks Canada)

Brig. Gen. (and New York congressman) Peter B. Porter, plus 500–600 Six Nations warriors.

The next day, Scott pushes north to Street's Creek and by evening spots 1,500 British troops and 300 natives concentrating south of the Chippawa (modern Welland) River under Riall. The Americans bring up reinforcements and prepare to fight on July 5.

JULY 5, 1814. Chippawa River. Unaware that Fort Erie has already fallen—which means he is confronting the bulk of Brown's invasion force—Riall advances across open fields toward the American positions south of Street's Creek. The British commander is further oblivious to the fact that this host contains a large percentage of U.S. regulars rather than undisciplined frontier militiamen.

At 5:00 p.m., Brown orders Scott to move his three battalions out and meet this British challenge head-on. After a brief exchange of long-range artillery salvos, Riall sends the 8th Foot to assault the American left, while the 1st and 100th regiments drive against the center. The steady counterfire and unwavering U.S. ranks reveal the true nature of his opposition, but this knowledge comes too late; by the time Riall signals the recall, 148 of his men have been killed, 321 have been wounded, and 46 are missing, as opposed to 60 dead and 268 injured among the American forces. The British then retire north behind the Chippawa River, having destroyed its lone remaining bridge.

JULY 7, 1814. Brown crosses the Chippawa River at two places, prompting Riall to retreat into Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario), forestalling any potential encirclement. The Americans follow, occupying Queenston and fortifying its strategic heights, while waiting for siege artillery and reinforcements to arrive from Sackets Harbor (New York) aboard Chauncey's squadron.

JULY 11, 1814. At 3:00 p.m., British lieutenant colonel Andrew Pilkington's 102nd Regiment—recently arrived at Halifax from Bermuda—is deposited on Moose Island (Passamaquoddy Bay, New Brunswick) by Commo. Thomas Hardy's 74-gun Ramillies and several transports. It subdues the 88-man American outpost under Maj. Perley Putnam at Eastport without resistance.

JULY 17, 1814. A retired Canadian fur trader named William McKay—temporarily appointed militia lieutenant colonel—reaches Prairie du Chien (Fort Shelby, Wisconsin) with 120 volunteers, 530 Indian allies, and a 3-pounder, obliging its garrison of 66 U.S. regulars and five guns under Lt. Joseph Perkins to surrender after three days' desultory exchanges, on condition that they be paroled into American territory. Total casualties are three wounded warriors.

About 400 Sauk, Fox, and Kickapoo Indians then pursue the escaping 14-gun U.S. gunboat Governor Clark down the Mississippi, overtaking it at Rock Island Rapids, along with some other craft. A much more hard-fought battle ensues, during which 35 Americans are killed or wounded, before this flotilla retires into St. Louis.

JULY 22, 1814. By the Treaty of Greenville, the Creek, Delaware, Miami, Seneca, Shawnee, and Wyandot Indians make an alliance with the United States, declaring war against Britain.

JULY 24, 1814. Learning that no reinforcements will reach him from Sackets Harbor (New York), and with his army outside Queenston (Ontario) now depleted to 2,644 effectives because of disease and desertion, Brown withdraws south of the Chippawa River. He is pursued by 1,000 redcoats under Pearson out of Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake), followed by another 600 under Riall, dragging four fieldpieces: two 24-pounders and two 6-pounders.

JULY 25, 1814. Lundy's Lane. This morning, Drummond reinforces Fort George from York (Toronto), sending Morrison's 89th Foot south to join Riall, while detaching another 500 redcoats and Indians out of Fort Niagara under Lt. Col. J. G. P. Tucker to threaten Lewiston (New York). Learning of this two-pronged menace, Brown orders Scott to advance north at 5:00 p.m. with the 1,070 survivors of his brigade and launch a diversionary strike against Riall's vanguard at Lundy's Lane (a mile from Niagara Falls).

At 6:00 p.m., Scott smashes into this 1,600-man British formation; Maj. Thomas Sidney Jesup's 25th U.S. Infantry Regiment drives back Riall's left, while Drummond fends off the American 11th and 22nd in the center. Riall is badly wounded, then captured when his stretcher bearers mistakenly enter American lines. By 8:30 p.m., Scott's brigade is reduced to 600 effectives, but he is then joined by Brown with Ripley's and Porter's brigades. They succeed in pushing back Drummond and seizing some British guns, only to have 1,200 redcoats of Lt. Col. Hercules Scott's 103rd Regiment and assorted Canadian militiamen, plus two 6-pounders, arrive at 10:00 p.m. from Twelve Mile Creek (St. Catharines) and swing the advantage back to the defenders. By midnight—Brown and Scott being wounded—Ripley orders a withdrawal to the Chippawa River; the Britons and Canadians are too exhausted to pursue. American casualties total 173 dead, 571 wounded, and 117 missing; British losses are 84 killed, 559 injured (including Drummond and Riall), and 193 missing among their regulars, plus a further 162 casualties among the Canadian militiamen. The next morning, the invaders destroy the Chippawa's lone bridge and their baggage train before retiring southeast into Fort Erie.

Battle of Lundy's Lane.

JULY 26, 1814. More than three weeks after quitting Detroit to sail up Lake Huron aboard five small U.S. vessels, Croghan—now a lieutenant colonel—appears off British-held Michilimackinac with 700 American regulars (five companies) and Ohio militiamen. Judging its fortifications too strong for a direct assault, he disembarks at the other end of the island on August 4, moving inland to take its defenders from the rear. Lt. Col. Robert McDouall of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment—commanding only 140 redcoats, plus 280 Canadian militiamen and Indian warriors—emerges from his lines to await the Americans behind a low breastwork in a woodland clearing. When Croghan drives against this position, he suffers 13 killed and 51 wounded; he reembarks the next day and departs, leaving behind a pair of blockading vessels.

(While returning toward Detroit, this American expedition destroys the British schooner Nancy of Lt. Miller Worsley near the Nottawasaga River mouth, although its commander and crew escape into Michilimackinac by canoe.)

AUGUST 2, 1814. Fort Erie Siege. Having recuperated from their encounter at Lundy's Lane, advance elements of Drummond's army arrive outside Fort Erie (opposite Buffalo, New York) to find its

2,200 American defenders completing a newly fortified camp. Brig. Gen. Edmund Pendleton Gaines has also traveled from Sackets Harbor to assume command over this U.S. garrison, in place of the wounded Brown.

The British commander appears the next day with his main body, but, realizing that 3,500 redcoats are insufficient to storm its defenses, he settles down to await his siege train. On August 5, Chauncey's squadron materializes out of Lake Ontario, detaching several U.S. warships to support the defenders ashore and restrict British lake traffic. On August 12, the American men-of-war Somers and Ohio are captured by Cmdr. Alexander Dobbs's Charwell, and the next day, Drummond opens fire upon Fort Erie's ramparts with six siege guns. Two hours before daylight on August 15, he sends five columns of redcoats to assault Gaines's lines; this attempt proves premature, and he is repulsed with heavy losses (especially when an advance British magazine blows up). All told, the attackers suffer 57 dead, 309 wounded, plus 539 captured or missing, as opposed to 84 Americans killed or injured.

Following this repulse, Drummond is reinforced by two fresh regiments—1,200 men—so maintains his siege. On August 29, a British shell explodes in Gaines's quarters, wounding him so severely that the convalescent Brown must reassume command. On September 15, the besiegers complete a third battery, compelling the Americans (now reinforced by 1,000 New York militiamen) to contemplate a sally. At 3:00 p.m. on August 17, during a heavy downpour, Porter emerges with 1,600 U.S. regulars and militia, catching the British by surprise. The British No. 3 Battery and protective blockhouse are quickly overrun, the guns are spiked, and the magazines blown, before Porter—supported by an additional 400 of Scott's men—proceeds against No. 2 Battery. This position, too, is overwhelmed before the Royal Scots, 6th (1st Warwickshire), 82nd (Prince of Wales Volunteers), and 89th regiments contain this breakout and drive the Americans back inside Fort Erie. The besiegers sustain 115 killed, 176 wounded, 315 missing, and three guns destroyed, compared to 79 American dead and 432 injured or missing.

Disheartened, Drummond raises his siege four days later, retiring toward the Chippawa River at 8:00 p.m. on September 21. Brown does not pursue, instead entering winter quarters at Buffalo.

AUGUST 9, 1814. Four months after erecting a fort at the confluence of the Coosa and Tallapoosa

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

ivers, Jackson—now a brevet major general in the regular U.S. Army—dictates terms to the defeated Creeks, compelling them to cede two-thirds of their lands to the United States and shift their villages out of the settlers' path into southwestern Alabama.

That same day, Hardy's Royal Navy squadron bombards Stonington (Connecticut) and is repulsed.

AUGUST 16, 1814. A British expedition escorted by the 80-gun flagship HMS Tonnant and nine other ships of the line sweeps through the Virginia Capes and up Chesapeake Bay under Cochrane, bearing 4,000 regulars of the 1st Battalion of the 4th King's Own Infantry Regiment, the 21st Royal North British Regiment or "Royal Scots Fusiliers," the 44th East Essex Regiment, the 85th "Bucks Volunteers" Light Infantry Regiment, plus the 3rd Royal Marine Battalion and an artillery company—all freshly arrived from England and Bermuda under Maj. Gen. Robert Ross.

Adm. Sir George Cockburn; this 1817 portrait painted by John James Hall shows him posing triumphantly while Washington burns behind him. (Library of Congress)

AUGUST 19, 1814. Ross's troops are unexpectedly disembarked at Benedict (Maryland), advancing northward up the Patuxent River the next day, supported by a light naval division under Rear Adm. George Cockburn, Cochrane's second-in-command. They intend to trap Commo. Joshua Barney's flotilla of American gunboats 40 miles upstream, then advance upon Washington.

AUGUST 22, 1814. Threatened by the rapid approach of Ross's redcoats, who have already reached Upper Marlboro, Barney scuttles his gunboats and retreats overland toward Washington with his 400 men. The British follow the next day, driving directly west toward the unprepared capital.

AUGUST 24, 1814. Bladensburg. At dawn, the Washington authorities learn Ross is nearing Bladensburg (Maryland), prompting President Madison to exit northeastward with more than 3,000 hastily assembled militiamen and join a similar force already gathered at this town. Eventually, Brigadier General Winder scrapes together almost 7,000 American troops—mostly raw recruits, no match for Ross's 4,000 disciplined veterans.

Shortly after noon on this very hot day, a British column under Col. William Thornton easily drives the defenders from the lone bridge across the East (Anacostia) Branch of the Potomac; he then panics the entire American army with his relentless advance. Only Barney's naval gunners stand and fight, eventually being obliged to retreat two hours later when their leader is wounded and captured. So many American volunteers run that the redcoats dub this battle the "Bladensburg Races." Defensive casualties total 26 killed, 51 wounded, plus 100 captured, compared with 64 dead and 185 injured among the British ranks. (Eighteen redcoats die from heat exhaustion.)

The road into Washington now lays open. A vanguard of 1,500 British troops under Ross rests for two or three hours, then marches six miles unopposed,

The Burning of Washington

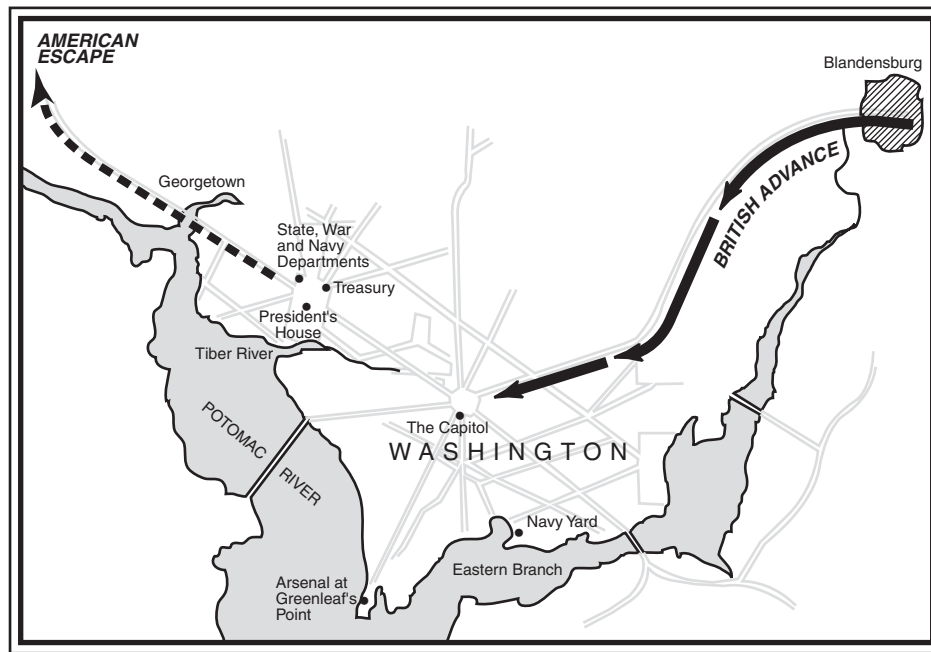

The British had not originally intended to assault the American capital and did not have enough troops to hold it. However, after Admiral Cockburn was joined on August 16, 1814, by General Ross's small army, he impetuously decided on this sideshow to humble American pride. While civilian residences would be spared, all public buildings were to be burned—allegedly in revenge for the torching of towns in Canada (see "April 25, 1813" entry et seq.).

This resolve only hardened once Ross actually entered the deserted capital with a party under a flag of truce on the evening of August 24, 1814, to discuss surrender terms with any surviving officials. As he neared Capitol Hill, inexperienced militia snipers opened fire out of the gloom from a house at the corner of Maryland and Constitution avenues and NE Second Street. His horse and one of his escorts being killed, Ross reacted angrily to this ambush by burning down the house; the force then pushed on vengefully deeper into Washington.

The nearby Senate and House of Representatives were quickly set ablaze with fuel from Congreve rockets, gutting the buildings along with the heavily timbered Library of Congress. Another British column struck out toward the Washington Navy Yard, key sections of which were already set alight on orders from U.S. naval captain Thomas Tingey—especially the new 44-gun frigate Columbia and the 18-gun sloop Argus. The British completed the destruction of its vast dockyards, barracks, storehouses, rope houses, and arsenal.

Ross and Cockburn meanwhile led 100 well-disciplined British troops from Capitol Hill a mile down darkened Pennsylvania Avenue toward the presidential mansion, reassuring civilians along the way as to their safety. Upon entering the residence around midnight, they found a banquet laid in its dining room, so shared it with their redcoats before Cockburn ordered the building set ablaze. As the main British army arrived outside the city, they were greeted by so many fires that a redcoat recorded how the brightness permitted "each man to view distinctly his comrade's face." The glow could be seen for 50 miles, as far away as Baltimore, punctuated by heavy blasts from exploding powder magazines.

Although a rainstorm near daybreak on August 25 put out many blazes, by dawn, nothing was left of the Treasury and most other government sites "except heaps of smoking ruins." The British army reunited around Capitol Hill, while Cockburn led an armed party to the National Intelligencer newspaper offices, determined to burn it down because of many unflattering articles published against him. Neighborhood women begged him not to do so, for fear the flames would spread to their homes. He therefore directed his men to tear down the structure instead and to remove all letter "C" type from the fonts—to prevent the Intelligencer from ever printing his name again.

British capture of Washington, D.C.

arriving at the city fringes that same evening. The president and Dolly Madison have already fled westward into Virginia via Georgetown, along with many of the capital's 8,000 residents. Ross therefore enters the deserted city with a party under a flag of truce to arrange terms, but as he nears Capitol Hill, snipers open fire out of the gloom. His horse is killed, along with a redcoat, and another soldier is injured, so they angrily attack and burn down this dwelling from which the snipers had been shooting and then vengefully sweep into the core. British parties burn the Capitol, presidential mansion, and numerous other government buildings overnight, while their main army arrives outside and encamps.

The next day, August 25, the two contingents reunite beside the smoldering remains of Capitol Hill, then exit that same night, returning to Benedict to reembark by August 30. (A month after the Americans reoccupy Washington, the shaken Congress—meeting in their temporary chambers in the U.S. Patent Office, which the British agreed to spare—narrowly defeats a bill proposing that the capital be moved to a more defensible locale. Scorch marks on the presidential mansion will also be whitewashed, allegedly leading it to be renamed as the “White House,” although evidence suggests that the name already existed.)

SEPTEMBER 1, 1814. Maine Offensive. This morning, British rear admiral Edward Griffith appears off

Castine (Maine) with 10 warships and 10 transports, depositing Lt. Gen. Sir John Coape Sherbrooke's 2,000 redcoats from the 29th (Worcestershire), 62nd (Wiltshire), and 98th Foot regiments, plus two companies of the 7th Battalion of the 60th (Royal Americans) and an artillery detachment. Its 140 American defenders detonate their magazine, abandon the fort, and retreat north up the Penobscot River, while Maj. Gen. Gerard Gosselin crosses to occupy Belfast opposite with 600 troops aboard HMS Bacchante.

Two mornings later, Barrie's pair of pursuing British sloops—one transport and boat flotilla—materialize at Bald Head Cove, three miles below Hampden, disembarking seven companies—700 regulars—and a 5.5-inch howitzer under Lt. Col. Henry John. These veterans easily brush aside 600 American militiamen under Maj. Gen. John Blake and overrun the town by 5:00 p.m., suffering only a single man killed, 8 wounded, and another missing (compared to the defenders' 13 killed or wounded and 81 prisoners). Capt. Charles Morris torches his anchored frigate USS Adams rather than have it fall into enemy hands, but 20 of its cannon in a battery ashore are seized, after which John and Barrie push on to accept the surrender of Bangor.

On September 9, Pilkington sets sail from Castine with several more British companies, circling east to land in Bucks Harbor 10 miles south of Machias by the next evening. At sunrise on September 10, the invaders occupy Fort O'Brien—five miles away in Sanborn Cove—without a struggle, and then enter Machias one hour later. The entire state of Maine capitulates by September 13.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1814. At sunset, naval lieutenant Worsley slips out of Michilimackinac (Michigan) with four boatloads of Canadian militiamen under Lt. W. Andrew Bulger of the Royal Newfoundland Fencibles to surprise the American blockading schooner Tigress, anchored six miles off Drummond Island. The next evening, the boarders row out and rush this vessel at 9:00 p.m., carrying it with a loss of two men killed and several wounded.

Worsley and Bulger leave the American colors flying until the Tigress's consort, the Scorpion, arrives two evenings later, anchoring two miles away. Early the next morning, the British slip their cable and surprise this second warship as well, suffering only eight injured.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1814. Capt. Nicholas Lockyer of the sloop HMS Sophia contacts Jean Lafitte at “Grande Terre” or Barataria Bay, south of New Orleans, requesting his freebooters’ help in the forthcoming British campaign against Louisiana. Despite the fact that his brother Pierre is jailed in New Orleans and that U.S. authorities are contemplating destroying Barataria as a smugglers’ nest, Lafitte reveals this plan to the Americans two days later—while also assuring the British of his cooperation.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1814. While advancing up the Mississippi from St. Louis to reclaim Prairie du Chien (renamed Fort McKay, Wisconsin), 350 U.S. regulars and Illinois militiamen under Taylor are ambushed near Rock Island Rapids early this morning by Winnebago, Sioux, and Sauk warriors under Chief Black Hawk, who are supported by a 3-pounder under Royal Artillery Sgt. James Keating. The Americans retreat downriver, pausing at the Des Moines River mouth to erect a small fort, which they abandon shortly thereafter.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1814. This evening, after five days’ march southward from Quebec along the western shores of Lake Champlain, Canadian governor general Prevost invests Plattsburgh (New York) with 10,350 redcoats in three brigades: Maj. Gen. Frederick P. Robinson’s 27th (Inniskilling, 3rd Battalion), 39th (Dorsetshire), 76th, and 88th (Connaught Rangers) regiments; Maj. Gen. Thomas Brisbane’s 8th (2nd Battalion), 13th (First Somersetshire), and 49th, plus the Swiss de Meuron (Neuchâtel) Regiment, Canadian voltigeurs, and Canadian chasseurs; as well as Maj. Gen. Manley Powers’s 3rd (East Kent or “Buffs”), 5th (Northumberland), 27th (1st Battalion), and 58th (Rutlandshire) regiments.

The motley 3,300-man American garrison under 32-year-old brigadier general Alexander Macomb—less than half being effective troops because Izard departed westward on August 29 with the 4,000 best regulars—retreat across the Saranac River and dig in. Rather than storm Plattsburgh’s fortifications, Prevost deploys his siege train, then two days later orders Commo. George Downie to sail 12 miles southward from nearby Chazy with his small British squadron to destroy Commodore Macdonough’s U.S. squadron anchored offshore. This respite allows numerous New York and Vermont militia contingents to rally into Plattsburgh.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1814. After resting for a fortnight, Cochrane’s and Ross’s 50-ship British expedition sweeps up Chesapeake Bay to attack Baltimore.

Officer in the New York state militia. (Parks Canada)

The next afternoon, they reach Patapco River and prepare to disembark their troops.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1814. Lake Champlain. This Sunday at 8:30 a.m., Downie rounds Cumberland Head to enter Plattsburgh Bay with the 37-gun frigate Confiance (flag), the 16-gun brig Linnet, the sloops Chubb and Finch, plus 11 gunboats manned by 800 British and Canadian seamen. Macdonough's 850 American sailors wait aboard their newly built, 26-gun corvette Saratoga (flag) and 20-gun brig Eagle, plus the 7-gun Ticonderoga and Preble and 10 oared gunboats mounting 16 guns between them.

After struggling upwind for a half hour, Downie's flagship anchors 400 yards away and opens fire upon the Saratoga. The British commodore is killed within the first 15 minutes, and over the next couple of hours, the Chubb drifts helplessly into the American lines and strikes. The Finch runs aground on Crab Island, and only four British gunboats engage; meanwhile, the American gunners completely outfight their opponents—some even swinging their warships around in midbattle to present their undamaged broadsides.

Although losses on both sides are comparable—57 dead and 72 wounded for the British, 52 killed and 58 injured aboard the U.S. vessels—all four attacking ships surrender, while their gunboats escape back out onto Lake Champlain under oars. Prevost, who has made no attempt to storm Plattsburgh's fortifications while this naval battle rages, inexplicably orders a general retreat northward that same rain-filled night. Total casualties from his army's campaign are 35 dead, 47 wounded, 72 captured, and 234 missing; American losses on land are 37 dead and 62 injured. (The next spring, Prevost is relieved of command because of his faintheartedness.)

SEPTEMBER 12, 1814. Fort McHenry. At 3:00 a.m., Ross's 4,000 redcoats—joined by 700 marines and sailors under Cockburn—begin disembarking at North Point (Maryland), assembling ashore before striking northwest four hours later to circle 12 miles inland and invest Baltimore. Their task proves daunting, for not only does Maj. Gen. (and Senator) Samuel Smith have 16,400 men to defend the city and its approaches, but the British general Ross is soon killed by American skirmishers; therefore, over-

"The Star-Spangled Banner"

On September 3, 1814, the American colonel John S. Skinner left Baltimore under a flag of truce aboard the sloop HMS Minden, accompanied by the 35-year-old lawyer Francis Scott Key. Their purpose was to secure the release of Dr. William Beanes, an elderly physician from Upper Marlboro. A friend of Key's, Beanes had been arrested during the British retirement from Washington for his role in detaining some redcoats. Four days later, Skinner and Key went aboard Admiral Cochrane's flagship, HMS Tonnant. Over dinner with General Ross and Rear Admiral Cockburn, the Americans asked for Beanes's freedom. Although initially denied, the British agreed after Key and Skinner showed some letters from wounded British prisoners, praising Beanes's kindness.

Although the doctor soon joined them, the three Americans were required to stay aboard the Minden because they had seen the British dispositions and had heard plans discussed over dinner. At anchor eight miles downriver from Fort McHenry, Key therefore had a rainy but clear view as British bomb-vessels and the rocket-ship Erebus shelled the American garrison on September 13 in preparation for a land assault against Baltimore. Fearful of yet another British victory, Key was so overjoyed at the sight of the rockets' "red glare" bursting against Fort McHenry's 30-by-42-foot flag—still flying the next dawn—that he started writing a poem on the back of a letter in his pocket.

Released into Baltimore on September 16, Key finished his poem overnight at the Indian Queen Hotel. Titled "Defence of Fort McHenry," he gave it the next day to his brother-in-law, Judge Joseph H. Nicholson. Recognizing that its words fit the popular British drinking song "To Anacreon in Heaven," Nicholson printed five copies that same day, amid the patriotic euphoria celebrating the British retreat. The poem was soon reprinted in many newspapers, while the Thomas Carr Music Store in Baltimore published its words and music together, retitled as "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Although difficult to sing because of its range of one and a half octaves, it proved an enduring tune, often played during public events in the 19th century. In July 1889, the U.S. Navy officially adopted "The Star-Spangled Banner" for all its flag ceremonies, and the song became the national anthem on March 3, 1931. Key's original composition is today preserved by the Maryland Historical Society, while the 15-star, 15-stripe flag that inspired his poem is on display at the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History.

all command devolves upon Col. Arthur Brooke of the 4th Regiment.

Brooke encounters a detached American contingent of 3,200 militiamen under Brig. Gen. John Stricker near Bread and Cheese Creek. He pushes them back after two hours of fighting, then encamps for the night. This clash costs the redcoats 46 dead and 273 wounded, as opposed to 24 Americans killed, 139 injured, and 50 captured.

Meanwhile, Cochrane sails 16 of his Royal Navy frigates and lighter warships up the Patapco. By midafternoon on September 12, he drops anchor a few miles south of Fort McHenry, offering cover fire for the upcoming assault against Baltimore by pounding the star-shaped fort's 1,000-man garrison under U.S. major George Armistead. The next morning at 5:00 a.m., the bomb-vessels Volcano and Meteor, plus the rocket-ship Erebus, creep within two miles of this American stronghold and commence a bombardment in anticipation of the land attack by Brooke's redcoats. The bomb-vessels Terror, Devastation, and Aetna soon join in; the outraged American artillery being unable to reply. However, no land assault occurs. At 3:00 p.m., Cochrane's ships close the range, only to retreat precipitately when they come under accurate counterfire. Their bombardment will continue from long range until nightfall.

This same evening of September 13, though, a discouraged Brooke orders his army to retreat the next morning. His troops will reembark from North Point by September 15, having suffered 346 total casualties. Shortly thereafter, Cochrane and Brooke part company, the admiral proceeding toward Halifax while the colonel leads his expeditionary army toward Jamaica.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1814. After disembarking from Percy's squadron three days earlier at Mobile Point (Alabama), Nicholls advances with 730 Royal Marines and Indian allies to invest the 130-man garrison of U.S. regulars holding Fort Bowyer under Maj. William Lawrence. The British squadron appears offshore to help bombard its ramparts, but the Americans repel this combined assault, killing 162 attackers and wounding 72, while suffering only 4 dead and 4 injured among their own ranks. Percy's flagship Hermes runs aground opposite the American batteries, being abandoned and destroyed. The British then retire 60 miles east into Spanish Pensacola.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1814. This morning, Lafitte's illegal base at Barataria is raided by 70 American soldiers under Commo. Daniel Todd Patterson of the 14-gun schooner USS Carolina, escorted from New Orleans by six gunboats under naval lieutenant Thomas ap Catesby ("Tac") Jones. They capture 80 freebooters, along with six schooners and eight lesser vessels, and destroy many buildings, without suffering any casualties.

OCTOBER 15, 1814. Last Ontario Invasion. After crossing the Niagara River into Upper Canada, Izard probes the British defenses at Chippawa (Ontario) with 5,500 U.S. regulars and 800 militiamen, finding the fortifications stronger than anticipated. The next day, he learns that Chauncey's squadron has retired into Sackets Harbor (New York), fearing an attack by the new 112-gun HMS Saint Lawrence out of Kingston. Without naval support for his rearguard, the American general hesitates to penetrate deeper.

On October 19, Brig. Gen. Daniel Bissell's U.S. regulars defeat a small British force at Cook's Mills (on Lyon's Creek), but Yeo's squadron arrives the next day off Fort George (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario) with the Saint Lawrence—a warship that so dwarfs the American vessels on Lake Ontario that Izard cancels his projected campaign into Upper Canada.

NOVEMBER 4, 1814. American Brigadier General McArthur reaches Oxford (Ontario) with 800 troops, having been sent from Detroit on a foraging raid throughout Upper Canada. British lieutenant colonel Henry Bostwick is powerless to resist, merely shadowing the invaders' movements with 400 Canadian militiamen until McArthur returns west one week later.

NOVEMBER 5, 1814. After Izard and Brown retire across the Niagara River—the former into winter quarters at Buffalo, the latter to Sackets Harbor (New York)—American engineers blow up Fort Erie (Ontario).

NOVEMBER 6, 1814. Pensacola. Irrate at the British use of this Spanish port as an advance base—despite Madrid's neutrality in the ongoing Anglo-American hostilities—Jackson appears outside Pensacola's walls with 2,000 mounted Tennesseans under Coffee, 700 U.S. regulars, a detachment of Mississippi dragoons under Maj. Thomas Hind, plus other auxiliaries.

Maj. Henry D. Peire of the 44th U.S. Regiment is sent forward under a flag of truce to demand that Pensacola's two principal forts—San Miguel and Barrancas, now manned by British garrisons—be surrendered by Spanish governor Mateo González Manrique. Instead, Peire's party is fired upon by red-coats, prompting Jackson to storm the town. Its only battery is carried at bayonet point, resistance melting away and almost no blood being shed. Percy's Royal Navy warships conduct a brief bombardment from out in the harbor before the British destroy Fort Barrancas (six miles west of the town) and withdraw.

Jackson thereupon installs an American garrison and returns toward Mobile, where he delegates two U.S. regiments and some militia to hold the coast between Pensacola and Mobile under Winchester, while he departs overland for New Orleans by November 21. The British meanwhile sail eastward to Apalachicola, where Nicholls erects a 10-gun stronghold—later dubbed Fort Negro—atop Prospect Bluff, manned by his Indian and black allies.

NOVEMBER 25, 1814. Cochrane's Tonnant weighs anchor from Negril (Jamaica), followed the next day by Rear Adm. Pulteney Malcolm's 74-gun Royal Oak (vice flag), Norge, Bedford, Ramillies, and Asia; the 64-gun Dictator; the frigates Diomedé, Gorgon, Alceste, Hydra, Weaver, Traave, and Belle Poule; plus numerous brigs and schooners. They are escorting more than two-dozen transports bearing 8,000 troops under Maj. Gen. John Keane: the 4th, 21st, 44th, 85th Light Infantry, 93rd (Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders), 95th Rifle Corps, 1st, and 5th West Indian regiments, plus two squadrons of the 14th (Duchess of York) Light Dragoons. They are to rendezvous in the Gulf of Mexico with another contingent arriving from England and capture New Orleans.

DECEMBER 1, 1814. Jackson reaches New Orleans (population 10,000) and begins preparing against an anticipated British attack.

DECEMBER 8, 1814. Cochrane and Keane's 50-ship expedition departs Pensacola, rendezvousing with Percy's squadron two days later near Mobile. On December 12, they anchor north of the Chaudetour Islands to transfer Keane's troops westward across shallow Lake Borgne.

This lake mouth, however, is barred by five American gunboats, plus the tenders Sea Horse and Alligator, manned by 200 sailors under Lt. "Tac" Jones. The next day, Lockyer leads 1,500 British sailors and marines aboard 45 boats against this flotilla. Jones falls back, but his vessels ground between Malheureux Island and the mainland, being overwhelmed at dawn on December 14 after a two-hour fight in which he suffers 10 killed, 35 wounded, and the rest captured. British casualties are 17 dead and 77 injured. By December 15, Cochrane begins ferrying Keane's army onto Isle aux Poins, taking five days to complete this operation.

DECEMBER 17, 1814. Within New Orleans, Jackson offers a full pardon to Lafitte and his Baratarians, who join the American cause.

British boats engaging Lieutenant Thomas "Tac" Jones's American flotilla on Lake Borgne. (National Maritime Museum, London)

DECEMBER 22, 1814. This evening, Keane's vanguard—1,800 soldiers of the 85th, 95th, and 4th regiments—disembark east of New Orleans. The next night at 7:30, they are struck by 1,800 Americans under Jackson and Coffee, plus the schooner Carolina of Capt. John Henley. After two hours of confused fighting, this attack is broken off. The Americans suffer 24 killed, 115 wounded, and 74 missing; British losses are 46 dead, 167 injured, and 64 missing. Nevertheless, Keane's army continues to be reinforced, so presses on.

DECEMBER 24, 1814. The Treaty of Ghent is signed in Europe, needing only ratification in London and Washington to bring an end to hostilities.

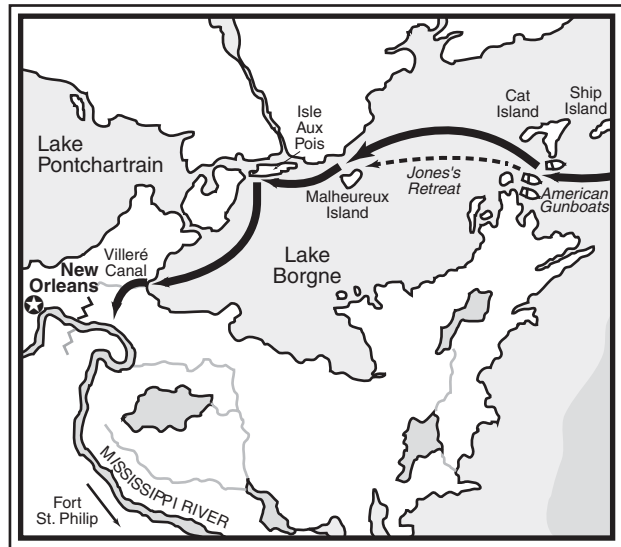

DECEMBER 25, 1814. This afternoon, 37-year-old general Sir Edward Michael Pakenham (Wellington's brother-in-law) reaches the British camp near New Orleans, having hurried out from England aboard the frigate Statira to supplant Keane. He is being followed from Jamaica by an additional 2,700 redcoats of Gen. John Lambert's 3rd Division: the 7th (Royal "fuzileers"), 40th (2nd Somersetshire), and 43rd (Monmouthshire) regiments.

DECEMBER 27, 1814. A five-gun British battery east of New Orleans destroys the Carolina with red-hot shot, then compels Lt. Charles Thompson's 16-gun Louisiana—a mile farther up the Mississippi—to be towed out of range.

DECEMBER 28, 1814. At 8:00 a.m., Pakenham probes Jackson's line east of New Orleans, ordering a recall after suffering 60 casualties, as opposed to 16 American dead.

JANUARY 1, 1815. Having stealthily installed 17 heavy naval guns in two batteries, the British besiegers open fire upon Jackson's line of earthen ramparts. American counterfire—especially from the two-gun Baratarian battery of Dominique You and Renato Beluché—proves so accurate that the British guns are silenced, and Pakenham's assault columns are restrained from advancing.

JANUARY 4, 1815. New Orleans is reinforced by 2,300 Kentucky militiamen under Brig. Gen. John Adair (although only 700 are armed). Two days later, Lambert reaches Villeré with 1,700 redcoats of the 7th and 43rd regiments, bringing Pakenham's strength up to 8,000 by January 7. The British commander, unable to conceive of a maneuver around Jackson's line, now prepares to storm straight at it.

British advance against New Orleans.

JANUARY 8, 1815. New Orleans. Despite the failure of Thornton to shift 1,400 redcoats overnight to the western bank of the Mississippi—thus outflanking the American defenses—two columns of British troops march directly against Jackson's line at 4:00 this Sunday morning: the 4th, 21st, and 44th regiments on the left, and one company each of the 7th and 43rd, and the 93rd and the 5th West Indian regiments on the right.

Awaiting them, in a position running inland from the riverbank, are the 7th U.S. Infantry, Thomas Beale's Orleans Riflemen, Maj. Jean-Baptiste Plauché's Louisiana carabinier militia, Maj. Pierre Robin Lacoste and Major Daquin's two battalions of black troops, plus the 44th U.S. Infantry; this whole western half is under U.S. regular colonel George T. Ross. The remaining Americans are commanded by Coffee, their center manned by Maj. Gen. William Carroll's Tennessee Rifles, with Adair's Kentuckians farther east, plus a screen of 60 Choctaw warriors under Pierre Jugeât in the cypress swamps beyond. Jackson thus has 4,000 men on his firing line, protected by a 10-foot earthen rampart and eight batteries.

In the growing light, the redcoats march bravely into a hail of fire, only to be remorselessly mown down. When his first assault wave falters, Pakenham personally intervenes to rally his troops, receiving three mortal wounds. His 6,500-man army eventually retires under Lambert after absorbing 858 dead,

2,468 injured, and 500 captured, in contrast to 13 killed and 39 wounded among Jackson's ranks.

Thornton belatedly reaches the western bank of the Mississippi with 450 redcoats, Royal Marines, and sailors, easily scattering Brig. Gen. David B. Morgan's 1,200 American defenders: the 1st and 2nd Louisiana Militia, Col. Alexandre de Clouet's conscripts, plus a company of Kentucky volunteers under Col. John Davis, supported by three field-pieces. Although suffering only 3 killed and 30 wounded, Thornton's victory cannot possibly offset the devastation of the main British body, so he retires this evening. The next day, a local truce is arranged so that Lambert's survivors can gather their fallen.

JANUARY 9, 1815. This afternoon, Cochrane's squadron approaches Fort St. Philip (45 miles southeast of New Orleans), deploying his sloops Herald, Nymph, and Thistle; schooner Pigmy; plus bomb-vessels Aetna and Meteor close inshore to commence a bombardment by 3:00 p.m. The fort's 366-man American garrison under Maj. Walter H. Overton—some 7th U.S. regulars, a Louisiana volunteer battalion, a company of free blacks, plus 120 gunners under English-born artillery captain Charles Wollstonecraft—endure nine days of continuous fire, suffering two killed, before the British withdraw on the morning of January 18.

JANUARY 18, 1815. After a fortnight of paralyzed inactivity before Jackson's line outside New Orleans, Lambert stealthily withdraws his shattered British survivors this evening toward Lake Borgne, beginning to reembark onto Cochrane's transports off Cat Island the next morning. The Americans do little to hamper this retirement, and by January 26, the invaders depart east toward Dauphine Island (Alabama).

FEBRUARY 7, 1815. Fort Bowyer. Having been reinforced by two fresh regiments out of England, Lambert disembarks 1,200 redcoats and 450 gunners for 16 heavy naval guns, plus numerous sappers and Royal Marines, behind Fort Bowyer on Mobile Point. They quickly invest its 360-man garrison under Major Lawrence, compelling him to surrender (under easy terms) by sundown of February 11. Victory celebrations are cut short by the arrival of a Royal Navy frigate bearing news of the official cessation of hostilities.

Second Barbary War

Soon after America's first Barbary conflict ended in 1805, seizures by the North African rovers resumed. Unable to dispatch a naval expedition because of worsening relations with Britain and France, Washington instead began paying ransoms once again. When the War of 1812 erupted, Royal Navy action prevented any U.S. vessels from even reaching the Mediterranean. Therefore, tributes were stopped, so the Bey of Algiers angrily expelled the American consul general and declared war against the United States.

As soon as hostilities with Britain ceased, Washington moved against the Barbary States. On March 3, 1815, Congress authorized the dispatch of two U.S. naval squadrons to the Mediterranean. First to depart from New York City was Commo. Stephen Decatur on May 20. His flagship was the brand-new, 50-gun, 1,500-ton USS Guerriere, leading the frigates Macedonian of 38 guns and Constellation of 36, the 16-gun sloops Ontario and Epervier, plus five lesser consorts. Commo. William Bainbridge followed six weeks later with another eight warships.

Decatur, however, conducted most of the campaign. After touching at Gibraltar on June 15, 1815, his squadron blasted and captured the 44-gun Algerian flagship Meshuda two days later. On June 19, they also intercepted the 22-gun brig Estedio. Decatur therefore arrived off Algiers with both prizes on June 28, forcing the Bey to sign a treaty two days later. All American and some European captives were released, and the Bey additionally paid $10,000 for the return of his ships. Decatur then proceeded to Tunis and concluded a similar settlement there on July 13, as well as another one at Tripoli on August 9.

Despite then being joined by Bainbridge's squadron at Gibraltar, the Americans could not prevent a resumption of Barbary captures. The British rear admiral Edward Pellew, Baron Exmouth, unleashed a much more punishing bombardment of Algiers on August 27, 1816. Many of its corsair vessels were crippled, and 3,000 captives were freed. Yet the Algerian menace was not finally eliminated until France occupied the port in 1830.

On February 14, 1815, Madison receives his copy of the Treaty of Ghent, which is ratified by the U.S. Congress three days later. Despite the last-minute victory at New Orleans, the War of 1812 ends badly for the Americans, their capital having been burned, no new territories won (except for some Creek lands), and exports reduced from more than $108 million in 1807 to a mere $7 million by 1814.

U.S. EXPANSION THROUGH EASTERN TRIBELANDS (1816–1842)

As American settlers push inland from the Atlantic Seaboard, Great Lakes region, and Mississippi Delta, they encroach upon the territories of their seminomadic Indian neighbors, resulting in clashes because of each side's differing philosophies regarding land ownership. The pioneers are also quick to call upon state and federal governments for support whenever they perceive a threat.

One of the earliest conflicts develops with the Creek and Seminole residents of northern Florida, who are squeezed between homesteaders migrating south out of Georgia and east out of Alabama. Although Florida remains nominally under Spanish control, Madrid is too distracted by the ongoing wars of independence in Latin America to defend these isolated, sparsely populated outposts. Armed Americans therefore begin crossing Florida's border with impunity, especially in pursuit of the runaway slaves who seek sanctuary amid Spanish missions.

JULY 1816. Fort Negro. Incensed at having a U.S. supply ship, which earlier attempted to ascend the Apalachicola River toward Fort Scott, fired upon by the black and Seminole garrison at Fort Negro, Brig. Gen. Edmund Pendleton Gaines dispatches an American land and naval force under 29-year-old, 250-pound Lt. Col. Duncan L. Clinch to deal with this obstacle. The latter penetrates 60 miles into Spanish territory and invests this stronghold. On July 24, a lucky round from one of his blockading gunboats scores a direct hit on the fort's magazine, killing 270 of its 300 defenders and wounding the rest. After the Americans raze Fort Negro and regain their own territory, Spain protests this violation of its sovereignty, but to no avail.

NOVEMBER 20, 1817. First Seminole War. After months of increasing frictions, Chief Neamathla of the Mikasuki Seminoles at Fowltown, plus Chief Bowlegs of the neighboring Alachua, warn Gaines not to send any more formations from Fort Scott across the Flint River (southwestern Georgia). Deeming this expanse to be U.S. rather than Indian or Spanish territory, the latter responds angrily by dispatching Maj. David E. Twiggs with 250 troops to arrest Neamathla. The next day, the soldiers engage in an indecisive firefight near Fowltown, thus inaugurating hostilities.

The conflict soon escalates after the Seminoles ambush 40 regulars under Lt. Richard W. Scott of the 7th U.S. Infantry Regiment, who are advancing up the Apalachicola River to reinforce Fort Scott. This force is almost totally annihilated, suffering 34 soldiers killed, plus 7 wives. From Washington, President James Monroe authorizes an expansion in the conflict's scope by authorizing Gaines on December 16 to pursue hostiles deep into Spanish territory. On January 4, 1818, the general advances upon Fowltown and, finding it deserted, burns it to the ground.

The war then escalates exponentially when the highly aggressive westerner Andrew Jackson reaches Fort Scott in early March 1818 to assume overall command. Soon, he strikes southward with 500 regulars, 1,000 Tennessee militiamen, and 2,000 Creek allies. Outnumbered and outgunned, the Seminoles scatter, their only opposition being made by 200–300 black warriors, who fight delaying actions west of the Suwannee River. Determined to eradicate these nuisance raids once and for all, Jackson presses on and seizes the Spanish outpost of San Marcos de Apalache by early April, furthermore hanging two British subjects on April 29 as agents provocateurs. The American general next proceeds to occupy Spanish Pensacola, while directing Gaines to capture St. Augustine as well.

Jackson returns toward Tennessee by May 30, finding that, although his highhanded actions are cheered by the public, they meet with disapproval in official circles. In August, President Monroe offers to restore Florida to Spain (though Spain soon offers to sell its increasingly untenable province back to the United States for several million dollars). On October 31, almost as an afterthought, the First Seminole War is declared ended.

AUGUST 1823. Arikara War. A semisedentary Pawnee tribe (a northern offshoot of the Caddosans), the Arikara live in earth-covered lodges with their Mandan and Hidatsa Sioux neighbors in what is today South Dakota, planting corn and hunting buffalo for their subsistence. In the summer of 1823, their warriors resist the ascent up the Missouri River of a swelling number of American traders, which eventually results in a pitched battle.

When news of this encounter reaches the 40-year-old colonel Henry Leavenworth 600 miles downstream at Fort Atkinson (Kansas), he swiftly leads a small force of U.S. regulars, trappers, traders, and Indian allies upstream to the mouth of Grand River and defeats the Arikara.

MAY 28, 1830. President Jackson signs the Indian Removal Act into law, a congressional bill allowing him to negotiate with southeastern tribes to exchange their ancestral homes for new lands west of the Mississippi River, which is to become known as the “Indian Territory.” Although forcible evictions are not permitted, this act greatly increases pressure on tribal leaders, accelerating wholesale expulsions of the Choctaws, Cherokees, Seminoles, and others.

SPRING 1832. Black Hawk War. Having been driven onto the western shores of the Mississippi River the previous year by white encroachments, Sauk and Fox planters return to Rock Island (Illinois) to sow new crops. Panicky American militiamen shoot down an Indian carrying a flag of truce, prompting the 65-year-old chief Ma’katawimesheka’ka (“Black Sparrow Hawk”) to authorize a series of cross-border raids.

Eventually, his overmatched tribesmen are defeated at Wisconsin Heights on July 20–21 by a volunteer army under Col. Henry Dodge and James D. Henry. Black Hawk flees westward with his own small band, which is subsequently massacred on the banks of the Bad Axe River; the chieftain is captured and confined in Fort Monroe (Virginia).

OCTOBER 21, 1834. Retired major general Wiley Thompson of the Georgia militia, now an Indian agent at reconstituted Fort King on the southern banks of the Alachua River in north-central Florida (modern Ocala), informs the Seminole chieftains of President Jackson’s decision to transplant their 5,000 tribesmen onto reservations west of the Mississippi. During the forthcoming year, native opposition will coalesce around belligerent leaders such as the 30-year-old warrior Osceola.

DECEMBER 28, 1835. Second Seminole War. On this cold, drizzly morning, 108 U.S. regulars under 43-year-old brevet major Francis Langhorne Dade are ambushed a few miles north of the Little Withlacoochee River while marching from Fort Brooke

The Seminole Wars.

(Tampa Bay) as reinforcements for Fort King, 30 miles deeper into central Florida. Their attackers are 160 Seminole warriors and black allies under chiefs Micanopy of the Alachua, his nephew Wildcat, Abraham, Jumper, and Alligator, who despite being briefly checked by Dade's 6-pounder cannon, eventually massacre the entire command (only two badly wounded survivors escape with their lives). That same afternoon, another 40 warriors under Osceola attack the outskirts of Fort King proper, killing seven whites—including its Indian agent Thompson—then retiring southward to join Micanopy's band.

This outbreak marks the culmination of several months of increasing volatility throughout this region, as natives protest against Washington's plan to expel them into Arkansas. Three days later, brevet brigadier general Clinch leads a second column into hostile Seminole territory, consisting of 250 regulars under one-armed brevet lieutenant colonel Alexander C.W. Fanning, and 500 Florida volunteers under militia brigadier general Richard Keith Call. While fording the Withlacoochee River, they are ambushed by 230 Seminole and 30 black warriors under Osceola, who—despite being injured—obliges the invaders to withdraw by late afternoon, after suffering 4 dead and 59 wounded.

The federal government in Washington responds to these two unexpected setbacks by dispatching Gen. Winfield Scott to Picolata with orders to marshal a large body of regulars and militiamen to stifle all resistance. In the marshy wilds of central Florida, meanwhile, Osceola's followers expand their revolt by attacking numerous plantations and freeing slaves, while simultaneously preparing to wage a protracted guerrilla struggle.

FEBRUARY 13, 1836. Having arrived four days previously at Tampa Bay from New Orleans with a relief force, Major General Gaines strikes inland with 1,000 men and a 6-pounder to reinforce Clinch in central Florida. After departing Fort King on February 26, however, Gaines is pinned down by Osceola's warriors the next day while attempting to ford the Withlacoochee River. Although suffering only 4 soldiers killed and 38 wounded, his half-starved army nevertheless cannot be extricated by Clinch until March 6.

MARCH 25, 1836. Scott orders three columns of more than 1,000 troops apiece to advance into Seminole territory: Col. William Lindsay's force from Tampa Bay, brevet brigadier general Abraham Eustis's from Volusia, plus Clinch's from Fort Drane. After repeatedly drawing fire from native snipers, these contingents meet at Fort Brooke by April 4–8, having slain only 60 of their elusive foes during this advance. Osceola's followers further begin attacking isolated American outposts behind the advance and harassing Scott's supply lines.

Osceola, as painted in captivity at Charleston in late 1837 or early 1838 by George Catlin. (Charleston Museum)

APRIL 27, 1836. While marching to the relief of Fort Alabama, Col. William Chisholm's 600 militia volunteers are ambushed, suffering 5 killed and 24 wounded.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1836. Call—now Florida's governor—crosses the Suwannee River with some U.S. regulars, local militiamen, and 1,500 Tennessee volunteers, driving toward Fort Drane. Despite being reinforced by 200 more regulars and 750 Creek auxiliaries under Col. John F. Lane, little is accomplished during Call's subsequent two-month campaign, beyond surprising a few unwary Seminole bands.

Finally, Wahoo Swamp is approached by November 21, where Call fails to press home his attack, instead retiring toward Volusia after suffering 55 casualties—not realizing that 600 native and black

Osceola

This chieftain was born in 1804 at Tallassee (in modern Macon County, Alabama). Despite later claiming to be a full-blooded native, Osceola's father was in fact the English trader William Powell and his mother was Polly Coppinger, the half-Muskogee daughter of Ann McQueen. Therefore, Osceola's maternal grandfather was James McQueen, one of the very first white men to trade among the Creeks, as far back as 1714. In Osceola's youth, some had even persisted in calling him Billy Powell.

During the hostilities of the winter of 1813, he was taken by his mother and other Upper Creeks or "Red Sticks" to seek refuge at Fort Negro. From there, they continued into central Florida early in 1814. As a young adult, he received the name Asi Yahola, derived from the ceremonial black tea drink assi and the word yaholi, the name of the Creek "Green Corn" god intoned whenever it was served. His name would become garbled into "Osceola" among whites, supposedly meaning "black-drink singer."

When a handful of Seminole chiefs signed a treaty with the U.S. War Department at Payne's Landing on May 9, 1832, supposedly agreeing to consider vacating central Florida for Arkansas within three years, they recanted a year later. However, the U.S. Senate ratified this disputed treaty in April 1834 and expected all 5,000 Seminoles to emigrate the next year. When the new U.S. Indian agent Wiley Thompson informed tribal leaders of this decision at Fort King in October 1834, Osceola—although not yet a chieftain, because his father had not been a Seminole—soon emerged as one of the treaty's most vociferous opponents. Thompson uneasily requested reinforcements, then read a letter from President Jackson in March 1835 to the assembled Seminole chiefs, threatening removal by force.

Most tribal leaders still rebuffed the treaty a month later, leading to more angry exchanges. As relations deteriorated, Thompson banned sales of arms and ammunition. In the summer of 1835, when one of Osceola's two wives was reclaimed as the daughter of a runaway slave, Thompson even locked him up overnight in Fort King for complaining too vigorously. Embittered and hostile, Osceola waylaid and killed Chief Charley Emathla that same November as he was leading his own Seminole band toward Fort Brooke to comply with the treaty. And one month later, Osceola personally exacted revenge upon Thompson by killing and scalping him outside his fort, just as the Second Seminole War exploded.

warriors have been trapped nearby, protecting their families. By early December, Call is relieved of military command in favor of U.S. quartermaster-general Thomas Sidney Jesup.

JANUARY 22, 1837. Jesup departs Fort Armstrong with approximately 2,000 U.S. regulars, marines, Alabama and Georgia militiamen, plus Creek auxiliaries, choosing to pursue elusive Seminole bands with his flying detachments rather than his cumbersome main force. This change of tactics produces a series of small victories near Lake Apopka, Hatchee-lustee Creek, and Big Cypress Swamp, obliging chiefs Micanopy, Abraham, and Jumper to request terms by February 3.

Eventually, a treaty is signed on March 6, whereby 1,000 Seminoles gather at Tampa Bay in mid-May to be transported west of the Mississippi by sea. However, Jesup's arrangements founder amid public criticism of his clemency and the lack of any amnesty for the natives' black allies, who are to be enslaved. Therefore, when Osceola and Sam Jones appear outside this unhappy Indian encampment with 200 warriors on the night of June 2, their comrades join them in resuming hostilities.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1837. Once Florida's summer heat has abated, Jesup resumes his campaign by deploying 3,700 troops in four columns: one moving along the St. Johns River, another patrolling Mosquito Inlet, a third advancing down the Kissimmee River from Tampa, the fourth going up the Caloosahatchee. These sweeps result in a number of important captures, culminating on October 27 when Osceola and 94 followers are treacherously seized, despite having been asked to a parley and displaying a white flag, near Fort Payton by 250 troops under Brig. Gen. Joseph M. Hernandez. American public opinion deplores this act of perfidy, and Osceola is lionized upon being transferred into Fort Moultrie (outside Charleston, South Carolina), where he subsequently dies of malaria on January 30, 1838.

DECEMBER 2, 1837. Jesup launches a winter offensive by sending seven small armies roaming into the interior of Florida, denying any respite to its recalcitrant Seminole bands.

DECEMBER 25, 1837. Lake Okeechobee. About midmorning, approximately 1,000 men of the 1st, 4th, and 6th U.S. Infantry regiments, 1st Missouri Volunteers, plus Delaware and Shawnee scouts—all under Col. Zachary Taylor—capture a man who promises to guide them toward a Seminole encampment atop a rise bordering Lake Okeechobee. Expecting to encounter only minimal resistance, Taylor launches a frontal assault by 12:30 p.m. across a half-mile of sawgrass swamp.

His front ranks are riddled by accurate counterfire from three bodies of waiting warriors: 250 on the right under Sam Jones, 120 in the center under Alligator, and 80 on the left under King Philip's son Coacoochee (called "Wildcat" by the Americans). After the 180 Missouri volunteers of Col. Richard Gentry break and run, the 6th U.S. Infantry of Col. Ramsey Thompson also retreats; therefore, by the time Taylor's reserves begin a flanking maneuver at 3:00 p.m., the Seminoles are able to escape eastward. American losses total 26 dead (including Gentry and Thompson) and 112 wounded, as opposed to 11 fallen warriors and 14 injured.

JANUARY 24, 1838. At noon, a company of U.S. dragoons under Capt. William M. Fulton—vanguard for Jesup's main army—is fired upon by 200–300 Seminole and black warriors who are occupying the high ground near Locksahatchee. Despite making a rapid advance, the Americans are unable to prevent their opponents' flight; they suffer 7 killed and 32 wounded (including Jesup, who is slightly injured).

FEBRUARY 7, 1838. Over the next few days, Jesup meets and persuades Chief Tuskegee to bring his emaciated followers to Fort Jupiter on the understanding that these Seminoles will not be obliged to abandon Florida. Some 500 Indians and blacks soon are encamped within a mile of this outpost, but when Washington rejects Jesup's terms on March 17, the general sends the 2nd U.S. Dragoons to surround and imprison the band, violating his promise.

MAY 15, 1838. Jesup relinquishes command of the 1,800 U.S. regulars and 500 militiamen remaining in Florida to brevet brigadier general Taylor and returns to Washington. By now, Seminole activity consists of feeble hit-and-run raids against mostly civilian targets.

Over the next four years, American forces fight a protracted brush war against Seminole bands hiding throughout the Everglades, gradually hunting them into extinction, while deporting hundreds of captives. Disgusted U.S. regulars refer to this inglorious struggle as a "dirty little war of aggression," many resigning from the service. On August 14, 1842, their 48-year-old lame commander—Col. William Jenkins Worth—announces an end to the Second Seminole War, which has cost 1,466 American soldiers their lives (328 in battle).

MEXICAN TURBULENCE (1822–1834)

For many emerging Latin American nations, independence from Spain does not bring an end to strife; rather, there ensues bitter wrangling as to how best to replace the vanished imperial apparatus. Many innovations are proposed, ranging from radical republicanism to constitutional monarchies, all backed by a ready resort to arms—now seemingly justified, after the recent struggle for liberty. As a result, a nation such as Mexico endures frequent military coups and countercoups within the first dozen years of its existence.

MAY 18, 1822. After learning two weeks earlier that Spain has refused to recognize Mexico's independence as defined by the Plan of Iguala (see "February 24, 1821" in "Latin American Insurgencies"), troopers from the 1st Cavalry Regiment abandon their San Hipólito barracks in Mexico City at 8:00 p.m. and—in a contrived gesture spearheaded by a sergeant named Pío Marcha—urge the insurgent hero Agustín Iturbide to become emperor. The next morning, Congress is bullied into ratifying this arrangement, and Agustín I is proclaimed.

JUNE 1822. A small army under the 37-year-old, Italian-born brigadier general Vicente Filisola arrives in Guatemala with orders from Iturbide to secure Central America for Mexico.

AUGUST 26, 1822. Numerous military officers are arrested throughout Mexico on suspicion of plotting to depose Agustín I in favor of a republic.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1822. Emperor Agustín I dispatches Brig. Gen. Juan José Zenón Fernández from San Luis Potosí to put down a republican mutiny in Tamaulipas that is led by Brig. Gen. Felipe de la Garza.

OCTOBER 26, 1822. In Veracruz, Antonio López de Santa Anna fails to wrest its island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa from the last loyalist Spanish holdout, General Dávila. Because of this setback, and other secret complaints regarding his conversations with the pro-republican U.S. ambassador Joel R. Poinsett, the emperor on November 16 orders Santa Anna to report to Mexico City.

OCTOBER 31, 1822. In Mexico City, Agustín I dissolves Congress with the help of Gen. Luis de Cortazar's troops.

DECEMBER 2, 1822. Threatened with demotion as Iturbide's governor at Veracruz, Santa Anna mutinies with 400 soldiers of the 8th Infantry Regiment four days later, he promulgates a republic and braces for Iturbide's counteroffensive, which is charged to generals José Antonio de Echávarri, Cortazar, and José María Lobato.

Nicolás Bravo and Vicente Guerrero also rise up against the Mexican emperor, prompting the further dispatch of Gen. José Gabriel Armijo's army.

JANUARY 1823. Unaware of the Mexican emperor's growing predicament, Filisola's army subdues patriotic unrest in El Salvador (Central America).

JANUARY 23, 1823. Armijo's subordinate, the 32-year-old brigadier general Epitacio Sánchez, comes into contact with Bravo's and Guerrero's rebel contingents at Almolonga in the state of Veracruz, defeating them over the next two days in a series of clashes that costs Sánchez his life.

FEBRUARY 1, 1823. After briefly besieging the port city of Veracruz, generals Echávarri and Armijo agree to join the rebellious Santa Anna and Bravo against Iturbide, formalizing this agreement with the "Plan of Casamata." Their mutiny quickly spreads to most other Mexican army units.

Santa Anna

Antonio de Padua María Severino López de Santa Anna Pérez de Lebrón was born on February 21, 1794, at Jalapa (Veracruz). His father was a minor local official, who saw that his young son became apprenticed to a merchant in Veracruz. The high-spirited Santa Anna preferred a military calling, so—against his parents' wishes—he enrolled on July 6, 1810, as a Subteniente in the Fixed Infantry Regiment of Veracruz under newly promoted Col. Joaquín de Arredondo y Muñiz.

The war for independence exploded that same autumn, and Santa Anna had his first taste of combat when Arredondo was sent in mid-March 1811 with 500 troops to put down insurrections in Tamaulipas and Texas. Two and a half years of wide-ranging campaigns ensued. The young subaltern was wounded in the left forearm by an Indian arrow in San Luis Potosí, then was promoted to second lieutenant as of February 1812. The Texans were finally crushed at Atascoso outside San Antonio on August 12, 1813. It is believed that Arredondo's ruthless execution of beaten foes and torching of towns helped shape Santa Anna's own harsh attitudes.

Singled out for bravery in battle, he was returned to Veracruz that same autumn as a military instructor. As the viceroy ordered new companies raised for that port city's regiment, Santa Anna was promoted to first lieutenant of its 2nd Grenadier Battalion. Then the next year, he became aide to the royalist governor and garrison commander, Gen. José Dávila, and patrolled local highways. In March 1816, Santa Anna was promoted to captain and served in Arredondo's pursuit of Francisco Mina during the summer of 1817.

Santa Anna's next few years were spent quietly, relocating displaced loyalists around Veracruz. He also acquired a few properties, as well as considerable debts through gambling. In his provincial backwater, he remained loyal to the Crown until the very closing phases of the War of Independence. Belatedly switching allegiances in the spring of 1821, he became one of many insurgent lieutenant colonels vying for attention. After a few small local victories, he was promoted to the command of the 11th Division but lost half of his men in a failed assault against Dávila's royal garrison in Veracruz.

When independence was at last won on September 27, 1821, Santa Anna seemed like countless other ambitious Mexican officers. Although he was promoted to brigadier general and made governor of Veracruz, confronting Dávila's last Spanish holdouts in the offshore island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa, nothing could have predicted that the 27-year-old Santa Anna would come to occupy the presidency 11 times over the next three decades.

FEBRUARY 12, 1823. Virtually all imperial troops in Mexico City mutiny against Iturbide, obliging the emperor to shift his headquarters to Ixtapalucan, while imprisoned congressmen are released.

MARCH 19, 1823. With the rebellious generals Echávarri, José Morán y Villar, Marqués de Vivanco, Bravo, and Miguel Barragán marching upon Mexico City, Iturbide abdicates as emperor. To avoid further bloodshed, Gen. Manuel Gómez Pedraza arranges a safe-conduct for the fallen ruler, who is escorted to Antigua in the state of Veracruz under Bravo's protection, then deported on May 11 aboard the frigate Rawlins.

MARCH 29, 1823. Upon learning of Iturbide's fall, Filisola convenes a constitutional congress in Guatemala City to decide Central America's fate, then departs with his Mexican army. On July 1, this body opts for full independence, only Chiapas choosing to remain as part of Mexico.

MARCH 31, 1823. The Mexican Congress decides that a triumvirate composed of Bravo, Guadalupe Victoria (originally born Manuel Félix Fernández), and Pedro Celestino Negrete will temporarily rule this country until a republican constitution can be drafted. Debate soon splinters into two contending factions: those favoring a strong central authority (known as escoceses or "Scots"), opposed by those wishing for a looser federal system (yorkinos or "Yorkists").

JUNE 1823. Bravo marches into Jalisco at the head of 2,000 men to calm that state's disturbances.

JUNE 5, 1823. In San Luis Potosí, Santa Anna issues a demand for a federal system of government, being recalled into Mexico City and briefly incarcerated for his temerity.

JANUARY 31, 1824. Mexico's new constitution is promulgated, establishing a republican form of government.

JUNE 1824. Bravo marches into Jalisco with 4,000 men because of its continued political unrest.

JULY 1824. After a year's sojourn in Italy and England, the former emperor Iturbide returns to Mexico, only to be taken prisoner and executed in Tamaulipas.

OCTOBER 10, 1824. The 36-year-old insurgent hero Guadalupe Victoria is sworn into office as Mexico's first elected president.

DECEMBER 23, 1827. Col. Manuel Montaña leads an uprising at Otumba in the state of Mexico, which is soon joined at Tulancingo by Vice President Bravo, who assumes overall command of the rebel forces.

JANUARY 7, 1828. Guerrero defeats Bravo's following, the latter being exiled to Ecuador (although pardoned the following year).

SEPTEMBER 1, 1828. After a tightly contested presidential campaign, the electoral college proclaims the moderate General Gómez Pedraza as winner, and Guerrero—the second-place finisher—as Mexico's vice president. Eleven days later, Santa Anna revolts at the fortress of Perote in the state of Veracruz, calling for the annulment of these results and Guerrero's elevation to president. This uprising is quickly put down, and Santa Anna retreats into Oaxaca.

Around that same time, President Gómez Pedraza also uses the Mexican army to eject the liberal governor of the state of Mexico, 40-year-old Dr. Lorenzo de Zavala.

NOVEMBER 30, 1828. The Acordada garrison in Mexico City mutinies in favor of Guerrero, and fighting erupts in the city's streets two days later. President Gómez Pedraza eventually flees for exile in France on December 3, leaving power in the hands of Guerrero.

MARCH 20, 1829. Guerrero orders all Spaniards expelled from Mexico.

APRIL 1, 1829. Guerrero officially assumes office as president, with the 49-year-old general Anastasio Bustamante as his vice president and Santa Anna as governor of Veracruz.

JULY 7, 1829. Spanish Invasion. A 15-ship expedition departs Havana under veteran brigadier general Isidro Barradas (see "January 23, 1820" entry in "Latin American Insurgencies") to attempt a Spanish reconquest of Mexico—supposedly with the aid of local sympathizers, now disillusioned by republican rule.

By July 27, this force sights Cape Rojo in the state of Veracruz, and its 3,500 troops disembark at Santander Beach. The first actual clash occurs four days later, while Barradas's invaders are attempting to traverse Corchos Pass, after which they skirt the burning, abandoned fortress at La Barra before occupying Tampico without resistance on August 6. Two days previously, Santa Anna has landed farther south at Tuxpan with a 3,750-troop counterexpedition from Veracruz, proceeding northwestward on foot. Tampico's small garrison meanwhile withdraws northward into the village of Altamira, where it is joined on August 8 by another 1,800 Mexican soldiers under General de la Garza.

Learning of this latter concentration, Barradas leaves his subordinate, Colonel Salomón, to hold Tampico with a small garrison, while advancing a week later against de la Garza with his main body. The Mexicans brace to receive the Spaniards at Altamira, being reinforced from Matamoros on August 15 by 40-year-old general Manuel Rafael Simón de Mier y Terán. Nevertheless, after only a brief exchange of long-range fire two days afterward, the defenders abandon Altamira to Barradas.

Having meanwhile circled around the Pánuco River, Santa Anna joins Mier y Terán and de la Garza by August 20, then slips a contingent across by boat that same night to attack Salomón the next dawn within Tampico. He is unable to carry the town by storm, though, so he retires toward Pueblo Viejo once Barradas returns to rescue his subordinate. Still, the Spanish incursion has been checked, and after a further buildup of Mexican strength, action resumes.

On September 3, Col. Carlos Beneski captures a Spanish schooner offshore; four days later, Mier y Terán blocks Doña Cecilia Pass (the last remaining road inland), then at 1:45 p.m. on September 10, he assaults the Spanish contingent at La Barra with 900 men, carrying that strongpoint the next day. Barradas therefore decides to come to terms with Santa Anna that same September 11, being allowed to re-embark along with his 1,800 demoralized survivors. (In retaliation for this invasion, the Mexican government soon commissions Gen. José Ignacio Basadre to travel to Haiti and recruit black guerrillas to infiltrate Cuba, raising a slave revolt against Spanish rule.)

NOVEMBER 6, 1829. Yucatán rebels against Guerrero's government.

DECEMBER 4, 1829. Bustamante's Uprising. Still in command of the large army raised to repel Barradas's Spanish invasion, Vice President Bustamante

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

mutinies at Jalapa in the state of Veracruz against President Guerrero. The latter quickly finds himself without supporters—Bravo defeating his troops at Chilpancingo, then occupying Acapulco—so the president flees the capital on December 18, establishing a tenacious guerrilla campaign in southern Mexico. His rival Bustamante assumes office as president by January 1, 1830, while sending General Armijo to fight Guerrero.

JANUARY 15, 1831. After a year of successful guerrilla forays, Guerrero is lured aboard the Genoese brigantine Colombo at Acapulco, its captain, Francesco Picaluga, having been offered a 50,000-peso bounty by President Bustamante to kidnap his intransigent predecessor. Instead of the anticipated lunch, Guerrero is sailed to Huatulco in the state of Oaxaca and handed over to Capt. Miguel González, who executes him by firing squad on the morning of February 14 at Cuilapan.

JANUARY 2, 1832. Santa Anna's Insurrection. Santa Anna rises in revolt with the Veracruz garrison against Bustamante, calling for the restoration of exiled president Gómez Pedraza (see "November 30, 1828" entry). Despite a halting start, this rebellion gradually spreads throughout central Mexico.

MARCH 19, 1832. Gov. Francisco Vital Fernández of Tamaulipas revolts against the Mexico City authorities, but flees upon the approach of Mier y Terán's loyal troops.

JULY 8, 1832. Mier y Terán, humiliated by his inability to put down another revolt in Tamaulipas—this time by the Tampico garrison under General Moctezuma—commits suicide by falling upon his sword at Padilla.

AUGUST 1832. In the state of Guerrero, Gen. Juan Nepomuceno Álvarez rises against Bustamante, supporting the exiled Gómez Pedraza.

AUGUST 14, 1832. Bustamante is obliged to march out of Mexico City at the head of his army to battle the spreading antigovernment revolt in central Mexico.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1832. Bustamante defeats a rebel concentration at Gallinero Pass near Dolores Hidalgo in the state of Guanajuato, but he must then retrace his steps toward Puebla to intercept Santa Anna's army, which is advancing inland from Veracruz.

OCTOBER 5, 1832. The former president Gómez Pedraza reaches Veracruz from exile in France, becoming the figurehead for Santa Anna's movement.

DECEMBER 21, 1832. Santa Anna's army clashes with Bustamante's near Puebla, then two days later an armistice is signed at Zavaleta Hacienda, whereby the latter resigns as president in favor of Gómez Pedraza.

JANUARY 3, 1833. Gómez Pedraza and Santa Anna enter Mexico City in triumph, the former temporarily reoccupying his presidency, although he is little more than a puppet of the victorious general. When elections are held a couple of months later, Santa Anna becomes president, and the 51-year-old liberal politician Dr. Valentín Gómez Farías becomes his vice president, officially taking office on April 1.

JUNE 2, 1833. Santa Anna marches out of Mexico City at the head of his army to put down a minor insurrection by General Gabriel.

MARCH 5, 1834. Gen. Juan Álvarez defeats Bravo's conservative followers at Chilapa.

NOVEMBER 9, 1834. Gen. Juan Álvarez rises in revolt against Santa Anna's rule at Tecpan, eventually besieging Acapulco and clashing with Bravo.

During this 12-year span, not a single Mexican president completes his term in office, military force having become a well-entrenched feature of political life.

CISPLATINE WAR (1825–1828)

South America's independence does not bring an end to the traditional Hispano-Portuguese rivalry regarding the disputed territory known as the Banda Oriental or "Eastern Shore" of the River Plate (modern Uruguay), seized eight years previously by the troops of Brazilian emperor Dom Pedro I. On April 19, 1825, 33 of the Banda's exiled patriots under 40-year-old Juan Antonio Lavalleja set sail aboard two boats from San Isidro (Argentina), landing at Rincón de la Agraciada to raise a revolt against the occupiers of their homeland.

Many disaffected Uruguayan gauchos quickly rise up in Lavalleja's support—especially the veteran patriot commander Fructuoso Rivera, popularly known as "Don Frutos"—therefore, the town of Soriano is overrun by April 24, Canelones is taken by May 2, and the main Brazilian garrison within Montevideo is invested six days later. The 18-gun Brazilian brigantine Caboclo (formerly the Maipu) of Lt. Francisco Pires de Carvalho carries reinforcements into Montevideo's beleaguered garrison by June, while the emperor vainly files protests with the government at Buenos Aires, which is soon to be headed by its first constitutional president—Bernardino Rivadavia—recently returned from serving as a plenipotentiary minister in London, negotiating closer ties with various European governments.

Brazil's protests are ignored, so Lavalleja's movement is emboldened and besieges Colonia del Sacramento as of August 18, while the extemporized Uruguayan government votes to secede from the Brazilian empire and unite with Argentina one week later.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1825. At Águila Creek southeast of Mercedes, Rivera is defeated when he attacks a column of 700–800 Brazilian troops sweeping into the Uruguayan interior under the 42-year-old colonel Bento Manuel Ribeiro.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1825. At dawn, having slipped across Vera Ford behind Ribeiro's main force with 250 riders, Rivera surprises the Brazilian depot of colonels Jeronimo Gomes Jardim and José Luis Mena Barreto, established south of the confluence of the Negro and Uruguay rivers at a ranch called Rincón de las Gallinas or Rincón de Haedo (the latter the name of its civilian proprietor). Nearby, Brazilian units turn back to contest this seizure, but Rivera lures them piecemeal into the local bañados or “bogs,” inflicting some 100 fatalities—including Mena Barreto and his entire staff—before making off with 8,000 mounts and considerable matériel.

Lavalleja and the 33rd Orientales swearing an oath to free Uruguay at Rincón de la Agraciada. (Museo Municipal de Bellas Artes, Montevideo)

This reverse prompts the Brazilian theater commander headquartered at Montevideo—Lt. Gen. Carlos Frederico Lecor, Barão de Laguna and Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Torre e Espada—to dispatch another 1,000-man column inland under Ribeiro, so as to unite with a similar-sized force moving southward from the Negro River under Gen. Bento Gonçalves da Silva. Lavalleja countersallies from his central Uruguayan base camp of Durazno to attempt to impede their juncture but is not successful.

OCTOBER 8, 1825. The Argentine general Carlos de Alvear and the diplomat Dr. Miguel Díaz Vélez visit Simón Bolívar in Potosí (Bolivia), proposing an alliance against Brazil, but the latter demurs.

OCTOBER 12, 1825. Sarandí. Despite having failed to prevent the juncture of Gonçalves’s and Ribeiro’s 2,200 Brazilian troops, Lavalleja has amassed

2,000 Uruguayan irregulars at dawn to confront them on the shores of Sarandí Creek. His left cavalry wing under Rivera closes at 9:00 a.m. against the Brazilian right, which is comprised of 400 cavalrymen and 450 infantrymen under Gonçalves, dispersing them after a hard-fought clash.

Meanwhile, the 700 Uruguayan riders and single fieldpiece on the right under Pablo Zufriategui check the advance of the 300 infantrymen constituting the Brazilian left under Ribeiro, before successfully counterattacking. The assault by the Uruguayan center under Manuel Oribe is initially driven back by the 800 Brazilian infantrymen opposite under Col. Joaquim Antonio Alencastre, but Lavalleja responds by committing his reserves at this point, eventually collapsing Brazilian resolve by midday. They draw off after suffering 200 dead and 630 other casualties, compared to only 35 killed and 90 wounded among the Uruguayan ranks.

As a result of this defeat, occupied Uruguay is reduced to a few isolated Brazilian garrisons holding out along the River Plate coastline, as well as along the northeastern borderlands.

OCTOBER 24, 1825. In the aftermath of the victory at Sarandí, the Argentine Congress recognizes Lavalleja’s request to incorporate Uruguay into their “United Provinces of the River Plate” under the name of the “Cisplatine Province,” duly advising Rio de Janeiro of this fact.

NOVEMBER 1825. Argentina’s internal politics become complicated when the impetuous, 30-year-old general Gregorio Aráoz de Lamadrid, who was sent to recruit troops in his native Tucumán in anticipation of forthcoming hostilities against Brazil, instead deposes local governor Javier López and as-

Gauchos

Gaucha is the traditional name for a cowboy in Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, parts of Bolivia, and even southern Brazil. The term’s origin is obscure. In ancient Moorish Spain, a chaucha had been a switch or quirt used in herding animals. Rural peasants in Andalucía were referred to as gachos. In the New World, the Quechua dialect in the Andes contained the word huacho to signify “nomad” or “vagabond.” The mid-18th-century traveler Alonso Carrió de Lavandera—better known as Concolorcorvo—who often traversed the lonely Pampas, recorded the name of its mounted herdsmen as gauderios. The first appearance of the version gaucha dates to only 1770 and became more widely used during the struggle for independence.

Being skillful horsemen, accustomed to living off the land and fighting against tough nomadic tribesmen, the gauchos made an excellent body of irregular cavalry. Many of these colorful Argentine riders joined Manuel Belgrano’s ranks as early as 1810, helping to blunt royalist offensives descending out of the Andes to cross the Pampas. Their Uruguayan brethren rallied behind José Gervasio Artigas the next year. Many of the Argentines later served as troopers under José de San Martín as well.

However, once independence was won, it became obvious that the interests of these rural nomads were considerably different than those of urban inhabitants in Buenos Aires or Montevideo. Therefore, decades of friction and warfare ensued, pitting hordes of wild horsemen against the better-armed and disciplined armies emerging from these port cities. Despite their brilliant triumphs under such early 19th-century leaders as Juan Manuel de Rosas, the gauchos eventually faded as a paramilitary force. Modern weaponry undermined their military value, and even cattle ranching changed and evolved. Their romantic reputation still lives on, though. Every November 11 is observed in Buenos Aires with a parade of mounted gauchos through the streets to its Mataderos District, in remembrance of the annual round-ups when thousands of such colorful riders brought herds into market.

Uruguayan gaucho, 19th-century painting by Juan Manuel Blanes. (Museo Municipal de Bellas Artes, Montevideo)

sumes office so as to impose a stronger centralist or “Unitarian” rule over this rural province, as well as over neighboring Salta and Catamarca. Such heavy-handed attempts to spread the liberal and self-serving policies of Buenos Aires into the more conservative regions of the countryside will provoke hostility and reactions against the Rivadavia government.

NOVEMBER 15, 1825. The 22-gun Brazilian corvette Maria da Glória (ex-American Horatio) under the French-born mercenary Théodore Alexandre de Beaurepaire recaptures the merchant brig São Miguel Constante and the Palma, both intercepted previously by the Argentine privateer Lavalleja.

DECEMBER 10, 1825. Brazil officially declares war against Argentina, which responds in kind as of January 1, 1826. Neither country is prepared for extended hostilities, both governments being hampered by inadequate resources and a lack of popular support for such overseas campaigns, as well as being powerless to intercept any significant amounts of foreign-borne commerce. The isolated Brazilian outposts in hostile Uruguay can only be sustained with difficulty by the Brazilian navy, whose larger warships are unsuited for the shallow River Plate estuary, while the Argentine navy and military expeditions have to be extemporized at Buenos Aires.

DECEMBER 21, 1825. A small Brazilian squadron under Vice Adm. Rodrigo José Ferreira de Lôbo arrives to blockade the River Plate. His efforts to bring any real pressure to bear upon Argentina will prove largely ineffectual, as he has secret instructions not to antagonize neutral shippers.

DECEMBER 31, 1825. Uruguayan troops under Col. Leonardo Olivera seize Fort Santa Teresa on the northeastern frontier, effectively reducing the Brazilian occupation of their homeland to only Montevideo and Colonia del Sacramento.

JANUARY 13, 1826. Commo. Diogo Jorge de Brito departs Rio de Janeiro with the Caboclo (flag), the English-built, recently purchased schooner Alcântara under Lt. Pierre-Paul Boutrouelle, and the brand-new, Bahia-built schooner Itaparica (5 guns) under Lt. Joaquim Leal Ferreira to reinforce the Brazilian naval squadron operating within the River Plate estuary under Lôbo.

FEBRUARY 1826. The 16-gun Brazilian brig Pirajá (ex-Portuguese Carvalho) under Capt. Bartholomew Hayden captures the Argentine privateer schooner Libertad del Sur (8 guns), which becomes incorporated into the Brazilian fleet as the Liberdade do Sul.

FEBRUARY 9, 1826. Off Collares Point, Argentine admiral Guillermo Brown's 28-gun frigate 25 de Mayo (flag); the brigantines General Belgrano, General Balcarce, Congreso Nacional, and República Argentina; the 7-gun, 150-ton sloop Sarandí; and the civilian steam paddleboat Pepa, pressed into service as a hospital ship, clash with Lôbo's Brazilian squadron. After enduring 26 casualties during a two-hour skirmish, the Argentine ships retire into the Los Pozos naval base, opposite Recoleta near Buenos Aires. Brown complains of the conduct of several of his captains, resulting in various changes in command.

FEBRUARY 26, 1826. Brown's squadron bombards the 1,500-man Brazilian garrison holding Colonia del Sacramento (Uruguay), being repelled by its batteries and retiring to San Gabriel Island, where the Belgrano sinks. Capt. Bartolomé Ceretti of the Argentine brigantine Balcarce is listed among the dead.

MARCH 1, 1826. Brown tries a second incursion into Colonia del Sacramento's harbor by sending six gunlaunches at night into its anchorage in two columns under captains Tomás Espora and Leonardo Rosales, commanded individually by lieutenants Jules Fonrouge, Charles Robinson, James Kearnie, Juan Francisco Seguí, José Monti, and Antonio Richitelli. They board and fire the anchored 18-gun brigantine Real Pedro of Capt. Lt. Frederico Mariath in the darkness. Despite this success, however, the Argentines suffer 200 dead, wounded, or captured when three of their craft are destroyed.

MARCH 13, 1826. After his two failed assaults against Colonia del Sacramento, Brown eludes his Brazilian opponents by sailing through the Hornos Keys and returning into his base.

APRIL 11, 1826. A mile off El Cerro (Uruguay), Brown's flagship, the 25 de Mayo, battles the 36-gun, 400-man Brazilian frigate Nichteroy (the ex-Portuguese Sucesso) of 37-year-old captain James Norton until nightfall, the former suffering 13 killed.

APRIL 27, 1826. Brown's 25 de Mayo and Independencia attempt to cut the 52-gun Brazilian frigate Imperatriz (the ex-Imperatriz Leopoldina) of Capt. Luís Barroso Pereira out of Montevideo's harbor at night but fail after an hour and a half of confused fighting. The Portuguese commander and others nonetheless fall in defense of their ship.

MAY 3, 1826. Brown fights a second inconclusive duel against the Brazilian Nichteroy and the smaller Maceió off Ortiz Bank in the River Plate estuary; he is hampered by its shallow waters.

MAY 25, 1826. Admiral Lôbo having been dismissed by Rio de Janeiro for his overly cautious strategy, his successor—the 63-year-old admiral Rodrigo Pinto Guedes—moves the Brazilian squadron closer to Buenos Aires, fighting a prolonged action against Brown off the Balizas Exteriores, which ends with the Brazilians' withdrawal toward Santiago Points.

JUNE 10, 1826. The Brazilian squadron reappears off Buenos Aires and the next afternoon at 2:00 p.m. attacks the Argentine naval base of Los Pozos, although shallow water prevents their seven largest vessels from coming within range. Brown launches a counterattack, observed by civilian throngs ashore, which drives off the dispersed Brazilian formation.

JULY 29, 1826. Off Lara Point near Quilmes, east-southeast of Buenos Aires, Brown encounters Norton's superior Brazilian squadron: the Nichteroy under Flag Captain Mariath; the corvettes Maria da Glória under de Beaurepaire, Maceió under J. I. Maze, and Itaparica under Leal Ferreira; the Caboclo under John Pascoe Grenfell; the 16-gun brigantine 29 de Agosto (the ex-Cerqueira) under Raphael José de Carvalho; the gunboat Leal Paulistana under Lt. Antônio Carlos Ferreira; plus a dozen lesser vessels.

Brown's flagship, the 25 de Mayo, under Flag Captain Espora, and Captain Rosales's schooner Río de la Plata become hard-pressed the next day, being rescued after three hours by their consorts Sarandí, Oriental Argentino, Balcarce, Piraja, República Argentina, Congreso, and Liberal. The Argentine flagship is so damaged that Brown shifts his flag to the brigantine República Argentina during this action; the 25 de Mayo subsequently sinks while being towed toward Los Pozos.

SEPTEMBER 1826. The Brazilian gunboat Leal Paulistana of Lt. Antônio Carlos Ferreira is taken by the French-born Argentine privateer César Fournier and incorporated into the Argentine Navy as the Maldonado.

OCTOBER 9, 1826. Argentine federalists under Capt. Pantaleón Argañaraz from La Rioja defeat the unitarian governor Gutiérrez of Catamarca a dozen miles southwest of his provincial capital, at Coneta. He is replaced by Colonel Figueroa, but Gutiérrez soon returns with reinforcements recruited at Tucumán to reassume office.

OCTOBER 25, 1826. Col. Federico Rauch with 800 men advances south from Toldos Viejos (30 miles southwest of Dolores, Argentina) to ravage Indian settlements in the La Ventana Range and extend Argentine influence. One month later, he leads a second such punitive sweep with 1,200 troopers of the 5th, 6th, and 7th Line Cavalry regiments, returning in January of 1827.

OCTOBER 26, 1826. Brown departs the River Plate with the Sarandí and the Chacabuco (purchased from Chile) to prey upon Brazilian shipping off Rio de Janeiro. He returns by Christmas Day, having made a few captures.

OCTOBER 27, 1826. El Tala. The 38-year-old conservative federalist governor Juan Facundo Quiroga of the western Argentine province of La Rioja,

Brazilian troops embarking at Praia to sail as reinforcements for the garrison holding Montevideo, early 1826; by Jean-Baptiste Debret. (Museu Imperial, Petropolis) disgruntled with Buenos Aires's liberal and centralist tendencies, invades the rival province of Catamarca with 1,000 gaucho riders, clashing against a similar-sized unitarian army under Lamadrid at El Tala. The latter is badly wounded, and Quiroga briefly occupies his capital of Tucumán before retreating at the approach of another unitarian army under Colonel Bedoya from Salta.

DECEMBER 28, 1826. A combined Uruguayo-Argentine army departs Arroyo Grande for the Negro River valley in three units: I Corps under Lavalleja, consisting of the 9th Argentine Cavalry Regiment, plus a host of Colorado Uruguayan irregular riders and militiamen; II Corps under Alvear, consisting of 2,000 troopers of the 1st, 4th, 8th, and 16th Argentine Cavalry regiments, a squadron of cuirassiers, and militiamen from Colonia del Sacramento; and III Corps under Soler, comprising the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 5th Argentine Infantry regiments, the 2nd and 3rd Argentine Cavalry regiments, a light-artillery regiment, and militia companies from Mercedes, guarding the artillery and supply trains. Its aim is to invade Bagé and the southern Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul.

DECEMBER 31, 1826. Unitarian Argentine colonel Bedoya occupies rival Santiago del Estero for five days before retiring into Tucumán.

JANUARY 26, 1827. The Brazilian town of Bagé is occupied without resistance by Lavalleja and Alvear. The local Brazilian theater commander—44-year-old marshal Felisberto Caldeira Brant Pontes de Oliveira e Orta, Marquês de Barbacena—falls back before the more numerous Uruguayo-Argentine cavalry formations, taking shelter in the Camacua Range until reinforcements can reach him from Río Grande.

FEBRUARY 7, 1827. While marching to the relief of Gov. Juan Antonio Álvarez de Arenales of Salta, the unitarian colonel Bedoya's entire command is massacred 30 miles south-southwest of that city, at Chicoana, by a local federalist guerrilla force under 47-year-old colonel José Francisco Gorriti, better known as "Pachi."

FEBRUARY 8, 1827. This afternoon, south of Juncal Island at the mouth of the Paraná Guazú River, Brown's flagship Sarandí, five other Argentine warships, nine gunboats, and a hospital ship intercept the Third Brazilian Naval Division of Capt. Jacinto Roque de Sena Pereira, which is descending the Uruguay River from Paysandú and consists of a brigantine, 10 schooners (including the 11-gun flagship Oriental; the 8-gun Bertioga of Capt. Lt. George Broom; the 4-gun Dona Paula of Lt. Thomas Read; and the single-gun Liberade do Sul of Lt. Augusto Venceslau da Silva Lisboa and Itapoã of Lt. German Máximo de Sousa Aranha, as well as the Januária and a new Leal Paulistana), plus six gunboats.

After two hours of inconclusive fighting, a pampero or "storm" blows up, but Brown consummates this engagement the next day by capturing a dozen enemy vessels and burning another three off Guleguaychú. Only the Dona Paula and one other Brazilian vessel escape. Captains Francisco José Seguí of the Argentine brigantine Balcarce and Francis Drummond of the schooner Maldonado distinguish themselves during this pursuit. Sena Pereira figures among the prisoners, and Broom's Bertioga is incorporated into the Argentine fleet with the name of 9 de Febrero. Brown and his officers are also rewarded with medals on February 21 by a grateful Argentine nation.

FEBRUARY 12, 1827. Alvear and Lavalleja's army enters São Gabriel (Brazil), but the next day on the western banks of the Vacacaí River, the 4th Argentine Cavalry Regiment under 29-year-old colonel Juan Galo Lavalle González skirmishes against 1,100 troopers of the 22nd and 23rd Brazilian Cavalry regiments under Gen. Bento Manuel Ribeiro. The latter suffer only 30–40 casualties, as opposed to 7 killed and 6 wounded among the Argentines and Uruguayans; however, intelligence gathered as to the invaders' line of advance allows General Barbacena to begin marshalling his main body across their intended path.

On February 14, Alvear detaches Brig. Gen. Lucio Norberto Mansilla with 350 troopers to drive back Riveiro, who overtakes his opponent the next day while traversing the Ibicuy River at Ombú Ford. Again, the Brazilians suffer only some 40 casualties, as opposed to 10 Argentine dead and 12 wounded; yet by February 17, Barbacena's army is taking up position near Rosario Ford on the Santa Maria River to contest Alvear's passage. The invaders arrive by afternoon of February 19 and prepare for battle the next day north of Ituzaingó Creek.

FEBRUARY 20, 1827. Ituzaingó. At 2:00 a.m. on this moonlit night, Barbacena orders his 2,300

Battle of Ituzaingó.

Brazilian infantrymen, 3,700 cavalrymen, and 300 gunners with 12 fieldpieces to advance against the invaders' vanguard under Olazábal. When Alvear perceives this movement at dawn, he in turn commands Olazábal's 5th Battalion to hang on to its crucial forward height at all costs, while hastening his own army into action: 1,800 infantrymen, 5,400 troopers (including 2,000 Uruguayan gauchos), and 500 artillerymen manning 16 cannon. Brig. Gen. Julián Laguna's cavalry are sent to hold the Argentine left. In the process, it collides with Brigadier General Brown's onrushing Brazilian infantry, who after receiving three full cavalry charges, forms into squares.

Brown's division is gradually pressed back, at which point Lavalleja's irregular cavalry disperses Abreu's Brazilian troopers on the southern flank, who take refuge behind their own 2nd Infantry Division. A second charge by Olavarria's 16th and Zufriategui's 18th Uruguayan Cavalry regiments force back the Brazilian left, while Lavalle's 4th Argentine Cavalry Regiment and the Colorados do the same farther north. When Brown's Brazilian infantry once more begins to advance, it is gradually halted by successive charges by Federico de Brandzen's 1st Regiment, José María Paz's 2nd Cavalry, and the Calado.

After six hours of confused fighting, Barbacena orders his army to retreat north toward Cacequí, having suffered 200 killed and 150 captured. Argentino-Uruguayan losses total 147 dead and 256 injured, and although they remain in possession of Rosario Ford, the bloodied invaders prefer to retrace their steps into São Gabriel by February 26.

FEBRUARY 24, 1827. Brown's Argentine squadron, returning toward Buenos Aires from Martín García Island, is sighted by a Brazilian squadron anchored off Quilmes. After an inconclusive engagement, a Brazilian schooner explodes, killing all but 3 of its 120-man crew, thus bringing this action to an abrupt end. Argentine casualties total 17 men.

FEBRUARY 28, 1827. The Brazilian warships Duquesa de Goiás, Itaparica, Escudeiro, and Constanza—commanded by the English mercenary, Capt. James Shepherd—fight their way in past Argentina's Negro River battery. Five days later (the Duquesa having run aground and been destroyed by waves), 350 men are disembarked to march inland and destroy Carmen de Patagones, 15 miles from the sea; but instead, the raiders are defeated at Caballada Hill on March 7 by Argentine forces, including a detachment of marines under the English mercenary James George Byron. Shepherd is slain, and his surviving men and ships surrender.

MARCH 1, 1827. Alvear and Lavalleja's joint expeditionary force quits São Gabriel (Brazil) to return into Uruguay at Minas de Corrales, 50 miles south of Santana do Livramento.

Uruguayan Colorados resting on their farm. (Museo Municipal de Bellas Artes, Montevideo)

APRIL 6, 1827. Brown slips out of Buenos Aires's naval base of Los Pozos with the 16-gun, 100-man, 150-ton brigantines República Argentina (flag) under Capt. William H. Granville and the 22-gun, 120-man, 250-ton Independencia under Francis Drummond; the 18-gun, 110-man, 185-ton bark Congreso under William Mason; and the 7-gun, 90-man, 150-ton sloop Sarandí under John H. Coe, hoping to evade the Brazilian blockaders and unite with the three prizes seized on the Negro River (see "February 28, 1827" entry). He plans to make a privateering cruise against Rio de Janeiro.

Instead, his four vessels are sighted the next dawn by the Brazilian corvette Maceió and run aground on Monte Santiago Bank while attempting to escape out to sea, the Congreso being obliged to turn back for repairs. Norton's 36-gun flagship Dona Paula (the ex-English East Indiaman Surat Castle) and other Brazilian warships overtake the squadron and exchange long-range volleys by 4:00 p.m., in bad weather. On April 8, the entire Brazilian fleet of 19 ships closes in and overwhelms the Argentine trio: the República Argentina suffering 3 killed and 14 wounded (including Brown) before being abandoned and set ablaze, while the Independencia loses 49 killed (among them, its captain, Drummond) and 69 injured or taken prisoner before surrendering to the Brazilians, who torch the hulk. Only the Sarandí, having sustained 17 casualties, escapes with Brown and other survivors.

APRIL 13, 1827. Alvear's 4,000 Argentine troops once more march north from Minas de Corrales—this time unaccompanied by their Uruguayan allies—to again invade the Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul in a bid to wring better negotiating terms at the ongoing peace talks. After five days' progression through steady rains, Bagé is reoccupied without opposition.

APRIL 23, 1827. Camacuã. Twenty miles north of Bagé, on the banks of the Camacuã Chico River,

1,600 Brazilian troopers are almost surprised by a nocturnal descent by 2,500 Argentine cavalymen under Lavalle. Instead, the former are able to make good their escape, suffering only 50 casualties.

MAY 7, 1827. Alvear's Argentine army quits Bagé, proceeding south to encamp two days later on the western banks of the Yaguarón River (spelled Jaguarão in Portuguese). On May 16, the general detaches Brigadier General Lavalle with the 4th and 6th Cavalry regiments to raid deeper into Brazil. The latter reaches Erval by May 21 and, four days later, turns to attack 400 Brazilian guerrillas under Chief Yuca Teodoro, who have been hounding his tracks.

Despite this token incursion, Alvear decides to take the rest of his demoralized army into barracks at Cerro Largo (modern Melo, Uruguay) on June 9, being relieved four days afterward and effectively ending all active campaigning for this year, as Argentina's exhausted government teeters on the verge of collapse.

JULY 6, 1827. At Rincón (also called Manantial, six miles outside of Tucumán), the reinstated unitarian governor Lamadrid is crushed by his Argentine rival Quiroga, having to flee northward and spend a year of exile in Bolivia.

DECEMBER 7, 1827. Norton sights the 20-gun Argentine brigantine Congreso of Cmdr. César Fournier with the captive Brazilian merchantman Harmonia dos Anjos, his Brazilian squadron chasing these two vessels until they run aground near Lara Point. The next day, the Brazilian admiral's gunboat Grenfell under Flag Capt. Isidoro Nery, the schooners Dom Paulo of Thomas Read and Bella Maria of G. Parker, plus the gunboats Esperada, 1 de Dezembro, and Victória da Colonia close in and burn this pair, while their Argentine crews escape ashore.

FEBRUARY 21, 1828. Having assumed command over the combined Uruguayo-Argentine army at Melo, Lavalleja leads a cavalry raid against Padre Filiberto Ranch—15 miles north of Jaguarão—to secure mounts. Although successful, he is pursued back into Uruguay by Brazilian units.

MARCH 23, 1828. The Brazilian Caboclo, now under the command of Capt. James Ingles, captures the Argentine privateer brig Niger.

APRIL 15, 1828. Las Cañas. Brazil's Marshal Brown crosses the Yaguarón River with three infantry battalions and three cavalry regiments, surprising and utterly routing the Uruguayo-Argentine troops bivouacked north of Las Cañas Creek under Brigadier General Laguna.

MAY 24, 1828. The Brazilian Caboclo and its prize, the Niger, capture the Argentine privateer Feliz.

JUNE 9, 1828. With Brazil's armies concentrated in its southwest, Rio de Janeiro is garrisoned by two battalions of German mercenaries: the 27th Chasseur Battalion, known as the Diabos Brancos or "White Devils," at Praia Vermelha, and the 28th Grenadier Battalion under Brig. Gen. Joaquim Thomaz Valente, Conde do Rio Pardo, in the city proper. The latter are incensed when their second-in-command, Maj. Francisco Pedro Drago, orders a soldier lashed for a minor offense. They burn down his house, then roam unchecked through the streets on June 10–11, until the brigadier general brings the Naval Artillery Brigade ashore from Ilha das Cobras and cobbles together a force of militiamen, slaves, and visiting French and British seamen. Together, they crush the mutiny on June 12, killing 12 mercenaries and wounding 50. Both battalions are later dissolved.

JUNE 16, 1828. The Argentine brigantine General Brandzen, manned by an Anglo-American privateer crew under George C. Kay, is chased aground near Lara Point and burned by Norton's Brazilian squadron. Kay and his men escape ashore, Norton losing an arm during this engagement.

AUGUST 24, 1828. The Argentine privateer General Dorrego is captured by the Caboclo and other Brazilian warships.

Exhausted by their efforts, the Argentine and Brazilian governments sign a peace treaty at Rio de Janeiro on August 27, 1828, which is ratified the next month by a national convention at the Argentine city of Santa Fe.

UNITARIAN-FEDERALIST WAR (1828–1831)

Internal strife persists within Argentina as its interior provinces struggle against the primacy of Buenos Aires and other coastal territories in the aftermath of the national defeat suffered at the hands of Brazil.

NOVEMBER 26, 1828. The first defeated Argentine contingents return into Buenos Aires from Uruguay, having lost their war against Brazil. Embittered and frustrated, General Lavalle leads a dawn revolt five days later, which seizes the Cabildo or “City Hall” and deposes Gov. Manuel Dorrego, after which Lavalle is acclaimed in Dorrego’s place in San Roque Church.

DECEMBER 6, 1828. Learning that Dorrego has united with the influential 35-year-old landowner Juan Manuel de Rosas and is marching with 2,000 men toward Santa Fe to gather more help, Lavalle appoints Admiral Brown as interim governor of Buenos Aires and sallies in pursuit of his opponent.

DECEMBER 9, 1828. Navarro. Lavalle’s 1,500 troops overtake and defeat Dorrego and Rosas’s poorly armed militiamen at Navarro. Rosas continues to retreat toward Santa Fe to unite with the federalist colonel Ángel Pacheco, while Dorrego is captured near Areco and brought back into Navarro to be shot four days later. (This execution will incite numerous counterrevolutions against Lavalle’s unitarian rule.)

FEBRUARY 17, 1829. The federalist rebel leader José Luis Molina is defeated and executed at Palmintas Lagoon near Junín by the unitarian colonel Isidoro Suárez, detached from Lavalle’s main force, which is operating south of Buenos Aires.

APRIL 3, 1829. The unitarian generals Lavalle and Paz meet at Desmochados, west of the city of Rosario, and agree that the former is to operate out of Buenos Aires and the latter out of Córdoba. Paz therefore heads to Córdoba with his Second Division survivors from the war against the Brazilians.

APRIL 12, 1829. Unitarian general Paz enters Córdoba, where he gains more recruits and raises his army’s strength to 1,000 men; he then marches westward to confront federalist general Juan Bautista Bustos.

APRIL 22, 1829. San Roque. At this hacienda on the Primero River banks, 30 miles west of Córdoba, Paz’s 1,000 unitarians engage Bustos’s 1,600 federalists. The former delegates Colonel Deheza to distract Bustos by a frontal assault with the 5th Battalion and Lamadrid’s cavalry, while circling swiftly around the federalists’ northern flank with the 2nd Battalion and 2nd Cavalry Regiment. Bustos’s army disintegrates at the speed of this attack, fleeing toward

Juan Manuel de Rosas

Juan Manuel José Domingo Ortiz de Rozas y López de Ossorio was born on March 30, 1793, in Buenos Aires. At the age of 13, he served as a boy soldier against the British invasions. However, he left the capital soon afterward to dedicate himself to the development of his family’s rural estancias or ranches around the lake of San Miguel del Monte. Despite his youth, the teenaged Rosas showed a great natural affinity for life on the Pampas. A gifted horseman, he quickly organized gauchos into a fearsome cavalry force known as the Colorados, fighting against local Indians.

Two weeks short of his 20th birthday, Rosas married Encarnación Ezcurra and restored all his family’s properties to their administrative control. Having acquired his own lands and businesses, he became very wealthy as a major cattle owner and meat exporter. He refrained from any political involvement while accumulating this fortune, until his friend and military superior, Gen. Martín Rodríguez, was challenged as governor of Buenos Aires in early October 1820. Rosas rode to his rescue with his Colorados del Monte, helping crush this insurrection in two days of heavy street fighting. Rosas also provided many thousands of the cattle that helped cement peace with Santa Fe that same November.

Eight years later, Rosas was ready to fully exert his powers. Now 35 years of age, rich, and with a huge following in the countryside, he became a leading figure among Argentina’s conservative landowning elite. A staunch federalist, he proved a fierce opponent against the liberal, foreign influences espoused by the unitarians of Buenos Aires over the ensuing decades.

La Rioja while leaving behind 30–40 dead, 200 captives, eight guns, plus their entire ammunition train.

APRIL 26, 1829. Puente de Márquez. Lavalle's 1,900 unitarian troops and four guns fight an indecisive action at Márquez Bridge over the Reconquista River against more than 2,000 federalists under Rosas and Estanislao López. Although undefeated, a beleaguered Lavalle retires to Altolaguirre, a dozen miles outside Buenos Aires, where he enters into protracted negotiations with Rosas.

MAY 8, 1829. La Rioja's federalist governor Quiroga—now nicknamed the Tigre de los Llanos or “Tiger of the Plains”—invades Córdoba Province at Serrezuela, slowly driving upon its capital from where the unitarian general Paz sallies to give battle. One month later, Quiroga eludes Paz and occupies Córdoba, then braces for Paz's inevitable assault.

JUNE 22, 1829. La Tablada. As Paz's 1,650 unitarian cavalrymen, 720 infantrymen, and 12 fieldpieces with 80 gunners approach Córdoba, they find Quiroga's 4,000–5,000 federalists massed east of the city at La Tablada. The unitarians advance in three columns, and a seesaw battle erupts. Charge and countercharge are launched until Quiroga finally attempts to smash in the unitarian left with 1,500 riders, only to be checked by Paz's 2nd Cavalry Regiment and Lamadrid's troopers, then routed by a counterattack by the unitarian 5th Battalion, which is supported by two guns.

Both armies retreat at nightfall, Paz's troops recuperating at nearby González Ranch, before resuming their advance against Córdoba the next day. Upon entering the city's streets, the unitarian “Tucumán Militia” and a squadron of “Argentine Volunteer” Cavalry are blasted by two cannon, setting off another round of fighting before the federalists are at last driven out in defeat. Over both days, Quiroga's army suffers 1,000 killed and 500 captured, his losses being considerably higher than Paz's unitarians. The latter subsequently mete out such harsh treatment to federalist sympathizers among the populace that they become dubbed Salvajes unitarios or “unitarian savages.”

JUNE 24, 1829. Lavalle and Rosas attempt to resolve their differences by signing the “Cañuelas Convention,” which calls for a cessation of hostilities and elections at Buenos Aires. Lavalle soon cancels these, though, when Rosas complains about voter intimidation. A new truce is consequently signed at Barrancas on August 24, appointing the Rosist general Juan José Viamonte as interim governor of Buenos Aires.

DECEMBER 1, 1829. Viamonte convenes the legislature at Buenos Aires, which five days later selects Rosas as governor.

EARLY JANUARY 1830. Quiroga departs Mendoza to again invade Córdoba Province, this time via San Luis and Salto. Upon reaching Oncativo (or Laguna Larga, 24 miles southwest of its capital) one month later, he pauses to be joined by Gen. Benito Villafañe advancing from the northern provinces of La Rioja and Catamarca with another 1,500 federalists. But before they can unite, Paz sallies from Anisacate on February 18 to attack Quiroga's smaller army.

FEBRUARY 24, 1830. Oncativo. Paz approaches Quiroga with 3,000 unitarian cavalrymen, 1,000 infantrymen, and 70 gunners, rejecting a last-minute mediation offer from Rosas. The federalists dig in their eight artillery pieces on the fringe of a small copse and brace for Paz's assault.

The next day, the unitarians charge in three columns, Paz concentrating most of his efforts against Quiroga's left flank. Lamadrid's 1st Division attacks first, only to be driven back. Nevertheless, continued pressure obliges the federalist cavalry to shift to their left wing, where they are smashed by a charge from Col. Juan Esteban Pedernera's 2nd Unitarian Cavalry Regiment and “Republican Lancers.” The rout is completed by Col. Luis Videla's 2nd and 5th battalions, which leaves the federalist infantry in the copse without cavalry protection. Quiroga's army disintegrates, the general himself fleeing toward Buenos Aires, while his cavalrymen are hunted down; most of his infantry surrenders.

JULY 5, 1830. Inspired by Paz's victory at Oncativo, the inland provinces of La Rioja, San Juan, Mendoza, San Luis, Santiago del Estero, Tucumán, Catamarca, Salta, Jujuy, and Córdoba form the Liga Unitaria or “Unitarian League,” also known as the Liga del Interior or “Interior League.”

JANUARY 4, 1831. In response to the formation of the Unitarian League, the federalists of Buenos Aires, Corrientes, Santa Fe, and Entre Ríos sign the Pacto Federal, thereby creating the so-called Liga del Litoral or “Coastal League.”

FEBRUARY 4, 1831. Federalist general Estanislao López marches upon the unitarian city of Córdoba.

FEBRUARY 5, 1831. Federalist colonel Pacheco surprises and defeats Colonel Pedernera's 2nd Unitarian Cavalry and other militia units at Fraile Muerto (modern Bell Ville).

MARCH 1, 1831. Calchines. Paz advances from Pilar with 5,000 unitarian troops and, 50 miles east-southeast of Córdoba at Calchines, checks the invasion by López's 2,000 federalists, compelling them to withdraw.

MARCH 5, 1831. After a stealthy approach with a small federalist force, General Quiroga carries the city of Río Cuarto by a surprise attack at dawn, accepting the surrender of its 400-man garrison under Col. Juan Gualberto Echevarría. The unitarian cavalry under 35-year-old colonel Juan Pascual Pringles has meanwhile escaped northward, although they are run down 13 days later on the banks of Río Quinto by federalist colonel José Ruiz Huidobro and annihilated at Chañaral de las Ánimas. Pringles dies on March 19 for insisting upon surrendering his sword directly to Quiroga rather than a subaltern.

MARCH 28, 1831. Rodeo de Chacón. After occupying San Luis, Quiroga's 1,000 federalists confront Col. José Videla Castillo's slightly larger unitarian army and two fieldpieces at Rodeo de Chacón in Mendoza Province. However, the unitarians are so demoralized that their San Juan Cuirassiers—all mounted on mules—join the federalist side at the very beginning of this action. Still, the unitarian infantry resists stubbornly for three hours, before finally being dispersed by repeated cavalry charges. Videla Castillo escapes, but Quiroga orders that all surviving unitarian officers be executed on the battlefield.

MAY 10, 1831. Paz is captured by federalist forces and succeeded as unitarian leader by Lamadrid at Córdoba.

NOVEMBER 4, 1831. Ciudadela de Tucumán. Quiroga's 1,200 federalist cavalymen and 450 infantrymen confront Lamadrid's 1,200 unitarian troopers and 750 foot soldiers at Tucumán, smashing both wings with cavalry charges. After a fierce struggle, the federalists seize their opponents' 10 guns and annihilate the infantry. At least 33 unitarian officers are executed following this bloody victory.

Quiroga's federalist triumph effectively ends the war, although passions linger. Little more than three years later, he is assassinated at Barranca Yaco by the brothers José Vicente and Guillermo Reinafé and Capt. Santos Pérez. As late as January 1836, a unitarian revolt is led by Gen. Javier López, who is defeated and executed on the banks of the Famaillá River by the federalist governor of Tucumán, General Heredia.

MINOR DISPUTES (1830–1838)

Although few major international confrontations ensue immediately after the War of 1812 and the Latin American struggle for independence, a number of lesser regional campaigns nonetheless erupt during this eight-year interlude.

APRIL 1830. Lircay. After achieving its independence from Spain, Chile has become riven between conservative, centralizing, landowning elements—nicknamed pelucones or “bigwigs”—who have reasserted their traditional hold over government, and liberal pipiols or “greenhorns” calling for more sweeping change.

This conflict climaxes when a small liberal pipiolo army under the 42-year-old ex-president Ramón Freire Serrano is defeated on the banks of the Lircay River by pelucón forces under 43-year-old conservative general José Joaquín Prieto Vial, as the former is attempting to oppose the traditionalists' seizure of power. After this battle, Freire is deported to Peru, and Prieto is installed as nominal president, although power actually rests in the hands of the 37-year-old policy maker Diego Portales.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1830. General Espinar, military commander for the Isthmus of Panama, declares independence from the Republic of Gran Colombia. His regime collapses two and a half months later.

APRIL 4, 1831. In the unhappy Brazilian city of Salvador, hundreds of soldiers and armed civilians occupy Fort Barbalho, calling for the ouster of the provincial commander in chief, Portuguese-born João Crisóstomo Callado. Over the next three days, as their numbers swell to 8,000 angry people, the authorities give in. However, more bloody riots ensue on April 13, spreading across the bay into the Recôncavo district before dissipating.

JULY 9, 1831. Col. Juan E. Alzuru also attempts to proclaim Panamanian independence, being suppressed 40 days later.

AUGUST 22, 1831. Before dawn this Monday morning, the 31-year-old black preacher Nat Turner launches a slave revolt in Southampton County in southeastern Virginia by slaughtering several white families in their beds. His 60 followers are defeated and scattered the next day by state militiamen, most being killed, while Turner escapes into hiding. Hysteria grips the American South, hundreds of innocent blacks being killed or imprisoned until this leader is finally captured on October 30 and hanged 11 days later in Jerusalem (modern Courtland, Virginia).

SEPTEMBER 14, 1831. In Recife (Brazil), the uncertainty and ill-will fostered during the regency in the name of the future emperor Pedro II causes the garrison's 14th Battalion to revolt overnight. Many Portuguese-owned warehouses and businesses are looted before this revolt is crushed on September 16. Some 300 pillagers are slain, while the 800 mutineers are taken in chains to Fernando de Noronha Island and then on to Rio de Janeiro to appear before the minister of war, Brig. Gen. Manoel Fonseca Lima e Silva.

DECEMBER 28, 1831. A landing party from USS Lexington of Lt. Cmdr. Silas Duncan, acting upon complaints from three American sealing vessels of having been robbed that July by Argentine residents ensconced on the Falkland Islands under its French-born governor Louis Vernet, arrives to recuperate the Americans' sealskins. Duncan also destroys the small Argentine stockade and its guns, arrests six foreign-born leaders, and forcibly removes almost 40 civilians from the settlement at Puerto Soledad, declaring these islands to be res nullius or "free of all government." Vernet resigns and never returns to the Falklands.

JANUARY 10, 1832. Bulnes's Sweep. Argentine colonel Manuel Bulnes marches into southern Mendoza Province with 2,000 troops to destroy the lairs of a band of Chilean brothers named the Pincheiras. He makes four individual forays, executing José Antonio Pincheira, plus destroying numerous Indian camps along the banks of the Atuel and Salado rivers.

APRIL 26, 1832. In Bahia (Brazil), a band of prisoners led by Benardo Miguel de Guanais takes over the city of Salvador's Forte do Mar sea castle, before being pounded into submission three days later.

OCTOBER 10, 1832. Capt. José María Pinedo, commander of the Argentine schooner Sarandí, arrives at the Falklands with a party of convicts, the authorities at Buenos Aires having decided to repopulate these remote islands as a penal colony. Shortly thereafter, however, while Pinedo's Sarandí is on patrol against trespassing American sealers, the disgruntled garrison murders their governor, Maj. Esteban José Francisco Mestivier. Upon Pinedo's return, he attempts to hunt down and bring these criminals to justice.

LATE DECEMBER 1832. Falklands Encounter. Cmdr. John James Onslow's 18-gun sloop HMS Clio arrives at Port Egmont (Falklands), having been sent by Rear Adm. Sir Thomas Baker to reclaim and administer these islands under British rule. The surprised Argentine garrison at the former Port Louis—long since renamed Puerto Soledad—on the main eastern island under Pinedo, capitulates without a shot and is removed on January 1, 1833, aboard the schooner Sarandí.

JANUARY 3, 1833. A landing party from Onslow's 18-gun Clio removes all remaining Argentines from the Falklands.

MID-FEBRUARY 1833. General Ruiz Huidobro departs El Morro near the city of San Luis with roughly 1,000 troopers, the first of three columns intended to extend Argentine influence deeper into its southwestern desert tribelands. On March 3, Gen. José Félix Aldao also quits San Carlos (south of

The Falklands

This lonely archipelago in the South Atlantic is made up of two large islands, plus some 200 smaller ones. The main islands are rugged and hilly, with irregular coastlines and many lakes, ponds, marshes, and bogs. The landscape is cold and wind-swept, with large quantities of penguins and other birds. Modern British inhabitants call themselves “kelpers” because of the large amounts of kelp. Sheep raising and wool manufacture are the economic activities. The archipelago covers some 4,700 square miles and lies less than 480 miles northeast of Cape Horn.

It was this strategic positioning that caused so many seamen in the past to take an interest. The English salvor John Strong sailed through the archipelago and landed in January 1690, naming it the “Falkland Islands” in honor of Lucius Carey, Viscount Falkland. French sailors out of Saint Malo also visited, dubbing the grouping as the Malouines in 1699. This name became transcribed into Spanish as “Maluinas,” then—because “u” and “v” were interchangeable in 18th-century script—it was changed to the Malvinas.

Finally, the French adventurer Antoine de Bougainville brought two ships to the uninhabited archipelago early in 1764 to create a settlement named Port Louis on its large eastern island. The English circumnavigator John Byron visited the western island a year later, leaving a small party behind at Port Egmont, unaware of the French presence. Meanwhile, Spain lodged a protest with Paris against Bougainville’s original colony, which the French agreed to withdraw. An expedition, therefore, was led out from Buenos Aires by Bougainville, and Port Louis was renamed “Puerto Soledad” by the Spanish on April 1, 1767. They were then surprised to learn that 100 English settlers had, in the meantime, reached Port Egmont, who they also insisted must leave.

This uneasy coexistence snapped in June 1770 when five Spanish warships disgorged 1,400 troops from Buenos Aires, expelling the British. But London threatened war in retaliation, so Madrid backed down, and a British expedition returned in April 1771 to supplant the Spaniards. Although Madrid conceded its occupation of the islands, it still insisted upon full ownership, which Britain ignored until it unilaterally decided to abandon the Falklands three years later because of the cost of maintaining such a remote outpost. The Spanish consequently resumed a token presence on the islands until 1811, when its settlers under the royal governor Gerardo Bordas were withdrawn because of the South American wars for independence.

The neutral whalers, sealers, and other vessels that had since become the most regular visitors welcomed this departure. They regarded the Falklands as free waters, even after an Argentine privateer frigate under Capt. David Jewett appeared in November 1820, informing the more than 50 ships at anchor that sovereignty was being reasserted. However, the first Argentine governor was not able to appear at Puerto Soledad until three years later, and so few people were willing to emigrate from Buenos Aires that the French entrepreneur Louis Vernet was allowed to bring in 90 colonists in 1826. When Argentina appointed him as their governor three years later, few governments recognized his title, and the stage was set for a confrontation.

Mendoza) with another 800 men, while Brigadier General Rosas leaves Monte near Buenos Aires on March 22 with 2,000 regulars.

Ruiz Huidobro only reaches as far as Trapal Lagoon before logistical problems and desertions oblige him to turn back. Aldao gains his assigned objective, the confluence of the Limay and Neuquén rivers, but otherwise achieves little. Rosas alone accomplishes any significant inroads, by sweeping between the Colorado and Negro rivers before returning home in 1834.

AUGUST 26, 1833. Matthew Brisbane, former pilot of the Argentine schooner Sarandí and now acting British “delegate” for the Falklands, is slain along with several companions by a group of rebels. These Argentine upstarts control the islands until the arrival of HMS Spartiate in January 1834.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1833. The French consul at Cartagena (Colombia) is detained by its local governor, prompting two French warships to blockade the port and threaten a bombardment, leading to the consul’s release and payment of an indemnization.

OCTOBER 31, 1833. A force of 43 U.S. marines and sailors disembark at Buenos Aires to protect American interests, remaining ashore until November 15.

JULY 26, 1834. In eastern Mexico, a small procentralist army from Campeche under Francisco de Paula Toro (one of Antonio López de Santa Anna’s brothers-in-law) defeats a force of Yucatecan secessionists at Calkiní after a bloody exchange. Nine days later, Toro’s victorious troops enter the capital of Mérida, restoring Yucatán to federal rule.

OCTOBER 1834. In the northern Brazilian province of Pará, its authoritarian new governor, Bernardo Lobo de Souza, culminates months of increasingly harsh repression by dispatching troops to arrest the popular bishop João Batista Gonçalves Campos, in the process burning the fazenda or “ranch” of his protector, the newspaper publisher Félix Antônio Clemente Malcher. The subsequent death of this prelate convinces most down-trodden cabanos (black and native lower classes) that they must overthrow this governor to free themselves from enforced labor, military impressment, and other iniquities.

NOVEMBER 1834. The province of Jujuy rises up and—covertly supported by Bolivia—declares itself independent from the rest of Argentina. Shortly thereafter, Gen. Alejandro Heredia, the governor of the province of Tucumán, also invades neighboring Salta and, in conjunction with troops from Jujuy and a Bolivian contingent under Lt. Col. Fernando Campero, defeats its Argentine governor Latorre, who is captured and then murdered while being held in prison.

JANUARY 6, 1835. Cabanagem Insurrection. As detribalized tapuios or Amazonian Indians and other cabanos (members of the lower social orders) gather from across the Brazilian province of Pará for the annual São Tomé festival in its capital of Belém, a rebellion spontaneously erupts against the rule of the hated governor de Souza. Led by Antônio Vinagre—a fazendeiro or “rancher” whose brother Manuel has recently been shot by soldiers during their expedition in search of Bishop Campos—the rebels quickly overrun this provincial capital, being joined by most of Belém’s garrison. The governor is thereupon executed, his prisoner Malcher is released and acclaimed into office in his stead, and a message is sent to Rio de Janeiro on January 16 demanding that no more appointees be sent to govern this province.

Himself a member of Pará’s dominant oligarchy, Malcher attempts to soften his followers’ demands, prevent acts of vengeance, and get them to return to work. Consequently, he, too, is overthrown on January 19, 1835, and replaced by the more populist Francisco Vinagre. The latter eventually comes into conflict with the cabanos as well, so that by June 1, power is peacefully restored to a newly designated official governor, Marshal Manuel Jorge Rodrigues (a naturalized Portuguese), who arrives with a military force. Cabano militiamen willingly forsake their occupation of Belém, but do not lay down their arms.

When Rodrigues subsequently sends troops to arrest the cabano ringleaders, further confrontations ensue, resulting in another uprising. Eduardo Angelim Nogueira, a tenant farmer on one of Malcher’s properties, leads the cabanos back to besiege Belém by August 14, 1835. They are now supported by rebellious black field hands, their joint objectives including the abolition of slavery and all coercive labor. Governor Rodrigues’s garrison is obliged to retreat offshore nine days later to Tatuoca Island, and the rebels enter the city uncontested on August 23. Many excesses are committed, most Portuguese whites fleeing. A “cabano republic” is proclaimed three days later.

Eventually, though, dissension splits the cabano ranks, after which disease and the arrival of fresh government troops on April 9, 1836, compel them to relinquish Belém four days later. By May, the insurrection is virtually ended, Angelim being captured on October 20 in his hidden camp on the Pequeno River near Lake Porto Real. Over the next four years, cabanos are ruthlessly hunted down and exterminated, ever deeper into Pará’s jungles; it is later estimated that one-fifth of Amazonia’s total population perishes during these terrible times.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1835. Farrroupilha Revolution. In Brazil’s southernmost province of Rio Grande do Sul, beset by falling prices and increased taxation, an uprising is initiated by the 47-year-old militia colonel Bento Gonçalves da Silva, whose 200 rural riders—known as farrapos or “ragamuffins” because of the fringed leather garb that these cowboys typically wear—ride in at dawn from his cousin’s Pedras Brancas estate to secure the provincial capital of Porto Alegre (population 14,000). The unpopular conservative governor Antônio Rodrigues Fernandes Braga flees, although Bento Gonçalves reiterates his loyalty to the empire only five days later. Efforts by the deposed governor to raise a local counterattack fail, so he is obliged to sail for Rio de Janeiro in defeat by October.

Imperial authority is restored in the city of Río Grande on January 15, 1836, when Dr. Marciano Araujo Ribeiro is appointed new provincial governor and the veteran liberal colonel Bento Manuel Ribeiro—once dismissed as commander of the 4th Line Cavalry Regiment because of suspected contacts with Lavalleja in Uruguay—switches allegiance and assumes military command. His imperial forces slowly press overland against the divided rebels, until Porto Alegre is retaken on June 15 by a sudden thrust led by Maj. Manuel Marques de Souza (later ennobled as Conde de Porto Alegre). However, rebel resistance persists as 33-year-old colonel Antônio de Souza Netto's "Liberal Brigade" defeats an imperial column under Col. João da Silva Tavares (later Visconde de Cerro Alegre) at Seival on September 10, and the next day proclaims the "Rio Grandese Republic." The town of Piratini in the Tapes Range is chosen as the new republican capital.

Imperial Brazilian squadron defeating the republican flotilla at Laguna. (Marina do Brasil)

When Bento Gonçalves attempts to mount a republican counterattack against Porto Alegre, his 1,500-man column is confronted 25 miles away at Triunfo on Fanfa Island on October 3, 1836, and defeated the next day by Bento Manuel. Bento Gonçalves suffers 120 dead and 200 wounded, and he is sent as a prisoner to Rio de Janeiro. Despite his incarceration, he will be elected president and commander in chief of Rio Grandese by his loyal farra-apos, who retreat into Piratini to regroup under the 31-year-old general João Manoel Lima e Silva and Colonel Souza Netto. Relentless imperial pressure by Bento Manuel nonetheless disperses these republicans as well into Uruguay by December 10.

Their cause is revived when the new provincial governor, Brig. Gen. Antero Ferreira Brito, sorties from Porto Alegre the next spring to arrest his subordinate Bento Manuel. The imperial governor is instead captured by the colonel at Alegrete's Itapevi Ford on March 28, 1837, and Bento Manuel's reversion to the republican side in turn reanimates the rebellion. A republican administration is quickly re-established at Piratini, Caçapava is captured on April 8, and Porto Alegre becomes besieged by May 13. Lacking a heavy siege train or warships, though, the republicans cannot storm its imperial garrison or starve the city into submission. In October, imperial lieutenant colonel Francisco Pedro de Abreu moreover pushes across from the beleaguered capital to seize Fort da Picada, launching repeated raids up Lagoa dos Patos or the Jacuí River to bedevil the republicans and capture supplies.

Porto Alegre's imperial defenders attempt a major breakout in February 1838, when their new commanding general Elzeário de Miranda Brito leads a waterborne expedition up the Jacuí River to circle around and take the besiegers from the rear. Although the republicans under Bento Gonçalves (who escaped imprisonment on September 10, 1837) and Col. José Mariano de Mattos must lift their siege and redeploy, they are able to reverse the imperial gains by defeating them at Rio Pardo on May 30. Porto Alegre is consequently invested once more. A second imperial sortie by General Miranda Brito is checked at the Caí River on February 1, 1839, by Bento Manuel, so the republican capital can be shifted into Caçapava two weeks later.

Imperial commanders are unable to end this stalemate because of their chronic troop shortages, conflicting fields of authority, and inadequate logistical support. Republicans are only sustained by a trickle of arms and money from the Uruguayan leader Rivera (who dreams of uniting his country with Rio Grande do Sul and the Argentine provinces of Entre Ríos and Corrientes to create a sizable new republic). Therefore, republicans try a new strategy in July 1839, whereby they transport a pair of 2-gun, 35-man vessels overland that have recently been completed at their Mendonça Ford yards on the Camaquã River. Under command of an American mercenary named John Griggs and the 32-year-old liberal Italian exile Giuseppe Garibaldi, these vessels are intended to help secure a seaport for the republic. After traversing the Lagoa dos Patos and ascending the Capaviri River, the boats are hauled across the northeastern border by cart teams, emerging six days later on the Tramandaí River in neighboring Santa Catarina Province.

Their accompanying military escort also helps the province's residents establish the so-called Juliana Republic, and Laguna is occupied. However, an imperial squadron defeats the republican flotilla on November 15, 1839, and this second republic promptly vanishes. While retiring back into Rio Grande Province, a republican column under Col. Joaquim Teixeira Nunes smashes the imperial Paulista Division out of Lages in a battle at Santa Vitória on December 14. Then the next spring, yet another new imperial garrison commander at Porto Alegre—Gen. Manoel Jorge Rodrigues—attempts to break its siege by ordering his subordinate, Brig. Gen. Izaías Bonifácio Calderon, to march from the São Gonçalo Canal near Pelotas to threaten the republican city of Caçapava. This thrust is checked, however, in an indecisive clash at Taquari on May 3, 1840, and fails to lure away any besiegers.

Bento Gonçalves and Garibaldi lead 1,200 republicans in a bloody assault on July 10, 1840, against the 600-man imperial garrison under Col. Antônio Soares de Paiva holding São José do Norte, but the movement is already disintegrating into factionalism. The coming of age of Emperor Pedro II and the installation of a liberal government at Rio de Janeiro cause many people to forsake the Farroupilha cause. Early the next year, Gen. Pedro Labatut brings an imperial division out of Santa Catarina, which finally obliges the weakened republicans to lift their three-and-a-half-year siege of Porto Alegre. Yet when the imperial general João Paulo dos Santos Barreto then tries to follow up this advantage by pushing inland with 5,000 troops from São Lourenço Ford on the Jacuí River near Cachoeira do Sul on March 4, 1841, to pursue the farrapos deep into their territory, his army is destroyed by disease, want, and desertions before it emerges at Carmo on the Ibicuí River banks by July 21.

Both sides are now utterly exhausted by their efforts. However, imperial strength is gradually rebuilt to 11,500 men, and the 39-year-old general Luiz Alves de Lima e Silva, Barão (later Duque) de Caxias, assumes overall command on November 9, 1842, fresh from suppressing liberal insurrections in Maranhão, São Paulo, and Minas Gerais. He purchases 7,000 mounts; amasses a huge flotilla of riverboats, supplies, and matériel; commissions ex-rebel officers such as Brig. Gen. Bento Manoel and Lt. Col. Francisco “Chico” Pedro de Abreu; then slowly presses back the 3,500 republican riders operating under Colonel Teixeira Nunes.

Over the next two years, steady imperial gains will slowly constrict republican territory and retake the cities of Caçapava, Bagé, and Alegrete. A string of imperial forts are also built and civilians are well treated, while generous terms are offered to rebel soldiers—including freedom for slaves. Eventually, Bento Gonçalves and his few republican diehards agree to surrender at Ponche Verde on the Santa Maria River banks on March 1, 1845. They are free to return home, and Caxias is acclaimed throughout Brazil.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1835. War of the League. In Costa Rica, the cities of Cartago, Heredia, and Alajuela—resentful of San José's growing dominance as the new national capital—band together to elect their own president and dispatch some 3,000 troops under José Ángel Soto to besiege San José. After battles on October 14 and 28, however, the army of the latter city under Col. Rafael García Escalante emerges triumphant over the league.

NOVEMBER 10, 1837. Lower Canada Rebellion.

After six months of growing turmoil and political repression, a column of mounted Anglo-Tory militiamen arrives south of Montreal in the Saint Jean in l'Acadie region (Quebec) to arrest leaders of its rural French Canadian patriote movement. Dr. Cyrille H. O. Côté and Lucien Gagnon contemplate resisting with 200–300 followers, but they demur when a company of British regulars also arrives the next day. On the morning of November 17, however, 150 patriote militiamen under Bonaventure Viger intercept 20 troopers of the Montreal cavalry as they pass through Longueuil with a pair of prisoners. These riders are fired upon, receiving numerous wounds before losing their captives; this success galvanizes many other patriotes into taking up arms throughout the district.

Gen. Sir John Colborne, British commander in chief for Lower Canada, responds by dispatching two columns to crush this insurgency, the first—300 troops and a 12-pound howitzer—reaching Saint Denis early on November 23 after marching overnight through a heavy snowstorm. The force is met by 800 patriotes under Dr. Wolfred Nelson (only 200 bearing arms), who resist and are reinforced throughout this day, eventually obliging the British to withdraw by 3:00 p.m. after suffering 6 dead, 10 wounded, 6 missing, plus the loss of their fieldpiece. Patriote casualties total 12 killed and 7 injured.

On November 25, a second British column of 406 regulars, 20 militia riders, and two cannon from Chambly under Lt. Col. George Augustus Wetherall reaches the main southern patriote stronghold at Saint Charles. Of more than 1,000 patriotes gathered under Thomas Storrow Brown, only 200 stand and fight from behind a low wall, being overrun within the hour amid great slaughter. Between 50 and 150 are slain and the rest scattered, after which the victors—having lost only 3 of their own number—retire toward Pointe Olivier and Montreal with 28 prisoners.

Colborne then masses 1,280 British regulars, 220 Canadian volunteers, and five fieldpieces to strike northward against Saint Eustache, where another 800–900 patriotes are concentrated under Amury Girod. The Anglo-Canadian vanguard arrives opposite this town by 11:00 a.m. of December 14, prompting 300 overconfident defenders to sally across its frozen river, who then break and flee when the main

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

British army suddenly materializes behind them. Only 200–250 patriotes remain to defend Saint Eustache, 70 being killed in its subsequent bombardment and assault. Colborne furthermore destroys the neighboring town of Saint Benoît the next day, effectively bringing an end to armed patriote resistance.

NOVEMBER 17, 1837. Sabinada.

In Salvador—Brazil's second largest city and capital of the province of Bahia—the 3rd Artillery Battalion, which is garrisoning Fort São Pedro, mutinies and joins the separatist movement of medical doctor and radical newspaper editor Francisco Sabino Álvares da Rocha Vieira (more commonly known as “Sabino,” thereby giving this rebellion its name). Within hours, they are joined by the 3rd Infantry Battalion, only the city's marines and part of its national guard militia units remaining loyal to the imperial government at Rio de Janeiro.

While a newly independent republic is being proclaimed at Salvador, many loyalists flee into the nearby sugar-producing region, called the Recôncavo, and begin organizing a counterrevolutionary force called the “Restorationist Army.” By the end of this same month, 1,900 Restorationists (mostly national guardsmen) are besieging the rebels inside the city, while imperial warships soon join them offshore. By December, hunger is being experienced inside Salvador, and the besiegers' numbers gradually swell to 5,000.

On March 12, 1838, the Restorationists mount an all-out assault to retake the debilitated city, inflicting hundreds of casualties in two days of heavy fighting. Final surrender comes on March 16, with Sabino being captured a week later and exiled to remote Goiás after a lengthy trial. Thousands of mulatto and black rebels are also condemned to hard labor upon Fernando de Noronha Island.

DECEMBER 4, 1837. Upper Canada Rebellion.

After months of political protest against patronage appointments and other restrictive practices, 150 men gather this Monday at John Montgomery's tavern on Yonge Street, north of Toronto (population 12,000), to spearhead an insurrection under the direction of the Scottish-born reformist newspaper editor and former mayor William Lyon Mackenzie. Alarmed at this mutinous assemblage, militia lieutenant colonel James FitzGibbon calls out loyalist volunteers that same night and sends scouts to investigate—two men being killed and numerous others captured in nocturnal skirmishes with rebel pickets.

The next day, Mackenzie advances down Yonge Street, his followers soon swelling to 1,000, wearing white armbands for identification. After burning the houses of several prominent citizens, the rebels are scattered toward evening by a volley from 27 loyalist pickets under Sheriff William Botsford Jarvis, retreating north. After both sides are reinforced by contingents from the countryside on December 6, FitzGibbon marches up Yonge Street on December 7 with 1,000 men in three columns, supported by two 6-pounders. Brushing aside 200 insurgent pickets at Paul Pry Inn (between Mount Pleasant Cemetery and modern Davisville Avenue), the loyalists then rout the few hundred disheartened insurgents remaining at Montgomery's tavern, killing two before torching this building. Mackenzie escapes to Buffalo (New York), his revolt ending in scores of arrests and the eventual execution of two of his lieutenants.

On December 13, loyalist colonel Allan MacNab's 800 militiamen further scatter another 400 rebels at Scotland (Ontario) that were raised by the Connecticut-born medical doctor and reformer Charles Duncombe, who also flees across the border into the United States.

DECEMBER 14, 1837. Mackenzie occupies Navy Island in the Niagara River (east of Chippawa, Ontario), backed by the American adventurer Rensselaer van Rensselaer and two-dozen supporters. Over the next couple of weeks, more than 425 republican volunteers reinforce this outpost, using their single cannon to fire upon 2,500 Canadian militiamen assembled opposite them under MacNab.

Noting that the 26-ton American steamer Caroline is being used to ferry supplies from Niagara Falls (New York), ex-Royal Navy captain Andrew Drew leads a 50-man boat party across to destroy this vessel. Failing to discover it anchored off the Canadian island, Drew instead boards the Caroline before dawn on December 30 at Fort Schlosser, killing one of its crew members and wounding others before setting it ablaze and towing it out into the river to sink. American public opinion is incensed by this attack in U.S. territorial waters, but Gen. Winfield Scott arrives to stifle local hostilities, while MacNab and Drew are replaced on the British side by more professional officers.

Mackenzie and van Rensselaer eventually abandon Navy Island on January 13, 1838, which is re-occupied by the Upper Canada militia two days later.

JANUARY 8, 1838. The Irish-born, self-proclaimed brigadier general Edward Theller departs Gibraltar—20 miles below Detroit, Michigan—with 200 Canadian rebels and American sympathizers to occupy Bois Blanc Island opposite Amherstburg (Ontario). The 41-year-old lawyer and militia lieutenant colonel John Prince of the 3rd Essex Regiment responds by massing volunteers on the Canadian shoreline, including a company of ex-American slaves from Windsor under Rev. Josiah Henson—later to become the inspiration for Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin.

On January 9, after gaining this island, Theller bears down upon the mainland with his schooner Anne and sloop George Strong, bombarding loyalist concentrations. At 7:00 p.m., however, his 21-man flagship Anne runs aground and is captured by the British, who discover one dead and eight wounded aboard—including Theller. Left leaderless, his followers subsequently retire to Sugar Island, on the American side of Lake Erie.

FEBRUARY 21, 1838. Mackenzie and van Rensselaer, having hoped to lead a republican army across the frozen Saint Lawrence River from Grindstone Island (New York) to Hickory Island (Ontario) and then assail the 1,900-man garrison at Kingston, instead abandon this enterprise when only 300 volunteers appear.

FEBRUARY 23, 1838. Despite efforts by the U.S. authorities to curb cross-border ventures, Duncombe slips out of Detroit with a small contingent of Canadian rebels and American republicans aboard the steamer Erie to occupy Fighting Island (below Sandwich, Ontario). The next day, he is joined by another company out of Cleveland under self-proclaimed major general Donald McLeod—an ex-sergeant in the British Army—bringing total strength up to 150 men and a 6-pounder.

Having been forewarned of this encroachment by Gen. Hugh Brady of the U.S. Army, British major Henry Dive Townshend of the 24th (Warwickshire) Regiment sallies from Fort Malden (Amherstburg) with two companies of redcoats, 400 militiamen, and a fieldpiece, traversing the ice to scatter these invaders by February 25, in the process wounding five and capturing another.

FEBRUARY 26, 1838. Self-proclaimed colonels H. C. Seward and E. D. Bradley lead 400 American republicans across the ice from Sandusky (Ohio), capturing Pelee Island (Ontario). At 6:00 p.m. of March 2, Lt. Col. John Maitland of the 32nd (Cornwall) Regiment quits Fort Malden with five companies of regulars—300 men—a pair of fieldpieces, and two companies of mounted militia to drive the invaders back. Despite heavy snowdrifts and dense woods, the redcoats succeed in scattering the republicans and capture 11, suffering 5 killed and 30 wounded among their own ranks.

MAY 27, 1838. In Costa Rica, the former president of the Central American Federal Congress, 38-year-old anticlerical liberal leader Braulio Carrillo Colina, leads Capt. José Manuel Quirós's troops from the San José barracks in a military coup that topples President Manuel Aguilar. He then pulls his nation out of the strife-torn Central American Federation by November 15, which collapses shortly thereafter.

(Four years later, the deposed federation leader, Francisco Morazán Quesada, takes his revenge by disembarking at Caldera, Costa Rica, with 500 troops on April 7, 1842, in turn driving Carrillo from office. His own forces are routed at San José, however, and he is executed by September 15. Carrillo is subsequently assassinated in exile in El Salvador on May 15, 1845.)

NOVEMBER 4, 1838. Overnight, Robert Nelson and Dr. Côté launch a second patriote uprising in French Canada, marshalling 1,500 men at Napierville (Quebec), while several hundred others assemble at various points along the Richelieu River and in the Châteauguay area. Despite carrying Beauharnois by storm, this insurgency soon falters because of factional bickering, lack of weaponry, effective loyalist opposition at Lacolle and Odelltown, plus an ill-judged patriote attempt to occupy the Mohawk village of Sault Saint Louis or Kahnawake, resulting in the capture of 64 of their men. By the time Colborne's redcoats march south out of Montreal a few days later, rebel sentiment is already ebbing, and this insurrection ceases without further fighting.

Soldiers of the 71st Highland Light Infantry Regiment conveying three patriote suspects to the Montreal jail. (National Archives of Canada)

NOVEMBER 11, 1838. This Sunday, the commandeered paddle steamer United States departs Sackets Harbor (New York), towing the schooners Charlotte of Oswego and Charlotte of Toronto with 400 American republicans aboard to attempt to raise a popular insurrection in British Canada. Led by self-proclaimed general John Ward Birge, the invaders are dubbed “Hunters” because of the secretive “hunters’ lodges” formed along the border the previous summer to organize such a venture.

At 2:00 a.m. on November 12, both schooners are released and approach Prescott (Ontario), only to sheer off when its sentries open fire. Some 200 Americans thereupon disembark a mile downriver at Windmill Point by sunup, occupying a stone mill at New Jerusalem, while electing the 31-year-old, Finnish-born, ex-French Foreign Legionnaire Nils von Schoultz as their leader. However, the 25-man armed British steamer Experiment of Lt. William Fowell prevents any further Hunter reinforcements from reaching this outpost out of Ogdensburg on the opposite bank, and the invaders become besieged by a host of British regulars and Canadian militiamen.

After repelling a direct assault on November 13, the outnumbered and isolated Americans are finally battered into submission by the evening of November 16, with 161 survivors surrendering after suffering more than 30 killed due to heavy artillery and musket fire. Eleven are eventually executed, and many others are transported to the Australian penal colony of Van Diemen’s Land.

DECEMBER 3, 1838. This evening, self-proclaimed general Lucius V. Bierce’s 250 republican followers commandeer the American steamer Champlain at Detroit, disembarking three miles above Windsor (Ontario) at 2:00 the next morning to attack 28 Canadian militiamen of the 2nd Essex Regiment under Sgt. Frederick Walsh, who are asleep in their barracks. Two defenders are killed and the building torched, along with the docked steamer Thames, while the town is occupied.

At sunrise, five companies of Canadian militia-men arrive from nearby Sandwich under Colonel Prince and Capt. John Frederick Sparke, engaging the invaders until Capt. Edward Broderick can appear from Amherstburg at 11:00 a.m. with 100 regulars of the 34th (Cumberland) Regiment, 40–50 Indian allies, and a fieldpiece. They rout the republicans, killing 21 and capturing 44, while the rest escape aboard boats toward Hog Island (modern Belle Isle). Furious at finding his friend Dr. John Hume slain, Prince orders five captives summarily executed during the heat of battle; six more are later hanged at London (Ontario), and 16 are transported to Australia.

TEXAN INDEPENDENCE (1835–1836)

Since April 1823, Texas—a remote, arid, uninhabited province historically shunned by most Mexicans—has been open to American emigration out of Louisiana on condition that new settlers accept Mexican citizenship and the Catholic faith. Within a few years, its 4,000 Mexican residents are outnumbered by 28,000 Americans, prompting the authorities in Mexico City to curtail this policy with a new law on April 6, 1830, which tries to close the border and reimpose central rule.

After incidents at Velasco and Anáhuac during June and July 1832, the Mexican colonel José de las Piedras—commander of the 12th Permanent Battalion at Nacogdoches—calls for the mostly American citizenry to be disarmed. The settlers, who often go by the name of “Texians,” refuse and instead choose 39-year-old Stephen F. Austin as their leader and request help from Louisiana. On the morning of August 2, 300 armed men under Capt. James W. Bullock descend from Pine Hill into Nacogdoches, defeating Piedras’s garrison in a daylong fight. The Mexican colonel leaves under cover of darkness for San Antonio with his battalion, but is chased down the next morning at the Angelina River by a party of riders led by 36-year-old Jim Bowie. The colonel is deposed by Capt. Francisco Medina, and his 300 demoralized troops surrender for repatriation. They have suffered 47 killed and a like number wounded, compared to only 4 Texians dead and 4 injured.

Some American settlers will subsequently try to persuade the Mexican Congress to elevate their region to the status of a state, while another, more radical faction led by the 39-year-old ex-governor of Tennessee, Samuel P. Houston, pushes for incorporation into the United States. Tensions escalate until the summer of 1835, when Antonio López de Santa Anna crushes other rebellions against his authority in central Mexico. He then sends a 1,400-man army northward under his 33-year-old brother-in-law Martín Perfecto de Cós to subdue the Texian dissidents.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1835. Col. Domingo de Ugartechea, garrison commander at San Antonio (population 2,000), detaches an 80-man cavalry patrol under Capt. Francisco Castañeda to dispossess a group of 500 Texians of their single small cannon at the town of Gonzales.

OCTOBER 2, 1835. South of Gonzales, 150 Texian militiamen under Col. John W. Moore surprise Castañeda's bivouacked Mexican troops at dawn, killing one and scattering the rest. Austin (released only that previous month from a long imprisonment in Mexico City), Houston, and other leaders proceed shortly thereafter into San Felipe to hold a Texian convention. Austin will be elected commander of a volunteer army and will issue a call to arms.

OCTOBER 9, 1835. After a brief skirmish, 50 Texians under Capt. James Collingsworth compel Goliad's 40-man Mexican garrison under Capt. Francisco Sandoval to surrender.

OCTOBER 26, 1835. After 10 days' hesitation at his Cibolo Creek encampment, Austin leads 400 men into San Francisco de la Espada Mission near San Antonio. The next day, Jim Bowie and a 31-year-old West Point dropout from Georgia named James Walker Fannin lead 92 riders in a patrol to Nuestra Señora de la Purísima Concepción de Acuña Mission, two miles south of San Antonio.

In heavy fog on the morning of October 28, they defeat a 230-man Mexican detachment in a confused three-hour exchange, killing 16 and wounding a similar number, while suffering only 1 American dead. Four days later, the bulk of the Texian army arrives under Austin and establishes its headquarters on the Alamo Canal south of the city, imposing a loose siege on Cós's unhappy garrison—comprised of only the regular Morelos Battalion and five companies of conscripts.

NOVEMBER 3, 1835. The Texian convention at San Felipe resolves to oppose Santa Anna as loyal Mexican citizens, upholding Mexico's 1824 federal constitution, furthermore calling upon other Mexican states to oppose his dictatorship as well. Austin is to be sent to the United States to raise support and recruit more volunteers, while on November 25 the ex-Indian fighter "colonel" Edward Burleson assumes overall command of the Texian army before San Antonio.

The next day, Bowie leads 60 mounted volunteers to intercept a Mexican pack train a few miles south of the city, escorted by 100 cavalymen. A running fight ensues right up to San Antonio's gates, during which the Mexicans suffer some 50 casualties, as opposed to 2 Americans. Because the captured pack train is loaded with bales of grass for the garrison livestock, this clash becomes known as the "Grass Fight."

DECEMBER 4, 1835. Cós's Surrender. After considerable delay, Burleson orders an assault against the Mexican garrison within San Antonio, only to cancel the attack at the last minute and instead propose a retirement into East Texas. Mutiny erupts, during which the honorary colonel Benjamin Rush Milam—a longtime Texas resident, originally from Kentucky—assumes leadership over a band of volunteers, proposing to storm San Antonio the next day.

At 3:00 a.m. on December 5, Milam's 210 attackers begin pressing into San Antonio's outer fringes, while Cós's beleaguered troops are distracted by a simultaneous bombardment of the Alamo. Three days of intense house-to-house fighting ensue, Milam being killed on December 8, just as the last Mexican defenders retreat into the Alamo.

The next dawn, their general sues for terms from the honorary colonel Frank Johnson, Milam's successor. Cós's capitulation is finalized on December 11, more than 1,100 defeated Mexican troops marching southward over the next few days, leaving behind 300–400 dead or deserters (as opposed to 20 Texians killed). Winter now having set in, many of the victorious Americans decamp in the erroneous belief that the war for Texian independence is largely ended.

JANUARY 7, 1836. Santa Anna reaches Saltillo in the state of Coahuila in northern Mexico to begin organizing a large army to invade Texas and reimpose his rule following Cós's defeat.

Within three weeks, Santa Anna heads northward with one cavalry and two infantry brigades, plus a siege train, to join Brig. Gen. Joaquín Ramírez y Sesma's army already operating near the Río Grande. The Mexican order of battle for the forthcoming campaign has Maj. Gen. Vicente Filisola serving as Santa Anna's second-in-command, with Brig. Gen. Juan Arago as chief of staff, plus brigadier generals Manuel Fernández Castrillán, Cós, and Juan Valentín Amador, as well as colonels Juan Nepomuceno Almonte, Juan Bringas, and José Bates, all serving as aides-de-camp. Quartermaster duties will be handled by Col. (brevet brigadier general) Adrián Woll, while the artillery is under Lt. Col. Tomás Requena, and Capt. (brevet lieutenant colonel) Ignacio Labastida is chief of engineers.

Ramírez y Sesma's army or Vanguard Brigade is comprised of 272 soldiers of the Matamoros and 274 men of the Jiménez Permanent Infantry battalions, 452 of the San Luis Potosí Active Infantry Battalion, 290 troopers of the Dolores Permanent Cavalry Regiment, plus 62 gunners for eight artillery pieces. Col. (brevet brigadier general) Antonio Gona will lead the 1st Brigade, constituted by 390 soldiers of the Aldama Permanent Infantry Battalion; 320 of the 1st Toluca, 370 of the Querétaro, and 390 of the Guanajuato Active Infantry battalions; 60 members of the Rio Grande Presidial Company; 185 Zapadores or "Sappers"; plus 63 artillerymen for six guns. Col. (brevet brigadier general) Eugenio Tolosa's 2nd Brigade is made up of 300 soldiers of the Morelos and 400 of the Guerrero Permanent

Jim Bowie

James Bowie was born into a pioneer family in Kentucky, most probably on April 10, 1796. When he was four years old, his family moved to Madrid (Missouri), then to Catahoula Parish in Louisiana by October 1801. Eight years later, his father purchased 640 acres on the Vermilion River and established a plantation near Opelousas. Big and strong, young Jim excelled at the rough-and-tumble frontier life. Around 1814, he cleared his own plot at Bayou Bouef in Rapides Parish, cutting timber for a living. Legend also says that he roped alligators, tamed wild horses, and trapped bears. Along with his older brother Rezin Bowie Jr., he volunteered for Col. Colman Martin's militia company to fight against the British at the Battle of New Orleans, arriving too late to see any action.

With the war over in 1815, the Bowie brothers visited Jean Lafitte's smuggling base at Galveston (Texas), illicitly bringing slaves back into Vermilion Bay for resale. They stopped this traffic after accumulating $65,000, investing this sum into properties during the autumn of 1819. They even imported the first Louisianan steam mill for grinding sugarcane at their 1,800-acre Arcadia Plantation near Thibodaux. Rezin now settled into married life and became the family patriarch, their father having died. He was eventually voted to the state legislature, but the younger Bowie still sought adventures.

Roaming to lawless Natchez (Mississippi) to speculate in new business, the hot-tempered Bowie confronted Maj. Norris Wright, sheriff of Rapides Parish, in an 1826 shoot-out in Alexandria (Louisiana). Bowie's pistol "snapped" or misfired, and he was wounded in the chest. His brother Rezin later visited and gave Jim a massive knife that he had designed, allegedly saying: "She won't snap." Bowie used this formidable weapon during a vicious fight on September 19, 1827. What started as a "duel" between two other men on the Vidalia Sandbar, 70 miles north of Alexandria, quickly degenerated into a bloody brawl during which Bowie was repeatedly shot and stabbed, yet he killed Wright and severely wounded another man. News of this spectacular "Sandbar Fight" made him famous, as men everywhere asked blacksmiths for a Bowie knife.

It appeared as if Bowie might settle down when he became engaged to Cecelia Welles, but she died in Alexandria on September 7, 1829, two weeks before their wedding. He therefore departed Thibodaux for Texas on New Year's Day 1830. With letters of introduction to Stephen F. Austin and Juan Martín de Veramendi, the Mexican governor of Texas and Coahuila, Bowie reached the capital of Saltillo and cheaply bought up claims to 70,000 acres of Texan wilderness. He also was baptized as a Catholic and became a Mexican citizen as of October 5, 1830, further promising the governor to bring a textile mill to Saltillo.

To finance his new start in Texas, Bowie returned to Louisiana and persuaded his brother Rezin to sell Arcadia Plantation and its 82 slaves on February 12, 1831, splitting the $90,000 payment. Jim Bowie used part of his share to buy the promised mill, then met the governor at San Antonio, marrying his daughter Ursula María on April 25. After Jim's honeymoon in New Orleans and Natchez, the Bowie brothers led a 10-man party from San Antonio on November 2 to search for the lost mines at Santa Cruz de San Sabá Mission, but they were attacked by Indians. Bowie made a second exploration westward in January 1832 as militia "colonel" at the head of two-dozen men. He played a prominent role in the Texan independence movement, although saddened by the deaths of his wife and child at Monclova (Coahuila) during a cholera outbreak in September 1833.

Infantry battalions; 350 of the 1st México, 420 of the Guadalajara, and 189 of the Tres Villas Active Infantry battalions; as well as 60 gunners for six artillery pieces. Brig. Gen. Juan José Andrade's Cavalry Brigade comprises 250 troopers of the Tampico Permanent Cavalry Regiment and 180 of the Guajuato Active Cavalry Regiment.

Brig. Gen. Juan José Urrea also commands an Independent Division made up of 300 soldiers of the Yucatán Active Infantry Battalion, 180 troopers of the Cuautla Permanent Cavalry Regiment, plus 40 members of an auxiliary cavalry troop from San Luis Potosí and another 30 from the Bajío, as well as 8 gunners manning a single artillery piece. In total, Santa Anna has 6,050 soldiers at his disposal for his invasion of Texas: 4,500 infantrymen, 1,120 cavalrymen, 190 artillerymen, and 185 sappers under 50 staff officers.

JANUARY 19, 1836. Bowie brings 30 men from Goliad into San Antonio, joining its unhappy 78-man garrison under Col. James C. Neill.

FEBRUARY 3, 1836. The 26-year-old William Barret Travis, newly appointed lieutenant colonel in the Texian cavalry, reaches San Antonio with 30 troopers to assume command of its Alamo garrison. The 49-year-old former U.S. Congressman Davy Crockett also arrives on February 8 with his 14 "Tennessee Mounted Volunteers," bringing total strength to slightly more than 150 defenders. Colonel Neill will depart on February 11.

FEBRUARY 11, 1836. News is received at San Antonio of Santa Anna's advance upon the Río Grande with a large army, which despite being delayed two days later by a two-foot snowfall, nevertheless will continue to approach swiftly.

FEBRUARY 12, 1836. San Antonio's defenders hold a vote, most volunteers electing Bowie to replace Travis as garrison commander. A drunken celebration ensues. The next day, both commanders work out a compromise.

FEBRUARY 23, 1836. Alamo. Somewhat sooner than anticipated, the first 1,500 mounted elements of Santa Anna's 2,500- to 3,000-man army are sighted at dawn, only a mile and a half outside San Antonio. Its 150 surprised Texian defenders and 25 noncombatants send a message requesting help from Fannin at Goliad before gathering inside the fortified Alamo, east of San Antonio's river. They are invested inside that same afternoon by the Mexican cavalry vanguard, and Bowie collapses the next day, suffering from an advanced case of tuberculosis. A Mexican battery consisting of two 8-pounders and a seven-inch howitzer opens fire on February 24, a loose siege being imposed, while further batteries are installed to weaken the Alamo's defenses—Santa Anna's overall effort seemingly intended at cowing its heavily outnumbered garrison into capitulation.

Skirmishes occur on February 25 and 27; then just after midnight of February 29–March 1, 32 more volunteers slip into the Alamo from Gonzales, led by Lt. George Kimball (or Kimbell, originally a New York hatter). Now realizing that the Alamo's defenders are willing to fight to the death, Santa Anna sends 1,700 men in four columns at 5:00 a.m. of March 6 to storm the Alamo's walls, Cós leads the Aldama Battalion and three companies of the San Luis Potosí Battalion against its northwestern corner; the northeastern corner is attacked by Col. Francisco Duque and Brig. Gen. Fernández Castrillán's Toluca Battalion, plus the balance of the San Luis Potosí troops; from the east come Col. José María Romero's Matamoros and the Jiménez Fusilier companies; while the light companies of the Matamoros, Jiménez, and San Luis Potosí units advance from the south under Col. Juan Morales. In reserve, Santa Anna has five grenadier companies and sappers, approximately 385 men, plus 350 cavalrymen.

After charging through the Texian artillery fire, which kills Duque and numerous others, the Mexicans gain the outer walls and eventually scale the Alamo's north side, forcing the defenders back inside their sleeping quarters—known as the "Long Barracks"—where the last few are slaughtered by 6:30 a.m. Mexican casualties total 70 men killed and 300 seriously wounded, while 182 of the 183 Texian defenders are put to death. Although a defeat, their courageous resolve inspires the cause of Texan independence and attracts many more volunteers from the United States.

FEBRUARY 27, 1836. Under cover of a rainstorm, the 40-year-old Mexican brigadier general Urrea slips into San Patricio (Texas) at the head of a 100-trooper vanguard, killing 16 and capturing 24 of its Texian defenders, while the remainder escape northward under Col. Frank Johnson.

Storming of the Alamo.

MARCH 2, 1836. The reconvened Texian convention at “Washington Brazos” declares Texas to be independent.

MARCH 3, 1836. One of Urrea’s cavalry patrols exterminates Col. James Grant’s followers at Agua Dulce, 20 miles west of San Patricio, killing 22 of his 25 men.

MARCH 11, 1836. Learning that the Alamo has fallen and that General Ramírez y Sesma is approaching with 700 Mexican troops, Houston aban-dons Gonzales with his 375 followers and a large number of refugees, retreating eastward in what becomes known as the “Runaway Scrape.”

MARCH 18, 1836. Fannin also falls back from Goliad, yet so ineptly that his 300 men and 25 cavalrymen are overtaken the next day two miles west of the Coleto River by a detachment from Brigadier General Urrea’s 600-man division. They kill 10 Texans, wound 70 (including Fannin), and compel the rest of this thirsty, tired band to surrender by March 20.

MARCH 27, 1836. Santa Anna—determined to terrify Texas into submission—orders 375 American prisoners marched out of Goliad early this Palm Sunday morning on the pretext of being paroled to New Orleans. Instead, they are shot a little distance away by Urrea's troops, only 30 surviving the massacre.

APRIL 18, 1836. Learning that Santa Anna's army has fragmented in pursuit of different fleeing Texian contingents, Houston arrives east of Harrisburg after a two-and-a-half-day forced march, close to where the unsuspecting Mexican commander in chief lies. Houston's own 780 untested troops are in an ugly mood after their prolonged retreat, yet nonetheless cross to the Harrisburg side of Buffalo Bayou the next day. By April 20, they take up a defensive position on the wooded banks of the San Jacinto River to await the Mexican army's approach.

APRIL 21, 1836. San Jacinto. After discovering Houston's army, skirmishing briefly, then emplacing his own troops opposite it, Santa Anna is reinforced this morning by General Cós, bringing total Mexican strength to more than 1,300 men and a single 6-pounder. When no action ensues by noon, the invaders repair to their encampments, assuming no fighting will occur until the next day (dawn being the traditional time for battle during this era).

But Houston instead gives the order for his troops to trail arms and silently charge the Mexican lines at 4:30 p.m., in four columns: the 260-man 2nd Texas Volunteer Regiment of Col. Sidney Sherman, 220 men of the 1st Texas Volunteer Regiment under Col. Edward Burleson, 240 of the Texas Regular Battalion under Lt. Col. Henry Millard, plus 50 cavalrymen under Mirabeau Buonaparte Lamar. They are within 200 yards of the improvised Mexican breastworks before being detected, two Texas 6-pounders—donated by citizens of Cincinnati and known as the “Twin Sisters,” manned by 31 gunners—arriving at this crucial juncture to unlimber and open fire.

Battle of San Jacinto.

Within 18 minutes, at a cost of only 8 killed and 17 wounded, Houston annihilates Santa Anna's unprepared army. Shouting “Remember the Alamo! Remember Goliad!” the Americans butcher 600–650 Mexican soldiers and capture another 730 (including a disguised Santa Anna, who flees the field but is captured the next day).

Santa Anna is compelled to sign an armistice to regain his freedom from the vengeful Texians, while his other field commanders retire into Mexico upon learning of his capitulation. Eventually, the Mexican government will repudiate this arrangement, insisting it is not valid because its terms have been extorted, yet they are powerless to reimpose their will over the Republic of Texas—which is soon recognized by the United States, Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium. Nine years later, in 1845, Texas becomes part of the United States.

WAR OF THE PERU-BOLIVIA CONFEDERATION (1836–1839)

In the years following the collapse of Spain's American empire, old jurisdictional rivalries become a source of disputes among the emergent new republics, such as when the 43-year-old Bolivian leader Andrés de Santa Cruz imposes a confederation upon Peru in 1836. This potentially powerful realignment displeases Chile, farther to the south, which in turn seeks its own secret accommodation with Rosas's Argentina.

Matters quickly come to a head when Santa Cruz's financially strapped government furthermore nullifies a treaty giving Chile preferential tariff treatment, while Peru—anxious to develop its own trade through Callao—also imposes a special tax upon goods imported via gold-rich Valparaíso. Angered by these hostile steps and by the renegade liberal general Ramón Freire's use of a Peruvian port in his latest abortive attempt to topple the Chilean government during the summer of 1836, Chile's 43-year-old de facto leader, Diego José Pedro Víctor Portales Palazuelos, orders his fleet to attack Callao, where it impounds three Peruvian vessels.

Infuriated, Santa Cruz retaliates by briefly detaining Chile's ambassador, although almost immediately releasing him with an apology. Portales, however, uses this excuse to demand that Peru pay reparations, reduce its navy, and dissolve its confederation with Bolivia. When Santa Cruz refuses, Chile declares war on November 11, 1836, despite considerable public reluctance.

FEBRUARY 13, 1837. Argentina, nursing its own separate grievances against Bolivia because of Santa Cruz's intervention in Andean insurrections (see "November 1834" entry in "Minor Disputes"), severs diplomatic relations with his government.

MAY 1, 1837. The Peru-Bolivia Confederation is officially proclaimed, Santa Cruz being recognized as its leader by both France and Britain.

MAY 19, 1837. Argentina's dictator Rosas declares war against Peru and Bolivia.

JUNE 6, 1837. The Chilean garrison at Quillota mutinies and seizes General Portales, who is on an inspection tour. Taken toward Valparaíso by the rebels, he is murdered when other garrisons refuse to join the insurrection.

AUGUST 28, 1837. Two small Bolivian cavalry units invade Argentina, capturing its isolated outposts of Cochino and Irúya.

SEPTEMBER 1837. The Argentine Cazadores de la Libertad or "Liberty Chasseurs" Battalion mutinies at Salta, being quickly put down by loyal troops under Col. Gregorio Paz.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1837. Bolivian troops occupy Humahuaca (Argentina), only to be defeated at La Herradura and driven back northward the next day by three cavalry squadrons and a company—400 men in total—under Gen. Felipe Heredia.

On September 13, Heredia's contingent also clashes two and a half miles north of Humahuaca at Santa Bárbara with another similar-sized Bolivian force under Lieutenant Colonel Campero, driving the invaders back into their territory, while killing 15 and capturing 10.

NOVEMBER 17, 1837. Paucarpata. Shortly after disembarking in Peru, Admiral Blanco Encalada's Chilean expeditionary force is defeated and forced to surrender by Santa Cruz. The Bolivian leader imposes generous terms not only for this army's capitulation, but also to end the entire war: Chile has merely to return the three Peruvian vessels it has seized and tacitly recognize the Peru-Bolivia Confederation, while in return the latter will pay part of its debt to Chile and allow Blanco Encalada's army to be repatriated. The captive commander—a former president of Chile—agrees, signing the Treaty of Paucarpata; but once his troops are home, Portales repudiates this arrangement, resumes the war, and court-martials Blanco Encalada.

DECEMBER 11, 1837. Two small Argentine and Bolivian companies clash at Vicuña, near Tres Cruces.

JANUARY 2, 1838. Argentine captain Gutiérrez defeats a tiny Bolivian contingent at Rincón de las Casillas, then occupies the village of Negra Muerta two miles farther north. Learning that a large enemy force is approaching to dispute his seizure, he withdraws under cover of darkness, watching from a safe distance as his opponents fire upon each other while storming Negra Muerta.

FEBRUARY 2, 1838. The Argentine Coraceros de la Muerte or "Death Cuirassiers" Regiment mutinies at Humahuaca, being put down by loyal forces.

MARCH 29, 1838. Argentine colonel Carrillo leads an uprising at Santiago del Estero, his forces subsequently being defeated at La Poma by Gen. Felipe Heredia.

APRIL 27, 1838. Failed Argentine Offensives. Col. Gregorio Paz departs Humahuaca with 1,000 Argentine troopers, penetrating into Bolivia and skirmishing with the garrisons at Acambuco Lagoon on May 29, at Zapatera on June 3, at San Diego on June 8, and at Pajonal on June 9. Upon closing within nine miles of Tarija, however, a superior Bolivian force is encountered, and Paz is compelled to retire. He is overtaken on June 24 and his rearguard annihilated before he can regain the safety of Argentine territory.

Meanwhile, Col. Manuel Virto marches on June 5 out of San Andrés, 35 miles east-northeast of Humahuaca, to attack Iruya with more than 1,500 men, but he, too, is defeated and obliged to retrace his route.

OCTOBER 21, 1838. A Rosist revolt occurs at Santa Fe (Argentina), led by Juan Pablo López, who deposes Governor Cullen.

NOVEMBER 12, 1838. Gen. Alejandro Heredia, governor of Tucumán Province, is assassinated at Lules by Col. Gabino Robles. Juan B. Bergeire briefly succeeds him before resigning.

NOVEMBER 20, 1838. The garrison at Jujuy (Argentina) mutinies and deposes Gen. Pablo Alemán as its governor, installing Rosist colonel José Mariano Iturbe in his place.

NOVEMBER 22, 1838. Gen. Felipe Heredia, governor of Salta, flees into neighboring Tucumán before the threatening approach of Col. José Manuel Pereda, being succeeded by Manuel Solá.

JANUARY 20, 1839. Yungay. After first being defeated at the Battle of Buin, Santa Cruz is routed at Yungay in the highlands north of Lima (Peru) by 6,000 Chilean troops under the 39-year-old general Manuel Bulnes Prieto, plus rebel Peruvian contingents under Agustín Gamarra, Antonio Gutiérrez de la Fuente, and Ramón Castilla. His rule in both Peru and Bolivia ended, Santa Cruz flees toward Ecuador aboard a British frigate, eventually dying in exile in France.

Following Santa Cruz's flight, the Peru-Bolivian Confederation is dissolved, and on February 14, 1839, Bolivia's provisional president—Gen. José Miguel de Velasco—calls for a general cessation of hostilities.

Chile's victorious General Bulnes subsequently parlayes his popularity from this war into being elected president of his homeland in 1841, serving two terms. Liberal discontent with the conservative stranglehold on power eventually leads Col. Pedro Urriola to attempt a coup in Santiago on April 20, 1851, which is put down. When Bulnes's hand-picked conservative successor, Manuel Montt, is elected into office on September 18, Bulnes's cousin, Gen. José María de la Cruz, leads the southern provinces into armed insurrection from his base at Concepción. However, the ex-president assembles an army and defeats these rebels as well at the bloody Battle of Loncomilla on December 8.

WAR OF THE CAKES OR PASTRY WAR (1838–1839)

In the chaotic years following Mexico's independence from Spain, foreign traders and investors complain to their home governments about frequent losses suffered due to its many insurrections, military coups, and civil unrest. In 1837, France sends a special plenipotentiary named Pierre Le-moine, Baron Deffaudis, to Mexico City to demand compensation for the sacking of French businesses during such disturbances and the imposition of forced loans made by rebel leaders. The Mexican government rejects this claim, arguing that it lies beyond the scope of any nation to protect foreign visitors from the vicissitudes that even its own citizens must endure.

Unsatisfied, Deffaudis quits these talks on January 1, 1838, and 15 days later takes ship from Veracruz.

MARCH 21, 1838. Deffaudis returns to Veracruz with a French squadron, anchoring off Sacrificios

Island and sending an ultimatum ashore from its flagship Herminie, demanding 600,000 pesos in compensation for a long list of wrongs. (When this note is delivered in Mexico City, popular opinion believes it to include a claim for pastries taken from the French “Remontel” Restaurant in Tacubaya by Santa Anna’s troops in 1832, hence the subsequent hostilities become derisively known among Mexicans as the Guerra de los Pasteles or “War of the Cakes.”)

APRIL 16, 1838. Blockade. The allotted time period for satisfaction having elapsed on April 15, the French squadron imposes a limited naval blockade on Veracruz, restricting entry for many items to deprive the Mexican government of revenues. The 53-year-old rear admiral Charles Baudin is sent from France to assume command over this operation, while other nations also dispatch men-of-war to look after their interests.

OCTOBER 21, 1838. After a six-month blockade, Baudin sends another communication ashore at Veracruz, leading to a face-to-face meeting at the inland town of Jalapa on November 17 with the Mexican foreign minister Luis G. Cuevas, who is willing to concede most points. The French admiral, however, demands an additional 200,000 pesos to compensate the French government for its expeditionary costs, which Cuevas refuses, so Baudin departs back toward Veracruz at 5:00 a.m. on November 21.

NOVEMBER 27, 1838. Bombardment. At 9:00 a.m., the Mexican officers Valle and Díaz Mirón board Baudin’s flagship Néréide with a last-minute offer from Minister Cuevas to renew negotiations, only to have the French admiral dismiss this proposal five and a half hours later. Five minutes afterward—while Valle and Díaz Mirón are still being rowed ashore—the frigates Néréide, Iphigénie, Gloire, the corvette Créole, and the bomb-ships Cyclope and Vulcain open fire upon Veracruz’s 153-gun, 1,186-man harbor castle of San Juan de Ulúa, using the newly developed Paixhans explosive shells.

This exchange persists until 6:00 p.m., when the bombardment slackens and finally ceases two hours later, after garrison commander Antonio Gaona requests a truce to attend to his wounded. During this afternoon, the French squadron has suffered 4 killed and 39 injured; San Juan de Ulúa, 224 casualties and 20 dismounted guns. Overnight, the French inform Gaona that his fortress will be leveled if he does not surrender; after consulting with Gen. Manuel Rincón in Veracruz at 3:30 a.m., the garrison com-

High-Explosive Shells

Scientific and technological innovations from the Industrial Age revolutionized the ancient art of gunnery. In November 1819, an inactive engineer in the French Army—36-year-old Henri Joseph Paixhans—proposed creating a better naval gun. Previously, either cannon blasted solid shot in a flat trajectory or mortars lobbed rounds high up into the air. Cannon depended upon power and muzzle velocity to be destructive. Such crude qualities were dangerous, though, when applied to hollow mortar rounds filled with powder. For these reasons, mortars had much shorter barrels and smaller firing charges, limiting their range and destructive weight.

Thanks to improved metallurgical and chemical techniques, Paixhans was able to develop a delaying mechanism, which for the first time allowed high-explosive shells to be blasted in a flat trajectory. Doubters were won over after seeing the effects of his first experimental rounds, fired into the hulk of the wooden two-decker Pacificateur at Brest in January and September through October 1824. The next year, Paixhans was recalled to active duty in the French Army as a lieutenant colonel, going on to other successes.

Meanwhile, 100 models of his “shell-gun” were ordered by the French Navy in April 1827 to test that their high-explosive rounds would not accidentally detonate in the gun barrels. Successful sea trials were conducted in October 1833 with three guns aboard the newly launched dispatch steamer Météore. The first Paixhans guns were therefore installed on French warships as of 1835. Three years later, their baptism of fire came against San Juan de Ulúa. The attackers rained 5,500 high-explosive shells upon this hapless stone fortress within five hours, causing such damage that the defenders surrendered rather than face destruction.

Thanks to this fearsome demonstration, the French Navy began casting improved shell-guns as of 1841. Some were offered for sale to Great Britain and other foreign navies. Two, 10-inch and eight, 8-inch models were purchased and installed that same year aboard the brand-new, 3,250-ton sidewheel steamer USS Mississippi. Russia also acquired the advanced weaponry. Soon, wooden warships became more heavily armored as well to better resist the powerful impacts of high-explosive rounds.

mander capitulates at 8:00 the next morning, surrendering as well a corvette, two sloops, and three brigs moored beneath its walls. By midday on November 28, the French are in possession of San Juan de Ulúa, and Rincón—with the intervention of Santa Anna, who has arrived from his nearby Manga de Clavo Hacienda—agrees to a cessation of hostilities. Baudin's vessels are allowed to refresh their provisions ashore, French citizens are promised compensation, and the blockade is lifted for eight months to permit a diplomatic resolution to each nation's grievances.

Conclusion of the French bombardment of San Juan de Ulúa, engraving by James H. Kernott. (Author's Collection)

NOVEMBER 30, 1838. When news of Rincón and Gaona's capitulation reaches Mexico City, an infuriated government orders both officers arrested and their agreement voided, followed by a vote declaring a state of war against France.

DECEMBER 3, 1838. This night, Santa Anna is informed near Veracruz of the Mexican government's declaration of war and that he is to command the 700–800 soldiers remaining in the port—out of a nominal garrison of 1,353 men—to resist the French invaders. The next morning, he informs Baudin of the rejection of the truce, and both leaders agree to refrain from hostilities until 8:00 a.m. on December 5.

DECEMBER 5, 1838. Disembarkation. During the night, the 36-year-old general Mariano Arista enters Veracruz, having ridden ahead of his 871-man relief column—which he has left encamped seven to eight miles away at Santa Fe—to consult with Santa Anna. The latter orders this contingent to advance upon Veracruz's outlying town of Los Pocitos at dawn, and both commanders turn in at 2:00 a.m.

A few hours later, they are awakened by gunfire, as Baudin sweeps down upon Veracruz's waterfront in a three-pronged assault. Boatloads of marines and sailors occupy the Santiago and Concepción bastions at the city's southeastern and northwestern corners, spiking the few guns, while other French forces advance from the wharf upon its main square. Santa Anna narrowly escapes from his headquarters at Coliseo and Damas streets, but Arista is taken, surrendering his sword to the Prince of Joinville. Baudin then besieges Veracruz's garrison within its fortress-like barracks in La Merced Square, vainly firing upon its doors with small artillery pieces to gain entry. After an hour, the French decide to retreat, hoisting a white flag to call for a truce, which the Mexicans refuse to honor.

By 10:00 a.m., Baudin has fought his way back to the wharf with his wounded to begin the reembarkation. Santa Anna arrives at 11:00 a.m. with 200 men that he has hastily formed up into a company, only to receive a blast from a French fieldpiece covering the beach, which kills nine of his men and blows off his left leg below the knee, as well as a finger off his right hand. Baudin, having suffered 8 killed and 60 wounded during his foray ashore, retires to his warships and continues bombarding Veracruz for another two hours. The Mexicans retreat out of their devastated city this afternoon, taking up positions in the dunes beyond.

DECEMBER 16, 1838. With passions at last beginning to cool on both sides, Baudin dismisses part of his blockading squadron from before Veracruz.

DECEMBER 22, 1838. Richard Pakenham, the 41-year-old British ambassador to Mexico, arrives at Veracruz to mediate the Franco-Mexican dispute. He is joined four days later by Vice Adm. Sir Charles Paget with his 74-gun flagship Cornwallis under Capt. Sir Richard Grant and the Edinburgh under William Honyman Henderson; the frigates Madagascar (46 guns) under Provo William Perry Wallis, 36-gun Pique under Edward Boxer, 28-gun Andro- make under Robert Lambert Baynes, and 26-gun Vestal under Thomas Wren Carter; the 18-gun sloops Rover under Cmdr. Thomas Matthew Charles Symonds, Modeste under Harry Eyres, and Racehorse under Henry William Craufurd; as well as the 16-gun sloops Snake under Alexander Milne and Ringdove under Acting Cmdr. Keith Stewart.

After consulting for a few days with Baudin, the British agree to withdraw part of their squadron so as to leave it on par with the French. Pakenham then departs inland on January 8, 1839, for Mexico City, eventually arranging a meeting between Baudin and the Mexican delegates Manuel Eduardo de Gorostiza and Guadalupe Victoria for March 7.

MARCH 9, 1839. Mexican and French representatives sign a peace treaty whereby the former agrees to pay the 600,000-peso compensation, while the latter restores San Juan de Ulúa to Mexican control.

ROSAS'S CAMPAIGNS (1838–1852)

In March 1835, the arch-conservative Juan Manuel de Rosas returns to the governorship of Buenos Aires, establishing a harsh dictatorship as a reaction to decades of anarchy and strife endured by the young republic. His rule is maintained by a large standing army and a paramilitary organization called the Mazorca to combat both external and internal foes.

EARLY MARCH 1838. The French vice consul in Buenos Aires submits a list of diplomatic complaints to Rosas, who in turn presents him with his traveling-papers to quit the country. However, the French representative travels only as far as Montevideo, where he boards the squadron of Rear Adm. Louis Leblanc.

MARCH 24, 1838. French Blockade. The French vice consul reappears off Buenos Aires with Leblanc's squadron, once more submitting his government's complaints to Rosas. When the latter refuses to deal, a blockade is imposed four days later.

JUNE 15, 1838. The ex-president of Uruguay, Fructuoso Rivera, invades his homeland from Brazil with a volunteer army (one-third being Argentine exiles). At El Palmar, he defeats his Blanco Party rival Manuel Oribe, forcing him back inside Montevideo.

OCTOBER 11, 1838. Eight French warships from Leblanc's blockading squadron cover the disembarkation of a Uruguayan flotilla on Martín García Island, whose 125-man Argentine garrison under Lt. Col. Jerónimo Costa is quickly subdued.

OCTOBER 23, 1838. Rivera's siege of Montevideo concludes when Oribe agrees to capitulate, setting sail for Buenos Aires two days later. Rivera's temporary new administration—he is not officially elected president of Uruguay until March 1, 1839—includes many Argentine exiles who are enemies of Rosas.

DECEMBER 31, 1838. In addition to his French support, Rivera also signs an alliance against Rosas with the 34-year-old governor Genaro Berón de Astrada of the inland province of Corrientes (Argentina).

JANUARY 20, 1839. Governor Berón de Astrada of Corrientes throws off Rosas's rule.

Manuel Oribe. (Museo Histórico, Montevideo)

FEBRUARY 24, 1839. Uruguay's president Rivera officially declares war against Rosas, seconded four days later by Governor Berón de Astrada of the Corrientes Province.

MARCH 31, 1839. Pago Largo. Rebel governor Berón de Astrada quits his Ávalos base camp near San Roque (northwest of Goya, Argentina), heading southeast toward Mocoretá in hopes of uniting with his Uruguayan ally Rivera. Instead, a loyal Rosist army under 42-year-old governor Pascual Echagüe of Entre Ríos Province quickly marches north from Calá (east of Tala) to intercept him before this juncture can be effected.

Learning of his approach, Berón de Astrada withdraws to Pago Largo Ranch, near Santa Elena southwest of Curuzú Cuatiá, bracing his 4,500 riders, 450 infantrymen, and three fieldpieces to receive his opponent's onslaught. Echagüe attacks with 5,500 cavalrymen, 360 foot soldiers, and two guns. His right wing, under 37-year-old Justo José Urquiza, defeats Olazábal's rebel division opposite, then swings behind the loyal army to help scatter Berón de Astrada's other flank under Brig. Gen. José V. Ramírez. At a cost of 55 dead and 104 injured, Echagüe's Rosist forces massacre 2,000 rebels—a huge disparity because of all the wounded and prisoners who are summarily executed as traitors, including Berón de Astrada himself.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

JULY 2, 1839. Rosas's rival Lavalle returns from 10 years of exile in Uruguay, leading 160 volunteers ashore from a French flotilla out of Montevideo to occupy the Argentine island of Martín García.

LATE JULY 1839. Echagüe invades western Uruguay from Entre Ríos Province with 5,000 Argentine troops. Rivera warily circles these invaders from a distance with his mounted irregulars.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1839. Escorted by French vessels, Lavalle sails up the Uruguay River and disembarks his 800 men a dozen miles south of Guleguaychú (Argentina) to raise an anti-Rosas revolt.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1839. Yeruá. Finding little anti-Rosas sentiment at Guleguaychú, Lavalle's small army marches north to Villaguay, then east toward Concordia, accompanied by a French flotilla in the Uruguay River. On the south side of Yeruá Creek, his 800 men are intercepted by 1,600 Rosist militia advancing from Nogoyá under the acting provincial governor, Col. Vicente Zapata.

Lavalle advances into battle in four lines, driving into Zapata's center before fanning out right and left, thus scattering his more numerous opponents.

OCTOBER 25, 1839. Lavalle safely reaches the anti-Rosist territory around Corrientes, camping at Ombú, 18 miles northeast of Curuzú Cuatiá, to be joined by Brigadier General Ferré and other rebels.

OCTOBER 29, 1839. A group of wealthy landowners revolts against Rosas, beginning at Dolores, southeast of Buenos Aires.

NOVEMBER 5, 1839. Chascomús. The Argentine rebel Pedro Castelli leads 4,000 followers north from Dolores, while three loyal Rosist columns converge upon his small army: Col. Vicente González from Monte, Col. Nicolás Granada from Tapalqué, and Col. Prudencio Rosas from Azul.

On November 6, Castelli camps on the northeastern shores of Chascomús Lagoon, east of the town of the same name, expecting to confront González's contingent. Instead, he is surprised the next day by Prudencio Rosas's 1,300 regular troops and defeated after three hours of confused fighting. Some 500 rebels are either killed or captured, Castelli figuring among the fallen, his head being exhibited upon a pike. Another 800 succeed in escaping to Montevideo aboard French ships, where they eventually join Lavalle's anti-Rosas army.

DECEMBER 29, 1839. Cagancha. After closing in upon Montevideo in early November, Echagüe finally brings Rivera to battle northwest of the capital at Cagancha, on the banks of the San José River. The Uruguayans muster 4,000 riders, 800 infantrymen, and 10 fieldpieces, compared to slightly less than 5,000 Argentine invaders with 4 cannon.

Echagüe's cavalry wings, commanded by Urquiza and Lavalleja, engage in a freewheeling series of clashes, retreats, and pursuits, leaving the Argentine infantry to receive the brunt of Rivera's 1,500-man counterattack and be defeated. Echagüe retreats from the field, having lost 480 dead and 1,000 prisoners, compared to 323 Uruguayans killed and 190 injured. Both sides furthermore lose hundreds of stray units and individual deserters, as the Argentines retire toward Entre Ríos Province.

MARCH 9, 1840. Lavalle returns to the Yeruá battlefield with greater numbers after his excursion into northern Argentina, and one week later he strikes west-southwest in search of the Rosist general Echagüe.

MARCH 26, 1840. A 150-man rebel detachment from Lavalle's army under Col. Mariano Vera is annihilated at Cayastá Creek north of Santa Fe (Argentina) by Rosist commander Juan Pablo López.

APRIL 10, 1840. Don Cristóbal. Lavalle's 3,400-man, two-gun rebel army comes upon 4,500 Rosists and a half-dozen fieldpieces under Echagüe, dug in between Don Cristóbal Creek and the Montiel Jungle southeast of Paraná, Argentina. Although preferring to commence action the next day, Lavalle is attacked this same afternoon by Echagüe's left wing, which is beaten back by a rebel cavalry counterattack. Darkness brings a halt to these confused proceedings, and the Rosists retire overnight, a few hundred casualties having been sustained on both sides.

JULY 15, 1840. Sauce Grande. The rebel commander Lavalle resumes his slow progression toward the city of Paraná (Argentina). He again encounters Echagüe's 4,500 Rosists and eight fieldpieces barring his path, this time at an encampment on the banks of Sauce Grande Creek, 20 miles southeast of this city. The advancing 3,400 rebels drive in Echagüe's pickets, then Lavalle uses his longer-range artillery to pound the Rosist lines, until his gunners run out of shells and night falls.

Hoping to resume the action at dawn of July 16, Lavalle must instead wait until midday, while a heavy fog burns off. His main effort sends 2,000 cavalrymen to drive in Echagüe's right wing, and although they defeat Urquiza's division, Oribe and Gómez's cavalry shift over from the Rosist left to contain this break. The rebel infantry then makes no headway against their counterparts in the center, and the battle ends with 500 rebel fatalities, as opposed to 150 Rosists.

Discouraged in his drive against Paraná, Lavalle veers westward, reaching the port of Diamante by nightfall to begin transferring his army out to Coronda Island, rejoining the French flotilla.

AUGUST 5, 1840. Having hurried down the Paraná, Lavalle's main body disembarks at San Pedro, while sending a smaller contingent ahead to Baradero. His 2,700 troopers and 300 infantrymen, with four fieldpieces, then reunite and advance southwest into Arrecifes, commandeering mounts along the way. After a brief respite, Colonel Videla leads one rebel column through Carmen de Areco before rejoining Lavalle's main body on August 19 at Guardia de Luján to press on together against Rosas's capital of Buenos Aires.

AUGUST 23, 1840. A 600-man rebel cavalry patrol under Colonel Vega drives 700–800 Rosist troopers under Commander Lorea out of Navarro, chasing them as far as Lobos before rejoining Lavalle at Guardia de Luján.

AUGUST 29, 1840. Lavalle hesitantly resumes his advance upon nearby Buenos Aires from Guardia de Luján, concerned by a lack of local support and the apparent strength of Rosas's garrison (greatly exaggerated through false intelligence reports). Five days later, at Cañada de la Paja—near the Morales Creek headwaters, three miles southwest of the capital—his 400-man cavalry vanguard easily scatters 200 Rosist troopers, then takes Merlo by September 5. At this point, Lavalle halts his army, convinced it is too weak to successfully storm Buenos Aires, so the next day he reverses direction to instead attack the inland city of Santa Fe.

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1840. Having learned that Corrientes has signed an alliance with the Uruguayan leader Rivera and begun to raise troops under the Argentine fugitive Paz, Rosist general Echagüe strikes across the Paraná with 5,000 troops. Paz resorts to a guerrilla campaign with his 3,000 followers, and Echagüe retires back across the river one month later.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1840. Having invaded Rioja Province to reimpose Rosist rule over the uncooperative “Northern Coalition”—which consists of this Argentine province plus Tucumán, Salta, Jujuy, and Catamarca—General Aldao’s 400-man vanguard is defeated at Pampa Redonda (also called Salinas, 90 miles south of the city of Rioja) by General Lamadrid, compelling Aldao to retire into Cuyo.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1840. Lavalle’s subordinate, Gen. Tomás de Iriarte, approaches Santa Fe with a 1,000-man vanguard, clashing with its 700 Rosist defenders under General Garzón. The latter capitulates two days later, upon the approach of the main rebel army.

OCTOBER 29, 1840. The signing of the Arana-Mackau Treaty puts an end to France’s differences with Rosas, the former being granted all their demands. In exchange, the naval blockade is lifted, and Martín García Island is restored to Argentina; Uruguay and the rebels, therefore, are left to fight on alone.

NOVEMBER 28, 1840. Quebracho Herrado. After a gruelling nine-day march to Romero in Córdoba Province (Argentina), Lavalle’s 4,250 rebel cavalymen—1,200 being on foot—350 infantrymen, and four fieldpieces are overtaken and attacked at Quebracho Herrado by 2,000 Rosist riders. The latter prove to be merely the vanguard of Oribe’s 4,900 cavalymen, 1,600 infantrymen, and five guns, which charge the rebel left wing repeatedly before finally breaking through, disintegrating Lavalle’s line. Through logistical error, the rebel artillery only has a few rounds, so this rout goes completely unchecked. At a cost of 36 dead and 50 wounded, Oribe kills 1,500 rebels and captures another 500, along with all their artillery and baggage trains. Devastated, Lavalle and Lamadrid retreat northwestward with 1,500 survivors.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

JANUARY 19, 1841. Sancala. Colonel Videla’s 1,500 rebels and two fieldpieces, resting at Sancala (50 miles west-northwest of Córdoba, Argentina), are surprised at dawn by Gen. Ángel Pacheco’s 1,100 Rosists. At least 400 rebels are killed and several dozen others captured, while the remainder disperses.

MARCH 20, 1841. After a successful guerrilla campaign, Col. Mariano Acha’s 400 rebel troopers are surprised at Machigasta (Argentina) by Gen. Nazario Benavídez’s Rosist forces and dispersed.

MAY 24, 1841. With the withdrawal of the French blockade, Admiral Brown sorties from Buenos Aires with an Argentine squadron to bottle up the smaller Uruguayan Navy—under a hired American commodore named John H. Coe—inside Montevideo. On May 24, Coe emerges and encounters Brown three miles south of the Uruguayan capital, engaging from 10:00 a.m. until sunset, when he returns into port. Both the Uruguayan flagship Sarandí and the Pereyra sustain some damage, whereas the Montevideano is unable to regain port and is beached the next morning to prevent its capture. The next night, May 25–26, the crew of the Uruguayan schooner Palmar mutinies and carries their vessel into Buenos Aires.

JUNE 20, 1841. The rebel governor Brizuela is killed at Sañogasta, 45 miles west of the Argentine city of Rioja, when his 600 troopers are defeated by Rosist general Benavídez.

AUGUST 3, 1841. On this afternoon, Coe’s Uruguayan squadron sorties and has a three-hour confrontation with Brown’s Argentine warships, five miles south of Montevideo. Action ends at nightfall; the Uruguayan schooner Rivera collides with another vessel while reentering port and is lost.

AUGUST 13, 1841. Angaco. Having captured the Argentine city of San Juan, Colonel Acha sorties with 500 troopers to confront the 2,100 Rosists approaching in diverse contingents under Aldao and Benavídez. Three days later, 20 miles northwest of this city at Angaco, he surprises and defeats 400 advance riders under Benavídez, prompting Aldao to lead his 600 cavalymen and 700 infantrymen on a forced march through the desert to engage him.

Although outnumbering the rebels, the Rosist general’s initial cavalry charges against Acha’s flanks prove too feeble to be effective, and when his infantry also becomes embroiled, it soon has to form a defensive square. Eventually, the attackers suffer 1,000 killed and 157 captured, as opposed to only 200 dead among Acha's ranks.

Despite this brilliant feat of arms on August 16, the rebel colonel is in turn surprised two days later on the outskirts of San Juan by Benavidez, whose 700 men smash into Acha's 250-man force and drive it to seek shelter inside nearby buildings. Eventually, the colonel and 100 survivors surrender on August 22; Acha is then executed and beheaded in San Luis Province on September 15.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1841. Having chased Benavidez out of San Juan, rebel general Lamadrid occupies the city of Mendoza (Argentina), then a couple of weeks later sorties 15 miles eastward to await Pacheco's approaching Rosist army at Rodeo del Medio.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1841. Rosist general Echagüe marches out of Villaguay with 5,000 men to invade the rebel Corrientes Province.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1841. Famaillá. After a lengthy pursuit through Tucumán Province, Lavalle's 1,300 rebel riders, 70 infantrymen, and three fieldpieces are overtaken by General Oribe's 1,700 Rosist cavalrymen, 700 infantrymen, and three cannon. Although still having the Famaillá River as a barrier between them, Lavalle adopts the desperate expedient of crossing upstream overnight, positioning himself west of his opponent in hopes of gaining some advantage.

Although the initial Rosist cavalry charge against the rebel left is broken the next morning, the issue is nonetheless decided within an hour. The rebel army crumbles, suffering 600 killed and 480 captured, while Lavalle escapes into Jujuy with 200 riders.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1841. Rodeo del Medio. Lamadrid's 1,200 cavalrymen, 400 infantrymen, and nine fieldpieces are dug in three-quarters of a mile behind a swamp with a single bridge, which Pacheco's 1,200 cavalrymen, 1,800 infantrymen, and 10 guns are nonetheless able to cross, despite enemy artillery fire. Once in position, the cavalry on Pacheco's right are driven back by Álvarez's initial rebel charge, yet recover when several Rosist squadrons are shifted over from the left to contain this development.

Meanwhile, Pacheco's left outflanks its rebel opponents, after which Lamadrid's outnumbered infantry are decimated by the Rosist troops opposite them in the center. Only 18 Rosists are killed and 80 wounded, while the rebels suffer 400 casualties and another 300 captured before being driven from the field. Having lost all his artillery and baggage trains, Lamadrid flees across the Andes into Chile with 100 followers.

OCTOBER 9, 1841. Lavalle is killed in Jujuy by a chance round.

OCTOBER 28, 1841. Echagüe's Rosist army reaches Pago Largo, southwest of Curuzú Cuatiá, prompting rebel general Paz to retire north behind the Corrientes River and dig in to cover its Caaguazú Ford. The Rosists encamp opposite, six miles upstream, and both armies remain in proximity for the next month.

NOVEMBER 26, 1841. Caaguazú. Determined to break the stalemate with his Rosist opponent Echagüe, Paz slips across the Corrientes River after nightfall with approximately 5,000 men and a dozen fieldpieces. On the morning of November 27, he sends out a 500-man cavalry patrol but is discovered by Echagüe, who deploys his own 5,000 men and 12 guns to attack the rebels, whose backs are still to the river.

Battle of Caaguazú.

However, on the morning of November 28, the rebel left wing under Núñez launches an attack against the Rosist right, then deliberately retreats, drawing Gómez's counterattack into a bottleneck between the river and a nearby swamp. A carefully stationed infantry battalion and two cannon then allow the rebel cavalry to ride between them, opening up a withering fire upon their pursuers. While the Rosist right is thus being destroyed, Núñez continues in a sweeping arc far to the west, gradually outflanking Echagüe's left. When this formation begins to crumble, the Rosist center is doomed, Echagüe's army being destroyed and suffering 1,350 casualties, plus the capture of 800 men, nine guns, and all their supply trains.

DECEMBER 9, 1841. The Uruguayan squadron under Coe battles Brown's Argentine blockaders 15 miles south of Montevideo, this engagement ending after four hours when a storm blows up. The 12-gun, 106-man Uruguayan brigantine Cagancha is unable to regain port along with its consorts, so it is chased down the next day and captured off Ortiz Bank by the brigantine Echagüe under Capt. Joaquín Hidalgo.

Joaquín Hidalgo. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

DECEMBER 15, 1841. Echagüe is replaced as Rosist governor of Entre Ríos Province by Urquiza.

DECEMBER 21, 1841. Uruguayan and Argentine warships exchange long-range volleys between Indio Point and Montevideo, this action ending indecisively after several hours.

JANUARY 11, 1842. After its Caaguazú victory, Paz's rebel army invades Entre Ríos Province.

JANUARY 20, 1842. Rivera crosses the Uruguay River with 2,500 troops, threatening to trap Urquiza's remaining 600 Rosists between himself and Paz. The loyal governor therefore evacuates Entre Ríos Province at Gualaguay, allowing the city of Paraná to fall into rebel hands.

MARCH 1842. Rather than pursue his advantage, rebel governor Ferré returns into Corrientes to demobilize his army; Paz does the same.

APRIL 1842. Rosist governor Benavídez of San Juan Province defeats the Argentine rebel Ángel Vicente "El Chacho" Peñaloza—who has invaded from Chile—at Cuesta de Miranda, nine miles south of Sañogasta.

APRIL 12, 1842. Rosist general Oribe defeats Juan Pablo López—now a rebel—at Coronda, then again at Aguirre Ford four days later, compelling the latter to retire into Corrientes.

MAY 1842. Oribe crosses the Paraná River near the city of this same name with 7,000 Rosist troops.

JUNE 26, 1842. The exiled Italian revolutionary Garibaldi, now the new commander of Rivera's navy, sweeps past Martín García Island with three small Uruguayan warships, exchanging shots with its Argentine garrison for two hours before disappearing up the Paraná River. His mission is to carry armaments into Corrientes Province and revive its flagging rebellion against Rosas.

JULY 18, 1842. The Argentine rebel Peñaloza is defeated once again by Rosist governor Benavídez, this time near Tucumán (Argentina).

JULY 19, 1842. Garibaldi's squadron clashes with an Argentine flotilla under Maj. Juan F. Seguí at Bajada del Paraná but presses upriver nevertheless—little damage is sustained on either side.

AUGUST 15, 1842. At Costa Brava, opposite San Juan Creek on the borderline between Corrientes and Entre Ríos provinces, Garibaldi's Paraná incursion is brought to an end when his flotilla is overtaken by Brown's Argentine river squadron. Outnumbered, Giuseppe Garibaldi ties up his vessels and entrenches ashore, only to be defeated by a disembarkation force under Brown's subordinate, Lt. Mariano Cordero. The next day, his ammunition gone, Garibaldi blows up his Constitución and Pereyra, retiring north with the survivors and eventually regaining Montevideo overland.

OCTOBER 1842. At Paysandú (Argentina), Uruguayan president Rivera signs an alliance with the rebel governors Paz, Ferré, and Juan Pablo López.

DECEMBER 6, 1842. Arroyo Grande. After entering Entre Ríos Province on November 20 to bolster its anti-Rosas rebellion, President Rivera's 5,500 Uruguayan–Argentine cavalymen, 2,000 infantrymen, and 16 fieldpieces are confronted south of Concordia at Arroyo Grande by 6,500 Rosist troopers, 2,500 infantrymen, and 18 guns under his old political rival Oribe (see “June 15, 1838” entry). Brigadier General Urquiza commands the loyalist right wing, Ángel Pacheco, the center, and José María Flores, the left.

Their attack commences when Oribe's infantry advances upon Rivera's center, smashing through, thus splitting the Uruguayan–rebel army. Flores's cavalry then defeats and disperses its opponents on the left, while Urquiza's seesaw struggle on the right is eventually decided when the victorious Rosist infantry moves to his support, taking his opponents in the flank. Rivera is routed, suffering 2,000 killed and 1,400 prisoners, while being pitilessly chased back into Uruguay. Oribe only endures 300 total casualties, this disparity in losses being explained by the numerous executions carried out upon the battlefield. Urquiza occupies the city of Corrientes with a flying cavalry column, installing Dionisio Cabral as its new Rosist governor.

LATE DECEMBER 1842. Oribe advances into Uruguay with his victorious Rosist army, leading one contingent to besiege his former capital of Montevideo and detaching another to keep Rivera in check.

JANUARY 3, 1843. Brown's Argentine squadron sorties from Buenos Aires to begin blockading Montevideo in anticipation of the arrival of Oribe's besieging army.

JANUARY 7, 1843. An Argentine flotilla deposits 200 troops at Paysandú (Uruguay) before reversing course and penetrating eastward along the Negro River to support Oribe's approaching army.

JANUARY 15, 1843. The Argentine rebel Peñaloza is defeated by Rosist governor Benavídez in a clash at Illisca, 100 miles south of the city of La Rioja, then again two days later farther west at Saquilán.

JANUARY 29, 1843. Some 2,500 Argentine troops disembark and seize Colonia (Uruguay).

FEBRUARY 16, 1843. Siege of Montevideo. Oribe's Argentine army reaches Cerrito, three miles north of the Uruguayan capital, to institute a siege. This operation is complicated by the fact that most of the large foreign colony within Montevideo rallies to its defense: 2,000 Frenchmen under Col. Jean Thiebaut, 600 Italians under Colonel Garibaldi, plus 500 Argentine exiles under Eustaquio Díaz Vélez, swelling its garrison under General Paz to 7,000 men.

More importantly, the Royal Navy squadron of Commo. Brett Purvis—anchored in the harbor since January 7—refuses to allow Brown to blockade Montevideo and declares that any British-born subjects serving aboard Argentine warships (a significant percentage of their skilled seamen) will be condemned as traitors if caught in action against the Union Jack. This threat is sufficient to cause Brown's squadron to retire into port, rendering the ensuing Argentine land siege useless.

MARCH 10, 1843. Oribe's troops begin their first landward assaults against Montevideo's defenses.

MARCH 31, 1843. Joaquín Madariaga invades Corrientes Province from Rio Grande do Sul with 110 Argentine exiles, marching upon its capital while gathering up a host of adherents and deposing its Rosist governor. When Col. José Miguel Galán marches to the latter's relief with 1,600 Rosist troops, they are ambushed and defeated at Laguna Brava, 18 miles east of this capital, by 600 of Madariaga's rebel partisans.

LATE MARCH 1843. Santa Lucía. Having gathered 5,000 mounted irregulars on the banks of the Santa Lucía River northwest of Montevideo, Uruguayan president Rivera is challenged by the approach of 4,000 Argentine cavalymen under Urquiza, supported by small contingents of infantry and artillery. Rather than give battle, the Uruguayans melt away, preferring to employ guerrilla tactics against the invaders.

MAY 8, 1843. The Argentine rebel Peñaloza is defeated by Rosist governor Benavídez at Leoncito, 75 miles northwest of the city of San Juan, prompting him to recross the Andes into Chile.

JUNE 1843. London having disavowed Purvis's threats against the Argentine Navy (see "February 16, 1843" entry), Brown sorties from Buenos Aires and imposes a blockade against Montevideo.

DECEMBER 1843. The Argentine rebel Madariaga invades Entre Ríos Province from Corrientes with 4,500 troops, hoping to depose its Rosist governor Garzón and thereby create difficulties in the rear of Oribe's and Urquiza's armies, which are fighting in Uruguay. On December 30, Madariaga crosses to the east side of the Uruguay River, seizing Salto—which has been abandoned the previous night by its Rosist garrison—and presenting this prize to Rivera.

JANUARY 17, 1844. Some 2,000 Argentine rebel riders from Corrientes Province endure an indecisive clash with 1,300 Rosist troops under Governor Garzón at Arroyo Grande (Entre Ríos Province); action concludes at nightfall.

JANUARY 24, 1844. Arroyo Sauce. After an arduous three-day ride, Urquiza's Argentine cavalry column disperses 3,000 Uruguayan irregulars gathered at Sauce Creek under Rivera.

FEBRUARY 15, 1844. Two battalions sally from beleaguered Montevideo, damaging Oribe's Argentine siege works.

MARCH 28, 1844. Gen. Venancio Flores succeeds in breaking the Argentine siege lines around Montevideo with 2,000 men and four fieldpieces.

APRIL 24, 1844. Arroyo Pantanoso. Garrison commander Paz attempts to break Oribe's siege of Montevideo, committing 7,800 troops to a surprise three-pronged assault against the encircling lines.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

His plan is to cut off Pacheco's Argentine contingent holding the commanding 400-foot Cerro Hill across the bay, then annihilate Oribe's reserves near Arroyo Pantanoso or "Swampy Creek" as they hasten to the rescue. Instead, Paz's operation breaks down, the 2,000 men sent by boat to outflank Pacheco disembarking so noisily as to forewarn the enemy, after which the main body of infantry falls back into the city at the mere threat of an Argentine cavalry charge.

JULY 4, 1844. General Paz resigns as Montevideo's garrison commander, emigrating to Rio de Janeiro.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1844. Capt. Philip F. Voorhees of the 52-gun, 1,867-ton frigate USS Congress seizes the Argentine blockading vessels 9 de Julio, Americano, and 25 de Mayo off Montevideo for having fired upon an American merchantman that he is convoying. (Voorhees will be court-martialed the next year for this action, eventually being restored to his full rank by President James K. Polk.)

MARCH 27, 1845. India Muerta. After patiently stalking his opponent, Argentine general Urquiza finally surprises Rivera's 3,000 mounted irregulars at India Muerta Creek south of Mirim Lagoon with his own slightly smaller contingent of troopers. With their first charge, the attackers drive in the Uruguayan left and center, and Urquiza commits his reserve against their right, turning the battle into a rout. Rivera suffers 400 killed and 500 captured, along with the loss of his supply train; he retires northward into the safety of Brazil's Rio Grande do Sul Province.

APRIL 18, 1845. The British plenipotentiary Robert Gore Ouseley and French representative Pierre Lemoine, Baron Deffaudis, reach Buenos Aires, jointly laying their respective governments' protests before Rosas—in particular, complaining against the protracted siege of Montevideo, which affects their citizens' commercial interests. The Argentine dictator refuses to oblige, so the diplomats withdraw.

LATE JUNE 1845. Argentine rebel Juan Pablo López invades Santa Fe Province from Corrientes with 700 troopers to raise an anti-Rosas revolt. By the time he reaches the town of Andino north of Santa Fe, López's numbers have swelled to 1,500—including 600 Indian warriors—and he pulverizes a Rosist force that has sallied under Santa Coloma.

JULY 6, 1845. López's Argentine rebels fight their way into the city of Santa Fe, while Rosist governor Echagüe awaits reinforcements from Argentina.

JULY 22, 1845. Anglo-French Intervention. Off Montevideo, a combined British and French squadron under Commo. Sir Thomas Sabine Pasley of the 36-gun, 1,000-ton Curaçao seizes Brown's Argentine blockaders, then hands these vessels over to the Uruguayans. The prisoners are paroled by their captors on condition that they will not take up arms against the Anglo-French entente.

AUGUST 12, 1845. After chasing the Argentine rebel López out of Santa Fe, Governor Echagüe's 3,000 Rosists overtake López's army at San Jerónimo or Mal Abrigo, inflicting a stinging defeat that drives this force even farther north.

AUGUST 31, 1845. Garibaldi's Incursion. Having gone aboard the three Argentine prizes seized by the Anglo-French squadron, Colonel Garibaldi sets sail from Montevideo with 700 Italian volunteers, 200 Uruguayan infantrymen under the 35-year-old colonel Lorenzo Batlle, and 100 cavalymen to re-occupy nearby Colonia.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1845. Garibaldi's flotilla seizes the Argentine island of Martín García before proceeding up the Uruguay River.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1845. The British and French announce a blockade of Argentina's shorelines along the River Plate.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1845. Having advanced up the Uruguay River, Garibaldi's 1,000 Italian and Uruguayan troops disembark and sack Gualeguaychú (Argentina).

LATE OCTOBER 1845. Garibaldi seizes Salto (Uruguay), remaining for a few months with his small army while skirmishing against local Argentine units under Urquiza, Díaz, and Servando Gómez.

Eventually, the Italian adventurer's depleted forces are confronted on February 8, 1846, at San Antonio Chico Creek outside Salto by 250 infantrymen and 1,000 riders under Gómez. Garibaldi's outnumbered legionnaires entrench themselves in a derelict tannery called Tapera de Don Venancio, while his cavalry under Col. Bernardino Baez begins the clash at noon with a charge into the enemy ranks, only to

Giuseppe Garibaldi

Giuseppe Garibaldi was born on July 4, 1807, in Nice, an Italian seaport conquered 15 years earlier by France. The second son from a family of Ligurian fishermen and coastal traders, young Giuseppe was raised for the sea. At the age of 14, he was enrolled in the Genoese maritime school and obtained his merchant captain license by 1832. The next April, he was anchored in the Russian Black Sea port of Taganrog with his schooner Clorinda. In a dockside tavern, he met the political exile Giovanni Battista Cuneo, who persuaded Garibaldi to join the Giovine Italia or "Young Italy" movement. This secret society was formed to free the fractured Italian states from Austrian domination.

In November 1833, Garibaldi met the equally passionate Giuseppe Mazzini in the Swiss border city of Geneva. Mazzini advocated Italian unification into a liberal republic. Garibaldi joined his Carbonari revolutionary movement. When Mazzini attempted a revolt in the Piedmont district in February 1834, it failed. Garibaldi was among those sentenced to death in absentia by a Genoese court, so he fled to Marseilles and then on to Tunisia by March 1835.

The next year, he set sail for Brazil under an assumed name. Disembarking in its southernmost province of Rio Grande do Sul, Garibaldi gathered some 50 fellow Italian exiles and, in the summer of 1837, joined its ongoing Farroupilha Revolt against Brazilian imperial rule. A couple of years later, he also started to help Uruguay resist the Argentine dictator Rosas, leaving the Farroupilha to take up residence in besieged Montevideo by 1841. At first he supported himself by trading and teaching mathematics, but by the next summer he was entrusted with command of the city's small naval squadron.

His fame was attained when Montevideo became closely invested by Oribe's Argentine army in February 1843. Garibaldi quickly raised 600 volunteers, known as the "Italian Legion," to help in its defense. Their black flag represented Italy in mourning, with a depiction of Mount Vesuvius to symbolize its dormant strength. Garibaldi uniformed his legionnaires with a consignment of bright red shirts, originally intended for delivery to the Buenos Aires slaughterhouses.

become dispersed. Garibaldi's Italians then successfully fend off repeated assaults until midnight, inflicting a couple hundred casualties while suffering 100 of their own. Retiring into Salto, news of his victory is smuggled into beleaguered Montevideo, so heartening its defenders that he is promoted to general on February 16 for his efforts.

NOVEMBER 8, 1845. Paraná River Offensive.

Having been instructed by their home governments to establish free navigation up the Paraná—which Rosas has long stifled out of Argentine self-interest and commercial animosity against Paraguay as well as the hinterlands of Uruguay and Brazil—an Anglo-French expedition departs Martín García Island. The force includes shallow-draft vessels capable of driving past the Argentine batteries installed about 60 miles below Rosario, north of the town of San Pedro and south of Ramallo, at Vuelta de Obligado (literally, “Obligatory Turn”).

Cmdr. Bartholomew James Sullivan aboard the 8-gun, 428-ton Philomel leads the 6-gun, 1,100-ton English paddle steamers Gorgon under Flag Capt. Charles Hotham and Firebrand under James Hope; the 18-gun, 492-ton sloop Comus under Acting Cmdr. Edward Augustus Inglefield; the 3-gun, 318-ton Dolphin under Lt. Reginald Thomas Jonathan Levinge; and the 1-gun Argentine prize schooner Fanny under Lt. Astley Cooper Key. The French squadron consists of the 2-gun, 650-ton paddle steamer Fulton under Lieutenant Mazères; the 8-gun, 200-ton Argentine prize San Martin under François Thomas Tréhouart; the 16-gun sloop Expéditive under Lieutenant Miniac; the 10-gun Pandour of Lieutenant Duparc; and the 4-gun Argentine prize Procida under Lieutenant de la Rivière. This flotilla is carrying an additional 70 Royal Marines under Capt. Thomas Hurdle, plus three fieldpieces.

NOVEMBER 11, 1845. The rebel Argentine province of Corrientes signs a military alliance with Paraguay.

NOVEMBER 18, 1845. The Anglo-French expedition anchors two miles below the Argentine defenses at Vuelta de Obligado, Commander Sullivan and Lieutenant Mazères reconnoitering this position and finding it formidable: 24 large armed hulks held together across its half-mile width by triple chains; four batteries on the west bank; plus two gunboats and the schooner Republicano guarding the eastern bank. Mansilla, the Rosist general in charge, commands 2,500 troops—including two squadrons of cavalry, 600 infantry regulars, and 300 volunteer militiamen.

On the morning of November 20, Sullivan weighs anchor with the Philomel, the Expéditive, the Fanny, and the Procida, advancing past Tréhouart’s heavier division with the San Martin, the Comus, the Pandour, and the Dolphin. Hotham is to remain in reserve with the steamers Gorgon, Firebrand, and Fulton until the chains have been burst, as they might foul his propellers. The Dolphin dashes directly upstream, drawing much of the Argentine fire until being passed by Tréhouart’s 100-man San Martin, after which all the attackers drop anchor opposite the batteries and return fire. Because of the strong current and faint breeze, most vessels struggle to reach their assigned positions. Ten Argentine fire vessels are released at 10:50 a.m., drifting harmlessly past the allies, at which point Hotham and Mazères join the action.

Battle of Vuelta de Obligado.

The Republicano is set on fire and abandoned by its crew at 11:30 a.m., blowing up three-quarters of an hour later. In the middle of the battle, Hope of the Firebrand leads three boatloads of men aboard the 16th hulk from shore, chopping through its cables to open a gap through which the Fulton passes, followed by the Gorgon and the Firebrand. From here, Hotham rakes the northern Argentine batteries, silencing them by 5:00 p.m. One hour later he sets 180 British seamen, 145 Royal Marines, and 135 French sailors ashore, who oblige the defenders to retreat—wounding Mansilla in the process, who is replaced by Col. Ramón Rodríguez. By the next morning, all the defenses have been occupied, at a cost of 24 dead and 72 wounded among the allied force. Rosist losses are 250 dead, 400 wounded, plus several hundred deserters or stragglers.

JANUARY 2, 1846. Rosist general Urquiza departs Concordia with 6,000 troops, marching north into Corrientes Province to defeat the Argentine rebel Paz before the latter's 4,000-man, 14-gun army can be reinforced from Paraguay.

JANUARY 16, 1846. At Las Osamentas Creek northwest of Pago Largo, an advance contingent of Urquiza's troops surprise a rebel cavalry force after a nocturnal march, dispersing them.

JANUARY 20, 1846. Part of the Anglo-French expedition reaches Corrientes on the Paraná River, from where Hotham continues as far as the capital Asunción (Paraguay) aboard the French Fulton.

FEBRUARY 4, 1846. A 1,200-man rebel cavalry screen is scattered at Laguna Limpia northeast of Bella Vista by 600 Rosist troopers riding ahead of Urquiza's army. Among their prisoners is Juan Madariaga, brother to the rebel governor of Corrientes Province, who is released the next day with a peace proposal.

General Paz, however, is to be excluded from these negotiations, so Urquiza continues against his defensive positions at Ubajay (north-northwest of Loreto, south of the Paraná River). They are judged to be so large and impregnable, though, that Urquiza orders a full-scale retirement back toward Entre Ríos Province by February 12.

FEBRUARY 8, 1846. Garibaldi's small army, comprising four companies of his Italian Legion and some irregular cavalry under Col. Bernardino Báez, is overtaken on the banks of San Antonio Chico Creek by 1,200 Oribista pursuers under Gen. Servando Gómez and the Argentine colonels Cesareo Domínguez and Nicolás Granada. Garibaldi digs in around the abandoned Don Venancio tannery, successfully resisting after his cavalry is scattered by Gómez's opening charge at noon. The next day, Garibaldi resumes his retirement down the Salto River.

APRIL 2, 1846. The British Philomel fights its way past the new Argentine batteries installed at San Lorenzo on the Paraná River.

APRIL 4, 1846. Governor Madariaga demotes Paz as commander of the rebel forces in Corrientes Province.

MAY 16, 1846. Hotham assembles a convoy of 110 merchantmen at Bajada de Santa Fe, to be escorted down the Paraná past Rosas's Argentine batteries at San Lorenzo.

JUNE 4, 1846. Hotham's convoy works its way past the Argentine batteries at San Lorenzo, which are distracted by hidden rocket batteries installed on an uninhabited island by Lt. Lauchlan Bellingham Mackinnon of the Alecto. (As a reward for their services in reaching Paraguay, Hotham is eventually made Knight Commander of the Bath, while Tréhouart is promoted to rear admiral in February 1847.)

JULY 1846. The British plenipotentiary Thomas Samuel Hood reaches Buenos Aires to attempt to negotiate an end to Anglo-Argentine hostilities, only to be rebuffed by Rosas.

AUGUST 14, 1846. Governor Madariaga signs a treaty at Alcaraz with Rosist general Urquiza whereby the rebel Corrientes Province rejoins Rosas's rule on condition that it will not have to take part in the ongoing hostilities against Uruguay, England, or France. Paraguay's independence is also recognized by this document.

MAY 1847. English and French representatives reach Buenos Aires to renew attempts to reach a diplomatic solution with Rosas.

JULY 15, 1847. Britain lifts its blockade against Buenos Aires, leaving France to maintain its own.

OCTOBER 1847. President Rivera is driven out of Uruguay.

OCTOBER 20, 1847. Rosist general Urquiza once more invades Corrientes Province, departing his Calá base camp east of Tala with 6,000 troops. During his advance, Correntine colonel Nicanor Cáceres switches sides and joins these invaders on the border, as does Cmdr. Juan Verón at Mercedes and Col. Juan Francisco Soto at the Corrientes River.

NOVEMBER 27, 1847. Vences. At the small Vences Ranch, deep in the jungle 50 miles east-southeast of the city of Corrientes, the provincial governor Madariaga digs in with 4,100 riders, 900 infantrymen, and 12 fieldpieces—his army's morale being particularly low. Urquiza arrives to attack with 6,000 Rosist cavalrymen, 500 foot soldiers, and seven cannon.

A frontal assault by two infantry battalions, a cavalry squadron, and two guns under Rosist commander Francia ties down the Correntine defenders, allowing huge flanking movements to penetrate the jungle on both sides and take Madariaga's followers by surprise. The effect of these cavalry columns pouring down upon the Correntine rear, plus enfilading salvos from a five-gun battery hidden in the trees, breaks the defenders' will and causes a wholesale flight. Some 500 Correntine soldiers are killed and another 2,100 captured, the rest dispersing into the jungle.

DECEMBER 14, 1847. Urquiza installs the 35-year-old general Benjamín Virasoro in the capital of Corrientes as its new Rosist governor.

JUNE 15, 1848. France lifts its blockade of Buenos Aires.

NOVEMBER 24, 1849. Britain signs a peace treaty with Rosas.

AUGUST 31, 1850. Admiral Lapredour signs a peace treaty with Rosas on behalf of the French government.

APRIL 5, 1851. Following Rosas's election to a fourth term as president, and amid growing fears about Buenos Aires's domination over the rest of Argentina, Governor Urquiza of Entre Ríos Province contacts other leaders about a possible revolt.

MAY 1, 1851. Urquiza proclaims Entre Ríos Province to be in open rebellion against the Rosas dictatorship.

MAY 29, 1851. At Montevideo, Urquiza signs a military alliance with Brazil and Uruguay, promising to help the latter in their ongoing war against Oribe's 14,000 troops, which, thanks to support from Rosas, hold most of that country (except for its capital city).

JULY 26, 1851. Uruguayan Campaign. Urquiza begins mustering 7,500 troops near Paysandú and then, two days later, crosses the Uruguay River to attack Oribe from the rear. He is soon joined by Rosist deserters and Uruguayan patriots, bringing his strength up to 9,000 men.

AUGUST 16, 1851. From Buenos Aires, Rosas officially declares war against Brazil for its intervention in Argentine affairs.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1851. Having encountered no opposition in Uruguay, Urquiza reaches the town of

Europe's Year of Revolutions

The Sicilian city of Palermo exploded into revolt on January 12, 1848. Crop failures, food shortages, and unemployment were the spark. Yet anger had also been brewing in the kingdoms of Europe for decades, with calls for social and political reforms. Industrial innovations had already changed many workers' lives, while new ideals such as liberalism and socialism were being raised in the popular press. Inspired by the Sicilians, an uprising ensued in Paris on February 22. Within two days, King Louis Philippe fled to England, after which a French Republic was proclaimed.

Revolution spread into Hungary, Bohemia, the Rhineland, and most of Central and Eastern Europe by March 1848. Vienna, Berlin, Milan, Venice, and every other city with more than 100,000 residents had some kind of violent uprising. Among the agitators adding to these upheavals was 29-year-old Karl Marx, whose Communist Manifesto was published in German on February 21. Most monarchs agreed to concessions, gathering delegates to begin constitutional change. But when so many diverse groups were involved, they soon fell out along class or ethnic lines. Urban working-class revolutionaries enacted radical socialist measures, which were rejected by the middle class or rural peasantry. Proposals for unifying the scores of German, Austrian, or Italian principalities were resisted by regional factions.

The anarchy unleashed by this revolutionary wave led to disenchantment. A conservative assembly was elected in France as early as June 1848, which sent troops into the streets of Paris to crush dissent. The Habsburg emperor reimposed his rule over his Austrian and Italian territories, while King Friedrich Wilhelm IV dissolved his Prussian "Constituent Assembly" by December. Although some reforms such as voting privileges were retained, no real gains were achieved. The year 1848 would be remembered as the "Year of Revolutions" or the "Spring of Nations."

Thousands of rebels fled, joining the millions of poor migrants leaving Europe for the New World. They settled in Argentina, Brazil, and the United States, bringing their beliefs into their new countries.

Durazno, while a 16,000-man Brazilian army crosses the frontier from Santana do Livramento to join him.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1851. Urquiza's huge army contacts Oribe, and after almost a month of negotiations, the latter capitulates at Pantanoso on October 8, bringing the Uruguayan civil war to a close. His Argentine followers are incorporated into Urquiza's ranks, while the Uruguayans agree to serve the government in Montevideo.

DECEMBER 17, 1851. An 11-vessel Brazilian river squadron under Adm. John Greenfield fights its way past General Mansilla's 1,500 Rosist defenders and 16 guns at Tonelero (north of San Pedro, on the Paraná River), disembarking the 1st Brazilian Division to establish a beachhead.

Shortly thereafter, 5,000 of Urquiza's cavalymen also cross farther upriver from his base camp at Diamante to pave the way for his main body. No opposition is encountered.

DECEMBER 28, 1851. Urquiza's main army begins embarking at Diamante, traveling down the Paraná River to land and reassemble at Espinillo, between Rosario and San Lorenzo, by January 8, 1852.

JANUARY 10, 1852. Urquiza's "Aquino" Division—formerly under Oribe in Uruguay (see "September 13, 1851" entry)—mutinies and kills its officers at Espinillo, fleeing into Santos Lugares to rejoin Rosas.

JANUARY 15, 1852. Urquiza departs Espinillo, beginning his offensive against Buenos Aires. Three days later, his army traverses Medio Creek, encountering no resistance from Rosist forces, who continue to fall back as the invaders gain Pergamino, Chivilcoy, Luján, and Márquez Bridge (over the Conchas—the modern Reconquista—River).

JANUARY 31, 1852. A 3,000-man cavalry detachment under Juan Pablo López clashes with 3,500 Rosist troopers under Col. Hilario Lagos at Álvarez Fields, six miles west of Márquez Bridge, killing 200 and capturing a similar number before the latter retire into Santos Lugares.

FEBRUARY 3, 1852. Caseros. At long last, Rosas decides to make a stand just southwest of Buenos Aires at the Caseros's family estate, on the banks of Morón Creek (modern grounds of the National Military College), with 12,000 cavalymen, 10,000 infantry, and 1,000 gunners and auxiliaries manning 56 artillery pieces. Urquiza traverses this creek during the morning with his own slightly larger army of 28,150 Argentines, Uruguayans, and Brazilians, and after drawing up in battle array, personally leads a devastating charge at 9:00 a.m. by 10,000 riders from his right wing. They destroy Rosas's left and consume his reserves during a vain attempt to check this onslaught.

Battle of Caseros. (Ministerio da Defesa, Brazil)

Although the Rosist right and Brigadier General Díaz's infantry and Chilavert's batteries resist tenaciously, the rest of this army disintegrates, leaving Urquiza triumphant by early afternoon. Wounded in one hand, Rosas flees from the battlefield, his army having suffered 1,500 casualties and 7,000 prisoners, plus the loss of all its artillery, provisions, and equipment. Urquiza's losses are 600 dead and wounded; the next day he designates Vicente López y Planes as governor of Buenos Aires, and will parade his army through its streets by February 20.

Following his defeat and resignation from office, Rosas flees into the British Embassy in Buenos Aires on the same evening of this battle, with his daughter Manuelita; Ambassador Robert Gore conducts them aboard the man-of-war Centaur in the harbor. The fallen despot is transferred shortly thereafter aboard the Conflict and sails with some loyal retainers a few days later for England, living out the remaining 25 years of his life as an exile at Southampton. His dictatorial methods and restrictive economic policies, which initially maintained his regime, in the end hastened its fall.

SIMMERING CONFRONTATIONS (1839–1844)

Minor outbursts continue to erupt throughout Central and South America—especially in Mexico, which is gripped by worsening political anarchy after its recent humiliation at the hands of France, while still feebly attempting to reconquer its lost province of Texas.

MAY 18, 1839. Angered by the centralist tendencies and increased taxation imposed by the Mexico City government, a brief revolt occurs in the state of Jalisco and is quickly suppressed.

MAY 29, 1839. Another anticentralist uprising erupts in Yucatán, where a leader called Santiago Imán besieges the town of Tizimín until November 11, before finally carrying this place. After a month-long occupation, his followers are dispersed eastward into the jungles.

FEBRUARY 17, 1840. Rebel colonel Sebastián López de Llergo arrives outside Yucatán's capital of Mérida and is allowed inside three days later by the defection of Col. Anastasio Torrens's garrison at the San Benito Barracks. This juncture of López de Llergo and Torrens so emboldens the separatist cause that the state legislature soon after severs relations with Mexico City.

APRIL 2, 1840. A small separatist expedition appears out of Yucatán under López de Llergo and Imán, blockading and laying siege to Campeche's centralist garrison. The defenders request terms by June 6, capitulating 10 days afterward.

JULY 15, 1840. At 2:00 a.m., Gen. Juan José Urrea—incarcerated in Mexico City's old Inquisi-torial headquarters for abetting the French cause during the recent "War of the Cakes"—is broken out of confinement, then leads troops from the 5th Battalion and Comercio Militia Regiment in an assault against Anastasio Bustamante's palace, capturing the latter in bed and proclaiming Gómez Farías as the new president. However, the army chief of staff, Gabriel Valencia, along with generals Antonio Mozo and Juan Nepomuceno Almonte, lead a loyalist counterattack from the Ciudadela Barracks, opening fire upon the rebels with their artillery. During the night of July 15–16, Bustamante moreover cuts his way free with 28 dragoons and, after a fortnight of further street fighting that inflicts many civilian casualties, compels Urrea to surrender and retire north into the state of Durango.

NOVEMBER 18, 1840. Panama, under Col. Tomás Herrera, declares its independence from the Republic of New Granada (Colombia), a secessionist effort that collapses three months later.

AUGUST 8, 1841. In a prearranged coup, the 44-year-old Mexican brigadier general Mariano Paredes y Arrillaga—military commander at Guadalajara—rises against President Bustamante, being joined shortly thereafter by Antonio López de Santa Anna at Veracruz. Paredes marches upon Guanajuato with 600 men and receives the defection of Brig. Gen. Pedro Cortázar. They then proceed together toward Querétaro to incorporate Gen. Julián Juvera's garrison into their ranks, swelling rebel numbers to 2,200 men.

Santa Anna meanwhile occupies Perote with a few hundred troops, while General Valencia mutinies with another 1,200 inside Mexico City itself, seizing the Ciudadela and Acordada barracks. The beleaguered president fights back with 2,000 loyal troops and a dozen guns, calling for reinforcements from the countryside, while civilians flee out of the line of fire. Although his following eventually numbers 3,500 men, Bustamante is driven out of the capital by September 20, resigning nine days later to go into exile in Europe.

OCTOBER 1, 1841. Yucatán contemplates declaring independence from Mexico, while furthermore signing peace and commerce treaties with the Republic of Texas—which reciprocates by sending armed gunboats to help protect Yucatán's coastline.

FEBRUARY 6, 1842. The British brig Jane and Sarah and sloop Little William are boarded and ransacked by five of General Carmona's Colombian warships while at anchor off Zapote near Cartagena. The 6-gun, 55-man Royal Navy brig Charybdis of Lt. Michael de Courcy is sent to demand satisfaction and, in an hour-long engagement, seizes the Colombian flagship—a corvette—while inflicting 26 fatalities. He then sinks a brig and captures three schooners before blockading Cartagena's roadstead. De Courcy is promoted for these actions.

MAY 7, 1842. Having failed to arrive at a reconciliation with Yucatán, Mexico's Congress severs relations with this breakaway province.

AUGUST 22, 1842. Yucatán Rebellion. A Mexican expedition escorted by the British-built steamers Guadalupe, Moctezuma, and captured Yucateco arrives before the Gulf port of El Carmen to begin subduing the rebel provinces of Campeche and Yucatán. This outpost surrenders by August 30, and a 4,000-man army then advances northeast through Champotón, Seybaplaya, and Lerma under Vicente Miñón without encountering any resistance.

At Campeche, however, the centralists meet 3,500 separatist defenders under Santiago Méndez, who compel them to settle in for a lengthy siege. Miñón is eventually recalled on January 29, 1843, because of his inactivity, being replaced by Matías de la Peña y Barragán.

AUTUMN 1842. Texas Incursion. Gen. Adrián Woll—an ex-Napoleonic officer—leads a Mexican raid across the border against San Antonio. When the Republic of Texas attempts to retaliate by marching against Santa Fe (New Mexico), their entire 270-man expedition is captured at Antón Chico and Laguna Colorada, subsequently being marched south into incarceration within the fortress of El Perote.

SEPTEMBER 1842. While lying at Callao with Capt. James Armstrong's 44-gun, 1,600-ton frigate United States and 20-gun, 200-man, 790-ton sloop Cyane, the veteran commander of the U.S. Pacific Squadron—Commo. Thomas ap Catesby ("Tac") Jones (see "September 16, 1814" entry in "War of 1812")—receives seemingly reliable information as to an outbreak of hostilities between the United States and Mexico because of border frictions involving the Republic of Texas. Concerned lest California be preemptorily seized during this confrontation by British or French interests, he sets sail northwestward.

OCTOBER 19, 1842. Jones's War. At 2:45 p.m., the American commodore drops anchor in Monterey, determined to launch a preemptive strike. The few ships in port are consequently taken as prizes of war, and at 4:00 p.m., Armstrong is sent ashore under a flag of truce to demand the Mexican garrison's surrender. Ex-Gov. Juan B. Alvarado and Capt. Mariano Silva command only 29 soldiers and 25 raw recruits, plus 11 nearly useless cannon within their tiny redoubt, so agree to capitulate that same night. The next morning, Jones lands 150 men and a band, marching inland to occupy this position, which is renamed Fort Catesby.

Mariano Paredes. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

By the next day, however, it becomes obvious even to Jones that there is no state of belligerency between both nations, so he restores all his captures. Notwithstanding this unwarranted action, his subsequent stay in California is not altogether unfriendly, although he is eventually recalled by an embarrassed—though not altogether reproving—government in Washington.

LATE JANUARY 1843. Growing dissatisfaction against the more than two decades of misrule by Haitian president Jean-Pierre Boyer sparks an insurrection at Les Cayes, which quickly gains momentum throughout the countryside, obliging Boyer and his family to board the English corvette Scylla at Port-au-Prince by the evening of March 13 to sail away into exile on Jamaica. An insurgent army under the mulatto leader Charles “Rivière” Hérard Sr. enters the capital shortly thereafter in triumph, yet will prove unable to govern.

FEBRUARY 4, 1843. After the newly arrived centralist Mexican general de la Peña decides to reinvigorate the Campeche siege by detaching General Andrade five miles eastward with 800 troops into the town of Chiná, this force is surprised by 500 separatist troops under Lt. Col. Manuel Oliver. In a ferocious exchange, some 400 men are slain on both sides, plus many others wounded, before the separatists retreat into Campeche.

MARCH 25, 1843. De la Peña disembarks 2,500 centralist troops at the tiny port of Telchac (north-central Yucatán), hoping to surprise its capital of Mérida from the rear. Although able to overrun Motul, he is checked at Tixcocab by López de Llergo on April 10, then compelled to seek terms two weeks later at Tixpéhual. De la Peña's army reembarks at Chicxulub by May 26, sailing away in defeat.

JUNE 26, 1843. The 39-year-old Cuban-born centralist general Pedro Ampudia y Grimarest lifts the siege of the separatist garrison within Campeche, retreating by sea toward El Carmen.

FEBRUARY 27, 1844. Heartened by the political chaos gripping Haiti in the wake of the deposal of President Boyer, the disgruntled Spanish-speaking subjects on the Dominican side of the island seize the “Puerta del Conde” bastion in the city of Santo Domingo to once more proclaim their independence. This secession is promptly challenged by a three-pronged Haitian invasion, which is successfully repelled by a Dominican army under the wealthy rancher and general Pedro Santana.

The fledgling “Dominican Republic” nonetheless remains so overmatched that Santana and a number of like-minded conservatives in the “National Junta” request annexation as a protectorate of France—or at least offer to make territorial concessions for a coaling station in Samaná Bay, a long-standing interest of that nation.

APRIL 15, 1844. Because of fears of a preemptive Mexican invasion of the Republic of Texas before it can be annexed by the United States, Commo. David Conner is ordered to concentrate his squadron in the Gulf of Mexico. When the U.S. Senate subsequently rejects this treaty of annexation on June 6, his vessels are withdrawn.

JUNE 2, 1844. Defeated by the Dominicans, rejected by black Haitian peasants, and deposed at Port-au-Prince with the acclamation of the octogenarian Philippe Guerrier as interim president, Hérard has no choice but to forego his Archaie military camp and board the British corvette Sparta to follow his predecessor Boyer into exile.

JUNE 9, 1844. To prevent the Dominican Republic's submission to France, the more liberal and nationalistic Trinitario faction, from the northern part of the island, stages a coup in the capital of Santo Domingo, deposing the junta leader Tomás de Bobadilla and other leading conservatives; yet the liberals' attempt to impose Esteban Roca as commander of the army is rejected by its rank and file, so Santana is reinstated.

OCTOBER 30, 1844. In Guadalajara, Paredes—en route to take up a new command in Sonora—agrees to spearhead a revolt against Santa Anna's regime. He is backed one week later by the Aguascalientes garrison, joined by the Mazatlán garrison on November 7, backed by the Zacatecas and Colima garrisons the next day, and then joined by the Durango and Querétaro forces on November 10.

NOVEMBER 22, 1844. Santa Anna's Overthrow.

Santa Anna marches northwest out of Mexico City toward San Juan de los Lagos with a small army to confront the rebel Paredes, who has reached Mochiltic (state of Querétaro) with 4,000 troops. On December 6, the Batallón de Reemplazos or “Reserves Battalion” also revolts in its Acordada Barracks in the capital, sparking a general uprising against Santa Anna’s 50-year-old handpicked “interim president,” Gen. Valentín Canalizo, who is arrested. The next day, the mutineers select 52-year-old general José Joaquín de Herrera as the new president of Mexico.

By early January, Santa Anna gives up all hope of reclaiming power, so he departs with his shrunken army and a small cavalry escort toward Veracruz. En route, he disguises himself as a muleteer, but he is recognized upon reaching Naolinco. He is detained in Perote Castle until banished to Cuba on June 3, 1845, aboard the gunboat Victoria.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN WAR (1846–1848)

When the U.S. Congress votes on March 1, 1845, to accede to American settlers’ wishes and annex the Republic of Texas, Juan Nepomuceno Almonte—the 41-year-old Mexican ambassador in Washington—requests his passport five days later to depart in protest, as his nation still regards Texas a breakaway province. Three weeks of wrangling ensue between the American and Mexican governments, culminating on the last day of that same month when Mexico severs diplomatic relations.

MARCH 20, 1845. Conner’s squadron—consisting of the 50-gun, 480-man, 1,700-ton frigate Potomac of Capt. John Gwinn; the 22-gun, 190-man, 700-ton sloop Falmouth of Cmdr. Joseph R. Jarvis; and the 10-gun, 80-man brig Lawrence (364 tons) of Cmdr. Samuel Mercer and Somers (260 tons) of Cmdr. Duncan N. Ingraham—is ordered back into Mexican waters.

APRIL 18, 1845. Conner anchors off Antón Lizardo, southeast of the port of Veracruz.

EARLY MAY 1845. The 50-year-old commodore Robert Field Stockton arrives at Galveston (Texas) with his 13-gun, 166-man, 670-ton, propeller-driven flagship Princeton under Cmdr. Frederick Engle, plus a small flotilla, for a two-month visit.

JULY 4, 1845. Anglo-Texans accept the U.S. terms for annexation.

JULY 23, 1845. To match Mexico’s military build-up near the mouth of the Río Grande—apparently threatening the peaceful annexation of Texas by the United States—61-year-old brevet brigadier general Zachary (“Old Rough and Ready”) Taylor departs Fort Jesup in Louisiana with 1,500 troops of Lt. Col. Ethan Allen Hitchcock’s 3rd Infantry Regiment and other auxiliaries. Their transport steamer, the Alabama, is escorted by the 22-gun, 210-man, 960-ton sloop St. Mary’s of Cmdr. John L. Saunders.

JULY 25, 1845. Taylor arrives at Aransas Inlet near Saint Joseph’s Island and, after some difficulty in disembarking, encamps six days later at Corpus Christi, near the Nueces River mouth—traditionally regarded by Mexicans as the Texan border.

AUGUST 24, 1845. Taylor is joined at Corpus Christi by 300 troopers of 59-year-old colonel David E. (“Old Davy”) Twiggs’s 2nd Dragoon Regiment, who have traveled overland from Louisiana via San Antonio. By late October, Taylor’s contingent will consist of 3,500 regulars: four infantry regiments, one dragoon regiment, and four artillery regiments—half the peacetime U.S. Army.

OCTOBER 30, 1845. Stockton departs Hampton Roads in Virginia aboard the 54-gun, 480-man, 1,860-ton frigate Congress of Cmdr. Samuel F. Du Pont to round Cape Horn and become second-in-command in the Pacific to 64-year-old commodore John D. Sloat. The latter is lying at Mazatlán (Mexico) with the 50-gun, 480-man, 1,700-ton frigate Savannah of Capt. James Armstrong; the sloop Cyane of Capt. William Mervine; the 22-gun, 210-man, 1,020-ton sloop Portsmouth of Cmdr. John B. Montgomery; the 20-gun, 200-man, 790-ton sloop Levant of Cmdr. Hugh N. Page; the 24-gun, 190-man, 690-ton sloop Warren of Cmdr. Joseph B. Hull; the 12-gun, 100-man, 200-ton schooner Shark of Lt. Neil M. Howison; and the 4-gun, 43-man, 610-ton store-ship Erie of Lt. James M. Watson.

OCTOBER 31, 1845. To help facilitate a reconciliation with Mexico, Conner withdraws his squadron from off Veracruz.

NOVEMBER 29, 1845. The ex-Louisiana congressman John C. Slidell arrives at Veracruz aboard the St. Mary's to reopen diplomatic contacts with the Mexican government.

DECEMBER 14, 1845. Frustrated in his attempts to mobilize an effective fighting force at San Luis Potosí, Paredes revolts against President Herrera, marching upon Mexico City with his small army. Herrera is abandoned by his troops, so Paredes enters the capital uncontested on January 2, 1846, to be acclaimed president.

MARCH 5, 1846. The 32-year-old explorer and brevet captain in the U.S. Engineers, John Charles Frémont—already gaining fame as “the Pathfinder” and son-in-law to the influential Missouri senator Thomas Hart Benton, a close advisor to newly inaugurated President James Knox Polk—approaches Monterey out of the Santa Cruz Mountains with a 60-man survey party to refresh supplies.

Although approved by the Mexican authorities, Frémont's visit is peremptorily canceled when he is a mere 25 miles away, and he is ordered to leave California. He instead entrenches atop Gavilán (modern Frémont) Hill northeast of Salinas and is besieged by a 350-man force under Gen. José María Castro. After four days of bombastic exchanges, the Americans begin withdrawing north toward Oregon, under cover of darkness.

MARCH 8, 1846. Taylor, having been authorized to move his 3,500 troops south from Corpus Christi—deeper into disputed territory—orders his vanguard to break camp this Sunday. He follows with segments of his main body over the next few days. The first American troops sight Point Santa Isabel by March 24, finding supply ships awaiting them in the Gulf of Mexico; the vanguard also enters the town of El Frontón, which has been ominously torched and evacuated by its 280-man Mexican garrison.

Zachary Taylor. (Library of Congress)

Four days later, the U.S. expedition reaches the Río Grande and receives a frosty reception from Col. Francisco Mejía, commander in Matamoros, who considers this American advance an invasion of Mexican territory. He is nevertheless not empowered to do anything more than observe as Taylor erects a 2,200-man camp opposite him, named Fort Texas. (Mejía's own strength consists of 3,000 men of the 1st and 10th Infantry, 2nd Light Infantry, and 7th Cavalry regiments; a sapper, plus several border guard companies; a battalion of Matamoros militiamen; and 20 guns. Other units are soon on their way to reinforce him.)

MARCH 30, 1846. Having failed to reach any agreement with the Mexican government, Slidell departs Veracruz aboard the 10-gun, 260-man, 1,700-ton paddle-steamer Mississippi of Capt. Andrew Fitzhugh.

General campaigns of the Mexican-American War.

APRIL 4, 1846. Mexico's war minister, José María Tornel y Mendivil, appoints major general and former president Mariano Arista to organize an "Army of the North" to confront Taylor's incursion. Shortly thereafter, Arista sets out from Monterrey (Nuevo León) with diverse bodies of troops, marching for Matamoros.

APRIL 11, 1846. Arista's vanguard—1,000 cavalymen and 1,500 infantrymen under de Ampudia—reaches Matamoros and, two days later, orders Taylor to begin retiring north to Corpus Christi within 24 hours. The American general refuses and, in turn, directs his warships out into the Gulf of Mexico to blockade the Río Grande, cutting off seaborne supplies for the Mexican army.

APRIL 17, 1846. The Lawrence and the Texas revenue cutter Santa Anna turn back the schooners Equity and Floridian, which are approaching Matamoros from New Orleans with provisions for the Mexican forces. Upon learning of this action five days later, de Ampudia lodges a formal protest.

APRIL 23, 1846. Paredes declares a "defensive war" against the American intervention, and Arista orders Gen. Anastasio Torrejón to cross the Río Grande a few miles upstream of Taylor's encampment with 1,600 cavalrymen. The American general responds by dispatching a reconnaissance patrol of 63 dragoons under Capt. Seth Thornton, which is ambushed at Carricitos the next day by 200 Mexican troopers, suffering 16 killed and the remainder captured.

APRIL 29, 1846. This night, Capt. Samuel Walker's 77 volunteer Texas Rangers clash with Mexican irregulars, suffering 10 killed.

MAY 1, 1846. Fearful that he is about to be encircled by a Mexican flanking maneuver, Taylor leaves the 7th ("Cotton Balers") Infantry Regiment of 58-year-old major Jacob Brown and two, four-gun batteries to hold Fort Texas, and commences a 30-mile forced march northeastward this afternoon with his remaining 2,300 men and 300 wagons to fall back and bolster his detached coastal contingent at Point Santa Isabel.

This same day, Arista's army slips east-southeastward out of Matamoros, hoping to cross the Río Grande at Longoreno and unite with Torrejón's cavalry behind the American lines, although a lack of boats slows this deployment.

MAY 2, 1846. Taylor reaches Point Santa Isabel at noon and digs in.

MAY 3, 1846. At dawn, Mexican artillery in Matamoros opens a heavy fire across the Río Grande against Fort Texas, which returns fire over the next several days. While inspecting outposts on May 5, Brown is killed by a shell, so Fort Texas is renamed Fort Brown in his honor; the town that eventually springs up around it becomes known as Brownsville.

MAY 4, 1846. This morning, Conner departs Veracruz for the Río Grande with his 50-gun, 480-man, 1,700-ton frigates Cumberland (flag) of Capt. Bladen Dulany, Raritan of Capt. Francis H. Gregory, and Potomac; the 22-gun, 190-man, 700-ton sloop John Adams of Cmdr. William J. McCluney; plus the brig Somers (leaving the Falmouth behind to maintain watch). Four days later, this squadron arrives off Taylor's base camp at Brazos de Santiago, using the army steamer Monmouth to set 500 sailors and marines ashore to reinforce Maj. John Monroe's garrison at Fort Polk.

MAY 7, 1846. Palo Alto. Learning that Fort Texas has been attacked, Taylor departs Point Santa Isabel with 2,300 men at 3:00 p.m. to relieve his beleaguered detachment. After camping overnight, he encounters Arista and Torrejón's 3,200 Mexicans on May 8, blocking the road at Palo Alto Pond in a mile-and-a-half-long battle line.

Taylor advances against Arista's waiting Mexican army at Palo Alto, lithograph by Carl Nebel. (Author's Collection)

Having secured their baggage train, the Americans advance early this afternoon with the 8th Infantry and Capt. James Duncan's light artillery battery on the left; the 4th and 3rd Infantry in the center, supported by heavy 18-pounders; and the 5th Infantry and Capt. Samuel Ringgold's light field artillery on the right. The Mexican guns open fire as Taylor advances, although resulting in poor execution due to their weak powder and because they have no high-explosive shells. The horse-drawn "flying" American light batteries, in contrast, wreak fearful havoc by swiftly deploying ahead of Taylor, pouring a heavy fire into the static Mexican lines.

Arista orders Torrejón's lancers to charge the American left, but this attack is broken by Ringgold's accurate counterfire before it can develop. Having suffered more than 400 casualties without coming to grips with their enemies, as well as being blinded by a dense brushfire raging through the chaparral, the Mexicans withdraw by evening. American losses total 9 dead—among them, Ringgold—44 wounded, and 2 missing.

MAY 9, 1846. Resaca de la Palma. At 6:00 a.m., Arista retreats into a new defensive position, re-deploying his army four hours later into an empty lake bed called Resaca de la Palma, six miles south of Palo Alto. Taylor resumes his advance and reestablishes contact shortly after noon.

Finding Arista's army again in a long, narrow line, the American general decides to drive directly down the road at his opponent's center. The ensuing fight is confused because of limited visibility in the heavy undergrowth, but at a cost of 39 American dead and 82 wounded, Arista's artillery is overrun and his line broken. Mexican losses are estimated at 200 dead, 300 wounded, and 100 captured, their outer wings fleeing back toward Matamoros in disarray. (That same evening, the American garrison in Fort Brown is heartened to see defeated columns streaming back across the Río Grande.)

MAY 11, 1846. In Washington on this Monday, Polk—having been informed two days previously of the Carricitos incident (see "April 23, 1846" entry)—asks Congress for an official declaration of war, which is passed by a 173–14 vote in the House of Representatives, then 40–2 the next day in the Senate, before finally being signed by the president on May 13.

MAY 17, 1846. After regrouping at Fort Brown, Taylor pushes across the Río Grande, despite a belated armistice offer from Arista. The Americans encounter no resistance the next day upon entering Matamoros (population 4,000), having been abandoned by its Mexican garrison—although leaving behind 300 wounded.

Arista retreats southwest toward Linares (state of Nuevo León), losing many men in the desert, then resigns his command to Gen. José María Ortega and requests to be court-martialed in early July so as to defend his conduct.

MAY 18, 1846. The 8-gun, 1,100-ton paddle-steamer Moctezuma and the 6-gun, 775-ton Guadalupe—having been repossessed from the Mexican Navy by their British builders for lack of payment—sail out of Alvarado (state of Veracruz) toward Havana, eluding the rapidly approaching American blockade.

MAY 19, 1846. The St. Mary's arrives off Tampico, proclaiming a blockade the next day.

MAY 20, 1846. The Mississippi blockades Veracruz.

This same day, amid growing dissatisfaction with Paredes's handling of Mexico's affairs, a revolt occurs in Guadalajara. Its governor and garrison commander are arrested, the former being replaced by the liberal politician Juan N. Cumplido, with support from colonels José María Yáñez, J. Guadalupe Montenegro, and Santiago Xicoténcatl.

JUNE 8, 1846. Early this afternoon, the St. Mary's shells the fort on the north bank of the Pánuco River mouth near Tampico and the anchored, single-gun, 25-man, 74-ton gunboat schooners Unión, Isabel, and Poblano. Little damage is inflicted because of the extreme long range.

This same day in the Pacific, Commodore Sloat departs Mazatlán with the Savannah to sail northwest into Monterey (California). Despite having received numerous reports over the past three weeks about the outbreak of hostilities, he wishes to refrain from any offensive actions until officially advised by Washington.

JUNE 10, 1846. Ezekial Merritt and five or six other American settlers seize a 150-horse herd destined for Castro's camp at Santa Clara; then four days later, 40 of the settlers furthermore arrest Gen. Mariano Guadalupe Vallejo—titular Mexican commander for Northern California—at his Sonoma home, along with 18 other followers, 8 guns, 250 muskets, and 250 horses.

Battle of Resaca de la Palma.

JUNE 12, 1846. Embroiled in its conflict with Mexico, Washington arrives at a diplomatic compromise with Britain over conflicting territorial claims in the Pacific Northwest, agreeing to establish a boundary between the United States and Canada along the 49th parallel, with Vancouver Island being ceded to the British.

The Mexican government, for its part, experiences even worse distractions, for this same day, the first half of a 6,000-man army arrives to besiege the liberal rebels within Guadalajara (see “May 20, 1846” entry). A protracted encirclement ensues, both sides firing upon each other to little effect.

JUNE 14, 1846. After failing to get a cutting-out expedition into Tampico’s roadstead under cover of darkness, the St. Mary’s shells the port ineffectually at dawn before retiring.

JUNE 24, 1846. The leading 50 men of Castro’s 160-man column, moving northward across San Francisco Bay to contain Merritt’s insurrection at Sonoma (California), are easily defeated by American settlers.

JULY 1846. American consul John Black relays a peace feeler from the Mexican government to Washington.

JULY 1, 1846. Having returned into California, Frémont leads some men across San Francisco Bay to spike the 10-gun, unoccupied San Joaquín Battery on its southern shore.

JULY 3, 1846. Sloat’s Savannah arrives at Monterey (California), joining the Cyane and the Levant. The American commodore nonetheless hesitates to secure the Mexican port because of his continuing uncertainty about the true state of hostilities.

JULY 4, 1846. California’s rebellious American settlers—led by the ex-Vermonters William B. Ide—proclaim themselves independent from Mexico, dubbing their new country the Bear Flag Republic.

JULY 5, 1846. Cmdr. Alexander Slidell Mackenzie (brother of John Slidell; see “November 29, 1845” entry) visits Havana, meeting the exiled Santa Anna two days later to enumerate Polk’s terms for a peace in case the Mexican strongman should regain power.

JULY 7, 1846. At 7:30 a.m., Sloat calls upon Monterey (California) to surrender, encountering no opposition as Capt. Mariano Silva has no means to resist so withdraws. Boats convey 85 marines and more than 140 sailors ashore three hours later to occupy the town.

JULY 9, 1846. This morning, Montgomery’s Portsmouth sets 70 men ashore at Clark’s Point to occupy San Francisco (California). Its Mexican authorities having already been displaced by rebellious American settlers, and its defenses having been destroyed by Frémont, no resistance is offered.

When news of the U.S. Navy’s seizures of Monterey and San Francisco reach Sonoma and Sutter’s Fort that same afternoon, the Bear Flag Republic is dissolved, and allegiance to the United States is formally proclaimed.

JULY 11, 1846. The British sloop Juno of Capt. F.J. Blake enters San Francisco Bay, prompting Montgomery to man its defenses. The Americans suspect that Rear Adm. Sir George F. Seymour’s Pacific squadron—spearheaded by his 80-gun, 2,600-ton flagship HMS Collingwood—will attempt to appropriate portions of California during this volatile transition period from Mexican rule. The Juno merely observes, though, before departing six days later.

JULY 16, 1846. Frémont, with 160 men, occupies the abandoned Mexican base of San Juan Bautista (California), gaining 9 cannon, 200 old muskets, and ammunition.

JULY 25, 1846. Frémont departs Monterey (California) with 200 men aboard the Cyane, disembarking four days later near San Diego to isolate the Mexican concentration around Los Angeles under Castro and Gov. Pío Pico.

JULY 28, 1846. This afternoon, Conner quits Antón Lizardo with the frigates Cumberland (flag), Potomac, and Raritan, plus the single-gun, 40-man, 74-ton schooners Reefer of Lt. Isaac Sterrett and Petrel of Lt. T. Darrah Shaw, to proceed southeast against Alvarado. Upon passing the northwest side of Chopas Reef, however, the Cumberland runs aground and is holed, bringing a halt to this operation.

JULY 29, 1846. Two weeks after reaching Monterey (California) aboard the Congress, Stockton replaces Sloat as commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Squadron. Sloat, old and infirm, immediately sets sail for home aboard the Levant.

The campaigns in California from 1846 to 1848.

JULY 31, 1846. After an arduous, 650-mile trek from Fort Leavenworth (Kansas), the 52-year-old brevet brigadier general Stephen Watts Kearny arrives nine miles outside Bent's Fort near modern Animas (Colorado) with 300 of his 1st Dragoons; 860 of the 1st Missouri Volunteer Mounted Infantrymen under his second-in-command—six-foot, six-inch, 240-pound colonel Alexander William Doniphan—plus 250 gunners under Maj. Meriwether Lewis Clark. (The 2nd Missouri under Col. Sterling Price is to follow later.) This so-called “Army of the West” is intended to capture the Mexican outpost of Santa Fe.

AUGUST 4, 1846. Taylor departs Matamoros up the Río Grande toward Camargo, having already sent most of his 12,000-man army ahead under Brigadier general Worth. Many of his latest reinforcements—inexperienced, 90-day volunteers—sicken at an alarming rate, 1,500 of them eventually dying.

This same day out in California, Stockton—three days after quitting Monterey with his flagship Congress—occupies Santa Barbara without opposition, leaving behind a 17-man garrison before proceeding toward San Pedro.

AUGUST 5, 1846. At dawn, just as Paredes is preparing to depart Mexico City to invigorate his besiegers outside the rebel city of Guadalajara (see “June 12, 1846” entry), Gen. José Mariano Salas mutinies at the capital's main Ciudadela or “Citadel,” arresting and deposing the president.

AUGUST 6, 1846. Conner detaches the Falmouth from Antón Lizardo this afternoon to join the Somers in blockading Alvarado. The next morning he follows with the frigates Cumberland (flag) and Potomac; steamers Mississippi and Princeton; schooners Reefer, Petrel, and Bonita of Lt. Timothy G. Benham; plus the British frigate HMS Endymion (as an observer) to once more attempt to assail this Mexican port. The steamers tow the Cumberland and the Potomac along the coast, then cast off to deploy before Alvarado that afternoon.

The outer channel is guarded by 16-gun Fort Santa Teresa, plus the 6-gun brig Zempoalteca and the single-gun, 25-man, 50-ton gunboats Guerrero, Queretana, and Victoria under junior naval captain Pedro A. Díaz Mirón, with other lesser batteries and warships inside. The Americans open a long-range bombardment toward the evening of August 7, only to cease fire at 6:30 p.m. Overnight, Conner prepares a boat party, but cancels his plans the next morning because the weather turns foul. Leaving the Falmouth on station, his squadron returns to its Antón Lizardo anchorage by noon of August 8.

AUGUST 7, 1846. A day after disembarking 360 of the Congress's sailors and four fieldpieces at San Pedro to assault nearby Los Angeles (population 1,500), Stockton receives a truce proposal from Castro's headquarters at Campo en la Mesa (now Boyle Heights). Rejecting it, the American commodore advances four days later to Rancho Los Cerritos (North Long Beach), then enters Los Angeles itself by August 13, encountering no opposition from its 100 defenders who have melted away.

One hour later, Frémont's small force also arrives overland from the opposite direction, while the remnants of Castro's army surrender by August 14, along with their 10 guns. A joint party of marines and Frémont's men then overtakes the ex-governor Alvarado and several other prominent Mexican officials at San Luis Obispo, capturing them after a brief skirmish.

AUGUST 14, 1846. Toward dusk in a heavy gale, Cmdr. Edward W. Carpenter's 10-gun, 80-man, 330-ton brig Truxtun runs onto Tuxpan Reef, surrendering to its Mexican garrison under Gen. Antonio Rosas three days later. The steamer Princeton arrives just past midday of August 20 in a belated rescue attempt. They burn the Truxtun's stripped remnants two days later, then return into Antón Lizardo by August 23.

AUGUST 16, 1846. Santa Anna returns to Veracruz from Cuban exile aboard the British mail-packet Arab, which is allowed to enter Veracruz by its U.S. blockaders because Washington believes he will help conclude a peace.

AUGUST 18, 1846. Kearny—after approaching Santa Fe (population 3,000) via a circuitous, southwesterly route—occupies the New Mexican capital without a fight, while Gov. Manuel Armijo retires toward Albuquerque with his troops.

AUGUST 19, 1846. Taylor advances west out of Camargo toward Mier and Cerralvo (state of Nuevo León), taking all his 3,200 regulars and his 3,000 best volunteers and leaving behind another 4,700 of the latter as garrison troops.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1846. Du Pont—now commanding the Cyane—arrives off the Pacific port of San Blas (Nayarit), setting a landing party ashore that spikes 24 cannon and seizes the sloop Solita and the brig Susana.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1846. Shortly after midday, Hull's Warren stands into the Pacific port of Mazatlán, anchoring a quarter-mile from the 12-gun, 114-ton Mexican brig Malek Ahdel and sending a 70-man boarding party across in four boats to secure this vessel without a fight. After exiting the port, the prize is commissioned under Lt. William B. Renshaw; the inbound brig Carmelita is also taken the next day.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1846. Taylor's vanguard marches southwest out of Cerralvo toward Monterrey (state of Nuevo León), followed by his main body, spread out over the next three days.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1846. After rendezvousing with Hull off Mazatlán, Du Pont's Cyane seizes nine Mexican vessels at La Paz (capital of Baja California) despite the neutrality agreement which is then struck with its governor, Col. Francisco Palacios Miranda.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1846. Santa Anna appears outside Mexico City on the eve of its Independence Day celebrations, entering the next morning to a tumultuous reception, escorted by Salas's troops.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1846. Monterrey. This Saturday morning, Taylor's 6,645 troops come within sight of this northern Mexican city, promptly being fired upon by its dark, formidable, eight-gun Ciudadela or "Citadel" (quickly dubbed "Black Fort" by the Americans). Garrison commander de Ampudia commands 7,000 Mexican regulars and 2,000–3,000

U.S. general John Wool and his staff, in the streets of Saltillo, about 1847. (Yale Collection of Western Americana, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library) militiamen, with which he intends to wage a defensive struggle.

The next afternoon, Worth swings west in a flanking maneuver with Col. John C. (“Jack”) Hays’s Texas Cavalry Regiment, Lt. Col. Thomas Staniford’s 1st Infantry Brigade, and Col. Persifor F. Smith’s 2nd Brigade. Early on September 21, a mixed body of 1,500 Mexican cavalry and infantry under Lt. Col. Juan N. Nájera confronts this American column, suffering 100 casualties—including their commander—before retiring 15 minutes later, having killed or wounded only a dozen invaders. Thus, Worth sits astride the Saltillo road by 8:00 a.m., cutting off Monterrey’s supply lines. At noon, he continues eastward up nearby Blanca Hill to overrun the Federación and El Soldado strongpoints by nightfall. Taylor’s main body also launches an assault against Monterrey’s northeastern suburbs this same September 21, during which Twiggs’s 1st Division—temporarily commanded by Lt. Col. John Garland—and other units become enfiladed by various Mexican redoubts, suffering 394 casualties. Despite such punishment, the Americans capture the 200-man Tenería or “Tannery” stronghold, plus five Mexican artillery pieces.

While Taylor’s main force recuperates on the rainy day of September 22, Worth steals up Independencia Hill, surprising its defenders. Lt. Edward Deas’s 50 gunners manhandle a 12-pound howitzer to its 800-foot summit by noon, opening fire upon the 200 Mexican troops holding the fortified Obispado or “Bishopric” under Lt. Col. Francisco Berra. The latter are finally overwhelmed by 4:00 p.m., prompting a discouraged de Ampudia to call in all his outposts this same night.

By the morning of September 23, the principal American army notices that Rincón or Diablo strongpoint is abandoned, so the Americans quickly occupy it with the 1st Mississippi Rifle Regiment under 38-year-old colonel and congressman Jefferson Davis (Taylor’s former son-in-law and later to become the Confederate president). Supporting units then begin fighting their way into northeastern Monterrey house to house, joined this afternoon by a similar offensive out of the west under Worth.

By dawn of September 24, most of Monterrey is in American hands, and de Ampudia requests terms. The capitulation is signed the next morning, Taylor agreeing to permit the Mexican army to march out with their arms and six guns over a number of days, retreating beyond Rinconada Pass, after which both sides will observe a two-month cessation of offensive operations. The conquest of this city has cost 120 American dead and 368 wounded, while the defenders suffered 700 casualties.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1846. The 52-year-old commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry (destined to “open” Japan seven years later) joins Conner off Veracruz as his second-in-command, having arrived from New York aboard the 3-gun, 50-man, 240-ton paddle-steamer Vixen of Cmdr. Joshua Sands.

This same day out in Los Angeles, marine lieutenant Archibald H. Gillespie’s 48-man garrison endures a dawn attack by 20 Californio guerrillas under Servulo Varela, sparking a general uprising the next day under paroled Mexican captain José María Flores. The latter’s 150 followers trap Gillespie atop Fort Hill, compelling him to capitulate by September 29. According to the surrender terms, the Americans are allowed to depart San Pedro with their arms by October 4 aboard the merchantman Vandalia.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1846. Almost six weeks after arriving in San Antonio (population 2,000) to organize an expedition in support of Taylor’s campaign, Brig. Gen. John E. (“Old Fussy”) Wool departs this Texan town with 1,300 troops, proceeding southwest toward Presidio del Rio Grande (modern Eagle Pass). One month later, he is followed by another 1,200 under Col. Sylvester Churchill.

This same day of September 25, Kearny quits Santa Fe (New Mexico) for California with 300 troopers of Maj. Edwin V. Sumner’s 1st Dragoons.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1846. Santa Anna leaves Mexico City to travel northward with a small body of troops, arriving at San Luis Potosí by October 8 to begin the four-month-long process of marshaling a 21,500-man army to then proceed against Taylor.

EARLY OCTOBER 1846. Having been reinforced at Santa Fe (New Mexico) by Price’s 1,200-man 2nd Missouri Mounted Infantry, plus the 500-man Mormon Battalion of Lt. Col. Philip St. George Cooke, Doniphan launches a seven-week mountain campaign against the Utah and Navajo tribes, who have been massacring outlying Mexican settlements.

OCTOBER 1, 1846. Du Pont’s Cyane seizes the Mexican schooners Libertad and Fortuna at Loreto, as well as intercepting three more vessels in the Gulf of California over the next few days.

OCTOBER 6, 1846. Early this morning, Mervine—now commanding the Savannah—appears off San Pedro to reverse the recent Californio revolt at Los Angeles. The next day, 225 Americans come ashore and begin marching inland. After camping overnight at Rancho Dominguez (North Long Beach), they encounter 80 Mexican riders and 10 soldiers under José Antonio Carrillo on October 8, who are barring their path with a 4-pounder. Despite three charges, Mervine's sailors and marines are unable to close with their more nimble opponents, so they must retreat back aboard their frigate. (Four of the 10 American wounded die and are subsequently buried in San Pedro harbor, on Isla de los Muertos or Deadmen's Island.)

That same morning of October 6, Kearny's 300 dragoons meet 36-year-old Christopher "Kit" Carson and 8 other scouts near Socorro (New Mexico), learning that California is now in American hands. Kearny therefore orders 200 of his men to return toward Santa Fe and nine days later continues westward across the mountains with only two companies—100 troopers.

OCTOBER 7, 1846. A day after arriving off Guaymas (Sonora) and calling for the surrender of its single-gun schooner gunboats Anáhuac of 105 tons and Sonorense of 27 tons, plus the merchant brig Condor—a proposal that is rejected by Col. Antonio Campuzano, the local military commander—Du Pont's Cyane begins bombarding the port by mid-afternoon of October 7. Both gunboats are set ablaze (possibly by their Mexican crews), while a 42-man American boarding party cuts out the Condor, despite a brisk exchange of small-arms fire with the defenders ashore. The brig is subsequently found to be useless so is scuttled.

OCTOBER 15, 1846. Just after midnight, Conner and Perry quit Antón Lizardo with the paddle-steamers Vixen (flag), Mississippi (vice flag), and 6-gun, 370-ton revenue cutter McLane of Capt. William A. Howard; the schooners Reefer, Bonita, and Petrel; the 6-gun, 150-ton revenue cutter Forward of Capt. H. B. Nonnes; plus the captured 4-gun, 122-ton Mexican schooner Nonata under Lt. Samuel F. Hazard to once again attack Alvarado.

Arriving offshore this same dawn, the Americans find the sea too rough for immediate penetration, so they content themselves with a long-range bombardment of its outer defenses. Fort Santa Teresa's 39-man garrison under Díaz and the Mexican warships under Commo. Tomás Marín—the 9-gun, 70-man, 175-ton brig Veracruzano Libre; the Zempoalteca; the 7-gun, 40-man, 130-ton schooner Aguila ("Eagle"); and two gunboats—are left largely unscathed.

Early this afternoon, Conner bears down upon Alvarado's bar in two columns, towing the Reefer and the Bonita with the Vixen, while the McLane does the same for the Nonata, the Petrel, and the Forward. Although his flagship weathers the defenders' batteries and crosses at 1:45 p.m., the McLane runs aground a half hour later, obliging the Americans to retreat back toward Antón Lizardo by 2:30 p.m.

OCTOBER 16, 1846. Perry departs Antón Lizardo eastward with the vessels Mississippi (flag), Vixen, McLane, Reefer, Bonita, Nonata, Forward, and a 250-man landing force under Capt. French Forrest of the Cumberland to ascend the Grijalva River and seize San Juan Bautista de Villahermosa (Tabasco). A storm separates the Reefer en route, but the remaining vessels rendezvous off the San Pedro y San Pablo River five days later, before steering east toward the town of Frontera.

OCTOBER 21, 1846. Mexican forces begin the week-long process of evacuating Tampico as part of Santa Anna's plan to concentrate his forces around the inland city of San Luis Potosí.

OCTOBER 23, 1846. After transferring aboard the Vixen, which has a shallower draft, Perry tows the Forward and the Bonita across the Grijalva River bar, followed by the McLane. The latter attempts to do the same for the Nonata and Forrest's boat party, only to run aground. Perry nonetheless presses on toward the nearby town of Frontera, sighting it by 3:00 p.m. and rushing ahead with the Vixen to secure the schooner Laura Virginia and paddle steamers Petríta and Tabasqueña, while the schooner Amado escapes upriver, pursued by the Bonita.

Having occupied Frontera, the American commodore installs a small garrison under Lt. Joseph C. Walsh, then transfers Forrest's boat party aboard the 200-ton prize Petríta to continue the next morning toward Villahermosa, 72 miles farther up the Grijalva. A short distance ahead, they find the Bonita with the captured Amado.

OCTOBER 25, 1846. At 8:45 a.m., Perry's 600-man expedition sights Fort Acachapan beyond Vuelta del Diablo or "Devil's Bend," two miles below Villahermosa. Its tiny garrison flees, allowing the Americans to disembark a mile away and spike its guns before noon.

By 1:00 p.m., Perry drops anchor before the town of Villahermosa proper, then one hour later calls for its surrender. Villahermosa's governor, Lt. Col. Juan Bautista Traconis—despite commanding only 330 regulars from infantry and cavalry companies, plus a militia battalion—bids the invaders open fire whenever they choose.

Twenty-five minutes later, at 3:05 p.m., the Vixen commences a desultory bombardment, followed by a disembarkation around 5:00, while American boat parties board the anchored brigs Yunaute and Rentville, the schooners Tabasco and Alvarado, plus the sloop Deseada. Notwithstanding the light resistance encountered, Perry withdraws his landing party at nightfall, then retires downriver the next morning with his prizes.

Also late this afternoon, Stockton's Congress reaches San Pedro (California), reinforcing the Savannah and setting a landing party ashore at dawn of October 27. Unable to advance upon Los Angeles, the American commodore decides to shift southeast toward San Diego, setting sail with his flagship by October 29.

OCTOBER 31, 1846. Stockton sets reinforcements ashore to relieve Lt. George Minor's beleaguered American garrison at San Diego (California).

NOVEMBER 11, 1846. Conner detaches the Potomac and the Raritan to join the St. Mary's and the 11-gun, 225-ton brig Porpoise of Lt. William E. Hunt off Tampico, following the next morning with his flagship Princeton, the Mississippi, the Vixen, and the 3-gun, 50-man, 240-ton paddle-steamer Spitfire of Cmdr. Josiah Tattnall, plus the Reefer, the Bonita, the Petrel, and the Nonata.

NOVEMBER 13, 1846. Taylor pushes southwest out of Monterrey (state of Nuevo León) with a portion of his army, occupying the undefended town of Saltillo three days later without resistance.

NOVEMBER 14, 1846. Tampico. At dawn, Conner's squadron rendezvouses off this port and, by 11:00 a.m., sends a 300-man boat party across its bar. One and a half hours later, they spot the Stars and Stripes flying above the abandoned town, having been raised by Mrs. Anna McClarmonde Chase (Irish-born wife of its former American consul). The Mexican garrison of 41-year-old Anastasio Parrodi having already withdrawn (see "October 21, 1846" entry), Conner gains Tampico without a fight and claims the schooners Unión, Poblano, and Isabel as prizes, along with the merchantmen Mahonese and Ormigo (or possibly the Hormiga).

NOVEMBER 15, 1846. Early this morning, the 20-gun, 190-man, 700-ton sloop Boston of Cmdr. George F. Pearson is lost on Eleuthera Island in the Bahamas.

That same day, Stockton's Congress runs aground at San Diego (California) and almost heels over with the ebbing tide, tempting 100 Californio guerrillas to launch an assault against its distracted garrison. This attack is repelled, and the frigate is saved.

NOVEMBER 16, 1846. Near San Luis Obispo, Manuel Castro's 100 Californios scatter a formation of American volunteers who were marching to reinforce Frémont's 400 men at Monterey.

NOVEMBER 18, 1846. While preparing Tampico to receive an American garrison of 2,000–3,000 troops, Conner detaches Tattnall 25 miles upriver with the Spitfire and the Petrel (reinforced with an extra 32 marines and sailors) to raid the Mexican outpost at Pánuco. It is overrun early the next morning and leveled by the time the Americans withdraw two mornings later.

NOVEMBER 23, 1846. Perry returns to Tampico from Brazos de Santiago (Texas), having brought 500 of Maj. Gen. Robert Patterson's soldiers to garrison the town.

NOVEMBER 26, 1846. After the Mexican schooner Criolla runs into Veracruz past the blockading brig Somers of Lt. Raphael Semmes—later captain of the famed Civil War-raider Alabama—eight of Semmes's men volunteer to cut it out from under the guns of the island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa. Despite boarding the schooner before midnight, the Americans become becalmed, so must burn their prize and escape back out to sea through a hail of gunfire, with their seven prisoners. (The Criolla subsequently proves to have been a spy ship, allowed to slip into Veracruz with Conner's connivance.)

NOVEMBER 30, 1846. Having failed to bring the Mexican government to the bargaining table, despite occupying the northern portion of their country, Washington decides upon a different strategy:

Winfield Scott

Winfield Scott was born into wealth and privilege on June 13, 1786, at the Laurel Branch estate in Dinwiddie County near Petersburg (Virginia). The son of a Revolutionary War hero, young Winfield's life was changed after his parents died. In 1805, he enrolled at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, becoming a lawyer by the next year. In 1807, he also enlisted as a militia cavalry trooper and was sent to Charleston (South Carolina) when war with Britain loomed. Scott then went to Washington to secure a regular commission as captain of light artillery in May 1808. He recruited a company in Richmond and Petersburg before being ordered to Louisiana. While at Baton Rouge in 1809, Winfield was suspended for a year for disparaging his superior, General Wilkinson. In 1811, he joined Wade Hampton's staff at New Orleans.

When hostilities with Great Britain erupted the next year, Scott—now a lieutenant colonel of artillery—was sent, in July 1812, to the Niagara frontier with Canada. He was captured on October 11, 1812, during the American defeat at Queenston Heights. After being exchanged in January 1813, promoted to colonel, and made General Dearborn's adjutant in March, he led the assault against Fort George on May 25, being injured when its magazine exploded two days later. Scott also went to Washington to lobby the Senate to punish British prisoners of war for the British execution of 13 Irish Americans. (Regarded as British-born subjects, they were hanged as traitors.) Although his bill passed, President Madison refused to enforce it. Scott returned to duty, receiving a brevet commission as brigadier general by March 1814 and commanding the 1st U.S. Brigade in that summer's offensive into Ontario. His role in the war ended when he was severely wounded in the left shoulder on July 25 at the Battle of Lundy's Lane. He convalesced as a hero in New York.

After hostilities with Britain ceased, Scott studied military science in France and, on his return, married Maria Mayo of Virginia in 1817. Scott also stayed involved as a militia major general and translated several Napoleonic manuals into English. In 1830, he produced the War Department's official manual for militia training, the Abstract of Military Tactics.

Two years later, Scott returned to active duty with the U.S. Army. He led an expedition to negotiate an end to the Black Hawk War, then returned to Charleston by that same November 1832 to monitor the "Nullification Crisis." On the eruption of the Second Seminole War, he organized the military response early in 1836. Two years later, he replaced his friend Gen. John Wool as commander of the federal troops in the Cherokee Nation. Scott had the unhappy task of moving these native families farther west, a heartbreaking migration remembered as the "Trail of Tears." In March 1839, he helped to defuse a border dispute between Maine and New Brunswick. Then the next year, his three volumes of Infantry Tactics were published, becoming the U.S. Army's standard drill manual.

By June 1841, Scott's seniority had gained him the highest rank of major general, and the next month he succeeded as general in chief on the death of Macomb. Although Scott was smart, influential, and experienced, he had also acquired a reputation as overbearing, contentious, and vain. An example occurred in December 1846 during his layover in New Orleans, while en route to prepare for the Veracruz landings. Telling his hosts that he wished an evening of chess against a strong local player, Scott was miffed when the nine-year-old Paul Morphy was ushered in after dinner. The proud general's mood did not improve when he was easily beaten in two games, the second after only six moves; he therefore retired early to bed.

rather than have Taylor march south across the desert from Monterrey into the teeth of Santa Anna's waiting army, the U.S. Navy will transport another army to Veracruz to invade nearer the enemy capital. Consequently, six-foot, five-inch, 59-year-old major general Winfield Scott and his staff set sail this day from New York for New Orleans, to continue on toward Brazos de Santiago to begin organizing this second expedition.

DECEMBER 6, 1846. At dawn, Kearny's 100 weary dragoons and Carson's 20 scouts—having been reinforced the previous day, after their trans-Sierra hike, by 40 sailors and marines under Gillespie, plus a brass 4-pounder—surprise 72 Mexican riders encamped near San Pascual under Capt. Andrés Pico, a brother of Gov. Pío Pico. Because of the Americans' exhausted mounts, the outnumbered Mexicans acquit themselves well, despite being driven from the field. American losses total 19 killed and 13 wounded (including Kearny and Gillespie), plus one of two howitzers lost, compared with only a single man captured and a dozen injured among Pico's men. The Americans subsequently limp toward San Diego, encumbered by their convalescents and Mexican harassing raids, until relieved on December 10 by a 215-man rescue column under Lt. Andrew V. F. Gray.

That same day of December 6, the polarized Senate in Mexico City votes 11–9 to offer the presidency to Santa Anna and the vice presidency to Gómez Farías. The former remains at San Luis Potosí training his army, leaving the latter to assume office alone on December 23.

DECEMBER 8, 1846. While pursuing a blockade-runner off Veracruz, the Somers accidentally overturns and sinks, drowning 32 of Semmes's 76 crew members, while 7 others are captured by the Mexicans. The remainder are rescued by neutral British, French, or Spanish warships anchored off Sacrificios Island.

DECEMBER 14, 1846. While marching from San Juan Bautista to contain the Californio revolt at Los Angeles, Frémont surprises San Luis Obispo this dark rainy night, capturing its commander Jesús Pico (cousin to Pío and Andrés Pico) at nearby Wilson's Ranch, along with 35 other Mexicans.

DECEMBER 16, 1846. Doniphan marches south out of Valverde (New Mexico) with his 850-man 1st Missouri Mounted Infantry to proceed 200 miles down the Río Grande and across the Jornada del Muerto or "Dead Man's Journey" against El Paso (Texas).

DECEMBER 17, 1846. To cut the clandestine trade entering Mexico through the neutral state of Yucatán, Perry sets sail from Antón Lizardo with the vessels Mississippi (flag), Vixen, Bonita, and Petrel to capture the border outpost of El Carmen.

DECEMBER 18, 1846. Having returned through Monterrey with his main army to press southeast against Ciudad Victoria (Tamaulipas), Taylor learns that Santa Anna is moving north from San Luis Potosí to assail Worth's small garrison holding Saltillo. The American commander therefore retraces his route with his regulars, leaving Brig. Gen. John A. Quitman to continue against Ciudad Victoria with an all-volunteer force.

Saltillo is reinforced on December 19 by an American unit out of Monterrey under Maj. Gen. William O. Butler, then two days later by Wool from Parras (state of Coahuila). Realizing his enemies are now gathering in strength, Santa Anna cancels his operation.

DECEMBER 20, 1846. Perry arrives off El Carmen bar, transfers his flag aboard the more shallow-drafted Vixen, then leads the Bonita and the Petrel across to proceed five miles inside its bay and assail El Carmen proper. The next morning, the town surrenders unconditionally, and Perry strips it of military stores, while installing Sands as governor. Leaving the Vixen and the Petrel behind, the commodore, aboard the Bonita, rejoins the Mississippi by December 22, before standing away west.

DECEMBER 23, 1846. Although absent from Mexico City on active duty in San Luis Potosí, Santa Anna is officially inaugurated as president, with Gómez Farías as his vice president.

DECEMBER 25, 1846. This afternoon, Doniphan's vanguard reaches the confluence of the Brazito and Río Grande rivers (30 miles north of El Paso), finding perhaps 1,200 Mexican irregulars under Colonel Ponce de León barring its path. After rebuffing a surrender demand, the better-armed Americans easily repel an amateurish cavalry charge, inflicting 100 fatalities while suffering no losses among their own ranks. The city is occupied shortly thereafter, without any further resistance.

DECEMBER 26, 1846. Taylor reaches Montemorelos (45 miles southeast of Monterrey), learning of Scott's imminent arrival to organize a second front—not realizing that his own army is to be stripped of 8,000 regular infantrymen, 1,000 cavalrymen, and two field batteries for this new campaign. The next day, Scott arrives at the Brazos de Santiago (Texas) and begins issuing instructions.

DECEMBER 28, 1846. Los Angeles. This morning, Stockton and Kearny quit San Diego with 600 men—dismounted U.S. Dragoons, two companies of the California Battalion, naval contingents from the Congress, the Savannah, and the Portsmouth, plus a small artillery train—to march 140 miles northwest and recapture the city of Los Angeles.

They do not sight any enemies until the evening of January 7, 1847, when Flores is discovered waiting at La Jabonería Ford with 450 Mexicans and a few guns to dispute the Americans' passage across the San Gabriel River. The next morning, Stockton and Kearny swing right, hoping to slip across at Bartolo Ford before Flores becomes aware, but the Mexican commander checks this maneuver by re-deploying his own riders opposite them. The Americans form a square and push across the ford, disregarding the feeble Mexican fire and unlimbering their artillery, then scattering the Californio riders in an hour-and-a-half melee that claims 2 American dead and 9 wounded. Flores suffers similar losses, and the Mexicans retreat, about 300 regrouping a half-dozen miles away at Cañada de los Alisos (on the mesa between the San Gabriel and Los Angeles rivers, near the modern Union Stockyards). The Americans again approach in a square, exchanging long-range artillery salvos and weathering a half-hearted cavalry charge, before Flores's army finally gives up two and a half hours later. One American and a Mexican lie dead, with 5 Americans and an unknown number of Mexicans wounded.

Stockton and Kearny cross the river about three miles below Los Angeles that same evening, then waiting until the next day—January 10—before making their triumphal entry into the city, the commodore establishing headquarters in Avila Adobe House (on modern Olvera Street). At a total cost of 20 American casualties, the campaign has subdued the last Mexican stronghold in California.

DECEMBER 29, 1846. Quitman's small army approaches Ciudad Victoria, prompting 1,500 Mexican cavalymen to abandon it without a fight and retire southwest toward Tula.

This same day, marine captain Ward Marston leaves San Francisco with 100 men and a field gun to put down a Californio insurrection. On January 2, 1847, he comes upon Francisco Sánchez and 120 rebels about seven miles from the Santa Clara Mission. They are dispersed after a brief skirmish in which 4 Californios are killed and 5 wounded, compared to only 2 Americans injured. Four days later, an armistice is finalized.

JANUARY 4, 1847. Taylor enters Ciudad Victoria, detaching Twiggs's division east toward Tampico.

JANUARY 5, 1847. Frémont, with 400 men and six fieldpieces, disperses a small band of Californio riders at San Buenaventura Mission (modern Ventura), plus another 60–70 the next day.

JANUARY 11, 1847. Late this evening, Frémont comes upon Flores's 100 surviving troops at Rancho Los Verdugos near San Fernando Mission, persuading them to surrender the next day—although the Mexican commander escapes into Sonora.

JANUARY 13, 1847. Infantry lieutenant John Alexander Richey, carrying one of two sets of Scott's campaign plans for Taylor, is killed while attempting to buy provisions in the village of Villagrán between Monterrey and Ciudad Victoria. The captured papers are forwarded to Santa Anna at San Luis Potosí.

JANUARY 19, 1847. At 6:00 a.m., because of high-handed actions by unruly American occupiers, the home of popular governor Charles Bent at Taos (New Mexico) is attacked by a mob of Mexicans and Indians, led by Pablo Montoya and Tomás Romero. Bent is murdered in front of his Mexican wife and sister-in-law—Kit Carson's 17-year-old bride Josefa Jaramillo—along with five other American residents. Seven more are killed at nearby Arroyo Hondo, plus eight at the town of Mora.

JANUARY 23, 1847. Having learned three days previously of the anti-American insurrection at Taos (New Mexico), Price leads 290 of his 2nd Missouri troopers northward, plus 63 local volunteers under Capt. Ceran St. Vrain—all afoot—with four field howitzers to battle the rebels. One day later at the village of La Cañada, this column encounters perhaps 1,500 Mexicans and Indians, driving them from their entrenchments and slaying 36 of them. American losses are 3 killed and 6 wounded. Price is reinforced shortly thereafter by a company of 1st Dragoons under Capt. J. H. K. Burgwin and another of the 2nd Missouri, bringing his total strength to 479 men.

JANUARY 24, 1847. Patterson reaches Tampico with 4,500 men.

JANUARY 25, 1847. Some 50–60 miles south of Saltillo, a 50-man patrol of Kentucky and Arkansas riders under majors John P. Gaines and Solon Borland is surprised and captured at Encarnación by a large body of Mexican cavalry. A second detachment of 30 Kentuckians under Capt. William J. Heady, sent to find this first patrol, shares its same fate.

JANUARY 28, 1847. Knowing of Taylor's diminished strength because of an intelligence windfall (see "January 13, 1847" entry), Santa Anna decides to strike northward and surprise his American opponent. The Mexican vanguard—an artillery train, sapper battalion, and the San Patricio Company of Irish American deserters—departs San Luis Potosí, followed the next day by Francisco Pacheco's infantry division, then Manuel Lombardini's division on January 30, and finally Ortega's division on January 31. In all, more than 20,000 troops advance to rendezvous south of Saltillo at Encarnación.

JANUARY 29, 1847. At El Embudo (New Mexico), 180 of Burgwin and St. Vrain's troopers defeat a small rearguard of Taos rebels, killing 20 and wounding another 60, while suffering only a single American killed and another wounded.

FEBRUARY 2, 1847. Price's small army passes through Taos (New Mexico), deploying five miles north to besiege its rebellious Mexicans and Indians within the old pueblo. After battering its adobe church throughout February 3 with their howitzers, the Americans launch a two-pronged assault the next morning at 11:00, which kills about 150 rebels by nightfall and ends all effective resistance. The survivors surrender the next day, 17 of their leaders eventually being executed—including Montoya and Romero. Price's losses are 7 dead (including Burgwin), plus 45 wounded.

FEBRUARY 15, 1847. Scott departs Brazos de Santiago, arriving at Tampico three days later, then proceeding 65 miles farther southeast to his expedition's rendezvous off Lobos Island.

FEBRUARY 17, 1847. Pacheco's division reaches Encarnación, followed soon afterward by the rest of Santa Anna's army. Only 14,000 Mexican troops and 17 guns have completed the grueling march from San Luis Potosí, the remainder having deserted or fallen by the wayside. Santa Anna nevertheless prepares to assail Taylor's encampment at nearby Agua Nueva (Coahuila).

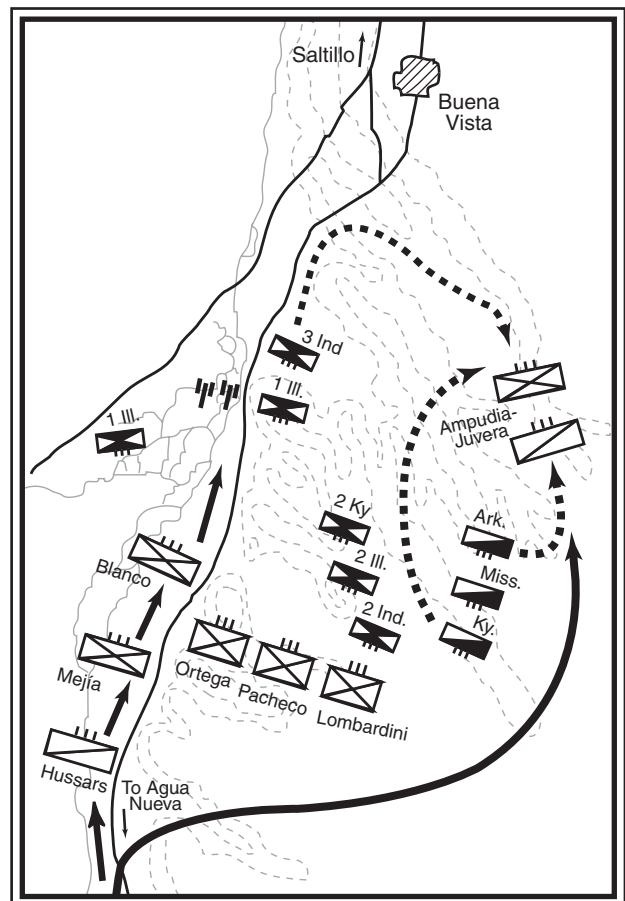

FEBRUARY 20, 1847. This evening, a 400-man American reconnaissance unit under Lt. Col. Charles A. May spots Miñón's 4,000 cavalrymen approaching Hediona Ranch in advance of Santa Anna's main army. By riding throughout the night, the scouts are able to advise Taylor at Agua Nueva the next morning of this approaching danger. (Maj. Benjamin McCulloch of the Texas Rangers brings in even more detailed information at midday, having penetrated the Mexican base at Encarnación in disguise.)

Taylor contemplates making a stand with his 4,800 troops but is instead persuaded by Wool to fall back to La Angostura—a narrow pass on Buena Vista Hacienda, six miles south of Saltillo—where his flanks cannot be as easily turned by the superior enemy numbers because of the adjacent mountains. Leaving the 1st Arkansas Cavalry Regiment of Col. Archibald Yell to break camp at Agua Nueva, the rest of the American army retires.

This same night of February 21, Santa Anna rests only six miles farther south at Carnero Pass. After midnight, Miñón's cavalry descends upon the vacated American camp, chasing Yell's regiment—plus a Kentucky cavalry battalion and two companies of 1st Dragoons—northward to rejoin Taylor and Wool by the next morning.

FEBRUARY 22, 1847. Buena Vista. While Taylor quickly visits Saltillo to ensure that Santa Anna has not slipped behind him, Wool digs in, facing southward down the San Luis Potosí road with 580 infantrymen of the 1st Illinois Regiment under Col. John J. Hardin, 573 of the 2nd Illinois under Col. William H. Bissell, 571 of the 2nd Kentucky under Col. William R. McKee, 628 of the 2nd Indiana under Col. William A. Bowles, and 625 of the 3rd Indiana under Col. James H. Lane. Cavalry consists of Battle of Buena Vista.

368 troopers of the 1st Mississippi Rifles under Col. Jefferson Davis, 479 of the 1st Arkansas Regiment under Col. Archibald Yell, 305 of the 1st Kentucky under Col. Humphrey Marshall, 133 of the 1st Dragoons under Capt. Enoch Steen, 76 of the 2nd Dragoons under Lt. Col. Charles A. May, as well as 88 Texas Rangers under Maj. Benjamin McCulloch. The 18 fieldpieces are manned by 150 gunners of the 3rd Artillery Battery under Capt. Braxton Bragg, a like number from the 3rd Artillery Company under Capt. Thomas W. Sherman, plus 117 from the 4th Artillery Battery of Capt. John M. Washington. Only the dragoons and gunners are regulars, while of the remaining regiments, the Mississippians alone are battle experienced.

Shortly after sunrise, Santa Anna's 18,000 troops appear, and at 11:00 a.m., the Mexican general sends a surrender demand ahead under a flag of truce. Taylor, who has just returned from Saltillo, rejects it. Around noon, de Ampudia's light infantry brigade and Juvera's cavalry are detached to occupy the high ground east of the plateau, prompting the American commander to send the Arkansas and Kentucky cavalry regiments, plus a battalion of Indiana infantrymen, to contest this flanking maneuver. After an indecisive firefight, these Americans withdraw at nightfall, the only other action being a long-range exchange between Blanco's leading Mexican division and Taylor's main battle line.

Early the next morning, the Mexicans resume the action, Blanco being repulsed by Washington's battery and 1st Illinois. However, de Ampudia and Juvera repel a second attempt by Yell's Arkansas and Marshall's Kentucky cavalry to gain the eastern high ground, after which Pacheco's division hits Bowles's 2nd Indiana, sending it reeling out of Wool's line. By the time Taylor returns from Saltillo around 9:00 a.m., the situation has grown precarious, although soon rectified when the 1st Mississippi and the 3rd Indiana plug the hole. As in previous encounters, the American horse-drawn artillery proves too much for the attackers, repeatedly smashing threatened Mexican breakthroughs. Taylor's army is compressed but does not break, whereas Santa Anna has a horse shot out from under him. A flanking maneuver by Pacheco's division is intercepted atop a ridge at 1:00 p.m. by the Mississippians, the 3rd Indiana, and Bragg's artillery, resulting in heavy Mexican losses. By nightfall, the Americans have suffered 267 killed, 456 wounded, and 1,500 deserters, but they still hold the field. They are further encouraged by the arrival of Brig. Gen. Thomas Marshall and

Col. George W. Morgan's two fresh regiments behind them at Saltillo.

The Mexicans, in contrast, have had enough, enduring 1,800 dead or injured, plus another 300 captured. After conferring with his staff this evening, Santa Anna orders a stealthy retreat toward Agua Nueva, hence the Americans awaken on the morning of February 24 to find the plain virtually empty. Satisfied with his hard-won victory, Taylor retires northeast into Monterrey shortly thereafter.

FEBRUARY 27, 1847. The Mexico City garrison under conservative general de la Peña y Barragán revolts against the liberal vice president Gómez Farías, who has introduced new taxes on church properties. Both factions then appeal to Santa Anna for resolution.

FEBRUARY 28, 1847. Sacramento. After pushing south from El Paso (Texas) into the state of Chihuahua, Doniphan's 924 Missouri troopers and 300 wagonloads of auxiliaries learn that 1,200 Mexican cavalrymen, 1,200 infantrymen, and 1,400 irregulars, supported by 300 gunners manning 10 brass cannon, are deployed just north of the Sacramento River and 15 miles above Chihuahua City under 40-year-old general and senator Pedro García Conde.

At sunrise, the Americans begin a wide flanking maneuver toward the west, not being discovered by the defenders until 3:00 p.m., when García Conde launches a belated, 800-man cavalry charge. The latter is easily dispersed by Clark's artillery, after which Doniphan methodically works his way behind the static Mexican lines, rolling up García Conde's hopelessly overmatched throng. At the cost of only a single American dead and 11 wounded, Doniphan kills 300 opponents and wounds a similar number, while capturing all 10 guns and their baggage train.

The next day, the Americans occupy Chihuahua City, finding it largely abandoned.

MARCH 2, 1847. After marshalling his seaborne expedition off Lobos Island southeast of Tampico, Scott's steamer Massachusetts gives the signal to get under way toward Antón Lizardo. His 8,600-man army, aboard 40 transports, is divided into three divisions. Worth's division consists of Garland's 4th, Lt. Col. J. S. MacIntosh's 5th, Col. N. S. Clarke's 6th, and Maj. C. A. Waite's 8th U.S. Infantry regiments; Col. James Bankhead's 2nd and Lt. Col. F. S. Belton's 3rd Artillery regiments; Duncan's field battery; Capt. G. H. Talcott's rocket and mountain battery; plus a sapper company under Capt. A. J. Swift. Twiggs's 2nd Division comprises Col. William Davenport's 1st, Lt. Col. Bennett Riley's 2nd, Capt. Edmund B. Alexander's 3rd, and Lt. Col. Joseph Plymton's 7th U.S. Infantry regiments; Col. Thomas Childs's 1st and Maj. J. L. Gardner's 4th Artillery regiments; Col. Persifor F. Smith's Mounted Rifle Regiment; plus Capt. Francis Taylor's field battery. Patterson's 3rd Division contains Col. P. M. Butler's South Carolina ("Palmetto"), Col. F. M. Wynkoop's 1st Pennsylvania, Col. J. W. Geary's 2nd Pennsylvania, Col. W. B. Campbell's 1st Tennessee, and Col. William T. Haskell's 2nd Tennessee Volunteer regiments; plus Capt. E. J. Steptoe's field battery.

The first of these vessels arrives two days later, anchoring between Antón Lizardo and Salmedina Island to begin preparing for the disembarkation.

MARCH 6, 1847. To permit Scott to view the proposed landing site at Collado Beach (three miles southeast of Veracruz), Conner takes him aboard the Petrita along with Patterson, brigadier generals Worth, Twiggs, and Gideon Johnston Pillow, captains Robert E. Lee and Joseph E. Johnston, plus lieutenants Pierre G. T. Beauregard and George G. Meade. The steamer is unexpectedly shelled by the big guns at San Juan de Ulúa, compelling it to withdraw.

MARCH 7, 1847. Generals Quitman, Fields, and Jesup set sail from Tampico toward Veracruz, bringing more troops for Scott's army.

MARCH 9, 1847. Veracruz. After a one-day delay, during which Scott's troops were transhipped from transports aboard navy vessels, Conner's men-of-war stand toward Sacrificios Island at 11:00 a.m., detaching a line of gunboats closer inshore by 3:30 p.m. to provide covering fire at Collado Beach. They open up their bombardment at 5:00, an hour before Worth's 2,600-man 1st Division actually begins disembarking. This landing meets no opposition, so is soon followed by Twiggs's 2nd Division, then Patterson's 3rd. By nightfall, all 8,600 American soldiers are ashore, along with a 1,200-man naval contingent, being joined the next morning by Scott and his headquarters staff.

Before sunrise of March 10, Conner directs Tattall's Spitfire to mount a brief diversionary attack against San Juan de Ulúa, while the American troops fan out at daylight to begin investing the city proper. Veracruz (population 15,000) is defended by 3,360 Mexicans—about two-thirds being regulars—with American siege of Veracruz.

86 guns under Maj. Gen. Juan Morales, while their offshore island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa boasts an additional 1,030 men and 135 artillery pieces. These ill-prepared defenders offer no resistance to the invaders' progress, however, preferring to wait behind their ramparts.

Shortly after midday of March 13, Twiggs reaches the sea northwest of Veracruz, thus entirely cutting off the city. Patterson has meanwhile taken up position in the center, with Worth farther southeast. The Americans then begin building formal siegeworks. By noon of March 21, their first heavy batteries are ready to open fire, Scott calling for Morales's capitulation the next afternoon. Upon being rejected, a concerted bombardment commences, seconded by Perry's warships offshore (who, having returned on March 20 from repairing the Mississippi in Norfolk, Virginia, bears orders to supplant Conner).

The besiegers increase their rate of fire until dawn of March 26, when Gen. José Juan Landero—new garrison commander within Veracruz in place of the ill Morales—requests terms. The city officially capitulates by March 29, along with San Juan de Ulúa, all defenders being paroled and officers allowed to retain their sidearms, mounts, and personal effects. At a cost of 14 American dead and 59 wounded, Scott gains a secure supply base for his march inland.

MARCH 21, 1847. Having led 10,500 survivors of his shattered army back from Buena Vista into San Luis Potosí, Santa Anna appears with his two best divisions at the Guadalupe suburb north of Mexico City, then ends the dispute between General de la Peña and Vice President Gómez Farías by deposing the latter in favor of 51-year-old general and congressman Pedro María Anaya.

MARCH 29, 1847. At midday, Montgomery's Portsmouth arrives off San José del Cabo (Baja California), calling for the town's surrender. The Mexican authorities refuse, yet offer no resistance when Lt. Benjamin F. B. Hunter disembarks the next day with 140 sailors and marines.

MARCH 30, 1847. This afternoon, Scott detaches Quitman's brigade to march southeast from Veracruz along the coast and seize the port of Alvarado, supported by a naval squadron offshore. When the 3-gun, 60-man, 230-ton, twin-propeller steamer Scourge of Lt. Charles G. Hunter bombards La Vigía Battery the next morning, he also discovers Alvarado already abandoned by its Mexican garrison. Hunter thus immediately occupies the place and pushes upriver as far as Tlacotalpan, capturing three vessels and burning a fourth.

After a brief occupation, Quitman's brigade rejoins Scott at Veracruz, leaving the U.S. Navy to garrison both Alvarado and Tlacotalpan under Capt. Isaac Mayo.

APRIL 3, 1847. Santa Anna departs Mexico City, traveling east to assume command over the three infantry divisions, one cavalry brigade, and 2,000 militiamen guarding the Veracruz highway under Canalizo.

This same day on the Pacific coast, Montgomery's Portsmouth seizes the village of San Lucas (California), then on April 4 steers for La Paz to obtain the surrender of the entire province from governor Palacios Miranda.

APRIL 8, 1847. Scott's vanguard departs Veracruz under Twiggs. It consists of 2,600 infantrymen, a dragoon squadron, two light field batteries, and a dozen heavier pieces. Twiggs is to be followed up the national highway toward Jalapa by Patterson's division; Scott himself emerges on April 11 with the balance of his forces.

APRIL 12, 1847. Tuxpan. Perry departs Sacrificios Island with a flotilla of small steamers and gunboats, rendezvousing the next evening with his main fleet off Lobos Island to veer south and make a land descent. Despite being briefly scattered by a norther, the Americans appear outside the Tuxpan River mouth by morning of April 17 with the steamers Spitfire (flag), Vixen, and Scourge; the schooners Bonita, Petrel, and Reefer, plus 30 barges bearing a 1,500-man landing force under Capt. Samuel L.

Breese of the 22-gun, 210-man, 1,040-ton sloop Albany.

After gingerly crossing the river's bar on the morning of April 18, the raiders proceed upriver. By 2:30 p.m., Perry's advance elements are fired upon by the three-gun La Peña Battery, which is abandoned when a contingent of Americans disembarks nearby. The same occurs shortly hereafter at the two-gun La Palmasola water battery, after which Perry's flotilla arrives directly before Tuxpan by 3:30 p.m. The town's 350-man garrison under General Cós (Santa Anna's brother-in-law; see "Texan Independence") melts into the interior, fighting a rear-guard action that kills two invaders and wounds nine.

The commodore spends the next four days stripping Tuxpan of everything of military value before he retires toward Antón Lizardo on April 22.

APRIL 13, 1847. Montgomery's Portsmouth officially occupies La Paz (Baja California), before withdrawing his marines and retiring north to Monterey.

APRIL 14, 1847. Cerro Gordo. Three days after Twiggs's vanguard has detected a large Mexican force dug in four miles northwest of Plan del Río (Veracruz), barring further progress up the national highway toward Jalapa—which lies four miles beyond—Scott arrives to assume direct command over operations. Desperate to halt the Americans' offensive before it can penetrate into Mexico's fertile and more densely populated interior, Santa Anna has emplaced 12,000 raw troops and 43 field-pieces east of the town of Cerro Gordo (whose 1,000-foot prominence is today called El Telégrafo). This ground being well chosen, Scott waits until Worth's division joins, bringing his own strength up to 8,500 effectives.

On the morning of Saturday, April 17, Twiggs circles north of the Mexican positions with Riley's 2nd Infantry, Smith's Mounted Rifles—temporarily commanded by Col. William S. Harney—and Brig. Gen. James Shields's brigade, which comprises the 3rd and 4th Illinois, plus the New York Regiment. Although intended only as a preliminary deployment, this column is hit around La Atalaya Hill by a Mexican counterattack, provoking Twiggs into pushing as far forward as Santa Anna's main force before his outnumbered men finally withdraw at nightfall.

The next morning, the Americans move forward again from La Atalaya. Supported by a frontal assault from Scott's main army, this flanking maneuver breaks the Mexican line and overruns the town of Cerro Gordo. Fearful of being cut off from the rear, Santa Anna's panic-stricken troops flee south from the heights toward Orizaba, leaving behind more than 3,000 prisoners. His carriage and six-mule team having been riddled by American shots, the Mexican commander in chief is compelled to join this flight, along with de Ampudia and other generals. Scott's losses total 63 killed and 367 wounded.

American troops advancing against the Mexican defenses atop the hill outside Cerro Gordo, lithograph by Carl Nebel. (Author's Collection)

APRIL 20, 1847. Led by Patterson's division, the victorious American army enters deserted Jalapa.

APRIL 21, 1847. After an exhausting cross-country ride, Santa Anna reaches Orizaba, beginning to re-assemble 4,000 of his defeated troops. The next day, de Ampudia rides toward Puebla with the remnants of his cavalry.

APRIL 28, 1847. Doniphan quits Chihuahua City, striking southeast to join Wool at Saltillo.

MAY 6, 1847. Worth's division departs Jalapa, pushing west-southwest toward Puebla. En route, one of his regiments occupies the abandoned Mexican stronghold of El Perote.

That same day, seven of Scott's volunteer regiments—3,000 men of the 3rd and 4th Illinois, 1st and 2nd Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama Infantry, plus the Tennessee Cavalry—quit Jalapa to travel eastward under Patterson, their terms of enlistment having expired. The American commander is therefore left with scarcely 3,000 troops in Jalapa.

MAY 10, 1847. Perry departs Antón Lizardo southeastward with the Mississippi (flag), the Vixen, and the 4-gun, 60-man, 340-ton paddle-steamer Scorpion of Cmdr. Abraham Bigelow to sweep the Mexican coastline. Two days later off Coatzacoalcas, he joins the John Adams, the 16-gun, 150-man, 566-ton sloop Decatur of Cmdr. Richard S. Pinckney, and 47-man, 180-ton "bomb brig" Stromboli (ex-Howard) of Cmdr. William S. Walker. Finding the 12-gun fort guarding its entrance abandoned and demolished by the Mexicans, Perry sends a reconnaissance party upriver on May 13, which surveys as far as Minatitlán—24 miles inland—before retiring.

MAY 11, 1847. Doniphan reaches Parras (state of Coahuila), his vanguard rescuing a group of Mexican captives being carried off by Lipan Indians and slaying 15 of these raiders.

MAY 15, 1847. Scott's army occupies the city of Puebla without opposition.

MAY 16, 1847. After watering at Frontera (state of Tabasco), Perry's Mississippi (flag), Vixen, Scorpion, John Adams, and Decatur arrive off El Carmen to join the brigs Porpoise and the single-gun Washington of Lt. Samuel P. Lee, plus the 47-man, 240-ton bomb brig Vesuvius (ex-St. Mary's) of Cmdr. George H. Magruder. The next day, to once again stem its clandestine traffic into Mexico (see "December 20, 1846" entry), Perry reoccupies the town of El Carmen with a party of sailors and marines, naming Magruder as governor.

MAY 19, 1847. While returning west toward Antón Lizardo from El Carmen, Perry pauses to appoint Cmdr. Gershom J. Van Brunt of the 47-man, 180-ton bomb-brig Etna (ex-Walcott) as military governor of Coatzacoalcos and its inland district.

MAY 28, 1847. Scott rejoins Worth at Puebla, their combined forces totaling 5,820 effectives—too few to push on toward Mexico City. Over the next three months, he awaits reinforcements to resume his offensive.

JUNE 9, 1847. Perry departs east from Antón Lizardo aboard the Mississippi, commanding his forces to gather at Frontera (state of Tabasco) for a campaign up the Grijalva River.

JUNE 14, 1847. Tabasco. Early this morning, Perry's steamers Scorpion (flag), Scourge, Spitfire, and Vixen begin towing the vessels Washington, Stromboli, Vesuvius, the merchant schooner Spitfire, and approximately 40 boats with a 1,200-man landing party across the Grijalva River mouth, joining the Bonita and the Etna already anchored off Frontera. The deeper-draft Mississippi, Raritan, John Adams, Albany, Decatur, and 22-gun, 210-man, 940-ton sloop Germantown of Cmdr. Franklin Buchanan remain outside the mouth of the river, although they contribute men toward this enterprise.

After spending the first day coaling, Perry signals his expedition to proceed upriver at 5:25 p.m. The next afternoon at 4:00, his advance elements are fired upon by 150 Mexicans under Col. Miguel Bruno, occupying a hill 12 miles below Villahermosa at Santa Teresa. The Americans push past unscathed, weathering further sniping at Vuelta del Diablo or "Devil's Bend" before anchoring for the night opposite some underwater obstacles at Siete Palmas.

At 6:00 a.m. on June 6, the Mexican breastwork at La Colmena opens fire upon an American reconnaissance boat, prompting Perry to disembark and lead his 1,200-man "naval brigade" in a flanking maneuver. Within a few hours, he has circled far enough inland to approach Fort Acachapan out of the east, finding it defended by 300 Mexican infantrymen, 300 militia riders, and two guns under Col. Claro Hidalgo. The attackers deploy their troops and artillery, scattering the garrison with a charge. Meanwhile, 34-year-old lieutenant David Dixon Porter—in acting command of the Spitfire—clears the river's log obstructions, then passes Perry's small army while it is still pressing southwest against Villahermosa's last lines of defense. Shortly after 10:30 a.m., the flotilla runs past Iturbide breastwork, raking it from behind so that its Mexican gunners flee, allowing Porter to set 68 men ashore and secure this strongpoint. The vessels then anchor before Villahermosa, which has been deserted by Gov. Domingo Echegaray's garrison so surrenders at noon. Perry's brigade arrives three hours later in heavy rain to begin the occupation. American casualties total 5 wounded, as opposed to about 30 Mexican casualties.

JUNE 22, 1847. Perry departs Villahermosa, having installed a small garrison under Commander Van Brunt, supported by the Spitfire, the Scourge, and the Etna.

JUNE 24, 1847. Mexican guerrillas launch a nocturnal attack against the American garrison in Villahermosa. They are dispersed but remain outside to harass foraging parties.

JUNE 30, 1847. Having sallied westward from Villahermosa before dawn to chastise the Mexican guerrillas encircling the town, Commander Bigelow approaches their base camp four miles up the Grijalva River at Tamulté with 200 men and a pair of 6-pounders, accompanied by the Scourge and the Vixen. After a 20-minute skirmish in which 1 American is killed and 5 wounded, the raiders disperse from the Mexican encampment, destroying everything of value before retiring.

JULY 8, 1847. Scott is reinforced at Puebla by 4,500 American troops under Pillow, MacIntosh, and Brig. Gen. George Cadwalader.

JULY 16, 1847. Mexican guerrillas launch a daylight assault against the American garrison within Villahermosa but are repelled.

JULY 19, 1847. Because of increasing sickness and persistent Mexican guerrilla attacks, Perry orders Villahermosa evacuated, which is accomplished by the evening of July 22, rearguard actions costing the Americans one killed and three wounded.

JULY 21, 1847. The 6-gun, 43-man, 690-ton store-ship Lexington of Lt. Theodore Bailey anchors two miles outside La Paz (Baja California), depositing Lt. Col. Henry S. Burton's 112 men of the 1st New York Volunteer Regiment to act as a permanent garrison.

JULY 27, 1847. On Santa Anna's orders, Gen. Gabriel Valencia arrives north of Mexico City at Guadalupe from San Luis Potosí, bringing 4,000 veterans of the army defeated at Buena Vista.

AUGUST 6, 1847. The 42-year-old brigadier general, ex-senator (and future U.S. president) Franklin Pierce reaches Scott's army at Puebla with 2,400 reinforcements. This same day, another 1,000 men of the 9th Infantry Regiment begin marching inland from Veracruz under Maj. F.T. Lally, taking 13 days to reach Jalapa because of constant harassing attacks by 2,000 Mexicans under Gen. Juan Soto.

The day after Pierce's arrival, Scott launches his long-anticipated offensive against Mexico City, dispatching Twiggs's division west-northwest out of Puebla in advance of his main army. All told, Scott has 14,000 troops—of whom 2,500 are sick and 600 more convalescent.

AUGUST 10, 1847. Learning that the Americans are at last moving, Anaya's brigade marches out of Mexico City this morning to begin fortifying El Peñón Hill, 10 miles to its east, with 7,000 troops and 30 cannon, in accordance with Santa Anna's plans for defending the capital.

AUGUST 14, 1847. Mexico's ex-president Paredes—disguised as “M. Martínez”—arrives at Veracruz from Havana aboard the British mail-steamer Téviot. The 46-year-old commander David Glasgow Farragut of the 22-gun, 275-man, 880-ton sloop Saratoga fails to make an inspection, thus allowing Paredes to escape ashore.

AUGUST 16, 1847. Rather than approach the main Mexican defenses at El Peñón head-on, Worth, Pillow, and Quitman's divisions veer southwestward this morning, leaving Twiggs's division at Ayotla (20 miles east-southeast of Mexico City) to hold Santa Anna in check, while they circle around.

AUGUST 18, 1847. Scott's vanguard reaches the town of San Agustín and turns north, only to have the advance cavalry screen draw fire from a heavy battery at San Antonio, three miles south of Churubusco (which kills Seth Thornton, among others). Unable to outflank this position because of an impassable lava field to its west called El Pedregal, the Americans decide to again slip farther around along a road reconnoitered by Captain Lee.

Santa Anna, meanwhile—having been alerted to this movement around his southern flank—redeploys Valencia's 5,500 men into San Angel, Francisco Pérez's 3,500 men two miles farther east into Coyoacán, and Bravo's force into Churubusco, using Rincón's force, which remains at El Peñón, as a reserve. Fearing his troops will see no action, however, Valencia disobeys and takes up station five miles southwest of his allotted position in the village of Padierna.

AUGUST 19, 1847. Contreras-Churubusco. This morning, Twiggs sets out westward from San Agustín to lead Pillow and Worth in the latest flanking maneuver. Early in the afternoon, while approaching the San Angel–Contreras highway at its Padierna crossroads, his advance elements come under artillery fire, prompting Twiggs to deploy Capt. John Magruder's two field batteries. When it becomes evident that they are dueling with Valencia's 22 heavy guns and not some minor outpost, Pillow commits 3,500 men of Riley's, Cadwalader's, and Morgan's contingents to capturing vacant San Gerónimo, hoping to thereby isolate Valencia from the principal Mexican body.

Instead, Santa Anna moves southwestward late in the day with another 3,500 Mexicans to extricate Valencia, in the process unwittingly threatening to crush the American thrust between two pincers. Realizing the danger, Smith follows Riley, Cadwalader, and Morgan into San Gerónimo at nightfall, directing them to leave a screen facing northward against American advance upon Mexico City.

Santa Anna while continuing with him behind Valencia's positions under cover of darkness with their combined strength. The next dawn, Santa Anna unexpectedly begins retiring northeastward, so that, when Riley suddenly launches his surprise attack from Valencia's rear at 6:00 a.m., the latter's men are already feeling lost. They scatter after only 17 minutes of fighting, suffering 700 killed plus 813 captured, along with all their artillery.

The subsequent American pursuit of this broken formation from Contreras carries as far northeastward as San Ángel and Coyoacán, spreading panic among other Mexican units. Worth takes advantage of this breakthrough to send Clarke's brigade (the 5th, 6th, and 8th Infantry regiments) wheeling behind the San Antonio stronghold, causing its Mexican garrison to flee northward into Churubusco as well rather than risk being cut off. Santa Anna's dispersed contingents now utterly collapse as a cohesive fighting force, every man struggling to recross the river at either Coyoacán or Churubusco. Scott directs Shields and Pierce to attack the former bridgehead and sends Worth and Pillow against the latter around noon.

After more than two hours of heavy fighting, the 2,600 troops of Clarke's and Cadwalader's brigades, plus Duncan's Artillery Battalion, overcome the Churubusco bridgehead; then Alexander's 3rd Infantry storms its last stronghold, the fortified San Mateo Convent. This building's defenders—renegade Irish American deserters re-formed into the so-called San Patricio Battalion—resist desperately but are eventually overwhelmed (30 of their 69 survivors later being court-martialed and executed). By midafternoon of August 20, Santa Anna has fled back into his capital, his army ruined. Mexican casualties total 4,000 killed or wounded, plus another 3,000 captured—including two former presidents and six generals. Scott's losses are 139 killed and more than 900 wounded or missing.

Although having Mexico City at his mercy, Scott hesitates to move against the capital the next morning, instead allowing Santa Anna time to request a truce—which the Americans grant on Sunday, August 22, hoping it will lead to a general armistice.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1847. After two weeks of fruitless talks, Scott informs Santa Anna that the American army will resume offensive operations the next midday.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1847. Molino del Rey. This afternoon, Scott learns that a large body of Mexican troops has occupied the Molino del Rey or "King's Mill," barely one and one-third miles from his Tacubaya headquarters. Wishing to brush back this outpost before his main army launches its final drive against Mexico City, the American commander sends 3,500 men against this place the next morning under Worth.

Expecting the Mexicans to fall back, the attackers instead encounter five brigades and heavy artillery, the defenders stubbornly holding both Molino del Rey and its adjacent stone Casa Mata. Twin columns under Maj. George Wright and Garland, supported by a field battery, become embroiled in a fierce two-hour battle before finally rooting the defenders out of these strongholds. American losses total 116 killed and 671 wounded.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1847. Chapultepec. Having marshaled his forces, Scott orders his artillery to begin bombarding the hilltop castle of Chapultepec at 5:00 a.m. so as to take this place before continuing on toward Mexico City. The 260 defenders under elderly general Bravo—including 50 young cadets of Mexico’s Military College—endure this daylong barrage, along with 600 troops stationed in the surrounding woods.

At 8:00 the next morning, Pierce’s brigade charges eastward from Molino del Rey, supported by Quitman’s brigade on its right, to overwhelm the lower defenses in intense hand-to-hand fighting. Scaling ladders are then brought forward, and by 9:30 a.m., Col. Joseph E. Johnston’s gray-coated Voltigeur Regiment unfurls the American colors atop this lofty fortress. (A half-dozen Mexican cadets fight to the death rather than surrender, one of them—Fernando Montes de Oca—jumping off the ramparts with the Mexican flag clutched in his arms. All six are today remembered as the Niños Héroes or “Boy Heroes.”)

Two American columns then sweep past this captured stronghold, speeding on toward the capital’s western gates. By nightfall, Santa Anna has suffered a total of 1,800 casualties (compared with Scott’s 450), so at 1:00 a.m., the Mexican president decides to evacuate his capital.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1847. Encountering only sporadic resistance, Scott fights his way into Mexico City’s main square by noon, while Santa Anna and his surviving troops retreat north toward Guadalupe. After a couple of days of severe rioting, some semblance of order is restored in the capital, Quitman being appointed as its military governor.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1847. At Guadalupe, Santa Anna resigns the presidency in favor of Chief Justice Manuel de la Peña y Peña.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1847. Brig. Gen. Joseph Lane departs Veracruz with 2,500 American reinforcements, joining Lally shortly thereafter at Jalapa.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1847. Santa Anna appears outside Puebla with 3,200 irregular cavalymen and 2,500 militiamen, calling upon its American garrison commander—Col. C. F. Childs—to surrender.

American troops sweeping past Chapultepec Castle toward Mexico City, lithograph by Carl Nebel. (Author's Collection)

General Scott's tense entry into Mexico City; the cathedral is at center, with the low presidential palace adorned with the Stars and Stripes at right. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

The latter refuses, at which the raw Mexican troops balk at storming its walls, instead instituting a half-hearted siege.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1847. Four days after departing occupied La Paz (Baja California), the 16-gun, 150-man, 566-ton sloop Dale of Cmdr. Thomas O. Selfridge approaches Mulegé under false English colors, then raises the Stars and Stripes and cuts out the Mexican schooner Magdalena this afternoon with a 50-man boarding party. Deemed unseaworthy, the prize is burned shortly thereafter.

The next morning, Selfridge calls upon Mulegé's officials to submit to U.S. authority. Capt. Manuel Pineda—having earlier overthrown the collaborationist Palacios Miranda—refuses, prompting the Americans to disembark 17 marines and 57 sailors around 3:30 p.m. after a 90-minute bombardment by the Dale. Although able to fight their way into this town, the landing party accomplishes little, before retiring at nightfall under harassing fire from the 150 defenders scattered through the hills. On October 2, the U.S. sloop reverses course southeast toward Loreto, while the heartened Mexicans prepare to advance against the U.S. garrison occupying La Paz.

OCTOBER 5, 1847. Selfridge's Dale disembarks a company of marines and sailors at Loreto (Baja California), seizing two brass 4-pounders and other armaments.

OCTOBER 8, 1847. Walker's Texas Rangers, acting as scouts for Lane's brigade, surprise Santa Anna's pickets and chase them back into the town of Huamantla (Puebla). However, here lies the main Mexican army, complete with two artillery pieces, which devastates this pursuit and kills Walker. Lane's infantry thereupon arrives, scattering Santa Anna's force and capturing his two guns before continuing westward into Puebla the next day.

Shortly thereafter, Santa Anna is ordered by President Peña to turn over command to Rincón and prepare to stand trial for his conduct of Mexico's defense.

OCTOBER 17, 1847. Capt. Elie A. F. La Vallette arrives outside Guaymas (Sonora) with the Congress, the Portsmouth, and the brigantine Argo (a Chilean blockade-runner intercepted earlier), calling upon its governor—Colonel Campuzano—to surrender his 400-man garrison the next afternoon. The Mexican officer refuses, so La Vallette installs a 32-pounder on Almagre Grande Island overnight to sweep the bay.

At 5:30 a.m. on October 19, the Portsmouth is rowed into Guaymas's inner harbor, its commander again calling for capitulation at noon, while threatening to shell the town. Campuzano rebuffs this latest offer as well, so the Portsmouth and Congress open fire the next morning at 6:30, halting an hour later when the Mexican garrison retreats four miles into Boca-chicacampo. A marine company occupies Casa Blanca Hill briefly that same afternoon and razes Guaymas's fortifications on October 21; otherwise, the Americans install no garrison, preferring to control this port by leaving a warship anchored in its roadstead.

NOVEMBER 1, 1847. Patterson strikes inland from Veracruz with 3,000 reinforcements, reaching Jalapa one week later. He is followed shortly thereafter by Butler with another 4,000.

NOVEMBER 10, 1847. Mazatlán. The new commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Squadron—Commo. William Branford Shubrick—arrives this evening off Mazatlán (Sinaloa), anchoring his 56-gun, 750-man, 1,900-ton flagship Independence due west at Olas Altas; the Congress northwest in Puerto Viejo; while the Cyane inches into Puerto Nuevo farther east. (The storeship Erie also joins after dark.) With the city thus threatened on three sides, Col. Rafael Telles withdraws his 560-man garrison inland to Palos Prietos overnight.

The next morning, the Americans discover Mazatlán undefended, so disembark 730 men in 29 boats. After beginning repairs on its fortifications, Shubrick installs a 400-man garrison, with Captain La Vallette as military governor. Telles is satisfied to maintain cavalry patrols outside, preventing supplies from entering the occupied city.

NOVEMBER 11, 1847. In an attempt to drive the Americans out of Baja California, Pineda launches a

Fall of Mexico City

By late evening on September 13, 1847, the last Mexican units outside the capital were vanquished, so Santa Anna gave the order at 1:00 a.m. for his remaining troops to slip away. Three hours later, some city councilors visited Scott at his headquarters, asking to discuss terms. The general refused, instead instructing at dawn that the twin American columns, standing before the capital's western gates under Worth and Quitman, cautiously push inside the city of 250,000 inhabitants. The former halted his advance at the Alameda Park, while Quitman's troops pressed all the way into the main square by noon of September 14.

Yet even as the Stars and Stripes were being hoisted atop the presidential palace, sniper fire began from the "flat roofs of the houses, from windows and corners of streets." Mexico City plunged into chaos. American troops, taking casualties in the narrow streets, returned fire, prompting frightened civilians to drape their homes with white flags. Jails were flung open by the fleeing Mexican authorities, and an estimated 2,000 prisoners then looted empty stores and dwellings. Anarchy raged for more than 24 hours before the invaders finally brought in field artillery to blast pockets of resistance. A curfew was imposed by the next evening.

September 16, Mexico's Independence Day, dawned quietly in the gutted city. Scott appointed Major General Quitman as military governor and also recognized the civilian authority of the Mexican councilors, police, and courts. The U.S. Army, "in consideration of its protection," imposed a levy of 150,000 pesos on the city council. Quitman meanwhile doused fires, repaired the prisons, treated the wounded, and buried the dead. As fears eased, life gradually returned to the capital. U.S. regulars behaved themselves quite well among the civilian population, although some volunteers proved so abusive that their regiments were billeted eight miles away at San Ángel. The American authorities installed pillories in Mexico City to punish offenders, native or foreign.

After a while, Quitman's duties came to include such mundane chores as replacing windows in the presidential palace, setting exchange rates, and processing restaurant applications. He was therefore granted leave on November 1, 1847, to depart for Washington. Commerce revived as the occupiers paid in dollars for their provisions, while their quartermaster employed 1,000 Mexicans to make uniforms to reclothe Scott's entire army. U.S. soldiers came to enjoy shows at the Nuevo México theater and to frequent dance halls on Coliseo or Betlemitas streets. They set up their canteen in the Hotel Bella Unión, complete with gambling tables and prostitutes. Even English-language newspapers eventually appeared during the nine-month occupation of the Mexican capital.

dawn assault against the La Paz garrison with 120 men, being repulsed by artillery fire.

This same day, elections are held in the unoccupied portions of Mexico, with Anaya emerging as interim president for the next two months, in succession to Peña (who becomes foreign minister).

NOVEMBER 17, 1847. In an attempt to impose sterner American control over Guaymas, Selfridge leads 17 marines and 50 seamen ashore from the Dale, encountering 250 Mexicans at Casa Blanca Hill. The Americans are pinned down in a brief firefight, and their commander is seriously wounded, before these defenders disperse.

This same day, Pineda mounts a second attack against La Paz on the far side of the Gulf of California, suffering four or five killed and a like number wounded, before withdrawing six miles to La Laguna. American casualties are one dead and two injured.

NOVEMBER 18, 1847. Delegates from eight Mexican states agree to seek peace from the Americans.

NOVEMBER 19, 1847. Lt. Charles Heywood's 24-man marine garrison at San José (Baja California) is called upon to surrender by 150 Mexicans under captains Vicente Mejía and José Matías Moreno, plus naval lieutenant José Antonio Mijares. The Americans refuse and, along with 20 Mexican collaborators, withstand two nights of assaults inside the old mission. The attackers withdraw by the morning of November 21, as two approaching sail seemingly promise relief—although proving to be merely the American whalers Magnolia and Edward.

NOVEMBER 20, 1847. Before dawn, two large American boat parties push out of Mazatlán, attempting to surprise a 90-man Mexican patrol 10 miles away at Urias, under Swiss-born Carlos Horn. One sailor is killed and 20 others wounded after a brief encounter, which also leaves 4 Mexicans dead and an unknown number injured.

NOVEMBER 26, 1847. The 8-gun, 43-man, 567-ton store-ship Southampton of Lt. Robert D. Thorburn reinforces the garrison at San José (Baja California) with 26 men and two guns.

NOVEMBER 27, 1847. This afternoon, Pineda rushes La Paz (Baja California) with 350 men, only to be repulsed by Burton's 112 defenders.

JANUARY 11, 1848. The Lexington joins the bark Whiton of Lt. Frederick Chatard off San Blas (Nayarit), combining to set 47 men ashore the next morning who strip its harbor castle of guns and cut out two schooners.

JANUARY 18, 1848. Chatard goes ashore at Manzanillo (Colima) with a small party from the Whiton, spiking three guns.

JANUARY 22, 1848. Pineda and several hundred men capture an American foraging party outside San José (Baja California) and then besiege 27 marines, 15 sailors, 20 Mexican collaborators, and 50 noncombatants inside its old mission. The defenders resist until dawn of February 15, when the Cyane deposits 102 men three miles away and relieves the garrison.

JANUARY 30, 1848. Before sunrise, 12 marines and two companies of seamen quit the Dale—now under acting command of Lt. Edward M. Yard—to row stealthily toward Cochori, eight miles east of Guaymas, and surprise a Mexican concentration. These raiders disembark three miles short of their destination and close upon it from three directions. Cochori is carried in a rush, 3 Mexicans being killed, 5 wounded, and numerous others captured before this landing party returns aboard the Dale two hours later.

FEBRUARY 13, 1848. At dawn, 60 of the Dale's seamen and marines close upon the remnants of Campuzano's camp at Bocachicacampo from three directions, dispersing and destroying his base.

MARCH 22, 1848. Another company of the 1st New York Volunteer Regiment, plus 115 recruits, reach La Paz (Baja California).

Reassured by these reinforcements, Capt. Seymour G. Steele three days later leads a 33-man raiding party against Pineda's main encampment at San Antonio, severely wounding this Mexican commander and capturing 3 of his men, while releasing 5 American captives.

MARCH 31, 1848. Eight days after departing La Paz (Baja California) with three companies—217 men—of the 1st New York Volunteers, Burton surprises a Mexican concentration under Gov. Mauricio Castro at Todos Santos, killing 10 and dispersing the rest. Many of these fleeing troops, including the governor, are subsequently captured 25 miles farther

California Gold Rush

In the lonely Sacramento Valley of occupied Upper California, a Swiss-born settler named John Sutter owned a vast tract of wilderness. In the summer of 1847, he sent a work crew up the south branch of the American River as far as Coloma to build a sawmill. When the workmen loosed water into its millrace on January 23, 1848, to wash clear the debris, they noticed gold nuggets glinting in its bed the next morning. Worried about potential disruptions from an influx of lawless prospectors, Sutter asked them to keep their discovery secret for another six weeks, until spring planting was done.

The workers agreed, continuing their regular shifts at his site, while panning for gold on Sundays. News of their strike nonetheless trickled into San Francisco and was reported in both newspapers. Still, the city's 850–900 residents were not unduly excited. A second, richer lode was then found by several Mormons about 25 miles from Sutter's Mill. By late April 1848, men were slipping into San Francisco with gold nuggets to replenish supplies before hastening back up the American River. The Mormon businessman Sam Brannan deliberately brandished a bottle full of gold on May 12 to excite enough interest that he might sell supplies and equipment to prospectors disembarking at his store below Sutter's Fort. Within two days, fleets of boats were departing upriver from San Francisco. By the end of June, it was estimated that less than 100 inhabitants remained in the deserted port city.

Word spread rapidly through Oregon, Utah, and the Mexican state of Sonora before finally reaching as far as the eastern United States. What really started the "California Gold Rush," though, was when President Polk corroborated reports of this wealthy new discovery in his annual State of the Union address on December 5, 1848. Thousands of easterners and mid-westerners then struck out overland, arriving the next year to be remembered as the "Forty-Niners." Others boarded ships for the 17,000-mile, six- to eight-month voyage round Cape Horn or the riskier six-week traverse across the Isthmus of Panama.

By 1851, the population of San Francisco had swelled to 25,000 residents. Thousands more relocated throughout California and the western United States. Such a sudden and massive migration also increased tensions with the Plains Indians, aggravated relations with Latin American nations such as Colombia, and marked a permanent shift westward in American interests.

east at Santiago by another two American detachments out of San José.

APRIL 9, 1848. A small American unit disembarks in the Soldado River estuary of Sonora, marching 12 miles inland to spike three Mexican guns, suffering two men wounded during their retirement.

APRIL 25, 1848. With the cessation of hostilities, the American marines garrisoning San José and La Paz (Baja California) are withdrawn by the Cyane. However, the three companies of New York volunteer militiamen left behind will experience mutinies, numerous ringleaders being detained before these units are finally picked up in early September to be transported to Monterey.

After fitful negotiations between the American occupiers and the faction-riven rump of Mexico's government, the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo is finally signed on February 2, 1848. By its terms, the United States wrests away half of Mexico's territory: the largely empty provinces of California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico. In addition, Mexico agrees to recognize the earlier U.S. acquisition of Texas.

In exchange, the American government pays Mexico $15 million in compensation for these lands, while assuming responsibility for an additional $3.5 million in claims by U.S. citizens. Mexicans living in the ceded territories are to be treated as American citizens. This agreement is ratified by the U.S. Congress on March 10 and by Mexico on May 19. Veracruz is restored to Mexican control by June 11, the last of 18,300 American troops departing from there by July 31.

FILIBUSTERISM (1852–1860)

In the mid-19th century, the weakness and divided nature of many Latin American countries encourage foreign adventurers to mount private campaigns into this region, much like those of their 17th-century predecessors, the “filibusters” (legally defined as individuals who wage war without a recognized government’s sanction). The first country to undergo such incursions is Mexico, still reeling from its defeat in its recent war against the United States.

In December 1850, a group of French investors headed by that nation’s ambassador in Mexico City, André Levasseur, persuades Gov. José de Aguilar and his compliant assembly, in the remote northwestern state of Sonora, to allow their company to develop the potentially rich mining region between the 31st parallel and the newly defined borders with California and New Mexico. Although this unauthorized arrangement fails to win ratification from the national Congress in Mexico City, it nonetheless furnishes an excuse for armed interventions, which the central authorities are powerless to resist.

JUNE 1, 1852. Raousset’s Invasion. Having failed to find any riches during California’s Gold Rush, a 34-year-old French soldier of fortune named Gaston Raoul Raousset, Comte de Boulbon, agrees to recruit and command an armed expedition into Sonora’s interior to stake out a huge new claim in this untamed Indian territory for the Franco-Mexican Restauradora del Mineral de Arizona Mining Company. Having hired 600 mercenaries at San Francisco (California)—260 of them being French—Raousset arrives at the port of Guaymas on June 1. After organizing his small army into six infantry companies, plus one each for cavalry and artillerymen, he strikes north toward Hermosillo on June 13.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1852. While encamped at Magdalena, Raousset receives a message from the new acting governor of Sonora, Fernando Cubillas, ordering that he and his French followers either adopt Mexican citizenship or leave the country. Knowing that this official and Gen. Miguel Blanco, the military commander for the state, are shareholders in a rival mining enterprise, Raousset refuses. Instead, he proclaims Sonora to be an independent country, then marches south with his 184 infantrymen, 50 dragoons, and 25 gunners for four small fieldpieces to defeat Blanco on September 30 and occupy the capital of Hermosillo.

OCTOBER 26, 1852. After almost four weeks of occupation, Raousset’s isolated garrison abandons Hermosillo, retreating south toward Guaymas, while being hounded by Mexican guerrillas under Blanco.

Falling sick with dysentery, Raousset leaves his army nine miles outside Guaymas on October 29 to sail away for Mazatlán, then for San Francisco (California). His survivors are allowed to depart undisturbed after surrendering their artillery train to the Mexican authorities in exchange for 11,000 pesos.

OCTOBER 15, 1853. Walker’s Mexican Adventure. The 29-year-old, self-proclaimed “Colonel” William Walker departs San Francisco with 45 followers aboard the schooner Caroline to carve out a new country. Disembarking in Baja California at La Paz (population 1,100) on November 3, he raises a flag with two stars—ostensibly signifying the union of Baja California and Sonora. He promulgates his newfangled “Republic of Lower California” with himself as president and a constitution modeled on the laws of Louisiana, permitting slavery.

Street fighting erupts 10 days later, though, obliging Walker and his adherents to retreat north into Ensenada, just south of Tijuana, which he designates as his new capital. Despite receiving reinforcements from nearby California, Walker’s hold soon weakens further when he comes into conflict with Ensenada’s local landowner Antonio María Meléndez. The adventurer nonetheless sets out east-northeastward in March 1854 with 100 American filibusters, hoping to push overland into northern Sonora. But after crossing the Colorado River into that state on April 4, he is obliged to turn back.

Now harassed by Mexican guerrillas, Walker is finally defeated by Lt. Col. Javier Castillo Negrete in a skirmish at La Grulla near Santo Tomás Mission, southeast of Ensenada, compelling him to flee northward across the border into California with his 33 remaining followers on May 8. They surrender to U.S. military authorities, and Walker is subsequently tried in San Francisco on a charge of violating the United States's neutrality laws, although he is acquitted that October.

William Walker, self-proclaimed president of Nicaragua from 1856 to 1857. (Library of Congress)

MARCH 1854. Raousset's Demise. After vainly appealing his October 1852 expulsion from Sonora before President Santa Anna in Mexico City, this young adventurer returns to San Francisco (California) and again recruits another 300 mostly French volunteers. Raousset arrives near Guaymas with this force on June 28, 1854 (after a 35-day passage), setting up temporary headquarters in a cave.

Having failed to persuade the local federal commander, Gen. José María Yáñez, to join the ongoing Ayutla Revolution against Santa Anna (see "March 1, 1854" in Ayutla Revolution), Raousset's contingent is eventually defeated by this Mexican general in a three-hour fight on July 31, suffering 100 casualties. The French leader is captured, tried before a military tribunal, then executed in Guaymas's La Mole Square at sunrise of August 12.

APRIL 13, 1855. This evening, the Spanish artillery company holding Fort San Cristóbal in San Juan de Puerto Rico mutinies because its enlistment period has not yet been reduced by two years like sister units in Spain. The island's new royal governor, Lt. Gen. Andrés García Camba, responds by deploying the Valladolid, Cádiz, and Madrid Infantry regiments to contain this insurrection. When a contingent of mutineers sallies to also seize the San Gerónimo arsenal, they are intercepted, two rebels being wounded and eight captured.

Fears of an artillery duel create widespread panic throughout the city the next dawn, three women and a child drowning during the civilians' subsequent flight out into the countryside. However, García Camba is able to persuade the mutineers to lay down their arms, seven eventually facing execution.

MAY 4, 1855. Walker in Nicaragua. The adventurer again departs San Francisco (California), this time with 57 heavily armed American followers, who grandiloquently refer to themselves as "The Immortals," to partake in Nicaragua's civil war. Having been contacted the previous year by that nation's liberal opposition—the Democrat Party—with a request to raise a force of filibusters and join its struggle against the ruling conservative Legitimist Party in exchange for a promised reward of 52,000 acres of land, Walker disembarks by June. Reinforced by 100 more Americans and 170 locals, his so-called Falange Americana immediately plunges into action. Forming the core of the liberal army, Colonel Walker's force defeats the Nicaraguan army at La Virgen by September 1, and then seizes the national capital of Granada on October 13.

Walker has been abetted in this campaign by the American-owned Accessory Transit Company, a corporation headed by the Wall Street tycoon Cornelius Vanderbilt, who wishes to secure a stable overland route from the Caribbean across Central America to the Pacific and then build a railroad. Under the peace arrangements, a coalition government is created under the puppet president Patricio Rivas, while Walker remains as commander in chief of the Nicaraguan army. He eliminates his most formidable rival, the new minister of war and former Legitimist army commander, Ponciano Corral, when

William Walker

William Walker was born on May 8, 1824, in Nashville (Tennessee), the eldest of five children. His Scottish father, James Walker, owned a 752-acre farm next to Indian Creek in Shelby County, and his mother, Mary Norvell, was a member of a well-connected political family. Her brother John was a senator for Michigan and had founded the Philadelphia Inquirer. Raised amid comfort and privilege, young William proved so precocious that he graduated summa cum laude from the University of Nashville by the age of 14. His family was wealthy enough to send him to study medicine at the Universities of Edinburgh and Heidelberg. He returned to obtain his medical degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1843.

After briefly practicing medicine in Philadelphia, the restless young man moved to New Orleans in 1845 to study law. Admitted to the Louisiana bar the next year, Walker worked as a law clerk. He then co-owned and edited The Crescent newspaper and strongly upheld the proslavery views of the Deep South. Saddened by the death of his deaf-mute fiancée Ellen Martin and attracted by reports of the California Gold Rush, Walker sold his interest in the newspaper and moved on to make a fresh start, arriving in San Francisco by 1850. He worked for a time as a journalist, was wounded twice in three duels, then relocated to Marysville to dabble in law.

Walker then decided to put his southern convictions into action. He and many others not only believed in America's "Manifest Destiny" to expand into Mexican and Caribbean territories but they wished that these gains might be admitted into the Union as proslavery states. The Frenchman Raousset's 1852 foray into Mexico threatened this design. Walker therefore visited himself, hoping to secure Mexican permission to create his own colony before a second French attempt might be launched.

Refused, Walker returned to San Francisco to begin selling land grants in his future Mexican colony. He used these funds to raise and arm a force of like-minded southern volunteers. He also chartered the brig Arrow as transport, before the U.S. Army commander at San Francisco, Gen. Ethan A. Hitchcock, arrested him and impounded the vessel. Walker nonetheless slipped away with a small band in October 1853, only to be defeated in Mexico. Sentiment in favor of his filibustering spirit remained so high, though, that a San Francisco jury acquitted him after only eight minutes of deliberation.

Walker again escaped the U.S. authorities with another small force in May 1855, this time to seize power in war-torn Nicaragua. With support from the tycoon Cornelius Vanderbilt, who wished to build a railway across Central America, Walker's conquest was even recognized by Washington in May 1856. But he was driven from that country within a year and failed in two more attempts to reestablish himself. He finally died before a Honduran firing squad at 36 years of age.

compromising letters are uncovered in which Corral asks for the intervention of other Latin American countries to oust Walker; the general is therefore executed for treason.

From November 1855 to June 1856, Walker will rule Nicaragua through Rivas. He also receives more than 1,000 American volunteer reinforcements, brought in free of charge by the Accessory Transit Company in anticipation of expanding his conquest. And in a propaganda move designed to win native support, he is dubbed the Grey-eyed Man in local newspapers so as to take advantage of a Mosquito Indian legend. Washington moreover recognizes the legitimacy of Rivas's regime on May 20, 1856. (This decision, taken during the last year of Franklin Pierce's only term, will seal his fate as one of America's worst presidents.)

Walker thereupon dumps his figurehead, has himself "elected" president of Nicaragua in a rigged vote on June 29, 1856, and assumes office by July 12. He dreams of uniting all of Central America, building railroads, digging a canal, fomenting agriculture by reintroducing African slavery, and becoming absorbed into the United States as proslavery states. However, neighboring republics such as Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Costa Rica fear such an outcome, so they combine forces to prepare a counterinvasion—covertly backed by Great Britain, with its own separate imperialist agenda for this region.

At this point, a rift erupts within the Accessory Transit Company. Walker is offered money and military supplies by Vanderbilt's chief rivals, Cornelius K. Garrison and Charles Morgan, so he revokes Vanderbilt's charter, seizes his ships and properties in Nicaragua, and turns them over to this faction. Furious, the formidable capitalist will work tirelessly toward Walker's downfall. Soon, Washington withdraws its recognition, while funds and matériel are funneled to Walker's enemies. His own flow of supplies is cut off, and most importantly, reinforcements to replace his mercenaries lost to disease or desertion are interrupted. Walker appeals to southern American sympathizers for help, but when the coalition forces finally invade Nicaragua, he is compelled to raze and evacuate his capital of Granada. Cornered inside the town of Rivas with only a handful of surviving followers, he surrenders on May 1, 1857, to Cmdr. Charles Henry Davis of USS St. Mary's to be deported home. Upon disembarking at New Orleans, he will be greeted as a hero by proslavery adherents, who blame his defeat on the U.S. Navy.

APRIL 15, 1856. In Panama City, a riot erupts after months of festering animosity between its inhabitants—many of whom are impoverished blacks—and the tens of thousands of white American travelers streaming across its recently completed trans-Isthmian railway to take ship for California.

On the evening of April 15, a drunken American named Jack Oliver snatches a watermelon slice from a street vendor, contemptuously refusing to pay, then wounding a bystander with his pistol after a mob gathers. This incident quickly escalates into a city-wide rampage derisively dubbed the “Watermelon War,” in which 15 Americans are killed and 16 wounded, compared with 2 Panamanians dead and 13 injured.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1856. Both USS Independence and USS St. Mary's arrive off Panama City, disembarking a small detachment under Cmdr. William Mervine, who occupies its railway station for three days to underscore Washington's displeasure because of the Watermelon War. New Granada's government is compelled to pay more than $412,000 in damages three years later.

MARCH 24, 1857. A band of 104 American filibusters under Henry A. Crabb crosses the border from San Diego (California), capturing Sonoíta (Sonora) two days later. In conjunction with his Mexican accomplice, Agustín Ainza, it is Crabb's intent to create a new breakaway republic in this territory.

However, two columns of Mexican troops move to contain this incursion, one from Ures under Lt. Col. José María Girón and the other under Capt. Lorenzo Gutiérrez. Starting on April 1, 1857, near Caborca, they defeat the invaders in a series of clashes lasting four days. Crabb's main contingent has meanwhile besieged the capital of Hermosillo, whose garrison resists until relieved by Hilario Gabilondo. The American commander and 57 of his followers are subsequently executed in Hermosillo's graveyard on April 7; another 33 have already been shot in isolated groups elsewhere, thus ending this invasion.

NOVEMBER 1857. Eluding the U.S. federal authorities, Walker sets sail from Mobile (Alabama) with 150 filibusters to reclaim the office of Nicaraguan president. Defying the U.S. sloop Saratoga, his expedition disembarks at the Caribbean port of Greytown, only to be overtaken by the American Home Squadron of 60-year-old commodore Hiram Paulding, who throws 350 men ashore and arrests Walker without bloodshed on December 8.

The adventurer is once more returned home, this action meeting with approval from the antislavery states of the North and with disapproval in the South. Nicaragua rewards Paulding with a jeweled sword, whereas the administration of President James Buchanan releases Walker shortly thereafter.

EARLY MARCH 1858. Gen. Julián Castro spearheads a revolt against the despotic Venezuelan president José Tadeo Monagas, compelling this oligarch to resign from office by March 15 and thus ending his family's stranglehold on power. Monagas is given sanctuary in the French Embassy when the triumphant revolutionaries enter Caracas, prompting enraged mobs to attack foreign legations.

MAY 8, 1858. British and French men-of-war enter Caracas's port of La Guaira, peremptorily demanding an apology from the new Venezuelan government for recent revolutionary excesses, which is refused.

DECEMBER 22, 1858. Grown weary of the megalomania of Haiti's self-proclaimed emperor Faustin I, a revolt is initiated at Gonaïves by Fabre Nicolas Geffard, Duc de Tabara and chief of staff for the Imperial Guard. He sweeps triumphantly into the capital of Port-au-Prince by January 15, 1859, while Faustin and his family flee—first into the French Consulate, then afterward sailing for Jamaica aboard the British frigate HMS Melbourne.

AUGUST 1860. After evading Anglo-American naval forces by zigzagging across the Caribbean via Roatán and Cozumel, Walker appears off the Honduran coast in hopes of once again seizing power in Central America. Instead, he is arrested on September 3 by Royal Navy captain Norvell Salmon and turned over to the Honduran authorities at Trujillo, who court-martial Walker and execute him at Trujillo on September 12. The short-lived era of filibusterism is effectively ended.

BUENOS AIRES VERSUS THE ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION (1852–1863)

Following Rosas's flight into exile, the triumphant Urquiza and other delegates from Argentina's interior reorganize the national government along confederate lines, thereby reducing the influence of Buenos Aires. When that city's governor, Vicente López, and other ministers resign in protest on June 23, 1852, thus allowing Gen. Manuel Guillermo Pinto to succeed into office, Urquiza voids this gesture, dissolves the legislature, and compels his most vocal critics to depart the country.

A second insurrection occurs on September 11, three days after Urquiza has quit Buenos Aires to attend the national Congress at Santa Fe. His governor within the capital—Gen. José M. Galán—retires outside it to San Nicolás with his outnumbered troops, allowing Pinto to be proclaimed president and the rebellion to take hold. Rather than plunge Argentina back into civil war, Urquiza sends emissaries into Buenos Aires on September 18, recognizing its separation from Argentina's other provinces. Eventually a rival capital is established at Paraná, with Urquiza as confederate president.

NOVEMBER 16, 1852. In an effort to install a friendlier administration in neighboring Entre Ríos Province, the Buenos Aires authorities dispatch Gen. Manuel Hornos with a small invasion force, which occupies Gualeguaychú, then defeats a confederate force at Calá. Soon, however, an army under Urquiza drives Hornos north into Corrientes Province, where his followers are disarmed.

NOVEMBER 20, 1852. Gen. Juan Madariaga leads a small Buenos Aires force in an abortive landing near Concepción del Uruguay. It reembarks and attempts to storm this place again the next day, only to be repelled by its confederate defenders. Discouraged, Madariaga returns into Buenos Aires.

DECEMBER 1, 1852. Col. Hilario Lagos—campaigning on behalf of Buenos Aires in the center of this province—mutinies against its government, feeling it should join Urquiza's confederacy.

JANUARY 22, 1853. Lagos defeats a Buenos Aires contingent sent to subdue him at Rincón de San Gregorio near the Salado River mouth.

EARLY SPRING 1853. Siege of Buenos Aires. After failing to reconcile with the authorities within the capital, Urquiza arrives to lay siege to the city with his 12,000 troops. The stranglehold is tightened on April 17 when Coe's confederate squadron destroys its Buenos Aires counterpart under Zurowky, then imposes a naval blockade of its port.

Coe, however, is bought off on June 20, bringing his squadron into Buenos Aires in exchange for 26,000 ounces of gold. The confederate Congress thereupon passes a resolution federalizing Buenos Aires, which prompts numerous besieging units—including Lagos's—to switch loyalties and join the defenders. By July 13, Urquiza is obliged to lift his siege and return into Entre Ríos Province, where he retires to his residence at San José and threatens to quit public life altogether.

JULY 10, 1853. Just before raising his siege of the capital, Urquiza signs a treaty with representatives from France, England, and the United States, promising free navigation up the Paraná and Uruguay rivers. This agreement causes much resentment within Buenos Aires, which has traditionally controlled all trade through the River Plate.

MARCH 5, 1854. Urquiza officially takes office as president of the Argentine Confederation.

NOVEMBER 8, 1854. After numerous raids into confederate territory, Gen. Jerónimo Costa's 500 Buenos Aires troopers are defeated at Tala by General Hornos and forced to seek sanctuary in Santa Fe.

DECEMBER 20, 1854. Buenos Aires and the Argentine Confederation sign a truce, then one month later formalize this arrangement with the so-called Pactos de Convivencia or "Convivial Pacts."

MARCH 30, 1855. Indian Wars. To avenge a raid by 5,000 Indians led by Chief Calfucurá that massacred 300 inhabitants of Azul and made off with numerous women captives, 33-year-old colonel Bartolomé Mitre leads 700 troops southward into the Chica Range, while a second 400-man column is to join him later. However, the inexperienced Mitre is defeated by Chief Catriel on May 30, suffering 16 killed and 234 wounded, before withdrawing under cover of darkness.

The next year, General Hornos suffers an even more stunning setback at the hands of Calfucurá when he quits Azul with 3,000 Argentine troops and a dozen fieldpieces to avenge the extermination of Lt. Col. Nicanor Otamendi's 124-man cavalry patrol (only 2 troopers having survived). Hornos is ambushed between the San Jacinto Range and Tapalqué Creek, suffering 270 killed and a like number of captured, along with the loss of his artillery train.

JANUARY 25, 1856. Confederate general José M. Flores violates the truce by invading Buenos Aires Province, only to be defeated at Cardozo Lagoon and driven back into Santa Fe Province. This incursion sparks a brief renewal of hostilities.

JANUARY 31, 1856. General Costa sails from Montevideo and disembarks near Zárate, only to be defeated by Col. Emilio Conesa and executed along with 125 of his followers.

JANUARY 13, 1858. Col. Emilio Mitre leads 2,000 Argentine troops into its southwestern desert to campaign against its Ranquel nomads, yet must turn back after exhausting his supplies.

MAY 29, 1859. After three years of further frictions over customs duties and free passage, the Confederation authorizes Urquiza to use any means necessary to bring Buenos Aires back into the nation.

JULY 7, 1859. Buenos Aires sends the steamers General Pinto and Buenos Aires up the Paraná River to prevent any confederate advance. However, the marines aboard this former vessel mutiny, capture their commander, Col. José Muratore, kill Capt. Alejandro Muratore, and switch loyalties to the Confederation.

OCTOBER 14, 1859. A confederate squadron under Col. Mariano Cordero fights its way past the Buenos Aires garrison on Martín García Island

Bartolomé Mitre

Bartolomé Mitre was born on June 26, 1821, in Buenos Aires. He spent his first four years at Carmen de Patagones, where his father, Ambrosio, was sent as a minor official. The family was then moved to Montevideo in 1825. At 14 years of age, the intelligent young Bartolomé was enrolled in the "Consulado" Commercial School. He was sent back into Argentina in 1836 to work on one of Rosas's rural estates. The bookish teenager, however, did not like the wealthy landowner or his own situation in the countryside, so he returned to Montevideo.

That same year, 15-year-old Bartolomé was enrolled in Uruguay's Military Academy. He also joined its Journalism Academy in 1837, starting a career as a newspaperman and author. He wrote numerous poems and articles before fighting as an artillery ensign two years later against the Rosista invasion at the Battle of Cagancha, as well as in the Uruguayan defeat at Arroyo Grande in 1842. Although he eventually was promoted as high as lieutenant colonel, it was Mitre's great erudition that sustained him during several years of exile after 1845.

An avid reader, Mitre learned Portuguese, French, English, and Italian in addition to his native Spanish, publishing many translations and other works. After living briefly in Brazil and Chile, the Bolivian president Balivián invited Mitre in 1846 to organize that nation's Military College. When the president was deposed in a coup two years later, Mitre proceeded to Peru and Chile. He published various newspapers and books there, despite being temporarily deported in April 1851.

The impending collapse of Rosas's regime drew Mitre back to Argentina. He took part in the Battle of Caseros in February 1852. As a long-time liberal exile and influential man of letters, he was offered a university chair and elected as a representative. However, the confederate leader Urquiza dissolved the legislature a few months later and expelled his critics.

Mitre returned to Montevideo. By September 1852, though, he was back in Buenos Aires as commander of its National Infantry Guard. A leading political figure, he was appointed by President Valentín Alsina as foreign minister and army chief of staff. Although wounded while defending the besieged capital in June 1853, Mitre was soon after promoted to inspector general. His meteoric rise culminated with the presidency in 1862.

to proceed up the Paraná River and aid Urquiza's advance.

OCTOBER 22, 1859. Cepeda. Urquiza arrives north of Pavón Creek with 10,000 confederate troopers, 3,000 infantrymen, and 1,000 gunners and auxiliaries manning 32 fieldpieces. To the south awaits General Mitre with 4,700 Buenos Aires foot soldiers, 4,000 cavalymen, and 300 gunners for two-dozen guns. This day, a Buenos Aires cavalry force under General Hornos crosses Medio Creek and clashes near Rica Canyon with advance confederate elements, only to retire once reinforcements are rushed to this scene.

On October 23, confederate general Virasoro drives in Mitre's skirmishers from the east bank of Medio Creek, then Urquiza's main army crosses and slowly takes up position opposite the Buenos Aires lines. His attack does not actually start until 6:00 p.m., the confederate cavalry on both flanks soon defeating their outnumbered opponents. Meanwhile, the confederate infantry is split asunder trying to avoid the 16-gun battery in the Buenos Aires center; Mitre is nevertheless doomed, his infantry on the left flank being annihilated when ordered to redeploy toward the right.

By 11:00 p.m., the Buenos Aires survivors are streaming off in defeat, Mitre reaching San Nicolás (50 miles away) with only 2,000 men and 6 cannon after a 36-hour forced march. Urquiza remains in possession of 2,000 prisoners, 20 fieldpieces, and all the baggage trains.

NOVEMBER 7, 1859. Urquiza's confederate army—now swollen to 20,000 men—halts at San José de Flores, and four days later Buenos Aires agrees to become reincorporated into the Argentine union.

NOVEMBER 16, 1860. After a year of uneasy peace, the people of San Juan Province rise up against confederate rule, killing Gov. José Antonio Virasoro (brother of the general) and 14 members of his retinue. The wealthy liberal merchant, Dr. Antonio Aberastain, is installed in his place, and Col. Juan Sáa—the confederate governor of neighboring San Luis—is sent to deal with his insurrection.

JANUARY 11, 1861. At Rinconada del Pocito, Aberastain's small force is quickly dispersed by the confederate cavalry vanguard under Francisco Clavero. Stripped and compelled to march on foot back toward town among the other captives, Aberastain collapses, so is shot. Colonel Sáa's army also commits numerous excesses upon entering San Juan, allegedly murdering as many as 400 inhabitants. These brutal expedients provoke such an outcry, especially in Buenos Aires, that Clavero must even subsequently flee into Chile.

APRIL 15, 1861. Valentín Alsida and Rufino de Elizalde, duly elected Buenos Aires delegates to the national Congress, have their credentials challenged and are refused their seats. Rather than hold new elections, Mitre and his followers begin preparing for war.

JULY 5, 1861. The Argentine Confederation accuses Buenos Aires of violating the peace and preaching sedition, therefore authorizes the use of force to restore order. Two days later, Mitre proclaims martial law within Buenos Aires, and Urquiza is appointed to once more command the confederate armies.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1861. After mustering at Rojas, the main Buenos Aires army under Mitre reaches Pergamino.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1861. Pavón. Mitre crosses Medio Creek and camps a mile to its north with 9,000 Buenos Aires infantrymen, 6,000 cavalry troopers, and 1,000 gunners and auxiliaries to man 35 fieldpieces. North of nearby Pavón Creek, Urquiza is meanwhile attempting to organize his 11,000 confederate troopers, 5,000 ill-disciplined foot soldiers, and 42 cannon.

In spite of such difficulties, the latter chooses to assume the offensive the next day, crossing the Pavón to take up position near Villa Constitución, opposite his Buenos Aires enemy. Around noon of September 17, Mitre launches a concentric attack with his infantry, charging through an artillery barrage to break the smaller confederate line. Meanwhile, the more numerous confederate cavalry disperse the Buenos Aires troopers, yet are unable to follow up their advantage due to the large formations of well-trained infantry guarding Mitre's baggage train in the rear. Seeing his infantry and artillery succumb, while his riders are scattering beyond his control, a demoralized Urquiza orders a general confederate retreat toward Rosario, leaving behind 1,650 prisoners, 37 guns, 5,000 mounts, 3,000 rifles, and his supply train, vowing never more to fight in Argentina's civil wars.

OCTOBER 4, 1861. Arroyo Manantial. Confederate general Octaviano Navarro's 4,000 troops—marching upon Santiago del Estero Province to re-install its governor after a liberal uprising led by the Taboadas—defeat 2,000 Tucumán rebels under Gen. José María del Campo at Manantial Creek. Despite this victory and the subsequent occupation of Santiago del Estero, Navarro proves unable to reimpose confederate rule, so he retires to Catamarca.

OCTOBER 11, 1861. Mitre's triumphant Buenos Aires army occupies Rosario.

NOVEMBER 5, 1861. Confederate president Santiago Derqui resigns.

NOVEMBER 13, 1861. Confederate governor Allende is deposed at Córdoba, and when generals Sáa and Juan de Dios Videla march to reinstall him, they are dispersed and compelled to flee into Chile by the approach of 3,000 Buenos Aires troops under Gen. Wenceslao Paunero.

NOVEMBER 22, 1861. Cañada de Gómez. A Buenos Aires cavalry column under Gen. Venancio Flores surprises 1,300 confederate troopers under Virasoro in Gómez Canyon. The latter launches an immediate charge, only to be lured into a trap and to suffer 300 killed, 150 captured, and the dispersal of his survivors. This defeat marks the end of effective confederate resistance.

DECEMBER 13, 1861. The confederate vice president, General Pedernera, dissolves his government, leaving Buenos Aires's Mitre as de facto president over all of Argentina.

DECEMBER 17, 1861. Liberal generals Antonio and Manuel Taboada easily disperse 2,400 confederates gathered under Gen. Celedonio Gutiérrez at Seibal in Tucumán Province, slaying 40.

JANUARY 1862. Mendoza and San Juan are occupied without resistance by Buenos Aires colonel Ignacio Rivas.

FEBRUARY 10, 1862. Confederate generals Peñaloza and Gutiérrez are defeated at Monte Grande (also called Río Colorado, 20 miles south of Tucumán) by José María del Campo.

MARCH 4, 1862. Confederate general Peñaloza enters the city of Rioja unopposed, its 600-man Buenos Aires garrison under Colonel Echegaray having withdrawn earlier (as well as deserting afterward). One week later at Salinas de Moreno, however, Peñaloza is overtaken and defeated by Col. Ambrosio Sandes.

APRIL 3, 1862. At Chañaral Negro, on the Quinto River banks in San Luis Province, Col. José Iseas defeats 300 confederate partisans under Fructuoso Ontiveros.

APRIL 12, 1862. Confederate general Peñaloza attacks Iseas's forces at Casas Viejas on the western edge of Córdoba Province, only to be bloodily repulsed and obliged to withdraw toward San Luis. His 1,600 confederates arrive five days later and lay siege to the 300 defenders within the city of San Luis. By April 21, the latter are willing to capitulate, but before Peñaloza can consummate this occupation, he is compelled to flee because of the approach of bonarense colonel Iseas.

JUNE 20, 1862. Peñaloza signs a truce with the Buenos Aires government.

OCTOBER 12, 1862. Mitre is officially installed as president of Argentina.

LATE DECEMBER 1862. Col. Julio de Vedia departs Bragado with 1,000 troopers to pursue the elusive Ranquel nomads of Argentina's southwestern deserts.

MARCH 31, 1863. Peñaloza rises up against Mitre's rule, and a series of skirmishes are fought by government troops against confederate guerrillas during the next month and a half: at Callecita on March 31, at Punta de Agua on April 2, at Villaprima 19 days afterward, at Chumbicha on April 22, at Mal Paso on May 3, at Santa Rosa four days later, and at Lomas Blancas on May 20.

JUNE 1863. Confederate exiles, led out of Chile by Colonel Clavero, invade southern Mendoza Province and briefly occupy Fort San Rafael before being defeated by government commander Juan Manuel Puebla.

JUNE 10, 1863. Las Playas. Gov. Justiniano Pose is deposed at Córdoba and replaced by Simón Luengo, who summons Peñaloza to take over office, arriving three days later with 100 followers to set about organizing the city defenses.

Some time later, Peñaloza sorties four miles south to Las Playas with 3,500 men to confront 4,000 government troops—the 1st, 2nd, and 7th Cavalry regiments, plus a force of National Guards—which are approaching from San Luis under General Paunero. The latter defeats the defenders and drives them into Rioja Province.

AUGUST 21, 1863. Ontiveros's 200 confederate partisans are defeated at San Francisco in San Luis Province, then again four days later at Río Seco.

AUGUST 25, 1863. Confederate guerrilla leader Puebla is defeated on the banks of the Sauces River in San Luis Province, losing 100 of 150 men.

OCTOBER 30, 1863. Some 1,000 confederate partisans under Puebla are scattered from Caucete (San Juan Province) by 150 government troopers and 80 foot soldiers under Mayor Pablo Irrazábal. The next day, the retreating guerrillas are attacked again at Bajo de los Gigantes by another government force under Colonel Arredondo and routed.

NOVEMBER 12, 1863. Accompanied by only 50 followers, Peñaloza is surprised at the town of Olta in Rioja Province and captured by a flying column of government cavalry under Capt. Ricardo Vera. Upon Irrazábal's arrival, the confederate chieftain is executed and his head exhibited upon a spike.

Although soon distracted by the larger Paraguayan conflict (see "War of the Triple Alliance"), Argentina's politics continues to be riven by this Buenos Aires–hinterland split.

AYUTLA REVOLUTION (1853–1855)

On February 6, 1853, the exiled Santa Anna is elected president of Mexico for the fifth and final time. His last two years in office are to be marked by increasing internal strife, exploding into the "Revolution of Ayutla," which in turn will culminate a few years later with the "War of the Reform" and "French Intervention in Mexico" (see "War of the Reform" and "French Intervention in Mexico").

FEBRUARY 7, 1853. The 51-year-old general Manuel María Lombardini leads a coup against Juan Bautista Ceballos, who is temporarily occupying the presidency until Santa Anna can arrive from his exile at Turbaco outside Cartagena (Colombia) to assume office.

APRIL 20, 1853. Santa Anna reaches Mexico City and becomes president.

SUMMER TO AUTUMN 1853. Santa Anna negotiates numerous territorial disputes with U.S. ambassador James Gadsen, creating unease in Mexico because of the nature of these claims.

DECEMBER 16, 1853. Santa Anna seizes dictatorial powers by abolishing all political parties, dispensing with the legislature and demanding to be addressed as "Most Serene Highness."

DECEMBER 30, 1853. Santa Anna signs the Gadsden Treaty, whereby Mexico cedes to the United States freedom of transit for mails, merchandise, and troops across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, plus readjusting the boundaries of the earlier Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo so as to give the Americans almost 30,000 more square miles in New Mexico and Arizona, in exchange for $10 million. Mexican public sentiment is outraged.

MARCH 1, 1854. Uprising. Col. Florencio Villareal leads the garrison of Ayutla (Guerrero) in a mutiny against Santa Anna's rule. What makes this uprising unusual among the numerous other insurrections then breaking out is that Villareal proclaims the Plan de Ayutla—a liberal program drawn up by his 63-year-old superior, the ex-governor Juan Nepomuceno Álvarez, and the illiterate, 54-year-old brigadier general Tomás Moreno to reform Mexico's government by deposing its dictator, then convening a national Congress to draft a new constitution. The reformers' democratic appeal will gradually attract many adherents.

MARCH 11, 1854. The Acapulco garrison embraces the Plan de Ayutla, led by its 41-year-old ex-customs collector Ignacio Comonfort, who furthermore calls upon Álvarez to assume command over the grandly named Restaurador de la Libertad or “Restorer of Liberty” army. This offer is accepted on March 13, Moreno agreeing to act as its second-in-command.

MARCH 16, 1854. Having ordered Gen. Luis Noriega and Col. Francisco Cosío Bahamonde to close in upon Guerrero from different directions, Santa Anna marches out of Mexico City at the head of 5,000 troops to help put down the uprisings on the Pacific coast.

MARCH 30, 1854. Having shot numerous persons suspected of disloyalty, and twice been attacked by Faustino Villalba’s guerrillas on both banks of the Balsas River near Mezcala (state of Guerrero), Santa Anna’s army finally reaches the mountain pass at Chilpancingo to head down from the Sierra Madre Mountains into coastal lands.

APRIL 13, 1854. Santa Anna’s army fights a skirmish against rebel forces at El Coquillo (state of Guerrero).

APRIL 20, 1854. Siege of Acapulco. Santa Anna’s army arrives and attempts to surprise Comonfort’s rebel garrison within Fort San Diego. After six days of fruitless bombardment and siege, the attackers are compelled to retire because of outbreaks of disease and lack of provisions, torching numerous dwellings during their retreat.

APRIL 30, 1854. Guerrilla partisans hound Santa Anna’s retreat, so he eventually fights a rearguard action at Peregrino Hill, which sufficiently bloodies his pursuers under Diego and Encarnación Álvarez and allows his crippled army to proceed. This ignominious withdrawal from the coast, however, greatly inspires other rebellions. Comonfort, meanwhile, sets sail from Acapulco to San Francisco to raise financing in the United States.

JULY 12, 1854. The 41-year-old brigadier general Félix María Zuloaga—loyal to Santa Anna—defeats the guerrilla chief Villalba at Iguala, killing him.

DECEMBER 7, 1854. Comonfort returns to Acapulco, from where he advances northwest shortly thereafter into Michoacán to spread the revolt.

JANUARY 1855. Zuloaga’s 1,000 men and five field-pieces are besieged within Nuxco Hacienda (Guerrero) by rebel forces under General Álvarez. The former eventually agree to switch sides and take up arms against Santa Anna. The same happens with the garrison at Ajuchitlán under Colonel Vélez once these rebels capture nearby Huétamo.

FEBRUARY 25, 1855. Liberal general Álvarez marches toward Chilpancingo (Guerrero) but halts two miles short of this city at Mazatlán Hacienda, deciding not to subject its populace to a siege.

FEBRUARY 26, 1855. Liberal forces take the garrison at Chilapa (Guerrero).

AUGUST 4, 1855. Santa Anna resigns from office and, five days later, flees Mexico City for Veracruz, where the ship Iturbide carries him off toward Cuba and back into exile at Turbaco (Colombia).

After triumphantly entering Mexico City, General Álvarez is provisionally elected president that October and convenes a constitutional congress to commence the year-long process of reforming Mexico’s institutions. Although the liberals may have defeated Santa Anna, they will soon encounter much more serious opposition from the country’s conservatives (see “War of the Reform” and “French Intervention in Mexico”).

WAR OF THE REFORM (1858–1860)

The united victory over Santa Anna in August 1855 only masks the fact that, ever since Mexico’s independence from Spain, the country has become increasingly polarized between conservative, centrist forces who wish to maintain its old colonial institutions largely intact—especially with respect to social status and privilege as well as the predominance of the Catholic Church—against liberal, federalist forces who feel that the break with the mother country should also have been accompanied by a loosening of all such entrenched practices. Both sides are diametrically opposed, conservatives arguing for a return to a constitutional monarchy and hierarchical social order to avoid the weakness and anarchy of republican rule, while liberals insist upon ever-greater reforms so that more Mexicans are able to participate and thus have a vested interest in their country's affairs.

The liberal Congress rewriting Mexico's constitution uncovers these fissures with its very first pronouncement on November 23, 1855, when the 49-year-old justice minister Benito P. Juárez (a former political prisoner and exile) orders the exclusive tribunals for members of the military and clergy abolished. Conservative protests quickly erupt throughout the nation under the cry of ¡Religión y fueros! or "Religion and privileges."

DECEMBER 12, 1855.

An antiliberal revolt breaks out in the mountain village of Zacapoaxtla (Puebla), led by the local priest Francisco Ortega y García, who is joined one week later by the conservative colonels Luis Gonzaga Osollo and Juan Olloqui. The newly installed, liberal interim president Ignacio Comonfort responds by ordering on December 14 that a small army converge upon this region under the overall command of a political appointee, 37-year-old acting governor Ignacio de la Llave y Segura Zevallos of Veracruz.

However, when the first regiment from Mexico City reaches Tatlaquitepec on Christmas Day, its second-in-command—24-year-old lieutenant colonel Miguel Miramón—arrests his superior Col. Rafael Benavides, and this whole force joins the rebellion. De la Llave is lucky to return alive into the capital a few days later, with only a handful of loyal officers. A second liberal brigade sent under Brig. Gen. Severo del Castillo also joins the rebel ranks. The 45-year-old conservative general Antonio Haro y Tamariz escapes from confinement at Veracruz the next month to assume military leadership over this rebellion.

JANUARY 23, 1856. The conservative rebel army of Haro, del Castillo, Osollo, and Miramón fights its way into the city of Puebla, assisted by Bishop Pelagio Antonio de Labastida y Dávalos, to expel its liberal National Guard defenders under 34-year-old militia colonel Juan Nepomuceno Méndez.

MARCH 1, 1856. Ocotlán. Comonfort arrives at San Martín Texmelucan, personally commanding 12,000 liberal troops. The president halts his advance to offer amnesty to Haro's rebel forces, ensconced inside nearby Puebla. When no answer is received within six days, Comonfort orders his brigadier generals Moreno and Italian-born Luigi Ghilardi to close upon the city at dawn of March 8.

Haro (a lifelong friend and colleague of the president) sallies to meet this liberal attack from atop Ocotlán Hill. Fighting rages until 10:00 a.m., when a truce is arranged to gather up the wounded and dead. The conservative commander also requests an interview with Comonfort, so they meet beneath a tree at noon. The president renews his amnesty offer, and Haro requests three hours to discuss the matter with his colleagues.

He fails to return at the appointed hour, though, and when Comonfort sends a rider to investigate, he reports that the outnumbered and demoralized conservatives are in full retreat back into Puebla. The liberal army therefore follows and bottles them inside, until the rebels agree to capitulate by March 23. Haro is carried off to prison in Mexico City, where he dies shortly thereafter; Osollo and del Castillo succeed in escaping, while Miramón hides within Puebla. All other rebel officers are stripped of their rank two days afterward and incorporated into the liberal army as privates. Many church properties are moreover expropriated to defray the costs of this campaign, while Bishop Lamadrid is deported from Mexico, actions that fuel resentment among the faithful.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1856. Uncovering a Franciscan conspiracy in Mexico City, President Comonfort abolishes this order throughout Mexico, expels its clergymen, nationalizes its properties, and begins tearing down sections of its huge convent in the capital.

OCTOBER 19, 1856. At 1:00 a.m., Capt. Leónides Campo awakens the liberal governor of Puebla, requesting that two captives—the fugitive conservative commanders Miramón and Francisco Vélez—be incarcerated in the same cell as Lt. Col. Luis Reyes. When the governor tries to comply, though, he is suddenly disarmed by Campo, and the four conservatives allow their fellow-conspirator Col. Joaquín Francisco Orihuela to enter the palace and assume command over the city garrison.

Learning of this reversal, liberal general Moreno arrives outside Puebla six days later with 4,000 troops and 30 artillery pieces, laying siege to the city. He is superseded the next month by the 23-year-old brigadier general Leandro Valle Martínez, before all resistance finally collapses on December 15. The conservatives scatter, Orihuela being captured and executed some days later at San Andrés Chalchicomula, while Miramón (an academy classmate of Valle), Vélez, and Manuel Ramírez Arrellano are apparently allowed to escape with 100 men toward Toluca.

FEBRUARY 5, 1857. Mexico's rewritten or "reformed" liberal constitution is unveiled, setting off an even greater wave of resentment among conservative elements, as well as dismay among some moderate liberals. Even Comonfort, who has now been duly elected president, hesitates to assume office on December 1 under its aegis.

DECEMBER 17, 1857. Brigadier General Zuloaga—now one of Comonfort's proteges (see "July 12, 1854" entry in "Ayutla Revolution")—leads a mutiny by the Mexico City garrison, proclaiming the "Tacubaya Plan." This plan proposes that the liberal constitution be voided, that Comonfort be recognized as president, and that a new Congress be convened to draft a more moderate document. The president accepts these conditions two days later, dissolving the liberal Congress, while Justice Minister Juárez—legally next in line of succession to the presidency and author of many of the constitution's changes—is jailed.

JANUARY 11, 1858. After three weeks of confused indecision, conservative general José de la Parra, with the Tacubaya garrison on the capital's outskirts, mutinies against Comonfort's rule. After a brief spate of fighting around Mexico City's Ciudadela or "Citadel," the president—now out of favor with conservatives and liberals alike—agrees to resign from office, fleeing the capital by January 21 and taking ship from Veracruz for New Orleans on February 7.

Before departing, Comonfort has released Juárez from prison, who proclaims himself president and travels clandestinely to the city of Guanajuato to begin organizing liberal resistance against the conservative coup. Meanwhile, Zuloaga is proclaimed as a rival conservative president in Mexico City on January 22, abolishing all liberal reforms.

JANUARY 19, 1858. Juárez reaches Guanajuato and is recognized as the legitimate president of Mexico by its liberal governor, Manuel Doblado. The states of Querétaro, Michoacán, Colima, Zacatecas, and Aguascalientes will soon follow suit, followed later by Veracruz, Oaxaca, Nuevo León, and Guerrero.

FEBRUARY 14, 1858. Threatened by the approach of 5,400 conservative regulars under General Osollo, Juárez transfers his liberal headquarters from Guanajuato to Guadalajara, arriving there by the next day.

MARCH 10, 1858. Salamanca. The War of the Reform officially erupts when conservative general Osollo—seconded by brigadier generals Miguel Miramón, Tomás Mejía, Francisco García Casanova, and José María Blancarte—leads 5,400 soldiers into battle against a liberal militia throng gathered at Salamanca in the state of Guanajuato under liberal general Anastasio Parrodi, as well as brigadier generals Leandro Valle, Doblado, Mariano Moret, and others. The former emerge victorious by March 11, forcing the vanquished liberals to fall back upon Guadalajara.

Typical Mexican uniform. (Archivo General de la Nación, Mexico)

MARCH 13, 1858. Upon learning this morning of the liberal defeat at Salamanca, Guadalajara's 5th Battalion under Col. Antonio Landa mutinies against Juárez, parading him and his cabinet before a firing squad the next day, only to be saved at the last moment by the eloquence of Minister Guillermo Prieto, who persuades the soldiers to lower their weapons and spare their lives. Landa's mutineers nonetheless ransack the palace before decamping on March 15, the day before Parrodi enters Guadalajara with his surviving troops.

MARCH 20, 1858. Juárez is forced to flee Guadalajara for the Pacific coast with 90 liberal troopers, leaving General Parrodi to surrender the city to the approaching conservative army under Osollo the next day.

MARCH 23, 1858. Osollo's victorious conservative army occupies Guadalajara without resistance, in accordance with the terms of Parrodi's capitulation agreement of two days previously.

APRIL 11, 1858. After a close pursuit by conservative riders, Juárez is able to depart Manzanillo (Colima) aboard the American steamer John L. Stephens, accompanied by four cabinet ministers.

APRIL 17, 1858. At Carretas Pass near Ahualulco de los Pinos in the state of San Luis Potosí, the 36-year-old conservative brigadier general Miramón wins a victory over a liberal concentration under 36-year-old general Juan Zuazua, Brig. Gen. José Silvestre Aramberri, and Col. Francisco Naranjo.

APRIL 27, 1858. While Miramón is distracted elsewhere, liberal general Zuazua captures the conservative garrison holding the city of Zacatecas.

LATE APRIL 1858. First Siege of Guadalajara. Bespectacled generals Santos Degollado and Pedro Ogazón Rubio arrive to besiege Guadalajara with the 1st Liberal Division, which is defended by conservative generals Casanova and Blancarte. This operation lasts until June 13, when the attackers are obliged to raise their siege.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

MAY 4, 1858. After passing through Panama, Havana, and New Orleans, Juárez and his fugitive liberal cabinet reach Veracruz aboard the American steamer Tennessee; they are greeted and installed in office by Gov. Manuel Gutiérrez Zamora.

JUNE 18, 1858. Following the demise of General Osollo from typhoid fever in San Luis Potosí, the 26-year-old Miramón—who is at Guadalajara—and his 38-year-old rival Leonardo Márquez Araujo at San Luis Potosí vie to succeed Osollo as commander in chief of the conservatives' main Ejército del Norte or "Northern Army." Their strategies are to drive off Degollado's forces, which are threatening Guadalajara, defeat the liberal army advancing southward from Nuevo León and Coahuila under Gen. Santiago Vidaurri, then shift southeastward to expel Juárez's government from Veracruz.

JUNE 30, 1858. Vidaurri's liberal subordinate Zuazua drives Márquez's conservative garrison out of the city of San Luis Potosí and occupies it. Bishop Pedro Barajas is expelled along with most of the clergy, while buildings are ransacked. When Vidaurri arrives in mid-August, he imposes forced loans and expels all Spanish citizens.

Miguel Miramón. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

JULY 2, 1858. Atenquique. Liberal generals Degollado, Miguel Blanco, and Valle are overtaken by conservative generals Miramón, Vélez, and Ruelas, advancing southward from Sayula. They fight a heavy but indecisive battle at the bottom of Atenquique Ravine (near modern Ciudad Guzmán, Jalisco).

The next day, other liberal forces reimpose a siege upon Guadalajara, which they maintain until they are compelled to lift it on July 21—despite having fought in as far as the Hospicio—when Miramón returns from his southern foray.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1858. Second Siege of Guadalajara. When Miramón is obliged to forsake the state of Jalisco to bolster Márquez's hard-pressed conservative forces in central Mexico, liberal general Degollado is able to defeat Casanova at Cuevitas near Techaluta, then six days later begin to once again besiege Guadalajara, seconded by Ogazón, Núñez, Sánchez Román, and Antonio Corona.

After repeated assaults, its conservative garrison commander Blancarte finally capitulates on October 28, the victors entering the next day amid great disorder (during which Blancarte and numerous other conservatives are summarily executed). The ensuing occupation lasts two months before the liberals evacuate the city.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1858. Ahualulco de los Pinos. After recuperating the state capital of San Luis Potosí in central Mexico and installing a conservative garrison under Juan Othón, generals Miramón, Márquez, Mejía, and Cobos overtake the liberal forces of generals Vidaurri, Zuazua, Aramberri, and Naranjo entrenched at nearby Ahualulco de los Pinos. Márquez leads a flanking maneuver that shakes the liberals' line, then Miramón finishes them off with a charge against their center. This victory—leaving 672 liberals dead and 91 captured—greatly elevates the youthful Miramón's prestige, at Márquez's expense, but his conservative army emerges so low on ammunition and supplies that it cannot march to Guadalajara's relief.

OCTOBER 15, 1858. Liberal general Blanco leads a small army from Morelia through the Valley of

Miguel Miramón

Miguel Gregorio de la Luz Atenógenes Miramón y Tarelo was born in Mexico City on November 17, 1831, 1 of 10 children of Lt. Col. Bernardo Miramón. As a child, Miguel studied at the prestigious San Gregorio College, until his father was assigned to a tour of duty in Tlaxcala. He enrolled his son in the Military Academy at Chapultepec Castle, just outside the capital, on February 10, 1846. The teenage cadet took part in its unsuccessful defense against the American invasion of September 1847, being slightly wounded and captured. Released after hostilities ended in June 1848, Miramón finished his military studies at the academy by November 1851. The next year, he was posted as a sublieutenant of artillery to the 2nd Division at Perote (Veracruz).

Smart and dashing, Miramón won promotion to captain, then rejoined the academy as an infantry tactics instructor on April 13, 1853. Staunchly conservative, he supported Santa Anna against the liberal "Ayutla Revolution," which erupted in March 1854. Put in command of a Baja Californian company at Toluca, Miramón wounded a man in a duel and was detained until his opponent recovered. He then joined Santa Anna's campaign in the state of Guerrero.

Miramón won a field promotion to lieutenant colonel in the Battle of Tepehuajalco, but Santa Anna was eventually exiled by August 1855. The new liberal government nonetheless confirmed Miramón's promotion by that same December 10. But when his regiment was sent four days later to help put down a conservative uprising at Zacapoaxtla, Miramón instead arrested his superior and joined the revolt. He helped defend the conservative stronghold of Puebla in 1856, before escaping with the help of his former academy classmate Leandro Valle, now a liberal brigadier general.

When the War of the Reform exploded the next year, the 26-year-old Miramón soon began to distinguish himself as a brilliant and energetic brigadier general. On the death of conservative general Luis Osollo in June 1858, Miramón's bravery and skill gained him promotion to full general by December. Then the next month, President Zuloaga was toppled by a coup in the capital, and the office was offered to Miramón. He was sworn in on February 2, 1859; at 27 years of age, he was Mexico's youngest-ever president. A little more than eight years later, he was shot dead.

Toluca to assault the very outskirts of Mexico City. Brig. Gen. Leandro Valle fights in as far as San Antonio Abad before being wounded and replaced by Brig. Gen. José Justo Álvarez. The liberal attackers are beaten off and retreat toward Michoacán.

OCTOBER 26, 1858. The conservative garrison within Villahermosa de Tabasco is besieged by liberal forces out of Tabasco and Chiapas, surrendering on November 7.

DECEMBER 8, 1858. Jalisco Counteroffensive. In a series of encounters along the banks of the Santiago River—from Puente Grande near Toluatlán as far as Atequiza—conservative generals Miramón, Márquez, and Cobos defeat liberal generals Degollado, Ogazón, and Contreras Medellín, the final battle occurring on December 14 at San Miguel Ranch, three miles from Poncitlán, which allows the conservative troops to reoccupy Guadalajara that same day. On December 20, Miramón again defeats Degollado in a skirmish at San Joaquín Ranch, 15 miles outside the state line of Colima, hastening the liberals' retirement six days afterward.

DECEMBER 20, 1858. Gen. Miguel María Echegaray revolts at Ayotla (state of Mexico), seconded three days later in the capital by Manuel Robles Pezuela, who deposes conservative President Zuloaga. Both commanders therefore briefly control Mexico City, during which time they issue the so-called Plan de Navidad or "Christmas Plan," in hopes of ending the civil war.

Instead, they must submit because of lack of support, and the conservative presidency is offered to the victorious Miramón in Jalisco by early January 1859, who refuses. The now thoroughly discredited Zuloaga is consequently reinstalled on January 24, but resigns in favor of Miramón one week later, who reaches Mexico City by February 2 to accept the mantle.

JANUARY 10, 1859. An ammunition dump in Guadalajara explodes, causing extensive damage to its municipal palace.

FEBRUARY 16, 1859. First Siege of Veracruz. Miramón departs Mexico City at the head of his army, marching down from the central highlands to besiege Juárez's liberal government within Veracruz. Slowed by numerous guerrilla attacks, the conservatives do not install their siege works until March 17. Moreover, this operation is soon interrupted by news that Degollado is driving upon Mexico City with a large liberal army, prompting Miramón to withdraw his forces by month's end.

FEBRUARY 18, 1859. Liberal general Degollado subdues the conservative garrison at León (state of Guanajuato).

MARCH 1, 1859. Degollado seizes the city of Guanajuato, advancing through Querétaro toward Mexico City. At Calamanda Hacienda, south of the city of Querétaro, one of his liberal divisions under Gen. José María Arteaga chances upon conservative general Mejía's lancer corps and is badly cut up. Mejía and Callejo are both hastening toward the capital with their contingents to bolster its conservative garrison before the liberals can arrive.

MARCH 22, 1859. Tacubaya. Degollado appears outside Mexico City with more than 6,000 liberal troops, occupying its suburbs of Tacubaya and Chapultepec. However, General Corona's 4,000 defenders are well entrenched and heartened by news that Márquez is hastening from Guadalajara to their relief.

Degollado defers attacking until April 2, when he probes the Tlaxpana and San Cosme defenses without success. A few days later, Márquez arrives with his conservative relief column and, on March 10, goes over to the offensive. This day and the next, Degollado's liberals suffer a crushing defeat at the hands of the conservatives around Tacubaya, which sends their survivors streaming southwestward from the capital, back toward Jalisco and Michoacán. Márquez mars this triumph by ordering every liberal captive executed—including medical personnel and civilians—thus earning the sobriquet "Tiger of Tacubaya."

Once this battle is concluded, Miramón belatedly regains the Valley of Mexico, annoyed to discover that his old rival Márquez has won all the accolades for defeating Degollado.

APRIL 1, 1859. Immediately after Miramón has lifted his siege of Veracruz, the American representative Robert H. MacLane reaches that port and, five days later, recognizes the legitimacy of Juárez's government. This provokes violent conservative criticism, knowing that Washington will expect territorial and commercial concessions from Mexico in exchange for their assistance.

JULY 12, 1859. To finance American aid and maintain his government, Juárez issues the first Leyes de Reforma or "Reform Laws" at Veracruz, confiscating most church properties. Conservatives violently oppose these measures.

SEPTEMBER 1859. At San Leonel (Nayarit), the 31-year-old conservative brigand Manuel Lozada—born Manuel García González—disperses a liberal cavalry troop under Colonel Valenzuela.

NOVEMBER 2, 1859. After a week's skirmishing, Lozada assaults Tepic.

NOVEMBER 13, 1859. Estancia de Vacas. After meeting at Calera Hacienda to attempt to resolve their differences, Miramón attacks liberal generals Degollado, Arteaga, and Doblado's 7,000 troops six miles outside the city of Querétaro, at the Estancia de Vacas Ranch. At first, the battle goes well for the liberals, but Degollado is eventually obliged to retreat into prearranged defenses, at which point Miramón launches a devastating assault, which collapses liberal morale. His enemies stream off in defeat, leaving Miramón master of the field. Shortly thereafter, he marches into Guadalajara, arresting his rival Márquez on a charge of theft and sending him as prisoner to Mexico City.

DECEMBER 14, 1859. MacLane signs a treaty with Juárez's foreign minister Melchor Ocampo at Veracruz, whereby the United States will provide the liberal government with $4 million in exchange for free passage for rail lines across both the Isthmus of Tehuantepec and northwestern Mexico, to be guarded by American troops. (Conservatives are outraged, but the MacLane-Ocampo Treaty eventually fails to win ratification in the U.S. Senate.)

DECEMBER 24, 1859. After a long pursuit during which Miramón has defeated liberal general Ogazón at Beltrán (Jalisco), the conservative general also beats Juan Rocha at Tonila (also called Albarrada, state of Colima).

FEBRUARY 8, 1860. Second Siege of Veracruz. Miramón marches out of Mexico City with a large army to proceed down to the Gulf coast and once more besiege Juárez within Veracruz. Despite repeated guerrilla assaults, the conservative general establishes his headquarters southeast of his objective at Antón Lizardo by March 6, when secret help appears; thanks to covert financing from the Spanish government, conservative rear admiral Tomás Marín has been able to hire the vessels General Miramón and Marqués de la Habana at Havana to blockade Veracruz in support of Miramón's army.

However, when these ships sail menacingly past the liberals' island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa without displaying any ensign, representatives of the Juárez government ashore declare them piratical craft, thereby subjecting them to capture by any vessel, either domestic or foreign. Availing himself of this excuse, Commander Turner of USS Saratoga—stationed in Veracruz as part of Washington's ongoing support for the liberal regime against French, Spanish, and British backing of the conservative cause—immediately sorties and captures both vessels that same night, after a brisk exchange. In addition to depriving Miramón of his blockaders, this action costs the conservatives two mortars, 1,000 shells, and 4,000 rifles being brought from Cuba, although the ships themselves are eventually returned to Cuba after adjudication by the U.S. federal court in New Orleans.

On March 15, Miramón begins his bombardment of Veracruz but soon runs out of heavy ammunition and is compelled to withdraw toward Mexico City six days later.

APRIL 1860. The sidelined conservative president Zuloaga issues a pamphlet in Mexico City criticizing Miramón's performance, who arrests his predecessor and takes him on his subsequent northwestern campaign in May to "show him how the presidency is won."

APRIL 7, 1860. Liberal "Colonel"—and former brigand—Antonio Rojas defeats Lozada at Barranca Blanca (Jalisco).

MAY 24, 1860. Liberal general José López Uraga arrives before Guadalajara with 8,000 followers and calls upon its conservative garrison commander—the French-born veteran Adrián Woll—to surrender. When the latter refuses, López Uraga proceeds with his assault, during which he is wounded and captured. His bespectacled, 31-year-old brigadier general Ignacio Zaragoza assumes overall command and withdraws upon news of Miramón's approach with the main conservative army.

JUNE 8, 1860. Having relieved Guadalajara, Miramón sorties with 6,000 soldiers in pursuit of Zaragoza, Valle, Plácido Vega, Rojas, and Col. Ramón Corona's 5,000 liberals. The latter dig in along

Adrián Woll. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

Zapotlán Crest between Ciudad Guzmán and Sayula (Jalisco), which the conservative general hesitates to assault.

JUNE 15, 1860. The 38-year-old, self-taught liberal general and governor Jesús González Ortega leads 10,000 followers in a victory over Silverio Ramírez's 3,000-man army at Peñuelas Hacienda (state of Aguascalientes) while the latter is marching southwest toward Guadalajara to join forces with Miramón.

This victory allows the liberals to seize control over all this crucial state, prompting the conservative commander in chief to leave a 5,000-man garrison in Guadalajara on June 27 under Gen. Severo del Castillo, then to hasten northeastward into Lagos de Moreno (Jalisco) three days later to begin concentrating his forces and to bar the road into Mexico City.

JULY 1860. Miramón shifts his conservative army southeast from Lagos into León (state of Guanajuato) after receiving news from his southwestern flank of an approaching liberal division under Zaragoza, that is coming to reinforce González Ortega. The two liberal contingents meet at vacated Lagos and continue to press back Miramón.

AUGUST 10, 1860. Silao. Now in full-blown retreat southeastward from León toward Querétaro before a 10,000-man liberal buildup under generals González Ortega, Zaragoza, Doblado, and Felipe Berriozábal, Miramón's demoralized conservative army is overtaken at Silao (Guanajuato) and brought to battle. In a sharp, three-hour engagement, Mejía's conservative lancers are dispersed by Gen. Antonio Carbajal's cavalry, after which Miramón's infantry are pulverized.

Conservative morale collapses, leading to a wholesale flight toward Querétaro, during which all the artillery and baggage trains are abandoned. Miramón reaches safety with a handful of riders, while González Ortega treats his prisoners magnanimously, releasing most. Zuloaga, who has still been accompanying Miramón as a captive, escapes on August 13 and regains the capital, attempting to have himself restored into office as president, only to fail because of lack of support. The liberal commander then reverses his army from in front of Querétaro and marches westward—at Degollado's order—to subdue Guadalajara, before commencing the final push toward Mexico City.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1860. Fall of Guadalajara. González Ortega's liberal army arrives to besiege the garrison within this conservative stronghold after a wearying and rain-sodden march through central Mexico. Four days later, he is joined at San Pedro Tlaquepaque by Ogazón's corps, bringing their total strength to 20,000 men and 125 fieldpieces, the first of which open fire by September 27. The 5,000 defenders under Severo del Castillo put up a stout resistance until October 29, when the starving civilian populace is allowed to evacuate.

The last conservative hope of relief is extinguished when Márquez is defeated at nearby Zapotlanejo on November 1, surrendering his 3,000 men and 18 cannon to the encircling army. Del Castillo therefore capitulates to González Ortega's subordinate Zaragoza two days later, on generous terms (the liberal commander in chief having been ill throughout most of these operations).

DECEMBER 8, 1860. Miramón surprises Degollado and Berriozábal at Toluca (state of Mexico), capturing both liberal generals.

DECEMBER 21, 1860. Calpulalpan. All liberal armies close in upon Mexico City for a final confrontation with their 11,000 men and 14 fieldpieces combined under the command of González Ortega. Miramón—who is so desperately short of cash that his chief of police Lagarde breaks into the British Legation and commandeers 630,000 pesos, over the objections of Ambassador Barton—prepares to give battle with his 8,000 troops and 30 guns at San Miguel Calpulalpan, on the outskirts of the capital. Liberal brigadier generals Valle and Álvarez suggest a tactic to González Ortega upon the eve of battle, whereby Miramón's main thrust will be drawn out by a feigned retreat by some liberal units, only to then become engulfed by flanking attacks, allowing the liberals' superior numbers to tell.

The commander in chief approves, and when Miramón leads a charge against the liberal left wing at 8:00 a.m. the next morning, December 22, the conservatives are struck on both flanks by Zaragoza and Régules. While thus checked, González Ortega leads Valle and Francisco Alatorre in a wide encircling march, routing the conservatives by unexpectedly charging into them from the rear. Miramón staggers back into Mexico City with only 1,500 soldiers still under his command, pausing long enough to release his prisoner Berriozábal before fleeing and being secretly whisked down to Veracruz through the intervention of the French ambassador Alphonse Dubois de Saligny. He sets sail for Europe aboard a Spanish warship by January 1861. A few conservative diehards such as Márquez, Cobos, and Mejía withdraw into the hills to continue the struggle, but their cause is essentially lost.

DECEMBER 25, 1860. González Ortega's victorious army makes its triumphal entry into Mexico City.

JANUARY 5, 1861. Juárez departs Veracruz and six days later officially assumes his duties as president in Mexico City, thereby marking an end to the War of the Reform (also called the Three Years' War). Although Mexico's conservatives have been temporarily subdued, they will quickly make a resurgence with foreign support (see "French Intervention in Mexico").

A particular case in point is offered by the brigand Lozada, who in early 1861 is cornered in Alica Pass (Nayarit) by 3,000 liberal troops converging from three directions under colonels Rojas, Corona, and Anacleto Herrera y Cairo. They disperse his followers after nine days of hard fighting, which earn Lozada the nickname Tigre de Alica. By May, however, he resumes his depredations, capturing both Tepic and San Pedro Lagunillas before being checked by Ogazón.

Nationhood (1861–1897)

Our hearts so stout have got us fame,
For soon 'tis known from whence we came,
Where'er we go they dread the name
Of Garryowen in glory.

—Irish ballad, regimental song of the U.S. 7th Cavalry

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR (1861–1865)

In the United States, as in many other emergent republics throughout the Western Hemisphere, the evolution from colonial monarchy to electoral democracy gradually comes to include a contest between rival factions, some professing that each individual state is virtually independent within a loose confederation, and others feeling that a federal government—representing the entire nation—must be paramount over any single member or region. Specifically for U.S. citizens, this question will center on the North’s desire to enact antislavery measures into federal law (their superior population and industrial productivity giving them a majority in Washington), contrasted against the deep-seated opposition from the agriculture-based interests of the South.

By the late 1850s, feelings are running so high within the polarized country that disputes over whether the new Kansas Territory should be admitted into the Union as a “free” or “slave” state spark cross-border raids between armed groups. On the night of October 16, 1859, the fanatical abolitionist John Brown further inflames tensions by seizing the arsenal at Harpers Ferry (Virginia) with 18 followers, in hopes of fomenting a slave uprising. Instead, he is overpowered two days later by a contingent of marines and local militiamen led by Col. Robert E. Lee, and hanged after a month-long trial.

Passions continue to escalate, though, until armed secessionist units surround the Federal garrison at Fort Sumter—a pentagonal island fortress guarding the sea entrance into Charleston, South Carolina—during the winter of 1860–1861, threatening to occupy this U.S. stronghold in the name of the breakaway “Confederate States of America”: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Texas (soon to be joined by Arkansas, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia). When the recently inaugurated administration of President Abraham Lincoln proposes on April 8, 1861, to resupply this isolated outpost, the encircling Southerners react belligerently.

Because of the overall wealth and manufacturing might of the nation, as well as the throngs of volunteers willing to fight for their beliefs upon native soil, the resultant hostilities will be conducted on a scale never before witnessed in the Americas. During the Civil War’s first year alone, the federal government raises and arms 600,000 regulars and militiamen from its population of 23 million people, and the Confederates, 250,000 from their 9 million (of whom 3.5 million are slaves).

APRIL 7, 1861. All intercourse between Fort Sumter and the secessionist city of Charleston is stopped by order of Confederate general Pierre G. T. Beauregard. The next day, the Lincoln administration in Washington informs the South Carolina authorities that provisions will be sent to this beleaguered outpost, by force if necessary.

APRIL 11, 1861. U.S. troops are stationed in Washington, as the Confederate commissioners depart. That same evening, General Beauregard demands the surrender of Fort Sumter, which Maj. Robert Anderson refuses.

APRIL 12, 1861. Fort Sumter. Confederate batteries at Fort Moultrie open fire against this surrounded outpost at 4:00 a.m.; the Union artillery does not reply until three hours later. After enduring 30 hours of bombardment, Anderson’s 111-man garrison finally surrenders on the afternoon of April 13 and are allowed to evacuate with their side arms and accoutrements for New York the next day.

APRIL 15, 1861. Lincoln calls for troops to help put down the secessionist movement, but this request is refused by North Carolina, Kentucky, Virginia, and Tennessee. Fort Macon (North Carolina) is also occupied by Confederate troops.

APRIL 17, 1861. Virginia secedes from the Union, and Jefferson Davis issues commissions to Confederate privateers.

Abolitionism

A movement to abolish slavery began when the Thirteen Colonies were still part of the British empire. The few thousand blacks held in England were household servants, and a verdict in June 1772 against sending one to serve on a Jamaican plantation effectively ended slavery's legal standing there. But this lone common-law verdict had no effect on the millions toiling as laborers in British North America or on West Indian islands. A group of Quakers in London were therefore moved to found an organization in June 1783 to abolish the Atlantic slave trade.

An American "Society for the Relief of Free Negroes Unlawfully Held in Bondage" had also been formed by Quakers in Philadelphia in April 1775, then resurrected nine years later once the Revolutionary War ended. Benjamin Franklin was elected its first president. All northern states were won over to emancipation within the next 20 years, and when Parliament in London moved to end slave traffic aboard British vessels in 1807, the U.S. federal government followed suit.

Although the transportation of new slaves out of Africa was curtailed, slavery still persisted on a vast scale in the American South. Plantation owners maintained that their charges were private property, governed humanely according to state laws, and that a few northern abolitionists could not impose their views through federal acts. A majority of Northerners preferred to see slavery gradually phased out, with owners being compensated. A vocal minority among certain immigrant groups even upheld the southern viewpoint.

Antislavery activists in the North grew increasingly frustrated by the slow pace of reform, while proslavery advocates bridled against any threatened interference. The passion of their dispute engulfed the larger question of national versus states' rights, until finally the South moved to secede from the Union by military force, and both sides braced for war.

APRIL 18, 1861. The U.S. arsenal at Harpers Ferry (Virginia) is destroyed by Lieutenant Jones to prevent it falling into Confederate hands.

APRIL 19, 1861. Lincoln orders a U.S. naval blockade of southern ports and calls for the recruitment of 82,000 long-term Union servicemen. This same day, the 6th Massachusetts Volunteers are attacked by a mob while passing through Baltimore, resulting in the deaths of 3 soldiers and 11 civilians.

APRIL 20, 1861. Several bridges on the Northern Pennsylvania Railroad are destroyed by Confederates in Maryland to prevent the passage of troops into Washington.

This same day, the Gosport Navy Yard at Norfolk (Virginia) is ordered destroyed and several vessels scuttled by 68-year-old commodore Charles S. McCauley to prevent their falling into Confederate hands. Only the 1,726-ton sloop of war USS Cumberland is towed out, while the burned remnants of the screw frigate Merrimack (or Merrimac) are left behind—this despite the last-minute arrival of 1,000 marine reinforcements under Commo. Hiram Paulding. Also, the arsenal at Liberty (Missouri) is seized by Confederates.

APRIL 21, 1861. Starting at 4:20 a.m., Norfolk Navy Yard is partially destroyed by U.S. Navy personnel, before they evacuate aboard the Federal steam sloop Pawnee. The Confederates occupy this base and have it operating again within a few weeks.

APRIL 22, 1861. The U.S. arsenal at Fayetteville (North Carolina) is seized by Confederate troops.

APRIL 23, 1861. Confederates seize Fort Smith (Arkansas), as well as the U.S. garrison officers at San Antonio (Texas). This same day, Robert E. Lee is promoted to major general in his home state of Virginia and offered command of its mobilizing forces.

APRIL 25, 1861. At Saluria (Texas), Maj. C. C. Sibley surrenders 420 U.S. troops to Confederate colonel Earl Van Dorn.

APRIL 26, 1861. Maj. Gen. Joseph E. Johnston is given command of the defense of Richmond (Virginia), which becomes the Confederate capital as of May 6.

MAY 4, 1861. U.S. ordnance stores are seized at Kansas City (Missouri).

MAY 10, 1861. Some 800 Confederates surrender to Capt. Nathaniel Lyon at St. Louis (Missouri).

MAY 11, 1861. The U.S. steamer Niagara arrives to establish a naval blockade of Charleston (South Carolina).

MAY 13, 1861. Gen. George B. McClellan is given command of the Department of the Ohio. Baltimore is reoccupied by U.S. troops.

Robert E. Lee

Robert Edward Lee was born at Stratford Hall Plantation in Virginia's Westmoreland County on January 19, 1807, the fifth son of the Revolutionary War hero "Light Horse" Harry Lee. After his father died heavily indebted 11 years after Robert's birth, the family was obliged to move often around Alexandria. A top student, Lee enrolled at the age of 18 in the United States Military Academy at West Point, distinguishing himself by never incurring a single demerit during his four-year tenure. He rose to cadet corps adjutant and graduated second in his class in 1829. Because of his intellect, he was posted as a second lieutenant in the Army Corps of Engineers, serving on projects in Georgia, Virginia, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, and New York until the Mexican-American War began in 1846.

By now a captain, Lee was attached to the staffs of generals John Wool and Winfield Scott and proved himself an able scout leader. He won a temporary promotion to lieutenant colonel and was slightly wounded in the assault against Chapultepec Castle. At the war's end, he resumed his engineering duties at Baltimore and then became superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy in 1852. Hoping for better career opportunities, he became lieutenant colonel of the newly created U.S. 2nd Cavalry Regiment three years later, serving as second-in-command under Col. Albert S. Johnston. The regiment was ordered to West Texas in 1856, but upon the death of his father-in-law, George Washington Parke Custis, the next October, Lee requested leave to return and manage Arlington Plantation and its 63 slaves for the next two years. He was therefore available to help smother John Brown's raid at Harpers Ferry in October 1859, before he resumed his Texan duties.

Lee did not favor secession as the nation proceeded to dissolve early in 1861. When the senior U.S. Army commander in Texas, Gen. David E. Twiggs, resigned and offered his 4,000 troops to the Confederate authorities that February, Lee instead traveled to Washington. General Scott offered him a top command in the Union forces, but Lee reluctantly declined on April 18, the day after his home state seceded; he felt that he must serve Virginia. Virginia's Gov. John Letcher promoted him five days later to militia major general, charged with organizing that state's military effort. Lee was also made a Confederate brigadier general as of May 14, and one of its five full generals a month afterward. His first field command was a failure, though, his campaign around Cheat Mountain in western Virginia fizzling amid much bickering. Lee was even nicknamed "Granny" for the public fuss that it entailed.

The Confederate president Jefferson Davis nonetheless valued his intellect, therefore Lee was recalled to Richmond early in 1862 to act as military advisor. When the Union commander McClellan closed upon the Confederate capital later that same spring, Davis and Lee were surprised when the defending general Joseph E. Johnston launched a counterattack on May 31 at Seven Pines. Riding out to view the battlefield, they found the Confederate commander badly wounded, therefore the southern president appointed Lee this same night to command what became known as the Army of Northern Virginia.

Nothing could have predicted Lee's daring and genius as a commander. Within a few weeks, he left a token force before Richmond and led his main army across the Chickahominy River to strike the Union corps that was moving down from the north, driving it away in the Seven Days' Battle. Over the next couple of years, he bested larger armies through fearless maneuvers, winning admiration from friends and foes alike.

MAY 24, 1861. Some 13,000 Union troops cross the Potomac into Virginia, occupying Alexandria and Arlington Heights to help secure Washington. The next day, they destroy seven bridges and miles of railroad lines between Alexandria and Leesburg.

MAY 26, 1861. The U.S. sloop Brooklyn arrives to blockade the Mississippi River mouth and New Orleans.

MAY 28, 1861. Brig. Gen. Irwin McDowell assumes command of the Department of Northeastern Virginia.

MAY 31, 1861. The Union steamers Freeborn and Anacosta bombard the Confederate batteries at Aquia Creek (Virginia).

JUNE 2, 1861. Beauregard assumes command of the Confederate forces at Manassas Junction (Virginia).

JUNE 4, 1861. The brig USS Perry captures the Confederate privateer Savannah, carrying it into New York 11 days later.

JUNE 15, 1861. The Confederates under Joseph Johnston—threatened by Patterson's approach—evacuate Harpers Ferry, transferring its armory machinery into Richmond.

JUNE 17, 1861. The Wheeling Convention unanimously declares West Virginia independent from the Confederate portion of the state, temporarily assuming the name "Kanawha."

JUNE 20, 1861. McClellan personally assumes command of the Union army in West Virginia.

JUNE 29, 1861. A Confederate column makes a dash toward Harpers Ferry, destroying several boats and its railway bridge.

JULY 8, 1861. Confederate brigadier general Henry H. Sibley is ordered to Texas to expel the Union forces in neighboring New Mexico. He eventually reaches Santa Fe in March 1862, only to be maneuvered into a disastrous retreat by Edward R. S. Canby, which ends all Confederate designs upon this territory.

JULY 13, 1861. After crossing the Ohio, McClellan defeats at Rich Mountain and Carrick's Ford (West Virginia) the small army sent across the Alleghenies to restore Confederate rule.

JULY 16, 1861. Union general McDowell advances from Alexandria with approximately 30,000 troops to drive Beauregard's 20,000 behind the Rappahannock.

JULY 21, 1861. Bull Run (First Battle). After skirmishing three days previously at Blackburn's Ford (Virginia) with Beauregard, McDowell's Union army prepares to smash the Confederate defensive line at Bull Run River by a direct frontal assault against its stone bridge with one division, while two others circle right to cross two miles farther northwest at Sudley Ford. The evening of the 20th, however, Gen. Joseph Johnston arrives with Confederate reinforcements and prepares for his own surprise counterattack.

The Federal troops strike first at 6:00 the next morning, storming the stone bridge, although their flanking movement at Sudley develops very slowly. Both armies being untried, many Confederates abandon Matthews Hill in confusion when the Union right finally attacks at 9:30, only to be steadied by the sight of Brig. Gen. Thomas J. Jackson's brigade standing "like a stone wall" atop neighboring Henry House Hill.

After a day of confused fighting, the 18,500 Union troops break and retreat, having suffered 2,900 casualties as compared to 2,000 among the 18,000 Confederates. Their retirement turns into a panic-stricken flight to the far side of the Potomac, although the Confederates are too exhausted and disorganized to pursue—choosing instead to establish themselves at Centreville.

JULY 22, 1861. The three-month enlistment terms of the earliest Union volunteers come due, prompting many to return home.

JULY 25, 1861. Frémont is appointed to command the Union's Western Department, headquartered at St. Louis.

JULY 26, 1861. Fort Fillmore (New Mexico) is surrendered to Confederate forces by Major Lynde.

AUGUST 7, 1861. Hampton (Virginia) is burned by Confederate forces.

AUGUST 8, 1861. The 39-year-old brigadier general Ulysses Simpson Grant assumes command of the Union district at Ironton (Missouri).

AUGUST 10, 1861. Wilson's Creek. After chasing Missouri's Confederate governor Claiborne Jackson out of office, Union general Lyon advances with 5,800 troops. Ten miles from Springfield, he confronts 12,000 Confederates drawn up at Wilson's Creek under Gen. Sterling "Pap" Price and the Mexican War veteran Ben McCulloch (see "February 20, 1847" entry in Mexican-American War).

Lyon's German-born subordinate, Brig. Gen. Franz Sigel, leads three volunteer St. Louis regiments in a flanking maneuver around the Federal left, which catches the Confederates from the rear but fails to break their line. Sigel's detachment is then repelled by a counterattack, the main Union body being defeated and obliged to retreat toward Rolla, while Lyon is slain.

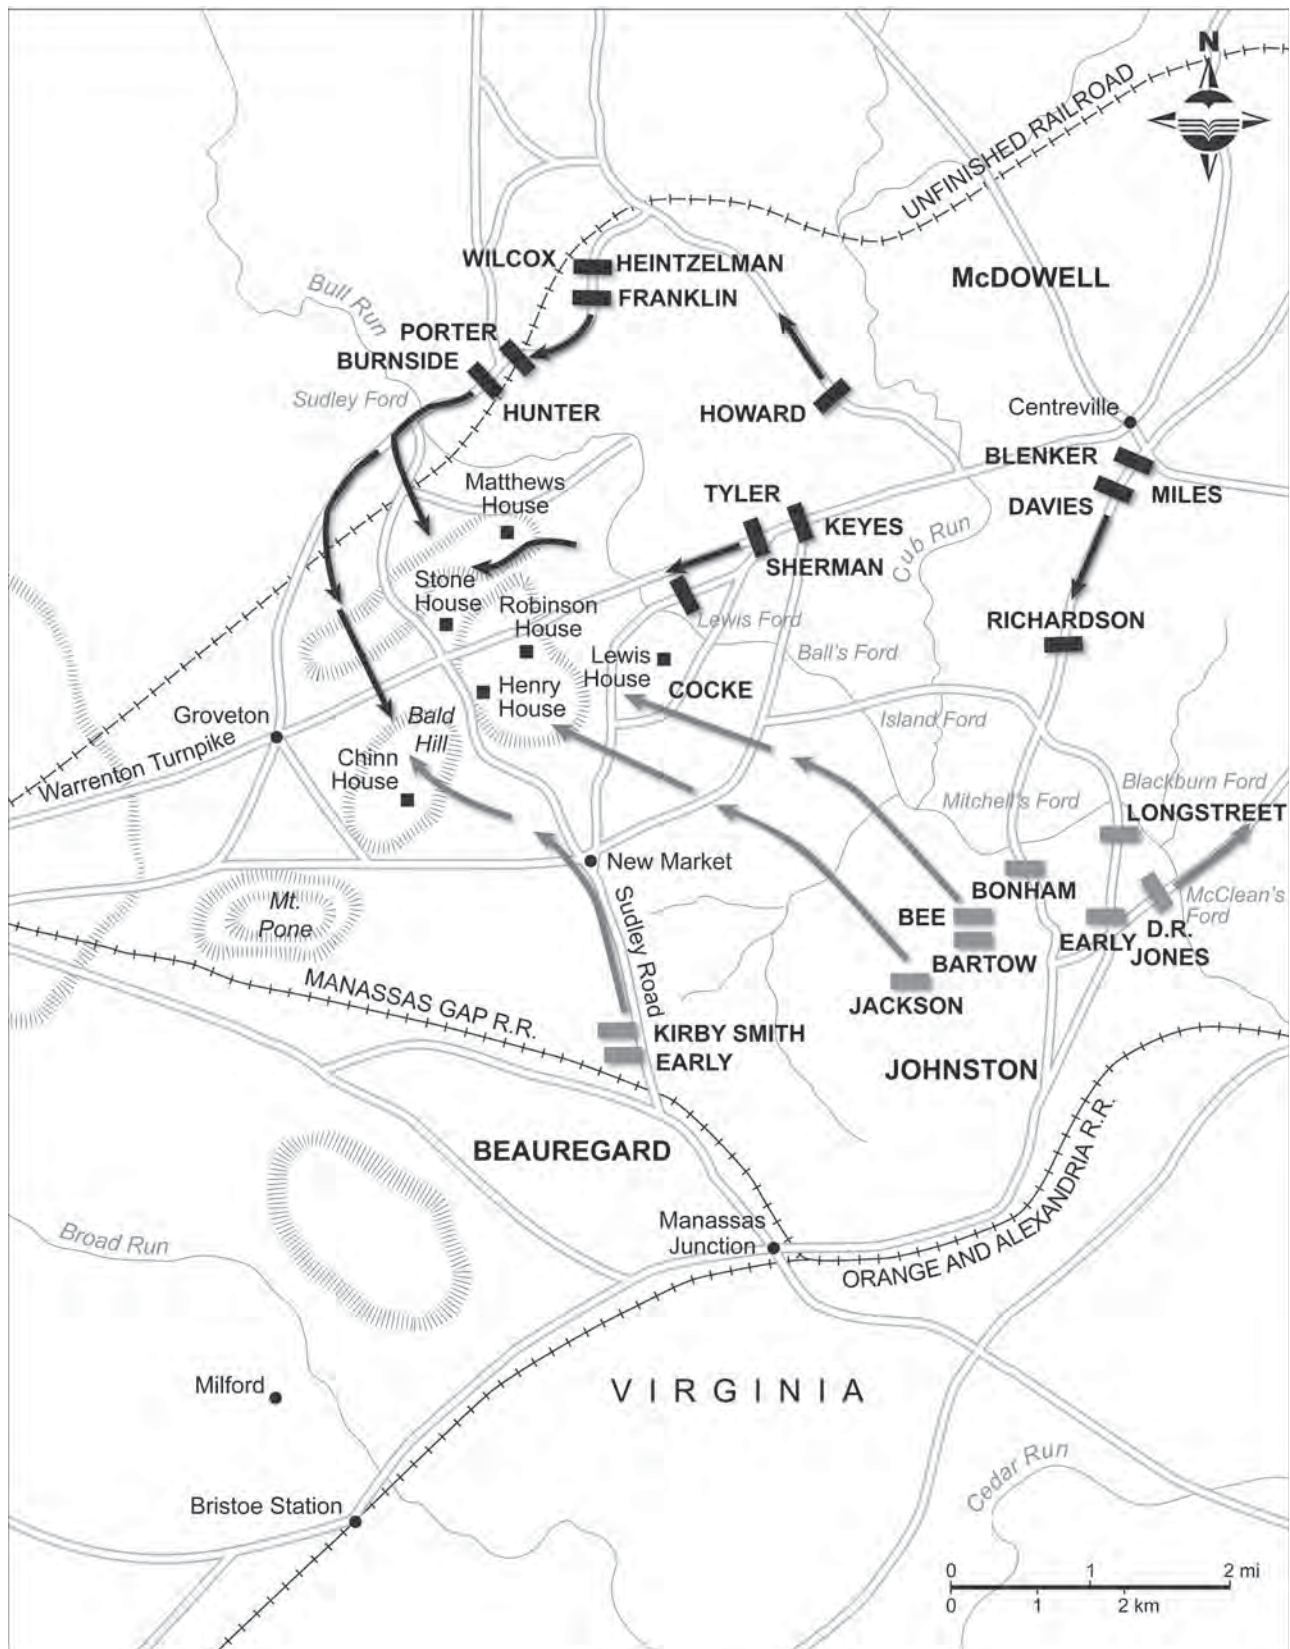

AUGUST 14, 1861. Frémont declares martial law at St. Louis.

AUGUST 15, 1861. Jefferson Davis orders all northern men to leave the South within 40 days. The next day, Lincoln officially proclaims all seceding states to be in a state of insurrection, forbidding all intercourse with them.

AUGUST 17, 1861. Gen. John E. Wool assumes command at Fortress Monroe, at the tip of the Yorktown Peninsula (Virginia).

AUGUST 20, 1861. McClellan assumes command of the Army of the Potomac.

AUGUST 27, 1861. Seven Union warships and two transports under Commo. Silas H. Stringham

First Battle of Bull Run (Manassas).

drop anchor off Hatteras Inlet (North Carolina), bombarding Confederate forts Hatteras and Clark the next dawn and prompting their garrisons to evacuate; 900 Union soldiers under Maj. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler come ashore to occupy these coastal keeps.

AUGUST 30, 1861. Frémont issues an emancipation proclamation, which is revoked by Lincoln 12 days later.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1861. Grant assumes command in southern Missouri.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1861. The floating dry dock at Pensacola, which the Confederate defenders have grounded while attempting to scuttle it across the harbor mouth, is destroyed by a raid of the Union forces holding Fort Pickens at the channel entrance.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1861. Kentucky—until now a neutral state—is invaded by Confederate troops under militia general (and bishop) Leonidas Polk, who begins constructing fortifications at Hickman, Chalk Cliffs, and Columbus.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1861. To counter Polk's incursion, Paducah and Smithland (Kentucky) are occupied by Union troops under Brigadier General Grant of the Illinois state militia.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1861. A descent is made upon the Pensacola Navy Yard by U.S. gunboats.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1861. Bowling Green (Kentucky) is occupied by Confederate forces under newly appointed general Albert S. Johnston.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1861. Confederate governor Price captures Lexington, although soon forced to retreat toward Springfield by the approach of 40,000 Union troops under Frémont.

OCTOBER 7, 1861. The Confederate ironclad Virginia—built atop the charred hull of the screw frigate Merrimack—makes its first appearance off Fortress Monroe (Hampton Roads, Virginia).

OCTOBER 8, 1861. The 41-year-old brigadier general William Tecumseh Sherman supersedes Gen. Robert Anderson in command of the Department of the Cumberland.

OCTOBER 11, 1861. The Confederate steamer Theodore escapes from Charleston (South Carolina), bearing the diplomatic commissioners James M. Mason and John Slidell.

OCTOBER 15, 1861. The 35-year-old Confederate brigadier general Meriwether Jeff Thompson leads a cavalry raid, which burns the Iron Mountain Railway bridge over Big River near Blackwell in southeastern Missouri. Returning into Fredericktown, he rejoins the infantry of his 1st Division, Missouri State Guards.

Six days afterward, two large Union columns under colonels J. B. Plummer and William P. Carlin begin converging upon Fredericktown, so Thompson retires 12 miles southward with his 3,000 men. Leaving his supply wagons in a secure position, the Confederate commander circles back to engage the Union occupiers around noon of October 21; he is defeated by their superior numbers after a two-hour struggle and chased out of southeastern Missouri.

OCTOBER 21, 1861. After four Federal regiments under Col. Edward D. Baker have been ferried across the Potomac to make a reconnaissance in strength toward Leesburg (Virginia), they are confronted on the fringe of a wood atop Balls Bluff by a superior Confederate force and driven back, with the loss of 900 Union dead, wounded, or captured—more than half their total number.

OCTOBER 29, 1861. Port Royal. Commo. Samuel F. Du Pont sets sail from Fortress Monroe with 30 warships, escorting 50 transports bearing 13,000 troops under Gen. Thomas W. Sherman, to attempt to capture Port Royal Sound (South Carolina) as an advance Union naval base. Although his fleet is scattered by a storm, Du Pont's flagship Wabash nonetheless leads two columns of 14 warships in past Fort Beauregard on northernmost St. Helena Island at 9:00 a.m. on November 7, shelling its batteries. He then reverses course two miles into the sound to visit a like treatment upon Fort Walker on Hilton Head Island farther south. By nightfall, both Confederate garrisons have evacuated, leaving the strongholds to be occupied and held by Union troops until the end of the war.

NOVEMBER 1, 1861. Winfield Scott resigns as commander in chief of all Union forces and is replaced by McClellan.

NOVEMBER 2, 1861. Maj. Gen. David Hunter supersedes Frémont in command of the Western Department.

NOVEMBER 7, 1861. Grant descends the Missouri River with 3,000 men to attack Confederate general Polk's positions 15 miles downstream of Cairo at Belmont (Illinois), eventually being obliged to re-embark his troops and withdraw.

NOVEMBER 15, 1861. The screw loop USS San Jacinto of Capt. Charles Wilkes (a former Antarctic explorer) arrives at Fortress Monroe, having removed the Confederate commissioners Mason and Slidell from the English mail steamer Trent. Britain protests against this boarding of a neutral vessel.

NOVEMBER 20, 1861. McClellan holds a review with 70,000 Union troops near Washington.

DECEMBER 4, 1861. Gen. Henry W. Halleck issues a series of punitive measures at St. Louis, aimed against secessionist supporters.

DECEMBER 18, 1861. Union brigadier general John Pope captures 1,300 Confederates, a number of horses and wagons, plus 1,000 firearms at Milford (Missouri).

DECEMBER 27, 1861. Having been illegally detained, the Confederate commissioners Mason and Slidell are surrendered to the British ambassador, leaving Fort Warren for England five days later aboard the British steamer Rinaldo.

JANUARY 17, 1862. Mill Springs. After pushing through the Cumberland Gap into Kentucky, Brig. Gen. Felix Zollicoffer's slightly fewer than 4,000 Confederates are attacked at Mill Springs—otherwise known as Logan's Crossroads, near Somerset—by a similar-sized Union army moving out of Lebanon under the 45-year-old brigadier general George Henry Thomas. In the confusion, Zollicoffer blunders into the Federal line and is shot, after which his army disintegrates and flees, leaving behind 11 field guns, their supply train, plus more than 1,000 horses and mules.

FEBRUARY 6, 1862. Fort Henry. After 15,000 Union troops under Grant disembark two miles below Confederate Fort Henry on the Tennessee River and become bogged down in its marshlands, Commo.

Andrew H. Foote bombards this flooded fort with his four Union “turtles”—flat-bottomed, stern-wheeled ironclads—and compels its defenders to evacuate toward nearby Fort Donelson an hour later.

This capture also prompts Johnston to abandon Bowling Green with half his 24,000-man army for Nashville, while directing his other half toward Fort Donelson.

FEBRUARY 8, 1862. Roanoke Island. Union brigadier general Ambrose E. Burnside takes six Confederate forts and 2,500 prisoners on Roanoke Island (North Carolina), as well as destroying all their gunboats, except for two vessels.

FEBRUARY 13, 1862. Brig. Gen. Samuel R. Curtis takes possession of Springfield (Missouri).

FEBRUARY 14, 1862. Fort Donelson. After occupying Fort Henry, Grant's army has marched 10 miles across difficult terrain to invest 17,000–18,000 Confederates under brigadier generals Gideon Pillow and John B. Floyd inside Fort Donelson at Dover (Tennessee). During the afternoon of February 14, Foote appears on the Cumberland River with a convoy of Union reinforcements and attempts to bombard the Confederate stronghold—located on a bluff 150 feet high—with four of his stern-wheel ironclads. This attack is repelled, and Foote is compelled to retire after being wounded, with two of his vessels disabled and the others damaged.

Grant therefore institutes a siege with his 27,000 troops and the next morning contains an attempted breakout, driving the defenders back into their last line of trenches. Pillow, Floyd, and the Confederate cavalry commander Nathan Bedford Forrest escape on the night of February 15–16 with a few of their men, leaving Brig. Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner to request terms from the Union commander. The latter calls for “immediate and unconditional surrender”—thus earning the nickname “Unconditional Surrender” Grant throughout the North—and accepts the capitulation of its remaining 15,000 Confederates. Fort Donelson's capture prompts Johnston to abandon Nashville farther downriver.

FEBRUARY 16, 1862. The Tennessee ironworks near Dover are destroyed by the Union gunboat St. Louis.

FEBRUARY 17, 1862. Two regiments of Confederate Tennesseans, unaware of the capture of Fort Donelson, approach it to reinforce Floyd and Pillow, only to be captured.

FEBRUARY 22, 1862. Jefferson Davis is officially inaugurated as president of the Confederacy, with Alexander H. Stephens as his vice president.

FEBRUARY 24, 1862. Nashville is occupied by Union troops under Buell.

MARCH 5, 1862. Beauregard assumes command of the Confederate Army of the Mississippi, three days after evacuating Columbus (Kentucky) and removing its armament to New Madrid and Island No. 10.

MARCH 8, 1862. Confederate generals van Dorn and Price attack Curtis at Pea Ridge (or Elk Horn, Arkansas), only to be routed.

MARCH 8, 1862. Hampton Roads. At 12:45 p.m., after lengthy trials and with workmen still aboard, the Confederate ironclad Virginia (built from the burned hull of the U.S. steam frigate Merrimack) stands out of Norfolk under Capt. Franklin Buchanan to attack the Union naval squadron stationed in nearby Hampton Roads. Guns aboard the Union vessels are powerless to penetrate the low, sloped, greased plating of their 320-man, 3,200-ton opponent, which measures two to four inches in thickness. The Virginia therefore plows through a hail of fire to ram the 24-gun, 1,726-ton sloop USS Cumberland, sending it to the bottom, then pounds the 50-gun, 1,867-ton frigate USS Congress into submission, leaving it ablaze when the ironclad must retire into Norfolk for the night.

The next morning at 7:00 a.m., the Virginia re-emerges to finish off its panic-stricken prey, this time commanded by Lt. Catesby ap Roger “Car” Jones (nephew of Commo. Thomas ap Catesby “Tac” Jones; see “September 16, 1814” in “War of 1812,” and “October 19, 1842” entry in “Simmering Confrontations”), because Buchanan has been wounded in a leg the day before by a shell fragment. Upon approaching the grounded steam frigate USS Minnesota, however, the Virginia finds it accompanied by the low-slung, 987-ton, turreted ironclad USS Monitor of Capt. John L. Worden, which has arrived from New York only that previous evening. Designed by the Swedish inventor John Ericsson, the Monitor is faster and more maneuverable than the Virginia, firing heavy solid shots from its two 11-inch Dahlgren guns.

Ironclads

Scientific advancement during the Industrial Revolution made artillery shells more explosive and accurate, as well as iron more plentiful. World navies therefore tried to improve their traditional wooden warships by encasing vital spots with thick plates. Early examples were the floating batteries draped or “clad” in iron, which the French used in 1855 against the Russian defenses at Kinburn on the Black Sea during the Crimean War. Their British allies also intended to deploy similar vessels against Kronstadt the next year, but hostilities ceased.

France then launched a revolutionary 36-gun, 5,600-ton frigate called the La Gloire at Toulon in late November 1859. It was an ocean-going vessel whose wooden hull was sheathed in massive plates, propelled by three masts and a small steam engine. Point-blank cannon blasts failed to breach its sides, although the ship was dark, uncomfortable, and difficult to sail. Britain’s Royal Navy launched HMS Warrior at the end of December 1860, a 9,200-ton, three-masted, propeller-driven frigate with 40 guns and a hull made entirely of wrought iron 4.5-inches thick. Both nations immediately laid down dozens more iron-hulled warships, many being bought by foreign navies.

In America, the Confederacy created its own unique version of ironclad river warships. Because the Union retained control over most sea-going naval resources since early in the Civil War, southern commanders had to devise alternatives. At the Algiers yards opposite New Orleans, Capt. John A. Stevenson cut down the steam tug Enoch Train and created a low-slung, 390-ton, single-gun privateer with a “turtleback” top covered in 1.5-inch plating. Commissioned on September 12, 1861, this “hellish machine” (according to Union officers) attacked the Federal squadron at Head of the Passes in the Mississippi Delta a month afterward. It rammed and damaged the 2,600-ton U.S. sloop Richmond before limping away under fire.

The Virginia and the Monitor continued this evolution in ironclad design, and although not the first such vessels to enter service, they shared the distinction of being the first to engage one another in battle. Many more Confederate “rams” and Union “monitors” were produced during the Civil War, excelling at river warfare, although their low profiles proved ill-suited for the open ocean.

Although the Virginia initially fires upon the Minnesota from a mile away, it cannot close through the shallows and is soon challenged by the Monitor. The two ironclads pound each other over the next four hours, circling as close as 50 yards before the Confederate vessel finally breaks off the action and withdraws behind Sewell's Point in Norfolk. The Monitor's presence will prevent it from being a threat ever again.

MARCH 11, 1862. McClellan is relieved as commander in chief of all Union armies, although retaining command over the Army of the Potomac.

MARCH 12, 1862. Winchester (Virginia) is abandoned by its Confederate garrison and occupied by Union forces.

MARCH 13, 1862. Lee is appointed commander in chief of all Confederate armies.

MARCH 14, 1862. Union brigadier general William S. ("Old Rosy") Rosencrans assumes command of the Mountain Department.

MARCH 16, 1862. Union general Garfield, with 600 Ohio and Kentucky volunteers, surprises a Confederate camp at Pound Gap (Tennessee) and destroys it before withdrawing.

MARCH 17, 1862. Peninsula Campaign. The first regiments of McClellan's Army of the Potomac begin embarking at Alexandria (Virginia) to transfer into Fortress Monroe by April 2, then launch a drive toward the Confederate capital of Richmond—the long-anticipated Peninsula campaign—two days later.

After investing Yorktown on April 5, McClellan settles down to patiently construct siege works, allowing the outnumbered, ill-equipped Confederate forces throughout this region to regroup. Gen. Joseph Johnston's garrison slips away on May 3, just as McClellan's batteries are about to open fire, then fights a sharp rearguard action at Williamsburg two days later. McClellan slowly resumes his progression toward Richmond, his army now numbering over 100,000 men in five corps.

He reaches the Chickahominy River on May 20 and splits his army onto both banks, waiting to be joined by McDowell, who is being delayed in the Shenandoah Valley by Stonewall Jackson. On May 31, Johnston attacks McClellan's two corps on the right bank of the Chickahominy in a battle known as Seven Pines; because Johnston is severely wounded early on, his army is obliged to retire the next day.

The Confederate commander is succeeded by Lee, who on June 15 directs Jackson to march swiftly to join him and crush McClellan before McDowell can intervene. On June 25, McClellan is only four miles outside Richmond, but he is struck full force the next day by Lee. In the Seven Days' Battle, one of McClellan's corps on the left bank of the Chickahominy is defeated by June 27, prompting the Union commander to attempt a flank march south through White Oak Swamp toward the safety of the James River. To cover the passage of his trains, McClellan is compelled to stand and fight, while the Confederates fall upon his rear and right flank. The critical day is June 30, when Lee fails to break through the Federal center. After repulsing a final assault at Malvern Hill on July 1, McClellan reaches the James the next day and entrenches at Harrison's Landing, refusing to budge again—despite his superior strength and Lee's more extensive losses. The Army of the Potomac is eventually evacuated on August 16, thus concluding its Peninsula campaign.

APRIL 6, 1862. Shiloh. After confidently ascending the Tennessee River and disembarking at Pittsburgh Landing to await Buell—who is advancing cross-country from Nashville—Grant's 45,000-man Union army is surprised by 40,000 Confederates stealthily approaching out of Corinth (Mississippi) under Albert Johnston and Beauregard.

Their first attack erupts at 6:00 a.m. near Shiloh Church, two miles inland, smashing the forward-most Union division under Brig. Gen. Benjamin Prentiss. However, the Confederate attacks become increasingly uncoordinated as they penetrate deeper into Grant's encampments, and Johnston himself is killed assaulting a strongpoint dubbed the "Hornet's Nest." By 5:30 p.m., Grant is able to stiffen his shortened lines a few hundred yards from the landing, supported by artillery fire from his gunboats offshore.

Overnight, Grant is reinforced by 25,000 fresh troops from Buell's corps, plus a detached division under Gen. Lew Wallace (later to become the author of Ben Hur). At 5:00 a.m. on April 7, therefore, the Union army goes over to the offensive, driving Beauregard from the field after hard fighting. Both sides suffer some 10,000 casualties apiece thus require a few weeks to recuperate.

APRIL 9, 1862. Jacksonville (Florida) is evacuated by Union forces.

APRIL 18, 1862. New Orleans. Union commodore David Glasgow Farragut arrives off Louisiana with a squadron of men-of-war led by his flagship Hartford,

The Peninsula Campaign.

Gen. Ulysses S. Grant poses, standing at center, with members of his staff. (U.S. National Archives) plus 21 mortar boats under his subordinate David Dixon Porter and a fleet of transports bearing 13,000 soldiers under General Butler, to jointly attempt to capture New Orleans. Porter's mortar boats—with branches tied in their tops as camouflage—are towed into position below forts Saint Philip and Jackson to begin dropping a steady rain of 13-inch shells into these strongholds.

Before sunrise of April 24, Farragut dashes through a gap in the Confederate boom with 17 warships, suffering mostly minor damage despite enduring a ferocious bombardment. His squadron also defeats Commodore Mitchell's Confederate ram, the Manassas, and some armed steamers before reaching New Orleans (35 miles farther upstream) on the morning of April 25, extinguishing the many fires that have been deliberately set and occupying the city three days later.

APRIL 21, 1862. Pope, after capturing the 7,000-man Confederate garrison on the Missouri River's Island No. 10, joins Halleck and Grant.

MAY 10–11, 1862. Having withdrawn everything of value, Confederate forces evacuate blockaded Pensacola, torching its navy yard as they withdraw. Union brigadier general L. G. Arnold brings 1,000 troops ashore to occupy all the bay's abandoned fortifications and parades triumphantly into Pensacola on May 12.

MAY 10, 1862. Union forces retake Norfolk, which has been evacuated by the Confederates after destroying their ironclad Merrimack and much other matériel.

MAY 30, 1862. Under pressure from Halleck's slowly advancing Union army, Beauregard evacuates Corinth for Tupelo (Mississippi).

JUNE 3, 1862. Confederate forces evacuate Fort Pillow below Island No. 10 and Memphis.

JUNE 6, 1862. Union commodore Charles H. Davis's ironclads defeat a Confederate flotilla before Memphis, sinking or capturing all but one of its vessels after a sharp fight and wild pursuit.

JUNE 18, 1862. Union troops occupy the Cumberland Gap (Tennessee).

JULY 11, 1862. Confederate general John Hunt Morgan enters Glasgow (Kentucky).

JULY 18, 1862. A band of Confederate raiders assails Newburg (Indiana), causing widespread destruction.

AUGUST 3, 1862. Confederate general Jeff Thompson is defeated near Memphis.

AUGUST 9, 1862. With the threat against the Confederate capital of Richmond receding as McClellan prepares to evacuate the Peninsula (see “March 17, 1862” entry), Lee shifts his operations against the recently promoted major general Pope’s army in northwestern Virginia. The first major clash occurs on August 9, when Jackson’s corps strikes Union major general Nathaniel P. Banks’s corps at Cedar Mountain. Although heavily outnumbered, the Federal troops resist gamely for more than an hour before being routed and driven from the field at nightfall. Pope’s main body comes up the next day, at which point Jackson draws off to await Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia.

AUGUST 19, 1862. Pope retires from the Rapidan with 45,000 Union troops to take up position behind the Rappahannock and await the arrival of McClellan’s army, which three days earlier has begun its withdrawal from the Peninsula. Pope is shadowed from Gordonsville (Virginia) by 55,000 Confederates under Lee, who probes the new Rappahannock defense lines until the 25th, then detaches Jackson on a long march around the Union right flank.

Confederate Commerce Raiders

Washington controlled 90 percent of America’s naval resources at the start of the Civil War. Therefore, the Confederate States Navy—created on February 21, 1861, two months before hostilities began—resorted to unconventional means. Jefferson Davis invited privateers to apply for licenses as early as April 17, two days before Lincoln announced a blockade of southern ports. This blockade quickly proved to be crippling. A few fast blockade-runners eluded patrols, yet bulk exports of cotton and tobacco were halted, strangling the Confederate economy.

Lacking heavy warships, the South’s best countermeasure was its privateers. Most initially operated out of New Orleans, then later along the Atlantic Seaboard. Their harassment of Union merchantmen was boosted when the 38-year-old Confederate commander James D. Bulloch reached Britain in June 1861 to act as a naval agent. In addition to purchasing arms and arranging cotton sales, he also secretly hired English shipbuilders (in violation of neutrality laws) to launch large vessels, which could then be sailed unarmed to a remote island and commissioned as Confederate warships.

The first such raider was named the Oreto, because it was supposedly intended for Italian service. After being launched at Liverpool and putting to sea on March 22, 1862, this swift 700-ton bark sailed for the Bahamas. John N. Maffitt assumed command and renamed it CSS Florida. Nine guns were installed, but as the raider still needed more equipment, it departed on August 17 to fight its way past the Union blockaders into Mobile (Alabama). The Florida reemerged on its first commerce raid on January 16, 1863, claiming 47 prizes before putting into the French port of Brest on August 23.

Bulloch meanwhile arranged the launch of a 1,100-ton English sloop named the Erica on July 29, 1862. Less than one month later, it was commissioned as the 8-gun CSS Alabama under Capt. Raphael Semmes. He conducted a spectacular two-year cruise that claimed more than 60 prizes before being sunk by the U.S. sloop Kearsarge outside Cherbourg (France). Insurance rates for Union merchantmen soared, and blockading warships were diverted to pursue the elusive raiders. Finally, angry protests from Washington compelled the English and French governments to seize 6 more ships and 4 ironclads being privately built for Confederate agents.

The last raider acquired in England was the 1,200-ton, iron-framed Sea King, which was purchased in September 1864. It was met the next month at Madeira by the tender Laurel and was converted into CSS Shenandoah under Capt. James I. Waddell. Prowling into the North Pacific, Waddell netted 38 prizes and circumnavigated the globe before surrendering to the Liverpool authorities in November 1865. The Civil War had ended seven months previously. Washington sued London for hundreds of millions in compensation for the losses inflicted by English-built commerce raiders. An arbitration commission finally decided in September 1872 that Britain should pay the U.S. government $15.5 million to settle these so-called Alabama claims.

The Confederate raider Shenandoah undergoing repairs in Melbourne, Australia. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

The latter covers 50 miles in two days, reaching the railway at Bristoe before sunset of August 26 and capturing Manassas Junction—Pope's supply depot—by midnight. Jackson's three divisions then hide in some woods 12 miles from Thoroughfare Gap, while Pope—his strength now increased to 70,000 troops because of the arrival of two of McClellan's corps—orders a concentration at Manassas. Failing to find Jackson, the Union army then presses on toward Centreville, while Lee begins arriving through Thoroughfare Gap on the evening of the 28th, with James Longstreet's troops. Not wanting Pope to withdraw behind the protection of Bull Run River, Jackson deliberately reveals his position at 5:30 p.m. this same day by attacking King's division of McDowell's corps near Groveton, thus luring the larger—but fragmented—Union army prematurely into battle.

AUGUST 29, 1862. Second Battle of Bull Run. Having at last located Jackson, Pope attacks the Confederate general's strong defensive position with only Sigel's corps and Brig. Gen. John Reynolds's division, the rest of his Union contingents being scattered. Four Federal divisions arrive from Centreville by noon and are thrown into the fight but are repeatedly repelled by Gen. Ambrose P. Hill's division on the Confederate left. Lee meanwhile appears with Longstreet's corps to reinforce Jackson, while Porter and McDowell—unaware of the growing rebel strength—arrive from Manassas with their various Union corps, which have been making toward Gainesville.

The next morning, Pope orders McDowell to pursue the Confederates, still mistakenly assuming he has encountered Jackson's contingent only, which is attempting to escape from this Federal encirclement.

Second Battle of Bull Run (Manassas).

McDowell soon discovers the truth, and although unleashing a heavy attack against the Confederate lines, also secures Bald and Henry House hills to secure his flank. After heavy fighting, Lee sends Longstreet's five divisions against the Federal left at 4:00 p.m., crumpling Union resistance and starting a full-scale retreat. It is too late in the day for the Confederates to achieve a complete victory, however, and Pope is able to extricate most of his forces across Bull Run into Centreville, joining Franklin's corps from Alexandria.

On September 1, Lee sends Jackson on another flanking march; the latter fights a sharp but indecisive engagement at Chantilly with the confused Union forces. Despite being further reinforced by Gen. Edwin "Old Bull" Sumner's corps and thus considerably outnumbering Lee, a demoralized Pope nevertheless decides on September 2 to retire all the way into the Federal fortifications around Washington, having suffered 14,000 casualties during the previous five days of fighting, as opposed to 9,000–10,000 Confederate losses.

AUGUST 30, 1862. Confederate general Edmund Kirby Smith's 15,000 troops brush aside an extemporized Federal force under Gen. William Nelson at Richmond (Kentucky), occupying Lexington three days later.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1862. Union colonel Lowe recaptures Clarksville (Tennessee).

SEPTEMBER 7, 1862. After being reinforced from Richmond, Lee's army crosses the Potomac at Leesburg and occupies Frederick (Maryland).

SEPTEMBER 10, 1862. Lee divides his 40,000-man army, sending Jackson with six divisions to seize Harpers Ferry while he retires behind South Mountain with only three.

SEPTEMBER 13, 1862. Harpers Ferry. Jackson appears out of the west, then other Confederate divisions occupy the heights north and east of Harpers Ferry on the opposite banks of the Potomac and Shenandoah, compelling its isolated, 12,500-man Union garrison to capitulate two days later.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1862. Buell's Union army confronts Gen. Braxton Bragg's Confederates at Bowling Green (Kentucky). Both sides circle around each other one week later without clashing.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1862. Being chased by McClellan, Lee retreats behind Antietam Creek into Sharpsburg (Pennsylvania) to reunite with Jackson.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1862. Antietam. Jackson rejoins Lee this morning at Sharpsburg with two Confederate divisions, followed by a third that same afternoon. By evening, 48-year-old Joseph ("Fighting Joe") Hooker's I Corps—the vanguard of McClellan's slowly approaching, 70,000-man Federal army—collides with 31-year-old John Bell Hood's two brigades on the Confederate left, and both sides brace for battle the next day.

At 5:30 a.m. on September 17, Union forces assault the Confederate left under Jackson, ceasing their efforts five hours later after negligible gains. The 10:00 a.m. Federal attack upon Lee's center fares somewhat better, D. H. Hill's Confederate division being enfiladed and driven out of the sunken road nicknamed "Bloody Lane" after heavy fighting. Farther south, the Union attackers fare even better, Burnside's IX Corps fighting its way across Antietam's stone bridge by 1:00 p.m., then driving upon Sharpsburg two hours later, threatening to roll up Lee's entire army.

At this crucial moment, Gen. A. P. Hill's Confederate division arrives after a forced march from Harpers Ferry and at 4:00 p.m. takes Burnside's corps in its unprotected left flank, thus sending the Union column reeling back across the Antietam. McClellan has suffered approximately 12,000 casualties, as opposed to Lee's 9,000—although with only 40,000 men to begin with and deep in enemy territory, the Confederate general can ill afford to lose many more. Nevertheless, Lee offers to renew the action the next day, but McClellan demurs, despite being reinforced by two more Union divisions. Instead, he allows the Confederates to retreat west across the Potomac on the night of the 18th, uncontested.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1862. Rosencrans defeats the Confederate general Price at Iuka.

OCTOBER 1, 1862. Buell sallies from Louisville to drive Bragg's Confederate invaders out of Kentucky.

OCTOBER 3, 1862. Corinth. Confederate general van Dorn appears outside Corinth (Mississippi) with 22,000 men, hoping to recapture this key strategic town and rupture Grant's line of communications. Its 20,000 Federal defenders under Rosencrans brace for an assault, which is launched the next day.

and eventually halted after heavy fighting around a strongpoint called Battery Robinet. By evening, van Horn is in retreat.

OCTOBER 7, 1862. Perryville. This evening, advance elements of Buell's Union army begin encamping west of Perryville (Kentucky), along a stream known as Doctor's Creek. Rearguard units of the Confederate army of General Bragg, which the Federals have been pushing back from Louisville, are also in the vicinity, and soldiers on both sides start fighting over waterholes.

The next day, a heavy battle erupts when the Confederates attack the left end of Buell's line and rout the greater part of a corps, without either general planning on such an engagement. The Union commander—whose headquarters is several miles away—only learns of the action at dusk, after losing 4,000 men. Confederate casualties are comparable, and the disheartened Bragg resumes his retirement shortly thereafter, abandoning the state altogether by retreating through the Cumberland Gap into Tennessee.

OCTOBER 30, 1862. Buell is replaced as Union commander by Rosencrans.

NOVEMBER 7, 1862. Because of his continuing reluctance to commit the Army of the Potomac to a renewed offensive against Lee, McClellan is relieved of his command and replaced by Burnside.

DECEMBER 11, 1862. Fredericksburg. After establishing the Army of the Potomac's new base at Aquia Creek, Burnside's 122,000 men have spent two weeks circling southeastward of Lee's main body into the vicinity of Falmouth (Virginia), hoping to slip across the Rappahannock River at or below nearby Fredericksburg and drive directly upon the Confederate capital of Richmond, 54 miles away. However, a delay in forwarding pontoons from Washington has prevented the Union army's immediate traverse, affording Lee's 79,000 troops time to arrive and take up position in the heights just west of the town.

Despite having lost the element of surprise, Burnside persists with his original plan, eventually ordering pontoon bridges erected on the morning of December 12. The Army of the Potomac pushes across in the face of considerable opposition, disgorging through Fredericksburg into a shallow open plain to the west of the town. On December 13, Burnside orders twin columns to press on and engage Lee's waiting lines in the hills beyond, being repulsed with 12,500 losses, compared to 4,200 rebel casualties. Two days after this lopsided slaughter, Burnside retreats, and both armies settle in for the winter on opposite banks of the Rappahannock.

DECEMBER 12, 1862. The Federal gunboat Cairo sinks after striking a Confederate "torpedo" in a Mississippi tributary, thus becoming the first victim of mine warfare.

DECEMBER 20, 1862. A Confederate cavalry raid by van Dorn on Grant's supply depot at Holly Springs compels him to defer his advance against Jackson (Mississippi).

DECEMBER 29, 1862. Sherman's 30,000-man army is defeated by Confederate general John C. Pemberton at Chickasaw Bluffs, six miles north of Vicksburg (Mississippi). Sherman is obliged to retreat after losing 2,000 troops.

DECEMBER 30, 1862. Murfreesboro. Four days after advancing out of Nashville, Rosencrans deploys his 43,000 Union troops along the banks of the Stone's River facing Murfreesboro (Tennessee), which is defended by a slightly smaller Confederate army under Bragg. The next dawn, four rebel brigades launch a devastating flank attack against Gen. Alexander McD. McCook's corps on the Federal right, causing it to disintegrate. However, Thomas's two divisions hold the Union center, reinforced by Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden on the left.

The day seemingly ends with a Confederate victory, but Rosencrans refuses to retire. Instead, after a couple of days of long-range skirmishing, Bragg drives against the Union left on January 2, 1863, only to see his attacking columns smashed by Federal artillery. The rebels then abandon Murfreesboro and fall back upon Tullahoma, leaving Rosencrans triumphant despite his 13,000 casualties.

JANUARY 10, 1863. Arkansas Post. To clear Confederate concentrations from their rearguard, generals John A. McClernand and Sherman lead 32,000 troops against Fort Hindman at Arkansas Post, 40 miles from the confluence of the Arkansas and Mississippi rivers, being supported by Porter's river squadron. After a preliminary naval bombardment, the Union army invests this stronghold the next day, suffering about 1,000 casualties before compelling its 5,000-man garrison to surrender.

JANUARY 26, 1863. Hooker replaces Burnside in command of the Army of the Potomac.

JANUARY 31, 1863. The Confederate ironclads Palmetto State and Chicora attack Du Pont's blockading squadron outside Charleston, capturing the converted merchantman Mercedita and crippling the Keystone State.

MARCH 14, 1863. Farragut's fleet attempts to push past the Confederate batteries at Port Hudson (Louisiana), but only some of his vessels succeed. The Mississippi runs aground and is destroyed.

APRIL 7, 1863. Shortly after noon, Du Pont reluctantly leads his nine Union ironclads in to give battle against Charleston's Confederate batteries. Despite their invulnerability, the cumbersome vessels are only able to fire off 139 heavy rounds by evening, compared to 2,200 by the shore batteries, thus retiring quite badly mauled (the Keokuk sinks the next day).

Shortly thereafter, Du Pont is replaced by Rear Adm. John A. Dahlgren, inventor of the gun of this same name, who gradually strangles the Confederate defenses.

APRIL 15, 1863. After two and a half months assembling 45,000 Union troops 10 miles above Vicksburg at Milliken's Bend under his corps commanders Sherman, McClelland, and Scottish-born James B. McPherson, Grant strikes south toward New Carthage with the latter two units along the western bank of the Mississippi to circumvent Vicksburg and eventually invest this Confederate stronghold from the rear. Sherman's corps in the meantime feints toward Chickasaw Bluffs, while Porter's seven ironclads, assorted gunboats, and three store ships slip past the Vicksburg batteries the next night to support Grant's main body along the river.

After reaching Hard Times Plantation on April 24, Grant crosses to the eastern bank of the Mississippi at Bruinsburg, defeats a small Confederate force a few miles inland, then occupies Grand Gulf. He then orders Sherman to rejoin before pressing east toward the town of Jackson on May 7.

APRIL 17, 1863. In a coordinated move designed by Grant to further confuse the Confederate defenders of Mississippi, Col. Benjamin H. Grierson departs Lagrange (near Memphis, Tennessee) with 900 troopers of the 6th and 7th Illinois Cavalry regiments, plus six field guns, to fight his way 600 miles down toward the Gulf of Mexico—giving the impression of being the spearhead of a much larger Union army following behind. After wreaking great material damage, Grierson emerges at Baton Rouge by the evening of May 2.

APRIL 18, 1863. The 2,000-man Union garrison holding Fayetteville (Arkansas) repulses an attack by 3,000 Confederate troops with four cannons.

APRIL 30, 1863. Chancellorsville. Eager to launch a spring offensive against Lee, Hooker masses 60,000 Union troops near Chancellorsville (west of Fredericksburg, Virginia), while Gen. John Sedgwick pushes across the Rappahannock farther east with another 40,000. Despite being outnumbered two to one, Lee outfights both contingents; he leaves 10,000 men to check Sedgwick, while his main body swings around under Jackson to confront Hooker on May 1.

Lee's initial attack throws the main Union army over to the defensive. The next day he outflanks and rolls up Hooker's right wing with Jackson's corps. The Army of the Potomac then falls back to a fresh defensive position, at which time (May 3) Lee turns upon Sedgwick, who in the meantime has captured Fredericksburg's commanding heights. On the 4th, the Confederates drive Sedgwick back across the river, then countermarch to strike another blow against Hooker at Chancellorsville. Thoroughly outmaneuvered and having suffered 17,000 casualties compared to 12,000 Confederate losses, Hooker retires across the Rappahannock by nightfall of the 5th, the only success coming when Jackson—Lee's ablest subordinate—is mortally wounded by a chance round from his own troops.

MAY 12, 1863. Grant defeats a Confederate concentration at Raymond (Mississippi), then captures nearby Jackson two days later, preventing the passage of 6,000 Confederate reinforcements under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston into Vicksburg.

MAY 16, 1863. Siege of Vicksburg. After sallying 25 miles eastward out of Vicksburg, its garrison commander, General Pemberton, challenges Grant's approaching army at Champion Hill, suffering 2,500 Confederate casualties in a seesaw battle before retreating. The next day, the rebels fight a rearguard action at a crossing of the Big Black River and are defeated again, being driven back inside their trenches at Vicksburg.

Grant arrives outside the city on May 18, his troops storming Vicksburg's defenses the next day. A second assault on May 22 results in 3,000 Union casualties, after which the Federal army settles down to a protracted siege. Confederate relief columns are kept at bay over the next several weeks, while Grant's strength swells to 75,000 men. Eventually, Pemberton requests terms on July 3, and 31,000 defenders capitulate the next day, along with 172 cannon and 60,000 small arms.

MAY 23, 1863. Capture of Port Hudson. Five weeks after departing northward from Baton Rouge, 14,000 Union troops under Banks besiege 7,000 Confederates inside Port Hudson, located 200 miles below Vicksburg on the Mississippi River. When news arrives of the fall of Vicksburg, Port Hudson's half-starved Confederate garrison also capitulates on July 9.

JUNE 3, 1863. Lee strikes north from Virginia with three corps under Longstreet, Gen. Richard S. Ewell, and A. P. Hill to invade Pennsylvania.

JUNE 9, 1863. Lee's cavalry clashes with Union troops at Brandy Station (Virginia), revealing to Hooker that the Army of Northern Virginia is moving over to the offensive.

JUNE 13, 1863. Refused permission to advance against the Confederate capital of Richmond during Lee's absence, Hooker must instead fall back toward Manassas in the hope of intercepting the Army of Northern Virginia before it can threaten Washington.

JUNE 15, 1863. Confederate general Ewell captures Winchester in northern Virginia and crosses over into Maryland, while pushing his cavalry forward into Pennsylvania.

JUNE 23, 1863. After six months of inactivity near Murfreesboro, Rosencrans's 60,000-man Army of the Cumberland breaks camp and pushes south to drive Bragg's 45,000 Confederates out of central Tennessee. By sliding east around the rebel flank, Rosencrans compels Bragg to pull back into Chattanooga by July 4.

JUNE 28, 1863. Lee—whose flamboyant cavalry commander J. E. B. Stuart has left him without

Recruitment of African American Soldiers

When the Civil War began, many free blacks in the North wanted to fight for the Union. Although blacks had served in other countries for decades, these first African American volunteers were refused because of ingrained prejudice. Even leaders such as Lincoln believed that they could not make effective soldiers and that their inclusion might push border states like Missouri into the Confederacy. The legal status of escaped slaves was also considered problematical. When Maj. Gen. David Hunter raised a black regiment in March 1862 from runaways congregated around the Federal base at Port Royal (near modern Hilton Head, South Carolina), he was obliged to disband this unit by August 9.

Ironically, after a Federal expedition seized New Orleans in late April 1862, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Butler was approached by militia officers of its 1st Regiment of Native Louisiana Guards. This all-black unit existed under the Confederate government and now wished to switch sides. With the passing of a law by Congress in July permitting free blacks to enlist (although for less pay or privileges than whites), Butler decided to accept the Louisianans' offer. The 1st Regiment was sworn into Federal service on September 27, followed by the 2nd and 3rd regiments in October and November.

A manpower shortage was now developing in Union ranks; therefore, when Lincoln finally issued the Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863, it not only declared all slaves in rebel states to be freed but it also added that blacks "will be received into the armed services." The existing 1st Regiment of Kansas Colored Volunteers therefore became the fourth African American regiment in the U.S. Army 12 days afterward, followed by Hunter's resurrected 1st South Carolina Volunteers on January 31.

Needing still more troops, Congress passed the first conscription act in U.S. history on March 3, authorizing a selection by lottery from among all males between the ages of 18 and 35. A separate "Bureau of Colored Troops" was also created by the War Department in the spring of 1863. Black regiments fought well in their first major battles in May and June at Port Hudson and Milliken's Bend on the Mississippi River. Despite being often assigned inferior equipment, heavy manual labor, and no chance of promotion, nearly 180,000 African Americans swelled Union ranks throughout the remainder of this conflict, one-third giving their lives.

reconnaissance capabilities because he prefers to raid deep into Union territory alone—learns that Hooker is concentrating at Frederick (Maryland), thus threatening the Confederates' rear.

This same day, Hooker is replaced by George Gordon Meade as Union commander in chief.

JUNE 30, 1863. Gettysburg. A Confederate brigade—part of A. P. Hill's and Longstreet's two corps—bears down upon Gettysburg out of the west in hopes of looting its shoe factory, only to find the small Pennsylvania town held by a Union cavalry contingent. Rather than scatter, these Federal troopers—detached from Meade's much larger concentration at Pipe Creek, farther southeast—make a stand, provoking Hill into mounting a full-scale assault the next morning.

The Confederates encounter unexpectedly stiff resistance from Gen. John Buford's Federal cavalry division, plus I Corps infantry units under Gen. John F. Reynolds, until the defenders are finally compelled to retreat when Ewell's Confederate corps also appears out of the north and sends in an assault column under Brig. Gen. Jubal Early. Nevertheless, the Federal forces retire no farther than Cemetery Hill and brace for another battle, while awaiting reinforcements.

Arriving upon the scene, Lee wishes to destroy this portion of the Army of the Potomac before it can be built up to full strength; however, through poor communications, he is unable to commit Longstreet's corps to battle until late afternoon of July 2, by which time the Federals are well dug in and increasing in numbers (eventually reaching 82,000 men, compared to 75,000 Confederates). Desperate fighting swirls around the "Peach Orchard" and "Devil's Den," with neither side gaining a decisive advantage, until Lee finally decides upon an all-out assault against the Union center the next day.

It is Meade, though, who strikes first at dawn of July 3, sending a division from XII Corps to reoccupy Culp's Hill from the Confederates, which it achieves after four hours of intense fighting. Despite this setback, Lee allows his main attack to go forward, preceded by an extensive bombardment of the Union center, which commences at 1:00 p.m. by 140 Confederate guns under Col. E. P. Alexander. When the 77 Union artillery pieces fall silent near 3:00—having been ordered by Gen. H. J. Hunt to preserve ammunition—38-year-old general George Edward Pickett's fresh Confederate division emerges from the trees three-quarters of a mile away and charges the Union lines atop Cemetery Hill in the belief that the defenders' guns are out of action. Instead, his regiments endure a merciless pounding from both renewed artillery fire and massed musket volleys, losing 3,400 of 4,800 men before retreating.

Having lost a total of about 30,000 men killed, wounded, or missing during the four days of fighting, a defeated Lee retires toward Virginia by July 5. Union casualties total 23,000, leaving Meade too drained to do much except follow.

JULY 5, 1863. Confederate general Morgan captures 400 Union prisoners at Lebanon (Kentucky), and then three days later crosses the Ohio River into Harrison County (Indiana) with 2,500 troopers and four artillery pieces, apparently in hopes of fomenting a local insurrection by anti-Federalist sympathizers called Copperheads. After proceeding into Ohio, he is cornered and defeated near Pomeroy on July 18, surrendering the remnants of his command two days later in Columbiana County.

JULY 13, 1863. During the second drawing of draft numbers in New York City, a furious mob attacks the assistant provost marshal's office, and a vicious anti-conscription riot ensues, resulting in some 150 deaths and 300 injuries before being put down four days later by the arrival of several thousand Federal troops.

JULY 17, 1863. Having quit occupied Vicksburg 12 days earlier with elements of three Union Army corps, Sherman drives the outnumbered Johnston out of Jackson (Mississippi). Natchez is also seized by another Federal detachment, while the rebel supply depot at Grenada is destroyed one month later.

AUGUST 20, 1863. At dawn, Lawrence (Kansas) is surprised by 300 irregulars under William C. Quantrill of Cass County (Missouri), who slay 191 residents and wound another 581 before burning the town to the ground. Local militia general James H. Lane retaliates by raiding Grand River (Missouri), claiming 80 lives.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1863. Burnside occupies Knoxville with 15,000 Union troops.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1863. Bragg evacuates Chattanooga, and Rosencrans occupies it the next day.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1863. Learning that Bragg is not in full retreat into Rome (Georgia) as expected but, rather, is holding his position, Rosencrans hastily reconcentrates his three corps near Chickamauga Creek, 12 miles south of Chattanooga.

The next day, Bragg begins advancing upon the Union left under Crittenden at Lee and Gordon's Mills, being reinforced en route by three freshly arrived Confederate brigades under Hood.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1863. Chickamauga. Bragg's army approaches through dense woods, hoping to envelop Rosencrans's left, then drive the 60,000 Union troops back upon Lookout Mountain, without any possibility of escape. However, the Federal general has already begun shifting his army to the left, and on the morning of September 19, Gen. George H. Thomas sends a division forward to reconnoiter near Chickamauga Creek, discovering dismounted Confederate cavalrymen. A confused series of clashes erupts, most units being unable to see any great distance because of the terrain, hence fighting independently wherever they chance upon their enemy.

Bragg is reinforced overnight and the next morning launches a two-pronged assault, most of which hits Thomas's corps. He calls for support, and Rosencrans shifts three Union divisions to the left, before a fourth is mistakenly pulled out of the Union line, allowing Longstreet's recently arrived Confederate reinforcements to pour through at noon. The Federal right—now reduced to fewer than 7,000 men—is swept from the field, although managing to make a stand in McFarland's Gap. Rosencrans and Crittenden are carried off in the Union flight toward Chattanooga, only Thomas hanging on with five divisions against the entire 60,000-man Confederate army. He mounts a desperate defense along Missionary Ridge, earning the nickname "Rock of Chickamauga." Eventually the Union survivors are pressed back around 4:00 p.m. and withdraw northward, the victorious Confederates giving up their pursuit at sunset. Both sides have suffered approximately 16,000 casualties apiece; Thomas retires unmolested toward Chattanooga on September 21.

OCTOBER 5, 1863. The four-man Confederate submersible David under Lt. William T. Glassell slips out of Charleston (South Carolina) after nightfall and badly damages the 4,120-ton ironclad USS New Ironsides with a "torpedo" (a spar tipped with an explosive charge), although it also sinks from this same blast.

OCTOBER 23, 1863. Grant reaches Chattanooga to assume command over the remnants of Rosencrans's army, now beleaguered within this city under Thomas after its defeat at Chickamauga. To extricate the Army of the Cumberland from its difficulties, it has already been reinforced by 12,000 men of the XI and XII corps under Hooker from the Army of the Potomac in Virginia and is awaiting the arrival of the XV Corps under Sherman from the Army of the Tennessee in Mississippi before attempting a breakout.

NOVEMBER 17, 1863. Having been detached with 15,000 troops from Bragg's victorious army, Confederate general Longstreet arrives to invest Burnside within Knoxville. After a nocturnal assault is repulsed with heavy losses, the Southerners institute a siege.

NOVEMBER 23, 1863. Chattanooga. After a month's preparation, Grant's 60,000 Union troops begin to push southeastward out of Chattanooga to break the siege by Bragg's 34,000 Confederates, dug in along the nearby heights. In the center, Thomas's corps moves out onto the open plain and pushes back the rebel picket lines around Orchard Knob, in anticipation of a two-pronged envelopment by other Federal contingents: Hooker, who is to storm Lookout Mountain on the right, and Sherman who is to outflank the Confederates on the left.

The next midday, the Union offensive is at last launched, as Hooker easily carries his objective, although without threatening Bragg's main army. Sherman's corps meanwhile encounters greater resistance among the broken hills at the northeastern tip of Missionary Ridge from the Confederate division of Irish-born general Pat Cleburne, and the Union drive bogs down by nightfall.

When fighting resumes on November 25, Grant directs Thomas's corps to pressure Bragg's center with a frontal assault during the afternoon to relieve his wings. Against all expectations, 18,000 Union infantrymen surge through the lower rebel trenches at 3:30 p.m., then—without orders—scale the 500-foot heights of Missionary Ridge in an irresistible tide led by 32-year-old major general Philip Henry Sheridan. Bragg's army is broken and retreats in disorder, having suffered 8,700 killed, wounded, or captured. Grant's losses are approximately 6,000 men.

DECEMBER 4, 1863. After helping defeat Bragg outside Chattanooga, Sherman's corps raises the Confederate siege of Burnside's army inside Knoxville.

FEBRUARY 3, 1864. Sherman departs Vicksburg with the XVI and the XVII Army corps, launching a devastating sweep through Confederate-held Mississippi. On February 5, his Union columns pass through Jackson, then level Meridian on February 14–15, before returning into their original cantonments on February 27.

FEBRUARY 17, 1864. The eight-man Confederate submersible H.L. Hunley (named for its dead inventor, Horace L. Hunley) slips out of Charleston under Lt. George E. Dixon and sinks the 1,930-ton Union steam screw sloop Housatonic by ramming it with a torpedo—which also claims the luckless submarine.

MARCH 8, 1864. Grant is promoted to lieutenant general by Lincoln and the next day is made commander in chief of all Union armies.

MARCH 14, 1864. Federal forces under Gen. A. J. Smith capture 325 Confederates and 12 guns at Fort DeRussey on the Red River (Louisiana).

MARCH 25, 1864. A cavalry raid by Confederate general Forrest levels Paducah (Kentucky).

APRIL 12, 1864. Forrest surprises and destroys the Union garrison at Fort Pillow (Tennessee).

MAY 3, 1864. The Wilderness. After reorganizing the Army of the Potomac and appointing Sheridan as his cavalry commander, Grant this evening departs Culpeper (Virginia) and heads southward with 120,000 men, subdivided into five corps, to cross the Rapidan River at Germanna and Ely's fords in search of Lee. The next evening, the Union vanguard camps in the middle of a large forest dubbed The Wilderness in Spotsylvania County, where advance Confederate units surprise it on the morning of May 5.

With scarcely 70,000 troops and less artillery than the Union host, Lee has opted to push his own army into this wooded area from the opposite direction and fight blind, wherever his troops become engaged; in this manner, Grant's superior numbers and guns cannot easily be brought to bear. The left wing of the Confederate army therefore collides with the left center of the Army of the Potomac shortly after daybreak, and isolated skirmishes gradually evolve into a pitched battle as reinforcements are hastened toward the sounds of gunfire by both sides. Unable to see more than 100 yards because of

Ulysses S. Grant

Hiram Ulysses Grant was born on April 27, 1822, at Point Pleasant (Ohio), 25 miles east of Cincinnati. He was the eldest of six children of the tanner Jesse Grant and his wife, Hannah Simpson. His family moved to the village of Georgetown the next year, and Grant grew up there until the age of 17. At that time, he was nominated for the U.S. Military Academy at West Point by Congressman Thomas L. Harmer—who erroneously listed his name as “Ulysses Simpson Grant,” which the academy insisted on retaining. Short of stature, Grant excelled at horsemanship as a cadet and graduated 21st in his class in 1843.

Three years later, he campaigned with distinction as a junior officer during the Mexican-American War, twice given field promotions for bravery. Upon the war's conclusion, he married Julia B. Dent, with whom he had four children. Grant pined for his young wife and family, though, when assigned in 1853 as quartermaster of the 4th U.S. Infantry Regiment at Fort Vancouver in the remote Washington Territory. After being promoted to captain the next year at Fort Humboldt in California, he grew so depressed that he started drinking and, consequently, was given the choice of resigning his commission or being court-martialed.

Grant left the U.S. Army on July 31, 1854, but he enjoyed little success in civilian life—working as a farmer, a real-estate agent in St. Louis (Missouri), and even a bill collector before finally accepting work as an assistant in the leather shop owned by his father and brother in Galena (Illinois). Such repeated failures seemed to show little promise, yet when the Civil War erupted in April 1861, Grant helped raise a volunteer company. He accompanied it to the state capital of Springfield to petition Gov. Richard Yates for a field command.

Being a West Point graduate, Grant eventually was appointed colonel of the undisciplined 21st Illinois Infantry Regiment on June 17, 1861. It was sent into Missouri to help secure that state for the Union, and Grant quickly became a militia brigadier general by August 7. Then began the unexpected string of victories at Paducah, Fort Henry, and Fort Donelson—the first significant Union successes of the war—which propelled him to the very top echelons of command. Unpretentious and inured to setbacks, Grant was cool and fearless in maneuver, qualities that eventually carried him to the presidency.

the dense undergrowth, many formations and batteries fire wildly throughout the night, until the brush itself catches fire.

The next day, the battle regains intensity, a threatened breakthrough by Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock's II Union Army Corps being contained by the timely arrival of Longstreet's division, although Longstreet is then accidentally shot by his own troops. Long-range exchanges characterize the fighting on May 7, after which Grant—undaunted despite having suffered almost 18,000 casualties to Lee's 11,500—resumes his advance southeastward toward Spotsylvania Court House.

MAY 8, 1864. Spotsylvania. A Union column under Sheridan hastens to seize the crossroads at Spotsylvania Court House to get between Lee's army and the Confederate capital of Richmond, but a rebel contingent bars its path. Both armies then collide again and another ferocious, confused battle erupts over the next 10 days as Grant and Lee slowly circle around each other.

On May 12, a fierce contest is fought in pelting rain from dawn to dusk over a horseshoe-shaped arc of Confederate trenches called the Bloody Angle, which guard the principal road crossing. Union casualties this day total 7,000, compared to 4,500 for the rebels (plus another 4,000 captured). The Army of the Potomac nevertheless persists in sliding eastward, all the while maintaining contact with the Army of Northern Virginia. By May 20, total Federal losses since the beginning of this campaign stand at 35,000; Confederate losses total 26,000.

MAY 13, 1864. Drive on Atlanta. Less than a week after departing Chattanooga southeastward with 90,000 Union troops, Sherman encounters Johnston's 60,000 Confederates dug in behind Buzzard's Roost on Rocky Face Ridge, with his headquarters in nearby Dalton (Georgia). Rather than storm these heights, two Federal corps pin down the Southerners, while Union general McPherson leads the 30,000-man Army of the Tennessee on a wide flanking movement to the right, passing through Snake Creek Gap to threaten Johnston's line of communications two days later at Resaca.

The Confederates fight their way free, but Sherman continues to press Johnston back toward Atlanta, outflanking the rebels whenever they make a stand. Eventually, the Confederates retire into prepared positions on Kenesaw Mountain, which Sherman assaults on June 27, suffering 3,000 casualties. Resuming their former tactic, the Federal columns again outflank Johnston, obliging him to withdraw beyond the Chattahoochee River by July 9, and into trenches around Atlanta (population 13,000) one week later.

At this juncture, President Davis replaces Johnston with Hood, who attacks General Thomas's Union corps on July 20 as it is crossing Peachtree Creek just a few miles outside Atlanta. This assault is beaten off with considerable difficulty, and two days later Hood also mauls McPherson's detached force as it approaches out of the east, after having secured Decatur. Sherman nevertheless continues to encircle Atlanta, despite another sally by Hood westward against the Union positions at Ezra Church on July 28. Eventually, a lengthy siege results, culminating in the escape northwestward of Hood's army and the capitulation of the battered city by September 2.

MAY 23, 1864. Six months after escaping from imprisonment in Ohio, General Morgan (see "July 5, 1863" entry) enters Kentucky with a body of mounted Confederate raiders. On June 11, he threatens Frankfort, but otherwise exerts little effect on Union dispositions.

JUNE 3, 1864. Cold Harbor. Three days after Sheridan's cavalry has occupied the village of Cold Harbor close to the Chickahominy River (Virginia), Grant mistakenly assumes Lee's forces are overextended, so he orders a direct frontal assault on the nearby Confederate trenches for 4:30 a.m. on June 3 in the hope of achieving a breakthrough. Instead, he discovers this sector has been heavily reinforced by Lee, consequently the Union storm columns suffer 8,000 casualties in half an hour.

Such brutal slaughter checks the Federal offensive, resulting in 10 days of long-range exchanges. Union casualties for the preceding month total 50,000 men, compared to Lee's 32,000; yet Grant is able to quickly replenish his lost troops and equipment, whereas Confederate resources are almost exhausted. Grant nonetheless decides to alter strategy in mid-June, leaving a holding force outside Richmond while slipping the bulk of the seven corps of his huge Army of the Potomac southeastward again to obliquely approach the Confederate capital through its vital supply point at Petersburg.

JUNE 15, 1864. Petersburg Siege. After stealthily crossing both the Chickahominy and James rivers aboard transports and a 2,200-foot-long pontoon bridge at Windmill Point, the Army of the Potomac's 15,000-man vanguard under Maj. Gen. William F. "Baldy" Smith of the XVIII Corps surprises the 5,400 Confederates under Beauregard who are holding Petersburg, a small but vital city of 18,000 inhabitants lying south of Richmond. This satellite serves as a hub for five railways, numerous roads, and much river traffic, and the Confederate capital cannot be held should it fall.

Part of the elaborate Confederate works outside Petersburg, after their evacuation in April 1865; such trenches extended for many miles in both directions. (Author's Collection)

Despite quickly building their numbers up to 67,000 men and having ample opportunity over the next five days to overwhelm the now 20,000 defenders, Federal forces fail to carry Petersburg and are even deceived by Beauregard's feints—which include using logs to simulate additional cannon and lighting excessive campfires at night, all giving a false impression of strength. These tactics nevertheless buy sufficient time for Lee to hasten his main Army of Northern Virginia down to bolster Peters-burg's defenses. Having suffered almost 11,400 casualties in the previous, vain assaults, compared to roughly 4,000 among the defenders, Grant is willing to settle down to protracted trench warfare, pinning the outnumbered Confederates in place.

Coal miners serving in the 48th Pennsylvania Infantry Regiment under Lt. Col. Henry Pleasants attempt to break this stalemate by digging a 511-foot tunnel and detonating an eight-ton charge beneath a Confederate strongpoint known as Elliott's Salient at dawn of July 30. Although the blast vaporizes some 280–350 defenders and blows a 135-foot-wide crater, the ensuing Union assault is botched because the specially prepared African American

Trench Warfare at Petersburg

Although referred to as the “siege” of Petersburg, the Union attack against this small southern city was not a full encirclement; rather, it was 10 months of gruelling trench warfare. Two huge armies dug works that eventually snaked for over 30 miles around the city’s eastern and southern fringes, probing for any advantage.

Both Federal and rebel commanders realized early in the Civil War that the more accurate and lethal weaponry available could have a shattering effect upon massed troops. Battles might still be decided by a climactic charge, yet armies routinely dug in whenever in an enemy presence—for protection from an unexpected artillery barrage, if nothing worse. Such tactics were especially true in mid-June 1864 when the Army of the Potomac pressed in upon Petersburg, which was desperately defended by the Army of Northern Virginia. As some 125,000 Union troops crowded into their entrenchments, 55,000 Confederates created such elaborate defenses opposite them that northern newspapers derided Lee as “the Ace of Spades.”

Throughout the winter and spring of 1864–1865, both armies slept in bombproof bunkers. Mortar rounds soared back and forth, snipers killed the unwary, and disease spread amid the cold squalor. Federal regiments attempted breakthroughs at vulnerable spots, almost invariably thrown back with heavy losses. Finally, Petersburg’s defenders collapsed through sheer exhaustion and lack of supplies. Remarkably, almost identical conditions were experienced a half-century later in the fields of Flanders and northern France during the First World War.

troops from Brig. Gen. Edward Ferrero’s division are replaced at the last minute, for political considerations, by Brig. Gen. James Ledlie’s unrehearsed division. The latter unwittingly blunder into the crater’s soft bottom rather than circle its rim, becoming bogged down, and are easily shot from above when Confederate brigadier general William Mahone’s division recuperates and moves over to plug the gap. A golden opportunity is lost, and some 5,300 Union casualties are suffered through the incompetence of the corps commander, Burnside, who is cashiered. The siege of Petersburg will persist for another eight months until the very final days of the war.

JULY 5, 1864. Alarm at Washington. After defeating small Union forces in the Shenandoah Valley, Confederate general Early moves into Maryland to threaten Washington, D.C., in the hope of relieving pressure on Lee’s hard-pressed army in Virginia. Gen. Bradley T. Johnson crosses the Potomac River this day with the 3,000-man Rebel vanguard, followed shortly thereafter by Early’s 10,000-man main body.

By July 10, the Confederates have passed through Rockville, and the next morning they encounter the Union fortifications at Fort Stevens (Brightwood, D.C.). They are held by the 1st and 2nd divisions of the VI Corps under Gen. Horatio G. Wright—hastily withdrawn from Grant’s army around Petersburg—plus a scratch force of rear echelon troops and convalescents. Without a siege train, Early can only probe the defenses, suffering 500 casualties before retiring on July 13 toward the Shenandoah Valley via Leesburg, Snickers Gap, and Winchester. Federal losses are 54 killed and 319 wounded.

AUGUST 5, 1864. Mobile Bay. At 5:30 a.m., Farragut—his flag flying aboard USS Hartford—stands in toward the Confederate defenses at Mobile Bay, his squadron consisting of the monitors Tecumseh, Manhattan, Winnebago, and Chickasaw, plus 14 wooden warships lashed together in pairs for greater protection. An hour and a half later, they begin exchanging salvos with Fort Morgan, while the Tecumseh presses on close inshore to engage the waiting Confederate ironclad Tennessee under Rear Adm. Franklin Buchanan.

Instead, the lead Union monitor suddenly strikes a mine or “torpedo,” capsizing within minutes, with Cmdr. T. A. M. Craven and 91 of its 113-man crew being drowned. The next Union ship in line—the steam sloop USS Brooklyn—hesitates to follow, until Farragut bellows across the water to its captain: “Damn the torpedoes! Full speed ahead!” The Union vessels clear the Confederate minefield without further incident, and some of their number dispose of the three Confederate gunboats supporting the Tennessee. The entire squadron then gives its full attention to this formidable opponent. The Monongahela, the Lackawanna, and the Hartford all unsuccessfully attempt to ram the ironclad, which is eventually checked by the 440-pound solid shots fired by the 15-inch guns aboard the Manhattan. Surrounded, its gunports battered shut, steering gear shot away, and commander seriously wounded, the Tennessee finally surrenders to its tormentors at 10:00 a.m.

Despite having captured this vessel, plus both forts Morgan and Gaines ashore, the Union forces are unable to subdue the city of Mobile 30 miles farther north, although it ceases to serve as a viable seaport for importing desperately needed goods from abroad.

AUGUST 7, 1864. To establish Union control in the Shenandoah Valley, Sheridan is given command of all its Federal forces. Three days later, he advances out of Harpers Ferry, driving Early's Confederates back toward Strasburg.

AUGUST 21, 1864. Forrest makes a hit-and-run raid into Memphis with a body of Confederate cavalry.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1864. Winchester. With 8,000 Union cavalymen and 23,000 infantrymen, Sheridan confronts Early's smaller Confederate army two miles east of Winchester (Virginia). Despite some initial confusion and a bloody repulse, the Federal commander rallies his troops, brings up reinforcements around noon, then launches an entire cavalry division in a charge behind the rebel flank that secures 1,200 captives and drives Early in retreat toward Strasburg.

The Confederates regroup at Fisher's Hill between the Shenandoah River and Little North Mountain, only to be routed again three days later when they are once more outflanked. Early then retires into Port Republic on September 25 with his surviving units.

OCTOBER 19, 1864. At dawn, Early's Confederate army—having been reinforced by Longstreet—surprises Sheridan's unprepared corps at Cedar Creek (Virginia), capturing 1,300 prisoners and 18 guns. The Union commander rides 20 miles from Winchester to rally his troops and rout Early by nightfall, seizing 23 rebel guns.

NOVEMBER 11, 1864. March to the Sea. Having detached Thomas's corps back into Tennessee to keep an eye on Hood, Sherman orders his 60,000 remaining troops to burn empty Atlanta to the ground, then the next day begins striking out in four parallel columns toward the Atlantic on an uncontested sweep designed to underscore the South's prostrate condition. On November 23, a few thousand raw Confederate militiamen are brushed aside outside Milledgeville (then Georgia's capital), being mostly boys and old men, but otherwise no armed resistance is encountered.

After cutting a swathe of destruction 60 miles wide and 250 miles long, Sherman's army reaches Savannah on December 10, circling around to the right to gain the Ogeechee River, overwhelm the Confederate garrison at Fort McAllister, and re-

Presidential Reelection

Early in 1864, the 26 northern states were confronted with the difficulty of conducting a presidential election amid the carnage of civil war. Such a test of democracy had few precedents, certainly none in the Western Hemisphere. The Republican Party was uneasy because they believed Lincoln could not possibly win; some even suggested that General Grant be nominated instead. Grant angrily rebuffed such a notion, declaring that he considered "it as important to the cause that [the President] should be elected, as that the army should be successful in the field."

Worried party members nonetheless forged an alliance with those Democrats who had originally favored the federal government's recourse to arms. They formed the so-called National Union ticket with Lincoln at its head and Gov. Andrew Johnson of Tennessee as his "War Democrat" running mate for vice president. Their campaign slogan was: "Don't change horses in the middle of the stream." A breakaway faction known as the "Radical Republicans," who felt that the president was being too soft on the South, held a separate convention in Cleveland on May 31, 1864, which nominated Frémont and John Cochrane of New York. The Democrats chose McClellan, once the commanding general of the Army of the Potomac, whom Lincoln had twice relieved and who now had to run on an anti-war platform, which he personally opposed.

Still, as late as the end of August 1864, the president was so convinced that he would lose that he made members of his cabinet blindly sign a pledge to cooperate with his successor. However, shortly thereafter, Sherman took Atlanta, Grant began making inroads at the Siege of Petersburg, and Sheridan defeated Jubal Early in the Shenandoah Valley. Because of these victories, Frémont withdrew from the race on September 21, throwing his support behind Lincoln.

The election, which was held on November 8, returned the president to office in a landslide, for he won 2.2 million votes to McClellan's 1.8 million, the latter only carrying his home state of New Jersey plus Delaware and Kentucky. Several states allowed their soldiers serving in the field to vote, a first in U.S. history, and most of them cast their ballots for Lincoln. Yet more noteworthy still was the very fact that an election was held at all under such strained circumstances.

establish contact with Union warships in Ossabaw Sound. Reprovisioned from supply ships, the Federal troops then return to occupy Savannah by December 21, its 10,000-man garrison under Gen.

William J. Hardee having withdrawn north into the Carolinas.

NOVEMBER 30, 1864. Franklin. Schofield's re-treating army entrenches just south of the town of Franklin (Tennessee), while his engineers rebuild the burned bridge across to the north bank of the Harpeth River in a plan to regain Thomas's main defenses 18 miles away at Nashville.

Shortly after noon, Hood comes up, furious at having let the Federal army escape him at Spring Hill. A mass of 18,000 Confederate infantry charges the strongest portion of the Union line and is greeted by artillery salvos and rifle volleys. Although a few fight their way through, their frontal assault is shattered, and they flee after enduring 6,000 killed or wounded. Schofield, who has suffered 2,000 casualties of his own, completes the bridge overnight and continues his retirement into Nashville.

LATE NOVEMBER 1864. In a last-ditch effort to discomfit the North, Hood crosses the Tennessee River from northern Alabama with 40,000 Confederates, driving toward Nashville. Thomas responds by detaching Gen. John Schofield with 22,000 Union troops to check this invasion, hoping to buy time to assemble even greater strength.

Hood emerges behind Schofield at Spring Hill on November 29, compelling the startled Union column to make an abrupt about-face and hurriedly retrace their route to march out of danger. Poor Confederate communications prevent any attack until the next morning, when Forrest's cavalry alone overtakes Schofield's rearguard, only to be repelled by its artillery.

DECEMBER 15, 1864. Nashville. Two weeks after Hood's smaller army has instituted a loose siege, Thomas emerges from behind his Nashville fortifications in full force, pinning the Confederate right with two brigades of African American troops, while a solid corps of infantry and Gen. James H. Wilson's cavalry punches through the left. The outnumbered Southerners cannot man their entire line, so are driven two miles back in heavy fighting.

The next morning, Hood stands and fights again, only to see his line once more shattered. This time, the rebel army reels away in disarray, leaving behind its artillery, while Forrest's cavalry covers the retirement with difficulty. Eventually, Wilson's carbine-toting Union troopers hound the defeated Confederates out of Tennessee. Upon regaining Muscle Shoals (Alabama) on December 29, Hood has only 21,000 men left.

DECEMBER 24, 1864. Porter has the ex-blockade runner Louisiana towed stealthily up to the seaward face of Fort Fisher outside Wilmington (North Carolina) and detonates 215 tons of powder onboard at 1:40 a.m. This is to be followed by an immediate amphibious assault by 2,100 troops under General Butler, but they take almost 10 hours to appear, only to reembark when the weather turns foul. Butler is relieved shortly thereafter of his command and replaced by Maj. Gen. Alfred H. Terry.

JANUARY 13, 1865. Fort Fisher. Porter's ironclads bombard the Confederate stronghold of Fort Fisher before Wilmington (North Carolina), allowing Terry's 8,000 soldiers to disembark nearby and storm its landward face. The garrison hangs on desperately, so two days later Porter disembarks an additional 400 marines and 1,600 sailors to attack from the opposite direction. They suffer heavy casualties—80 Union killed and 270 wounded—yet nonetheless permit Terry's troops to scramble in through a breach, exterminating all resistance after seven hours of hand-to-hand combat. The loss of Fort Fisher closes the South's last major seaport.

JANUARY 20, 1865. Confederate forces evacuate Corinth (Mississippi).

FEBRUARY 12, 1865. Three and a half weeks after departing Savannah and heading northeastward along the Atlantic Seaboard with 60,000 Union troops, Sherman breaks the South Carolina border and occupies Branchville. Confederate general Johnston is powerless to halt this Federal advance, and the northern soldiers—convinced South Carolina is the cradle of secessionism—cruelly ravage the countryside during their march, burning Columbia to the ground five days later. Charlotte is evacuated by the Confederates the next day.

FEBRUARY 22, 1865. Having advanced east out of Tennessee with another Union army, Schofield occupies Wilmington (North Carolina) in anticipation of uniting with Sherman.

MARCH 2, 1865. At the head of 10,000 cavalrymen, Sheridan runs down Early's depleted Confederate force at Waynesboro, between Staunton and Charlottesville (Virginia), extinguishing the last rebel army in the Shenandoah Valley by capturing 1,600 prisoners, plus all its baggage and artillery trains.

MARCH 22, 1865. Union general James H. Wilson crosses the Tennessee River into Alabama with 12,500 cavalry troopers armed with carbines to seize the last rebel munitions center at Selma.

MARCH 23, 1865. Sherman and Schofield combine at Golsboro (North Carolina).

MARCH 25, 1865. Desperate, Lee attempts to break the eight-month Union stranglehold on Petersburg (Virginia) (see “June 15, 1864” entry) by making a dawn attack against a strongpoint in the Federal siege lines called Fort Stedman. Although this objective is carried, the Confederate sally is beaten back within a few hours at a cost of 5,000 rebels killed, wounded, or captured.

MARCH 31, 1865. Appomattox. Outside Petersburg, Sheridan circles beyond the Union left with a large body of cavalry, seizing the Five Forks crossroads until driven south into Dinwiddie Court House by three counterattacking Confederate cavalry divisions and Pickett’s five infantry brigades. However, Federal infantry hold nearby White Oak Ridge, despite suffering 2,000 casualties. The next afternoon Union reinforcements pulverize Pickett’s corps.

This collapse on the Confederate flank prompts Grant to bombard all of Lee’s lines overnight and launch a general assault on April 2. Despite inflicting 1,100 casualties in 15 minutes, A. P. Hill’s rebel corps is broken, and 10 miles of the defenders’ 37-mile perimeter eventually have to be abandoned. At 3:00 p.m., Lee gives the order for his 50,000 surviving troops to evacuate both Petersburg and Richmond at nightfall in the forlorn hope of marching southwest and uniting with Johnston’s beleaguered army in North Carolina.

While Grant sets off in pursuit of the retreating Army of Northern Virginia on April 3, Lincoln visits the burning city of Richmond. On April 7, Sheridan’s cavalry and two of Meade’s corps crush a fleeing Rebel column at Saylor’s Creek, capturing General Ewell and many prisoners. Sheridan and both the V and the XXIV corps then get ahead of Lee’s retreating army, compelling the Confederate commander in chief to surrender his remaining 28,300 troops at Appomattox Court House by April 9 (Palm Sunday).

APRIL 2, 1865. Union general Wilson occupies Selma (Alabama).

APRIL 10, 1865. Sherman advances from Golsboro (North Carolina) against Johnston’s tattered 27,500-man army, occupying Raleigh three days later and compelling the Confederate commander to request terms by April 14. Because Lincoln is assassinated this same evening while attending Ford’s Theater in Washington, Johnston’s capitulation cannot be consummated until April 26 at Greensboro.

APRIL 12, 1865. A Union expedition headed by Gen. Edward R. S. Canby captures Mobile (Alabama).

MAY 4, 1865. The last Confederate forces in Alabama and Mississippi surrender to Canby.

MAY 9, 1865. The newly installed president, Andrew Johnson, issues a proclamation declaring the Civil War to be at an end, although the Union naval blockade is maintained until May 22 to impede the escape of renegade Confederates. Jefferson Davis is arrested on the morning of May 10 near Abbeville (Georgia) by the 1st Wisconsin and 4th Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, after which the last holdout Rebel contingents gradually give themselves up: Jeff Thompson at Chalk Bluff (Arkansas) on May 11, Kirby Smith in Texas on May 26, and Hood by May 31.

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN MEXICO (1861–1867)

On July 17, 1861, the bankrupt, six-month-old government of liberal president Benito Juárez suspends all payments on Mexico’s 82.2 million-peso foreign debt for two years—70 million of which is owed to British interests, 9.4 million to Spanish, and 2.8 million to French. Both the English and French ambassadors sever diplomatic relations in protest eight days later, while their home governments begin casting about for additional means of punishing this default. The most direct method is armed intervention, therefore London, Paris, and Madrid sign a pact by October 31 to send an expedition to occupy Veracruz to garnish customs dues until the country's obligations are met.

However, since the earliest days of Mexico's independence from Spain, the republic's conservatives have been proposing the adoption of a constitutional monarchy as a means of stabilizing the country's administration. Consequently, José Manuel Hidalgo—a Mexican conservative who in September 1861 is living at the French empress Eugénie's court at Biarritz—suggests that the intervention be used to implement just such a scheme, furthermore proposing the 29-year-old archduke Ferdinand Maximilian of Austria as an ideal neutral candidate. Napoleon III agrees, and the archduke in turn is persuaded to assume the mantle of Mexican emperor, should it ever be offered.

NOVEMBER 29, 1861. Occupation of Veracruz. A Spanish squadron under Adm. Joaquín Gutiérrez de Rubalcava begins departing Havana, consisting of 13 warships, 5 hired merchantmen, and 5 horse transports to convey 5,800 soldiers under Gen. Manuel Gasset y Mercader across the Gulf of Mexico. They anchor southeast of Veracruz off Antón Lizardo by December 10, then contact the French and British representatives aboard the anchored frigates Foudre and HMS Ariadne, proposing a joint seizure of Veracruz. The latter demur.

On December 14, the Spaniards deliver a unilateral ultimatum, calling upon Veracruz's republican governor Ignacio de la Llave to surrender. Under

Napoleon III

France's last great military venture in the Western Hemisphere was launched by Bonaparte's nephew. Born Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte in Paris on April 20, 1808, he was the second son of the famed emperor's younger brother, King Louis of Holland. The young prince's privileged childhood ended when Napoleon I was defeated at Waterloo. All the Bonapartes fled into exile, thus Louis Napoléon was raised in Switzerland and Bavaria. He settled in Italy as a young man and became involved in liberal causes.

Upon his elder brother's death in 1831, Louis Napoléon became the main Bonapartist heir. Traveling secretly to Strasbourg in France, he attempted a coup in October 1836. A second attempt, by sailing into Boulogne with some hired soldiers in August 1840, resulted in his imprisonment. He escaped to England in May 1846 by trading clothes with a mason. Less than two years later, economic woes led to the fall of the last Bourbon king and the ensuing proclamation of a French Republic. The 40-year-old prince therefore was free to return.

Louis Napoléon's very name helped him win a landslide victory in the presidential elections of December 10, 1848. He promised strong government and a return to national glory. When the Bourbon monarchists who dominated the Assembly refused to amend the constitution so that Louis Napoléon might run for a second, four-year term, he seized power on December 2, 1851, the 47th anniversary of his famous uncle's self-coronation.

Exactly one year later, he annulled the Republic and proclaimed himself Napoleon III. An imperial regime was imposed that sidelined the Assembly, muzzled the press, and banished political prisoners to Devil's Island or New Caledonia. Modernization and industrialization were also encouraged, along with public works, social reforms, and military science. Determined to restore France's prestige, his aggressive foreign policy included taking part in the Crimean War of 1854, the conquest of Vietnam four years afterward, the expulsion of Austria from northern Italy in 1859, as well as the Second Opium War in China the next year.

By the time he moved against Mexico, France was considered the strongest military power in Europe. The emperor hoped to reclaim a position in North America, while the United States was distracted by its Civil War. He even toyed with recognizing the Confederacy, but the final Union triumph dashed all his hopes. Discredited in Europe for abandoning his Mexican puppet Maximilian, Napoleon III suffered a humiliating defeat at Prussian hands in September 1870 before dying in exile in England.

orders from Mexico City not to offer resistance, the garrison evacuates the port, allowing the Spaniards to occupy both the town and its off-lying island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa by December 17.

JANUARY 3, 1862. English and French contingents having reached Havana, they continue toward Mexico under the overall command of Spanish general Juan Prim. The British fleet consists of two warships, a pair of frigates, and two gunboats under Commo. Hugh Dunlop, bearing the plenipotentiary Sir Charles Lennox Wyke. The 900-man, 90-gun, 5,100-ton French flagship Masséna and the 530-man, 58-gun, 3,800-ton frigates Ardente, the 545-man, 38-gun, 3,600-ton Guerrière, and the 410-man, 16-gun, 3,400-ton Astrée, plus the 267-man, 4-gun, 2,600-ton, paddle-steamer packet Montezuma, all under the 49-year-old, recently promoted vice admiral Jean-Pierre Edmond Jurien de la Gravière, not only convey their representative Du bois de Saligny but also carry 1,800 troops.

JANUARY 7, 1862. The allied fleet reaches Veracruz, its diplomats sending a joint offer inland to Mexico City one week later, hinting at a resolution to the crisis. The Mexican foreign minister Manuel Doblado responds in kind, but excessive demands by the French delegation hamper progress.

From their beachhead, the French also secretly allow Mexican conservatives—driven out of the country following their defeat during the “War of the Reform” (see “War of the Reform”)—to return from exile and begin contacting sympathizers, calling upon them to foment uprisings against Juárez’s republican regime.

JANUARY 25, 1862. Seditious propaganda emanating out of Veracruz leads the Mexican government to declare this foreign incursion a piratical act, proclaiming the death penalty for any citizens found collaborating with the invaders.

JANUARY 27, 1862. The Mexican monarchist ideologue, Fr. Francisco Javier Miranda, reaches Veracruz and calls upon conservatives to rally around Almonte when he arrives, thus paving the way for the emperor Maximilian.

FEBRUARY 2, 1862. Disease having already compelled Prim to send 800 convalescents back to Havana, while another 300 Frenchmen remain hospitalized at Veracruz, the Spanish general informs the

Zouaves

When France initiated its struggle in 1830 to subdue Algeria in North Africa, Berber natives of the Zouaoua mountain tribe in its Jurjura Range—who previously served the Turkish Ottoman rulers—shifted their allegiance. By October, two battalions were formed as French auxiliaries, uniformed in their traditional garb of bright baggy trousers, short jacket, and a fez. The exceptional courage and daring displayed by these colorful Berber warriors led to the raising of an additional battalion in 1837, so as to constitute a full “1st Zouave Infantry Regiment” five years later. When all Muslim troops in Algeria were regrouped shortly thereafter into the Tirailleurs Algériens, the Zouaves were transformed into a purely French body.

Troops who volunteered for the lengthy tours in this elite regiment not only retained its distinctive uniform but also displayed a conspicuous fearlessness and dash in battle. There were four Zouave regiments in the French Army by 1854, who served with great gallantry during the Crimean War, as well as in the Franco-Austrian War of five years later. Their stylish appearance and bravery attracted much attention among reporters, making the Zouaves world famous.

Britain, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and even the Papal States created their own Zouave units, yet perhaps no country embraced the “Zouave craze” as fully as did the United States. Both before and during the Civil War, more than 50 Zouave regiments were formed by American volunteers, mostly in the Union states of the Northeast.

Mexican authorities that the joint expedition will have to advance inland to healthier cantonments. Foreign Minister Doblado responds by reopening negotiations, and on February 19, a preliminary accord is signed at Orizaba. Admiral Jurien de la Gravière sails for France to obtain Napoleon III’s approval, which will not be given.

FEBRUARY 25, 1862. Without waiting for the Orizaba accord to be ratified, the French contingent moves inland from Veracruz.

MARCH 1, 1862. The Mexican conservative exile Almonte reaches Veracruz, along with 4,500 more French troops five days later under 47-year-old general Charles Ferdinand Latrille, Comte de Lorencez. Almonte—with plenary powers from Maximilian to act on his behalf—is escorted inland to Córdoba along with other returning Mexican monarchists by a French chasseur battalion, all the while calling for an uprising against Juárez.

APRIL 9, 1862. After a lengthy consultation among the allied commissioners at Orizaba, the British and Spaniards dissolve their association with the French, who are now openly pursuing their own separate agenda for the installation of a puppet regime in Mexico. Wyke and Prim therefore agree to withdraw their forces from Veracruz nine days later, leaving the situation entirely in French hands.

APRIL 19, 1862. At dawn, Lorencez strikes inland from Córdoba with Lt. Col. Léon Mangin's 1st Battalion of Chasseurs à Pied; Col. Edmond-Aimable l'Heriller's two battalions of the 99th Line Regiment; Col. Pierre Guillaume Eugène Gambier's two battalions of the 2nd Zouave Regiment; Foucault's 3rd and 4th squadrons of the 2nd Chasseurs d'Afrique Regiment; Col. Agathon Hennique's Marine Regiment; plus Allègre's Marine Fusiliers. They are supported by 16 artillery pieces of Bernard's 9th Artillery Regiment, Mallat's Marine Battery, and Bruat's Field Battery, plus a company of 2nd Engineers under Barrillon and the 3rd Supply Train Squadron under Torracinta. Five miles inland, these 6,600 troops skirmish at El Fortín against Mexican cavalry under Col. Félix Díaz, who in turn warns 33-year-old republican general Ignacio Zaragoza to begin evacuating Orizaba.

This same day, in a coordinated move, Gen. Antonio Taboada revolts against Juárez outside Córdoba, his example soon being imitated by other conservative commanders: Márquez, Mejía, and Juan Vicario all bringing Mexican units in to join Lorencez, while Ignacio Buitrón, Lamadrid, Gutiérrez, Ordóñez, López Herrán, Tovar, and Lozada rise up in the interior. Their combined strength represents 8,000 Mexican soldiers.

APRIL 20, 1862. The French army occupies Orizaba.

APRIL 27, 1862. Lorencez continues marching inland from Orizaba with 6,000 troops, occupying the town of Acultzingo by 9:00 the next morning, then finding 2,000 Mexican infantrymen, 200 dragoons, and 18 artillery pieces entrenched atop its nearby heights under the 29-year-old general José María Arteaga. In a three-hour engagement starting early this afternoon, the French drive the defenders back toward El Palmar, minimal casualties being inflicted on either side—although one is the corpulent Arteaga, who is wounded in a leg.

MAY 4, 1862. Cinco de Mayo. After passing uncontested through El Palmar, Quecholac, and Acatzingo, the French army enters Amozoc to await Mexican conservative reinforcements under Márquez. When they fail to appear, Lorencez resumes his advance the next dawn, May 5 (in Spanish, Cinco de Mayo), his vanguard reaching Los Álamos Hacienda by 9:00 a.m. and clearing the way for his main body to assault the nearby city of Puebla. It is defended from atop Loreto and Guadalupe hills by Zaragoza with 1,200 regulars of the Negrete Division; 3,100 from the Berriozábal, Díaz, and Lamadrid brigades; plus 500 cavalrymen of Álvarez's division (two cavalry brigades having been detached earlier under generals Tomás O'Horan and Carvajal to check the approaching conservatives). Puebla also boasts small artillery and engineering companies, plus militia contingents stationed in strongpoints within the city proper, while noncombatants have largely been withdrawn.

Repulse of the French assault on Puebla. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

At 11:30 a.m., Lorencez orders a long-range bombardment of Loreto and Guadalupe hills northeast of the city—recently fortified by the Mexican engineer colonel Joaquín Colombres by digging trenches and strengthening their few standing edifices—then shifts two Zouave battalions and a marine fusilier battalion over to his right wing, for an assault supported by field guns of the 9th Artillery Regiment. Forewarned by this movement, Zaragoza counters by dispatching a cavalry regiment and two squadrons from Álvarez's division via a hidden route, to lie in reserve behind the Mexican left. After 45 minutes of ineffectual shooting at a range of one and one-third miles, the French artillery falls silent to move nearer to Lorencez's headquarters at Oropeza Ranch and resume its shelling. Despite expending 1,000 rounds, almost half their supply, they are too poorly placed to weaken the Mexican defenses, thereby compelling Lorencez to launch a direct assault against Guadalupe Hill by midafternoon.

Two columns of French Zouaves advance through heavy fire, led by their commanders Morand and Cousin, the right-hand thrust being followed by the marine fusiliers and the left-hand one by a battalion from the 99th Line Regiment. Berriozábal reinforces Negrete's division at the most threatened section atop Guadalupe Hill, the Mexicans checking the French assault waves three times and killing the few invaders who succeed in reaching its summit. When Lorencez finally commits two more Zouave companies, a sudden rainstorm makes it impossible for them to ascend the slippery slope of Guadalupe Hill, after which they are hit in the right flank by Álvarez's cavalry and a bayonet charge by Berriozábal. The defeated attackers are thereupon allowed to make an orderly retreat into Los Álamos, having suffered 117 killed and 305 wounded. Mexican losses total 83 dead and 232 injured.

MAY 8, 1862. Lorencez retires eastward from Los Álamos back through Amozoc Canyon, regaining the town of Amozoc the next day, then retreating into Acultzingo by May 11. The Mexican conservatives Almonte and Miranda dissuade him from withdrawing all the way back to Veracruz.

MAY 17, 1862. The 210-man, 2,300-ton French frigate Dryade and the Marceau shell the port city of Campeche.

Also this same day, the first of 2,500 conservative Mexican troopers under Márquez begin reaching Lorencez at Tecamalucan, their main body still wend-

Significance of Cinco de Mayo

This republican victory was so unexpected that it became memorable. For decades, Mexico's conservatives maintained that only aristocrats were capable of directing national fortunes, not members of the lower classes. The propertied elites of colonial times still dominated economic and social life. Their children had access to the best schools, military or Church appointments, as well as political circles. The poor were deemed incapable of intellectual achievement or leadership roles, so they were excluded from advancement. Commoners such as Benito Juárez or Ignacio Zaragoza could only rise under a liberal regime.

Conservatives attributed their previous defeats to being outnumbered. Now aided by thousands of French troops, judged to be the finest and most modern in the world, they expected to win easily. Yet upon closing against Puebla on May 5, 1862, the invaders were confronted by a well-entrenched host, led by a youthful peasant general. The defenders' resounding triumph elated republican spirits throughout Mexico, while embarrassing the conservatives and their foreign allies.

Although the French regrouped and returned the next spring to take Puebla, then sweep unchecked throughout most of the country, republicans still treasured their lone victory. Popular celebrations of Cinco de Mayo kept hope alive throughout this difficult period, reminding common people that the invaders could be beaten. Finally, the tide turned, and they were expelled in 1867. Annual commemorations have continued to this day, proving to be especially popular among Hispanic communities in the United States.

ing their way through the Sierra Madre Range from Tehuacán.

MAY 18, 1862. Barranca Seca. Around noon, republican general Santiago Tapia's 500 dragoons intercept the remainder of Márquez's cavalry reinforcements arriving from El Potrero by interposing themselves around Acultzingo Heights near Tecamalucan. After a brief standoff, the liberals are joined by a further 1,500 infantrymen, so storm across the stone Barranca Seca Bridge to attack the conservatives early this same afternoon.

However, while thus engaged, the republicans are suddenly surprised by two relief columns of the 2nd Battalion of the French 99th Line Regiment, who have marched the 12 miles from El Ingenio de Nogales in three hours to rescue Márquez's men. The 99th promptly drive in Tapia's left, killing 100 republicans, wounding 200, and capturing 1,200. Allied casualties total 214 men, among them 2 French dead and 26 injured.

MAY 30, 1862. Lozada's conservative irregulars clash with some of Corona's forces at the base of Ceboruco Hill in the state of Nayarit.

JUNE 10, 1862. After being reinforced by 6,000 conscripted troops under republican general Jesús González Ortega, Zaragoza's 14,000-man army marches out of Acultzingo to attack the French in Orizaba.

JUNE 13, 1862. Borrego. After stealing upon Lorencez's army in two columns, Zaragoza and González Ortega arrive outside Orizaba, the latter quietly occupying Borrego (or Tlalchichilco) Hill. Learning of this deployment, the French commander sends a 150-man company under the recently promoted captain Paul Alexandre Detric of the 99th Line Regiment to reconnoiter. He ascends this height before sunup on June 14 and discovers sleeping sentinels from the 4th Zacatecas Battalion.

Ignacio Zaragoza. (Library of Congress)

Ignacio Zaragoza

Ignacio Zaragoza Seguín was born on March 24, 1829, the second son of a Mexican foot soldier stationed at the Presidio de la Bahía del Espíritu Santo (modern Goliad, Texas). When the American settlers won their independence from Mexico seven years later, Zaragoza's father and family were transferred farther south into the border city of Matamoros. Young Ignacio attended its San Juan School, and upon his father being reassigned to Monterrey in 1844, the 15-year-old entered its seminary to study for the priesthood.

When the Mexican-American War erupted two years later, though, Zaragoza attempted to enroll as a cadet—only to be rejected because of his low birth. Small, bookish, and wearing glasses, he was unable to even enlist until 1853, when he joined a Nuevo León militia regiment as a sergeant. Promoted to captain during the liberal uprising known as the Ayutla Revolution, he displayed a rare talent for understanding and inspiring confidence among his soldiers.

Despite his mild appearance, Zaragoza proved such an intelligent and determined commander that he had a meteoric rise through the liberal ranks. A 31-year-old brigadier general by May 1860, he assumed command over the 8,000-man army besieging Guadalajara and led them successfully throughout the War of the Reform. He was rewarded by being named as Juárez's secretary of war from April to October 1861. Sent to check the French penetration inland from Veracruz, he cleverly made a stand at Puebla. His report describing that victory was brief: "The national arms have covered themselves in glory. The French troops conducted themselves with valor, their commander clumsily." Four months later, the promising young commander contracted typhoid fever and died.

A skirmish thereupon erupts, after which a second 99th company under Captain Leclerc joins this nocturnal clash. Despite heavily outnumbering their opponents, the raw Mexican troops fire wildly upon each other in the darkness, suffering 250 casualties and 200 captured, an even greater number deserting during the subsequent retreat. French losses total 7 killed and 28 wounded. At dawn, Lorencez skirmishes with Zaragoza's main body outside La Angostura Gate leading into Orizaba, prompting the latter to withdraw his entire army toward El Retiro.

AUGUST 28, 1862. A French convoy arrives at Veracruz with 2,000 reinforcements under Col.

Auguste Henri Brincourt, disembarking them over the next four days.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1862. Zaragoza dies of typhoid fever in Puebla, being succeeded by González Ortega.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1862. The 58-year-old general Elie Frédéric Forey arrives at Veracruz, having been appointed to succeed Lorencez as commander in chief of the French expeditionary force. The next day, he assumes command at Orizaba, and on September 23 he dissolves Almonte's provisional Mexican government.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1862. After a difficult disembarkation at Veracruz because of foul weather, Forey detaches 5,400 troops under Gen. François Berthier de Grandry, who occupies Jalapa despite resistance by 2,000 mounted Mexican guerrillas called chincos under Salvador Díaz Mirón.

NOVEMBER 7, 1862. De la Llave abandons Perote Fortress at the approach of Forey's spearhead, the 1st Division under the French general's 51-year-old second-in-command, Gen. François Achille Bazaine. The invaders brush aside the few Mexican irregulars roaming outside under Gen. Aurelio Rivera, although not actually bothering to garrison this fortification until September 9, 1863.

NOVEMBER 22, 1862. After a bombardment by a French squadron consisting of Admiral Jurien's new 550-man, 5,600-ton armored frigate Normandie, Masséna, and the 80-man, 500-ton bomb-vessel Grenade, a landing force comes ashore at Tampico from Dryade, searching for mules and cattle so as to supply their army farther to the south.

JANUARY 19, 1863. Republican general Juan José de la Garza recaptures Tampico with 500 troops and two cannon.

FEBRUARY 3, 1863. Conservative general Taboada's cavalry brigade departs Orizaba to reconnoiter the road leading inland toward Puebla in advance of Forey's main army.

FEBRUARY 22–23, 1863. Having reorganized his army into two infantry divisions and a cavalry brigade totaling 28,800 men, Forey quits Orizaba, striking inland to meet up with other converging

French columns under his divisional commanders Charles Abel Douay and Bazaine.

MARCH 8, 1863. Forey's 2nd Infantry Division captures Amozoc, paving the way for his main body to enter two days later.

MARCH 15, 1863. Siege of Puebla. Advance French elements occupy Los Álamos Hacienda, then the next afternoon Forey's vanguard—the 1st and 2nd Infantry divisions, plus a marine battalion and several squadrons of conservative Mexican cavalrymen—begins encircling Puebla. Despite the presence of Gen. Ignacio Comonfort's 8,000 troops and 40 artillery pieces among the nearby Uranga Hills, the 25,000-man French army occupies San Juan Hill unopposed by midday of March 18, thereby isolating González Ortega's 25,000-man, 180-gun garrison.

Carvajal's and Rivera's republican cavalry brigades manage to dash out of the beleaguered city on March 21, but French siege lines and batteries are laid out the next day, and an intense bombardment commences by March 24. At dawn four days later, three French columns storm the San Javier Monastery—now strengthened and renamed “Fort Iturbide”—being repelled by three battalions of the Zacatecas Regiment. Nonetheless, this strongpoint is carried the next afternoon by a second assault that costs 600 French casualties.

After numerous lesser skirmishes, General O'Horan slips out of Puebla with 2,500 republican troopers on the night of April 13 to join Comonfort's army at nearby San Jerónimo. Six days later, the French besiegers once again storm the southeastern portions of Puebla, with Santa Inés Convent changing hands several times in fierce fighting. On the night of April 20, Rivera attempts to lead a supply column into Puebla, mistakenly clashing with the 4th Zacatecas Battalion in the darkness. At dawn on April 24, French sappers detonate mines beneath Santa Inés Convent and the next morning attempt to overrun this stronghold, although they are thrown back by Lieutenant Colonel Lalane's Zacatecas Battalion, plus the 1st Toluca and 2nd Puebla.

On May 5, Comonfort's republican army takes up position at San Lorenzo, hoping to break the siege lines at La Cruz Hill and thus resupply Puebla. After clashing inconclusively against Márquez's conservative contingent the next day, though, Comonfort's left flank is suddenly driven in at dawn on May 8 by a surprise French counterattack under Bazaine. The small Mexican army collapses, suffering 2,000 killed, wounded, or captured, while its demoralized survivors flee toward Tlaxcala. On May 9, Forey releases numerous prisoners into Puebla to spread news of this defeat.

On May 16, González Ortega requests terms and surrenders at 5:30 the next afternoon. Forey proves generous, but in one final act of defiance, the Mexican defenders destroy their remaining matériel and attempt to disband their units so as not to be considered prisoners of war. Nevertheless, the French seize 1,000 officers and 16,000 troops upon occupying Puebla—5,000 of whom subsequently join the victors' ranks.

MARCH 25, 1863. The two French Foreign Legion regiments disembark at Veracruz from Algiers.

APRIL 30, 1863. Camerone. At 1:00 a.m., 34-year-old captain Jean Danjou—his left arm having been blown off 10 years previously by an exploding musket and replaced with a wooden prosthesis—departs Chiquihuite (state of Veracruz) with 61 men of the 3rd Company of the recently arrived 1st French Foreign Legion Battalion to reconnoiter the road leading inland from Paloverde toward Puebla, in advance of a scheduled payroll shipment bound toward the main army.

While breakfasting at 8:00 a.m., his legionnaires are surprised by 650 Mexican riders under Col. Francisco de Paula Milán, who have massed undetected at nearby La Joya. They chase Danjou's company into the hamlet of Camerone, where the desperate French fortify themselves one hour later inside its abandoned hacienda. By the afternoon, another 1,000 Mexicans of the Veracruz, Jalapa, and Córdoba Mounted Infantry battalions join Milán, and this evening they overwhelm the defenders in a massive assault. Despite repeated calls for their surrender, Danjou's handful fight gallantly to the end, suffering 30 killed and 32 severely wounded, while inflicting heavy casualties.

(The next day, 48-year-old colonel Pierre-Jean Joseph Jeannigros reaches this site with his main Foreign Legion column and, in honor of such spirited resistance, removes Danjou's wooden arm before burial. It is today preserved as a sacred relic at Legion headquarters in Aubagne, France. Every April 30, the Legion holds its regimental parade on "Camerone Day," Danjou's wooden arm receiving the salute after a recitation of his brave act.)

MAY 31, 1863. Feeling Mexico City to be indefensible despite its 12,000-man garrison, Juárez abandons his capital for San Luis Potosí, escorted by a division under 32-year-old general José de la Cruz Porfirio Díaz Monroy.

JUNE 4, 1863. Forey's vanguard, the Chasseurs de Vincennes Battalion, reaches San Lázaro just outside Mexico City.

JUNE 9, 1863. Juárez's republican government in exile reaches San Luis Potosí.

JUNE 10, 1863. Led by Márquez's conservative contingent, Forey's army occupies Mexico City. Five days later, a new government is temporarily appointed.

JUNE 17, 1863. Spanish-born colonel Eduardo G. Arévalo appears before Villahermosa de Tabasco with 200 conservative troops, conquering the town the next day.

JULY 5, 1863. Berthier occupies Toluca (state of Mexico).

JULY 10, 1863. Under Forey's guidance, the new Mexican government offers the title of emperor to Maximilian.

JULY 29, 1863. Franco-conservative forces occupy Cuernavaca.

AUGUST 6, 1863. The French take the port of Tampico.

AUGUST 15, 1863. Lozada openly swears loyalty to the new conservative government.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1863. The French occupy Zaca-poaxtla (state of Puebla).

OCTOBER 1863. Arévalo temporarily subdues a republican uprising in Tabasco by surprising the forces gathered at Comalcalco under Andrés Sánchez Magallanes and Gregorio Méndez.

OCTOBER 1, 1863. As a reward for his services, Forey is promoted to field marshal and succeeded as commander in chief by Bazaine. Forey takes ship for Europe by November 21.

OCTOBER 3, 1863. In Europe, a Mexican delegation offers the throne to Maximilian, who requests that a plebiscite be held to determine the will of the Mexican people.

OCTOBER 10, 1863. The 42-year-old conservative Mexican general Tomás Mejía defeats a republican force at Actopan (state of Hidalgo) under Herrera y Cairo.

OCTOBER 23, 1863. Franco-conservative forces occupy Jalapa.

OCTOBER 27, 1863. Díaz attacks the rich mining town of Taxco (Guerrero) with two battalions of Oaxaca chasseurs under Gen. José María Ballesteros. The force consists of his 1st Infantry Brigade; two battalions of the México Regiment under Col. Manuel González acting as his 2nd Infantry Brigade; three battalions of the Sinaloa Regiment under Col. Apolonio Angulo serving as his 3rd Infantry Brigade; three squadrons of the San Luis Potosí Cavalry Regiment under Gen. Mariano Escobedo; plus an artillery battery under Lt. Col. Martiniano Ruiz. These 7,000 men overwhelm Taxco's defenders by the next day, taking 269 prisoners.

OCTOBER 29, 1863. A hastily organized republican brigade under Sánchez Magallanes and Méndez occupies Cunduacán (Tabasco), and then three days later defeats conservative colonel Arévalo at Jahuacal, compelling him to retreat into Villahermosa.

LATE OCTOBER 1863. Douay marches north from Mexico City toward Querétaro with L'Herillier's 1st Brigade; Brig. Gen. Charles Louise Camille, Baron Neigre's, 2nd Brigade; Brig. Gen. François Charles du Barail's Cavalry Brigade; plus Brig. Gen. Ernst Louis-Marie de Maussion's Reserve Brigade. On November 17, this city is occupied without resistance.

NOVEMBER 12, 1863. The Pacific port of Mazatlán is seized without opposition by a French squadron under Cmdr. Thomas Louis Le Normant de Kergrist, backed by a military column advancing overland the next day under the Mexican conservative leader Lozada.

NOVEMBER 23, 1863. The republican guerrilla chief Martínez surprises 600 Algerian and conservative troops at Higuera (Sinaloa), chasing them back into Mazatlán with considerable losses.

NOVEMBER 24, 1863. After clashing with some Mexican guerrillas near Maravatío (state of Michoacán), Gen. Armand Alexandre de Castagny's 1st Infantry Division occupies Acámbaro, then Morelia six days later.

DECEMBER 1863. In a growing rift between Bazaine and some of his Mexican conservative allies, the French general orders Miramón and Taboada to demobilize 3,400 of their troops at Guanajuato.

DECEMBER 1, 1863. After being reinforced by Colonel Santibáñez's 450-man brigade at Huajuapam, Díaz's footsore republican army establishes its headquarters in Oaxaca City.

DECEMBER 9, 1863. San Miguel Allende, Celaya, and Guanajuato City are occupied by the French.

DECEMBER 18, 1863. Uraga's forces attack the conservative Mexican general Márquez at Morelia (state of Michoacán). The republicans are repelled, however, and driven south into Jalisco with heavy losses.

DECEMBER 20, 1863. Threatened by Castagny's and Mejía's parallel drives northward, Juárez abandons his provisional capital of San Luis Potosí in favor of Saltillo. By Christmas, San Luis Potosí is occupied by the invaders.

DECEMBER 23, 1863. Near the village of San Pedro, west of Culiacán, 500 French and conservative troops under the junior naval captain Gazielle of the warship Lucifer, as well as the Mexican general Domingo Cortés and Col. Jorge Carmona, are defeated after two hours of combat by 400 Mexican militiamen of the so-called Sinaloa Brigade under that state's 41-year-old republican governor, Col. José Antonio Abundio de Jesús Rosales Flores, and Col. Joaquín Sánchez Román. The French suffer 26 dead and 25 wounded, plus 98 captured, along with the loss of two small guns; conservative losses are estimated at double these numbers, their noncommissioned captives being incorporated into republican ranks.

DECEMBER 27, 1863. Mejía repels a republican counterattack against San Luis Potosí under Gen. Miguel Negrete.

JANUARY 6, 1864. Guadalajara falls to Franco-conservative forces under Bazaine, republican general Arteaga having exited southward two days previously.

JANUARY 10–11, 1864. Acapulco is bombarded by a French squadron, driving its terrified inhabitants inland. French sailors thereupon occupy the abandoned town for three days before retiring.

JANUARY 13, 1864. Méndez arrives to besiege Arévalo's conservative garrison within Villahermosa de Tabasco, obliging him to evacuate this stronghold by February 27.

JANUARY 15, 1864. The port of Campeche is invested by the 14-gun French paddle steamer Magellan, the Pique, and the Brandon, as well as the 80-man, 500-ton bomb vessels Flèche and Éclair, all under Capt. Georges Charles Cloué. It is also being attacked from land by a small Yucatecan army under conservative general Felipe Navarrete. These joint assaults claim several hundred lives on both sides, after which liberal governor Pablo García requests terms on January 22. A series of parleys results in the city capitulating to the French four days later, subsequently becoming incorporated into Yucatán as part of Mexico's new conservative administration.

FEBRUARY 2, 1864. Aguascalientes City is occupied by Franco-conservative forces.

FEBRUARY 7, 1864. Zacatecas City falls to the French and Mexican conservatives.

FEBRUARY 27, 1864. The ex-dictator Santa Anna returns from exile in Turbaco (near Cartagena, Colombia), arriving at Veracruz aboard the British vessel Conway. Bazaine allows him ashore after extracting a loyalty oath to the new conservative government, while Santa Anna furthermore promises not to take part in any political activity. However, after almost immediately issuing a call to his adherents through the Indicador newspaper, the ex-president is deported aboard the 130-man, 6-gun, 1,300-ton French corvette Colbert and is deposited at Havana by March 12, from where he continues back toward Colombia.

MARCH 1864. Bazaine directs the conservative Mexican generals Miramón and Taboada to serve under the French commander at Guadalajara, prompting both to resign.

MARCH 7, 1864. The 38-year-old Mexican general Mariano Escobedo—after separating from Díaz (see “October 27, 1863” entry), then being driven out of southern Mexico into the United States—recrosses the Texas border and, with a handful of followers, occupies Nuevo Laredo.

MARCH 29, 1864. Juárez deposes Santiago Vidaurri, governor of Coahuila and Nuevo León, for hinting at switching to the conservative cause.

APRIL 3, 1864. Juárez temporarily reestablishes his government in Monterrey (Nuevo León).

APRIL 10, 1864. In Europe, Maximilian—having the previous day renounced all claims to the Austrian throne after receiving the favorable results of a Mexican plebiscite (see “October 3, 1863” entry)—accepts the offer of Mexico's crown. Napoleon III promises to support him for three years, gradually reducing the size of the French expeditionary force from 38,000 to 20,000 men.

MAY 17, 1864. Mejía and the French colonel Edouard Alphonse Antoine, Baron de Aymard, destroy a republican force under General Doblado at Matchuala.

MAY 28, 1864. Maximilian and his Belgian-born empress, Charlotte (called “Carlota” in Mexico), reach Veracruz aboard the frigate Novara.

JUNE 3, 1864. Acapulco is captured by five French warships, and a week later 400 of its occupiers push inland, seizing La Sabana Pass.

JUNE 12, 1864. Maximilian enters Mexico City to a generally warm reception. Many Mexican conservatives, however, are soon offended by some of their idealistic young monarch's more liberal opinions, while republicans continue to loathe him as a foreign puppet.

AUGUST 1, 1864. Brincourt's Offensive. Two French battalions reach Huajuapam to inaugurate a four-pronged offensive against Oaxaca: in addition to General Brincourt's contingent, Giraud is to march from Orizaba through Teotitlán, while Mexican imperial columns are to depart Cuernavaca and Atlixco and head toward Chilapa and Tlapa, respectively.

Shortly after penetrating into republican-held territory, Díaz slips between both French units with 2,000 men to fall upon a company of the 7th Line Regiment and some imperial cavalry that are garrisoning San Antonio Teotitlán in the rear. This defeat prompts both Giraud and Brincourt to return into this town by August 17.

Column of French troops trudging wearily across a desert in northern Mexico. (Royal Museum of the Army and Military History, Brussels)

Once more resuming his advance southeastward, Brincourt approaches Nochistlán (60 miles northwest of Oaxaca City), only to discover that it has been heavily fortified by Díaz. From Mexico City, Bazaine prohibits any direct storming of this stronghold, not having sufficient reserves for a relief column should this assault miscarry. Brincourt therefore retires to his original bases.

AUGUST 19, 1864. Díaz leads a Mexican counter-attack against San Antonio Nanhuatipan, being repelled.

DECEMBER 12, 1864. The artillery general Curtois Roussel d'Hurbal reaches Yanhuatlán with a French siege train, being part of a new, three-pronged offensive against Díaz in Oaxaca. Five days later, Curtois d'Hurbal is joined at San Francisco Huitzo by another French contingent, then presses on southeastward against Etla, which he occupies with little difficulty on December 18.

JANUARY 1, 1865. The 27-year-old republican general Ramón Corona, with 600 ill-armed guerrillas, attempts to dispute the westward passage through the Sierra Madre Mountains from Durango toward Mazatlán of Col. Isidore T. Garnier's 18th Chasseur and 31st Line regiments, with their respective artillery trains, plus Lozada's irregulars. Despite a highly defensible position chosen at Espinazo del Diablo (literally, "Devil's Spine"), the Mexicans are eventually enveloped and scattered.

JANUARY 6, 1865. In Mexico City, conservative general Taboada is arrested on suspicion of plotting against the emperor.

JANUARY 11, 1865. Corona surprises part of General Castagny's supply train at Veranos Station (state of Sinaloa), defeating its escort of 150 soldiers from the 7th Chasseurs de Vincennes Regiment, plus 50 armed teamsters. The 60 French and 40 teamster prisoners are thereupon hanged, prompting Castagny to issue a decree from Mazatlán on January 25 ordering the execution of all republican guerrillas.

JANUARY 17, 1865. Siege of Oaxaca. Bazaine reaches Etla to personally assume command over the 4,000 infantrymen advancing into the state of Oaxaca against Díaz. Bazaine's force consists of two battalions of the 3rd Zouave Regiment, 12 companies of the Foreign Legion, plus a battalion of Infanterie Légère d'Afrique. They are supported by 1,000 troopers—a company of mounted Zouaves, three squadrons of French cavalymen, plus four of Mexican imperial riders—as well as a dozen 12-pound siege guns, eight 4-pound fieldpieces, and six mortars manned by a total of 80 gunners, with 200 sappers and 500 auxiliaries rounding out this force.

Within a couple of days, advance French elements begin harrying the republican defenders just north of Oaxaca City, prompting Díaz to order his cavalry—700 dragoons under Col. Félix Díaz—to exit, while preparing the remainder of his 3,000 regulars and 4,000 local militiamen to withstand a siege. On January 21, Col. José Guillermo Carbó's Morelos Battalion sallies out of the city and falls upon some French units at Aguilera Hacienda, this action eventually embroiling two other companies of the Sinaloa plus one of the Sierra Juárez battalions.

However, the defenders otherwise mount no more counterattacks once Colonel Dutretaine commences his siege works on February 1, installing batteries opposite Oaxaca City, as well as atop Mogote and Pelado hills. By February 8, republican morale collapses, and Díaz surrenders and is carried off into captivity along with colonels Juan Espinosa, Manuel González, and Francisco Carrión.

JANUARY 28, 1865. At Potrerillo (state of Jalisco), the republican guerrilla colonel Antonio Rojas is surprised and killed by a Zouave contingent under Berthelin.

APRIL 1, 1865. Lozada defeats Corona in a skirmish at Concordia (state of Sinaloa).

APRIL 9, 1865. After having once been briefly occupied by republican forces under General Aguirre, Saltillo (Coahuila) is reconquered from an imperial garrison by Negrete's 3,000 troops.

APRIL 12, 1865. Negrete takes Monterrey (Nuevo León) without opposition, the city having been abandoned by imperial generals Olvera and López.

APRIL 18, 1865. Lozada bests Corona at an encounter near Cacalotán (Sinaloa).

French Foreign Legion

Soon after France started its conquest of Algiers, a difficult and dirty campaign with little appeal among regular regiments, King Louis-Philippe authorized the creation of a Légion Étrangère or "Foreign Legion" on March 9, 1831. All non-French royal battalions were to be regrouped into a single regiment, while more volunteers were also to be raised for the unpopular Algerian service. All these foreign troops were moreover prohibited from operating on Continental French soil in the aftermath to the July 1830 Revolution.

The Legion's original 1st, 2nd, and 3rd battalions therefore were composed of Swiss and German soldiers, the 4th Battalion by Spaniards and Portuguese, the 5th of Sardinians and Italians, the 6th of Belgians and Dutchmen, and the 7th of Poles. New recruits were allotted into these units after a verbal declaration as to their name and nationality. Under such a system, even a hardened criminal could enter the Legion's ranks under an assumed name.

The first contingents reached Algiers in August 1831, undergoing their baptism by fire the next April 27. Because they were poorly equipped, ill paid, and expendable, morale was so low that many early legionnaires deserted. When civil war threatened in Spain two years later, the entire 4th Battalion was disbanded to return to their homes. Upon the actual eruption of that conflict, France transferred its entire 4,000-man Legion to Spain's Queen Isabel II on June 29, 1835, to fight for her cause.

A brand new Legion therefore had to be created at Algiers as of December 16, 1835. This new force was made up of only three battalions, but they were rejoined more than three years later by the 500 or so survivors from the Ancienne Légion sent into Spain. Two more battalions were formed from these survivors at Pau and Perpignan in 1840, after which the reunited Legion was divided into two regiments. Both departed Algiers to fight during the Crimean War from 1854–1856, distinguishing themselves at the Battle of Alma and Siege of Sebastopol, as well as in the Battles of Magenta and Solferino during the Italian campaign of 1859.

However, it was the legionnaires' service in Mexico that crowned their reputation as tough, elite troops in any hostile environment. Neither regiment was originally assigned to the Mexican expedition, but their officers petitioned the war minister. Within a year of having landed, their losses rose so alarmingly—468 officers and men eventually lost their lives in Mexico—that its five undermanned battalions were reorganized into four in 1864. The Legion's home base was even allowed to temporarily shift from Sidi-bel-Abbès in Algiers to France's Aix-la-Chapelle to recruit more volunteers. The Legion's tenacity, enduring brutal losses even in a doomed cause, further burnished its fame.

APRIL 23, 1865. Republican colonel Pedro Méndez occupies Ciudad Victoria (Tamaulipas), while Col. Francisco Naranjo seizes Piedras Negras (opposite Eagle Pass, Texas).

APRIL 30, 1865. Two and a half weeks after occupying Monterrey, Negrete marches his 4,000 republican troops against Mejía's 2,000-man imperial garrison holding the strategic border town of Matamoros (opposite Brownsville)—only to retire the next day upon learning of the disembarkation at nearby Bagdad of 500 French marines and 140 gunners from Admiral Cloué's Var, Magellan, and Tactique as reinforcements, plus the possible intervention of Confederate forces out of Texas.

MAY 25, 1865. French general Jeannigros reaches San Buenaventura (Coahuila) from San Luis Potosí with 1,500 troops, planning to join Brincourt's column approaching out of the west-northwest from Parras (Durango) and attack the Mexican concentration around Saltillo under Negrete, Escobedo, and León Guzmán.

MAY 30, 1865. La Angostura. Jeannigros probes north through Piñón, Carnero, Agua Nueva, and San Juan de la Vaquería, finally encountering the main republican defenses at La Angostura (site of the American victory of Buena Vista; see "February 22, 1847" entry in "Mexican-American War"). Despite being outnumbered, the French general sends two columns of infantry into the attack on June 1, supported by four artillery pieces. The defenders scatter them with concentrated volleys, after which Jeannigros waits for his colleague Brincourt to close from the north, hoping to trap Negrete in between. The latter instead slips away on the night of June 6–7, retreating northwest toward Chihuahua.

JUNE 18, 1865. Republican general Arteaga overruns Uruapan (Michoacán), executing its imperial garrison commander and other officials as traitors.

AUGUST 16, 1865. Gen. Albino Espinosa with 480 republican riders overtakes a rich mule train at Las Cabras Ford on the San Juan River (Tamaulipas), which is being escorted from Monterrey toward Matamoros by 100 imperial troopers, 700 infantrymen, and two howitzers under General Tinajero. The surprised escorts disperse, suffering 60 killed and 80 captured, before Escobedo's main body can come up and join the action.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1865. Republican general Porfirio Díaz escapes from confinement within the Jesuit monastery at Puebla, a 1,000-peso reward being offered for his recapture.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1865. Escobedo begins gathering an army and 11-gun siege train to besiege Mejía's imperial garrison inside Matamoros, then assaults its Gulf outlet at Bagdad (Tamaulipas). The French admiral Cloué responds by landing reinforcements from the Adonis, the Magellan, the Tactique, and the Tartare.

OCTOBER 3, 1865. The imperial government orders that all republican soldiers or guerrillas be considered bandits and summarily executed if found under arms.

OCTOBER 21, 1865. Captive republican general Arteaga and four of his officers are executed in Uruapan, in compliance with the October 3 decree.

OCTOBER 23, 1865. Defense of Matamoros. Having concentrated several thousand followers at Cerralvo (Tamaulipas), Escobedo presses in to besiege the imperial garrison at Matamoros. After installing an eight-gun battery and siege lines southwest of its walls on October 24, the attackers mount a three-pronged assault the next dawn, with General Hinojosa storming Fort San Fernando on the right, Naranjo driving against the city center, and Cortina proceeding against Fort Freeport on the left. All are checked by heavy counterfires, after which the republicans settle down to a formal siege. Soon, their ammunition supply—and patience—begins to run low, so the siege is abandoned by November 14. Six days afterward, the French vessel Allier lands 300 Austrians, 20 Mexican conservatives, and 60 horses as reinforcements at the nearby port of Bagdad.

NOVEMBER 23, 1865. Monterrey. Nonplussed by his failure at Matamoros, Escobedo gathers another small army outside Monterrey—whose French troops have departed, leaving only an imperial garrison under Tinajero and Quiroga. The latter launch a sudden sally on November 23 against the republican besiegers on Guadalupe Hill, being checked by Col. Jerónimo Treviño's cavalry. Two days later, Escobedo sends twin assault columns under Colonel Naranjo and Lieutenant Colonel de la Garza to storm the city's Carlota and Pueblo redoubts.

After two hours of heavy fighting, they succeed in gaining Monterrey's main square, only to be in-terraptured by the unexpected arrival of a French relief column from Saltillo under 40-year-old Foreign Legion major Hubert de La Hayrie. Learning that Jeannigros is not far behind with another 800 soldiers, Escobedo's followers break off the battle and withdraw in two directions, bloodying a pursuit column at Los Lermas before finally escaping into the mountains.

EARLY JANUARY 1866. Two columns of 1,000 French and 1,200 imperial troops sortie from the Pacific port of Mazatlán in a vain attempt to chase away the republican guerrillas under Corona and Captain Miramontes, who have been hampering communications inland.

JANUARY 4, 1866. Escobedo's republican troops overrun the tiny Gulf port of Bagdad below Matamoros (Tamaulipas), its Austrian defenders retreating aboard the anchored French vessel Antonia. Because looting threatens American properties, 150 black U.S. Army regulars are dispatched across the border to restore order. They withdraw three weeks later after protests from the Mexican imperial and French authorities.

JANUARY 22, 1866. In Paris, Napoleon III—under increasing domestic and international pressure to withdraw from Mexico—declares the intervention a success, then dispatches a delegation to Maximilian to discuss accelerating troop withdrawals.

FEBRUARY 12, 1866. At dawn, republican governor Viesca of Coahuila seizes the town of Parras.

FEBRUARY 20, 1866. Maj. Amable Brian de Foussieres-Founteneuille marches from Saltillo with four companies of the 2nd French Foreign Legion Battalion and recuperates Parras from Viesca without opposition. However, when Brian subsequently learns on February 25 that the republican governor has withdrawn only seven miles northward into the mountains with 300 men, establishing his field headquarters at Santa Isabel Hacienda atop La Cruz Hill, the major celebrates his 38th birthday and then sallies at midnight of February 27–28 to attack—little realizing that Viesca has in the interim been heavily reinforced by colonels Treviño and Naranjo.

Before first light, Brian's two companies (totaling 188 legionnaires) and 250 imperial partisans approach this hacienda, only to be greeted by heavy volleys fired out of the darkness. The French commander falls severely wounded, his auxiliaries flee, and Captain Moulinier leads the surviving legionnaires in a hopeless series of assaults, which cease at dawn when republican cavalry circle behind the attackers, cutting off their escape. Eventually, a single French soldier crawls back into Parras, 82 others having been killed and more than 100 captured.

MARCH 4, 1866. At Río Frío (state of Mexico), republican guerrillas attack a Belgian delegation. General Forey and Captain d'Huart, who are traveling with these visitors, are killed.

MARCH 24, 1866. Lozada's imperial forces surprise Col. Perfecto Guzmán's company at Guapicori (Sonora), dispersing them before skirmishing with Corona at Concordia (Sinaloa) and then retiring into Mazatlán by April 11.

APRIL 1, 1866. Escobedo attacks Matehuala (San Luis Potosí), then detaches his subordinate Ruperto Martínez westward to loot the rich mining camp of Real de Catorce.

APRIL 11, 1866. Republican general Nicolás Régules surprises Tacámbaro (Michoacán), overwhelming its garrison of four Belgian and one imperial companies.

JUNE 1, 1866. French units are recalled from Mexico's interior to reassemble in the capital.

JUNE 12, 1866. Santa Gertrudis. Escobedo attacks a large mule train at Cerralvo (Nuevo León), which is being escorted east from Monterrey toward Matamoros by two battalions of French foreign legionnaires under Lt. Col. Louis Adrien de Tuce and by numerous Belgian and imperial auxiliaries, some cavalry squadrons, plus six artillery pieces.

After pinning them down with 600 dragoons under Col. Ruperto Martínez, Escobedo wheels his remaining 1,500 troops and three guns eastward, lying in ambush two days later at Derramaderos near Santa Gertrudis for another mule train. It is proceeding west from Matamoros to meet the first convoy, escorted by 2,000 Austrian and imperial troops under Olvera, plus 13 fieldpieces.

On the morning of June 15, Olvera advances in a skirmishing line to drive back Escobedo's scouts, little realizing the hidden forces awaiting him. The republicans open fire once the enemy comes within close range, then launch a devastating attack with

Belgian mercenaries posing in colorful uniforms, designed for their service as imperial auxiliaries in Mexico. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

34-year-old general Sóstenes Rocha's cavalry. Some 400 of the surprised enemy are killed and another 1,000 captured, Olvera fleeing the battlefield with only a handful of riders. Republican casualties total 155 killed and 78 wounded.

Upon learning of Olvera's fate, Tuce retires into Monterrey by June 28, and Mejía evacuates half-starved Matamoros, with the consent of republican general Carvajal.

JULY 8, 1866. Empress Carlota departs Mexico City, traveling toward Paris to beseech Napoleon III to maintain his French army in Mexico.

JULY 11, 1866. In Nayarit, Lozada abandons the imperial cause, declaring himself neutral.

JULY 26, 1866. Jeannigros abandons Monterrey (Nuevo León).

AUGUST 7, 1866. Tampico (Tamaulipas) is recaptured by republican forces.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1866. The French evacuate the Pacific port of Guaymas (Sonora).

SEPTEMBER 23, 1866. Porfirio Díaz's cavalry defeats a Hungarian contingent at Nochistlán (Oaxaca), slaying its leader, Count de Gans.

OCTOBER 1, 1866. Miahuatlán. While waiting to be joined by General Ramos's republican cavalry brigade, Porfirio Díaz sends his vanguard under Lt. Col. Feliciano García Bustamante into Miahuatlán (Oaxaca), arriving himself the next day with the remainder of his so-called Ejército de Oriente or "Eastern Army." At dawn of October 3, a force of French and imperial troops is discovered to be approaching, so Díaz deploys and digs in his army facing northwestward: Col. Manuel González's 130-man brigade, Lt. Col. Juan J. Cano's 100-man Morelos Battalion, Cmdr. Felipe Cruz's 230 Tiradores de Montaña or "Mountain Rangers," Col. José Segura's 96-man Patria Battalion, an 80-man Chiautla company; the 130-man "Fieles de la Patria" Battalion, plus 40 local militiamen.

They are attacked by 1,100 French and imperial troops under Gen. Carlos Oronoz, consisting of an infantry brigade (a Chasseur battalion and the 9th French Line Regiment), several cavalry squadrons under General Trujeque, plus two, 12-inch fieldpieces. They close upon the republican positions from Matadero Rise in three columns, preceded by a skirmishing line and long-range bombardment.

Díaz checks them along Nogales Ravine, then sends his cavalry—spearheaded by the Tepejí squadron—across Miahuatlán River to circle behind and fall upon the enemy's right rear. Oronoz flees the battlefield, leaving behind some 70 dead (including his French second-in-command, Colonel Testard), plus 400 prisoners and two artillery pieces. Republican losses total 59 killed and 140 wounded.

OCTOBER 5, 1866. Having crushed the imperial forces at Miahuatlán, Col. Félix Díaz's cavalry occupies most of Oaxaca City. He is joined the next day by Porfirio Díaz's main army, which besieges Oronoz's remaining followers within the Santo Domingo, El Carmen, and La Soledad strongholds.

OCTOBER 16, 1866. Learning that 1,500 Austrian and imperial troops are marching to the relief of Oaxaca, Díaz breaks off his siege overnight and sorties to give battle. On October 17, he is reinforced at San Juan del Estado by General Figueroa's brigade, and then presses northwest toward Etlá.

(Also on October 16, a discouraged Maximilian leaves Mexico City, determined to travel to Veracruz and depart because of his imperial government's flagging fortunes, American opposition, and reduced French support.)

OCTOBER 18, 1866. La Carbonera. Around noon, Díaz's scouts discover the Austro-imperial army approaching, so his 3,000-man main body halts, facing northeastward and looking up the main highway that bisects the valley beneath the hamlet called La Carbonera. On the republican right lies the Figueroa Brigade; in the center, the Chiautla and Cazadores battalions (350 men under Col. Juan Espinosa); on the left, González's Brigade, consisting of the Patria and Morelos battalions; to the rear, cavalry from the Fieles, Montaña, Guerrero, and Costa Chica regiments, plus the Tlaxiaco militia and some artillery.

Shortly thereafter, the enemy appears and, despite being outnumbered two to one, immediately deploys for battle. After marshalling on a nearby height, two companies of 300 men apiece advance upon the republican lines, only to be repelled. Both armies then close and fight a general action. Eventually, the Austro-imperial right is outflanked, and their cohesion disintegrates. Díaz's victorious troops pursue their vanquished foe for 12 miles, capturing 500 prisoners, and four fieldpieces.

OCTOBER 20, 1866. Díaz returns into Oaxaca City to resume his siege of its isolated citadels. They capitulate by October 31, the republicans capturing 350 Franco-imperial defenders, plus 16 guns.

OCTOBER 21, 1866. Maximilian reaches Orizaba, meeting Gen. Henri Pierre Abdon Castelnau, aide de camp to Napoleon III, who has been sent as a plenipotentiary to attempt to persuade the emperor to abdicate the Mexican throne and return to Europe.

This same day, Washington recognizes Juárez's republican government as the sole legitimate representative of the Mexican people.

NOVEMBER 12, 1866. The French having abandoned Mazatlán and sailed southward five days previously, this port is reoccupied by Corona.

NOVEMBER 26, 1866. Sedgwick's Intervention. The republican government, having disapproved of the terms under which Matamoros surrendered to Carvajal, sends Gen. Santiago Tapia to assume command over this garrison. The latter is instead deposed by Colonel Canales, who is thereupon declared a rebel; consequently, Escobedo arrives with 2,700 men to subdue this mutinous contingent.

In the interim, U.S. general Sedgwick has occupied Matamoros from Brownsville, citing fears for the safety of American citizens. Escobedo prepares to storm its walls at dawn of November 27, so as to comply with his original instructions for arresting Canales. After a half-hour bombardment, republican columns fight their way into the city, until a ceasefire is requested by both the Americans and mutineers. Escobedo agrees, withdrawing to institute a siege. Canales then surrenders on November 30, the Americans evacuate, and Escobedo enters Matamoros.

DECEMBER 1, 1866. After repeated importuning by conservative leaders such as Márquez and Miramón, Maximilian agrees to remain as emperor, even after the French withdraw.

DECEMBER 6, 1866. Under mounting pressure to eliminate all foreign support for his government, Maximilian offers Austro-Belgian volunteers the option of departing via Veracruz or joining the imperial Mexican army with higher ranks.

DECEMBER 19, 1866. Porfirio Díaz sorties from Oaxaca City toward Tehuacán to clear the Tehuantepec Isthmus of its Franco-imperial garrisons.

EARLY JANUARY 1867. With outnumbered imperial forces retreating toward the capital, San Luis Potosí is reoccupied without opposition by a northern cavalry contingent under republican general Treviño.

JANUARY 10, 1867. The French general Castelnau receives orders from Paris to begin reembarking the Foreign Legion, plus Austrian and Belgian contingents, for a return to Europe. Within a month, most are going aboard ship at Veracruz.

JANUARY 16, 1867. Escobedo's 10,000-man republican army reaches San Luis Potosí from northern Mexico, pausing to refresh.

JANUARY 22, 1867. Juárez's government in exile reaches Zacatecas City, only to be driven out within a week by news of the approach of Miramón's 2,000-man imperial army from Querétaro.

JANUARY 26, 1867. After defeating General Liceaga's 1,500 imperial troops and 22 artillery pieces outside Guanajuato, republican general Antillón reoccupies this city, while his defeated foe falls back upon Querétaro.

JANUARY 31, 1867. San Jacinto. Learning that Escobedo is fast approaching with a much larger republican army, Miramón hastens southeastward out of Zacatecas, hoping to unite near San Luis Potosí with another 2,000-man imperial army under Gen. Severo del Castillo.

Instead, Miramón unexpectedly meets Escobedo the next day at San Diego Hacienda, on the road between San Jacinto and San Francisco de Adames. The outnumbered imperial infantrymen position themselves within the hacienda, their cavalry on both flanks. But Escobedo's superior force easily overwhelms these defenses, driving their enemies back into Cuisillo Ranch. Miramón is fortunate to escape toward Querétaro with a handful of followers, leaving behind 100 dead, 800 captives, his artillery and supply train, plus countless deserters.

After this battle, Escobedo executes 103 French prisoners for violating the decree recalling them to Europe.

FEBRUARY 13, 1867. Determined to maintain his throne by battlefield victories, Maximilian quits Mexico City at the head of 4,000 troops raised by Márquez, marching northwest toward Querétaro. Skirmishes with republican guerrillas under Catarino Fragoso occur at Lechería and Calpulalpan, before the emperor finally reaches San Juan del Río by February 16.

FEBRUARY 19, 1867. Maximilian enters Querétaro City with 1,600 troops and a dozen fieldpieces.

FEBRUARY 20, 1867. Corona enters Morelia (Michoacán), mustering 6,000–7,000 republican troops and departing five days later, to strike into the interior of imperial Mexico via Acámbaro and Celaya.

FEBRUARY 22, 1867. Imperial general José Ramón Méndez reenters Querétaro City from Morelia with 3,500 troops and an artillery train, augmenting its garrison to 12,000 men.

FEBRUARY 27, 1867. Corona's republican army is joined at Celaya by an additional 3,000 men and 10 artillery pieces under colonels Franco and Bermúdez.

MARCH 5, 1867. After conferring at Chamacuero, Escobedo and Corona agree to jointly begin their final advance against Maximilian's stronghold of Querétaro the next day, in parallel columns of approximately 10,000 men apiece.

MARCH 6, 1867. Siege of Querétaro. Advance republican cavalry units occupy Estancia de las Vacas and Castillo Hacienda outside this city, and are joined two days later by Corona's column, which seizes San Juanico and Celaya Gate—just as Escobedo's contingent appears out of the north as well.

Mexican firing squad that executed the Emperor Maximilian. (Museo de Querétaro)

Together, both generals command Treviño's I (Northern) Corps, consisting of two infantry divisions under Sóstenes Rocha and Francisco Arce, plus a cavalry division under Francisco Aguirre; Corona's II or Western Corps, comprised of the Jalisco Infantry Division under Manuel Márquez, the Sinaloa Infantry Division under Félix Vega, the Michoacán Infantry Division under Nicolás Régules, plus the Third Division from I Corps under Saturnino Aranda; and an artillery train under Francisco Paz. Eventually, this host will swell to 32,000 troops and 100 guns, prompting the formation of a separate cavalry division under Gen. Amado Guadarrama.

To oppose them, Maximilian has a 12,000-man garrison under his chief of staff Márquez: del Castillo's 1st Division, consisting of the 1st Brigade (Tiradores Battalion, Celaya Light Infantry, and the 2nd Line Regiment) plus the 2nd Brigade (14th Line Regiment, and Guardia municipal); Casanova's 2nd Division, subdivided into a 1st Brigade (Querétaro Battalion, plus the 7th and 12th Line regiments) and a 2nd Brigade (Cazadores Battalion, plus the 15th Line Regiment); a cavalry division under Mejía, again consisting of a 1st Brigade (4th and 5th Cavalry regiments) and a 2nd Brigade (2nd and La Fron-tera Cavalry regiments); Méndez's reserve, being a mixed brigade of the Emperador Battalion, 3rd Line Regiment, and Emperatriz Regiment (ex-Belgian Military Legion); plus the 3rd Engineering Company under Colonel Reyes and artillery batteries under Col. Manuel Ramírez de Arellano.

Escobedo occupies the hills and roads north of Querétaro, and on March 9 detaches 5,000 men and 14 guns to strengthen Corona's lines. After several days of positioning his cumbersome army, the republican commander in chief orders a general probe of the defenses. Consequently, a diversionary attack commences against Las Campanas Hill at 10:00 a.m. on March 14, followed quickly by a three-pronged drive under General Neri against La Cruz Convent (Maximilian's headquarters). The convent's garden and cemetery are overrun, but this assault is eventually driven back when Márquez orders an imperial infantry battalion and battery to counterattack. Mejía simultaneously sallies from Pueblito Gate with his imperial cavalry, falling upon some republican dragoons opposite and scattering them, capturing 70 and killing 100. Escobedo's lone success is the seizure of San Gregorio Hill to the north, these operations costing him 1,000 casualties and 4,000 prisoners, as opposed to 250 killed and wounded among the defenders.

Following this bloody setback, the republicans settle down to a protracted siege. On March 17, Corona launches another assault against La Cruz Convent, yet only to discourage a sortie being contemplated by Miramón (in hopes of reestablishing his prestige with the emperor). At dawn of March 22, this general exits with the imperial Guardia municipal and Cazadores battalions in his van, supported by a half-dozen fieldpieces and a cloud of cavalry. They surprise a republican supply train that has just reached San Juanico Hacienda, capturing and carrying it back into Querétaro with scarcely any losses.

That same night, Márquez and Vidaurri slip out of the besieged city with two cavalry brigades—1,100 troopers—having been ordered by Maximilian to cut their way through to Mexico City and hasten the dispatch of reinforcements. By sunrise of March 23, Márquez's contingent is well on its way, but instead of immediately returning with a relief column, he will instead veer eastward from the capital one week later to rescue the beleaguered imperial garrison at Puebla (see "March 9, 1867" entry).

At noon of March 24, Escobedo—freshly reinforced by 9,000–10,000 men under generals Vicente Riva Palacio, Vicente Jiménez, and Francisco A. Vélez—attempts a second assault against Querétaro's walls. The main thrust is directed against Casa Blanca and the Alameda, by twin columns under generals Vélez and Joaquín Martínez, supported by numerous diversionary actions. Again, this drive is repelled by timely imperial counterattacks after the republicans have succeeded in penetrating the city. Republican losses total 2,000 killed, wounded, and captured, for no gain.

It is the defenders' turn next, as Miramón sorties on April 1 with eight infantry battalions and 1,000 dragoons to attack the republican siege lines extending from San Sebastián Convent northwest of Querétaro. Once more, an initial success is followed by quick containment, the imperial forces eventually retreating into their defenses. Morale within the city begins to sag, especially when two cavalry sallies on April 12 and 16 attempt to reestablish contact with Mexico City and are checked.

At 5:00 a.m. on April 27, Miramón leads another sudden exit southward, this time surprising Jiménez's republican troops who are holding the México Gate and Calleja Hacienda. Brushing them aside, Miramón continues past with 3,000 troops in two columns, defeating Rivera's republican cavalry, who are belatedly hastening to Jiménez's support. Then, the imperial forces wrest Jacal Hacienda from the Sinaloa Regiment, precipitating a wholesale republican flight from their rearmost trenches at Cimatario. In this fashion, Miramón not only seizes 21 guns and valuable provisions from supply parks in the republican rear, but moreover pierces Querétaro's encirclement. Maximilian personally visits the battlefield to congratulate his general.

However, both the emperor and his staff fail to properly exploit this advantage, either by leading their army out of the city or securing this breach. Instead, it is Escobedo who reacts first, throwing the Galeana Battalion—armed with repeating rifles—and San Luis Potosí chasseurs into this gap, while the Norte Cavalry Regiment recuperates much of the booty being transferred into the city. Naranjo, Guadarrama, and Tolentino thereupon lead a massive cavalry movement behind republican lines from the southwest, recovering Jacal with a 3,000-dragoon charge. Maximilian commits the Emperatriz Cavalry Regiment in a last-ditch effort to regain his vanishing booty, but it, too, is repelled. The disappointed imperial troops stream back into Querétaro, while Rocha reoccupies the besiegers' original positions at the México Gate and Calleja Hacienda.

At dawn of May 1, Miramón tries again, unleashing a heavy bombardment of Calleja Hacienda, followed at 10:00 a.m. by an assault spearheaded by the Cazadores franco-mexicanos Battalion, 3rd Line Regiment, and Guardia municipal under Colonel Rodríguez. They succeed in overrunning the hacienda but get no farther before being chased back into the city when Rodríguez is killed. On May 3, Miramón thrusts north toward San Gregorio, breaking through the first two republican siege lines with the 3rd and 13th Line regiments, plus the Emperador, Iturbide, and Celaya battalions. Once more he is contained and retires. A final imperial breakout is attempted northeast toward San Sebastián on May 5 but is easily contained.

By this time, the garrison is reduced to only 5,000–6,000 effectives, while civilians are starving. Before sunrise of May 15, Col. Miguel López, commander of La Cruz stronghold, agrees to surrender this crucial imperial redoubt to its republican besiegers in a prearranged piece of treachery. As Vélez's Supremo Poderes and 1st Nuevo León battalions advance to seize this building, the emperor flees west from his sleeping quarters, calling upon his supporters to rally atop Las Campanas Hill. Dawn reveals their pathetically small numbers, at which point the last imperial defenders capitulate to Escobedo.

MARCH 9, 1867. Reconquest of Puebla. Porfirio Díaz arrives at San Juan Hill west of this city with 3,000 republican troops to lay siege to its 3,000-man garrison under Gen. Manuel Noriega. After being reinforced by local contingents and cutting off all communication inland, the republicans inaugurate formal siege proceedings.

Within the next couple of weeks, General Carrión seizes both San Javier and Penitenciaría redoubts through costly assaults, as the republicans gradually fight their way into the city limits. Díaz is unable to completely subdue the defenders, however, and on March 31 he receives word that Márquez has quit Mexico City the preceding day with a relief column of 3,000 imperial troops and 17 fieldpieces.

Reacting swiftly, the republican general gathers three assault columns of 300 men apiece to storm Puebla's main stronghold—El Carmen Convent—plus 13 companies of approximately 100 men each to stealthily approach other points in the city's defenses. At 2:00 a.m. on April 2, the three-pronged attack is launched against El Carmen. After an hour and a half of noisy fighting—long enough for Noriega to commit his reserves—Díaz signals from San Juan Hill, directing his 1,300 hidden soldiers to rise and mount simultaneous attacks. They break through everywhere, only the Siempreviva trenches and El Carmen Convent offering much resistance before surrendering.

Noriega's remaining defenders seek refuge in the Loreto and Guadalupe convents and are compelled to capitulate two days later. This assault has cost Díaz 253 dead and 233 wounded, as opposed to much higher casualties among the defenders, plus 2,000 captives. The republican commander quickly detaches Colonel Lalane with 900 troopers on April 4 to monitor the approach of Márquez's imperial relief column.

APRIL 8, 1867. San Lorenzo. While still encamped at Guadalupe Hacienda (Tlaxcala), Márquez learns of the fall of the imperial garrison within Puebla, as well as the approach of a 4,000-man republican cavalry division out of the north under Guadarrama (having been detached from Querétaro on March 29 by Escobedo).

The next day, Márquez's 3,000 men make contact with Díaz's larger army at San Lorenzo near Apizaco. Díaz deploys his republicans in an extended line and commences a long-range bombardment to pin down the imperial troops, while awaiting Guadarrama. Knowing his forces to be doomed, Márquez orders a retreat in several columns the next dawn, April 10, only to then encounter Guadarrama barring his path at San Cristóbal Hacienda. Losing all hope, the imperial general orders most of his artillery cast into a ravine and the supply carts burned before escaping into the mountains.

Meanwhile, his Austro-Mexican infantry and Hungarian cavalry make a brave fighting retreat from San Lorenzo through San Cristóbal to Texcoco, against overwhelming odds. Eventually, they are crushed on April 10 by republican cavalymen under General Leyva, suffering 300 killed and 1,000 captured.

LATE APRIL 1867. Díaz arrives outside Mexico City and occupies its outlying towns of Chapultepec, Tacubaya, and Guadalupe, although his army is not strong enough to carry the capital itself.

MAY 24, 1867. The captive emperor Maximilian is put on trial at the Iturbide Theater in Querétaro, along with Miramón and Mejía.

Porfirio Díaz recaptures the city of Puebla. (Museum of History, Chapultepec Castle)

JUNE 19, 1867. At 7:05 a.m., Maximilian, Miramón, and Mejía are shot atop Las Campanas Hill outside Querétaro.

JUNE 20, 1867. This afternoon, imperial general Ramón Tabera surrenders Mexico City to Porfirio Díaz, who enters the next day. His troops capture and execute Vidaurri for treason.

JUNE 27, 1867. The Veracruz garrison surrenders to republican forces, being the last imperial hold-outs of this war. Juárez returns triumphantly into Mexico City on July 15, 1867, being reelected president both this year and in 1871. Napoleon III's failed attempt to revive an American colonial empire marks France's last major military venture in the New World.

NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN WARS (1861–1890)

In the United States, the second half of the 19th century witnesses an explosive migration inland from the original European-created colonies along the Atlantic Seaboard. New settlers soon come into conflict with nomadic tribesmen roaming these sparsely inhabited plains, and a protracted struggle ensues for ownership over these lands. Most campaigns consist of raids and counterraids, with few pitched battles.

JANUARY 1861. Lt. George Bascom of the 7th Infantry leads 54 mounted soldiers to Apache Pass (New Mexico) to rescue two kidnapped boys. Cochise—leader of the central Chiricahua Apache—meets with this contingent and informs its commander that the captives have been taken by neighboring Coyotero Apaches and offers to intercede. Instead, Bascom accuses Cochise of collusion, prompting the Chiricahua leader to cut his way out of the tent, leaving behind his retinue as hostages.

A few days later, Cochise returns with Butterfield Mail prisoners, offering to exchange them for his followers. However, a brief skirmish erupts, during which both sides kill their hostages and withdraw.

AUGUST 17, 1862. Sioux Uprising. In Acton Township in Meeker County, southwestern Minnesota, an Indian hunting party treacherously kills three white men and two women gathered on their farm for Sunday dinner. This attack precipitates a general rebellion the next morning under Chief Little Crow of the Lower Sioux, who have grown resentful of the settlers' continual encroachments and broken promises.

On August 18, both Lower and Upper Agency are ransacked, and several hundred civilians are killed throughout this district, while terrified survivors stream toward Fort Ridgely. Capt. John Marsh leads 47 soldiers toward the Lower Agency ferry to investigate, only to be ambushed and killed along with 26 of his men. His successor, Lt. Timothy Sheehan, musters 180 soldiers at Fort Ridgely, which is attacked on the 19th by 200 of Little Crow's warriors. Repelled by the fort's three cannon, the Indian chief then makes a second attempt at noon of August 21 with 800 men, which also proves futile. The attackers draw off after suffering perhaps 100 casualties, compared to 3 killed and 13 wounded among the defenders.

On August 23, the town of New Ulm 20 miles south of Fort Ridgely is assaulted by a large number of Sioux, although successfully held by Justice of the Peace Charles Flandrau. The defenders suffer 26 dead and more than 60 wounded, while 190 of New Ulm's 215 buildings go up in flames, prompting the 1,000 survivors to withdraw 30 miles farther east into Mankato.

As thousands of refugees flee east out of the region, the cavalry vanguard of Col. Henry Sibley's 1,400-man relief column reaches Fort Ridgely from Fort Snelling by dawn of August 27. A detachment under Maj. Joseph R. Brown is subsequently ambushed at the head of Birch Coulee, suffering 16 killed and 44 wounded before being rescued, but Sibley nonetheless presses deeper into Indian territory. At Wood Lake, his army—now increased to 1,600 men—fends off an ambush by 700–800 Sioux, then scatters Little Crow's followers farther west. At a site renamed Camp Release, 269 captives are freed from Indian bondage, and 2,000 Sioux are arrested.

Of the latter, 38 are eventually executed in Mankato on December 26, and the remainder is resettled on a reservation on the Niobrara River banks in Nebraska a few years later.

AUGUST 1868. Beecher Island. Because of Washington's failure to supply aid promised at the Medicine Lodge Creek conference almost a year earlier, Cheyenne, Sioux, and Arapaho war bands under Chief Roman Nose begin raiding along the Saline and Solomon rivers in Kansas, killing over 100 settlers. In response, 30-year-old major George A. Forsyth sets out from Fort Hays with 50 volunteer scouts on August 29, eventually tracking some of these warriors along the Republican River into eastern Colorado and encamping the afternoon of September 16 near Arikaree Fork.

Here, the scouts are assaulted at dawn of September 17 by several hundred braves. Forsyth immediately moves his outnumbered men out to an island in the partially dried riverbed and digs in. After many probes and repeated sniping, Roman Nose personally leads a massive charge around noon, which is broken when the Cheyenne chief falls mortally wounded. Nevertheless, the Indians keep the volunteers pinned down for the next nine days with galling fire, until four men manage to slip out through the besiegers' ring and summon help, in the form of two troops of the all-black 10th Cavalry Regiment under Lt. Col. Louis H. Carpenter. They rescue the survivors, whose refuge is renamed Beecher Island in honor of Forsyth's fallen second-in-command, Lt. Frederick H. Beecher (nephew of the famous abolitionist preacher Henry Ward Beecher). During this encounter, 5 scouts have been killed and 18 wounded, compared to at least 32 dead among the attackers, who disperse.

SEPTEMBER 1872. The 32-year-old colonel Ranald Slidell Mackenzie of the 4th Cavalry Regiment makes a surprise attack against a large Comanche village at McClellan's Creek (a tributary of the Red River's North Fork in the Texas Panhandle), killing 20 and capturing 130 Indians, along with 3,000 horses. Roving warrior bands soon recapture most of these mounts, along with some of the troopers' ponies. Cavalry losses total 1 dead and 3 wounded.

DECEMBER 1872. Major Brown—a subordinate of recently promoted brigadier general George Crook—runs a band of Tonto Apache to ground at Salt River Cave, a huge, shallow cavern 400–500 feet from a cliff top in New Mexico. Thinking themselves safe, the Indians make a stand, only to be decimated by bullets ricocheting down off the roof. A desperate last-minute attempt to cut their way out ends in a massacre. A similar victory shortly thereafter at Turret Mountain secures the surrender of the majority of the remaining Tontos.

MAY 17, 1873. This evening, Colonel Mackenzie leads a cavalry column out of Fort Clark at Bracketville (140 miles west of San Antonio, Texas), then the next dawn splashes across the Río Grande into Mexico to surprise a band of Kickapoo, Lipan, and Apache raiders camped on the banks of the San Rodrigo River near Remedios (Coahuila). This illegal incursion is rewarded by the killing of 19 startled Indians and the capture of another 40, along with 65 horses. Cavalry losses are 1 killed and 2 wounded, while subsequent protests from the Mexican government are ignored.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1874. Mackenzie's 4th Cavalry Regiment endures a sharp skirmish with Southern Cheyenne warriors in the Staked Plains region, then, after feinting a march southward, turn back north under cover of darkness to surprise the natives' encampment in Palo Duro Canyon by the next dawn. Most Indians escape to its high ground, but 1,400 ponies are taken and shot, greatly hampering their subsequent movements.

EARLY MARCH 1876. Powder River. Brigadier General Crook marches north with 800 men from Fort Fetterman in Nebraska, his column being one of three eventually intended to invade the Black Hills Reservation in South Dakota and put down Sioux and Northern Cheyenne raiding parties being led by the Hunkpapa medicine man Sitting Bull. Crook's vanguard consists of six troops of the 3rd Cavalry Regiment under Col. J. J. Reynolds, who chances upon and disperses an Indian encampment on the banks of the Powder River.

However, Sioux and Cheyenne warriors launch a counterattack that mauls Reynolds's command so badly that he is obliged to rejoin Crook. The entire U.S. column then retires into Fort Fetterman to re-fit and prepare for a second offensive.

JUNE 17, 1876. Rosebud. Crook's second expeditionary force collides near the source of the Rosebud River with 1,000 braves under Chief Crazy Horse, who has been sent south from the main Indian encampment to contest the soldiers' advance. After a severe action lasting most of this day, Crook once again withdraws to seek reinforcements. The natives return triumphantly into their camp, deciding shortly thereafter to move westward to a more secure position. On the western banks of the Little Big Horn River, they set up a new camp three miles long.

George Crook

George Crook was born on September 8, 1828, on a farm near Taylorsville outside Dayton (Ohio). He graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in 1852, near the bottom of his class. Posted as a second lieutenant to the 4th U.S. Infantry Regiment, he served for eight years in Oregon and northern California. Crook fought against local tribes and was severely wounded by an arrow. He was promoted to first lieutenant in 1856, and to captain four years later.

When the Civil War broke out early in 1861, he returned east to be made colonel of the 36th Ohio Volunteer Infantry Regiment. Crook was promoted to brigadier general on September 7, 1862, assuming command over three Ohio regiments in the Kanawah Division of the Army of the Potomac. He developed a lifelong friendship with one of his subordinates, Col. Rutherford B. Hayes of the 25th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, who would later be elected president.

General Grant delegated Crook in April 1864 to lead 6,500 men into Virginia, scattering the outnumbered Confederates at Cloyd's Mountain outside Dublin, before destroying its vital railway link. Crook was given command that same August of the Army of Western Virginia, campaigning so successfully in the Shenandoah Valley that he was promoted to major general by October 21. He was surprised and captured at Cumberland (Maryland) by Confederate raiders in February 1865 and was held in Richmond for a month before being exchanged. He commanded a cavalry division during the final weeks of the war.

At the end of hostilities, Crook resumed his regular army rank of lieutenant colonel and joined the 23rd U.S. Infantry Regiment on frontier duty in the Pacific Northwest. His success against the Paiutes prompted President Grant to place him in command of the Arizona Territory, where Crook was to gain great fame as an Indian fighter. He had driven Cochise and his Apache tribesmen onto reservations by 1872, so he was promoted over several other colonels to brigadier general.

Crook also campaigned against the Sioux and Lakota before returning to Arizona in 1882 to hunt Geronimo. Ironically, Crook eventually grew so bitter at the injustices suffered by his Indian foes that he spent the last years of his life speaking out against this mistreatment.

JUNE 21, 1876. This evening, Brig. Gen. Alfred H. Terry instructs colonels Gibbon and Custer aboard the hired steamer Far West, anchored at the Powder River mouth, as to how both commanders might approach and annihilate Sitting Bull's encampment on the Little Big Horn. Gibbon's force—mostly infantry—is to advance up the Little Big Horn River and attack the Indians from the north on June 26, while Custer's 7th Cavalry is to simultaneously circle and fall upon them from the south. The U.S. commanders seriously underestimate the natives' strength, believing only some 1,000 warriors are present—about a quarter their actual number.

The next day at noon, Custer leads the 7th past Terry, then advances up the Rosebud and camps for the night. Upon the return of his scouts at 9:00 p.m., however, he resumes his march and instead of proceeding farther south, strikes out for 10 miles toward the ridge between the Rosebud and the Little Big Horn, hoping to gain it before daylight. Although impossible to decipher his reasoning, Custer has obviously discarded the notion of cooperating with Gibbon.

JUNE 23, 1876. Custer's Last Stand. At 2:00 a.m., Custer reaches Crow's Nest, a high point on the ridge overlooking the Plain of Greasy Grass. With the sunrise, Sitting Bull's camp is faintly discerned 15 miles away, and Sioux outriders, in turn, spot the 7th Cavalry. Custer therefore decides to attack immediately, dividing his command into three: Captain Benteen is to circle south with 125 men; Major Reno is to lead a squadron west along the southern bank of the tributary running into the Little Big Horn (later renamed Reno Creek); while Custer himself takes the remainder of his regiment in a parallel movement to eventually outflank the Indians out of the northeast.

By 2:00 p.m., Custer and Reno have advanced some 9 miles opposite each other, when a lone teepee is found and heavy dust clouds are spotted a few miles ahead. Erroneously believing the Indians are scattering, Custer orders Reno to charge west, while he himself veers north to intercept. After covering three miles at a sharp trot and crossing the Little Big Horn, Reno's squadron is engulfed by a massive Indian counterattack. His contingent is then joined by Benteen's, and both only survive thanks to the natives' subsequent distraction in besetting Custer, who has appeared four miles farther north. (A movement to relieve Custer, led by Captain Weir of "D" Troop, is eventually repulsed.)

Geronimo, third from left, negotiating with George Crook, second from right, in northern Mexico, March 25, 1886; photograph by C. S. Fly. (Author's Collection)

Custer's attempt to surprise the Indian encampment via Medicine Tail Coulee is checked by a huge force of warriors under the Hunkpapa chief Gall, and Oglala Sioux chief Low Dog. Driven back, his cavalymen make a desperate last stand on the high ground, their escape route being closed by Crazy Horse's flanking charge. By 5:00 p.m., everyone in Custer's command is dead. The next morning, Terry appears on the battlefield with the 2nd Cavalry Regiment and rescues Reno's survivors. The Sioux and Cheyenne have meanwhile scattered northward, seeking refuge in Canada. By the next spring, many—including Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse—will surrender to the U.S. authorities and take up life on reservations.

OCTOBER 1876. In a surprise dawn attack, MacKenzie's 4th Cavalry Regiment overruns the Northern Cheyenne village of Chief Dull Knife on the banks of the Powder River, killing 40 Indians and capturing 600 ponies, dooming many survivors to subsequently perish in the bitterly cold weather.

SEPTEMBER 1877. Some 300 Apaches flee the San Carlos Reservation under their leaders, Victorio and Loco. Eleven days later, 187 of them—including Victorio—surrender at Fort Wingate, to be taken to their preferred destination of Warm Springs Reservation.

OCTOBER 1878. Learning they are to be repatriated to the San Carlos Reservation, Victorio and 80 of his followers flee Warm Springs.

FEBRUARY 1879. Victorio surrenders at Mescalero.

JULY 1879. The Apache leader Victorio flees into Mexico.

SEPTEMBER 1879. In Colorado, the White River Utes ambush a U.S. Army contingent under Maj. Thomas T. Thornburgh, killing him along with several of his troopers. In all, 30 whites are killed and another 44 wounded before this uprising is finally put down by the arrival of Colonel Mackenzie's 4th Cavalry.

OCTOBER 15, 1880. Victorio and most of his Apache warriors are killed after a prolonged battle with Mexican troops.

AUGUST 30, 1881. Colonel Carr orders the arrest of the Apache shaman Nocadelklinny, fearful of his anti-white preaching among the tribesmen on the San Carlos Reservation. Two days later, Fort Apache is besieged by angry warriors, although this clamor soon dies away.

APRIL 1882. The Apache leaders Geronimo (whose real name is Goyakla or the "Yawner") and Juh ("Whoa") secretly slip into the San Carlos Reservation, persuading several hundred of Loco's Chiricahua followers to depart with them, while at the same time killing the chief of Indian police, Albert Sterling. Pursued by U.S. regulars, including cavalry under Col. George Forsyth, the Indians succeed in reaching Mexico, only to be ambushed by Mexican troops, suffering severe losses.

SEPTEMBER 1882. Crook resumes command over the Department of Arizona. He stations U.S. cavalry at the San Carlos Reservation, then crosses the border into Mexico with 50 soldiers and 200 Apache scouts to chase Geronimo in accordance with the new "hot pursuit" agreement signed between Washington and Mexico City.

MARCH 1883. Geronimo's Apaches launch lightning raids throughout northern Mexico, southeastern Arizona, and New Mexico.

MAY 1, 1883. Sierra Madre Expedition. Crook sets out into the central Mexican highlands in pursuit of Geronimo, guided by a scout called Peaches, who has lived for a while among these renegades. After tracking them through rugged ranges, the column of 51 U.S. troopers and 193 loyal Apache scouts finally surround the main Apache base camp while its warriors are away raiding, killing 9 of its defenders. The garrison thereupon surrenders, and after three long parleys starting on May 20, Geronimo promises to bring in the remainder of his renegades. Crook escorts 325 Apaches back to the San Carlos Reservation by June, and in March 1884 Geronimo appears with another 80, plus 350 stolen Mexican cattle—which are promptly confiscated.

MAY 17, 1885. Geronimo again bolts the San Carlos Reservation, this time accompanied by such hardened lieutenants as Chihuahua, Cochise's son Naich, the elderly Nana, and Mangas Coloradas's son Mangas. Crook stations cavalry patrols along the Mexican border, but Geronimo nonetheless succeeds in escaping into the Sierra Madre Range with 43 warriors and some 60 noncombatants.

JANUARY 1886. Capt. Emmett Crawford's scouts capture Geronimo's horses and provisions in Mexico, then open negotiations with the renegade chieftain, only to be slain by Mexican scalp hunters shortly thereafter.

MARCH 25, 1886. After parleying with Crook, Geronimo agrees to surrender and serve two years' imprisonment in the East. The U.S. War Department reneges on this promise, though, shipping 77 Chiricahua to Fort Marion in Oklahoma, prompting their chieftain to once more flee into Mexico with 39 followers, while Crook resigns in disgust on April 1. He is replaced by Brig. Gen. Nelson A. ("Bear Coat") Miles.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1886. After a massive hunt by 5,000 U.S. regulars and hundreds of Apache scouts, Geronimo's 20 renegade warriors and 13 women surrender to Miles. The captive chieftain is dispatched into internment at Fort Pickens in Florida along with 381 followers, while other families are sent to Fort Marion in Oklahoma.

LATE DECEMBER 1890. Wounded Knee. White authorities, increasingly alarmed by the spreading Indian practice known as "ghost dances"—ceremonies conceived the previous year by the Paiute shaman Wovoka in a fever, whereby dead native ancestors and buffalo herds are to be revived, thus signifying an Indian resurgence—intercept the Miniconjou Sioux band of Chief Big Foot as it is traveling to collect its reservation rations. After being taken to Wounded Knee Creek and surrounded by troops, the natives begin a ghost dance, at which point a concealed Indian gun is fired, setting off a pitiless massacre of most of the band. More than 150 natives are slaughtered, including many women and children.

SPAIN'S RETURN TO THE PACIFIC (1863–1866)

In April 1863, Adm. Luis Hernández Pinzón y Álvarez rounds Cape Horn with the brand-new, 41-gun, 3,400-ton, propeller-driven war frigates Resolución (flag) of Capt. Manuel de la Rigada y Leal and Nuestra Señora del Triunfo of Capt. Enrique Cróquer y Pavia, plus the 2-gun schooner Virgen de la Covadonga, supposedly serving as transports for eight naturalists who are to make scientific observations in the Pacific—although the real objective of this expedition is to reassert Spain's influence in South America.

After visiting Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Panama, Mexico, and San Francisco, the flotilla—rather than continue across the ocean toward Manila as announced—is instead ordered to reverse course. En route back down the South American coastline, Admiral Hernández is informed of an incident involving the death of a Spanish Basque subject at a new Peruvian agricultural development called Talambo near Pacasmayo in the northern part of that country, so the diplomat Eusebio de Salazar y Mazarredo is set ashore to lodge a protest with the Lima government, despite the fact that this republic's very existence has not yet been formally recognized by Madrid.

APRIL 14, 1864. De Salazar receives no satisfaction from the Peruvian authorities, so he instructs Hernández Pinzón's squadron to seize the offshore Chincha Islands, which are rich in valuable guano or "nitrate." The Spanish Crown eventually repudiates this action and recalls its admiral and diplomat, yet without restoring the islands to Peru. Chile meanwhile supports its neighboring South American republic by denying coal to the Spanish warships.

NOVEMBER 26, 1864. Overnight, the Triunfo is consumed off Pisco (Peru) by an accidental fire, originating in its paint locker.

DECEMBER 6, 1864.

The 52-year-old Spanish admiral José Manuel Pareja y Rodríguez Septién reaches Pisco and the next day supersedes Hernández Pinzón, his squadron being reinforced shortly thereafter by the arrival of the 36-gun, 3,150-ton armored frigates Blanca of Capt. Juan Bautista Topete y Carballo and Berenguela of Capt. Jacobo MacMahon y Santiago (later succeeded by Manuel de la Pezuela); the 48-gun, 5,000-ton, wooden frigate Villa de Madrid of Capt. Claudio Román Alvargonzález y Sánchez; plus the propeller-driven, 3-gun auxiliary schooner Vencedora of Lt. Serafín de Aubareda y Bouyón.

DECEMBER 30, 1864. The Peruvian steamer Chalaco approaches the anchored Spanish squadron off Pisco, bearing Gen. Manuel Ignacio de Vivanco, who is to open negotiations with the blockaders.

JANUARY 27, 1865. After bitterly protracted talks, Vivanco is pressured into signing an agreement with Pareja whereby the Chincha Islands are to be restored to Peru in exchange for an indemnization payment of 3 million pesos to Spain.

FEBRUARY 5, 1865. Outraged by this diplomatic capitulation, a Peruvian mob murders the Spanish "ship's corporal" Esteban Fradera at Callao.

FEBRUARY 28, 1865. As part of Peru's nationwide outburst of disapproval against the Vivanco-Pareja accord, Col. Mariano Ignacio Prado leads a revolt at Arequipa, seeking to oust President Juan Antonio Pezet from office.

Meanwhile, Admiral Pareja detaches the Vencedora to Chile with a letter requesting that Spain's

Spanish naval officers and marines clustered around the church on the occupied Chincha Islands; the schooner Virgen de la Covadonga is anchored in the distance. (Museo Naval, Callao) representative at Santiago lodge a similarly extortionate demand for compensation from that republic for having denied his squadron coal during its recent confrontation with Peru.

MAY 5, 1865. The Spanish squadron at Callao is reinforced by the brand-new, 34-gun, 7,300-ton, Toulon-built, armored frigate Numancia of Commo. Casto Secundino María Méndez Núñez, which has arrived from Cadiz and Montevideo in company with the collier Marqués de la Victoria of Lt. Francisco de P. Castellanos. By the end of that same month, some Spanish warships steer southward to increase pressure upon Chile.

JUNE 1865. With an even more aggressive administration now installed in Madrid, Pareja imposes a partial blockade upon the Chilean coast because his compensation demand has been ignored by the authorities at Santiago.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1865. Having failed to resolve their diplomatic impasse, Chile officially declares war against Spain.

NOVEMBER 6, 1865. In Peru, President Pezet is expelled as head of state by his rebellious opponents, taking sanctuary aboard the British frigate Shearwater of Capt. R. Gordon Douglas at Callao.

NOVEMBER 26, 1865. The 20-gun, 200-man, 854-ton Chilean corvette Esmeralda of Capt. Juan Williams Rebolledo sorties from the small seaport of Papudo, 40 miles from Valparaíso, and in less than an hour overwhelms the passing Spanish auxiliary Covadonga of Lt. Luis Fery y Torres Vildosola, killing 3 of its crew members, wounding 13, and capturing a total of 132.

Humiliated when he learns about this unexpected loss four days later from the visiting American consul Nicholson, Pareja commits suicide at his fleet anchorage of Caldera de Copiapó (Chile) and is succeeded in command of the Pacific squadron by Méndez Núñez on December 12.

DECEMBER 5, 1865. Having been acclaimed president of Peru, Prado signs an accord with Chile.

DECEMBER 6, 1865. The Spanish government declares war against Chile.

JANUARY 14, 1866. Peru also declares war against Spain, being seconded shortly thereafter by Ecuador.

FEBRUARY 7, 1866. During a reconnaissance of the Chiloé Archipelago, the Blanca and Villa de Madrid find the combined Chileo-Peruvian squadron of Capt. Manuel Villar—so overmatched by Méndez Núñez's much larger and more modern formation that it has been driven into hiding, hence derisively referred to as the “Invisible Armada” by the Spaniards. The squadron is most likely at anchor inside the Challahu Channel beside Abtao Island, awaiting the arrival around the Horn of the foreign-built ironclads Huáscar and Independencia. A long-range exchange of salvos results in two dead aboard the Peruvian corvette Unión and nine injured between both Spanish vessels, who retire the next day toward blockaded Valparaíso to inform the Spanish admiral of their find.

MARCH 9, 1866. After vainly searching again amid the foggy Chiloé Archipelago for the elusive Chileo-Peruvian squadron—which has since abandoned Abtao in favor of an even more defensible anchorage at Huito—Méndez Núñez's Numancia and Blanca return northward as far as Arauco, southwest of Concepción. There they intercept the 400-ton Chilean paddle steamer Paquete del Maule of the junior captain Luis Lynch Saldivar, which has just cleared the nearby coaling port of Lota with 134 troops aboard. The next day, the Blanca furthermore seizes an Italian and a Prussian vessel off Coronel, thereby securing almost 1,000 tons of coal.

Upon reappearing off Valparaíso, Méndez Núñez finds five American steam warships under Commo. John Rodgers—the 15-gun, 3,360-ton side-wheeler Vanderbilt as flagship; the 16-gun Powhatan; the frigate Tuscarora; the 10-gun, 1,370-ton side-wheeler

Steam and Coal

Many inventors contributed to the evolution of steam power. The French physicist Denis Papin envisioned a piston-driven steam engine as long ago as 1690, although the first practicable patent was granted eight years later to the English engineer Thomas Savery. The ironmonger Thomas Newcomen improved upon Savery's model, while the Scottish inventor James Watt so refined Newcomen's version that his design of 1769 helped usher in the Industrial Revolution. Yet because Watt's patent was also so strictly enforced in England, the first experimental applications of steam power into boats occurred in France and America.

When Watt's patent finally lapsed in 1800, many practical refinements appeared. The first steam railway went into service in England only two years later, as well as the first steam tug in Scotland. Robert Fulton, an American who lived and experimented in both England and France, returned to New York with a Watt engine to perfect his own steamboat by 1807. Numerous North American imitators rapidly followed, for the hinterland's rivers were ideally suited to commercial steamboat travel. Even the small engines of that day could propel a vessel along the quiet waterways, with frequent stops to refuel.

Sea voyages were much more challenging, though, because of the powerful ocean waves and enormous distances involved. Ships were to retain masts and sails well into the 19th century, because the early steam engines were only capable of driving large vessels for short spurts before exhausting their on-board coal supply. The five-masted, 2,350-ton English side-paddle steamer Great Western addressed this problem in 1838 by leaving ample space in its hold for powerful boilers, plus enough coal to traverse the Atlantic. It chased its rival the Sirius into New York harbor that same April in record time, with 200 tons of coal still in its bunkers. (The Sirius, on the other hand, burned all its cabin furniture and every other flammable aboard, an incident later described in Jules Verne's novel Around the World in Eighty Days.)

For warships prowling off remote and hostile shorelines, such as Spain's squadron off the Pacific coast of South America in the mid-1860s, any interruption in coal supplies could be crippling. Refinement of screw propellers and the invention of triple-expansion engines during the next decade greatly improved the range and speed of ships, yet a ready source of coal continued to worry commanders for another 50 years.

Spanish cartoon deriding the Chilean and Peruvian naval authorities for sending their overmatched fleets into hiding at Abtao.
(Author's Collection)

Mohongo; and the 3,300-ton, twin-turreted monitor Monadnock—plus the powerful, 40-gun British frigates Sutlej and Leander and the 4-gun corvette paddle-wheeler Devastation under Rear Admiral Lord Denham, who jointly attempt to mediate a truce. However, the Spanish admiral has already been ordered by Madrid to shell this port if the Covadonga is not restored by its Chilean captors, so he reluctantly sets the date of March 27 for compliance.

MARCH 31 (EASTER SATURDAY), 1866. Bombardment of Valparaíso. After extending his deadline by four days, Méndez Núñez orders the vessels Resolución, Blanca, Villa de Madrid, and Vencedora to stand into the harbor to shell this city, while he and his flagship Numancia maintain watch against any hostile countermoves by the distant Anglo-American warships—who have cleared for action and withdrawn northward—and the Berenguela mounts guard over the Spanish prizes.

The reason for Méndez Núñez's distaste for this assignment is that Valparaíso lies helpless, its Fort San Antonio not even having any artillery mounted, while 40,000 of the city's 84,000 inhabitants have already fled in terror. Hospitals and churches have been marked with white flags in accordance with the Spanish admiral's instructions, yet otherwise no resistance can be offered. In the desperate hope of persuading the Americans and British to intercede, Valparaíso's citizenry has impeded the removal of foreign merchandise from its aduana or “customs-house,” yet to no avail. The Spanish warships blaze away unopposed from 9:30 a.m. until noon, and although only 3 people ashore are killed, fires nonetheless start and spread throughout the deserted streets, consuming many buildings by the next day. Madrid is universally reviled for this wanton act of destruction.

APRIL 9, 1866. While still hovering off devastated Valparaíso, Méndez Núñez's squadron is bolstered by the arrival of the 50-gun, propeller-driven frigate Almansa under Capt. Victoriano Sánchez Barcaiztegui. Five days later, the Spaniards burn three of their prizes and steer northward, having decided to lift their Chilean blockade in favor of an attack against the main Peruvian naval base of Callao.

APRIL 27, 1866. Having arrived off San Lorenzo Island, Méndez Núñez sets a message ashore at Callao recommending that all foreign nationals evacuate, as his squadron will bombard this city within four days' time.

However, the Spanish admiral discovers after reconnoitering aboard Vencedora that Callao—unlike Valparaíso—is protected by 50 heavy artillery pieces in a half-dozen batteries to its southeast. In addition, it boasts minefields, as well as seven infantry, two cavalry, and a marine battalion, hence poses a formidable stronghold. Fort Independencia (formerly Real Felipe) and the city itself are left unarmed so as not to draw enemy fire, yet enormous Armstrong and Blakely cannon have been emplaced elsewhere, and the defense is being coordinated from its main citadel by Peru's new president Prado. At a safe remove lie Commodore Rodgers's seven American warships—the Monadnock, Mohongo, Tuscarora, Vanderbilt, and Powhatan, the 1,173-ton gunboat Wateree, and the Freedonia—plus the British frigate Shearwater and the corvette Mutine, as well as the French frigate Vénus.

MAY 2, 1866. Bombardment of Callao. Shortly before noon, Méndez Núñez's squadron advances to shell the defenses in three columns. The Numancia, the Blanca, and the Resolución are to exchange fire with the redoubts along the shoreline extending southeast from Callao toward La Punta or Los Baños. These redoubts consist of six 32-pounders in the “Abtao” Battery; two, 11-inch Armstrong 300-pounders in the La Merced battle turret; a half-dozen 32-pounders in the “Maypú” Battery; one, 13-inch Blakely 500-pounder, a 68-pounder, and seven 32-pounders in Fort Santa Rosa in Chucuito’s main square; five 32-pounders in the “Chacabuco” Battery; plus another five 32-pounders in a provisional battery. The Berenguela and the Villa de Madrid are to threaten the sector north of Callao, defended by six 32-pounders of the “Independencia” Battery; two Armstrong 300-pounders in the “Junín” battle turret; five 32-pounders in the “Pichincha” Battery; as well as two Blakely 500-pounders in Fort “Ayacucho.” Last, the Almansa and the Vencedora are to engage the single Blakely 500-pounder covering the city waterfront (manned by volunteers, later to be remembered as the Cañón del Pueblo) and the anchored Peruvian warships under Capt. Lizardo Montero—consisting of the 2-gun monitor Loa and the single-gun Victoria; the twin-gunned steamer Tumbes; the single-gun Sachaca, and the 2-gun Colón. The Spanish auxiliary Marqués de la Victoria is to remain behind, guarding the half-dozen prizes and supply ships clustered off Muerte Beach.

Peruvian defenders preparing their batteries at Callao prior to the Spanish bombardment of May 2, 1866. (Museo Naval, Callao)

Although the Numancia’s propeller severs the electric cables connected to the Peruvian mines, a ferocious fire nonetheless greets Méndez Núñez’s oncoming squadron. The Villa de Madrid’s engine is crippled within 35 minutes by a round below its waterline, so that it has to be towed out of range by the Vencedora. At 1:00 p.m., the La Merced battle tower explodes ashore from a direct hit by the Blanca, claiming the lives of Peru’s war minister, Col. José Gálvez Egusquiza, plus another 40 officers and men, so that the defenders’ fire in this sector temporarily slackens. The Spaniards’ incendiary Congreve rockets fail to rain destruction upon Callao, however, and the battered Berenguela is compelled to retire a half-hour later, followed at 2:30 p.m. by the Blanca, whose ammunition is virtually exhausted. Méndez Núñez, having been wounded by eight shell splinters, collapses and is relieved by his second-in-command Miguel Lobo, and the squadron finally retreats at 5:30 p.m. to anchor behind San Lorenzo Island. The attacking vessels have suffered a total of 43 dead and 151 wounded among their 3,200 crew members, compared to roughly 200 casualties among the defenders ashore.

The Spaniards have failed to impose their will upon the defiant South American republics, and without repair or resupply facilities and regarded with worldwide opprobrium, they have no choice but to quit the Peruvian coast on May 10, 1866. Méndez Núñez leads the vessels Villa de Madrid, Blanca, Resolución, and Almansa back around the Horn to neutral Rio de Janeiro, while the Numancia, the Berenguela, and the Vencedora strike out across the Pacific toward Tahiti and Manila, thereby bringing an end to this ill-conceived intervention. Both formations suffer further losses due to disease. A little more than two years later, the Blanca’s Captain Topete—now promoted to admiral—leads a naval mutiny at Cadiz in September 1868 that topples the Spanish monarchy. Three years later, Washington mediates a cessation of hostilities among Madrid, Santiago, and Lima.

WAR OF THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE (1864–1870)

In April 1863, the exiled president Venancio Flores of Uruguay—whose liberal Colorado or “Red” party was deposed nine years previously by the rival Blancos or “Whites” under President Bernardo P. Berro—invades his homeland from Argentina, with support from his traditional Brazilian allies out of the Rio Grande do Sul Province and the liberal Argentine government of President Bartolomé Mitre. Montevideo complains to both Buenos Aires and Rio de Janeiro about this intervention, while calling upon the Paraguayan government for support.

Underlying this incident are deeper, unresolved border disputes between all four nations: Paraguay asserts that its boundary with Brazil runs along the Branco River, while the latter insists upon the Apa; Argentina feels that its own dominion extends northeastward to the Paraná and Paraguay rivers, which Asunción contests; while Uruguay—the least populous of all four states, having only 350,000 inhabitants to Brazil’s 8 million, Argentina’s 1.2 million, and Paraguay’s 525,000—is squeezed in the middle and split between its own contending factions.

Therefore, when Brazil sends a diplomatic mission in April 1864 to demand reparations for damages caused to its borderland farmers by Uruguayan gauchos, only to be rebuffed, tensions escalate. Brazil masses troops along the border and sends a squadron into the River Plate, while the new acting “White” president of Uruguay, Atanasio de la Cruz Aguirre, calls upon the 38-year-old Paraguayan dictator Francisco Solano López for help. With expansionistic designs of his own, Solano López offers to mediate, then reproves Rio de Janeiro when his proposal is rejected and severs diplomatic relations by August 30. Brazilian forces begin entering Uruguayan territory on September 21, and beleaguered Montevideo declares war by October 12.

NOVEMBER 13, 1864. Two days after the Paraguayan president Solano López has instructed his steamship Tacuarí, it seizes the Brazilian steamship Marquês de Olinda before Asunción while it is headed upriver with Col. Frederico Carneiro de Campos aboard as a passenger to assume office as governor of Mato Grosso. This action effectively closes the river to Brazil’s inland traffic.

DECEMBER 2, 1864. Defense of Paysandú. The Uruguayan presidential challenger Flores closes in upon the small city of Paysandú with 4,000 of his Colorado irregulars and 1,500 Brazilian allies, backed along its river by the squadron of 57-year-old Brazilian vice admiral Joaquim Marques Lisboa, Visconde (later Marquês) de Tamandaré. Slightly fewer than 1,100 Uruguayan Blanco defenders offer a spirited resistance under 53-year-old general Leandro Gómez and Col. Lucas Piriz, although the city has no walls. Instead, its 12 central blocks are barricaded in hopes of resisting long enough for Blanco reinforcements to lift the siege.

On December 8, all noncombatant women, children, and foreigners are allowed to evacuate Paysandú for the safety of an island out in the river before the Brazilian naval bombardment is renewed with greater vigor. A relief column of Argentine sympathizers under Juan Saa out of the neighboring province of San Luis is checked on the Río Negro banks by a Colorado formation led by Máximo Pérez of Soriano, yet Paysandú’s doomed garrison still refuses to submit, exciting admiration throughout the region.

The besiegers’ numbers swell to more than 15,000 men, and they mount an assault at dawn on December 31, pressing into the small city’s ruins, while Piriz falls mortally wounded. By the afternoon of January 2, 1865, Gómez sends out the captive Colorado officer Atanasildo Saldaña with a request for a truce to bury his dead, which is refused. Before fighting can resume, though, Brazilian troops rush into Gómez’s headquarters, and he capitulates. He nevertheless insists upon being taken before his bitter Colorado foes, and the vengeful general José Gregorio Suárez immediately orders him executed, along with Gómez’s three senior staff officers. Suárez furthermore has every fifth man of the 600 surviving defenders earmarked for execution, most of which are carried out before Tamandaré and the Argentine marine colonel José Muraturi can intervene.

DECEMBER 13, 1864. Paraguay officially declares war against Brazil.

DECEMBER 24, 1864. Offensive into Mato Grosso. A 6,000-man Paraguayan army departs Asunción eastward to successfully attack the 200 Brazilian soldiers scattered around sparsely populated Mato Grosso Province.

JANUARY 14, 1865. Paraguay requests permission from Argentina to send troops through the Misiones district, east of the Paraná River, to attack the Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul. Buenos Aires—which has previously turned down a similar request from Rio de Janeiro—refuses, fueling Asunción’s resentment.

FEBRUARY 15, 1865. In Uruguay, General Flores comes into power when Montevideo finally capitulates to his besieging army, backed by Brazilian arms.

MARCH 18, 1865. Paraguay secretly authorizes the extension of its ongoing hostilities against Argentina as well, yet without advising Buenos Aires until more than six weeks later.

APRIL 13, 1865. Fall of Corrientes. Paraguayan forces seize the Argentine warships 25 de Mayo and Gualeduay off Corrientes, then next day occupy the city. A 1,600-man garrison is installed under a military governor, while the bulk of this invading army pushes southward under Gen. Wenceslao Robles, down the Paraná River toward Empedrado.

Damage inflicted by the Brazilian bombardment of the Uruguayan city of Paysandú. (Departamento de Estudios Históricos Navales, Casa Amarilla, Argentina)

MAY 1, 1865. Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay sign a pact known as the “Triple Alliance” to fight against Paraguay. The ensuing conflict will also become known as the Paraguayan War, or the Great War.

MAY 3, 1865. Buenos Aires officially receives Paraguay’s declaration of war and responds in kind by May 9.

MAY 25, 1865. Argentine Counterstroke. Gen. Wenceslao Paunero disembarks with 1,200 Argentine troops of the 1st Division and 4,000 Brazilians near occupied Corrientes, defeating a small Paraguayan contingent on the Paraná River banks, plus a larger force that hastens to its rescue. The occupiers therefore abandon Corrientes, which the Argentines briefly reoccupy, before themselves withdrawing on the night of May 26–27 upon rumors of the approach of Paraguayan reinforcements from Humaitá.

JUNE 10, 1865. This night, eight Paraguayan steamers and six gunboats under Commander Deza slip down the Paraná River hoping to surprise nine Brazilian vessels under Vice Admiral Barroso, which are anchored south of Corrientes opposite Riachuelo Creek. Mechanical difficulties aboard two of the Paraguayan steamers delay their arrival until 8:00 a.m. on June 11, at which time the Brazilians are able to repel this assault, after a daylong struggle that sees three of Deza’s steamers sunk and his half-dozen gunboats captured. This defeat will eventually slow Paraguayan operations downriver.

JULY 28, 1865. Advancing down the Paraná River, Gen. Isidoro Resquín’s Paraguayan invasion army reaches Bella Vista (Argentina), continuing to press both south toward Goya and east toward San Roque to take up a defensive position along the banks of the Santa Lucía River.

AUGUST 2, 1865. A 3,000-man Paraguayan contingent under Major Duarte, advancing down the western banks of the Uruguay River, reaches Paso de los Libres (Argentina). Three days later, another 8,000 invaders under Lt. Col. Antonio de la Cruz Estigarribia arrive on its eastern bank opposite them at Uruguayana (Brazil).

AUGUST 17, 1865. Yatay. Between the confluence of the Yatay and Despedida creeks in Argentina, a 10,700-man allied army under Uruguayan general Venancio Flores falls upon Duarte's heavily outnumbered Paraguayans and annihilates them by launching a frontal assault to tie them down, then circling their right flank with another force to finish them off from the rear. Paraguayan losses are 1,200 dead, 300 wounded, and 1,200 captured, as opposed to 390 killed and 246 injured among Flores's ranks.

The victorious allies then cross the Uruguay River from August 21–29, combining with a Brazilian army arriving from the east under generals Canabarro and Baron de Yacuhy to bottle up Estigarribia's army within Uruguayana. Eventually, the allied buildup grows to 18,600 men and three-dozen cannon, overseen by Emperor Pedro II and President Mitre.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1865. Recapture of Uruguayana. The allied army closes in upon the beleaguered Paraguayan garrison within Uruguayana (Brazil), calling upon Estigarribia to surrender. Faced with such overwhelming odds, his 5,400-man garrison capitulates. The triumphant allies thereupon march northwestward, massing their forces at Mercedes (Argentina) by October 24.

OCTOBER 7, 1865. In light of the defeats of Duarte and Estigarribia, Gen. Isidoro Resquín's 27,000-man Paraguayan army begins withdrawing northward from the Santa Lucía River, pillaging the Argentine countryside, and herding off 100,000 head of cattle.

OCTOBER 30, 1865. Resquín's army recrosses the Paraná River into Paraguayan territory from Argentina.

Paraguayan prisoners in detention. (Biblioteca Nacional, Montevideo)

JANUARY 29, 1866. Having ventured across the Paraná River from Fort Itapirú, a 1,200-man Paraguayan contingent seizes Corrales (Argentina) and probes south, only to be defeated at Pehuajó. Two days later, the force is driven out of Corrales also, returning to its native soil.

APRIL 16, 1866. Paraná Crossing. An allied river squadron opens fire upon Fort Itapirú (Paraguay), covering the departure one hour later of 10,000 Brazilian troops under General Osório, who advance up the Paraguay River to disembark near Paso de la Patria. They are joined this evening—after a delay caused by a storm—by another 5,000 allied soldiers under Uruguayan general Flores. After the so-called combates de la Confluencia or “Confluence battles,” this advance force drives the Paraguayans out of Fort Itapirú by April 18, thus allowing the remaining 45,000 allied troops to land east of this position.

MAY 2, 1866. Estero Bellaco. While advancing into enemy territory and concentrating upon Solano López's main body, digging in to the north of them behind the marshes known as Estero Bellaco Norte, the allied army is surprised when the Paraguayan leader orders Colonel Díaz's 5,500 troops to attack the invasion spearhead out of marshlands from the south—out of Estero Bellaco Sur.

This attack develops around midday, Díaz's columns smashing into the rear of three Brazilian battalions and forcing them to abandon their artillery. Four Uruguayan (Orientales) battalions with six guns are then pressed even farther north, before other allied relief columns hasten to their rescue. Díaz is eventually driven off after suffering 1,000 casualties and 300 captured, compared to more than 2,000 casualties among the allies.

MAY 24, 1866. Tuyutí (First Battle). From behind his defensive lines at Estero Bellaco Norte, Solano López decides to deploy 22,000 of his 25,000 Paraguayan troops in a preemptive assault against the 33,000 allied invaders massed opposite him at Tuyutí, before they can be reinforced by another

Allied troops waiting in a trench during the First Battle of Tuyutí. (Biblioteca Nacional, Montevideo)

First Battle of Tuyutí.

15,000 Brazilians marching inland. His attack is to consist of four columns wending their way through marshy pathways: Marcó's division, which is to use Gómez Pass and fall upon the enemy front lines; Colonel Díaz's division, which is to support Marcó on his western flank; General Resquín, who is to drive in the allied right; and Gen. Vicente Barrios's division, which will skirt Piris Lagoon to surprise the enemy left and rear.

Díaz's division fares the best in its approach, splitting around Carapá Island in the swamp to fall upon two Uruguayan battalions at 11:30 a.m. on May 24, only to then encounter three Brazilian battalions with 26 fieldpieces, who scatter the colonel's Paraguayans back into the jungle. Marcó comes up late and is three times repelled by the alerted allies. Resquín also makes a slow approach, his two battalions of infantry picking their way through Yatayty Corá and Leguizamón passes, while his eight cavalry regiments circle farther east via Minas Pass. The latter reach the allied right first, scattering some Argentine cavalry squadrons before being bloodily repulsed by the bulk of their infantry. Meanwhile, Resquín's foot soldiers are sighted approaching and driven off with long-range fire. Barrios's is the last Paraguayan column to engage, several hours after this action has begun, and is also driven back. By 4:30 p.m., all four divisions are retiring, having suffered 6,000 killed and 7,000 wounded. Allied casualties are 4,100, but nonetheless their invasion is halted, so the Paraguayans claim victory.

JUNE 10, 1866. Two Paraguayan battalions advance through Yatayty Corá Pass and engage the allied army, still encamped around Tuyutí. They are repelled, and the next day 2,500 Paraguayans return to resume this action, eventually being driven off with 400 casualties, double the invaders' numbers.

JULY 16, 1866. The allied army at Tuyutí launches a surprise attack against the advance Paraguayan defenses around Carapá Island, only to be repulsed after suffering 1,600 casualties. The same fate befalls its attempt two days later to overrun the Paraguayan defenses at Sauce Ranch; although initially successful, the columns of storm troops are in turn dispossessed by the defenders' counterattack and driven back with 2,500 casualties.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1866. Curuzú. To outflank Solano López's entrenchments at Estero Bellaco Norte, the II Brazilian Corps under the Barão de Porto Alegre sails up the Paraguay River from Itapirú, disembarking a mile and a half southwest of Curupaytí to engage 2,500 Paraguayans dug in at Curuzú with 13 cannon. The attackers suffer 800 dead, yet nonetheless kill 700 Paraguayans, wound 1,700, and overrun this position.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1866. Curupaytí. Following up their success at Curuzú, the allies advance north-eastward to storm the Paraguayan defenses around Curupaytí, held by 5,000 defenders and 49 guns under Gen. José Eduvigis Díaz. The Brazilian river squadron of Admiral Tamandaré begins a bombardment of these defenses shortly after 8:00 a.m., and by noon signals the awaiting 10,000 Brazilian and 5,000 Argentine troops that Curupaytí's batteries have been silenced.

However, when the allied assault columns break cover, they are almost immediately engulfed in artillery counterfire and suffer heavy casualties while working through the mangroves. The attack is therefore called off after 4,000 men fall—compared to only 92 Paraguayans—and by 5:00 p.m. the allies have returned into Curuzú.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1866. General Flores returns into Uruguay because of its unstable political situation.

OCTOBER 1866. The 63-year-old general Luís Alves de Lima e Silva, Marquês (later Duke) de Caxias, replaces General Osório as commander in chief of the Brazilian forces in Paraguay.

NOVEMBER 9, 1866. An anti-liberal government revolt breaks out in Argentina's western province of Mendoza, started by impressed conscripts destined for service in Paraguay. The veteran leaders Juan and Felipe Sáa (see "November 16, 1860" entry in "Buenos Aires versus the Argentine Confederation"), plus colonels Juan de Dios Videla and Felipe Varela, return from exile with two battalions of Chilean volunteers to take control of this uprising, calling for peace to be made in Paraguay and the transfer of rural western Argentina to Chilean control.

General Paunero is instructed by the liberal administration in Buenos Aires to gather troops at Río Cuarto to mount a pacification campaign, while Col. Julio Campos advances from La Rioja with another 1,200 men for this same purpose.

DECEMBER 4, 1866. Shortly after Paunero's "Army of the Interior" marches out of Río Cuarto (Argentina), the 7th Cavalry Regiment—ordered to join his liberal ranks—also mutinies against the government.

JANUARY 2, 1867. The Argentine rebel colonel Varela defeats a liberal government force under Paraguayan artillery salvos firing from the far side of the river at the Battle of Curupaytí, by Cándido López. The painter, a young Argentine subaltern at the time of this encounter, was badly wounded during the assault and his right forearm was later amputated, compelling him to learn to paint with his left hand. (Museo Nacional de Bellas Artes, Buenos Aires)

Commander Linares at Guandacol, thereby gaining control of La Rioja Province.

JANUARY 5, 1867. At Rinconada del Pocito (Argentina), Colonel Videla's rebel contingent defeats Campos's liberal troops, compelling the latter to flee into San Luis with only 200 followers. News of this disaster prompts Paunero to halt his drive against Mendoza at Desaguadero, where he is hounded by guerrillas under Felipe Saa. He finally decides to retrace his steps into Río Cuarto by February 5.

LATE JANUARY 1867. Because of Argentina's political unrest, Col. José Miguel Arredondo returns from the Paraguayan front with 3,500 troops and is ordered to reinforce Paunero's "Army of the Interior" with four liberal battalions—1,600 men—and two fieldpieces.

FEBRUARY 1867. President Mitre—commander in chief of the allied forces and in the field with Argentina's invasion army in Paraguay—returns home because of the growing seriousness of the anti-liberal revolt, which has now spread throughout San Luis, Mendoza, San Juan, Catamarca, and La Rioja provinces.

MARCH 4, 1867. The governor of Catamarca, Col. Melitón Córdoba, is defeated by a rebel contingent out of La Rioja Province.

MARCH 19, 1867. Argentine government troops reoccupy the rebel city of La Rioja.

MARCH 26, 1867. A cholera epidemic strikes the allied army in Paraguay, 2,400 troops dying at Curuzú alone. By early May, 13,000 Brazilian troops lie sick at Tuyutí.

LATE MARCH 1867. Having been reinforced by Arredondo, Paunero's 3,000-man army once again marches into San Luis Province with 10 fieldpieces to resume putting down its rebellion. During this advance, Arredondo is sent ahead toward Mercedes with a 1,600-man vanguard.

APRIL 1, 1867. San Ignacio. At San Ignacio Ford over the Quinto River (Argentina), Arredondo's 1,600 government troops encounter 3,500 rebel irregulars with eight fieldpieces under Juan Saa. The latter are defeated and dispersed by nightfall, so Paunero's main body reenters the city of San Luis three days later and reclaims Mendoza by April 14.

APRIL 10, 1867. Pozo de Vargas. A mile and a half north of the city of La Rioja (Argentina), Gen. Antonino Taboada's 2,100 government troops are attacked by 4,000 rebels—including a battalion of Chilean volunteers—under Colonel Varela. In a sharp fight, the latter are routed, fleeing toward Jáchal. This victory effectively ends the antigovernment revolt in western Argentina.

EARLY MAY 1867. A 5,000-man Brazilian contingent, advancing from Mato Grosso Province into Paraguay under Colonel Camisao, is trapped south of the Apa River by Paraguayan troops and exterminated with the help of cholera and starvation.

MAY 25, 1867. The Paraguay River overflows its banks, flooding the miserable allied encampment at Curuzú and forcing its survivors to seek shelter at Tuyutí.

JUNE 5, 1867. A flying column of 400 Argentine government troops under Commander Charras drives Varela's rebels out of Jáchal and, by August 4, forces Varela to cross the border into exile in Bolivia with 1,000 followers.

JUNE 29, 1867. To break out of their Tuyutí deadlock, an allied contingent circles east of the Paraguayans' main defenses at Estero Bellaco Norte, gaining Tuyú Cué and sending 1,500 riders three miles farther north toward San Solano.

AUGUST 16, 1867. A brief insurrection occurs in Córdoba; Argentina's war minister is detained until a column of government troops can approach this city under General Conesa, causing this uprising to collapse.

AUGUST 29, 1867. The Argentine rebel Varela—having recrossed the border from Bolivia—defeats government colonel Pedro J. Frías at Rincón de Amaicha, then the next day administers a second reverse in Molino Valley.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1867. A Brazilian supply train carrying provisions from Tuyutí toward the allied flanking army at Tuyú Cué is ambushed by Paraguayan guerrillas, suffering 200 killed (as opposed to 80 attackers killed).

Uruguayan encampment during the War of the Triple Alliance. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Montevideo)

OCTOBER 3, 1867. At Tayí, a clash between advancing Brazilian forces and Paraguayan raiders results in 500 of the former being killed, and 300 of the latter.

OCTOBER 10, 1867. The Argentine rebel Varela fights his way into Salta, losing 125 men, as opposed to 15 defenders. Soon afterward, he is forced to abandon this city because of the approach of government troops under General Navarro, withdrawing toward Jujuy. Eventually, Varela is chased back into Bolivia, where his guerrillas are disarmed by that country's authorities.

OCTOBER 28, 1867. At Obella Ranch, the Brazilian army, while working its way around the Paraguayan's eastern flank, is ambushed, suffering 370 killed as opposed to 140 Paraguayan dead.

NOVEMBER 2, 1867. The Brazilian flanking army overruns 400 Paraguayans defending Guardia Tayí, killing them almost to the last man.

NOVEMBER 3, 1867. Tuyutí (Second Battle). To pressure the allies into recalling their eastern flanking army, Solano López decides to launch a dawn attack with 8,000 Paraguayan troops against the 13,000 invaders still encamped at Tuyutí. Initially, this proves a great success, the attackers surprising the allied front lines and causing four Brazilian battalions to break and flee in disorder toward Itapirú. Much damage is then inflicted upon the supply dumps, which are looted and fired, the flames eventually spreading throughout half the allied encampment. Nevertheless, heavy Brazilian and Argentine counterattacks finally drive back the raiders, inflicting 2,500 casualties—double the defenders' numbers. Despite their more numerous losses, the Paraguayans come away claiming victory, feeling that they have dealt the invading host a crippling blow, thus slowing the progress of their penetration upriver.

DECEMBER 22, 1867. The garrison at Santa Fe (Argentina) mutinies under Col. José Rodríguez to protest the rule of Governor Oroño. The same occurs at Rosario two days later under Col. Patricio Rodríguez. Both incidents are resolved without bloodshed.

JANUARY 14, 1868. Mitre must return to Buenos Aires because of the death of his vice president.

FEBRUARY 6, 1868. In Montevideo, Col. Fortunato Flores—the 24-year-old son of the acting governor Venancio Flores—leads a revolt against his father, causing foreign warships anchored in the harbor to disembark troops to protect their national interests. The elder Flores eludes capture, thus, realizing that he has missed his chance, his son agrees to sail for Buenos Aires the next evening with a few adherents aboard the merchant steamer Charrúa. The foreign troops withdraw by February 8.

FEBRUARY 19, 1868. Uruguayan followers of Bernardo Prudencio Berro assassinate Venancio Flores in his carriage at Montevideo, sparking two days of rioting that culminate when Flores's sons kill Berro in revenge.

This same day of February 19, the Brazilian river squadron of Adm. José Joaquim Inácio fights its way past the well-fortified Paraguayan complex at Humaitá, thus gaining control of the Paraguay River. Inácio even detaches two ironclads and a monitor under Capt. Delfin Carlos de Carvalho to bombard the outskirts of its capital Asunción (population 15,000) five days later. This thrust, coupled with the Brazilian encirclement slowly closing in overland from the east, threatens a fatal interruption in Solano López's flow of supplies and compels the Paraguayan leader to at last begin evacuating his Estero Bellaco Norte defenses—the so-called Cuadrilátero or “Quadrilateral” stronghold—by early March.

Paraguayan contingents begin retiring north to establish a temporary defensive line on the Tebicuary River, and a more permanent one at Pikiciry Creek 20 miles below Asunción, while still fighting delaying actions at their old positions. Eventually, Solano López rebuilds his army to 18,000 men and 71 cannon, 5,000 being stationed on the Pikiciry, 8,000 being fortified at Itaibaté in the Valentinas Hills, and 5,000 and a dozen fieldpieces serving as a mobile reserve under 39-year-old general Bernardino Caballero. Despite the numbers, these Paraguayan forces include half-starved soldiers as young as 11 and as old as 60, with scant equipment or supplies.

MARCH 21, 1868. A Brazilian assault against the Sauce Ranch defenses, at the western end of Solano López's Estero Bellaco Norte entrenchments, finds only 100 defenders, who are easily overwhelmed. This is the first concrete sign of a general Paraguayan retreat and is followed by a gradual allied advance against the 3,000-man garrison still holding nearby Humaitá.

MAY 29, 1868. Faced with financial insolvency and an inland rebellion raised by Gen. Francisco Caraballo, the recently installed Uruguayan leader, Gen. Lorenzo Batlle, allows 1,100 foreign troops to disembark at Montevideo to maintain order until June 9.

JULY 15, 1868. Fall of Humaitá. After a brief siege, Brazilian troops storm this strategic Paraguayan river town, only to be repelled with 1,200 casualties. Nevertheless, its defense is doomed by a lack of supplies, and on the night of July 22–23, women, children, and noncombatants are stealthily evacuated by canoe to its opposite banks. Noisy celebrations are then held within Humaitá on July 24—Solano López's birthday—masking the garrison's intent to escape this same night. When the allies finally enter the town, they find it abandoned except for 180 cannon and 600 rifles.

AUGUST 5, 1868. The allies overtake a Paraguayan contingent fleeing from Humaitá, surrounding them and thereby receiving the surrender of 1,000 troops, 300 convalescents, 5 cannon, and 800 firearms.

AUTUMN 1868. After delegating 6,500 Argentine, 2,200 Brazilian, and 800 Uruguayan troops to maintain pressure upon Solano López's new defensive line from Angostura up the Pikiciry Creek, General Caxias slips across the Paraguay River at Las Palmas with 18,500 Brazilian soldiers to commence an advance up the western banks and take the enemy from the rear.

DECEMBER 6, 1868. Itororó. After recrossing the Paraguay River at San Antonio, Caxias's 18,500 Brazilians are checked at Itororó Creek by General Caballero's mobile reserve of 5,000 Paraguayans, rushed north to meet this threat. The attackers make a frontal assault directly across this stream, suffering 2,400 casualties—double the defenders' numbers—but still pushing back the overmatched Paraguayans.

DECEMBER 11, 1868. Avahy. Caballero's small Paraguayan army is annihilated after being overtaken on the southern banks of Avahy Creek by Caxias's Brazilians. The latter suffer 770 killed, as opposed to 3,500 killed and 1,000 captured (including 600 wounded) among the former's ranks. This victory allows Caxias to rest and reorganize his weary army at Villeta before pressing southeast toward the enemy concentration in the Valentinas Hills.

DECEMBER 21, 1868. Itaibaté. After recuperating at Villeta, Caxias's Brazilian army attacks Solano López's 8,000 troops at Itaibaté, seemingly carrying the defenses by sheer weight of numbers until the Acaamoroí Regiment—the Paraguayan leader's last reserves—turns the tide of battle by driving these storm columns back out of the trenches, leaving 1,000 Brazilian dead and 3,250 wounded. A simultaneous allied offensive against the 2,000 Paraguayans holding Pikiciry Creek fails to materialize, the main frontal assault under Gen. Juan Andrés Gelly y Obes being recalled after eight hours' wait in swampy terrain because Gen. João Manuel Menna Barreto's eastern flanking movement does not appear. At 5:00 p.m., however, this overdue contingent finally bursts out of a nearby woods and devastates the Paraguayan defense single-handedly, killing 680, wounding 100, capturing 100, and sending its survivors scurrying into the town of Angostura.

Six days later, after Caxias's main army has been reintegrated with 7,000 allied soldiers from Gelly y Obes's and Menna Barreto's contingents, a second attempt is made against Solano López's 4,000 remaining troops at Itaibaté. This time, the Paraguayans are routed, 1,500 being killed and a like number captured, compared to 467 dead among the 23,000 attackers. Solano López escapes toward his new capital of Luque with a small following, leaving Angostura to surrender the 1,200-man garrison under English-born colonel George H. Thompson by December 30.

JANUARY 5, 1869. Caxias's allied army takes and loots Asunción, while Solano López sets up a new government east of there—first at Luque, then at Piribebuy. Paraguayan resistance is reduced to guerrilla warfare, and Caxias decides to return to Brazil shortly thereafter.

JANUARY 12, 1869. Having invaded Argentina from Bolivia one last time—albeit with only 100 followers—rebel colonel Varela is defeated at Pastos Grandes in Salta Province by a government contingent under Col. Pedro Corvalán. Fleeing into Chile, he dies by 1870.

APRIL 16, 1869. The marshal Guilherme Xavier de Sousa is succeeded at Luque as commander in chief of the Brazilian occupying forces by the 27-year-old, French-born prince Louis Philippe Marie Ferdinand d'Orléans, Comte d'Eu, who is married to Pedro II's eldest daughter.

LATE MAY 1869. Piribebuy. After a lull in active campaigning, 20,000 allied troops under Brazilian general Conde d'Eu drive eastward against the last Paraguayan stronghold at Azcurra Pass, in the hill country 30 miles from Asunción. Artillery fire pins down the overmatched defenders, allowing Mitre to slide north and turn the Paraguayan right, while the Brazilians circle southeastward through Valenzuela to

Elisa Lynch

Elizabeth Alicia Lynch was born on June 3, 1835, in County Cork (Ireland), the daughter of a physician named John Lynch. Young Elisa, as she was known, seemed to have received a promising education before the family moved to join her eldest sister, Corinne, in France in 1847. On her 15th birthday, Elisa married a French military surgeon named Jean-Louis Armand de Quatrefages, moving with him to Algiers, before their unhappy union ended in divorce in 1853.

Returning to live in Paris with her mother, Adelaide (and possibly a Russian nobleman), Elisa met Francisco Solano López, eldest son of the Paraguayan dictator. In Europe to purchase armaments, steamers, and a railway for his South American nation, the 26-year-old officer was smitten by her beauty, and they became lovers. Ignoring protests from his younger brother Benigno, Solano left money and instructions for his pregnant mistress to follow him across the Atlantic when he returned home to become war minister in 1855.

During her layover in Buenos Aires that October, Elisa gave birth to their first son, who was baptized Juan Francisco after she reached Asunción that December. Although received with such antipathy from Solano's family and high society that they would never marry, Elisa lived in great luxury and style. After giving birth to a daughter named Corina Adelaida, Elisa bore Solano five more sons. Upon becoming president in 1862, he showered riches upon her, including 26 city properties, several large ranches, and more than 20 million acres of land.

She was spared during his descent into madness amid his military defeats a few years later, when Solano condemned even his own mother and brothers to death. After burying his body in March 1870, she was allowed to depart for Paris, allegedly with more than $500,000 in jewels, gold, and cash. She returned to Paraguay five years later, at the invitation of President Juan B. Gil, to settle claims about her confiscated lands. Unable to reach any agreement, she was deported once more, dying forgotten and poor in Paris in 1886.

threaten Solano López's makeshift capital of Piribebuy from the rear. They overrun it on August 12, Piribebuy's 1,800 defenders suffering 700 killed and 1,000 captured, compared to 53 fatalities among the assault forces (including General Menna Barreto).

In a desperate bid to stem this envelopment long enough for his tattered army to escape northeastward, Solano López four days later orders a stand made at Acosta Ñu near the village of Barrero Grande by his rearguard of 4,500 boys, women, and old men under Caballero. They are overwhelmed by allied cavalry charges after a desperate resistance known to Brazilian historians as the "Battle of Campo Grande," enduring 2,000 killed and 2,300 captured. On August 18, Solano López's remaining 2,500 troops are chased across the Hondo River toward Caraguatay.

AUGUST 15, 1869. The allies establish a provisional government at Asunción.

AUGUST 18, 1869. Having pushed upriver toward Caraguatay, past the remnants of the Paraguayan steamer Paraguari (scuttled four days previously at the confluence of the Yhaguy and Manduvirá rivers), the allied squadron sights the anchored Rio Apa, Yporá, Salto del Guairá, Amambay, Piraveve, Matei, Yberá, and Ybyrei. All these Paraguayan steamers are torched and sunk rather than surrendered.

MARCH 1, 1870. At Corá Hill near the confluence of the Aquidabán and Nigui creeks in northeastern Paraguay, Solano López's last band of 100–200 soldiers and approximately 300 civilian followers is discovered by a Brazilian cavalry battalion sent by Gen. José Antônio Correia da Câmara and is wiped out. The president and his 18-year-old son, Juan Francisco or "Pancho," the vice president, cabinet ministers, and numerous military officers are all killed, only a handful of troopers and civilians surviving to be taken prisoner. Solano López's common-law wife, Elisa Lynch, buries his body, along with their son's, in a shallow grave dug with her own hands by sundown.

JUNE 20, 1870. Brazil, Argentina, and Paraguay sign a preliminary accord formally ending this war. By its terms, Brazil gains the district between the Branco and Apa rivers, while Argentina acquires undisputed title over Misiones, as well as pushing the Chaco borderline as far north as the Pilcomayo River. Paraguay thus loses 38 percent of its territory, where all its heavy and most of its light industry is located.

Although free elections are promised within three months, the last Brazilian troops do not evacuate Paraguay until six years later, while Argentina continues to administer Villa Occidental until 1878 when—through the arbitration of U.S. President Rutherford B. Hayes—it is restored to local control.

FENIAN RAIDS (1866–1870)

In October 1858, the "Fenian Brotherhood"—an American offshoot of the older Irish Republican Brotherhood—is secretly formed in New York City to help win Ireland's independence from British rule. For a few years after the conclusion of the American Civil War, one of its factions even prepares for cross-border raids into Canada as a means of pressuring Great Britain.

MARCH 7, 1866. Anticipating trouble from the increasingly belligerent Irish American organizations on Saint Patrick's Day, Lt. Gen. Sir John Michel—commander in chief of all British forces in Canada—orders 10,000 volunteer militiamen mobilized, only to have this day pass without incident.

MAY 27, 1866. Col. John O'Neill—formerly a Union captain in the 11th U.S. Cavalry Regiment—moves north by train out of Nashville with his 13th Fenian Regiment and arrives in Buffalo two days later, having gathered further reinforcements en route. By May 31, approximately 1,500 Fenians are marshalled in anticipation of advancing across the Niagara River into Canada. British authorities respond by calling up 14,000 militia volunteers, plus another 6,000 two days later.

MAY 31, 1866. This night, Colonel O'Neill takes 800 Fenians aboard two steamers and four canal barges

Fenians

The hundreds of thousands of Irish immigrants who reached North America during the mid-19th century included many nationalists opposed to British rule over their homeland. These radicals were known, both in Ireland and abroad, as “Fenians”—a name derived from the Celtic Na Fianna or Na Fianna Éireann, a mythical band of ancient warriors formed to defend that island. In 1850, a young fugitive in Paris named James Stephens created an “Irish Republican Brotherhood,” hoping to forge a global movement based upon the Jacobin model from the French Revolution.

Eight years later, he endorsed the emergence of an American branch called the “Fenian Brotherhood.” This secret society was organized in New York City by John O’Mahony and Michael Doheny. The latter was a captain (later colonel) in the 9th New York State Militia, while O’Mahony soon became colonel of the mainly Irish American 69th Infantry Regiment. Both units served in the Union cause during the Civil War.

The Fenian Brotherhood held a convention in Chicago in November 1863, its 82 delegates agreeing to raise funds to purchase arms by selling bonds, which could be redeemed “six months after the recognition of the independence of Ireland.” After the American Civil War ended in the spring of 1865, some discharged veterans even answered Stephens’s appeal to return and try to set Ireland free, only to be arrested there.

A rival faction sprang up within the Fenian Brotherhood in October 1865, however, led by the wealthy businessman William R. Roberts. He called instead for cross-border raids into the neighboring British colony of Canada. Their aim would be to seize a few transportation hubs, establish a foothold (giving their movement a vaguely defined “belligerent status”), and then exchange them for the liberation of Ireland. Federal authorities in Washington did little to discourage these Fenian preparations, as official resentment against London’s lackluster support of the Union during the Civil War still lingered.

Yet when O’Mahony, anxious to outdo his challenger Roberts, raised his own small force in April 1866 and pushed across the border from Eastport (Maine) to seize the Canadian island of Campobello, American officials reacted quickly. His munition ship, the Ocean Spray, was impounded, deflating this attempt. Humiliated by his so-called Eastport Fizzle, O’Mahony resigned the Fenian presidency on May 11, clearing the way for Roberts to launch his own attempt.

at Lower Black Road (New York), disembarking the next dawn at Fort Erie (Ontario) to commence his invasion of Canada.

Realizing that the Welland Canal will be this enemy’s likely objective, British major general George Napier concentrates 850 men of Lt. Col. Alfred Booker’s 2nd Battalion (Queen’s Own Rifles), the 13th Battalion (Hamilton Infantry), and the York and Caledonia Rifle Companies at Port Colborne at its southern end, while Col. George Peacocke’s 16th Regiment, three companies of the 47th Regiment, and a detachment of artillery muster at Saint Catherine’s to its north—later being joined by the 10th Royal Regiment, Lincoln militiamen, two more companies of regulars, and the governor general’s bodyguard.

JUNE 2, 1866. Ridgeway. After detraining at dawn, Booker’s troops advance up Ridge Road toward Stevensville (Ontario), only to be unexpectedly fired upon a mile and a half away by O’Neill’s Fenians, who have occupied positions along Limestone Ridge. After three hours of long-range exchanges, the 500 invaders are about to retreat when the Canadians mistakenly form into squares, believing that they are about to be outflanked by enemy cavalry (of which the Fenians have none). The invaders therefore fire upon this easy target, at which Booker’s redcoats break and flee in the general direction of Fort Erie, having suffered 9 dead, 32 wounded, and 6 prisoners.

Later this same day, O’Neill overruns Fort Erie, enduring 9 killed and 14 wounded while capturing its 42-man British garrison (6 of whom are injured). But realizing that their prospects are now dim, the Fenians thereupon reembark for Buffalo, only to have their barge intercepted by the U.S. gunboat Michigan, which arrests virtually all participants in O’Neill’s adventure.

JUNE 7, 1866. Another force of 500–1,000 Fenians crosses the frontier near Saint Armand (Missisquoi Bay, Quebec) under Brig. Gen. Samuel Spier, occupying this town plus Pigeon Hill, Cooks Corners, Frelighsburg, and Stanbridge. The British dispatch the Prince Consort’s Own Rifle Brigade, the 25th Regiment, the 7th Regiment, the Royal Guides, border volunteers, and the No. 2 (Hochelaga) Field Battery to confront this incursion.

JUNE 9, 1866. This afternoon, British defense forces enter deserted Saint Armand, and the Royal Guides overtake 200 Fenians retiring southward into the United States, killing several and capturing 16.

JUNE 22, 1866. A small body of Fenians returns to Pigeon Hill near Saint Armand (Quebec), firing ineffectively upon the 21st Battalion of the Richelieu Light Infantry before withdrawing. Most Fenian captives held by the U.S. authorities are released after posting nominal bonds, and are even given free rail tickets home upon promising that they will never try to invade Canada again.

MAY 22, 1870. After a four-year hiatus, British lieutenant colonel W. Osborne Smith receives notice to expect another round of Fenian raids—despite the fact that Canada is no longer officially a British colony but, rather, an independent nation since July 1, 1867 (although still allied to London).

MAY 25, 1870. Stanbridge. Fenian general O'Neill advances from his base camp at Franklin (Vermont), threatening the Quebec border near Saint Armand. Smith departs Montreal by rail for Saint Jean with companies of the 1st Prince of Wales Rifles, the 3rd Victoria Rifles, the 5th Royal Light Infantry, the 6th Hochelaga Light Infantry, and the Montreal Troop of Cavalry.

Disembarking at Saint Jean, Smith presses on eight miles farther into Stanbridge with the Victoria Rifles and Montreal Cavalry alone, reinforcing the handful of defenders ensconced atop Eccles Hill, three miles east of Pigeon Hill. A couple of hours later, 350–400 Fenians charge across the border at double-time, immediately drawing fire from Lt. Col. Brown Chamberlain's advance British detachment. Breaking for cover, the Fenians and British then snipe at long range throughout most of this day, until the invaders attempt to wield a fieldpiece into position at 5:00 p.m. Smith immediately directs a rapid advance in skirmishing order, causing the Fenians to flee in disarray, the engagement ending by 6:00 p.m. Fenian losses are estimated at 5 dead and 15–18 wounded, while the Canadians suffer no casualties.

MAY 27, 1870. Another small force of Fenians advances up the Trout River and crosses into Canada near Holbrooks Corners (Quebec). They are confronted by seven militia companies of the 50th Battalion (Huntingdon Borderers) and one of the 69th Regiment regulars, advancing from nearby

Encampment of the 60th Canadian Battalion at Pigeon, or Eccles, Hill. (National Archives of Canada)

Huntingdon to engage. Advancing at the double and firing as they move, the Canadians and British drive the Fenians back across the border, killing three, capturing one, and wounding several, while suffering no casualties of their own. Aside from an attempted invasion of Pembina, Manitoba, in October of the next year, the Fenians never again attack Canada.

RED RIVER EXPEDITION (1870)

By 1869, Britain's private Hudson's Bay Company completes negotiations with the two-year-old Canadian government of Prime Minister Sir John A. Macdonald to sell its vast territory—called "Rupert's Land"—which will become incorporated into this new dominion. However, the local French and Indian residents (known as Métis) have not been properly consulted about this change, so they form their own provisional government under Louis David Riel to deal directly with Ottawa. Setting up his headquarters at Fort Garry (modern Winnipeg), Riel draws up a list of conditions, most of which are accepted when Canada passes the Manitoba Act on May 12, 1870.

Nevertheless, during the standoff, an Ontario settler named Thomas Scott has been executed by a Métis firing squad, so Macdonald orders Col. Garnet J. Wolseley, quartermaster-general of the British forces in Canada, to lead an expedition to the Red River mouth and depose Riel, as well as quell any further outbursts.

EARLY MAY 1870. Wolseley departs Toronto by train, his expedition consisting of 250 regulars of the 60th Regiment under Lt. Col. Randle Joseph Feilden, 370 militiamen apiece from the 1st Ontario Rifles under Lt. Col. Samuel Peters Jarvis and 2nd Quebec Rifles under Lt. Col. Louis Adolphe Casault, plus a Royal Artillery detachment under Lt. James Alleyne and a contingent of Royal Engineers under Lieutenant Heneage. They travel to Collingwood on Georgian Bay, where they transfer aboard the steamers Algoma and Chicora, reaching Fort William on Lake Superior by the morning of May 25.

JUNE 4, 1870. After gathering 150 boats, 280 local guides and voyageurs, plus abundant provisions, the advance elements of Wolseley's 1,400-man expedition begin departing Fort William westward on an epic 500-mile march over wilderness trails.

AUGUST 4, 1870. After an exhausting series of portages, Wolseley reaches Fort Francis and refreshes before pressing on toward Fort Garry.

AUGUST 20, 1870. Wolseley reaches Fort Alexander to find his vanguard—the regulars of the 60th Regiment, plus gunners and engineers—awaiting him. Rather than give time for his trailing militia—

Lord Wolseley. (National Archives of Canada)

Garnet Wolseley

Garnet Joseph Wolseley Jr. was born on June 4, 1833, at Golden Bridge House in County Dublin (Ireland). He was the eldest of seven children of a major in the 25th "King's Own Borderers" Regiment of Foot. His father died when Garnet was seven, so his mother struggled to raise the large family alone. Bright and inquisitive, Garnet worked briefly in a surveyor's office before being commissioned on March 12, 1852, as an ensign in the 12th Regiment of Foot. He entered "without purchase" because of his father's past military service and his own lack of funds.

Garnet soon transferred to the 80th Foot to see active duty in India, initiating a career that carried him to the farthest corners of Queen Victoria's empire. While fighting in the Second Burmese War, he was severely wounded in a thigh, promoted to lieutenant in May 1853, and sent home to recuperate. The next year, he joined the 90th Light Infantry and went to Crimea, serving as assistant engineer at the siege of Sebastopol, and was so seriously wounded that he lost the sight in his right eye. Still, Wolseley finished this war as a captain, a deputy assistant quartermaster-general of the Light Division, and a recipient of the French Légion d'Honneur (5th Class), and was recommended for the Victoria Cross.

After six months of peacetime duty at Aldershot, he shipped out again with the 90th in March 1857 for India and was wrecked in the Strait of Banka, before gaining Singapore and hastening on to Calcutta to help put down the Great Mutiny. In addition to his exceptional bravery and energy, Wolseley was also unusually intellectual for a line officer. He served as quartermaster under Maj. Gen. Sir James Hope Grant in India, as well as three years later in China, and was promoted to lieutenant colonel by the age of 25. Wolseley furthermore published his first book upon returning, A Narrative of the War with China.

Wolseley was sent to Canada amid the Trent diplomatic confrontation, arriving on January 5, 1862. When this incident was resolved, he remained at Canadian headquarters in Montreal and traveled into the United States to meet with commanders on both sides of the Civil War. Wolseley also continued his studies and writing and was promoted to full colonel by June 5, 1865. He improved Canadian militia training and helped repel Fenian raids during the summer of 1866. When his Canadian appointment ended, he returned to England in April 1867 and married, only to be sent back to Montreal that same September as deputy quartermaster-general. When it became obvious early in 1870 that an expedition was to be sent to the Red River to oversee the transfer of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories from Hudson Bay Company rule, Wolseley submitted such a detailed plan of operation that he was given command.

Upon its successful conclusion, he returned to England in October 1870 and received a couple of knighthoods. Wolseley helped reform the War Office the next year, as assistant adjutant-general. His meticulous planning of the expedition that he would lead against the Ashanti in Ghana in West Africa in September 1873 drew great praise. He was promoted to major general, showered with honors, and immortalized in Gilbert and Sullivan's operetta Pirates of Penzance as "the very model of a modern major general, with information vegetable, animal, and mineral." Garnet Wolseley died a field marshal and viscount and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

men to catch up, the colonel the next day decides to proceed into Fort Garry with only this strength.

AUGUST 22, 1870. Wolseley's vanguard reaches the Red River mouth and the next evening sights Fort Garry, bivouacking outside until August 24 when he enters and finds it empty—Riel and his followers having withdrawn southward into the United States.

As early as August 29, Wolseley begins withdrawing the first of his regulars, who return into their barracks by October, leaving Fort Garry to the Canadian militiamen and the governor designate Adams Archibald. Riel eventually returns to his farm at Saint Vital, south of Saint Boniface, and quietly resumes agrarian life over the next few years before being again declared an outlaw in 1875.

ARGENTINE UNREST (1870–1890)

This South American nation continues to be racked by factionalism, military coups, and civil war between the Unitarios—now more commonly referred to as Liberales, who largely represent the white elites—and the Federales or “Federalists,” comprised of rural mestizo cattlemen and laborers.

APRIL 11, 1870. After nightfall, a band of disgruntled federalists under the Cordoban renegade Simón Luengo push their way into San José Estate and assassinate the now discredited general Urquiza, governor of Entre Ríos Province. Instead, his 47-year-old military subordinate Gen. Ricardo López Jordán is proclaimed as federalist governor three days later at the capital of Concepción del Uruguay by a narrow vote in the provincial legislature. The national liberal president, Domingo F. Sarmiento, refuses to recognize this succession, though, so both sides begin marshalling their armies for a confrontation.

MAY 20, 1870. Arroyo Sauce. López Jordán, having advanced toward the Paraná River, is confronted at Sauce Creek (a branch of the Nogoyá River) by 1,700 government cavalrymen, 1,200 infantrymen, and 160 gunners manning a half-dozen fieldpieces under General Conesa. Although the former commands 9,000 riders, they prove to be so ill disciplined that they are easily scattered by the better-armed regular soldiers.

JULY 7, 1870. Government troops from General Gelly y Obes’s “Corrientes Army” occupy Concordia.

JULY 12, 1870. López Jordán reoccupies his capital of Concepción del Uruguay.

JULY 14, 1870. Government troops reach the liberal stronghold of Gualeguaychú and, five days later, beat off an assault by some of López Jordán’s federalist followers.

OCTOBER 12, 1870. Santa Rosa. After avoiding action for the past several months, López Jordán’s 9,000 men attack Col. Ignacio Rivas’s 4,000 government troops at Santa Rosa Creek (an affluent of the Gualeguay River, 20 miles east-southeast of Villaguay). The opening assault is a headlong charge by 3,000 riders against Rivas’s left, followed by another 1,000 troopers against his right.

Nevertheless, the superior weaponry of the government forces—Remington rifles and Krupp cannon—allow them to drive off these attacks, as well as an attempt to fall upon the government rear by another 3,000 insurgents. After a hard-fought, three-hour battle, López Jordán withdraws, having killed 36 and wounded 103 government soldiers, while suffering about three times as many casualties among his own ranks.

NOVEMBER 18, 1870. Some 1,200 López Jordán followers wrest Gualeguaychú from its 200-man government garrison under Colonel Villar. The defenders suffer 32 dead, while slaying 150 assaulters. As a result of this setback, President Sarmiento appoints Colonel Arredondo—a notoriously callous, even brutal commander—to lead all government forces in Entre Ríos, with “unlimited power to pacify the province at all cost.”

DECEMBER 5, 1870. Col. Francisco Borges’s government garrison successfully defends the city of Paraná against 3,000 of López Jordán’s partisans, led by Col. Carmelo Campos.

JANUARY 26, 1871. Ñaembé. Desperate to break out of his encirclement in Entre Ríos Province, López Jordán marches northward into neighboring Corrientes with 6,000 riders, 1,000 infantrymen, and nine fieldpieces. Seven miles east of Goya, on the southern banks of Ñaembé Lagoon, he falls upon its provincial governor—Col. Santiago Baibiene—who is busily mustering 2,000 government foot soldiers, 1,000 cavalrymen, and a half-dozen cannon.

Despite his surprise, Baibiene immediately advances with his infantry, hoping to bottle up López Jordán’s larger army before it can fully deploy. When the latter’s mounted vanguard streams back in defeat, this retirement disrupts other rebel formations marching into battle. At this critical moment, Baibiene strikes frontally with his foot soldiers, plus along both flanks with his cavalry. López Jordán’s ill-disciplined army is broken and chased all the way back to the Corrientes River, leaving behind 600 dead, 550 prisoners, all their artillery, and 52 supply wagons. Government losses total 190 casualties.

Argentine troops. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

FEBRUARY 14, 1871. Arredondo defeats 1,500 of López Jordán's followers under Col. Carmelo Campos at Gená Creek, an affluent of the Guauguaychú River, killing 20 and capturing 100.

MARCH 6, 1871. Liberal government colonel Donato Alvarez, commanding 620 troopers, defeats 900 insurgents under Colonel Leiva at Punta del Monte in the Department of Guauguay. This action effectively marks an end to López Jordán's first rebellion, the leader fleeing into Brazil with 1,000 surviving followers, where they are disarmed.

JANUARY 1, 1872. In the early hours before dawn, gaucho followers of a mystic named Gerónimo E. "Tata Dios" Solané—adorned in scarlet, the color of the federalists, as opposed to the blue of the liberals—murder more than 30 immigrant farmers and their families in the remote frontier town of Tandil.

EARLY MARCH 1872. Indian Wars. The Araucano chieftain Calfucurá raises his people in revolt against Argentine incursions into their desert tribal lands, sacking the towns of Alvear, 25 de Mayo, and 9 de Julio with his 3,500 warriors. Rivas overtakes these raiders with his 1,800 troops, defeating them after several hours of hard fighting around San Carlos fortress, near Bolívar (170 miles southeast of Buenos Aires).

MAY 1, 1873. López Jordán returns from Brazilian exile to invade his native Entre Ríos Province, toppling its liberal governor. President Sarmiento dispatches Col. Luis María Campos to deal with this second rural rebellion, and the latter skirmishes against López Jordán's elusive partisans at Guauguaychú on May 9, at Arroyo Ayuí four days later, at Arroyo Lucas north of Villaguay on June 29, at Guauguaychú once more on October 17, and at Arroyo Atencio (a branch of the Feliciano River) on October 25, without being able to deal this insurrection a crushing blow.

OCTOBER 31, 1873. The 500-man government garrison holding La Paz under Lieutenant Colonel Méndez, frantically evacuates this city upon the approach of 3,000 rebels. Méndez loses half his troops to enemy action or drowning and is subsequently court-martialed and demoted.

DECEMBER 8, 1873. Don Gonzalo. The liberal government colonel Juan Ayala, who has also been actively campaigning against López Jordán's gaucho followers, comes upon a 2,000-man rebel concentration under Col. Carmelo Campos at Talita Creek (a branch of the Alcaraz River), killing 200 and capturing 170 before scattering the remainder. Nearby at Don Gonzalo Creek, an affluent of the Feliciano River, lies López Jordán's main body of 5,000 riders, 1,000 infantrymen, plus 500 gunners and auxiliaries to man 8–10 ancient fieldpieces.

Col. Martín de Gainza—Argentina's minister of war, who is serving in the field—strikes across the Alcaraz this same night and, the next day, closes in upon López Jordán's army. The battle begins at 3:00 p.m. on December 9 with an hour-long artillery exchange, after which the rebels attempt an enveloping movement against Gainza's right flank with three cavalry regiments, an infantry battalion, and two cannon. Thanks to their superior Remington rifles and battlefield discipline, the government troops are able to break this assault, then drive López Jordán's column back to the far side of Molle Creek in disarray. The rebels fare no better in the center, nor farther west, being pushed across Don Gonzalo Creek by 7:30 p.m., leaving behind 250 dead, 250 prisoners, and all their artillery. (Another 300 insurgents drown while attempting to ford the creek.) Gainza suffers some 100 killed.

DECEMBER 22, 1873. Government colonel Villar's 300 troopers defeat double this number of insurgents under General Carballo at Nogoyá. A few more minor skirmishes occur, but López Jordán's second rebellion is concluded, the leader retiring into Uruguay.

MARCH 15, 1874. A rupture in the unitarian movement is healed when the Autonomist Party of Vice President Adolfo Alsina Maza merges with the Nationalist Party of Nicolás Avellaneda, creating the united Partido Autonomista Nacional. One month

Julio Roca

Alejo Julio Argentino Roca Paz was born in the northwestern city of San Miguel de Tucumán on July 17, 1843. The son of a former aide to Marshal Santa Cruz, Roca's family moved to the small city of Concepción del Uruguay in Argentina's Entre Ríos Province. At the age of 13, young Julio was enrolled as a cadet in the Colegio Nacional. By mid-March 1858, he was serving as a subaltern in the Army of the Confederation. The next year, Roca campaigned in Urquiza's ranks against the unitarians of Buenos Aires, climaxing with a victory at Cepeda. Roca also commanded a fieldpiece during the Confederate defeat at Pavón in September 1861, without losing his cannon.

After serving briefly as secretary to his uncle, Dr. Marcos Paz, he switched his allegiance to the unitarian cause. Roca fought with the 6th Line Infantry Regiment of Lt. Col. José Miguel Arredondo against Peñaloza's federalist revolt of 1862–1863. Roca then achieved such distinction at the Battle of Curupaytí and other actions during the War of the Triple Alliance (in which his father and two brothers died), that he ended it assigned as lieutenant colonel of the 7th Line Infantry Regiment at Salta. When the federalist López Jordán raised yet another anti-unitarian revolt in April 1870, Roca marched his regiment from Córdoba to reinforce Arredondo in the Mesopotamia district. At the Battle of Ñaembé, he won promotion to full colonel.

Named in 1872 to command the garrison at Río Cuarto, Roca married a wealthy woman from Córdoba. When Mitre's revolt erupted two years later, he moved swiftly with his Army of the North, defeating his former commander Arredondo at Santa Rosa in December 1874. Promoted to general by a grateful president, Avellaneda, Roca became a leading figure in the newly created Partido Autonomista Nacional. Three years later, his chief rival Adolfo Alsina died on campaign, so Roca succeeded him as minister of war. In 1879, he launched the ruthless "Conquest of the Desert," which propelled him to the presidency at 37 years of age.

later, the latter wins the presidential election amid charges of widespread fraud.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1874. Mitre's Revolution. After five months of bitter arguments following the fraud-ridden election of April 14, Mitre's Nationalist Party encourages an uprising to prevent Sarmiento's succession by Avellaneda. When the Buenos Aires newspaper La Prensa is closed for preaching such sedition, the 115-man crew of the 4-gun, 550-ton, British-built gunboat Paraná mutinies under marine colonel Erasmo Obligado, followed by Colonel Rivas's division south of the capital, as well as General Arredondo's garrison at Villa Mercedes in San Luis Province—which in the process also kills its commander, General Ivanowski.

Julio Roca, during his second presidential term. (Author's Collection)

SEPTEMBER 27, 1874. Arredondo reaches Río Cuarto after a three-day forced march, hoping to surprise its Autonomist garrison under his former subordinate, Col. Julio A. Roca. Instead, he finds the city empty.

OCTOBER 3, 1874. Arredondo's Nationalist forces enter Córdoba, but soon depart this city toward Villa Mercedes upon finding no support, plus Roca is closing in from Bell Ville with a gradually increasing army.

OCTOBER 29, 1874. Santa Rosa (First Battle). While marching upon Mendoza, Arredondo's 2,500 Nationalist troops are intercepted 45 miles southeast of the city by 2,000 Autonomist troops under Lt. Col. Amaro Catalán. Arredondo smashes through the defenders' southern flank and disperses them after two hours of hard fighting, during which Catalán succumbs. A total of 350 casualties are inflicted upon both sides, the victors furthermore capturing 80 prisoners. Arredondo then enters Mendoza three days later.

NOVEMBER 2, 1874. Mitre joins Rivas's rebel division at Médanos, 25 miles west of Tuyú, plus 1,500 Indians under Chief Catriel. The next day, they proceed westward, hoping to join forces with Arredondo around Mendoza.

NOVEMBER 3, 1874. San Juan Province rises in favor of the Autonomists.

NOVEMBER 10, 1874. Mitre's Nationalist vanguard under Lt. Col. Francisco Leyría scatters an Autonomist concentration under Col. Julio Campos at Gualicho Creek, south of Las Flores, killing 180 defenders.

NOVEMBER 13, 1874. Learning that Roca is approaching with a large Autonomist army, Arredondo exits Mendoza and takes up a defensive position at Santa Rosa.

NOVEMBER 14, 1874. Mitre's Nationalist army reaches Tapalqué, but because it is closely pursued by Autonomist forces under colonels Julio and Luis María Campos, it continues this same day toward Olavarría and San Carlos. Morale is now starting to fade among Mitre's followers, thus four days later 600 of his Indian supporters switch allegiance.

NOVEMBER 24, 1874. La Verde. At dawn, Autonomist lieutenant colonel Arias enters the hamlet of La Verde and learns that he is directly in the path of Mitre's approaching Nationalist army. Realizing that the latter is closely followed by other Autonomist forces, Arias decides to dig in with his 550 infantrymen—all well-armed with Remingtons—and 350 carbine-toting troopers to check this enemy progress.

Two days later, Mitre's 5,500 followers appear and launch a four-pronged assault against the hill-top ranch and orchard held by the Autonomists. Without artillery or other modern weaponry, the assault columns are unable to discomfit the defenders and quickly suffer 260 casualties before giving up in despair. Mitre orders his army to continue their march westward, but that same night at least 1,500 of his men desert.

DECEMBER 2, 1874. Arias overtakes Mitre's remaining 2,500 followers at Junín and receives the ex-president's surrender.

DECEMBER 6, 1874. Santa Rosa (Second Battle). Roca's 4,500 Autonomist troops arrive at Santa Rosa to find Arredondo's similar-sized Nationalist army dug in along the Tunuyán River bank, with three cannon and two machine guns—having furthermore flooded the fields to the north of this entrenchment in the mistaken belief that their enemy will prove much more numerous. Despite such obstacles, Roca leaves a small detachment to threaten Arredondo's front, while making a nocturnal encirclement to the Nationalist rear.

By 7:00 a.m. on December 7, his main Autonomist army is stationed two and a half miles behind Arredondo and launches its attack. Caught off guard, the Nationalists deploy their reserve to counter this assault, while also fearing an attack from their front. Because of soggy terrain, cavalry prove of little use, so within three hours the Nationalists are routed, suffering 300 casualties and 2,000 prisoners (including Arredondo), as well as the loss of all their artillery and equipment. Roca's ranks suffer 200 casualties.

JANUARY 1, 1876. A pursuit column under Lt. Col. Lorenzo Wintter defeats the combined Indian bands of chiefs Catriel and Manuel Namuncurá at Tigra Lagoon, southeast of Olavarría, capturing tens of thousands of their cattle and livestock. The next day, Col. Conrado Villegas inflicts a similar setback upon 200 natives at San Carlos near Tapalqué.

MARCH 10, 1876. Troopers under Col. Salvador Maldonado defeat 2,000 warriors at Horqueta del Sauce, at the southern extreme of Buenos Aires Province, who are returning from a raid into Argentine territory.

MARCH 18, 1876. Col. Nicolás Levalle defeats 3,000 warriors at Paragüil Lagoon, 50 miles west of Juárez, before they can invade Argentine territory.

MARCH 20, 1876. A month-long operation begins, involving 3,700 cavalymen in five distinct columns, pushing Argentine control farther south into Indian territory, as well as digging a 360-mile trench between Bahía Blanca and the southern portions of Córdoba Province to impede native movements.

Second Battle of Santa Rosa.

NOVEMBER 27, 1876. López Jordán reenters Entre Ríos Province from exile in Uruguay with a handful of followers. After clashing with a government cavalry patrol, they penetrate into the interior and attempt to raise a third federalist revolt.

DECEMBER 7, 1876. At Alcaracito south of La Paz, López Jordán's followers—now numbering 800 men—are surprised by government colonel Juan Ayala's vanguard and dispersed after a brisk hour-long fight. Discouraged, López Jordán proceeds into Corrientes Province, where he is arrested. (He eventually escapes confinement at Rosario, returning into exile in Uruguay.)

APRIL 2, 1879. Roca's Desert Campaign. As a climax to Argentina's lengthy struggle to clear and claim its southwestern desert tribelands for development by homesteaders, War Minister Roca initiates a coordinated sweep intended to pitilessly hunt down and eliminate any native resistance within this region. Almost 5,200 troopers armed with Remington rifles are employed and divided into five columns, which strike out between April 2 and May 10: the 4th Cavalry Regiment under Lt. Col. Napoleón Uriburu departing San Rafael in Mendoza Province; the 3rd Cavalry Regiment under Col. Eduardo Racedo riding out of Villa Mercedes in San Luis Province; the 5th Cavalry Regiment under Col. Hilario Lagos proceeding out of Trenque Lauquen in the province of Buenos Aires; the 2nd Cavalry Regiment under Col. Nicolás Levalle leaving from Carhué in the province of Buenos; while Roca himself heads out of Azul in the province of Buenos Aires with the 1st Cavalry Regiment. These columns are furthermore accompanied by 820 Indian allies.

In a three-month campaign, 1,600 Indians will be killed or captured, and another 11,500 will submit as vassals. Argentine cattle ranches spring up throughout these newly conquered lands.

APRIL 1880. Largely because of his celebrated “Conquest of the Desert,” General Roca wins the presidential election to succeed Avellaneda, although his opponent—Dr. Carlos Tejedor, governor of Buenos Aires—refuses to acknowledge this fact and threatens civil war. On May 10, both men meet aboard the gunboat Pilcomayo to attempt to resolve this impasse, but fail.

JUNE 2, 1880. A shipment of 3,500 Mauser rifles reaches Buenos Aires, which outgoing President Avellaneda has ordered impounded. Instead, they are brought ashore and used to arm Tejedor’s followers; hence, two days later Roca declares Belgrano to be his new capital and Tejedor in a state of rebellion.

JUNE 17, 1880. Col. José Inocencio Arias—marching to join the Buenos Aires troop concentration at Mercedes—is overtaken by two opposing cavalry regiments under Colonel Racedo at Olivera, between Mercedes and Luján. Arias succeeds in dispersing them, suffering some losses in a brief pursuit, before resuming his progress toward the rendezvous. His numbers soon swell to 7,000 men, with whom he marches east toward the capital the next day.

JUNE 20, 1880. Buenos Aires Assault. Forces loyal to President-elect Roca close in upon the capital, an 800-man cavalry column under Colonel Levalle being one of the first to test its perimeter by being repelled in a probe against Barracas Bridge.

The next day, Racedo’s troops storm Alsina Bridge from the south, forcing Arias to redeploy at Los Corrales (modern Patricios Park) after a bloody engagement that inflicts 1,200 casualties on both sides. The defenders are again forced to retreat by afternoon, this time into Buenos Aires proper, which is moreover blockaded by the Argentine Navy on its seaward side. Tejedor requests terms two days later and, after a week’s negotiations, resigns as governor.

OCTOBER 12, 1880. General Roca is officially sworn in as Argentina’s new president.

MARCH 8, 1881. General Villegas leads 1,700 Argentine troopers—divided into three brigades—in a sweep through the Neuquén and Río Negro districts, converging upon Nahuel Huapi and driving various nomad native bands across the border into Chile.

NOVEMBER 15, 1882. The first of three Argentine cavalry columns sets out under Col. Nicolás Palacios from Chocle-Choel Island in the Negro River to pacify Indian resistance in the foothills of the Andes around Neuquén, Río Hondo, and

Chief Manuel Namuncurá, wearing an Argentine officer's uniform after his surrender. (Archivo General de la Nación, Argentina)

Chubut. Eventually, a total of 1,400 troopers are deployed under the overall command of General Villegas, killing 360 natives and capturing 1,730 by March 1883 in a campaign that blocks the Andean passes with border posts and results in the creation of Neuquén Province.

JANUARY 1, 1884. While probing deep into the Indian territory of Patagonia, Lt. Col. Lino Oris de Roa's 100 troopers are ambushed in Alto Senguer Valley by 300 natives, but they repel this attack.

MARCH 24, 1884. The native chief Namuncurá accepts the amnesty terms offered by the Argentine government, surrendering along with his 300 remaining followers to Lt. Col. Pablo Belisle. This marks an end to most native resistance in the south.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1884. The first of five military columns strikes northward into the untamed Chaco district to push Argentina's northern border as far as the Bermejo River.

JULY 26, 1890. Campos's Coup. With Argentina in the grip of a dire economic crisis, Gen. Manuel J. Campos gathers 1,300 troops—three battalions of infantry, the 1st Artillery Regiment, an engineering battalion, and senior cadets from various military academies—in Buenos Aires's Artillería Park (site of the modern Tribunales Palace) to proclaim a revolt against President Dr. Miguel Juárez Celman. The naval squadron offshore also joins in, prompting Juárez Celman to flee the capital by train toward Rosario, while leaving his vice president, Dr. Carlos Pellegrini, to deal with this crisis.

Loyal troops quickly attack the rebels, trapping them in Artillería Park and setting off a night of bloody fighting, during which more than 1,000 people lose their lives. At dawn of July 27, Campos requests a truce to tend to the wounded, then surrenders two days later.

AUGUST 6, 1890. The disgraced president Juárez Celman tenders his resignation and is succeeded in office by Pellegrini.

PORFIRIAN DICTATORSHIP (1876–1897)

Political turmoil continues to wrack Mexico, especially when the increasingly unpopular Juárez announces in 1871 that he will seek yet another term as president. A group of officers—Negrete, Toledo, Cosío Pontones, Chavarría, and others—stage a coup on October 1, seizing the arsenals in Belén Jail and La Ciudadela at Mexico City, while calling for a general insurrection. They are quickly put down by troops loyal to the government under generals Alejandro García, Rocha, and 39-year-old Donato Guerra. But then retired general Porfirio Díaz, hero of the struggle against the French, also proclaims his opposition to the president's reelection from his ranch at La Noria in Oaxaca.

Although crushed both in his home state and Zacatecas, Díaz and Juárez's other enemies persist with guerrilla campaigns until the president dies of natural causes on July 18, 1872, leaving 49-year-old Sebastián Lerdo de Tejada as his successor. The latter retains power, a 2,250-man army under Ramón Corona defeating 6,000 rebels under Manuel Lozada at La Mojonera in the state of Jalisco in late October 1873.

However, when Lerdo de Tejada announces that he, too, will run for another term three years later—thus perpetuating his faction's stranglehold over power—Díaz again raises the banner of revolt, proclaiming the "Tuxtepec Plan" on January 10, 1876, which calls for no further reelections of Mexican presidents.

NOVEMBER 16, 1876. A small rebel army under Díaz defeats troops loyal to Lerdo de Tejada's government at Tecoac, prompting the president to resign from office four days later.

NOVEMBER 26, 1876. Lerdo de Tejada flees Mexico City toward Veracruz, taking ship to New York (where he dies in exile 13 years later).

MAY 1877. Díaz is elected president of Mexico, gradually beginning the task of overhauling its bankrupt administration while installing loyal placemen throughout all departments.

JUNE 24, 1879. This evening, nine opposition leaders in Veracruz are arrested and executed the next day by Gov. Luis Mier y Terán, on Díaz's orders.

DECEMBER 1, 1880. One-armed veteran general Manuel González—a protégé of Díaz—is elected president of Mexico.

DECEMBER 1, 1884. Despite his earlier opposition to presidential reelections, Díaz is once more installed into office, which he will hold uninterrupted for another 26 years (being elected eight times in all and serving six full terms).

JANUARY 28, 1885. Yaqui Wars. A native war party under Loreto Molina attacks the home of 47-year-old Yaqui leader Cajeme (whose Hispanicized name is José María Leyva) at Guamúchiles, in the remote northwestern state of Sinaloa. Failing to find this chieftain, they arrest several of his followers, beat his family, then loot and torch his household before withdrawing. In revenge, Cajeme declares war against his rivals, and a tribal civil war erupts.

Mexico's authorities—who because of past difficulties have ignored the Yaqui, allowing them to live autonomously—now decide to reimpose their rule over this troubled region. An expedition of 2,200 men is assembled and divided into two columns, one under Gen. José Guillermo Carbó, the other under Gen. Bonifacio Topete. While the former remains around Guaymas, the latter penetrates into the Sierra Madre Range, until checked by the Yaqui mountain fast at El Añil (near Vicam, Sonora). Despite bombarding its moat, stakes, and palisades with a small fieldpiece, Topete is unable to carry this stronghold. By July, he retires because of the onset of torrid summer weather.

OCTOBER 1885. Carbó dies, being temporarily succeeded by Gen. Marcos Carrillo, before Ángel Martínez arrives in January of the following year to assume command over all Mexican forces in Sonora and Sinaloa.

Mexican infantry parading through a northern garrison town in 1889, by Frederic Remington. (Amon Carter Museum, Fort Worth, Texas)

MARCH 1886. General Carrillo marches east out of Guaymas (Sonora) with 1,200 soldiers to reduce El Añil, while Martínez proceeds southeastward with 1,500 to subdue the neighboring Mayo tribes.

MAY 5, 1886. After a fierce struggle, Carrillo compels Cajeme's Yaqui to quit their mountain stronghold of El Añil, although most of the natives escape farther northeastward into the mountains.

MAY 11, 1886. Buatachive. Cajeme concentrates 4,000 Yaqui tribesmen at another mountain stronghold: Buatachive, located 10 miles north of Tórim in the Bacatete Range (Sonora). Martínez approaches with 1,400 troops, finding its three-and-a-half-mile perimeter protected by a system of trenches and stone walls.

This night, however, Col. Lorenzo Torres leads 300 Mexican soldiers to the heights above Buatachive, and when Martínez sees his company become engaged the next dawn, he attacks with his main army divided into four assault columns, supported by artillery. The Yaqui are defeated, suffering 200 dead and more than 2,000 noncombatants captured, while Cajeme again escapes deeper into the mountains with a band of survivors. Mexican casualties total 21 dead and 48 wounded.

MAY 27, 1886. A number of Yaqui and Mayo chieftains submit to the Mexican authorities at Tórim (Sonora).

JUNE 22, 1886. Guichamoco. At Guichamoco Beach, Colonel Torres encounters Cajeme, who is leading 1,500 Yaqui warriors across open country for a surprise attack against Gen. Juan Hernández's Mexican garrison at nearby Médano (Sonora), in hopes of gaining desperately needed weapons. Torres charges and easily scatters this poorly armed host, killing 62 and effectively ending organized Yaqui resistance under Cajeme.

APRIL 12, 1887. After living in Guaymas for two months under an assumed name, Cajeme is betrayed to Torres and Martínez by an Indian woman and arrested at dawn. The chief is then taken aboard the frigate Demócrata on the night of April 21, sailed up the Yaqui River, and executed at Córorit four days later as a disincentive to his adherents.

MAY 20, 1887. The Yaqui chieftain Anastasio Cuca—Cajeme's second-in-command—is extradited from Tucson (Arizona) and returned into Sonora to be executed.

JUNE 1887. Believing the Yaquis to be pacified, Martínez withdraws his troops, only to have Córorit overrun two days later by their new leader, Tetabiate (whose Hispanicized name is Juan Maldonado).

JULY 1887. Torres is appointed governor of Sonora, delegating the wealthy 33-year-old local landowner Ramón Corral to actually carry out these duties.

JANUARY 5, 1888. Heraclio Bernal Zazueta, a brigand and would-be revolutionary popular among the citizenry of the state of Sinaloa for "robbing from the rich to give to the poor," is killed in a battle with Mexican Army troops.

Surrender of Teobiate outside Guaymas. (Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, Mexico)

FEBRUARY 1889. After a year and a half of sporadic Yaqui raids, the newly appointed military commander for this district—Gen. Julio M. Cervantes—offers the rebels a general amnesty, which is ignored.

MARCH 1890. Marcos Carrillo replaces Cervantes and resumes the Mexican Army's patrols against rebel Yaqui bands in the mountains of Sonora and Sinaloa.

FEBRUARY 1892. Carrillo dies at Tórim (Sonora), being replaced the next month by Gen. Abraham Bandala.

OCTOBER 29, 1892. Porfirian federales wipe out the rebellious town of Tomochic in Chihuahua, killing or arresting all its inhabitants.

DECEMBER 1896. Col. Francisco Peinado, commander of the 5th Cavalry Regiment, begins a correspondence with the renegade Yaqui chieftain Teobiate in the Sierra Madre Range, proposing an armistice. Four months later, this chief and 400 of his warriors accept the colonel's amnesty, meeting at La Cieneguita between Bacatete and Tetacombiato to finalize terms.

MAY 15, 1897. At a ceremony held at Ortiz Station outside Guaymas, Teobiate's rebel band arrives from La Misa with a cavalry escort from Peinado's 5th Dragoon Regiment and submits to Gov. Luis E. Torres.

Ironically, Díaz's original opposition to presidential reelections will instead see him remain in power until early 1911, his military and political might helping convert him into the so-called Strong Man of the Americas. The early part of his reign is buoyed by many Mexicans' desire for peace and stable government after so many decades of fractious rule; however, his stranglehold eventually results in the cataclysmic explosion called the Mexican Revolution.

WAR OF THE PACIFIC (1879–1883)

Years of bitter wrangling between Bolivia and Chile over the arid but nitrate-rich Atacama Desert are reignited when the 38-year-old Bolivian dictator general Hilarión Daza—his impoverished Andean nation faced yet again with bankruptcy—violates the existing arrangement by levying a heavy new tax in February 1878 upon the Chilean Nitrate Company operations at Antofagasta.

NOVEMBER 8, 1878. Chile's president Aníbal Pinto Garmendia—beset with considerable economic woes of his own due to collapsing metal prices, drought, and a lack of currency—sends a diplomatic note to protest Daza's tax increase, who responds by calling for even stiffer measures. When the Chilean manager at Antofagasta refuses to pay the increased levies, he is imprisoned and the Nitrate Company's properties are seized.

NOVEMBER 16, 1878. While entering the senate chamber in Lima, Peru's 44-year-old ex-president Manuel Pardo is assassinated by Sgt. Melchor Montoya, who is disgruntled at his failure to secure an officer's commission.

LATE DECEMBER 1878. The Chilean government dispatches the battleship Blanco Encalada to Antofagasta.

FEBRUARY 1, 1879. After months of diplomatic exchanges and in protest to the visit to Antofagasta by the Chilean battleship, the Bolivian government announces that it will officially expropriate all nitrate operations, selling off their leases along with its railway two weeks later.

FEBRUARY 10, 1879. Santiago severs diplomatic relations with La Paz.

FEBRUARY 14, 1879. The Chilean battleship Cochrane and corvette O'Higgins under the 52-year-old admiral Juan Williams Rebolledo advance northward from Caldera and deposit Col. Emilio Sotomayor Baeza with 700 marines and soldiers in Antofagasta to prevent the Bolivian authorities from auctioning off the impounded properties of Chile's Nitrate Company. The 60-man Bolivian garrison retires toward Cobija and Tocopilla, without offering resistance.

Atacama Desert

The Atacama is known as “the driest place on Earth” and is 50 times more arid than California’s Death Valley. Its desolate landscape covers 70,000 square miles of mostly sand, salt basins, and lava flows. This desert is often described as “moon-like.” Its rainless plateau runs inland for roughly 100 miles between the Pacific and the Andean foothills, and more than 600 miles north to south between latitudes 18° and 26° S.

Not surprisingly, such daunting terrain held no attraction for Spanish settlers. Throughout the colonial era, it was recorded on maps as the despoblado de Atacama or “uninhabited Atacama.” It acted as a natural barrier, separating Peru from Chile. All communications had to circle around by ship, except for the few vessels calling every year at Arica to service the rich mining districts in the Bolivian highlands.

During the mid-18th century, a few thousand Chileans began settling along the Atacama’s southern fringe, founding the city of Copiapó by 1746. Local mining began, and small quantities of salitre or nitrates were extracted from farther north in the desert around Tarapacá. Overseas demand for nitrates boomed during the late 1830s as the Industrial Revolution gained speed. More than 30 ships departed Huasco in 1838, bearing minerals for plants in Europe or North America. Exports multiplied so fast that a railway was laid between Copiapó and its new outlet of Caldera in 1851. Within three years, that port’s population reached 2,000 inhabitants, while Copiapó’s stood at 12,500.

Chileans and their foreign backers dominated the nitrate business, probing ever higher into the harsh Atacama for new deposits. Up in the Andes, Bolivia sought to reassert ownership over its once-worthless Pacific coastline by contesting Chile’s claim to control as far up as latitude 23° S. After wrangling for a few years, an agreement was struck in 1866, tacitly recognizing Bolivia’s claim by establishing a boundary at latitude 24° S.

However, the Chilean and British-funded operations soon reached that line. A major new nitrate plant went into production by October 1869, drawing raw ore from both sides of the border and exporting vast amounts through a railway completed two years later between La Noria and the port of Iquique. Bolivia therefore protested once again in 1872, so a new agreement had to be made two years later. Taxes on all Chilean operations between latitude 23° S and 25° S were to be split equally between both nations for 25 years. In February 1878, the bankrupt government at La Paz violated this arrangement for a third time, finally leading to open war.

FEBRUARY 20, 1879. Daza learns of the Chilean occupation of Antofagasta and replies five days later by requesting aid from his secret ally Peru, before declaring war against Santiago on March 1. The Chilean government—contemptuous of Bolivia’s poverty and lack of military resources—ignores this declaration until April 5, while Peru (reluctant to become drawn into the conflict) instead offers to mediate. Its diplomatic mission, though, is threatened by angry mobs in the Chilean capital on March 7 for siding with Bolivia.

MARCH 23, 1879. Colonel Sotomayor advances from the mining town of Caracoles with 540 men and defeats a hastily assembled force of Bolivian militiamen under Col. Ladislao Cabrera at Calama on the Loa River. Shortly thereafter, Chilean warships also occupy Cobija and Tocopilla, being rejoined at this latter port by Sotomayor’s land column and bringing his total strength to 1,400 men.

APRIL 2, 1879. Having learned of the secret protocol existing since 1873 between Bolivia and Peru, Chile prepares to sever diplomatic relations with Lima the next day, then officially declares war against both countries on April 5. None of the three nations is really capable of sustaining hostilities. Bolivia’s population of 2 million maintains a standing army of only 2,300 ill-equipped regulars, Peru (population 2.7 million) maintains an army of 5,250 soldiers, while Chile’s 2.5 million people support 2,900 soldiers. The Chileans’ great advantage lies in their pair of modern, 3,500-ton, 300-man, English-built ironclads, the Almirante Cochrane and the Blanco Encalada, which their opponents cannot equal.

APRIL 5, 1879. Despite having been ordered to attack Peru’s main naval base of Callao in a preemptive strike, the Chilean admiral Williams anchors off the port of Iquique instead with his battle squadron, instituting a close blockade in hopes of compelling his naval foes to seek battle. Infirm and obsessed with winning the Conservative Party’s nomination for Chile’s presidential elections two years hence, Williams will act with excessive caution throughout the forthcoming campaign.

Chilean troops paraded at Antofagasta. (Museo del Morro de Arica, Chile)

Meanwhile, Chilean columns pushing out of Antofagasta clear the Atacama Desert of the last Bolivian troops, easily driving them up into the Andes.

APRIL 12, 1879. Four days after Peruvian captain Aurelio García y García has sailed from Callao with the aim of disrupting Chilean sea communications south of Iquique with the 16-gun, 1,600-ton, French-built, wooden corvette Unión of Capt. Nicolás del Portal and the 7-gun, 700-ton, English-built gunboat Pilcomayo of Capt. Antonio C. de la Guerra, they sight the 4-gun, 950-ton, English-built Chilean corvette Magallanes of Capt. Juan José Latorre Benavente off Punta Chipana. The latter immediately flees northwestward. The pair of Peruvian warships pursue, although only the Unión can overtake and open fire at a range of two miles by 10:50 a.m. Ineffectual salvos are exchanged until 1:00 p.m., when the Unión's engines fail. That Magallanes regains the main Chilean squadron concentrated off Iquique, while the Pilcomayo puts into Ilo for coal and the Unión limps toward Callao for repairs.

MAY 16, 1879. Stung by public criticism of his inactivity, the Chilean admiral Williams leaves the elderly, 12-gun, 200-man, 850-ton, wooden corvette Esmeralda and 4-gun wooden gunboat Covadonga to maintain his blockade of Iquique and sails his battle squadron in a feint against Arica, then continuing past to invest his originally intended target of Callao. During his passage northward he unwittingly misses a Peruvian squadron steaming in the opposite direction under 45-year-old captain Miguel Grau Seminario, who intends to lift the blockade of Iquique.

MAY 21, 1879. Iquique. Grau appears off this port with his 5-gun, 1,130-ton, 200-man turreted flagship Huáscar and the 22-gun, 2,000-ton ironclad Independencia of Capt. Juan Guillermo Moore. Both Peruvian vessels are quite old, yet nonetheless more than a match for the wooden Chilean blockaders Esmeralda and Covadonga, which they pursue. However, the Independencia runs aground near Punta Gruesa, then is totally lost when Capt. Carlos Condell de la Haza's Covadonga turns and shells it into a wreck. (The chagrined Moore later quits the Peruvian Navy in disgrace, eventually vindicating his honor by a heroic stand in defense of Arica; see “June 1, 1880” entry.) The Huáscar meanwhile rams the Esmeralda, whose 31-year-old captain Arturo Prat Chacón bravely leaps aboard the Peruvian flagship with a single follower, only to be shot down while his vessel sinks.

A few days after this encounter, Admiral Williams arrives off Callao and learns of his detachment’s defeat. This news prompts him to return southeastward, searching for Grau. The latter slips past the Chileans again and reenters Callao by early June for a refit, in anticipation of launching more seaborne raids.

JULY 6, 1879. Grau departs Callao with the Huáscar and a few auxiliaries, surprising the blockaders Abtao and Magallanes off Iquique three days later and almost sinking the armed transport Matías Cousiño before being driven off toward Arica by the arrival of the powerful Chilean warship Cochrane.

JULY 17, 1879. Grau puts to sea again, his Huáscar seizing the Chilean frigate Adelaida Rojas two days later off Antofagasta, then wreaking havoc among the boats of Chanaral on July 20 and at Huasco the next day. On July 22, he also captures the cargo vessel Adriana Lucía.

Then on July 23, Grau’s Huáscar—in concert with the Unión—intercepts the Chilean troop transport Rímac of Capt. Ignacio Luis Gana, which is bearing 260 cavalry troopers and 215 mounts of the Yuncay Carabineers Regiment of Lt. Col. Manuel Bulnes. The Unión is subsequently detached still farther south to Punta Arenas to intercept war matériel reaching Chile around the Strait of Magellan, while the Huáscar reverses course northward to shell Antofagasta, as well as to attack the ports of Caldera, Coquimbo, Taltal, Tocopilla, and Tongoy.

These distractions in turn allow other Peruvian vessels to carry supplies for Gen. Juan Buendía’s military buildup at Tarapacá, who is to be joined at nearby Arica by 7,000 poorly armed Bolivians marching down out of the Andes under Daza. Given the failure of Chile’s navy to secure control over the seas, Admiral Williams—completely outclassed by his Peruvian counterpart Grau—is compelled to resign in favor of Adm. Galvarino Riveros Cárdenas.

OCTOBER 7, 1879. Angamos. After three months of successful hit-and-run raids against Chilean targets, Grau is steaming northward when he reappears off Antofagasta with the Huáscar and the even swifter Unión of Capt. Aurelio García. He silently penetrates its harbor with his flagship at 1:10 a.m. to find it empty. The Peruvian warships therefore reunite at 3:00 a.m. and continue northward, little realizing that five of their Chilean pursuers—the Blanco Encalada, the Cochrane under Capt. Latorre Benavente, the 412-ton Covadonga under Capt. Joaquín Orella, the 1,100-ton O'Higgins under Capt. Jorge Montt, and the 1,675-ton transport Loa under Capt. Javier Molina—have been alerted at nearby Mejillones and are preparing to intercept.

Peruvian ironclad Huáscar narrowly avoids being rammed by the Chilean warship Cochrane at right, while the Blanco Encalada hastens to join the action at left, by Thomas Somerscales. (Museo Naval de Chile)

At daybreak of October 7, the Huáscar and the Unión sight the Chilean Blanco Encalada, Covadonga, and Loa 40 miles north of Antofagasta, and use their superior speed to circle past their opponents. However, off Angamos Point by 7:00 a.m., they realize that they are being driven toward the Cochrane and the O'Higgins. The fast-steaming Unión is able to race past, being chased by the O'Higgins and the Loa, but the Peruvian flagship is pressed against the coast.

Cornered, the Huáscar bravely opens fire at 9:25 a.m., striking the Cochrane, but not a crippling blow. The Cochrane's countervolleys of armor-piercing shells, starting 15 minutes later after it closes to within a mile, quickly incapacitates the steering aboard Grau's flagship, as well as kills the Peruvian admiral along with his second-in-command, Capt. Elías Aguirre. The Blanco Encalada also comes up by 10:15 a.m., and both Chilean men-of-war attempt to ram the Huáscar, narrowly missing it and each other. However, their combined fire so fiercely rakes the Peruvian vessel that several fires break out, three-quarters of its crew are either killed or wounded, and its flag is hauled down by 10:55 a.m. Exultant Chilean boarding parties come aboard to find the Huáscar's sea valves open, but they are able to close them and steam their prize into Mejillones, from where it will be taken to Valparaíso for repairs and eventually become incorporated into the Chilean Navy.

OCTOBER 28, 1879. Pisagua. Having gained complete mastery over the seas with the death of Grau, the 63-year-old brigadier general Erasmo Escala Arriagada departs Antofagasta with a 9,500-man Chilean expedition, intending to outflank the Peruvian and Bolivian armies with a surprise disembarkation at Pisagua and Junín.

At dawn of November 2, the unprepared garrison at Pisagua—900 Bolivian infantrymen of the Independencia and Victoria battalions under colonels Pedro Pablo Vargas and Juan Granier, as well as 400 Peruvian artillerymen under Col. Isaac Recabarren—are astonished to behold the Chilean fleet entering their bay. The warship Cochrane silences the single 100-pound gun in the northern harbor castle with its opening salvo at 7:15 a.m., before proceeding to engage the southern fort. Yet despite pummeling the shoreline, the first disembarkation of 450 Chilean troops at Playa Blanca is greeted at 10:00 a.m. by heavy gunfire, and the 8,000 invaders suffer 330 killed or wounded before eventually fighting their way atop the bluffs at Alto Hospicio. Another 1,500 come ashore without loss at nearby Junín, thereby establishing a Chilean beachhead for an overland encirclement of Iquique.

Over the next couple of weeks, the Peruvians and Bolivians will fall back along the railroad line as the invaders press inland. Finally, the Peruvian commander in chief Buendía gathers perhaps 10,000 troops with which to march northward from Iquique to catch Escala from both the front and rear in conjunction with Daza's 7,000 Bolivians, who are advancing southward across the desert from Arica.

NOVEMBER 18, 1879. Pozo Dolores or San Francisco. After occupying the oasis at Dolores Railway Station, an advance Chilean contingent from Escala's army detects the approaching host of Peruvian and Bolivian troops under Buendía. This 6,000-man Chilean vanguard—the Coquimbo, 4th Line, and Atacama regiments under Colonel Sotomayor, as well as some chasseur and grenadier cavalry squadrons—hastily throws up a defensive line extending for almost two miles below a small mountain crowned with their artillery, overlooking the Dolores well at San Francisco.

At dawn of November 19, the first of the approaching columns crests Chiniquiray Hill, and Buendía begins deploying his 4,200 Peruvians and 3,200 Bolivians for battle, along with 18 fieldpieces. A few chance exchanges spark a general round of fighting prematurely, ill-coordinated Peruvian and Bolivian thrusts being decimated by the defenders' 34 modern pieces of Krupp artillery, directed by mercenary German officers who are veterans of the Franco-Prussian War. An attempt by the 2nd Bolivian Division of Gen. Pedro Villamil to circle westward around the Chileans' position is checked by artillery fire from atop Dolores Hill, and all the attackers eventually grow discouraged. By afternoon, Buendía disappears from the battlefield, leaving his regimental commanders to lead their men off into the night in defeat. They circle southeastward toward Tarapacá in the hope of slipping northward through the Andean foothills to join the main allied concentration at Tacna. Daza's army has turned back as well because of heat and the lack of any logistical support.

The triumphant Escala therefore resumes his advance and occupies the abandoned port city of Iquique by November 23, from where he detaches Col. Luis Arteaga with 3,900 men to go in pursuit of Buendía's defeated army.

NOVEMBER 27, 1879. Tarapacá. At dawn, Colonel Arteaga with his Chacabuco Battalion, as well as five battalions from the 2nd Chilean Line Regiment of Lt. Col. Eleuterio Ramírez and the Sapper Regiment of Cmdr. Ricardo Santa Cruz, plus a squadron of mounted grenadiers and 10 fieldpieces, appears in the hills west of the city of Tarapacá, believing—through faulty intelligence and overconfidence—that they are about to rout a demoralized segment of Buendía's disintegrated army. Arteaga therefore prepares to launch an immediate frontal assault against the city with one of his columns, while a second under Ramírez seizes the vital Huaracina wells, and a third under Santa Cruz hastens to cut off any escape through Quillaguasa Pass.

Instead, the 3,000 forewarned defenders of the 2nd Peruvian Division under Col. Andrés Avelino Cáceres of the Zepita Regiment move swiftly out of the city to counterattack the surprised Chileans at 9:15 a.m., driving Arteaga back for a couple of miles. Another 1,400 Peruvian troops then join in, having hurried back from their more distant encampments, to produce a full-scale engagement that ends with 800 Chilean casualties (including the death of Lieutenant Colonel Ramírez) as well as the loss of all their artillery. The Peruvians suffer 500 casualties of their own, colonels Cáceres and the elderly Francisco Bolognesi having distinguished themselves during this clash; however, they break off their pursuit at Minta Hill to resume their retirement northwest toward Tacna. After an arduous march through the desert, they arrive there on December 18.

DECEMBER 18, 1879. Having deposed Buendía and left Rear Adm. Lizardo Montero in overall command of the armies in southern Peru, while himself returning from Tacna into Lima, the Peruvian president Mariano Ignacio Prado unexpectedly sets sail from his capital for Europe to raise funds, ships, and other matériel needed to sustain his nation's war effort. Three days later, his vice president, Gen. Luis La Puerta, is overthrown by a popular uprising, and Prado's longtime political rival Nicolás de Piérola is installed into office as the new president on December 23, promptly branding his predecessor a traitor for desertion.

Soldier of the 2nd Chilean Line Regiment. (Museo del Morro de Arica, Chile)

DECEMBER 27, 1879. Disgraced by his abysmal performance in the field, Daza is deposed in a coup at Tacna directed by Col. Heliodoro Camacho and replaced in office at La Paz by the popular general Narciso Campero. Under the latter's rule, Bolivia will attempt to revive its military fortunes, although its efforts continue to be feeble.

DECEMBER 31, 1879. The 500-man Lautaro Battalion of Lt. Col. Arístides Martínez is landed at Ilo, brushing aside its few startled Peruvian defenders before riding the railway to Moquegua, then withdrawing on January 2, 1880.

LATE FEBRUARY 1880. A 12,000-man Chilean expedition under Escala quits Iquique and Pisagua, sailing north-northwestward to disembark at Pacha near Ilo, from where it is to advance inland and threaten the main Peruvian concentration at Tacna, while the Chilean fleet blockades its supply port of Arica. Through such a strategy, the outnumbered invaders hope to draw the defenders out into the open for battle, where the superior weaponry and discipline of the Chileans can excel.

MARCH 9, 1880. A Chilean raiding force comprised of the 3rd Line Regiment, the Naval Regiment, as well as some sappers and chasseurs disembarks at the port of Mollendo and sweeps aside its 100 Peruvian defenders, before sacking the buildings and tearing up railway lines.

MARCH 12, 1880. The 57-year-old brigadier general Manuel Baquedano, commanding Escala's spearhead, strikes inland across the desert toward Moquegua, which he occupies on March 20 in the hope of provoking a Peruvian counterattack.

MARCH 21–22, 1880. Cuesta de los Ángeles. A short distance beyond Moquegua, the vanguard of Baquedano's advancing Chilean army encounters 2,000 Peruvians under Col. Agustín Gamero dug in across a defile called Cuesta de los Ángeles, which proves to be such an unusually strong position that it will have to be taken by storm. Therefore, the Atacama Regiment stealthily circles around the Peruvian right overnight and scales the heights, surprising the hilltop defenders from their rear at 6:15 a.m. on March 22, just as the 2nd Chilean Line and Santiago regiments launch a direct assault against the positions lower down at Quilin-Quilin. Caught between two fires and being shelled by the invaders' artillery, the Peruvians are overwhelmed, although Baquedano's troops suffer heavy losses in gaining this victory.

MARCH 28, 1880. Disappointed with the performance of elderly general Escala, Chile's war minister Rafael Sotomayor Baeza forces his resignation, replacing him with the more vigorous Baquedano.

APRIL 8, 1880. Still unable to lure Montero's main army out of its defenses around Tacna, Baquedano gradually pushes southeast out of Moquegua across the desert, arriving within 20 miles of his objective one month later.

Manuel Baquedano

Manuel Jesús Baquedano González was born in the Chilean capital on January 1, 1823. The son of a cavalry colonel, he studied at the Juan de Dios Romo School and Chilean National Institute until the age of 15. When his father's chasseur regiment shipped out to fight in the War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation, he stowed away. Discovered after several days at sea, the youthful Baquedano was allowed to take part in clashes on Peruvian soil. He even received a temporary commission as ensign in August 1838.

After hostilities ceased, he returned home and completed his military studies. Baquedano became a lieutenant in his father's regiment in January 1845, then transferred to the mounted grenadiers in December. Promoted to captain five years later, Baquedano was in command of a company at the La Moneda presidential palace when Col. Pedro Urriola attempted a liberal coup on April 20, 1851. Baquedano successfully resisted on behalf of conservative president Manuel Bulnes and also fought loyally beside him when a second liberal revolt erupted that September. It concluded with a conservative victory at Loncomilla on December 8, even though his own father and brother Eleuterio were among the rebel ranks.

In April 1854, Baquedano himself was implicated in a barracks uprising so was posted to La Frontera. Rather than waste away on such a remote station, he retired from active duty, becoming a prosperous rancher near the small city of Los Ángeles. Baquedano also remained involved in militia affairs, so was recalled to duty as a lieutenant colonel late in 1868 to help to put down a native rebellion. He was rewarded with command of his father's old cavalry regiment in September 1869 and returned into Santiago to begin a steady rise up through the ranks.

When the War of the Pacific began a decade later, he was a wealthy and well-connected brigadier general. He distinguished himself so well during the storming of Los Ángeles Defile, that War Minister Rafael Sotomayor promoted him in the field to replace General Escala. (Exasperated with Escala's conduct of the campaign, the minister even added that, "Wherever Baquedano goes, there is no gossip.") Despite his subsequent string of victories, the headstrong Baquedano was criticized by contemporaries and historians alike for his lack of tactical subtlety. He often launched direct assaults against fixed positions, resulting in excessive casualties.

MAY 16, 1880. The Chilean war minister Sotomayor reaches Baquedano's encampment at Yaras, near Tacna, but four days later suffers a fatal heart attack during lunch.

MAY 25, 1880. Tacna. After a few Chilean teamsters have been captured by the Junín Hussars and taken before the new Bolivian president and allied commander in chief, General Campero, some 13,650 Peruvians and Bolivians advance this evening from their encampment atop a promontory christened Alto de la Alianza or "Alliance Height," intending to surprise the approaching 14,000 Chileans within a deep ravine called Quebrada Honda on the road into Tacna. However, the allies' nocturnal progression proves so ponderous and confused that they instead return into their original camp, where Baquedano finds them the next morning and initiates a long-range bombardment, while deploying his columns for a frontal assault.

The 1st Division of Col. Santiago Amengual engages the allied right wing under Rear Admiral Montero at 9:00 a.m. Other Chilean units are committed to the attack piecemeal, so they become bogged down and suffer considerable casualties before running low on ammunition around 12:30 p.m. and having to withdraw under fire. The allies are prevented from pursuing by the maneuvers of the Chilean cavalry, giving Baquedano time to rearm his soldiers, then launch a coordinated assault with the full weight of his entire army, which rolls up the overmatched defenders by 3:00 p.m. Chilean casualties total 2,000 men, compared to 2,800 and another 2,000 taken prisoner among the Peruvians and Bolivians, whose armies utterly disintegrate in the wake of this defeat, fleeing toward Puno and Arequipa.

JUNE 1, 1880. Arica. The victorious Baquedano detaches 5,380 men of the Buin, 3rd and 4th Line, Lautaro, and Bulnes regiments, as well as four cavalry squadrons and four field batteries, all under Col. Pedro Lagos, to take the nearby port of Arica before its 2,000-man garrison can escape. The mounted

Photograph of the Chilean flag being raised over El Morro Citadel above Arica early on the morning of June 7, 1880. Note the dead and wounded still littering the ground. (Museo del Morro de Arica, Chile)

Chilean troops depart on June 1 under Cmdr. Rafael Vargas, followed shortly thereafter by Lagos's main body.

Three days later, the army arrives outside blockaded Arica and installs its artillery northeast of the city, while Lagos sends an emissary to call upon the defenders' commander, Colonel Bolognesi, to surrender. He proudly responds with the words, "Tengo deberes sagrados que cumplir y los cumpliré hasta quemar el ultimo cartucho" ("I have sacred duties to perform, which I shall perform until the last cartridge is spent"). The siege batteries thus open fire by June 5, being answered by Peruvian guns ensconced atop Arica's towering El Morro headland and manned by naval gunners from the lost warship Independencia of Captain Moore.

Before dawn on June 7, the 3rd and 4th Chilean Line regiments steal down Azapa Valley and, under cover of darkness, storm Arica's citadel and Fuerte Este, which they carry amid great slaughter, before charging up El Morro and securing it as well within less than an hour. Infuriated by the mines detonated by the defenders, the Chilean troops kill Bolognesi, Moore, and some 60 percent of their men before Lagos's staff can restore order. Meanwhile, Arica is looted and gutted by fires. In one last act of defiance, the twin-gunned, 2,100-ton, American-built Peruvian monitor Manco Cápac is scuttled out in the harbor by its crew upon perceiving the Chilean flag being hoisted atop El Morro.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1880. While foreign governments attempt to mediate an end to the hostilities, the 55-year-old naval vice admiral Patricio Javier de los Dolores Lynch uses the Chilean Navy's superiority at sea to depart Arica with a 2,600-man seaborne expedition—including 1,900 infantrymen, 400 cavalry troopers, and three Krupp howitzers—to make a series of descents in northern Peru. Six days later, they disembark in the port of Chimbote without resistance, roaming the countryside and destroying large estates that refuse to pay ransom. Lynch then shifts his expedition to Supe, which suffers the same fate, before the Chileans reembark on September 17 and move to Paiza, destroying its railroad installations before returning to Arica in triumph.

DECEMBER 18, 1880. After the collapse of peace talks and Chilean general José A. Villagrán's landing at Curayaco to seize the nearby Peruvian port of Chilca as an advance bridgehead, Baquedano begins bringing another 20,000 men ashore two days later farther southeast at Pisco, to unite with Villagrán and jointly invade Lima.

After two weeks of preparation, the invaders begin their overland push, reaching the southern banks of the Lurín River by late December. On the opposite side looms a hastily constructed line of fortifications running for eight and a half miles to the San Juan foothills, held by a total of 22,000 Peruvian defenders—mostly raw militiamen and civilian recruits. The Chileans decide to feign an intent with 2,000 men under Colonel Barbosa at the central position of San Juan, while directing their main efforts against the Peruvian defenses near the coast at Miraflores.

JANUARY 12, 1881. Chorrillos-Miraflores. This evening, Baquedano's 24,000 Chileans begin a silent advance to strike across the Lurín River the next dawn in four columns, their main thrust being directed by a division under Lynch (now promoted to army brigadier general) against the Santa Teresa and Morro Solar strongholds in the resort town of Chorrillos, defended by Peruvian general Miguel Iglesias. Despite heavy losses—800 dead and 2,500 wounded—the invaders overwhelm the defenders by midday of January 13, killing almost 4,000, capturing 1,500, and sending thousands more streaming back toward Lima in disarray. The Chileans meanwhile fall to looting among the wealthy summer homes throughout this district, then the next day visit a like treatment upon Barranco, allowing the defenders time to recuperate from their setback.

Some 5,000 Peruvians reassemble in their last four-mile-long defense line along the Surco River, two and a half miles outside of Lima proper. A delegation of international diplomats led by the Salvadoran ambassador Jorge Tezanos Pinto also intercedes, arranging a brief ceasefire and peace conference at the resort town of Miraflores in the no-man's-land between both armies for January 15. Peruvian president de Piérola and the Chilean commander in chief Baquedano attend, only to be interrupted shortly after 2:00 p.m. by gunfire. Although the invading army has agreed to a ceasefire, its units have nonetheless continued to redeploy for their final assault against the defenders' line, prompting a jittery Peruvian company to open fire when a Chilean artillery battery begins unlimbering within point-blank range. Spontaneous fire erupts all up and down both battle lines, as well as from Chilean warships offshore, while the diplomats flee for their lives. By nightfall, the Peruvian army is shattered. Col. Juan Martín Echenique is later blamed for his failure to commit the 6,000-man reserve, although it is unlikely to have stemmed the Chilean onslaught.

Destruction around the railway station and upper reaches of the resort town of Chorrillos after the Chilean assault of January 1881; photograph by Eugenio Courret. (Author's Collection)

As defeated Peruvian troops retreat through the capital's streets, rioting and pillage ensue. De Piérola gallops toward Chócas, Tarma, and then on to Jauja to continue the resistance in Peru's mountainous interior, and Mayor Rufino Torrico is left to surrender Lima to the victors on the morning of January 16. A select regiment of 3,000 well-disciplined Chilean troops under Gen. Cornelio Saavedra enters the next day at 2:00 p.m., and order is restored. The nearby port of Callao capitulates by January 18.

The conquest of the Peruvian capital brings a virtual end to large-scale fighting, most of Baquedano's expedition reembarking for Chile in March. The discredited de Piérola retreats into Ayacucho and appoints Cáceres military commander for the central highlands, with Admiral Montero acting in a similar capacity farther northwest at Cajamarca. Although Cáceres in particular eventually organizes a successful guerrilla campaign in the La Breña district, these efforts cannot break Chile's stranglehold over coastal Peru. Further complicating matters is the creation on March 12, 1881, of a rival provisional government under the lawyer Dr. Francisco García Calderón in the La Magdalena suburb of occupied Lima, which enters into peace negotiations with the invaders.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1881. As the peace talks mediated by the United States begin to collapse, the military governor of Lima—Admiral Lynch—orders the deposal of provisional president García Calderón, who is later arrested and sent as a prisoner to Chile on November 6.

OCTOBER 1, 1881. At Arequipa in southern Peru, several thousand troops mutiny against de Piérola's authority, being visited a little more than a month later by Admiral Montero, who proclaims himself the new acting president. When Cáceres and his

Occupation of Lima

As the Peruvian army fell apart on the evening of January 15, 1881, the capital's 101,000 residents panicked. Thousands fled, as looting and arson raged in its darkened streets. Mayor Rufino Torrico was left alone to surrender his city to the victors at dawn of January 16. Hoping to avoid the violence that was experienced at Chorrillos, Baquedano was persuaded by neutral diplomats to send in 3,000 well-disciplined Chilean troops under Gen. Cornelio Saavedra at 2:00 p.m. the next day to properly secure Lima. Its nearby seaport of Callao also capitulated on January 18, after Adm. Manuel Villar scuttled the last eight Peruvian warships.

The few wealthy Limeños who stayed saved their homes by bribing Chilean officers. The poor begged for food. Crime persisted, therefore Saavedra asked the courts to reconvene on January 20, 1881. They could not, so he declared martial law as of February 9. Chilean military tribunals were used to punish criminals. Minor felons were flogged, while major crimes were punished by firing squads in La Salud or San Lázaro squares. Residents seldom ventured outdoors, fearing the Chilean soldiers.

The invaders crowded into the city, with the officers taking over the best hotels: Morín, Maury, Americano, Cardinal, and Francia e Inglaterra. Troops were housed in large buildings, and a disturbing trend soon began. A month after Col. Pedro Lagos's battalion occupied the National Library, he was ordered from Santiago to remove the best of its 50,000 volumes. Lima was stripped bare to help offset Chile's war costs. Some 10,000 16th- and 17th-century books and manuscripts were therefore removed. Many other institutions shared this same fate: the senate, the chamber of deputies, the municipality, the University of San Marcos, the botanical gardens, the museum of natural history, the engineering school, and the 1872 Palacio de la Exposición. Even presses were hauled away from the national print offices, while private factories had their machinery removed.

Although Baquedano sailed for home with 6,000 Chilean troops in March 1881, Lima remained strongly garrisoned and off limits. When the lawyer Dr. Francisco García Calderón was allowed to create a provisional Peruvian government that same month, it had to meet in the La Magdalena suburb. The new Congress had to hold sessions in Chorrillos. Admiral Lynch replaced Saavedra as governor of Lima on May 4, and another three and a half years of occupation ensued for the gutted city. Many empty homes collapsed from neglect. The ancient La Recoleta Church burned on March 21, 1882, as did the Teatro Principal one year later. When the German visitor Hugo Zöller arrived at Christmas 1883, he found Lima lifeless, only a single theater offering entertainment for its Chilean garrison.

montonero or “mountaineer” guerrillas in the central highlands also reject de Piérola, the latter has no choice but to resign the presidency at Tarma on November 28 and go into exile.

Over the next two years, dispersed Peruvian units do their best to contain minor Chilean incursions into the Andes, but without seriously discomfiting the invaders' occupation along the coastline. Cáceres wins numerous small-scale encounters—such as at Caxacamara in September 1882—only to finally be defeated at Huamachaca that following July, while Montero has already been chased out of Arequipa.

Convinced that peace must be reestablished for Peru to revive, the war-hero Iglesias then convokes a congress at Cajamarca that proclaims him president, in spite of rival claims by Cáceres in the center of the country and by Montero in its south. Iglesias next proceeds to Ancón, a small seaside community a short distance northwest of Lima, and after considerable negotiation, signs a treaty on October 23, 1883, ending hostilities with Chile. Cáceres and Montero refuse to ratify this agreement until June 1884, and Bolivia concurs only after being threatened with a Chilean invasion.

The victors withdraw their occupying forces by August 1884. Chile has vastly expanded its territory by annexing the provinces of Atacama and Tarapacá, thereby gaining a monopoly over the world's nitrate deposits. Cáceres assaults Lima on August 27, 1884, launching a yearlong struggle to drive Iglesias from office.

RIEL REBELLION (1885)

Fifteen years after the Red River Expedition (see “Red River Expedition”), the Métis and Indians of Manitoba once again rise in revolt against the Canadian government, this time disappointed by the erosion of their former way of life. Riel is recalled from exile in the United States and travels to the main Métis community of Batoche to organize yet another protest movement.

MARCH 11, 1885. Leif Crozier, superintendent of the Northwest Mounted Police outpost 30 miles west of Batoche at Fort Carlton, informs Ottawa that a native rebellion is imminent.

MARCH 19, 1885. Riel proclaims himself president of a provisional government and two days later sends a party to demand the surrender of Fort Carlton.

MARCH 26, 1885. Duck Lake. Crozier, with 98 mounted policemen and volunteers, attacks a Métis concentration under Gabriel Dumont at Duck Lake, only to be soundly beaten; 12 Canadians are killed, as opposed to 5 Métis. Crozier thereupon retreats into Fort Carlton, to be reinforced by another 90 Northwest Mounted Police from Red River under Commissioner Acheson Irvine, who assumes overall command. Feeling that he cannot hold this position, Irvine subsequently orders a retirement down the North Saskatchewan River into Prince Albert.

MARCH 27, 1885. The 60-year-old British major general Frederick Dobson Middleton, commander in chief of Canada’s militia forces, reaches Winnipeg by train to begin organizing its defenses.

MARCH 30, 1885. Warriors under the Cree chief Poundmaker depart Cut Knife Creek reservation and attack the Canadian settlement at Battleford. The residents seek refuge in its Northwest Mounted Police barracks, while their homes are looted and burned.

APRIL 2, 1885. Cree braves under Chief Wandering Spirit attack Canadian settlers at Frog Lake, killing nine and capturing several others.

APRIL 7, 1885. Some 600 Canadian militiamen reach Winnipeg, having departed Toronto a week earlier.

APRIL 12, 1885. Lt. Col. William Otter reaches Swift Current by train, to continue 130 miles farther north and lift the siege of Battleford with 273 troops of the Queen’s Own Rifles under Lt. Col. Augustus Miller, 50 members of “C” Company of the Toronto Infantry School, 100 gunners from “B” Battery of the Kingston Artillery Regiment under Maj. Charles Short, plus a couple of hundred teamsters. This force is backed by a pair of nine-pounders under Capt. Robert Rutherford, as well as a Gatling gun under U.S. lieutenant Arthur Howard. Because water in the South Saskatchewan River is running low, though, Otter’s advance is delayed for two days before he can proceed overland.

APRIL 14, 1885. Otter’s expedition is joined at Saskatchewan crossing by 50 Northwest Mounted

Original patent of the Gatling gun. (U.S. National Archives)

Police under Superintendent William Herchmer aboard the steamer Northcote.

APRIL 21, 1885. Canadian scouts from Battleford encounter refugees traveling downriver from Fort Pitt under Northwest Mounted Police inspector Francis Dickens (son of the famous Victorian novelist Charles Dickens).

Gatling Gun

Improvements in steel and other technological innovations allowed 19th-century weapons manufacturers to experiment with multiple-shot firearms. The concept was tried as long ago as 1718, when the British lawyer James Puckle unveiled a tripod-mounted, single-barreled, flint-lock gun that was fed by a revolving cylinder of prepared charges. A hand-held version known as a "Pepperbox pistol" emerged by the early 1830s. It was followed by the "revolver," patented in the United States by 21-year-old Samuel Colt in February 1836.

Fifteen years later, the French Army unveiled a large battlefield model, based upon a Belgian design. Dubbed a mitrailleuse, it consisted of several rifle barrels clustered into a cylinder atop a gun carriage. Each barrel was loaded simultaneously from a fitted packet of charges, then fired in succession by working a lever or crank. (Because of its appearance, the mitrailleuse was nicknamed a moulin à café or "coffee grinder.") Reloading and firing in the field, though, proved to be slow and difficult, while its one-ton weight limited mobility.

When the American Civil War erupted in April 1861, the 42-year-old inventor Dr. Richard J. Gatling revealed an improved version with 6 steel rifle barrels (later increased to 10). Each included its own finely crafted firing mechanism, revolving around a shaft and being fed rounds continuously through a hopper. Although Gatling received a patent and opened his "Gatling Gun Company" factory in Indianapolis the next year, the U.S. government did not order any of them because of the first guns' poor accuracy, frequent jams, and weight.

Gatling persisted, refining his weapon until Gen. Benjamin Butler bought a dozen in 1864. He apparently used a pair to good effect on the Petersburg front. Union and Confederate onlookers were impressed by the Gatling gun's power, yet only a few more were acquired by Union forces before hostilities ceased the next year. However, improved models continued to appear, eventually making the "Gat" a military success story. It was often copied and upgraded by other manufacturers around the world.

APRIL 22, 1885. One of Herchmer's scouts carries word to the 500 beleaguered residents of Battleford that Otter's relief column is nearby.

APRIL 24, 1885. Otter relieves Battleford, its native besiegers having withdrawn. Simultaneously, news is received that Middleton has fought an indecisive engagement against Dumont at Fish Creek south of Batoche, where 11 men were killed and 48 wounded.

MAY 2, 1885. Cut Knife Creek. Having left a garrison to hold Battleford, Otter ventures forth with 300 men in search of Poundmaker's main Cree camp. At dawn on May 2, he stumbles upon it, shortly afterward fording Cut Knife Creek and ascending a hill. Neither side is prepared for battle, yet fighting gradually spreads on all sides. Rather than charge the surprised Indians, Otter chooses to make a stand atop the hill, where his men are surrounded and shot at from every direction. The young Cree chief Fine Day directs his warriors from a hill south of this battlefield, signaling them with a mirror.

By 11:00 a.m., Otter is so hard-pressed as to order a portion of his troops to retreat, then take up covering positions farther to the rear. When his front lines subsequently follow at noon, the action abruptly ceases. Eight Canadian troops have been killed and 14 wounded, as opposed to 6 Cree dead and 3 injured. Otter abandons his ammunition train and returns into Battleford by 10:00 p.m., claiming victory.

MAY 9, 1885. Middleton's column—including the 90 Winnipeg Rifles—arrives outside Batoche, and three days later charges its rifle pits, compelling the Métis defenders to flee.

MAY 15, 1885. His followers scattered, Riel surrenders to Middleton, who then presses on into Battleford.

MAY 23, 1885. Chief Poundmaker and 150 Cree warriors surrender to Middleton.

JUNE 3, 1885. Inspector Samuel Steele of the Northwest Mounted Police—leading the vanguard of Major General Strange's column marching eastward, having previously relieved Edmonton in May—defeats Chief Big Bear's Cree concentration at Frenchman's Butte, near Fort Pitt on the North Saskatchewan River.

JULY 2, 1885. After a lengthy pursuit, Big Bear surrenders at Fort Carlton.

Determined to put an end to Métis resistance, the Canadian authorities hang Riel at Regina on November 16, followed by Wandering Spirit and seven other native leaders outside Fort Battleford on November 27. Poundmaker and Big Bear are condemned to three-year terms in Stony Mountain Penitentiary, although released early because of their ill health. They die shortly thereafter.

BRAZILIAN STRIFE (1889–1897)

After a half-century of living in relative isolation under its emperor Pedro II, this giant South American nation at last begins to stir, throwing off the monarchy and gradually struggling into the modern world.

NOVEMBER 15, 1889. Collapse of Empire. At day-break, 2,500 men of the 1st and 9th Cavalry regiments, and the 2nd Artillery Battalion revolt at São Cristóvão outside Rio de Janeiro, marching into the capital to confront the government. Liberal prime minister Affonso Celso, Visconde de Ouro Preto, quickly dispatches units to put down the rebels, but these loyal forces instead join the mutineers.

The disgruntled 62-year-old marshal Manuel Deodoro da Fonseca is behind this movement, intended to replace Brazil's monarchy with a republic. The emperor arrives from his palace at Petrópolis that afternoon, yet is powerless to intervene. The next day, he is informed of his banishment, so he sails to exile in France aboard a Brazilian warship at 8:00 a.m. on November 17. Meanwhile, Deodoro da Fonseca declares martial law and installs a provisional government with himself at its head.

NOVEMBER 3, 1891. Plagued by economic deficiencies and growing political resentment, Deodoro da Fonseca sends troops to dissolve Brazil's Congress.

NOVEMBER 23, 1891. Rear Adm. Custódio José de Melo's squadron revolts against the Deodoro da Fonseca regime, firing a single shell into Rio de Janeiro from his 5,700-ton anchored battleship Riachuelo (named for a famous Brazilian naval victory; see "June 10, 1865" entry in "War of the Triple Alliance"). Knowing himself to be surrounded by numerous other enemies, the dictator resigns rather than mount a futile resistance and the next day retires from active service. He is succeeded by his 52-year-old vice president, the adjutant general Floriano Peixoto.

JANUARY 19, 1892. Sgt. Silvino de Macedo leads a populist revolt at Fort Santa Cruz, in Guanabara Bay opposite Rio de Janeiro, being joined shortly thereafter by the garrison of nearby Fortress Laje. Peixoto quickly deploys loyal forces and crushes these upstarts.

MARCH 31, 1892. A group of 13 high-ranking Brazilian officers send Peixoto a threatening manifesto, urging quick presidential elections. He dismisses all 13 from the service, and when they organize a riot in Rio de Janeiro 10 days later, he arrests and deports many of the ringleaders by April 11.

JUNE 17, 1892. Youthful Júlio Prates de Castilhos leads a bloodless coup in Rio Grande do Sul Province in support of a central Brazilian state.

JULY 1892. Anti-centralist lieutenant Santos Lara revolts at Pôrto Alegre, shelling this city before capitulating a few days later.

FEBRUARY 9, 1893. Rio Grandese Revolt. Anti-centralist Brazilian exiles under their civilian leader Gumerindo Saraiva cross into Rio Grande do Sul Province from Uruguay to overthrow de Castilhos's rival regime. They are soon joined by other bands, and these 3,000 united guerrillas come under the command of Col. João Nunes da Silva Tavares.

After overrunning the town of Dom Pedrito, they march upon Santana do Livramento, but break off their approach upon learning that it is about to be reinforced by federal troops. They are then repulsed outside Pôrto Alegre, but gain fresh armaments at Quaraí and come under the command of Col. Oliveira Salgado after he defects from the federal cause and supersedes Silva Tavares.

Shortly thereafter, the rebels are overtaken on the banks of Inhanduí Creek and defeated by Gen. Pinheiro Machado. Salgado and Silva Tavares retreat into Uruguay, pursued by the triumphant republicans, but Saraiva persists with guerrilla hit-and-run raids within Brazil.

JULY 6, 1893. Adm. Eduardo Wandenkolk—one of the 13 high-ranking officers dismissed by Peixoto (see “March 31, 1892” entry)—commandeers the ammunition ship Jupiter outside Rio de Janeiro, then diverts it southwest to the port of Rio Grande, where he gathers some followers and calls for a more widespread antigovernment revolt. Receiving scant support, he surrenders shortly thereafter off Santa Catarina Island to the new, 1,300-ton, British-built cruiser República of Capt. Álvaro Belfor.

AUGUST 1893. Rebel colonel Salgado returns into Rio Grande do Sul from Uruguay, joins forces with Saraiva, then launches a guerrilla campaign throughout this province.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1893. Naval Rebellion. Disaffected by the army’s misrule, Admiral de Melo this evening goes aboard the English-built, 4,950-ton cruiser Aquidabã with his staff and some federal deputies, raising the white flag of revolt the next dawn. He is joined by the 1,400 officers and men aboard the remaining 15 warships and 18 auxiliaries lying at anchor before Rio de Janeiro, plus the naval base of Niterói opposite.

Expecting an easy capitulation as on November 23, 1891, the mutineers are instead disappointed to find the harbor castles remaining loyal to Marshal Peixoto and no sympathetic insurrections occurring elsewhere in Brazil. Moreover, the powerful battleship Riachuelo is undergoing repairs in Europe, and the rest of the squadron is in such poor material condition that only five vessels can actually move under their own power. As a crowning complication, foreign warships present in the harbor band together under a French rear admiral aboard the 3,665-ton cruiser Aréthuse to protect their nationals' interests, restricting de Melo's actions (although not before he manages to commandeer about 30 merchantmen to act as supply ships).

The Brazilian cruiser Aquidabão at anchor inside Rio de Janeiro's Guanabara Bay during peacetime; photograph by Marc Ferrez. (Author's Collection)

Fighting between the rebels and federal forces flares on September 10, ending the next afternoon. Another outburst occurs at 9:00 a.m. on September 13; before dawn of September 17, the mutinous admiral detaches his cruiser República under Capt. Federico de Lorena and the 725-ton torpedo-boat Primeiro de Março, covering their escape past the batteries with a bombardment by the Aquidabã so that they might proceed south to Destêro (modern Florianópolis, capital of Santa Catarina Province) to foment a more widespread rebellion. Meanwhile, Peixoto has patiently mustered 5,000 troops at Santana and reinforced Rio's defenses, so a lengthy stalemate ensues, punctuated by occasional exchanges of gunfire with de Melo's anchored squadron.

During this interlude, numerous foreign powers rush warships to Rio, most notably the United States, whose president, Grover Cleveland, is determined to exert American influence against European interference in this theater. Despite an embarrassingly slow start because of certain deficiencies, the 3,730-ton cruiser USS Charleston of Capt. Henry F. Picking eventually arrives on September 27, followed by the 4,083-ton cruiser Newark of Capt. Silas Terry, the brand-new 8,150-ton New York of Capt. John W. Philip and the 2,094-ton Detroit of Cmdr. Willard H. Brownson, plus the 500-ton wooden steam corvette Yantic of Lt. Cmdr. Henry W. Lyon (soon superseded by Lt. Cmdr. Seth M. Ackley).

This deployment gives the U.S. contingent a marked superiority over all other warships present in Rio's harbor: two British ships (flag: HMS Sirius of Capt. William L. Lang), two French ships (flag: the Aréthuse), the 3,300-ton Italian cruiser Giovanni Bausan and 2,200-ton Dogali, two Portuguese ships, one German ship, the 1,160-ton Spanish cruiser Cristóbal Colón, and the Argentine Nueva de Mayo. However, the first American commander—Commo. Oscar F. Stanton—compromises himself at the very outset by saluting the rebel flag upon entering port aboard the Newark, thereby sparking a formal protest from Peixoto's government, which leads to Stanton's recall by early October and replacement by Rear Admiral Benham.

Also in late October, the Brazilian garrison of Fort Villegaignon joins the mutineer cause, although the loyalists score a victory in November when the ironclad Javari is sunk by their shore batteries. Hoping to revive his flagging fortunes by personally heading southwest to raise another insurrection, de Melo breaks out of Rio on December 1 with his flagship Aquidabã under Capt. Lt. Alexandrino Faria de Alencar, leaving his fellow conspirator admiral Luís Filipe de Saldanha da Gama (former commandant of Brazil's Naval College) to maintain pressure upon the capital. De Melo eventually disembarks in Santa Catarina Province to organize further rebel activities, while Saldanha grows increasingly frustrated at his idled squadron's impotence against loyalist encroachments around Rio.

Consequently, this second admiral leads 500 men ashore on February 9, 1894, under covering fire from his ships, to attempt to capture the eastern town of Niterói. Although initially successful, Saldanha is soon thrown back from its center by loyal troops under colonels Fonseca Ramos and Argolo, then trapped on Armação Point. After a vicious firefight during which Saldanha is wounded, the rebels are defeated and driven back aboard their ships, marking a virtual end to their resistance within the harbor. A few days later, the Aquidabã—which has returned some time previously after depositing de Melo in Santa Catarina—again breaks out of the bay, steaming toward Destêro.

The remaining mutineer ships learn on March 11 that a small loyal squadron—many of its vessels recently purchased, armed, and manned in the United States—is approaching Rio from Pernambuco under retired admiral Jerônimo Gonçalves. Their morale shattered, Saldanha and almost 500 of his men seek asylum aboard the tiny Portuguese corvettes Mindelo and Afonso Albuquerque of Cmdr. Augusto de Castilhos, so that when Gonçalves enters Rio's harbor two days later, he finds its naval rebellion already ended. Peixoto demands the return of the mutineers, but de Castilhos refuses, instead exiting the harbor and setting sail for the neutral River Plate. (Because Saldanha and many of his followers subsequently cross the border to join the provincial rebellion in Rio Grande do Sul, Peixoto accuses de Castilhos of sympathizing with the insurrectionists and severs diplomatic relations with Portugal.)

EARLY NOVEMBER 1893. After a 750-mile jungle campaign against the loyal Northern Division of Pinheiro Machado, rebel leaders Salgado and Saraiva fight their way across the Pelotas River into Santa Catarina Province, seizing the coastal Laguna rail center. From there, Salgado entrains to join de Melo's naval mutineers at Destêrro, while Saraiva strikes north toward Lajes, shifting the main theater of operations northeastward out of Rio Grande do Sul Province.

NOVEMBER 24, 1893. After recapturing the town of Quaraí and defeating a republican force at Río Negro—decapitating his captives after this latter battle—rebel colonel Silva Tavares lays siege to loyal general Carlos Teles within Bagé. He finally disperses his followers into several columns after a month and a half of fruitless watch.

MARCH 28, 1894. De Melo's Last Gasp. His revolution having lost momentum because of recent military setbacks near São Paulo and general dissension among its leadership, Admiral de Melo departs the captured port of Paranaguá with some contingents, heads south, and is reinforced by the cruiser República and four armed merchant vessels out of Destêrro. Together, they give him a landing force of 2,000 men, with which he intends to capture the port of Rio Grande.

However, after crossing the bar, this attempt, too, ends in failure, so the discouraged renegades instead seek to disembark in neighboring Uruguay. When they are interrupted by the local authorities, de Melo chooses to sail on for Buenos Aires, surrendering the remnants of his fleet to Argentina in exchange for asylum.

APRIL 16, 1894. Loyal admiral Gonçalves arrives outside the Bay of Santa Catarina with his new 500-ton, English-built torpedo boat Gustavo Sampaio under Capt. Lt. Altino de Miranda Correia and

One of the heavy army artillery pieces that duelled against the Brazilian cruiser Aquidabão inside Rio de Janeiro's anchorage during the autumn of 1893; photograph by Marc Ferrez. (Author's Collection) sinks the rebel battleship Aquidabã. (It is later refloated and repaired in Stettin, Germany.)

AUGUST 10, 1894. The rebel chieftain Saraiva is killed in a skirmish, and guerrilla activity declines precipitously as 2,000 tattered fighters seek asylum in Uruguay and Argentina. Peixoto emerges triumphant, becoming nicknamed the “Iron Marshal,” while numerous executions ensue.

NOVEMBER 15, 1894. The lawyer Prudente José de Moraes e Barros succeeds Peixoto as Brazil’s first civilian president, while the latter retires modestly into private life, then dies seven months later at his country estate.

MARCH 1895. Cadets at Rio de Janeiro’s military academy rise up against their commandant, suspecting him of being anti-Peixoto. The government quickly represses this outburst, discharging the insubordinate students.

JUNE 8, 1895. Gen. Inocêncio Galvão de Queirós arrives from Rio de Janeiro and sets up his headquarters at Pelotas to pacify the remaining insurrectionists in Rio Grande do Sul Province. Exiled admiral Saldanha da Gama crosses the frontier from Uruguay to attempt to keep this revolt alive.

JUNE 24, 1895. Saldanha’s 150 rebel navy riflemen and 550 guerrillas are attacked north of the Quaraí River near Pedro Osório by much larger federal forces under Gen. Hipólito Ribeiro, and are easily defeated and their leader slain.

JULY 1895. Britain occupies the island of Trinidad, 700 miles east of Vitória, prompting diplomatic protests from Rio de Janeiro. After a year of negotiations, the island is restored to Brazil.

JULY 1, 1895. Rebel colonel Silva Tavares negotiates an armistice, then visits General Galvão at Piratinim nine days later.

OCTOBER 11, 1895. The Brazilian Congress votes a general amnesty for all rebels of the recent disturbances, despite opposition from more rancorous factions.

FEBRUARY 21, 1897. After two previous attempts by a small police force and then a 543-man military expedition under Maj. Febrônio de Brito have both been repulsed by the conservative religious sect of 66-year-old Antônio Conselheiro headquartered 200 miles north of Salvador (Bahia) at Canudos, the government decides to send in a larger force: 1,000 soldiers under Col. Moreira César, including a cavalry squadron and artillery train. However, on February 21 the government forces are ambushed and routed and their commander is killed, thereby provoking an outburst of antigovernment rioting in Rio de Janeiro.

MAY 26, 1897. Cadets at Rio de Janeiro’s military academy mutiny against President de Moraes, considering his government weak. They are quickly surrounded by loyal units, subjugated, and discharged.

OCTOBER 5, 1897. Canudos. After the commitment of 6,000 troops in several columns under Gen. Artur Oscar has failed to subdue the fanatical Canudos rebels, the war minister—the marshal Carlos Machado Bittencourt—personally assumes command over this operation, and his armies gradually fight their way into the outskirts of that embattled town. Resistance finally ceases on October 5, no survivors being found among Conselheiro's followers, and Canudos itself given over to flames. It is estimated that this campaign has cost the lives of nearly 5,000 Brazilian soldiers through disease and combat since its initiation a year before.

Brazilian general Carlos Eugênio de Andrade Guimarães and some of his staff, prior to departing from their Monte Santo base to campaign against the Canudos rebels; photograph by Flavio de Barros. (Author's Collection)

NOVEMBER 5, 1897. While reviewing some of the battalions returning from the Canudos campaign at Rio de Janeiro's arsenal, President de Moraes is attacked by a young soldier named Marcelino Bispo and saved by the personal intervention of Marshal Machado Bittencourt (who is fatally stabbed). A purge of antigovernment politicians and military officers ensues.

GERMAN OVERTURES (1890–1898)

On March 18, 1890, the veteran chancellor Otto, Prinz von Bismarck, is obliged to resign from office in Berlin, less than two weeks short of his 75th birthday. Affairs of state pass into the hands of the 31-year-old kaiser Wilhelm II, who becomes an enthusiastic proponent of sea power. Although careful never to directly challenge the United States, Britain, or France in the New World, Germany will nonetheless soon signal its rise as an imperial player.

As long ago as the winter of 1869–1870, a German squadron consisting of the 12-gun, 380-man, 1,930-ton steam corvette Arcona; the 9-gun, 70-man, 350-ton steam gunboat Meteor; and the 12-gun, 240-man, 1,300-ton sailing frigate Niobe had successfully blockaded Venezuela under Lt. Eduard von Knorr in retaliation for the detention of the merchantmen Franz and Marie Sophie at Maracaibo. Yet despite this early precedent—plus the presence of several hundred thousand German migrants settled throughout South America and military officers advising its governments—Bismarck has prevented any further adventurism, until Wilhelm II ascends the throne.

APRIL 1891. The kaiser orders his Far East Squadron—the 432-man, 3,930-ton light cruiser Leipzig, plus the 290-man, 2,160-ton corvettes Alexandrine and Sophie—to sail from Asia and visit Valparaíso to uphold German prestige following the detention and destruction of two of its merchantmen during Chile's civil war.

AUGUST 23, 1893. During an outbreak of unrest at Puerto Cabello (Venezuela), 100 German nationals must seek succor from French and Spanish warships in its harbor, the new German warship Arcona not arriving until six days later.

DECEMBER 1893. Berlin dispatches the 12-gun, 450-man, 2,850-ton frigates Stein and Stosch on a prestige visit to La Guaira, timed to coincide with the inauguration of the German-owned and German-operated Great Venezuela Railroad in February 1894.

OCTOBER 1897. Disturbances in Guatemala prompt the kaiser to wish to dispatch a warship to protect German nationals' interests, only to discover that the sole vessel available is a school ship for cadets. Rather than send such an unprepossessing representative, he cancels his order, then requests an increase in the naval construction budget from the Reichstag.

DECEMBER 6, 1897. The German warship Stein and the 13-gun, 480-man, 3,300-ton corvette Charlotte appear off Port-au-Prince to intimidate Haitian president Tirésias Augustin Simon Sam into rescinding a fine levied against an alleged German national, Emil Lüders.

APRIL 1898. In Europe, Germany's state secretary of the navy, Adm. Alfred von Tirpitz, uses the numerous requests for patrols in South American waters as a pretext to help pass an immense naval bill authorizing the construction of 19 new battleships, 8 armored cruisers, plus 12 large and 30 light cruisers—a figure then almost doubled by the appropriations bill of June 1900. The subsequent naval buildup becomes a primary cause of the First World War.

Monroe Doctrine

After several years of hesitation, in 1822 the United States recognized the new Latin American republics of Argentina, Chile, Colombia, and Mexico. The next year, Spain and France discussed jointly recuperating their New World colonies with help from Russia, Prussia, or Austria. Great Britain objected. Its foreign minister George Canning even proposed to President James Monroe that London and Washington should warn against any such interference.

Thomas Jefferson and James Madison urged Monroe to accept this British offer, yet the president's secretary of state, John Quincy Adams, favored a more independent course. During a cabinet meeting on November 7, 1823, he said: "It would be more candid, as well as more dignified, to avow our principles explicitly to Russia and France, than to come in as a cock-boat in the wake of the British man-of-war." Convinced, Monroe added a statement into his seventh State of the Union Address on December 2, declaring that any effort to restore European political influence in the Western Hemisphere would be considered "dangerous to our peace and safety."

While America remained militarily weak, this so-called Monroe Doctrine had little effect. But when the U.S. government—fully mobilized with powerful fleets and armies at the end of the Civil War in 1865—threatened the French puppet regime in neighboring Mexico, Napoleon III quickly withdrew his troops. Grant also extended the Monroe Doctrine during his presidency in the 1870s by stating that the United States would not tolerate any American colony being transferred from one European power to another.

As any real possibility of overseas interference faded toward the end of the 19th century, the Monroe Doctrine came to be applied even more aggressively. Secretary of State Richard Olney announced in 1895 that it gave the United States the right to mediate border disputes in South America. Nine years later, President Theodore Roosevelt even claimed that it permitted direct American intervention anywhere in Latin America.

CHILEAN CIVIL WAR AND ANTI-AMERICAN ANTAGONISM (1891)

Toward the end of his five-year term in office, the flamboyant, 50-year-old liberal president Dr. José Manuel Balmaceda Fernández announces on January 1, 1891, that he will henceforth rule without Chile's recalcitrant Congress, which censured one of his cabinet ministers the previous year, and he refuses to approve his governmental budget. The Congress replies by declaring Balmaceda deposed that very same day, then on January 6 places the Chilean Navy under the command of the 44-year-old veteran commodore Jorge Montt Álvarez.

JANUARY 7, 1891. Units of the Chilean Navy exit Valparaíso under Montt's orders, moreover bearing the senatorial vice president Waldo Silva and the head of Chile's chamber of deputies, Ramón Barros Luco, to organize opposition to Balmaceda from Quintero. The president responds by proclaiming a state of martial law, and civil war officially begins the next day. The Congressionalist forces control most of the navy, as the warships Blanco Encalada, Cochrane, O'Higgins, Esmeralda, and Magallanes quickly assemble under Montt's leadership, while the elderly monitor Huáscar is towed out of Valparaíso to Las Salinas to have its engines reinstalled. The merchant steamer Aconcagua is also seized the next day to serve as a supply ship, and 4,500 Mannlicher rifles destined for the Chilean Army are expropriated from the German ship Cleopatra.

Balmaceda retains support from most of the army, granting its soldiers immediate 50 percent pay raises to help ensure their loyalty. Only Gen. Gregorio Urrutia and a few isolated units join the Congressionalist cause. Internationally, Great Britain—whose investments, principally in Chile's rich nitrate deposits to the north, are threatened by Balmaceda's nationalistic policies—favors the Congressionalist rebels, prompting the United States to support President Balmaceda.

JANUARY 8, 1891. The Cochrane and the Magallanes convey Deputy Barros Luco toward Iquique and Pisagua to seize those ports for the Congressional cause, thereby tapping the revenues from mineral-rich Tarapacá Province.

JANUARY 10, 1891. The O'Higgins sails with the transport Amazonas for Coquimbo, La Serena, and Ovalle to seize those ports and gather weapons for the upcoming confrontation. The remaining Congressionalist warships at Quintero meanwhile begin intercepting merchantmen outside nearby Valparaíso, sending at least 18 prizes to their anchorage with coal and supplies.

JANUARY 16, 1891. Presidentialist batteries near Valparaíso open fire against the anchored Blanco Encalada, damaging this Congressionalist warship.

JANUARY 19, 1891. Coquimbo's military garrison under Col. Estanislao del Canto Arteaga has joined the Congressionalist cause; they are therefore attacked around the Cruz de Zapiga nitrate offices by troops loyal to the president. After a confused melee, the colonel retires to Pisagua, and his opponents go to Negreiros.

A second, equally confused clash occurs four days afterward at Alto Hospicio above Pisagua, the Presi-dentialist forces seemingly offering to surrender, then capturing most of the Congressionalists when they mix together. Survivors flee to go aboard the blockading rebel warships, yet when the victorious Presidentialist forces enter the town, they in turn are captured—after which the Congressionalists abandon Pisagua altogether on January 26.

JANUARY 23, 1891. The Congressionalist Huáscar and Amazonas seize the tiny port of Tal-Tal.

JANUARY 27, 1891. Presidentialist land forces recapture the ports of Coquimbo and Pisagua from Congressionalist control.

FEBRUARY 5, 1891. An hour before midnight, the Congressionalist warships Cochrane and O'Higgins, accompanied by the transports Amazonas and Cachapoal, weigh anchor to join the blockading Huáscar off Pisagua the next dawn and reclaim that port from its 350-man Presidentialist garrison under Lieutenant Colonel Valenzuela.

The warships open fire at 6:00 a.m. on February 6, covering the disembarkation of 290 armed men under naval captain Vicente Merino Jarpa at Playa Blanca and another three companies at Punta

Loyalist artillery shelling the rebel flagship Blanco Encalada near Valparaíso. (Illustrated London News)

Pichalo. These forces close in upon the pair of artillery pieces defended by 40 soldiers and a few mounted grenadiers atop Alto Hospicio Hill, from both the north and the south. Naval gunnery pins down the 250 Presidentialist infantrymen and 40 artillerymen holding Pisagua proper, as well as damaging their train. Once the high ground at Alto Hospicio is seized, the Congressional forces overrun Pisagua, capturing almost its entire garrison.

FEBRUARY 10, 1891. Col. Miguel Arrate Larraín disembarks at Sama from the transport Luis Cousiño with 400 Presidentialist troops, initiating a cross-desert trek 50 miles southward to reinforce Tacna and Arica.

FEBRUARY 13, 1891. Col. Eugenio Robles disembarks at Sama from the transport Imperial with 600 Presidentialist troops of Col. Emilio Gana's division, detaching half of them this evening on a cross-desert march 50 miles southward to reinforce Tacna, while personally leading the other 300 troopers against the Congressional foothold at Pisagua.

Robles encamps at Santa Catalina by nightfall of February 14, and the next dawn, his opponent, Colonel del Canto, sorties from Alto Hospicio outside Pisagua by train with the 1st "Constitución" Infantry Battalion, the 2nd Marine Battalion of Valparaíso, the 3rd Marine Battalion of Pisagua, a naval battery and armed seamen, a squadron of the 1st "Libertad" Cavalry Regiment, plus two field guns.

Having received a few local reinforcements, Robles takes up a defensive position with his 339 Presidentialist troopers atop Dolores Hill, above the San Francisco de Dolores railway station. The Congressional army de-trains below, initiating its attack against their outnumbered opponents by 3:00 p.m. on the afternoon of February 15. Within three hours, the Presidentialist force is routed, Robles barely managing to escape with 108 survivors toward the Negreiros railway station. The victors set off in pursuit through Rosario del Huara.

FEBRUARY 17, 1891. Robles's second-in-command, Col. José María Soto, withdraws the entire 600-man Presidentialist garrison from Iquique to join his superior and his San Francisco survivors at the Santa Rosa de Huara railway station. There, they are overtaken this afternoon by 1,200 Congressional pursuers, now under the command of General

Urrutia. A second battle erupts at 3:30 p.m., when Soto sends two runaway locomotives smashing into the Congressional train convoy, followed immediately by a cavalry charge that drives in Urrutia's flanks. The defeated Congressionals beat a hasty retreat, leaving behind 240 dead (all prisoners are shot).

Yet despite this setback, Cmdr. Luis Alberto Goñi Simpson has been able to land from his monitor Huáscar at undefended Iquique, claiming this valuable harbor (the main seaport for Chile's wealthy nitrate trade) by installing a Congressional garrison under Captain Merino. Upon learning of the seizure of this strategic anchorage, Montt's squadron steams northward from Quintero.

FEBRUARY 19, 1891. Panic grips Iquique at 3:00 a.m. when it is learned that a Presidentialist column is approaching to recuperate the town. Some Congressionals retreat aboard their anchored warships, leaving Captain Merino fortified within the sturdy customs house with only 40 armed seamen. Two hours later, the approaching Colonel Soto reaches El Molle—only three and a half miles away—and can see the Blanco Encalada's searchlights illuminating the surrounding hills. Having only been allowed by his superior Robles to bring 200 Presidentialist infantrymen, 15 riders, a small fieldpiece, and a machine gun, Soto takes advantage of the early morning fog to slip into Iquique's streets, closing upon the customs house and opening fire at 6:15 a.m.

Forty-five minutes later, Merino's defenders are reinforced by an additional 40 sailors, and the mist burns off sufficiently by 8:00 a.m. for the anchored warships to open fire with their heavy ordinance and machine guns, driving Soto's soldiers back. Daylong exchanges start numerous fires in hapless Iquique, until the neutral British rear admiral Charles F. Hotham of HMS Warspite proposes a 20-hour truce at 4:00 p.m. As more Congressional forces continue to appear, Soto chooses to surrender aboard the British warship by noon of February 20 rather than renew a hopeless struggle.

FEBRUARY 23, 1891. Col. Hermógenes Camus disembarks at Antofagasta with the Buin, Linares, and Andes battalions, which travel by train to Calama and then strike out across the desert on March 3 to join Robles's main Presidentialist army.

FEBRUARY 25, 1891. Robles and the 560-man 5th Line Infantry Regiment are joined at Zapiga by the divisions of Gana and Arrate, yet the Presidentialist field commander still does not feel capable of mounting an offensive. Instead he orders a defensive concentration at Pozo Almonte.

FEBRUARY 27, 1891. Congressionalist forces mass at El Molle, Colonel del Canto's army from two weeks earlier (see "February 13, 1891" entry) having since been further augmented by the 4th Tal-Tal Infantry Battalion, the 5th Chañaral Battalion, an Armstrong cannon, two Gatling guns, as well as an armored train mounting two machine guns. It is the latter, advancing ahead of the Congressionalist vanguard under marine lieutenant Felipe de la Fuente, that discovers the Presidentialist concentration at Pozo Almonte on March 3.

MARCH 6, 1891. Pozo Almonte. The Congressionalist army de-trains and deploys within sight of Robles's defensive positions at Pozo Almonte. The Presidentialist right is held by 413 men of Arrate's 1st Division, backed by some artillery pieces; in the center and right are 389 soldiers of the 2nd Division under Lt. Col. Manuel Ruminot, while 379 troops of the 3rd Division under Lt. Col. Virgilio Méndez constitute a reserve. After examining the terrain, the Congressionalist commander del Canto and his aide Col. Adolfo Holley decide to concentrate their efforts against their enemy's left flank.

At dawn of March 7, their batteries open fire, but their flank attack is checked by the Presidentialists' Angol Battalion and Méndez's reserve. However, a counterattack by Arrate on Robles's right is repulsed by machine gun fire, after which the Presidentialists begin to run low on ammunition by 10:00 a.m. The Congressionalist armored train spearheads a final thrust that collapses the defenders' resolve, and the Presidentialists break and flee after Robles falls mortally wounded. Only 250 survivors will regroup, with a like number of 5th Line infantrymen waiting at Pachica, to begin a headlong retirement into Arica.

Del Canto's resounding triumph secures possession of all of Tarapacá Province for the Congressionalist cause, assuring a steady stream of money, which is furthermore denied to the president. Neighboring Antofagasta Province is cleared of Balmacedistas by the latter part of this same month, Tacna is taken in April, and Atacama, by the end of May. All of northern Chile therefore falls into the hands of the Congressionalist rebels (who establish a provisional government at Iquique as of April 12), although Balmaceda and his army remain strong in the south. For the latter to prevail, the president needs to acquire the Chilean warships under construction in European yards; for Congress to triumph, its leaders need to buy arms and ammunition abroad to create a land force and directly challenge the army in the field around Santiago.

MARCH 12, 1891. Balmaceda designates Claudio Vicuña to run as his successor in the forthcoming elections, while he arrests political opponents.

APRIL 23, 1891. At 3:30 a.m., two of the few naval vessels loyal to the president—the modern, 750-ton, British-built destroyers Almirante Lynch under Capt. Alberto Fuentes and the Almirante Condell under Capt. Carlos Moraga Suzarte—steal around Cabeza de Vaca Point from Huasco and a half-hour later torpedo the Blanco Encalada from a range of less than 100 yards as it lies at anchor inside the Congressionalist harbor of Caldera. The elderly warship rolls over and sinks, taking down 182 crewmen and passengers. (Deputy Barros Luco, who cannot swim, will survive by clinging to the tail of a cow that heads for shore.)

The destroyers return to verify their kill, then exit and steer southward. At 7:00 a.m., they are sighted by Captain Merino's Congressionalist Aconcagua, which closes to within a thousand yards and exchanges volleys until 8:20 a.m., when the destroyers escape.

MAY 3, 1891. Itata Incident. The lightly armed, 1,200-ton Congressionalist steamer Itata of Capt. Alberto Silva Palma reaches San Diego (California) from Arica to clandestinely receive delivery of 5,000 Remington and 45,000 Lee rifles, plus 2 million rounds. Two evenings afterward, this vessel is impounded at the request of Balmaceda's ambassador to President Benjamin Harrison in Washington, while an apprehension order is also issued for the schooner Robert & Minnie, which is bringing these arms and ammunition southward from Oakland.

When the U.S. Marshal's tug leaves the Itata's side at 4:00 p.m. on May 6 to chase the latter schooner into Mexican waters, the Chilean steamer escapes out to sea. American authorities are outraged by its unauthorized departure. The situation is furthermore exacerbated when the Robert & Minnie is seized near San Pedro (California) by the tug Falcon

Blanket-wrapped survivors of the 1st Buin Infantry Regiment, part of Camus's defeated Presidentialist Division, retreating into the Andes aboard a train; photograph by Carlos Mandiola Gana. (Author's Collection) on the evening of May 9—only to be found empty of its cargo, which has been transshipped to the Itata off San Clemente Island. The Chilean steamer has set sail for home. The 300-man, 3,700-ton cruiser USS Charleston of Capt. George C. Remy is sent in pursuit, and a formal protest is lodged with the rebel leadership at Iquique.

JUNE 3, 1891. The Itata reaches Tocopilla, 120 miles south of Iquique, but the next day—before it can offload its military cargo—it is ordered by Congressionalists leaders to surrender to U.S. rear admiral M. B. MacCann. It thus departs northward with the Charleston on June 13. Chileans are angered by this interference in their internal affairs, especially when an American court subsequently rules in the Itata's favor.

The Congressionalists are meanwhile left with thousands of unarmed recruits whom they cannot train or deploy, while furthermore apprehensive that the 2,050-ton, Toulon-built cruisers Presidente Errázuriz and Presidente Pinto will soon join Balmaceda, thereby shifting the balance of naval power in his favor.

JULY 20, 1891. Three Congressionalist troop transports depart Iquique, reaching Caldera four days later to begin mustering a 10,000-man invasion force at Copiapó.

AUGUST 15–16, 1891. Going over to the offensive, more than 9,300 Congressionalist troops wearing red armbands go aboard nine transports anchored at Huasco and Caldera, then steer southward, escorted by four warships and six supply ships. They arrive at Quintero Bay at dawn of August 20, disembarking their entire force unopposed by 11:00 p.m. (observed from a distance by Adm. George Brown's 4,083-ton cruiser USS San Francisco).

AUGUST 21, 1891. Concón. At 7:00 a.m., the 32 Congressionalist artillery pieces and six machine guns open fire against the 6,400 Presidentialist troops under Gen. Orozimbo Barbosa holding defensive positions with their 18 guns and four machine guns along the southern banks of the Aconcagua River, mostly concentrated between Concón Bajo and Torquemada Hill. Two and a half hours later, the defenders around Verdejo Ford above Concón Alto break and flee, allowing the Congressionalist 3rd Brigade of Brig. Gen. Enrique del Canto to thrust across the river, after which del Canto's 1st Brigade also pushes inland from Concón Bajo near the river mouth with support fire from the O'Higgins and the Esmeralda.

After several hours of fierce fighting, the out-flanked Presidentialists scatter by 4:00 p.m. in the direction of Viña del Mar, Quilpué, and Quillota, leaving behind 2,200 dead or wounded, 2,000 prisoners, plus all their guns and ammunition. This victory has claimed more than 522 Congressionalist dead or missing, as well as 600 wounded, yet they soon resume their advance upon the nearby port city of Valparaíso.

The defeated Balmacedistas manage to regroup outside the port, along with fresh reinforcements arriving from Concepción and Santiago, and throw up a new semicircular line of trenches running inland from Fort Callao on the southern shore of Marga Marga Inlet. The morale of these 8,000 men is nevertheless shaken, and ammunition is scarce. When the victorious Congressionalists appear on the evening of August 22, however, they content themselves with merely entrenching a half-mile away and commencing a long-range bombardment the next morning, supplemented by the vessels Cochrane, Esmeralda, Aconcagua, and Cachapoal offshore.

The Balmacedista commanders soon withdraw farther inland to prepare more new positions atop Placilla Heights, thus barring the road leading inland to the capital. They also detach a lesser force to hold Quillota. The Congressionalists reply by sending columns of their own to hold Quilpué and cut the railway at Las Cucharas, before following their retreating foes. Significantly, they are joined by various regiments defecting from Balmaceda's cause.

AUGUST 28, 1891. Placilla. The Congressionalist army, still 9,300 strong, attacks the 9,200 Presidentialists gathered into trenches around Placilla Heights, backed by 40 fieldpieces. In a brutal struggle, the attackers smash through and kill 1,115 defenders and wound 2,500, while capturing many more. Congressionalist casualties total 2,070 men, but the road into the capital lies open.

AUGUST 29, 1891. In the wake of his army's defeat at Placilla, Balmaceda delegates power to Baquedano as interim president, before fleeing into the Dead Balmacedista gunners, fallen around their fieldpiece at Placilla; photograph by Emilio Magner. (Author's Collection)

Argentine Embassy. The victorious Congressionalists enter Santiago the next day amid widespread looting and torching of businesses and homes owned by Balmaceda supporters.

Order is restored, and Montt is promoted to vice admiral, being acclaimed as acting president the next day (although he will not actually be elected until October—running unopposed—and installed as of December 26). The trapped Balmaceda commits suicide on September 19, the day after his official term in office expires.

OCTOBER 6, 1891. Released under bond, the Itata departs San Diego (California) for Valparaíso.

OCTOBER 16, 1891. Baltimore Incident. This evening, a fight erupts outside the “True Blue” Bar in the red-light district of Valparaíso between a mob of Chileans—angry at American interventions in their country—and some of the 117 sailors on liberty from Capt. Winfield Scott Schley’s anchored 4,400-ton cruiser USS Baltimore. Two American sailors are killed and 17 wounded, 5 of them seriously, leading to a serious downturn in diplomatic relations. Eventually, Santiago pays $75,000 in compensatory damages so that this crisis might be defused.

Pax Americana (1898–1938)

Poor Mexico! So far from God, and so close to the United States.

—Mexican president Porfirio Díaz

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR (1898)

Ever since the beginning of Cuba's latest insurrection in 1895, public opinion in the United States has been building in favor of intervention against Spain, especially after the arrival of a Spanish army (whose numbers eventually swell to 20,000 men) under Gen. Valeriano Weyler—dubbed “the Butcher” by William Randolph Hearst’s jingoistic New York Journal—who resorts to mass arrests, concentration camps, and executions to stifle rebel sentiment.

These tactics fail, and Weyler is replaced by Gen. Ramón Blanco y Arenas, while Spanish forces are largely defeated and driven out of Cuba’s rural areas by the winter of 1897–1898, being reduced to merely sustaining garrisons within major towns. By this time, even many members of the land-owning elite also support the notion of an American intervention, simply to restore public order and trade, while the Hearst-Pulitzer newspaper feud in New York City further fans American passions with their sensationalistic, anti-Spanish rhetoric.

JANUARY 1, 1898. The American North Atlantic Squadron of Adm. Montgomery Sicard begins gathering in the Gulf of Mexico, near Florida’s Dry Tortugas.

JANUARY 12, 1898. A pro-Spanish riot occurs in Havana, involving numerous uniformed officers, who ransack independent Cuban newspaper offices and prompt the U.S. consul-general to request protection from Washington.

JANUARY 15, 1898. Spain’s governor general establishes a guard around the U.S. Consulate in Havana to protect it from attacks by Spanish zealots.

JANUARY 24, 1898. The 354-man, 6,700-ton battleship USS Maine of Capt. Charles D. Sigsbee is ordered to Havana to protect American interests, arriving the next day.

FEBRUARY 9, 1898. Enrique Dupuy de Lôme, the Spanish ambassador in Washington, writes disparagingly of Republican president William McKinley in a private letter, which is published by the American press, thus forcing his resignation.

FEBRUARY 15, 1898. Loss of the Maine. At 9:40 p.m., this battleship suddenly explodes at anchor in Havana’s harbor, killing 266 of its crew and

Yellow Journalism

This term was coined during the heated newspaper rivalry between Joseph Pulitzer’s New York World and William Randolph Hearst’s New York Journal. Both were cheap, mass-circulation dailies vying for readers in New York City at the end of the 19th century by filling their pages with lurid articles. The competition began when Hearst bought the Journal in 1895, challenging Pulitzer’s World for advertising revenues. By the next year, he was hiring away employees dissatisfied with the ill-tempered Pulitzer. Both newspapers were Democratic Party organs, sympathetic to labor and immigrant causes.

Hearst also embraced the topic of Cuban freedom, so tales of Spanish brutality soon came to dominate the Journal’s front pages. Pulitzer’s World responded in kind, and both papers resorted to questionable tactics such as offering huge rewards for information on who bombed the USS Maine. Together they clamored for armed action against Spain. A week after Washington finally authorized hostilities, Hearst ran the headline “How Do You Like the Journal’s War?” before sailing for Cuba to personally report on the fighting as a correspondent.

Yet modern research casts doubt on the publisher’s claim to having ignited the conflict. Both dailies exercised little influence over other publications in the country, and no clout with the conservative Republican administration of President William McKinley in Washington. Their brazen editorializing was mostly confined to working-class New York. America’s intervention sprang from a much broader groundswell of concern over deteriorating conditions on a neighboring island.

The battleship USS Maine entering Havana's harbor for the last time. (U.S. Naval Historical Center) wounding 52 others. A naval court of inquiry is appointed by President McKinley five days later, which travels to Cuba under the 58-year-old captain William Thomas Sampson to investigate.

FEBRUARY 23, 1898. Several American warships begin gathering at Key West, Florida.

MARCH 6, 1898. The 494-man, 10,200-ton battleship USS Oregon of Capt. Charles E. Clark departs Puget Sound for San Francisco, then to continue toward Callao and around Cape Horn into the Caribbean theater, accompanied by the 144-man, 1,000-ton gunboat Marietta.

MARCH 11, 1898. The American War Department begins mobilization, despite wavering by McKinley.

MARCH 14, 1898. Spanish rear admiral Pascual Cervera y Topete departs Cadiz toward the Cape Verde Islands to begin marshalling an expedition to reinforce Puerto Rico and Cuba.

MARCH 19, 1898. The report of the American court of inquiry into the Maine explosion is completed and presented to Congress nine days later. While unable to determine its exact cause, the members do not believe this detonation to have originated within the ship—that is, from unstable ammunition—but rather from outside, suggesting a Spanish mine. The next day, March 29, simultaneous resolutions declaring war against Spain and recognizing Cuban independence are introduced into Congress, although not passed until April 20.

APRIL 5, 1898. American consuls in Cuba are recalled.

APRIL 9, 1898. Desperately attempting to fend off war, the Spanish foreign minister informs Stewart L. Woodford, American ambassador in Madrid, that his government will grant an immediate armistice to Cuban rebels, submit the Maine controversy to arbitration, and accept virtually all of America's demands. Nevertheless, war fever in the United States is too far excited for reconciliation.

APRIL 11, 1898. McKinley asks Congress for a declaration of war, which is passed one week later and signed by the president on April 20, and hostilities are officially authorized to commence the next day.

APRIL 22, 1898. The U.S. Navy's North Atlantic Squadron begins a blockade of Cuba. The first shots of the war are actually fired when the 1,400-ton American gunboat Nashville captures the Spanish steamer Buenaventura that is approaching Havana out of the Gulf of Mexico. Numerous other interceptions follow.

APRIL 25, 1898. In Washington, the Teller Amendment is added to the American declaration of war, whereby the U.S. government declares that it will make no attempt to establish control over Cuba.

APRIL 27, 1898. Shortly before 1:00 p.m., acting Rear Admiral Sampson shells the Spanish batteries at Point Rubalcava outside Matanzas in northwestern Cuba for half an hour with his 562-man, 8,150-ton armored cruiser New York (flag); 339-man, 3,200-ton cruiser Cincinnati; and 230-man, 6,060-ton monitor Puritan. Little damage is inflicted.

APRIL 29, 1898. At midnight, Cervera slips out of San Vicente in the Cape Verde Islands with his 7,000-ton cruisers Infanta María Teresa (flag), Vizcaya, and Almirante Oquendo; 6,840-ton Cristóbal Colón (formerly the Italian Giuseppe Garibaldi II); 380-ton destroyers Furor, Plutón, and Terror, plus the hospital ship Alicante. Despite Washington's exaggerated fears as to this squadron's strength and objectives, the Spanish men-of-war are poorly armed and manned—the cruiser Colón only having two dummy 10-inch guns mounted, while the destroyers must be towed across the Atlantic toward the West Indies.

Also on this date, the 262-man, 2,000-ton cruiser Marblehead and 64-man, 500-ton armed yacht Eagle exchange fire with the Spanish torpedo gunboat Galicia and gunboat Vasco Núñez de Balboa off Cienfuegos in south central Cuba, causing minor damage.

APRIL 30, 1898. The battleship Oregon and gunboat Marietta reach Rio de Janeiro and recoil from the 6,000-ton purchased ship Niterói (renamed the Buffalo), while maintaining a careful watch for the Spanish destroyer Temerario, reputedly operating in these same waters.

MAY 8, 1898. The 25-man torpedo boat Winslow of Lt. J. B. Bernadou enters Cárdenas Bay in northwestern Cuba, only to be driven out by accurate counterfire from the 40-ton Spanish gunboats Ligera and Alerta, plus the armed tug Antonio López.

Operations in Cuba throughout 1898.

Battle of Manila

On April 21, 1898, the 60-year-old commodore George Dewey was anchored in Hong Kong Bay with the U.S. Asiatic Fleet when he was informed by telegraph that war had been declared against Spain. Three days later, he was instructed to launch a long-planned attack against the naval forces defending Spain's Pacific colonial capital of Manila in the Philippines. Dewey therefore shifted his warships 30 miles east into Mirs Bay on the Chinese coast to prepare for combat and await the latest intelligence being brought from Manila by its displaced American consul, Oscar F. Williams.

Immediately after this diplomat came aboard on April 27, 1898, Dewey set sail, checking Subic Bay three days later. Spanish rear admiral Patricio Montojo y Pasarón had hoped to make a stand inside with his overmatched squadron, but since its shore batteries were incomplete, he had withdrawn into the Spaniards' main anchorage of Cavite (seven miles southwest of the Philippine capital, inside Manila Bay). The American squadron arrived outside that same afternoon, standing in through the Boca Grande southern channel shortly before midnight. They then steamed across Manila Bay's vast expanse until the capital and Cavite came within sight at dawn on Sunday, May 1.

The Spanish defenders opened fire at 5:15 a.m., yet so feebly that Dewey steered directly toward Montojo's anchored warships without replying until a half-hour later. Led by his powerful 410-man, 5,600-ton armored cruiser Olympia under Capt. Charles V. Gridley, plus the 4,600-ton cruiser Baltimore, 3,200-ton Raleigh and Boston, and two gunboats, the U.S. squadron outclassed their obsolete, unarmored, wooden foes. A one-sided exchange ensued, lasting almost two hours, the American warships circling and hurling salvoes until Dewey—misinformed that his ships were running low on ammunition—retired a few miles out of range.

Learning that there was in fact no ammunition deficiency, Dewey refreshed his crews with a light meal, then resumed his bombardment at 11:16 a.m. Montojo's few surviving vessels meanwhile crept into the shallows, where they were finished off within the hour. The Spaniards suffered 371 total casualties, compared to only 7 American sailors lightly wounded.

When news of this lopsided victory reached Washington nearly a week later, it was greeted with exultation. Being led to believe that untested U.S. forces might fare badly against European professionals, the American public now lionized Dewey's achievement and wholeheartedly embraced the war. An expedition of 11,000 U.S. troops under Maj. Gen. Wesley Merritt was dispatched to join the distant fleet, taking Manila that same August. Permanent American control was established over the Philippines for several decades.

MAY 11, 1898. Winslow reenters Cárdenas Bay accompanied by the armed revenue cutter Hudson of Lieutenant Newcomb, backed up by the 198-man, 1,400-ton gunboat Wilmington and 154-man, 1,170-ton cruiser Machias farther out at sea. When the lighter U.S. vessels probe into shoal waters, they are ambushed by a masked Spanish battery using smokeless powder. The Winslow suffers five killed and a like number wounded during an hour-long exchange, before being towed out of danger by the Hudson. The Spaniards suffer two killed and a dozen wounded aboard their armed tug Antonio López, which is disabled along with the Ligera by long-range American salvoes.

This same day on Cuba's southern coast, the cruiser Marblehead and gunboat Nashville shell the beach outside Cienfuegos, providing cover fire for an attempt by 55 men aboard four boats to cut its three underwater telegraphic cables. Two are severed, despite three hours of Spanish rifle fire that kills four Americans and injures five more. The armed revenue cutter Windom then stands close inshore, bringing down Cienfuegos's lighthouse with its four-inch gun.

MAY 12, 1898. Shelling of San Juan. Before dawn, Sampson approaches the Puerto Rican capital out of the northeast with the 265-man, 2,000-ton cruiser Detroit in his van, followed by the 590-man, 11,300-ton battleships Iowa (flag) and 570-man, 10,200-ton Indiana; the cruiser New York; the 180-man, 4,000-ton monitors Amphitrite and Terror; the 32-man torpedo boat Porter; the 270-man, 2,000-ton cruiser Montgomery; plus the 32-man armed tug Wompatuck, hoping to catch Cervera inside.

At 5:17 a.m., the Iowa opens fire against the outer Spanish defenses and is joined by the other American capital ships, as Sampson's squadron slowly circles offshore for the next three hours. The Spaniards respond with two-dozen artillery pieces; marksmanship is poor on both sides, so only minor damage is inflicted. Realizing that the Spanish battle squadron is not at anchor inside, the American admiral thereupon reverses course westward—unaware that, this very same day, Cervera has been sighted off Martinique, detaching his destroyer Terror and hospital ship Alicante into Fort-de-France for repairs before continuing for Curaçao.

MAY 13, 1898. The 11,600-ton armed auxiliary Saint Louis of Capt. Caspar F. Goodrich drags the seabed a few miles east of San Juan de Puerto Rico, cutting the underwater telegraphic cable leading to Saint Thomas.

MAY 14, 1898. The 12-year-old, three-masted, 1,130-ton Spanish cruiser Conde del Venadito sorties from Havana with the equally ancient, 570-ton torpedo gunboat Nueva España to engage American blockaders east of this port. One hour later, they encounter the 135-man, 1,000-ton gunboats Vicksburg and Annapolis—soon supported by the auxiliaries Mayflower, Wasp, Tecumseh, and Osceola—which drive the Spaniards back under the protection of Santa Clara Battery by nightfall.

At 8:00 a.m. this same day, Cervera's flagship and the Vizcaya enter Willemstad (Curaçao) for coal and provisions, while the Oquendo and two destroyers remain outside. After hastily resupplying, the Spanish squadron departs at 5:15 p.m. of May 15, pretending to steer north-northeast toward Puerto Rico, before altering course northwest toward Santiago de Cuba.

MAY 16, 1898. After nightfall, the Saint Louis and the Wompatuck stand in close to Santiago, attempting to raise and sever its two underwater telegraphic cables to Jamaica. The batteries open fire, and a pair of Spanish vessels sortie, obliging the Americans to retire out of range.

The next morning at 10:00 a.m., the Saint Louis and the Wompatuck resume their efforts, cutting one cable before withdrawing eastward. They then try to break the Guantánamo-to-Haiti line as well, only to be chased off by the 106-ton Spanish gunboat Sandoval.

MAY 17, 1898. While racing toward Key West for more precise intelligence on Cervera's movements, Sampson's flagship the New York intercepts the 750-ton Spanish vessel Carlos F. Rosas off Havana. His straggling squadron overtakes the American admiral two days later.

MAY 18, 1898. The battleship Oregon reaches Bridgetown (Barbados) alone, having taken two months to sail 14,000 miles around Cape Horn from San Francisco. (This immensely long detour will eventually

The battleship USS Oregon at anchor inside Rio de Janeiro's bay, as photographed in early May 1898 by Marc Ferrez; note how its turrets are swivelled into firing position to cover the harbor entrance in case of a surprise attack. (Author's Collection) revive Washington's interest in securing a shorter passage, either across southern Nicaragua or the Isthmus of Panama.)

MAY 19, 1898. At 5:30 a.m., Cervera's squadron slips into Santiago de Cuba (population 50,000) and comes to anchor two hours later. The city's beleaguered 9,000-man garrison under Gen. Arsenio Linares—its pay already 10 months in arrears—is ill prepared to meet the demands of an additional 2,200 seamen, plus their warships.

MAY 20, 1898. In international waters three miles off Cap du Môle (northwestern Haiti), the Wompatuck cuts the underwater telegraphic cable leading to Guantánamo.

MAY 23, 1898. The Red Cross ship State of Texas, with Clara Barton aboard, reaches Tampa in anticipation of a U.S. invasion of Cuba.

MAY 24, 1898. The Oregon appears off Jupiter Inlet (Florida) and reports its arrival to Washington.

MAY 26, 1898. Commo. Winfield Scott Schley arrives 20 miles off Santiago with the battleships Iowa, the 495-man, 10,200-ton Massachusetts, and the 433-man, 6,300-ton Texas; the 550-man, 9,100-ton armored cruisers Brooklyn (flag) and Marblehead; the armed auxiliaries Vixen of 165 tons, Hawk, and Eagle; and the collier Merrimac to learn whether Cervera is inside. The 477-man, 8,050-ton cruiser Minneapolis, plus the 11,600-ton armed auxiliaries Saint Paul and 10,800-ton Yale (ex-Paris) join him this same evening.

MAY 28, 1898. The U.S. tugs Uncas and Leyden demolish a Spanish blockhouse five miles east of Cárdenas (Cuba).

MAY 29, 1898. After cruising indecisively off Santiago for three days, Schley sights Cervera's men-of-war lying inside at 7:40 a.m., receiving some rounds at extreme long range from Colón.

MAY 31, 1898. Shortly after 1:00 p.m., Schley leads the battleships Massachusetts and Iowa, plus the recently joined 365-man, 3,600-ton cruiser New Orleans, in toward Santiago's harbor mouth and opens fire against its outer defenses and the cruiser Colón one hour later. A brief exchange of shots results in no damage.

The next dawn, Sampson arrives to assume command over this U.S. fleet, while the Spaniards stretch a boom across the entrance.

JUNE 3, 1898. At 3:30 a.m., Lt. Richmond P. Hobson steams the collier Merrimac into Santiago's entrance and scuttles it under fire, in a vain attempt to block its channel and trap Cervera inside. However, his block ship comes to rest a little out of position, leaving a narrow passage out to sea.

JUNE 6, 1898. At 7:40 a.m., Sampson leads his fleet in two columns against Santiago's outer defenses and opens fire 20 minutes later. Although thousands of shells are expended, only 3 Spaniards are killed and 51 wounded ashore, plus another 5 dead and 14 injured aboard the decrepit Rey Alfonso XII-class cruiser Reina Mercedes, after which the Americans withdraw.

JUNE 7, 1898. Guantánamo. At dawn, five of Sampson's vessels appear off the town of Caimanera, and the Spanish batteries at Playa del Este—called "Windward Point" by the Americans—and Cayo Toro are destroyed by bombardments from the Marblehead under Capt. Bowman H. McCalla; the 282-man, 6,900-ton converted cruiser Yankee (ex-mail steamer El Norte); and the Saint Louis, which together will also force the Spanish gunboat Sandoval to seek shelter behind minefields in Guantánamo's shallow upper bay.

The Saint Louis then cuts the lower bay's boom, allowing the American squadron to penetrate as far as Fisherman's Point, where it anchors and is contacted from ashore by two Cuban guerrilla officers. These men report that Gen. Calixto García—of "message to García" fame—holds the western side with his rebel forces. The nearest Spanish concentration is the 7,000-man isolated garrison of Gen. Félix Pareja, located 14 miles inland at the town of Guantánamo itself. The Americans therefore decide to remain off Caimanera until a full-fledged U.S. landing force can arrive in their support.

Two days later, on June 9, the Marblehead and the 117-man Dolphin again fire upon the Spanish defenses, allowing 60 marines from the battleship Oregon and the Marblehead to establish a beachhead the next dawn at Playa del Este. That same afternoon of June 10, the U.S. troop transport Panther (ex-merchantman Venezuela) arrives with a 645-man marine battalion and four guns under Lt. Col. Robert W. Huntington and lands them near Caimanera to set up camp. Spanish resistance consists of occasional sniper rounds fired from Cuzco Hill and the surrounding jungle, killing four Americans and wounding another.

Extemporized Spanish shore battery installed at Socapa to cover the west end of Santiago's harbor entrance; it consisted of 6-inch Hontoria rapid-fire guns apparently removed from the cruiser Reina Mercedes. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

A feeble counterattack is launched against the American encampment on June 12, during which two more marines are killed and seven wounded. At dawn on June 14, Huntington advances to circle south around Cuzco Hill, guided by 50 Cuban scouts. This maneuver outflanks the surprised Spaniards at Cuzco Well, allowing the marines and Cubans to drive them inland, inflicting 60 fatalities and capturing 18. Two Cubans are killed, and 3 marines and 2 Cubans are wounded during this exchange.

On June 16, the Texas and the Marblehead again shell the Spanish fort on Cayo Toro, reducing it to rubble one hour later, which secures Guantánamo Bay as a haven for U.S. naval operations along the entire coast.

JUNE 10, 1898. The Saint Louis intercepts the British collier Twickenham off Jamaica, carrying 3,000 tons of coal for Cervera.

JUNE 13, 1898. The Spanish torpedo gunboat Galicia approaches the Yankee off Cienfuegos, apparently mistaking it for an unarmed merchantman.

When the latter opens fire, the Spaniards retire into port, their retreat covered by shore batteries and their consort Balboa.

JUNE 14, 1898. The 69-man, 930-ton "dynamite cruiser" Vesuvius joins Sampson off Santiago, adding its high-explosive gun-cotton shells to the intermittent bombardment of the shore emplacements.

JUNE 20, 1898. After lengthy delays while assembling at Tampa, the 17,000-man Fifth Corps of 300-pound, 63-year-old, gouty major general William Rufus Shafter arrives off Santiago aboard 32 crowded transports and begins disembarkation 17 miles farther east at Daiquirí two days later, while Sampson's fleet shells various coastal points as a diversion. Daiquirí's 300 Spanish defenders, having no artillery and menaced by Cuban guerrillas in their rear, retire quietly. Late on June 22, the first American units also reach the nearby port of Siboney, eight miles closer to Santiago, thereby gaining a second landing zone for Shafter's army, as well as contacting 4,000 Cuban insurgent allies.

Rough Riders

Upon the outbreak of hostilities against Spain, the vigorous assistant secretary of the U.S. Navy—39-year-old Theodore Roosevelt—resigned and was offered command of one of three volunteer cavalry regiments that were to be raised. Aware of his limited practical military expertise, though, he deferred to his colleague and friend, Col. Leonard E. Wood, a Medal of Honor recipient and a Harvard-trained doctor in the Army Medical Corps.

Yet as lieutenant colonel and second-in-command, Roosevelt traveled through Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico during May 1–21, 1898, recruiting most of the 1,000 officers and men who comprised the 1st U.S. Volunteer Cavalry Regiment. He included ranch hands and Pawnee scouts he had known during his early years in the Dakota Badlands, policemen from whom he had served as New York City police commissioner, plus Ivy League athletes and polo players. Many applicants were turned away before this amateur regiment received less than a month's training at Camp Wood in San Antonio (Texas), then went to Tampa for embarkation toward Cuba by June 14.

Lack of ships meant that only two-thirds of the regiment landed at Daiquirí eight days later, without any horses; yet they acquitted themselves well as infantrymen in a clash against retreating Spanish troops at Las Guásimas on June 24, 1898.

Six days later, Wood was promoted to brigadier general and was given command over the entire cavalry brigade because of the illness of his superior. Roosevelt was moved up to full colonel of the 1st Volunteers, who became known as "Roosevelt's Rough Riders." (The nickname apparently derived from Buffalo Bill Cody's popular Wild West show, which featured a "Congress of Rough Riders of the World.")

The next day, July 1, 1898, Roosevelt—the only man on horseback—led his dismounted troopers up Kettle Hill, before veering south and joining the regular 1st and 10th Cavalry regiments in a diversionary charge up San Juan Hill. At considerable cost, the Spaniards were broken and driven back inside Santiago's defenses, capitulating two and a half weeks later. Because Roosevelt and more than a third of his Rough Riders contracted malaria, they were evacuated on August 8 to Montauk on Long Island outside New York City.

Greeted as heroes, they were discharged by September 14. Despite such a short term of service, the volunteer troopers became famous thanks to extensive newspaper coverage, and especially after Roosevelt was elected governor of New York State that same year and went on to be elected president in 1901.

JUNE 22, 1898. While blockading San Juan de Puerto Rico, Captain Sigsbee's 11,600-ton armed auxiliary Saint Paul spots the ancient, 1,130-ton cruiser Isabel II exiting at 1:00 p.m., followed by the not fully repaired Terror. After pausing briefly beneath its batteries, the Spanish destroyer dashes at the Saint Paul, only to be hit by heavy counterfire. In a sinking condition, the Terror's commander circles back and beaches on Puntilla Shoal (from where his destroyer is eventually refloated), while the Isabel retreats into port. Sigsbee is then relieved three days later by the 285-man, 6,200-ton armed auxiliary Yosemite (ex-El Sol), so he sails the Saint Paul toward New York for a refit.

JUNE 24, 1898. Las Guásimas. U.S. naval authorities expect Shafter to march due west along Santiago's coastline and capture the harbor castle guarding its sea entrance to permit Sampson's fleet to then enter and annihilate the anchored Spanish squadron. Yet once ashore, the general instead decides to push northwestward and invade the city first, eliminating the military threat posed by its garrison before proceeding against the coastal defenses.

When the American vanguard advances inland from its beachhead, approximately 1,100 dismounted U.S. troopers and Rough Riders overtake a large number of Spaniards three and a half miles away at Las Guásimas, who are hastily retiring behind Linares's defensive positions around Santiago. This retreating column is mauled and suffers 250 losses, as opposed to 16 American dead and 52 wounded.

JUNE 28, 1898. Cuban scouts inform Shafter that 8,000 Spanish troops have broken out of the rebel encirclement at Manzanillo and are marching eastward to bolster Linares. This information prompts the American general to galvanize his preparations for an assault against the Santiago defenses before these reinforcements can arrive.

JUNE 30, 1898. This morning, the 55-man armed yachts Hornet and Hist push into Niquero Bay in southeastern Cuba, destroying a 40-ton Spanish gunboat at long range. Joined by the tug Wompatuck, the American vessels then press northeast toward Manzanillo, opening fire upon its defenses at 3:20 this same afternoon, only to be driven off an hour and a half later by its batteries and the 135-ton gunboat Guantánamo, the 85-ton Delgado Parejo, the 65-ton Guardián, and the 40-ton Estrella.

Also this day, the Yosemite intercepts the 3,460-ton Spanish steamer Antonio López as it attempts to enter San Juan de Puerto Rico out of the Atlantic. Despite a belated sally by the cruiser Isabel II and the gunboat General Concha, the approaching vessel is driven aground on Salinas Point.

JULY 1, 1898. San Juan Hill. At dawn, Shafter launches a three-pronged attack against the Spanish perimeter defenses outside Santiago, sending a newly arrived half brigade of volunteer infantry in a diversionary move along the beach toward its harbor castle; an infantry division supported by dismounted cavalrymen up the Siboney road toward San Juan Hill (actually a low ridge just east of the city of Santiago); while Brig. Gen. Henry W. Lawton's 6,200-man 2nd Infantry Division leads the main thrust by circling northward, then storming the isolated village of El Caney on the Guantánamo road.

However, this outpost is held by 520 determined Spaniards, barricaded behind trenches and a blockhouse. For the better part of a day, they check Lawton's flanking maneuver, killing 81 Americans and wounding 360 before they are finally overrun at 4:00 p.m. El Caney's defenders sustain 235 casualties, and almost all survivors are captured. Meanwhile, dismounted elements from five different cavalry regiments, plus a battery of Gatling guns, carry San Juan Hill this same afternoon after a bitter struggle.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Wheeler and his staff, at left, meeting with Col. Leonard Wood and Lt. Col. Theodore Roosevelt, at right, in the Tampa embarkation camp, early June 1898. (U.S. National Park Service)

Both sides are greatly shaken by their losses. Shafter—having endured 1,100 total casualties—briefly contemplates retreat, while the Spaniards—whose losses are even heavier—retire into their second line of trenches, despite the fact that these are disadvantageously placed on lower ground. Linares, severely wounded in an arm while trying to hold San Juan Hill, is succeeded by Gen. José Toral.

JULY 2, 1898. Fearful that Cervera's squadron will be lost if Santiago falls, the Spanish authorities order their admiral by telegraph to escape. He therefore recalls the 1,200 sailors who have been helping man the defenses ashore and after nightfall sends the gunboat Alvarado to remove six mines from the harbor entrance, thus clearing a passage out to sea.

JULY 3, 1898. Action off Santiago. Cervera makes a desperate dash at 9:30 this Sunday morning with the 556-man cruiser Infanta María Teresa of Flag Capt. Victor María Concas y Palau, the 491-man Vizcaya of Capt. Antonio Eulate y Pery, the 487-man Almirante Oquendo of Capt. Juan Bautista Lazaga, and the 567-man Cristóbal Colón under Commo. José de Paredes y Chacón, plus the 80-man destroyers Furor and Plutón under Capt. Fernando Villamil. Immediately, they are sighted and pursued by Schley's vice flag Brooklyn under Capt. Francis A. Cook, plus the battleships Iowa, Indiana, Oregon, and Texas (Sampson is too far east with the New York to engage, having gone to confer earlier with Shafter ashore; while the Massachusetts is at Guantánamo recoaling).

The Brooklyn, the Texas of Capt. John "Jack" W. Philip, and the Iowa of Capt. Robley D. "Fighting Bob" Evans open fire by 9:40 a.m., before Cervera can even begin turning westward. Both the Spanish flagship and the Oquendo are struck repeatedly, salvoes driving them aground 20 minutes later, six and eight miles, respectively, from Santiago's entrance. The Vizcaya is set ablaze and runs ashore by 11:15 a.m.

Wrecked remains of the Spanish cruiser Vizcaya ablaze after the Battle of Santiago with the American torpedo boat Ericsson standing by to rescue survivors. (U.S. Naval Historical Center) at Aserraderos, 15 miles west of Santiago. Both the Furor and the Plutón are also destroyed by the Indiana and the 93-man, 800-ton armed yacht Gloucester of Lt. Cmdr. R. Wainwright, succumbing near Cabrera Point. Lastly, the unarmed Colón leads the Brooklyn and the Oregon on a 50-mile chase before finally being overhauled and forced aground in ruins at 1:20 p.m., 70 miles west of Santiago opposite Turquino Peak. All the Spanish ships are lost and 323 crew members killed, 151 wounded, and 1,700 captured—including Cervera and the Vizcaya's Captain Eulate—while only two American vessels sustain any damage, and a single seaman killed and another injured.

Battle of Santiago.

After witnessing this one-sided slaughter, Santiago's garrison is further demoralized when the Manzanillo relief column at last slips through a gap in the besiegers' lines this same evening, proving to be only 3,500 weary troops under Col. Federico Escario rather than the anticipated 8,000.

JULY 4, 1898. To reblock Santiago's entrance following Cervera's sortie, the 11-year-old, 3,042-ton cruiser Reina Mercedes—partially disarmed and barely capable of getting up steam—is scuttled in its channel at 11:30 p.m. (Refloated the next year, it is taken to the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1912 as a prize exhibit and used as a barracks ship until scrapped in 1957.)

JULY 5, 1898. At midnight, the 50-man, 545-ton armed yacht Hawk intercepts the 4,380-ton mail steamer Alfonso XIII seven miles outside Havana and chases it westward. By 1:30 a.m., the Spanish vessel runs hard aground outside Mariel and is abandoned and shelled the next morning by its pursuer, along with the 153-man, 1,200-ton gunboat Castine.

JULY 9, 1898. Having gradually extended his siege lines, Shafter closes off Santiago's last escape route when his right flank reaches the western shores of the bay.

JULY 10, 1898. This afternoon, a firefight erupts between Santiago's defenders and besiegers—joined from offshore by the Brooklyn, the Indiana, and the Texas—that lasts until the next morning. Holding the high ground, the American soldiers suffer only 2 dead and 2 wounded, compared to 7 Spaniards killed and more than 50 injured.

JULY 11, 1898. While the Brooklyn, the New York, and the Indiana continue shelling Aguadores, the 59-year-old major general Nelson Appleton Miles arrives off Siboney with reinforcements for Shafter, visiting his subordinate's headquarters ashore the next day.

JULY 12, 1898. This morning, the Eagle pursues the Spanish blockade runner Santo Domingo west of Isla de Pinos (modern Juventud Island, off southwestern Cuba), driving it on to Piedras Point and setting it ablaze.

JULY 16, 1898. Cuban insurgents occupy without resistance the small northeastern port of Gibara, supported by the Nashville.

JULY 17, 1898. After several days of negotiations, Toral capitulates at noon, surrendering not only Santiago's 12,000-man garrison and 97 guns but also another 12,000 troops and militiamen scattered around Guantánamo, plus a half-dozen other Spanish outposts throughout eastern Cuba. Wood is installed as Santiago's new military governor three days afterward, this land campaign having cost 243 American dead and 1,445 wounded.

JULY 18, 1898. Early this morning, the Wilmington and its 176-man, 1,400-ton sister gunboat Helena stand into Manzanillo's northern channel, while the 627-ton armed auxiliary Scorpion and the Osceola enter through its central channel and the Hist, the Hornet, and the Wompatuck via its southern channel to shell the Spanish shipping inside. Uniting at 7:50 a.m. and opening fire from beyond range of Manzanillo's batteries, the Americans pound the harbor for two and a half hours, destroying or incapacitating its gunboats, the Cuba Española of 225 tons, the Guantánamo, the Delgado Parejo, the Guardián, the Estrella, and the 35-ton Centinela, as well as setting the steamers Gloria, José García, and Purísima Concepción ablaze.

JULY 21, 1898. The Annapolis and the 167-man, 1,800-ton gunboat Topeka, preceded by the smaller auxiliaries Wasp and Leyden, stand into Nipe Bay in northeastern Cuba, discovering its Ramón Point battery to be unarmed. Four and a half miles inside, they also sight the 22-year-old, 146-man, 935-ton dispatch vessel Jorge Juan. They open fire on the latter at 12:45 p.m. and sink it one hour later.

This same day, Miles departs Guantánamo with a dozen transports bearing 3,400 fresh troops—the 6th Massachusetts and the 6th Illinois Volunteer Infantry regiments, plus five regular field batteries and other auxiliaries—to gain a foothold on Puerto Rico and await the arrival of further contingents from Tampa and Newport News. This first expedition is escorted by the battleship Massachusetts of Capt. F.J. Higginson, the 181-man, 6,100-ton armed auxiliary Dixie (ex-El Sud), and the Gloucester.

JULY 24, 1898. Puerto Rican Invasion. Although originally intended to disembark at Cape Fajardo, 25–30 miles east of San Juan, Miles instead changes strategy after this destination is revealed by the U.S. press. After coasting eastward along northern Puerto Rico to deceive Spanish lookouts, his expedition reverses course after nightfall of July 24 and runs without lights around the southwestern tip of the island, to appear the next dawn off its tiny port of

Surrendered Santiago

Cuba's second-largest city suffered during its siege. About half of its prewar populace, some 20,000 civilians, were allowed to evacuate for El Caney. Its buildings were then shelled from the encircling heights until July 14, when General Toral was asked to capitulate. After telegraphing Madrid, he accepted the Americans' terms, so General Shafter raised the Stars and Stripes over the governor's palace by noon on July 17.

The rebel leader García was excluded from this arrangement, however, and his followers were not allowed into the devastated city. Instead, the young Wood was installed as military governor on July 20, 1898, despite objections from rebels who argued that at least its civic administration "should be turned over to Cubans." Shafter grudgingly agreed to share some duties, so the wealthy, French-educated rebel general Demetrio Castillo was temporarily named mayor. But the Americans remained distrustful and contemptuous of the ragtag insurgents, most of whom were black, and believed that only the former Spanish municipal officials could manage the city's resurrection.

Castillo therefore was removed a few days later in favor of Santiago's ex-Spanish mayor, Leonardo Ros. García's aggrieved followers retired into the hills, their vision of Cuban independence having been dashed. As some rebels still wished to avenge years of repression, roads inland remained dangerous for travelers, and no produce reached market. Some defeated Spaniards in turn continued to treat all Cubans with vindictiveness, while the American occupiers often regarded black inhabitants—almost 57 percent of Santiago's peacetime populace—with blatant racism.

Fortunately, Wood proved to be an excellent administrator. He immediately addressed the needs of the few surviving residents, who were still suffering so badly from disease and famine that the death rate exceeded 200 people a day. Water and sewer systems had been destroyed, and no public funds were available. Wood hired citizens to clear streets of bodies and debris, then turned to repairing the docks and bridges. At first, he paid wages with rations, then he issued checks as the economy revived. García was allowed to make a ceremonial visit on September 22, yet the Americans still refused to relinquish control. Wood's authority was even expanded the next month to encompass all of eastern Cuba, with Castillo as his token vice governor.

Guánica, 15 miles west of Ponce. The Gloucester stands in and quickly secures its waterfront, allowing Miles's troops to occupy the town without loss. The Americans then press inland on July 26 and gain the main road leading toward Ponce after another bloodless skirmish.

JULY 26, 1898. Spain, through France's Ambassador Cambon in Washington, asks President McKinley to name his peace terms; McKinley responds four days later. These are accepted by Madrid on August 8 and relayed to the U.S. government on August 9.

JULY 27, 1898. Miles is joined off Guánica by another 3,300 troops from the United States: the 16th Pennsylvania, plus the 2nd and 3rd Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry regiments, under Maj. Gen. James H. Wilson. Rather than have them disembark, Miles orders their transports to proceed directly east toward Ponce, which he is about to attack.

The next morning, this convoy—supported inshore by the Annapolis, the Dixie, and the Wasp, plus the Massachusetts farther out to sea—penetrates Ponce's harbor in coordination with a land assault, prompting its heavily outnumbered Spanish garrison to flee north toward San Juan after only token resistance. Miles then issues a proclamation promising the Puerto Ricans liberty from Spain, which produces a friendly reception.

JULY 31, 1898. Brig. Gen. Theodore Schwan joins Miles at Ponce with an additional 2,900 regulars from the 11th and 19th U.S. Infantry regiments, plus artillery and cavalrymen.

AUGUST 1, 1898. With the support of the Gloucester offshore, Miles's advancing army captures the town of Arroyo. The next day Guayama capitulates as well, after being briefly shelled by the Cincinnati and the Saint Louis.

AUGUST 3, 1898. Brig. Gen. Peter C. Hains appears off Puerto Rico with 3,700 men of the 3rd Illinois, 4th Ohio, and 4th Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry regiments, disembarking at Arroyo. They are joined a couple of days later by Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke with another couple of thousand cavalrymen and gunners. Miles's command eventually swells to 17,000 men, facing 8,000 dispirited Spaniards—1,300 of them concentrated inland at Aibonito to block any immediate American advance across its range toward San Juan.

Miles instead opts for a four-pronged offensive, with Schwan marching north along the coast from Guánica; a second column ascending a mountain trail to meet him at Arecibo; Wilson pressuring Aibonito frontally with a third formation; while Brooke circles behind with a fourth detachment out of Arroyo.

AUGUST 6, 1898. A unit from the Amphitrite seizes the lighthouse outside San Juan, repulsing—along with the Cincinnati—a Spanish counterattack on the night of August 8–9, before withdrawing the next morning.

AUGUST 8, 1898. A minor skirmish occurs four miles north of Guayama, followed by another at Hormigueros two days later, as Miles launches his northern drive. The Americans easily rout the Spaniards on all fronts, sending defeated or outflanked companies reeling back into blockaded San Juan. American losses total only 4 dead and 40 wounded throughout this entire campaign. Schwan's troops, in particular, distinguish themselves by capturing 192 prisoners, before overrunning Mayagüez on August 11.

AUGUST 12, 1898. Goodrich appears outside the Cuban port of Manzanillo with his 393-man, 4,100-ton cruiser Newark (flag), Suwanee, Hist, Osceola, and ex-Spanish gunboat Alvarado, escorting a marine battalion aboard the transport Resolute. After calling upon its governor to surrender, the warships open fire against Manzanillo's batteries at 3:40 p.m., while Cuban insurgents also threaten its garrison from inland. The next morning, fighting ceases when the general peace treaty is announced.

On August 12, 1898, Madrid signs the peace protocols, officially ending hostilities. Although America's victory has been greatly facilitated by the 48,000 rebels fighting beside the invading U.S. forces, Cuba is excluded from the subsequent negotiations in Paris and must accept compromises demanded by Washington.

By the resultant accord signed on December 10, 1898, Spain withdraws from Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and other small islands in the West Indies and Pacific, thereby losing the last vestiges of its overseas empire. The United States assumes a protectorate over these newly liberated territories, remaining in Cuba over the next three years to supervise the installation of a national government. It also inserts an amendment by Connecticut senator Orville Platt directly into the Cuban constitution that allows for future U.S. interventions.

WAR OF THE THOUSAND DAYS (1899–1902)

After a precipitate, three-year decline in the world price of coffee, Colombia is plunged into bankruptcy, which in turn sparks civic unrest and riots. The aged, Conservative Party president Manuel Antonio Sanclemente responds by declaring martial law on July 28, 1899, but his Liberal Party opponents nonetheless prepare to challenge him by a recourse to arms. On October 18, the north-eastern department of Santander rises in revolt, and a desultory civil war erupts.

OCTOBER 24, 1899. The government gunboats Hércules and Colombia overtake a hastily assembled Liberal flotilla moving up the Magdalena River, which has already blocked the channel at Barranquilla and captured the river ports of Magangué and El Banco. In a violent nocturnal action at Los Obispos, the gunboats sink most of the more lightly armed Liberal vessels.

Equally ill-equipped Liberal land forces are also dispersed on November 5 at Nocaima in Cundinamarca Department, resulting in the death of their general, Zenón Figueredo. Furthermore, when the former doctor—now promoted to general—Rafael Uribe Uribe assaults Bucaramanga in Santander Department six days later. Some 1,000 Liberals are lost, as compared to fewer than 100 of its Conservative defenders. Yet another Liberal setback occurs at Manta on November 20.

DECEMBER 15, 1899. Peralonso. A large but fragmented government army under Gen. Manuel Casabianca closes in upon the main Liberal concentration under generals Uribe, Benjamín Herrera, and Justo L. Durán in the Peralonso River Valley, west of Cúcuta in Santander Department near the Venezuelan border. An indecisive action thereupon ensues around La Laja Bridge, which separates both armies, until finally Uribe personally leads a charge on the afternoon of December 16 that routs his Conservative opponents.

By nightfall, the government army is in full retreat, abandoning arms, supplies, horses, and hundreds of deserters. Despite this victory, the Liberals do not follow up their advantage by marching directly upon the national capital of Bogotá but rather—at the suggestion of Gen. Gabriel Vargas Santos—choose to retire into Cúcuta to consolidate smaller local gains.

MAY 11, 1900. Palonegro. After rebuilding their strength, some 14,000 government troops under Gen. Próspero Pinzón bear down upon slightly fewer than 8,000 Liberals under Uribe, Herrera, and Vargas Santos, who are waiting in the steamy, mountainous terrain around Palonegro amid the Canta foothills near Bucaramanga and Lebrija. During the first three days of this encounter—the largest in modern South American history, with battle lines eventually extending for 15 miles—the defenders launch savage attacks against the Conservatives' positions, fighting their more numerous and better-equipped opponents to a standstill. However, Pinzón begins to turn the tide by May 14, and the next day disperses Uribe's increasingly desperate counterthrusts.

Both armies thereupon dig in, stubbornly refusing to abandon the field, while maintaining limited probing attacks throughout daylight hours and vicious patrol actions at night. Total Liberal deaths are estimated at 1,500, compared to 1,000 for the Conservatives, yet with the passage of time disease begins claiming more lives than combat operations. Eventually, the stalemate is broken when the government side receives several thousand reinforcements and a plentiful resupply of ammunition on May 23, compelling the overmatched Liberals to retreat three days afterward. The latter never recuperate from this setback. Uribe, Herrera, and Vargas Santos are individually defeated by the end of this same year and are obliged to flee Colombia.

JULY 31, 1900. Gen. Jorge Moya Vásquez, garrison commander at Soacha (west-southwest of Bogotá), marches upon the capital and topples the Sanclemente government, replacing it with another faction called the "Historical Conservatives" under Vice President José Manuel Marroquín.

Their main army having been defeated on the battlefield at Palonegro, the Liberals subsequently resort to guerrilla warfare, especially in their strongholds of Cundinamarca and Tolima departments. For the next two and a half years, an increasingly vicious irregular campaign ensues, with massacres and counter-massacres being perpetrated by both sides.

Finally, general exhaustion sets in by late 1902, although some 100,000 of Colombia's 4 million people have succumbed during this conflict (mainly due to disease). In October and November, the largest remaining Liberal armies capitulate in Panama and on the Atlantic coast in exchange for amnesties and limited political reforms. The Conservative government thereupon crushes all guerrilla resistance in the interior.

Liberal troops resting prior to the Battle of Palonegro. (Author's Collection)

PORTENTS IN MEXICO (1899–1910)

Despite the iron-fisted rule of dictator Porfirio Díaz, this country continues to simmer with discontent. Although all stirrings are repressed, they will eventually explode into the Mexican Revolution of 1910.

JULY 21, 1899. Yaqui Ultimatum. Chiefs from the eight main Yaqui tribes send an ultimatum to Gen. Lorenzo Torres calling upon all whites to withdraw from Sinaloa or face hostilities.

AUGUST 6, 1899. Torres defeats a Yaqui concentration at Palo Parado (Sinaloa) and is wounded in a thigh.

AUGUST 10, 1899. A 784-man Mexican column—composed of units from the 11th, 12th, and 17th Infantry battalions, plus the 5th Cavalry Regiment—drives 500 Yaqui warriors from a stronghold in Sinaloa.

AUGUST 14, 1899. Mexican federales clash with Yaqui warriors at Laguna Prieta (Sinaloa).

SEPTEMBER 1899. A Yaqui war band is decimated at Bahuca (Sinaloa), suffering 87 dead, including their chief, Gutmasolero.

NOVEMBER 9, 1899. Yaquis and federales clash at Coyotes Lake, then again nearby two days later.

JANUARY 18, 1900. Mazocoba. Learning that Teta-biate's followers are concentrated in a stronghold atop Mazocoba Heights (Sinaloa), Torres approaches in three columns: 402 troops under Col. Agustín García Hernández, who reaches Semana Santa Mesa only to find a ravine separating him from the Indians; 423 men under Torres, to the right of García Hernández's formation and directly opposite the enemy; plus 240 soldiers under Col. Jesús Gándara, occupying two hills near Mazocoba.

At 10:00 a.m., the Mexicans begin shelling Tetabiate's defenses, then attack five hours later, driving the Yaquis from their trenches in hand-to-hand combat. The defenders eventually turn and flee around nightfall, many plunging to their deaths into ravines or being finished off by skirmishers from the 4th and 11th Infantry battalions. More than 400 natives are killed, and 1,800 noncombatants are captured—fully half of the latter succumbing in their subsequent forced march into captivity at Tetacombiate. Torres's federales suffer 56 killed and 104 wounded.

JULY 9, 1900. A company of federales chases eight Yaquis carrying a wounded companion a half-mile from Mazocoba, killing the latter and discovering him to be Chief Tetabiate.

FEBRUARY 1902. Yaqui resistance in the Sinaloa mountain ranges increases under their new chief-tain Luis Bule.

APRIL 1904. Mexican authorities parley with Yaqui leaders at San Miguel Horcasitas (Sinaloa) and are unable to arrange a truce.

APRIL 30, 1904. Federales and Yaquis clash at Agua Escondida, near Ures (Sinaloa).

JUNE 1, 1906. Cananea. In the state of Sonora, 5,360 Mexican workers go on strike against the Consolidated Copper Company policies being exercised at the Cananea mines, specifically protesting against the higher wages and shorter work hours enjoyed by its 2,200 American employees. A march by 2,000 strikers toward the company lumberyard—where most of the Americans work—is met by rifle fire, and a riot ensues in which 23 are killed, mostly Mexicans, and another 22 are wounded. The strikers are thereupon chased out of Cananea and into the mountains by armed American riders, yet not before they torch numerous buildings.

The company owner, Col. William C. Greene, requests intervention from the Mexican authorities, who not only dispatch state troops and rurales (federal policemen) under Col. Emilio Kosterlitzky but also allow 400 gun-toting American “volunteers” to enter the country from nearby Naco (Arizona),

Rurales

As early as 1889, the strongman Porfirio Díaz tried to stamp out Mexico's perennial problem of banditry by upgrading its Guardia Rural or “Rural Guard.” This was a small force of mounted constabulary who patrolled the countryside. To encourage the nation's peaceful transition into a modern state, he increased their numbers to more than 2,100 riders. Ten squadrons of three, 76-man companies apiece were created, led by officers seconded from the Mexican Army. Stylish dove-grey uniforms and broad-brimmed hats were issued, modeled on the traditional charro dress, complete with silver buckles, as well as red and black cravats. Heavier, standardized weaponry was provided to each trooper: carbines, sabers, and pistols. Telegraph communications and railway transportation allowed them to concentrate quickly in any troubled area. And the rurales were encouraged to apply the notorious ley fuga, a ruthless policy whereby any criminal caught in the act could be executed on the spot.

By the first decade of the 19th century, this distinctive body of riders doubled in size and was considered among the most famous police forces in the world, comparable to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or Texas Rangers. Díaz and his advisers often paraded the glamorous corps on ceremonial occasions and confirmed tales about their cruel efficiency to reassure foreign investors about the stability of his regime. However, modern research indicates that the rurales were neither as brutal nor as omnipresent as once believed but rather were deployed mostly in a few showpiece states, not in the country as a whole.

Perhaps tellingly, when the reformist Francisco Madero was swept into power by the Mexican Revolution of 1910, rurales were still so highly regarded that he maintained the force largely intact. It was only after he was betrayed and murdered by his successor, Gen. Victoriano Huerta, that the rurales were transformed into a paramilitary body. In an effort to expand them into a field force, standards were lowered, and their numbers swelled to more than 10,000 riders. Their pride gone, the last few remnants were disbanded in July 1914.

greatly offending Mexican sensibilities. Some 50 strikers are subsequently identified and transported into penal servitude on the island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa (Veracruz).

DECEMBER 3, 1906. Río Blanco. Thousands of textile workers in the states of Veracruz and Puebla unionize and go on strike, leading to a standoff with company managers and replacement workers. On January 7, 1907, a group of hungry strikers storms

Double column of gray-clad rurales entering a Mexican town. (Author's Collection) the company store at Río Blanco (Veracruz), ransacking it and starting a fire, which burns several adjacent buildings. Federal cavalymen under Gen. Rosalino Martínez are consequently rushed in the next day from the nearby city of Orizaba, brutally restoring order by firing point-blank into some mobs, then conducting summary executions of other detainees. Among those shot out of hand is the local garrison commander, Lt. Gabriel Arroyo, as well as his entire company, for having refused to crush the initial outbreak. By the time order is finally restored, some 200 strikers have been killed, and the cowed survivors return to work.

JUNE 6, 1910. The guerrilla chief (and ex-butcher) Santana Rodríguez Palafox—nicknamed “Santanón”—briefly captures the town of San Andrés Tuxtla (Veracruz), only to be hunted down and killed shortly thereafter by federales under Francisco Cárdenas.

This same day of June 6, the 36-year-old opposition candidate Francisco Ignacio Madero is detained on President Díaz’s orders to ensure the dictator’s easy reelection. However, Madero will escape confinement within four months and call for a general insurrection that touches off the Mexican Revolution.

POLICE ACTIONS (1901–1920)

Washington’s easy victories in Cuba and Panama draw the U.S. government deeper into Caribbean adventures, gradually supplanting the European powers that have traditionally dominated this theater.

SEPTEMBER 1901. Because of President Cipriano Castro’s refusal to fully honor Venezuela’s international debts, the United States dispatches the 2,900-ton training ship Hartford, as well as the auxiliaries Scorpion and Buffalo, into La Guaira, followed by the German vessels Vineta, Gazelle, and Falke.

(Although temporarily acting in concert with Washington, German foreign minister Oswald, Baron von Richthofen, realizes that any unilateral action will be resented as a breach of the Monroe Doctrine, adding that “the seizure of territory is precluded, as this would immediately involve us in a conflict with the United States.”)

NOVEMBER 20, 1901. During the final phases of fighting in Colombia’s “War of the Thousand Days” (see “War of the Thousand Days”), a 30-man detachment from USS Machias goes ashore at Colón on the Isthmus of Panama to protect its American-owned railway terminal. This contingent will be reinforced over the next few days by additional men from the Marietta, while the USS Iowa and 1,700-ton gunboat Concord will also disembark a total of 325 men into Panama City and Balboa on November 24. All U.S. detachments will return aboard their ships by December 4 once this crisis abates.

APRIL 16, 1902. USS Machias again disembarks 30 armed sailors to protect American interests, this time amid the Bocas del Toro islands in the northwestern reaches of the Colombian province of Panama. A few additional marines are also landed before this force is withdrawn on April 22.

APRIL 26, 1902. The impoverished Dominican Republic is being contested between two rival factions: the Horacistas of youthful general Horacio Vásquez Lajara, and the Jiménistas of President Juan Isidro Jiménez. On April 26, the former proclaims a state of rebellion from his headquarters at Cibao and, after a brief clash at San Carlos, besieges Jiménez inside the capital of Santo Domingo. Lacking support, Jiménez flees into the French Consulate four days later, allowing Vásquez to enter and be proclaimed provisional president as of May 2.

AUGUST 1, 1902. Amid the succession struggle after the resignation of Haitian president Tirésias Antoine Simon Sam, the city of Petit Goâve rises up in revolt. Eight days later, troops under Gen. Justin Carré occupy the city and put it to the torch.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1902. The U.S. cruiser Cincinnati sets more than 80 armed sailors ashore at Colón on the Isthmus of Panama to protect the American-owned railway. They are reinforced five days later by four companies totaling 342 marines under Lt. Col. B. R. Russell, who have been dispatched from the League Island Navy Yard in Pennsylvania aboard the transport USS Panther. This battalion is withdrawn by November 18.

During a November 1901 visit to Virginia, the German heavy cruiser Vineta is refurbished in dry dock. (Mariners' Museum, Newport News)

DECEMBER 9, 1902. Venezuelan Blockade. After repeatedly requesting that Castro honor his country's debts to Britain, Germany, and Italy, the ambassadors from these first two nations withdraw through the port of La Guaira at 3:00 p.m. One hour later, 10 German and 4 British cutters bearing 240 armed men are towed into its harbor, covered by the brand-new, 962-ton German gunboat Panther under Lieutenant Commander Eckermann. They board the 137-ton, English-built gunboats General Crespo and Totumo, plus the hired French steamer Ossun, setting their 390 Venezuelan sailors ashore before towing all three vessels out to sea. The torpedo boat Margarita is also disabled in La Guaira's dockyard, while the General Crespo and the Totumo are scuttled after nightfall.

The boarding parties have been sent from the 5,900-ton German cruiser Vineta of Commo. Georg Scheder and cruiser HMS Ariadne of 60-year-old, Canadian-born vice admiral Sir Archibald Lucius Douglas to exact restitution from Castro's government. A contingent of 130 German sailors then ventures into La Guaira's Cardonal suburb at 10:00 this same evening to protect the evacuation of its foreign noncombatants, while the British do the same the next morning.

Also on December 9, the cruiser HMS Charybdis of Capt. R. A. J. Montgomerie seizes the Venezuelan gunboat Bolívar farther east, while the next day the British sloop Alert captures the troop ship Zamora and the 600-ton torpedo-gunboat 23 de Mayo in the Gulf of Paria, conveying both into Port-of-Spain (Trinidad). The 600-ton steamer Restaurador (the ex-American yacht Atlanta) is taken as well, so that within a couple of days virtually the entire Venezuelan Navy has fallen into the hands of the Anglo-German partnership.

With the addition of the British cruisers Retribution, Indefatigable, Tribune, and Pallas; the sloop Fantomé; the destroyers Quail and Rocket; plus the German cruisers Gazelle of 2,650 tons and Falke of 1,730 tons, the two commanders then blockade the coast—the British are responsible for its Demerara-to-La Guaira portion, and the Germans for the stretch between the latter section and Colombia's border. After heated street demonstrations, the Venezuelans react by arresting more than 200 foreigners at Caracas on December 10, plus detaining the British freighter Topaze at Puerto Cabello.

DECEMBER 13, 1902. The cruisers HMS Vineta and HMS Charybdis reach Puerto Cabello and, after sending 50 men into its roadstead to rescue the pillaged British freighter Topaze, they level the port's Vigía and Libertador harbor forts with a concentrated bombardment after the Venezuelans refuse to issue a formal apology.

JANUARY 17, 1903. Eckermann's Panther duels with Fort San Carlos at the mouth of the Bar of Maracaibo but is compelled to retire when its light armament cannot penetrate the ancient castle's stone battlements. Feeling that he must reassert German prestige, Scheder appears four days later with his much more heavily armed Vineta, severely damaging this fortification.

Washington responds negatively to this seemingly unprovoked escalation and lodges protests with Berlin, while Adm. George Dewey ominously conducts maneuvers in the Caribbean with more than 50 vessels. Britain and Italy are embarrassed by the action of their German ally and draw apart from the resultant diplomatic furor to avoid worsening their own relations with America.

FEBRUARY 13, 1903. Castro's government comes to terms with Britain, Germany, and Italy, raising customs duties at La Guaira and Puerto Cabello to satisfy their monetary claims. The president is glorified by Venezuelans for resisting foreign pressure, while the Germans are cast as villains, both domestically and internationally.

MARCH 23, 1903. Amid economic collapse and turmoil, the Dominican Republic's usurper president Horacio Vásquez resigns and is temporarily supplanted by the Jimenista general Alejandro Woss y Gil. The latter supposedly assumes office against the return from exile of President Jiménez, yet instead rapidly maneuvers to secure the nomination as sole presidential candidate for himself.

During this unsettled interlude, the elderly, 284-man, 3,200-ton cruiser USS Atlanta deposits 30 marines to act as a guard at the American Legation in the capital of Santo Domingo until calm is restored and they can be withdrawn on April 20.

APRIL 16, 1903. In Nicaragua, Emiliano Chamorro Vargas launches a rebellion at Chontales against the Liberal regime of José Santos Zelaya, only to be defeated within a month.

OCTOBER 24, 1903. Gen. Carlos F. Morales Languasco, governor of Puerto Plata on the Dominican Republic's northern coast, rises against the newly installed president Woss y Gil. Morales's rebel troops march upon the capital and are supported by both Jimenista and Horacista factions in the so-called War of the Union. Loyalist gunboats blockade the port, while the newly recommissioned, 386-man, 4,400-ton cruiser USS Baltimore provides reassurance for foreign residents.

After a brief siege, the city of Santo Domingo falls to Morales's revolutionary coalition on November 24, and he is installed as provisional president. Shortly thereafter, though, he refuses to restore the deposed Jiménez into office and instead announces his intention of running as a candidate himself in forthcoming elections. Another widespread counter-rebellion consequently erupts in favor of Jiménez, isolating Morales's forces within the capital.

DECEMBER 23, 1903. Woss's former vice president, Gen. Eugenio Deschamps, assumes power in Jiménez's name at Puerto Plata, and this port is bombarded from out at sea by a Dominican naval force loyal to Morales. Meanwhile, troops are also

Seizure of the Panama Canal

Dreams of cutting sailing times between the Atlantic and Pacific existed for centuries. In 1878, the French engineer Ferdinand de Lesseps—builder of the famed Suez Canal—bought rights from Colombia to dig a channel across the isthmus of its westernmost province, Panama. A decade of toil amid disease-ridden, torrid jungles ended in failure. But the new American president Theodore Roosevelt, who believed in the expansionistic naval doctrines of Capt. Alfred T. Mahan, felt that completion of the canal was a strategic imperative for the United States. He therefore bought Lesseps's rights for $40 million, then offered the Colombian government a further $10 million for a wider strip of land across the Isthmus.

A 100-year lease was grudgingly accepted by the Conservative administration in Bogotá on January 22, 1903. Yet after months of angry debate in the Colombian Senate, the treaty was rejected, and they adjourned in October. Roosevelt raged that he was dealing with "irresponsible bandits." He also noted the disappointment in economically depressed Panama. Realizing that its citizens had attempted to secede at least three times in the past, the American president wryly observed: "I deemed it likely that there would be a revolution in Panama soon."

The chief American engineer helped Manuel Amador Guerrero and other Panamanian leaders issue a new proclamation of independence on November 3, 1903. When Colombian troops arrived at the Caribbean port of Colón to put down this insurrection, they were denied passage across the isthmus by the American-owned railway company—backed by the intimidating presence of the U.S. gunboat Nashville. It was reinforced two days later by the transport Dixie, bringing 400 marines under Maj. John A. Lejeune. Despite a few tense moments, the coup succeeded with virtually no bloodshed.

A Panamanian "delegate"—the French-born lobbyist in Washington Philippe Bunau-Varilla, who had not been in Panama for many years—was swiftly received, and the new country was recognized on November 13, 1903. Five days later, a long-term treaty was signed between the United States and the "Republic of Panama." A canal zone 10 miles wide by 40 miles long was to be leased to American interests for 99 years, in exchange for a $10 million downpayment and annual rents of $250,000. Roosevelt absorbed all criticism, both domestic and foreign, against his high-handed action. He even commented that his critics were "welcome to debate me as long as they wished, provided that we can go on with the Canal." Eleven years later, the first ships steamed through it, while Colombia received a $25 million indemnity payment by 1921.

disembarked nearby under Gen. Jesús María Céspedes to besiege the city.

JANUARY 3, 1904. The 2,575-ton cruiser HMS Pallas of Capt. Charles Hope Robertson arrives off beleaguered Puerto Plata to protect British interests, followed the next day by the cruiser USS Detroit of Cmdr. Albert C. Dillingham to do the same for American residents. A U.S. marine detachment is immediately disembarked at Sosua, 10 miles east of Puerto Plata, after which both allied cruisers compel the 322-ton Dominican gunboat Independencia to withdraw on January 5, without machine gunning the rebel defenders as instructed by Morales.

JANUARY 14, 1904. General Céspedes informs the Anglo-American naval captains anchored off Puerto Plata that the Independencia will return the next day to bombard the city in conjunction with a land assault to be mounted by his troops. To minimize civilian casualties and material damage, Robertson and Dillingham persuade both factions to fight a half-mile outside the city limits.

They agree, and both small armies meet on January 16. Céspedes's advance is supported by the Inde- pendencia, until the defenders' lone fieldpiece obliges the gunboat to retreat out of range. Nevertheless, Céspedes's 400-man main column overwhelms Deschamps's rebels in a 20-minute firefight after nightfall, driving him into exile and incorporating most of his men into the government ranks.

Their peacekeeping duties done, the American and British cruisers depart on January 19.

FEBRUARY 11, 1904. When the Jimenista besiegers outside the city of Santo Domingo violate a temporary truce by opening fire upon the steamer New York, some 370 marines and armed sailors are rushed ashore from the anchored 475-man, 7,400-ton cruiser USS Columbia and its smaller consort, the Newark, to scatter them inland.

AUGUST 1904. In Paraguay, the exiled militia general Benigno A. Ferreira leads an invasion from Argentina, which will foment a popular revolution and drive the corrupt Colorado Party from power. After four months of fighting, President Juan Antonio Ezcurra is obliged to sign a surrender document aboard an anchored, neutral Argentine gunboat on December 12, handing over power to Paraguay's Liberals. Political instability will unfortunately ensue, as feuding liberal factions will seat 21 different governments over the next three-dozen years.

OCTOBER 28, 1904. In Panama City, the military commander in chief, Gen. Esteban Huertas, backed by the Liberal Party, calls for the resignation of two ministers from the cabinet of Conservative president Manuel Amador. Fearful that this action might portend a coup, which will in turn threaten the fledgling Canal Zone project, American governor George Davis requests support from Washington. On November 14, Adm. Caspar F. Goodrich anchors offshore with the battleship USS New York, the 3,200-ton cruiser Boston, and the 1,700-ton gunboat Bennington. Huertas goes into early retirement four days later, and the 250-man Panamanian army is disbanded on November 19, to be replaced by a police force.

NOVEMBER 10, 1904. Rioting erupts this afternoon in Rio de Janeiro, worsening the next day as cadets from the Praia Vermelha Military Academy join the insurrection. Order is restored during the night of November 15 when General Piragibe leads a loyal contingent through the streets, clearing them of rebels, thus saving the administration of civilian president Francisco de Paula Rodrigues Alves.

APRIL 19, 1905. Great Britain and Nicaragua sign the Altamirano-Harrison Treaty, whereby the former renounces all colonial-era claims to the Caribbean coastline of Nicaragua.

APRIL 1906. Four years after American forces have been withdrawn from Cuba, moderate president Tomás Estrada Palma is pronounced reelected by his constitutional assembly, despite a vigorously contested campaign. This verdict prompts a walkout by Gen. Faustino “Pino” Guerra and other members of the Liberal opposition, creating heightened tensions throughout the island.

AUGUST 16, 1906. Pino Guerra revolts in his native Pinar Province against the government of President Estrada Palma, inaugurating a guerrilla campaign.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1906. Guerra’s Revolt. Four days after the ambush of a Cuban armored train west of Havana by Guerra’s rebels, the 3,200-ton cruiser USS Denver of Cmdr. John Colwell enters the harbor, reluctantly dispatched by President Theodore Roosevelt to help restore public order, as well as protect American lives and interests.

The next day, after an interview with President Estrada Palma as to the gravity of the insurrection, 130 U.S. marines and a fieldpiece come ashore—only to be angrily recalled on September 14 by Roosevelt.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1906. The 140-man gunboat USS Marietta of Cmdr. William Fullam reaches

The cruiser USS Denver firing a salute while on a visit to San Juan de Puerto Rico, 1905. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

Cienfuegos (Cuba), setting half its crew ashore to protect American sugar mills, which have been threatened with destruction by local rebels if they do not contribute “a small obligatory war-loan.” Four days later, two companies of marines arrive aboard the transport Dixie to further augment Fulam’s force.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1906. Rather than call for new Cuban elections—as suggested by the American secretary of state, William Howard Taft, recently arrived from Florida aboard the 3,200-ton cruiser USS Des Moines—President Estrada Palma’s entire cabinet resigns at 9:00 p.m., prompting the U.S. government to intervene directly. The next day, more than 2,000 marines begin coming ashore from the brand-new, 16,000-ton battleship USS Louisiana and other vessels, while an expeditionary force musters in the United States.

OCTOBER 6, 1906. The diminutive and adventurous Brig. Gen. Frederick Funston—who a decade previously served as a volunteer in Cuba’s revolt against Spain—reaches Havana with the first units of a 6,000-man U.S. occupation force. He is superseded one week later by Maj. Gen. J. Franklin Bell, and no resistance is encountered from Cuban rebels.

OCTOBER 12, 1906. Taft appoints Charles Magoon as Cuba’s provisional governor, and the island remains peacefully under U.S. rule for the next two years, until Liberal ex-general José Miguel Gómez is elected president in American-supervised elections and installed into office on January 28, 1909, prompting a U.S. withdrawal.

MARCH 18, 1907. Zelaya’s War. After encouraging an insurrection in neighboring Honduras in January, only to see its rebels chased back into his own country, Nicaragua’s Liberal dictator José Santos Zelaya decides to retaliate against these cross-border incursions by launching an invasion. At Namasigüe his advancing forces encounter a combined Honduran-Salvadoran army on March 28, and for the first time in Central American warfare use machine guns in combat, inflicting horrific casualties—

Great White Fleet

Toward the end of his presidential term, Theodore Roosevelt surprised the nation by sending a fleet on a goodwill tour around the continent. Because of the Imperial Russian Navy’s recent failure in dispatching an ill-prepared expedition on a similar epic voyage, only to endure repeated embarrassments before being annihilated by the waiting Japanese at the Battle of Tsushima Straits, planning for this American operation—unprecedented in size and distance for the U.S. Navy—had to be meticulous. Roosevelt, embroiled in his own diplomatic dispute with Japan, which threatened the U.S. outpost in Manila, did not shrink from the prospect of failure. He even told his admirals: “I want all failures, blunders, and shortcomings to be made apparent in time of peace, and not in time of war.”

The president therefore watched from his yacht Mayflower as Rear Adm. Robley D. Evans steamed out of Hampton Roads (Virginia) on December 16, 1907, with his brand-new, 16,000-ton flagship Connecticut. Fifteen other battleships of the U.S. Atlantic Fleet followed out to sea. Because of their peacetime coloring, hulls painted white with gilt adornments, they were dubbed the “Great White Fleet” by reporters. The vessels were manned by more than 14,000 sailors and marines and accompanied by a half-dozen destroyers, plus other auxiliaries. After stopovers in Port-of-Spain on the British West Indian island of Trinidad, then Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, the warships were guided through the Strait of Magellan by a Chilean cruiser into Valparaíso. They continued on to Callao in Peru and had a month of gunnery practice in Mexico’s Magdalena Bay before finally reaching San Francisco Bay in California on May 6, 1908.

Now ordered to continue around the world, the troubled battleships Maine and Alabama were replaced by the Nebraska and the Wisconsin, which consumed less coal. Rear Adm. Charles S. Sperry also relieved Evans, because of his worsening gout. The Great White Fleet ventured as far north as Seattle before striking out across the Pacific in early July 1908 to visit Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, Japan, China, and the Philippines. After resting in Manila, they steamed for Ceylon, then through the Suez Canal for Gibraltar.

Although welcomed in the Mediterranean, the American vessels were already rendered obsolete by the recently launched HMS Dreadnought, whose revolutionary design included multiple large turrets and turbine engines. Yet, antiquated or not, the Great White Fleet was greeted by Roosevelt as it reentered Hampton Roads on February 22, 1909, two weeks short of the end of his presidency. Over 14 months, they had steamed 43,000 miles, a sign of America’s newfound global confidence.

The Great White Fleet steams out of Hampton Roads on December 16, 1907, past President Roosevelt's anchored yacht. The brand-new, 16,000-ton battleships Kansas and Vermont appear nearest to the camera. (U.S. Naval Historical Center) perhaps as many as 3,000—within a few minutes. Shortly thereafter, the victors enter Tegucigalpa and install Miguel R. Dávila as Liberal president. In May, Zelaya dictates his terms for concluding this conflict, despite diplomatic opposition from Washington.

MAY 1, 1908. In Peru, the 36-year-old radical politician Augusto Durand leads an unsuccessful uprising against President José Pardo y Barreda, which is suppressed and followed by hundreds of arrests.

JULY 2, 1908. In Paraguay, 30-year-old major Albino Jara Benegas spearheads a revolt that topples General Ferreira from the presidency.

NOVEMBER 10, 1908. In Haiti, Gen. François-Antoine Simon mounts a revolt at Les Cayes against the increasingly unpopular rule of President Nord Alexis, which rapidly gains adherents.

DECEMBER 2, 1908. The Haitian president, Nord Alexis, flees aboard the French cruiser Duguay-Trouin for Jamaica, his luggage being pillaged by an angry throng along Port-au-Prince's waterfront. Gen. Antoine Simon enters triumphantly the next day with his troops and is installed as president by the National Assembly on December 17. Like his predecessors, he, too, will seek foreign loans to implement his ambitious economic plans—most particularly the development of bananas as an export crop—so that the National Bank of Haiti is underwritten with French, German, and American funds.

DECEMBER 19, 1908. With Venezuela's now unpopular president Castro absent in Europe seeking medical treatment for a kidney ailment, demonstrations in the capital Caracas result in his deposal in favor of his 51-year-old vice president Juan Vicente Gómez. Although slightly more refined than his illiterate predecessor, Gómez will quickly exceed him in corruption.

MAY 29, 1909. A band of 25 backers of opposition leader Nicolás de Piérola storms the Peruvian National Palace and seizes newly installed president Augusto B. Leguía. Parading him through Lima's streets in a vain attempt to foment a popular insurrection, they are quickly scattered by a small detachment of loyal troops, and Leguía is rescued.

OCTOBER 11, 1909. Juan José Estrada, intendent general of Nicaragua's "Atlantic Coast" district, rises up in rebellion against the liberal regime of President Zelaya. This insurrection is backed by American interests, especially the Rosario and Light Mines Company, thus enjoying the backing of Secretary of State Philander C. Knox and Consul Thomas Moffat at the port of Bluefields. When two young American engineers acting as mercenary ship saboteurs are executed by liberal troops the next month, Washington severs diplomatic relations with Zelaya's government as of December 2, leading to his retirement from office 16 days later. He is nevertheless succeeded on December 21 by the Liberal Dr. José Madriz Rodríguez, who continues to resist Estrada's rebellion.

FEBRUARY 22, 1910. Liberal Nicaraguan forces under 31-year-old general Benjamín F. Zeledón defeat a Conservative force under generals Frutos Bolaños Chamorro and Emiliano Chamorro, driving them back upon their main base of Bluefields.

MAY 19, 1910. The Conservative rebel Estrada informs U.S. Consul Moffat that he is facing defeat in Nicaragua's ongoing civil war and can no longer defend Bluefields. U.S. Marines are thus disembarked to declare the port a "neutral zone," preventing the rout of the Conservative cause.

AUGUST 20, 1910. Estrada's Nicaraguan rebels enter the capital of Managua, driving the Liberal president Madriz from office. Madriz departs into exile six days later.

NOVEMBER 22, 1910. Brazil's "Revolt against the Lash." After months of planning, the black conscript sailors manning four anchored warships in Rio de Janeiro's vast Guanabara Bay rise up against their white officers, mortally wounding three and forcing the remainder ashore before weighing anchor and lobbing a couple of cannon rounds over the city, then prowling menacingly offshore in the darkness. The warships include the nation's brand-new, most modern battleships—the 1,200-man, 19,250-ton Minas Gerais and São Paulo, both recently completed in England—as well as the elderly 3,150-ton dreadnought Deodoro and the new 2,900-ton cruiser Bahia. The Minas Gerais has arrived from its maiden voyage out of England only seven months previously, escorting the American battleship bringing home the body of Brazil's deceased ambassador, Joaquim Nabuco, from Washington. Its sister ship the São Paulo has entered the bay as recently as October 23, returning the newly elected president Marshal Hermes da Fonseca from a state visit to Portugal.

José Carlos de Carvalho, the congressional deputy for naval affairs, goes aboard the Minas Gerais

the next morning and discovers that, although Capt. João Baptista das Neves is dead and all officers are gone, the mutinous sailors are still soberly performing their duties. He therefore asks the ringleader, João Cândido, to anchor and present his demands, which call for an end to floggings with a chibata or "lash," as well as amnesty for all mutineers (who number 2,400 out of the 5,000 naval personnel stationed in the harbor). Carvalho in turn lays these demands before Congress, while Hermes da Fonseca prevents the navy minister, Joaquim Marques Baptista de Leão, from attempting an ill-considered attack.

After heated debate, amnesty is granted, and the mutiny ends by November 26. However, some officers seek to circumvent the promised pardon by discharging Cândido and 17 others from the navy, then incarcerating them overnight in a suffocating cell on Cobras Island, where all but two perish. And when a second rebellion breaks out on December 9 aboard the new 340-man, 2,900-ton cruiser Rio Grande do Sul and in the Marine Infantry Battalion barracks on Cobras Island, the former is suppressed at the cost of Capt. Lt. Francisco Xavier Carneiro da Cunha's life, while the latter is pounded with shells and retaken the next afternoon, leaving 18 dead and 132 wounded. Determined to eradicate all forms of dissent, the navy discharges hundreds more seamen, and 200 former mutineers are sent off into internal exile on Christmas Day aboard the steamer Satélite, 8 being executed en route before the rest are marooned at different remote spots.

JANUARY 17, 1911. In the Paraguayan capital of Asunción, the war minister, Lt. Col. Albino Jara, advances from its artillery barracks to seize police headquarters and depose the recently inaugurated Liberal president Manuel Gondra in favor of himself two days afterward. Jara will in turn be driven from office and into Argentine exile by July 15.

FEBRUARY 1, 1911. The increasingly unpopular Haitian president Antoine Sam is challenged by a northern revolt at Ouanaminthe, led by the junior lieutenant Jean-Jacques Dessalines Michel Cincinnatus Leconte. The president himself disembarks with a small army, sacking and burning this city, yet failing to quell the revolt.

AUGUST 1, 1911. Haiti's Antoine Sam is toppled from power when a rebel army under Gen. Stivern Peralte reaches nearby Pétionville. The president and his family consequently flee through a hostile crowd along Port-au-Prince's waterfront the next day, going aboard the Dutch steamer Prinz Nederlanden to sail away into exile in Jamaica on August 4. General Cincinnatus Leconte enters the capital triumphantly two days afterward, being officially installed as president on August 14.

NOVEMBER 19, 1911. This Sunday evening, a small Jimenista group under Luis Tejera assassinate the Dominican Republic's President Ramón Cáceres Vázquez as he enjoys a leisurely drive through the streets of Santo Domingo. Gen. Alfredo M. Victoria, chief of the army, takes advantage of this opportunity by browbeating the Congress two and a half weeks later into electing his uncle, Sen. Eladio Victoria, as provisional president.

APRIL 1912. Jara returns into Paraguay from his Argentine exile, only to be defeated and killed by government forces at Paraguarí on May 15.

MAY 20, 1912. An antigovernment protest erupts at Santiago and Santa Clara in Cuba's Oriente Province when several hundred of its impoverished, disenfranchised black residents rise up to support a political leader named Evaristo Estenoz Coromina (sometimes misspelled as "Estanoz"), founder of a banned Afro-Cuban party known as the Independientes de Color or "Colored Independents."

MAY 23, 1912. Sugar Revolt. Alarmed by the threat posed to American-owned businesses by Cuba's latest disturbance, the U.S. Navy is ordered to dispatch a 2,100-man marine brigade under Col. Lincoln Karmany to Guantánamo Bay. Its 1st Regiment, 785 officers and marines under Col. George Barnett, departs Philadelphia's League Island base this same day aboard the 6,620-ton transport Prairie; the brigade's 2nd Regiment, an additional 1,300 men under Col. James E. Mahoney, will start following from Norfolk (Virginia) two days later aboard a succession of battleships from the U.S. Atlantic Fleet: the vessels Georgia, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, Ohio, Rhode Island, and Washington.

Meanwhile, the few hundred rebels in Oriente Province torch a number of government and private buildings, then seize the town of La Maya on June 1, prompting President Gómez to suspend all civil liberties. The Prairie's marine regiment having reached Guantánamo three days previously, a detached company is sent to reinforce Santiago de Cuba aboard

Guantánamo Bay

This vast harbor at Cuba's southeastern tip was sighted by Christopher Columbus on April 29, 1494, during his second Caribbean cruise. Impressed by its deep and broad entrance, he entered with his three ships and dubbed its inner expanse the Puerto Grande or "Big Port." Sharing a meal at what is today Fisherman's Point with the friendly Taíno inhabitants, he apparently learned that the bay was called "Guantánamo." Yet despite being an excellent anchorage, its stark surrounding landscape meant that it was to be largely ignored by Spaniards moving later through the West Indies.

Over the next few centuries, warships or squadrons occasionally sheltered inside the bay from storms, yet Santiago and Bayamo farther to its west remained the principal settlements for this stretch of coastline. As a result, when the U.S. expedition of Admiral Sampson needed a safe haven in the summer of 1898 to sustain its siege of Santiago throughout the autumn hurricane season, a force of sailors and marines seized the lower half of Guantánamo Bay. Its spacious waters proved invaluable for American battleships, therefore on February 16, 1903, Tomás Estrada Palma (an exiled rebel leader who had become an American citizen before being elected the first president of Cuba) obligingly offered Washington a perpetual lease to the lower half of Guantánamo Bay, as well as to Bahía Honda along the north coast.

By its terms, the American government retained rights over these properties as long as it used them for "coaling or naval stations only," while Cuba retained ultimate ownership and Cuban vessels were allowed free passage. A second treaty signed on July 2, 1903, specified annual rent payments of $2,000, doubled when a third treaty went into effect in late May 1934 (simultaneously ending Washington's interest in Bahía Honda). Five years later, yet another agreement was reached to supply water into the Guantánamo base via pipelines from the Yateras River, four and a half miles to its northeast.

By that date, the 45-square-mile compound occupying the lower half of Guantánamo Bay had become the U.S. Navy's principal Caribbean base, home to thousands of personnel and their dependents. Large numbers of Cuban laborers also entered every day to work. As its name was so often contracted as "G'tmo" in official papers, its nickname among the service soon became "Gitmo."

the 100-man, 1,200-ton gunboat Paducah on May 31. In response to pleas from local American planters and miners, 50 sailors are also disembarked from the Nashville and Paducah on June 10 in Nipe Bay, on the north coast of Oriente Province, traveling inland by rail to protect the mines of the Spanish-American Iron Works, until a marine company can circle around two days later from Guantánamo aboard the small auxiliary Eagle. The marine detachment from the 13,000-ton battleship USS Mississippi furthermore lands at El Cuero on June 19 to protect U.S. interests there as well.

Reassured by this strong U.S. naval deployment along both coastlines, the regular Cuban army and paramilitary volunteers launch a ruthless sweep throughout the region, indiscriminately slaughtering as many as 6,000 blacks over the next few weeks. Estenoz himself is shot at point-blank range along with some 50 followers on June 27 near Alto Songo, in the environs of Nipe Bay, his body being brought into Santiago de Cuba for public display. His colleague Pedro Ivonnet surrenders on July 18, only to be murdered, supposedly “while trying to escape.” The Afro-Cuban revolt having been crushed, U.S. marine units and navy ships retire into Guantánamo Bay to begin rotation back to their regular stations on the American mainland.

AUGUST 8, 1912. At 3:00 a.m., Haiti’s President Cincinnatus Leconte and some 200 soldiers are suddenly killed when the powder magazine beside the National Palace accidentally explodes, leveling the building and others nearby. His successor Tan-crède Auguste is sworn in that same day.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1912. In response to a request from Nicaragua’s unpopular Conservative president Adolfo Díaz, a battalion of 323 U.S. marines and seamen land at Corinto from the cruiser USS Colorado, raising the total strength available to the 52-year-old colonel Joseph “Uncle Joe” H. Pendleton in western Nicaragua to more than 2,500 men with which to put down a Liberal insurrection. Pendleton deploys his marines to take control of the railway line running inland to the capital Managua, then closes in upon the rebel stronghold near Lake Masaya, whose mountaintop fast of Fort Coyotepe controls the rail line and main road running toward Granada.

Coyotepe Hill in Nicaragua, October 1912. (U.S. Marine Corps)

Pendleton and his Conservative allies find the former Liberal minister of war, General Zeledón, entrenched here along with several hundred followers and the tiny fort's garrison commander, Col. Isidoro Díaz Flores, behind barbed-wire trenches atop Coyotepe and Barranca hills, plus a few machine guns. After the liberals refuse to surrender, a marine assault column steals halfway uphill before dawn on October 4. After being detected, it fights its way to the summit of Coyotepe Hill within less than an hour, suffering four killed and several wounded, but scattering the defenders and inflicting several score casualties. Díaz Flores falls, and the fleeing Zeledón runs into a Conservative force the next morning near Diriomo, who fatally wounds him and thereby brings an end to his insurrection.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1912. Amid growing dissatisfaction in the Dominican Republic with its recently imposed president, Eladio Victoria (see "November 19, 1911" entry), the U.S. administration of William H. Taft dispatches a diplomatic mission to resolve this island dispute. The transport Prairie arrives off the city of Santo Domingo from Philadelphia on October 2 with almost 800 men of the 2nd Provisional Marine Regiment under Col. Franklin J. Moses to lend weight to this diplomatic effort. Victoria agrees to resign by November 26, and after Archbishop Adolfo A. Nouel is installed as interim president in early December, the Prairie departs.

JANUARY 27, 1914. Lacking any military support, the rich Port-au-Prince lawyer and senator Michel Oreste resigns as Haiti's civilian president to go into exile aboard the German cruiser Vineta. On February 2, the rebel caco army, advancing from northeastern Haiti under its elderly leader Davilmar Théodore, is confronted at Artibonite outside the capital by a force under Gen. Charles Oreste Zamor and compelled to retreat. German, American, and French marines are disembarked at Port-au-Prince to protect their national interests during this lawless interlude.

FEBRUARY 4, 1914. This morning, Col. José Urdanivia Ginés leads an assault against the Peruvian National Palace. The attackers are initially hurled back by forces loyal to President Guillermo Billing-hurst (grandson of an English naval officer who served in South America's wars of independence). Thanks to tacit help from Army Chief of Staff Oscar R. Benavides, however, the rebels fight their way inside on a subsequent attempt, and Billinghurst is exiled.

FEBRUARY 5, 1914. Disappointed in its attempt to reach Haiti's capital of Port-au-Prince, the caco army of General Théodore systematically pillages the northern port city of Cap-Haïtien.

FEBRUARY 7, 1914. This evening, Charles Oreste Zamor's army marches triumphantly back into Haiti's capital, then storms the National Assembly to acclaim him president the next day.

OCTOBER 28, 1914. Plagued by economic difficulties, Haiti's President Charles Oreste Zamor resigns from office amid the usual scenes of pillage at Port-au-Prince. Ten days later, the northern army of Davilmar Théodore marches in unopposed, to assume the presidency on November 8.

DECEMBER 17, 1914. Concerned by the utter economic collapse of Haiti at a time when Europe has been plunged into World War I, Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan dispatches the U.S. gunboat Machias, which arrives off Port-au-Prince and sets 50 marines ashore to transfer the gold reserves out of that country's Franco-American-controlled national bank. The government of President Théodore protests, but the gold is nonetheless conveyed to New York.

JANUARY 15, 1915. Gen. Vibrun Guillaume Sam, commander of Haiti's Northern Department, revolts against President Théodore at Cap-Haïtien (population 25,000) and is joined a few days later by 1,000 caco rebels under "General" Metellus.

JANUARY 23, 1915. The 15,700-ton cruiser USS Washington of 47-year-old captain Edward Latimer ("Ned") Beach—father of the future author of the novel Run Silent, Run Deep—reaches Cap-Haïtien with the 59-year-old rear admiral William B. Caperton aboard, to confer with General Sam. Two days later, a meeting is held at which Caperton insists upon accompanying Sam's revolutionary army southward to prevent excesses.

Sam agrees, and the cruiser Des Moines and the 1,000-ton gunboat Wheeling join the Washington, shadowing the revolutionaries' progression.

FEBRUARY 5, 1915. Sam's revolutionary army occupies Gonaïves in north-central Haiti.

FEBRUARY 22, 1915. President Théodore abandons the capital Port-au-Prince aboard a Dutch liner at noon, and three days later General Sam is acclaimed as Haiti's new ruler. He will govern only five months, being in turn displaced by yet another revolutionary leader out of the north, Dr. Rosalvo Bobo.

MAY 19, 1915. The 4,000-ton, 420-man French cruiser Descartes sets a landing party ashore at Cap-Haïtien to prevent a massacre of foreign residents by Bobo's revolutionary besiegers.

JULY 1, 1915. The cruiser USS Washington returns to Cap-Haïtien with the armed yacht Eagle to protect American interests.

JULY 27, 1915. At dawn, the ex-Haitian police chief Charles de Delva escapes from asylum within the Portuguese Embassy and with 36 armed followers torches and assaults President Sam's national palace in Port-au-Prince. The latter, wounded in a leg, flees to the French Embassy, while his police chief, Charles Oscar Etienne, massacres 200 political prisoners under his charge, before taking refuge within the Dominican Embassy. An enraged mob drags Etienne back out into the street and hacks him to pieces, while Sam shares this same fate the next morning.

JULY 28, 1915. Haitian Occupation. At 11:40 a.m., USS Washington reaches riot-torn Port-au-Prince (population 100,000) and this same evening sets 170 marines and 170 sailors ashore at Bizoton Navy Yard under the marine captain George van Orden to march two miles eastward into this capital and restore order. By the next morning, with 2 Haitians dead and 10 wounded, the Americans are in control, then are reinforced on the evening of July 29 by the 19,250-ton transport Jason bearing a marine company from Guantánamo Bay (Cuba). At 8:00 p.m., a feeble Haitian counterattack strikes the U.S. detachment holding Fort Le Rebours south of Port-au-Prince, but is repelled with 6 attackers dead and 2 wounded. The Americans suffer 2 of their own sailors killed—one of whom is William Gompers, nephew of the famed labor leader Samuel Gompers.

On August 4, the 16,000-ton battleship Connecticut of Capt. E. H. Durell arrives with five companies of the 2nd Marine Regiment from League Island (Philadelphia) under Col. Eli Cole, who seizes the U.S. troops resting by a tropical roadside. (Usher Photographs, Hoover Institution)

Haitian arsenal in Port-au-Prince and disbands its local factions. The Eagle and the gunboat Nashville of Cmdr. Percy Olmstead simultaneously bring a halt to fighting outside Cap-Haïtien in the north, while the Jason is dispatched to bring Bobo to Port-au-Prince. Expecting to be greeted as president, the general is instead defeated in a hastily arranged election on August 12 by the American-backed candidate Philippe Sudre Dartiguenave. Bobo subsequently goes into exile at Kingston (Jamaica).

Dartiguenave's installation is resented by many Haitians, with a revolt erupting 40 miles west of Cap-Haïtien at Port-de-Paix. Outright opposition is stifled, however, by the arrival on August 13 of the 14,500-ton armored cruiser Tennessee, which conveys an additional 850 men and 35 machine guns of the 1st Marine Regiment under the 59-year-old colonel Littleton W. T. "Tony" Waller. Three days later, a sizable marine contingent is detached to garrison Cap-Haïtien as well, and Americans assume administrative duties throughout numerous lesser ports. The Haitian cacos retire into the interior of the island to wage a protracted guerrilla campaign against the occupiers.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1915. At dawn, Colonel Cole pushes inland from Cap-Haïtien with 130 marines, fighting the four miles into Haut du Cap by noon, losing 2 killed and 8 wounded as opposed to the loss of 60 caco guerrillas. The next day, Quartier Morin, five miles farther eastward along this same coast, is also occupied without resistance.

OCTOBER 4, 1915. Waller sails east from Cap-Haïtien aboard the Nashville and disembarks a marine company, occupying Fort Liberté and the inland border town of Ouanaminthe without opposition.

OCTOBER 20, 1915. Four marine squads advance out of Cap-Haïtien, pushing 20 miles into caco territory and occupying Bahun.

NOVEMBER 2, 1915. Under cover of darkness, a caco raiding party attacks Waller's field headquarters at Le Trou, roughly between Fort Liberté and Grande Rivière du Nord. The assault is repelled, costing 38 attackers their lives.

NOVEMBER 5, 1915. A marine column attempts to assault the major caco mountain stronghold of Fort Capois (situated on the eastern bank of Grande Rivière, 40 miles west of Vallière and about half-way between Grande Rivière du Nord and Bahun), but its garrison bolts into the jungle without loss. The same occurs three days later at Forts Selon and Berthol.

NOVEMBER 16, 1915. A storming force of 100 marines carries the caco mountain stronghold of Fort Rivière, located four miles west of the Grande Rivière narrows, killing 50 of its 75-man garrison and capturing the rest without suffering a single casualty.

JANUARY 5, 1916. Antoine Pierre Paul attempts to overthrow the Dartiguenave administration by having his followers fire upon Haiti's National Palace in Port-au-Prince at dawn. This coup is easily repressed by U.S. marines, five cacos being killed and many others arrested.

APRIL 14, 1916. After a prolonged bout of political unrest, the unpopular president Juan Isidro Jiménez of the Dominican Republic orders the arrest of several key supporters of his insubordinate war minister, Gen. Desiderio Arias. The latter mutinies and commandeers the country's main arsenal in the capital of Santo Domingo.

Following a two-week standoff, the general brings matters to a head by surrounding the National Chamber of Deputies with his 250 troops on May 1, calling for an immediate impeachment of the president. Jiménez advances from his country home with 800 loyal troops under General Pérez and orders Arias stripped of all authority.

MAY 3, 1916. Dominican Intervention. This afternoon, the U.S. transport Prairie of Commander Crosley and the gunboat Castine of Cmdr. Kenneth Bennett arrive off Santo Domingo from Haiti and, at dawn on May 5, disembark two marine companies—150 men—under Capt. Frederic "Dopey" Wise at the foot of Fort San Gerónimo, two miles from this capital (population 30,000) to protect American interests during the Jiménez-Arias confrontation.

Unwilling to cooperate with Wise in besieging his mutinous general, Jiménez resigns as president. Arias remains in possession of Fort Ozama until Friday, May 12, when the 1,500-ton U.S. dispatch vessel Dolphin and 3,325-ton store ship Culgoa arrive from Port-au-Prince with Admiral Caperton, plus two additional marine companies under Maj. Newt H. Hall. (A third company appears the next day from Guantánamo Bay aboard the 11,230-ton collier Hector.) With 400 men in total, the Americans order the general to evacuate his stronghold by Monday morning, May 15; they find Arias already departed northwestward by this deadline. Further reinforcements then continue to reach the American beachhead, as Washington intends to end the Dominican Republic's fractious internal politics by a full-scale intervention.

U.S. marines disembarking from the transport ship Prairie. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

On the morning of June 1, Wise occupies the northern coastal town of Monte Cristi with 120 marines from Cmdr. Harris Lanning's transport Panther, while 65 miles farther east another 133 marines under Maj. Charles Hatch go ashore from the 1,400-ton gunboat Sacramento of Cmdr. Roscoe Bulmer, wresting Puerto Plata from 500 Dominican defenders under General Rey after a heated exchange of gunfire. Three and a half weeks later, on June 26, Colonel Pendleton leads 800 marines eastward out of Monte Cristi to march 75 miles inland and attack Arias's new concentration around Santiago. After being briefly checked at Las Trincheras and Guayacanes, plus enduring repeated sniping, Pendleton rendezvouses on July 4 at Navarrete with another 135 marines under Maj. "Hiking" Hiram Bearss, who has pushed south from Puerto Plata. The next day, Arias surrenders, and during this afternoon Santiago is occupied without opposition, followed by other lesser towns over the next several days.

The Americans then take over administrative duties for the entire island and impose martial law as of November 29, inaugurating a lengthy occupation. Only Gov. Juan Pérez of San Francisco de Macorís, 30 miles southeast of Santiago, mounts a brief resistance, his 300-man garrison being surprised and scattered by a marine company under Lt. Ernest Williams. (Also, Captain Beach's USS Memphis is wrecked off Santo Domingo on August 29, 1916, by a surprise tidal wave, suffering 40 men killed and 204 injured.)

NOVEMBER 1, 1916. Despite an earlier pledge not to seek reelection, Conservative Cuban president Mario García Menocal runs again and is seemingly defeated by his Liberal opponent, amid widespread balloting irregularities. Nevertheless, when results are announced late that same December, he proclaims himself the victor.

An appeal to the Cuban Supreme Court in January 1917 is decided in the Liberals' favor, new elections being proposed for Oriente and Santa Clara provinces; however, García Menocal proves slow to respond.

JANUARY 27, 1917. In Costa Rica, the young, reform-minded president Alfredo González Flores is deposed in a military coup headed by his war minister, Federico Tinoco Granados. U.S. president Woodrow Wilson refuses to acknowledge this change of government, invoking Washington's 1909 Non-Recognition Policy; yet, thanks to support from Costa Rica's upper classes and American companies, plus a vigorously pro-Allied foreign policy, Tinoco is able to remain in power for the next 30 months.

FEBRUARY 11, 1917. Gómez's Revolt. At dawn, a few Cuban soldiers at Camp Columbia outside Havana rise up against President García Menocal in a coordinated coup and are quickly suppressed. However, other mutinies claim the garrisons at Camagüey, Santiago, and Guantánamo, while former president Gómez raises the banner of revolt in Santa Clara Province, and Pino Guerra and Baldomero Acosta—a former major-league baseball player with the Washington Senators—take the field in the west.

FEBRUARY 12, 1917. To protect American interests in rebel-held Santa Clara Province, the gunboat USS Paducah disembarks its bluejackets.

FEBRUARY 15, 1917. Before dawn, the decrepit U.S. gunboat Petrel of Cmdr. Dudley Knox arrives outside Santiago from Guantánamo Bay, agreeing to prevent Cuban government vessels from entering in exchange for a rebel pledge not to block its channel with scuttled ships.

FEBRUARY 19, 1917. Washington brands the Liberal revolt in Cuba “lawless and unconstitutional,” vowing to oppose it.

FEBRUARY 25, 1917. A detachment of 220 marines advance from Guantánamo Bay to occupy the city of Guantánamo. Another 200 disembark from the 5th U.S. Battleship Division to protect American sugar plantations on the western hook of Oriente Province.

MARCH 7, 1917. The rebellious ex-president Gómez is defeated and arrested in Santa Clara Province by Cuban government forces.

MARCH 8, 1917. Threatened by the steady advance of Cuban government forces, the rebel garrison at Santiago agrees to surrender control over this city at nightfall to landing parties from the elderly, 4,100-ton cruisers USS San Francisco (flag) and 5,600-ton Olympia, and the gunboat Machias.

MARCH 18, 1917. Cuba's short-lived “Sugar Revolt” officially ends when triumphant President García Menocal—at U.S. urging—promulgates a general amnesty for all rebels.

OCTOBER 17, 1918. The recently escaped Haitian general Charlemagne Peralte attacks the American-run gendarmérie barracks in his home town of Hinche (population 5,000) with 100 caco guerrillas, being repelled by its garrison with the loss of 35 of his followers.

NOVEMBER 10, 1918. The Haitian guerrilla chieftain Charlemagne overruns the town of Maisade, upriver from Hinche, ransacking its police barracks for weapons.

MARCH 1919. Hunt for Charlemagne. Because of the increased guerrilla activity in northeastern Haiti near the Dominican border, marine brigadier general Albertus W. Catlin requests reinforcements from Washington. Four companies of the 7th Marine Regiment consequently arrive from Guantánamo Bay, followed on March 31 by 13 aircraft—7 HS-2 flying boats and 6 Curtis JN-4 “Jenny” biplanes—which land at Bizoton airfield outside the capital of Port-au-Prince.

After joining the 500 marines and numerous gendarmes already deployed in Haiti's Northern District, the forces combine for a summer-long offensive against Charlemagne's elusive cacos. The latter responds by storming the northern gates of Port-au-Prince before dawn of October 6 with 300 followers, but the forewarned defenders halt this assault with machine-gun fire, killing 30 cacos and scattering Charlemagne and the rest.

Now determined to smother this insurrection, the Americans bribe ex-caco general Jean-Baptiste Conzé to lead a small party of 20 disguised marines into Charlemagne's camp near Grande Rivière on the night of October 31–November 1, where the

Charlemagne Peralte

Charlemagne Masséna Peralte was born in 1886 in the central Haitian city of Hinche, which borders the Dominican Republic. He was apparently of Dominican descent, as his surname had derived from the Spanish name "Peralta." An educated member of the rural bourgeoisie, he had already held several elected and appointed positions, as well as risen to the rank of general in the national army and served as garrison commander at Port-de-Paix in 1914, before the American intervention occurred the next summer. Peralte resigned his commission as military chief for the city of Léogâne and returned to his native Hinche to attend to his family's lands.

Resentment against racist elements of U.S. policy quickly grew in the occupied nation, particularly regarding the resumption of the hated corvée—a forced-labor system that compelled all Haitians to work on the new roads being built. Peralte and his stepbrother Saül were arrested on October 11, 1917, for leading an attempt against the home of the American police commander at Hinche. After a quick trial at Ouanaminthe, he was sentenced to five years' hard labor. Enduring the humiliation of toiling in prison garb throughout the streets of Cap-Haïtien, where he was well known, Peralte escaped on September 3, 1918. Slipping out of the city disguised by friends as a woman, he quickly gathered a group of rural guerrillas known as cacos, vowing to "drive the invaders into the sea."

Despite raising some 1,200 fighters and attracting the loyalty of tens of thousands of sympathizers, his 13-month campaign failed to dislodge the American presence. He was eventually betrayed and killed. A photo of his body was circulated to stifle further rebellions, and resistance collapsed without his charismatic leadership. Haiti did not regain its independence until May 1935.

Peralte's corpse was disinterred from Port Chabert almost immediately after the U.S. occupation ended and, after being identified by his mother by dint of its gold teeth, was reburied in a grand tomb at Cap-Haïtien. His state funeral was attended by President Sténio Vincent and many other mourners, and the reputation of the handsome young rebel grew over the ensuing decades. By the time the centennial of his birth was observed in 1986, Peralte was universally lionized as a model hero, compared and often preferred to the national founder Jean-Jacques Dessalines. His image is even featured on modern Haitian currency and postage stamps.

charismatic leader is shot dead by the 25-year-old sergeant Herman H. Hanneken, while the Brown-ing machine gun of 23-year-old corporal William R. Button slays nine of his bodyguards (both marine noncommissioned officers later are rewarded with promotions and the Medal of Honor).

MAY 6, 1919. Rebel forces under Julio Acosta García, determined to drive Tinoco from power in Costa Rica, strike across the border from Nicaragua to seize several small towns.

JUNE 2, 1919. Radical anarchists known as "Galleanists," being mostly Italian American immigrant followers of the violent agitator Luigi Galleani, detonate bombs in Washington and seven other U.S. cities. Carlo Valdonoci, while planting the Washington bomb outside the home of newly appointed attorney general A. Mitchell Palmer, is scattered over two city blocks when it detonates prematurely. A crackdown ensues against all leftist groups in the United States, being known as the "Palmer Raids."

JUNE 13, 1919. Riots against the Costa Rican dictator Tinoco erupt in its capital of San José and are put down with some bloodshed.

AUGUST 12, 1919. After months of mounting American pressure, including the arrival of the USS Castine at the Caribbean port of Limón and tacit support for an anti-Tinoco insurgency, the Costa Rican dictator is obliged to resign the presidency and sail away for exile in England.

JANUARY 15, 1920. Before sunrise, Charlemagne's chief lieutenant Benoît Brataville launches an assault upon Port-au-Prince with 300 caco irregulars. They are easily repelled, suffering more than 100 fatalities.

MAY 18, 1920. Brataville's camp near Las Cahobas (Haiti) is surprised by a marine patrol, and this leader is killed. The Americans remain in Haiti until August 15, 1934, when the 2nd Marine Regiment is recalled by President Herbert Hoover and full autonomy is restored to this island's rulers.

MEXICAN REVOLUTION (1910–1924)

In the summer of 1910, Porfirio Díaz—now approaching 80 years of age—stands for his eighth term as president, despite growing resentment against his long reign. When the wealthy, high-minded political neophyte Francisco I. Madero decides to run as head of an “anti-reelectionist” party, the president has him arrested. By the time the primary election date of June 21 dawns, 5,000 of Madero’s adherents are in prison; when the final elections are held on July 8, an estimated 60,000 are behind bars.

Díaz is proclaimed president on his birthday, September 27, yet his government is essentially doomed. That year also marks the centennial of Mexico’s revolt against Spain, and numerous stirrings have already been felt. When Madero escapes from loose confinement in San Luis Potosí on October 4 and gains asylum at San Antonio (Texas), then calls for an uprising by November 20, the situation explodes.

NOVEMBER 19, 1910. This night, Madero recrosses the border with a few followers, attempting the next day to foment insurrection at “Ciudad Porfirio Díaz” (Piedras Negras, opposite Eagle Pass, Texas), but he is chased back into the United States by federales.

NOVEMBER 20, 1910. Several small uprisings occur throughout Mexico, the most successful led by a 28-year-old teamster named Pascual Orozco from the town of San Isidro (modern Orozco, Chihuahua), who moves upon Miñaca and Guerrero.

On November 27, a portion of Orozco’s scratch force ambushes a federal column under Gen. Juan N. Navarro at Pedernales, then the guerrilla leader himself leads a descent against the federal outpost at Ciudad Guerrero, 100 miles west of Chihuahua City, which is captured in early December after a brief siege. Cerro Prieto and La Mojina are also attacked, while a federal column is ambushed in Mal Paso Canyon on January 2, 1911. After this latter victory, Orozco reportedly orders his men to gather up the light khaki caps and uniforms of the dead soldiers to be sent to Díaz with the taunt: Ahí te van las hojas, mándame más tamales (“Here are the wrappers, send me more tamales”).

JANUARY 30, 1911. Having abandoned Ciudad Guerrero (Chihuahua) with his 400 followers, Orozco destroys some lengths of railway track south of Ciudad Juárez (opposite El Paso, Texas), then seizes a freight and two passenger trains, using them to approach the federal garrison within Ciudad Juárez by February 2. Unable to reduce its outnumbered defenders, this city is relieved three days later by a federal column under Col. Antonio M. Rábago, which fights its way in via Bauche.

FEBRUARY 4, 1911. At dawn, a small revolutionary band under 49-year-old José Luis Moya takes the Zacatecan town of Nieves (population 5,000), departing this same evening, only to be repelled six days later at San Juan de Guadalupe.

FEBRUARY 13, 1911. A disguised Madero recrosses the Río Grande at Isleta, 15 miles southeast of El Paso (Texas), joining José de la Luz Soto’s 130 revolutionaries at the village of Zaragoza before penetrating deeper into Chihuahua.

This same day, Moya defeats a federal force under Maj. Ismael Ramos at El Ahuague, then occupies the town of San Juan de Guadalupe (Durango).

FEBRUARY 26, 1911. Moya’s 200 revolutionaries capture the town of Chalchihuites (Zacatecas).

MARCH 6, 1911. Madero attacks the depleted federal garrison under Col. Agustín Valdés at Casas Grandes (Chihuahua) with his 800 revolutionaries divided into three columns. The defenders resist successfully until relieved by Col. Samuel García Cuellar, who drives the attackers off toward Bustillos Hacienda, capturing most of their supplies.

Madero emerges wounded in his right arm, and his men suffer 100 casualties. Nevertheless, he will be joined over the ensuing few weeks by Orozco and many other local leaders—such as 600 men under the 32-year-old bandit Francisco “Pancho” Villa—who proclaim Madero as Mexico’s true president.

MARCH 10, 1911. From San Miguel Anenecuilco (Morelos), Pablo Torres Burgos leads 72 peasants in a revolt, striking out southward through its sugar plantations to gather greater strength. After overrunning nearby Tlaquiltenango on March 24 and then Jojutla, Torres Burgos is dismayed by the brutalities perpetuated by some of his followers, so he resigns. While riding back toward Moyotepec with his two sons, they are killed by a party of federales under Gen. Javier Rojas. Command of Torres Burgos's 800 revolutionaries subsequently devolves upon 32-year-old Emiliano Zapata.

MARCH 12, 1911. Moya seizes the rich mining town of Mapimí (Durango).

MARCH 26, 1911. Moya occupies Ciudad Lerdo.

APRIL 9, 1911. After briefly seizing Fresnillo and being chased off by federal forces, Moya surprises the city of Zacatecas with his 300 revolutionaries, camping in its Mercedes suburbs before proceeding north toward Veta Grande.

APRIL 19, 1911. Together with 48-year-old Calixto Contreras and Martín Triana, Moya retakes the town of San Juan de Guadalupe (Zacatecas).

APRIL 23, 1911. Ciudad Juárez. Four days after arriving to besiege the border town Ciudad Juárez with 3,500 ill-disciplined revolutionaries (Orozco is the "general" among this throng, and Villa serves as a "colonel"), Madero arranges a 10-day truce with the 700-man federal garrison under General Navarro to meet some plenipotentiaries who have come from President Díaz in Mexico City.

Talks are eventually broken off on May 6, after which the impatient Orozco and Villa arrange for their rebel troops to precipitate a firefight against the federales two days later, furnishing an excuse to storm Ciudad Juárez. Madero is constrained to watch as this assault pushes the outnumbered defenders back inside their cavalry barracks, where they surrender by May 10.

Three days after achieving this victory, Orozco and Villa challenge Madero, demanding that Navarro and his federal officers—infamous for their

Pancho Villa

The chaos engendered by the Mexican Revolution produced many unlikely generals, none more improbable than Pancho Villa. He was born on June 5, 1878, as Doroteo Arango Arámbula, into a poor family living at Río Grande near the hamlet of San Juan del Río in the arid northern state of Durango. After his father's death, he supported his mother and four siblings by working as a woodsman and itinerant salesman in the Sierra Madre Range. Big, strong, and a natural horseman, he always possessed the common touch among Mexico's poor.

Legend has it that, at the age of 16, he returned home to find that his younger sister Martina had been seduced and abandoned by Agustín López Negrete, the son of the owner of Gogojito Hacienda near Canatlán. In a fit of rage, Arango wounded López Negrete with a gunshot, then stole a horse and fled into the mountains. After a couple of years, he joined a gang of rustlers and thieves led by Ignacio Parra, adopting the pseudonym of Francisco "Pancho" Villa—an infamous local bandit recently hanged by the authorities. When Parra was slain in a police ambush, Villa temporarily assumed leadership over the surviving members, before the gang disintegrated. Roaming into the adjacent state of Chihuahua, Villa found occasional work as a manual laborer in the El Verde mine and as a bricklayer in the city of Chihuahua.

Once more reverting to crime, he took to the hills with a new gang. Villa's life was changed when his friend Eleuterio Soto introduced him in 1910 to the political agitator Abraham González, who believed that a revolution was needed to sweep away Mexico's Porfirian dictatorship and its oppressive upper classes. Although uneducated, Villa embraced this philosophy wholeheartedly and soon came to distinguish himself among the bands of riders gathering to topple the government. Brave, well armed, used to living rough, and a natural leader among the peasantry, he was also such a notable rider that he eventually become nicknamed the Centauro del Norte or "Centaur of the North."

Villa excelled in the irregular warfare that bewildered the Federal garrisons, and his callous brutality toward defeated foes added to his fearsome reputation. Crude and impulsive, he attained high rank and commanded vast armies in the field. Yet for all his cunning and flair for leadership, he was incapable of producing the disciplined force created by his less flamboyant, yet more intelligent and determined contemporary, Álvaro Obregón. A series of climactic defeats in the summer of 1915 reduced Villa, now 37 years of age, to living like a fugitive once more in the mountains. Although he eventually secured a government pardon and ownership of a vast estate, he enjoyed these riches for only three years before being murdered.

Pancho Villa riding his favorite horse Siete Leguas across the Bajada de los Carretones, on the north side of the border town of Ojinaga, shortly after its capture in January 1914. He galloped across several times until the American photographer John D. Wheelan could snap this, one of the most famous pictures of the Mexican Revolution. (Author's Collection) harshness—be executed, but Madero refuses and instead releases the captives into the United States. Both rebel commanders, after grudgingly acquiescing with Madero's decision, leave his service shortly thereafter.

MAY 7, 1911. Beset by armed outbreaks throughout Mexico, Díaz offers to resign the presidency.

This same day, Moya arrives at the rich mining town of Sombrerete (Zacatecas), driving out its 200-man federal garrison under Col. Fernando Trucy Aubert after two days of heavy fighting, during which the revolutionary chieftain is accidentally killed by a stray bullet.

MAY 12, 1911. Zapata's peasant army besieges the federal garrison at Cuautla (Morelos), fighting its way inside this burning city after six days of fierce fighting. The remaining defenders are found to have escaped by dawn of May 19. Numerous excesses are committed by the victors before Zapata can restore order. This capture closes the road leading into Mexico City.

MAY 15, 1911. Two days after the 700 federal troops holding Torreón (Coahuila) under Gen. Emiliano Lojero have repulsed various probes by revolutionary patrols, the defenders' three battalions withdraw through Huarache Canyon this Sunday at dawn. The city is thus left to be overrun by unruly followers of the revolutionary chieftains Benjamín Argumedo and Sixto Ugalde Guillén of Matamoros, as well as Orestes Pereyra, Gregorio García, and Jesús Agustín Castro.

This easy rebel victory is quickly marred by looting and the massacre of 303 unarmed Chinese civilians, about half the total number of Chinese living in this city of 14,000 inhabitants. Emilio Madero, nominal rebel commander for this district, finally restores order when he enters the city with his troops at 10:00 a.m. (The Maderista government will later agree to pay the Chinese government an indemnity of 3.1 million pesos for this massacre, although the president himself is killed before these funds can be disbursed.)

MAY 21, 1911. Cuernavaca (Morelos) is evacuated by its federal garrison and taken soon thereafter by Zapata.

MAY 25, 1911. After rioting has occurred the previous evening in Mexico City's main square, Díaz resigns and flees for Veracruz on May 26, to sail away aboard the German liner Ypiranga. Foreign minister Francisco León de la Barra becomes interim president until elections can be held.

MAY 26, 1911. This evening, the revolutionary leader Cándido Navarro enters the city of San Luis Potosí with more than 500 men, deposing its governor, José M. Espinosa y Cuevas, the next day.

MAY 31, 1911. The revolutionary "colonel" Benigno N. Zenteno occupies the state capital of Tlaxcala at the head of 3,000 men.

JUNE 7, 1911. A few hours after a strong earthquake has killed 207 people in Mexico City, Madero makes a triumphal entry into the shaken capital.

JUNE 12, 1911. Madero visits the state of Morelos, where Zapata has refused to disarm his revolutionary followers or restore any captured lands.

JUNE 22, 1911. Orozco's army triumphantly enters Chihuahua City, transforming it into his headquarters.

JULY 13, 1911. Zapatista troops stationed in Puebla begin arresting civilians supposedly implicated in a plot to assassinate Madero during a forthcoming visit. Federal troops under the 62-year-old colonel Aureliano Blanquet—on orders from interim president de la Barra—attack the Zapatista encampment within Puebla's bullring, killing 80 and wounding 200 of these unruly occupiers under colonels Gracia and Zenteno.

AUGUST 8, 1911. The hard-bitten, 66-year-old former Porfirian general Victoriano Huerta Ortega is dispatched into Cuernavaca (Morelos) with 1,000 federal troops to keep an eye on Zapata, who grudgingly demobilizes part of his peasant army.

AUGUST 22, 1911. The newly appointed federal governor of Morelos, Ambrosio Figueroa, executes 70 Zapatistas in Jojutla.

AUGUST 31, 1911. Ignoring Madero's calls for restraint, Huerta occupies Cuautla (Morelos) and orders Zapata's arrest, who flees into the hills.

OCTOBER 10, 1911. Zapata reoccupies Cuautla with 1,500 followers.

NOVEMBER 6, 1911. Having won the presidential election, Madero is installed into office in Mexico City.

NOVEMBER 9, 1911. From San Antonio (Texas), the ex-revolutionary leader Emilio Vázquez Gómez calls for a new revolt, this time against Madero.

NOVEMBER 11, 1911. Zapata narrowly escapes capture by federal troops and once again flees from Cuautla (Morelos).

NOVEMBER 27, 1911. Zapata publicly disavows Madero's presidency because of his apparent inability to cede land to the peasants.

DECEMBER 13, 1911. The 61-year-old, one-eyed, former Porfirian general Bernardo Reyes crosses the border from Texas, calling for a conservative uprising against Madero. Receiving no support, he surrenders to the authorities at Linares (Nuevo León) by Christmas Day.

FEBRUARY 6, 1912. The 35-year-old Zapatista leader Genovevo de la O launches a series of attacks against Cuernavaca (Morelos), prompting its federal garrison to raze the town of Santa María Ahuacatlán in retaliation.

FEBRUARY 10, 1912. Federal troops seize Zapata's mother-in-law, one of his sisters, and several brothers-in-law as hostages.

FEBRUARY 15, 1912. Gen. Juvencio Robles—new federal commander for the state of Morelos—launches a terror campaign against Zapatista resistance by ordering the town of Nexpa burned, followed over the next few days by San Rafael, Los Hornos, Los Elotes, Ayala, Coajomulco, and Ocotepec.

MARCH 3, 1912. Rellano. In Chihuahua City, the disaffected Orozco rises up against Madero, accusing him of failing to carry out the revolution's promise (although actually resentful at being passed over for promotion). A vanguard of 1,000 cavalrymen strikes southward a few days later under generals José Inés Salazar and Emilio P. Campa aboard two trains, to be followed by Orozco with 6,000 well-equipped irregulars. This action prompts Gen. José González Salas—a relative of Madero by marriage—to resign his post as war minister and march northward to confront him.

On March 25 near Rellano Station in southern Chihuahua, González Salas's vanguard is devastated by a runaway Orozquista locomotive, sent flying down the track filled with dynamite by Campa. The Maderista army is then attacked from the rear by Campa's rebel cavalry. During this fighting, a federal battalion even mutinies, having to be fired upon by other federal contingents. Wounded and despondent, González Salas orders a retreat into Torreón (Coahuila), before committing suicide at Bermejillo.

APRIL 1, 1912. Zapatista forces occupy Tepoztlán (Morelos), then enter Jonacatepec five days later.

APRIL 12, 1912. Huerta reaches Torreón (Coahuila) to take over González Salas's defeated army. After reorganizing this formation—and nearly executing “Brigadier General” Villa for insubordination—he advances northward into Chihuahua to confront Orozco.

In a summer-long campaign, Huerta inflicts a series of defeats upon the rebel leader's 7,000 men: at Los Conejos on May 12, at Rellano on May 22–23, at La Cruz in Bachimba Canyon in late June, at Bermejillo, at Chihuahua City, and finally at Ciudad Juárez on August 16. Although Orozco and his surviving followers win an isolated victory on September 11 against the federal garrison holding the border town of Ojinaga, the rebel leader is wounded during this fray so seeks refuge in the United States.

APRIL 26, 1912. Col. Pedro León's “Sierra Juárez” Battalion mutinies against Madero in Oaxaca City,

Villa walking away from the execution wall at Torreón after receiving a last-minute reprieve from President Madero. (Clendenen Papers, Hoover Institution) attempting to take over this capital a few days later, only to be driven out into the countryside and its commander executed by June.

JUNE 1, 1912. With 60 riders, Huerta defeats a 400-man Orozquista garrison at Parral (Chihuahua).

OCTOBER 16, 1912. Having previously resigned his commission in the federal army, the 44-year-old brigadier general Félix Díaz—nephew of the departed dictator Porfirio Díaz—leads the Veracruz garrison in a conservative rebellion against Madero. Within a week, loyal forces arrive outside this port, and Félix Díaz is arrested by October 23.

FEBRUARY 9, 1913. Decena Trágica. At 2:00 a.m. this Sunday morning, generals Manuel Mondragón and Gregorio Ruiz mutiny against Madero, marching into Mexico City from nearby Tacubaya at the head of the 1st, 2nd, and 5th Cavalry regiments. They are joined en route by the 1st Artillery Regiment, for a total of 2,400 men, 6 cannon, and 14 machine guns. (Some 600 cadets of the Tlalpan Military College also commandeer streetcars into the capital to support this insurrection.) One column releases Gen. Bernardo Reyes from imprisonment at Santiago Tlatelolco, while another frees Brig. Gen. Félix Díaz from Lecumberri Penitentiary. By the time the mutineers converge upon the presidential palace, it has already been briefly occupied by the cadets, who have been overwhelmed by 500 loyal troops of the 24th Battalion under the elderly general Lauro Villar. The latter also arrests Ruiz when the latter enters the main square, at which point shooting erupts. During the fighting, Reyes and another 300 people—including many curious civilians—are killed, and another 200 are wounded.

The mutineers withdraw and, at 1:00 p.m., force their way into the Ciudadela arsenal less than a mile away to dig in, executing Gen. Rafael Dávila and numerous other defenders. Meanwhile, Madero arrives from Chapultepec Castle at midday and appoints Huerta (who has been dismissed from the army so is in the crowd) as interim commander in place of Villar, now badly wounded. Huerta orders Ruiz and all rebel cadets shot by firing squad, while Madero travels toward Cuernavaca this afternoon to summon 1,000 more loyal troops under the 43-year-old brigadier general Felipe Ángeles. Monday, February 10, passes in silence, shattered at 10:00 a.m. Tuesday morning when an artillery duel erupts—with the mutineers holding out inside the Ciudadela—during which a further 500 civilians are killed. (Eventually, 5,000 will perish over this Decena Trágica or “Tragic Fortnight.”)

Huerta and Ángeles now command 6,000 troops, while 1,800 remain to the rebels Mondragón and Díaz; still, Huerta seems incapable of reducing this ancient fortress, provoking doubts as to his loyalty. After five more days of long-range shelling, Madero’s youngest brother Gustavo arrests Huerta at 2:00 a.m. of February 18, accusing him before the president of treachery. Unconvinced, Madero orders his general released. At 1:30 this same afternoon of February 18, Huerta in turn detains Gustavo Madero, then sends General Blanquet’s 29th Battalion to capture the president, who is seized after a brief struggle along with Vice President José María Pino Suárez and most of the cabinet. By 9:30 p.m., Huerta meets with Díaz at the residence of the U.S. ambassador Henry Lane Wilson—a vocal critic of Madero—to sign a pact whereby the former temporarily assumes the presidency on the understanding that he will support the ex-dictator’s son during forthcoming elections. (For his role in this treachery, Wilson is shortly thereafter recalled to Washington and forced to retire. A 2,100-man brigade of two U.S. marine regiments is also sent from Norfolk, Virginia, and Philadelphia to bolster strength at Cuba’s Guantánamo Bay in the event that direct intervention is required; they will be returned home three months later.)

FEBRUARY 22, 1913. After resigning office and being promised safe passage into Cuban exile, Madero is driven to Lecumberri Penitentiary on the edge of Mexico City at night and cruelly murdered.

FEBRUARY 24, 1913. Venustiano Carranza, the 53-year-old governor of Coahuila, revolts in northern Mexico against the usurper Huerta, along with such noteworthy guerrilla chieftains as 33-year-old Pablo González, Lucio Blanco, Eulalio and Luis Gutiérrez, the 39-year-old ex-photographer Francisco Murguía, Emilio Salinas, Cesáreo Castro, Jacinto B. Treviño, and many others.

MARCH 9, 1913. Having earlier escaped from prison into El Paso, Villa recrosses the Texas border to raise troops and fight against Huerta.

MARCH 13, 1913. A 33-year-old, newly promoted revolutionary colonel named Álvaro Obregón—

Tunes of War

Because so many irregulars without uniforms joined the Mexican Revolution, one distinguishing feature was to be the music played by each faction. Northern rebels were identified as early as the spring of 1911 by “La Adelita,” a lively piece sung by Maderista troops under Domingo and Mariano Arieta as they marched into Mexico City. It was later adopted by Pancho Villa’s armies. His own favorite would be “Las Tres Pelonas,” a ribald ballad about three women on a balcony cheering passing troops: first those of Villa, then of his bitter rival Álvaro Obregón, then of his ally Tomás Urbina, then of his hated opponent Carranza, and finally of Villa again.

Obregón’s well-disciplined army from Sonora was recognized by “La Valentina.” “El Abandonado” was favored by conservative backers of the Díaz regime, and later by Victoriano Huerta. Patrick O’Hea, a transplanted young Irishman who met many of the revolution’s leading figures, recorded in his Reminiscences the last request made by Jesús “Cheché” Campos, leader of a bloodthirsty pack of right-wing vigilantes known as the Colorados. Standing before the execution wall, Campos asked for a three-finger shot of sotol and for the band to play “El Abandonado.” He then “closed his eyes and gave the sign to the firing-squad.”

Hundreds of ballads known as corridos, sung in restaurants or public places by street musicians, narrated the great clashes of the war. “La Toma de Zacatecas,” for example, gave an account of Villa’s capture of that city in June 1914, while “Nuestro México, Febrero Veintitrés” satirized Pershing’s cross-border incursion of two years later. Troubadours also noted the passing of famous personages such as Benjamín Argumedo and Gabino Barrera. The suffering of the anonymous soldiery was described in “Carabina 30–30,” “Soldado de Levita,” and many other songs. Eventually, these simple yet enduring tunes—favorites of revolutionary armies—passed into the very fabric of Mexico’s culture.

having advanced northward from Hermosillo (Sonora) five days previously with 1,500 troops—launches an assault at 5:15 a.m. with 900 of his men in two columns out of the east and west against the 100-man Huertista garrison of regular army colonel Manuel Reyes and the 300 rurales under Colonel Kosterlitzky, who are jointly holding trenches in the border town of Nogales. After fighting all day, the defeated defenders retreat into Arizona, surrendering to the American authorities. They are interned at Fort Rosencrans in San Diego (California).

MARCH 17, 1913. In Chihuahua, Orozco accepts the rank of brigadier general in Huerta’s federal army.

MARCH 22, 1913. Carranza attacks Saltillo (Coahuila) with three small revolutionary columns, only to be forced to withdraw two days later because of a lack of ammunition.

MARCH 26, 1913. The tiny government garrison at Cananea surrenders to revolutionary forces under the 39-year-old municipal mayor, Manuel Macario Diéguez Lara (a veteran of the 1906 strike; see “June 1, 1906” entry in “Portents in Mexico”), now a subordinate of Obregón.

APRIL 15, 1913. After heavy fighting at Naco and Agua Prieta in the state of Sonora (south of Douglas, Arizona), Obregón and Diéguez defeat all remaining Huertista forces under Gen. Pedro Ojeda along the U.S. border, facilitating the purchase by revolutionaries of more arms and ammunition.

APRIL 17, 1913. After several months of peace in Morelos, Robles deposes its state government, being appointed military chief by Huerta.

APRIL 18, 1913. The 30-year-old rebel chief Pánfilo Natera García—an ex-corporal in the Porfirian rurales or rural police—occupies Jerez (Zacatecas) by following a circuitous approach with 400 riders, thereby surprising its 100-man federal garrison, who then join his ranks.

APRIL 19, 1913. Zapata fails to overwhelm the Huertista garrison under General Aguilar holding Jonacatepec (Morelos), despite surprising its defenders on April 17 and fighting desperately for a day and a half. The defending commander finally defects to the Zapatista cause on April 19.

APRIL 23, 1913. Zapata besieges the Huertista garrison within Cuautla (Morelos), yet is unable to subdue its defenders because of a lack of artillery. A fortnight later, some of his revolutionaries blow up a military train, killing 100 federal troops and provoking a brutal reprisal roundup of civilians.

MAY 8, 1913. Natera circles Fresnillo (Zacatecas) and is joined by almost all its federal garrison. Left with only a half-dozen loyal troops, Huertista major Natividad del Toro locks himself inside the stronghold and, when almost smoked out by burning sacks of chili, commits suicide.

MAY 9, 1913. Santa Rosa. Having witnessed the arrival of the warships General Guerrero, Tampico, and Morales, as well as a pair of steamers bearing a total of 3,000 Huertista reinforcements into the Pacific port of Guaymas (Sonora), Colonel Obregón's small revolutionary army retreats north toward the state capital of Hermosillo, until ordered to make a stand by Acting Gov. Ignacio L. Pesqueira.

On May 12, Obregón chooses to fight at Santa Rosa Hacienda, where the next day he checks the advance of General Gil and the 40-year-old brigadier general Luis Medina Barrón, thereby winning promotion to the rank of brigadier general.

MAY 29, 1913. Obregón dispatches a Martin pusher biplane built in California and piloted by 27-year-old, French-born Didier Masson, with the Mexican captain Joaquín Alcalde along as his bombardier, 40 miles southward across the Sonoran Desert to attempt to bomb the Huertista warships anchored in the Pacific port of Guaymas (Sonora). Extemporized bombs are dropped this day and the next in three separate attacks, but they fail to strike the 1,880-ton, English-built cruiser General Guerrero.

MAY 30, 1913. Zapata declares Huerta unworthy of occupying the presidency so officially launches his own separate war against the regime.

JUNE 1, 1913. Natera occupies the Bufa Heights, using this high ground to win Zacatecas City below—although it is recaptured two weeks later by Huertista general José Delgado.

JUNE 4, 1913. This morning, Pablo González's small revolutionary army seizes the border town of Matamoros. Its 50-man regular garrison under Maj. Esteban Ramos and several hundred militia volunteers under the 23-year-old colonel Antonio Echazarreta are defeated, suffering more than 100 dead and hundreds wounded, while frightened civilian refugees flee across the border into Brownsville (Texas). Some 30 captives are executed after the city's fall.

JUNE 18, 1913. The 36-year-old revolutionary "colonel" Tomás Urbina R. captures Durango (Coahuila), gaining considerable booty.

JUNE 20, 1913. Obregón defeats a Huertista force under Ojeda at Santa María (Sonora), then does the same one week later at San Alejandro, driving his beaten foes back into Guaymas and besieging them inside until July 8, when he pushes still farther southward with his army.

AUGUST 19, 1913. Huertista troops overrun Zapata's base at Huautla (Morelos), but the rebel chief-ain escapes into the hills.

AUGUST 26, 1913. With 700 riders—plus two 75-pounders directed by ex-federal artillery colonel Juan Medina—Villa wins his first independent victory by defeating Gen. Félix Terrazas's 1,300-man Huertista garrison at San Andrés, near Riva Palacio, southwest of the state capital of Chihuahua. Some 100 defenders are killed outright, while another 236 are executed afterward—in rows four deep so as to save ammunition—compared to only 32 rebel dead. Booty includes three trainloads of supplies, which Villa, pausing at San Nicolás de Carretas, distributes among his men.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1913. Villa's 700 riders incorporate Maclovio Herrera's 400 at Santa Rosalía de Camargo, then continue into Jiménez to be joined by Urbina's 600-man force. Pressing still farther on to La Goma Hacienda, only 15 miles west of the strategic city of Torreón, they are reinforced by further contingents under Orestes Pereyra and Calixto Contreras for a major attempt against the beleaguered 3,500 Huertistas holding that city under Gen. Eutiquio Munguía. The latter's federal brigadier generals include such veteran commanders as Campa, Argumedo, Luis Anaya, and Felipe Álvarez.

SEPTEMBER 29, 1913. Torreón (First Battle). Having sallied from this city with 1,000 men, the Huertista generals Campa and Álvarez probe Villa's huge encampment with a long-range bombardment, hoping to scatter his ill-disciplined following—now swollen to 10,000 men and dubbed the División del Norte or "Northern Division" and boasting four field-pieces and a few machine guns. Instead, Villa orders a general advance eastward against Torreón (Coahuila) in three columns: his own "Villa Brigade" under Col. Toribio Ortega driving along the southern bank of the Nazas River toward Áviles; Maclovio Herrera and the "Juárez Brigade" following the northern bank toward the twin towns of Lerdo and Gómez Palacio; while Urbina's "Morelos Brigade" covers Villa's right. The "Zaragoza" and Benjamín Yuriar's brigades are to remain behind as a reserve.

Civilian volunteers posing around a fieldpiece prior to the First Battle of Torreón. (Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, Mexico)

Argumedo appears atop La Cruz Hill with his Huertista cavalry but cannot stem the Villista onrush, despite repeated countercharges. Within an hour, the outnumbered Huertistas are falling back. The hamlet of Áviles is carried by Urbina and Pereyra after four hours of heavy fighting, during which the Huertista general Álvarez is slain, while Campa is driven out of Lerdo by Herrera and Contreras. The victors quickly begin executing some 500 prisoners gathered at Áviles, before being ordered to stop by Villa. Villa continues on through Huarache Canyon toward Torreón with 6,000–7,000 men of the Villa and Morelos brigades, while his reserve Zaragoza and Yuriar brigades are to circle around the city.

Munguía braces to receive this onslaught by detaching Huertista units to entrench themselves atop Polvorera, Calabazas, and Unión hills outside the city, as well as within its two principal factories—solidly built of brick—while civilians flee en masse.

The first long-range skirmishes erupt on the evening of September 30, Calabazas and Polvorera hills being taken overnight. Amid intense fighting the next day, Villa personally leads the final charge that carries the revolutionaries into Torreón on October 1, despite heavy losses. Some 232 Huertista defenders lie dead—a total of 800 having been killed over these past three days—while another 109 are captured, along with 11 cannon, 5 machine guns, and almost 40 trains. Fires consume many of the city buildings. Munguía flees eastward with the survivors of his Nazas Division to join Gen. Tracy Aubert's 7,000-man Huertista concentration around Monterrey six days later and face a court-martial.

LATE OCTOBER 1913. Having extorted a forced loan at Torreón, executed Yuriar for insubordination, and left Contreras in command of the gutted city's garrison, Villa leads a train convoy northward to launch repeated assaults against Chihuahua City. He is unable, however, to subdue its Huertista garrison under Gen. Salvador R. Mercado.

NOVEMBER 14, 1913. Obregón's newly created revolutionary "Army of the Northwest" captures Culiacán (Sinaloa) and cuts all overland communication into the Huertista-held port of Mazatlán. He gathers further strength for a major spring offensive.

NOVEMBER 15, 1913. Having left some of his troops to watch the Huertista garrison within Chihuahua City, Villa heads northward and intercepts a coal train traveling in the opposite direction from Ciudad Juárez, compelling its terrified conductor to telegraph back to his railway office that it is impossible to reach Chihuahua City. Villa unloads the train and hides his troops aboard, orders it to return, and thus glides into Ciudad Juárez (opposite El Paso, Texas) after nightfall of November 15 to capture it with ease. Several hundred executions follow, despite Villa's personal leniency in numerous cases.

NOVEMBER 18, 1913. Pablo González captures Ciudad Victoria (Tamaulipas), followed shortly thereafter by Nuevo Laredo and Guerrero.

NOVEMBER 23, 1913. Tierra Blanca. Villa's 6,200-man División del Norte makes a stand along the high ground south of Ciudad Juárez, occupying a 12-mile line between Bauche and the Tierra Blanca Railway Station to await 5,500 federales traveling northward out of Chihuahua City under the Huertista general José Salazar.

The latter launches a series of ferocious assaults, which over the course of November 23–24 bleed his army white. Leaving almost 1,000 dead upon the field, Salazar is in full-flight retreat southeastward by the evening of November 24, heading toward the border town of Ojinaga opposite Presidio (Texas). Upon learning of this defeat, the 200-man Huertista garrison holding Chihuahua City under Gen. Salvador R. Mercado abandons this outpost before the end of the month, fleeing along with hundreds of adherents by train into Ojinaga (population 3,000).

DECEMBER 8, 1913. Villa occupies Chihuahua City unopposed, the Chinese Mexican general Manuel Chao—Carranza's appointee—eventually being installed officially as its governor, despite Villa's reluctance.

LATE DECEMBER 1913. Villa detaches his 31-year-old brigadier general Pánfilo Natera with 3,000 troops to besiege Mercado and Salazar within Oji-naga. Natera fails to subdue these surviving Huertista remnants.

JANUARY 10, 1914. Ojinaga. Villa's main army joins Natera before Ojinaga and, in a 65-minute assault, pulverizes Mercado's and Salazar's remaining federales, sending 2,000 frightened survivors streaming into internment in Presidio, Texas—whose American garrison has just come under the command of the 53-year-old general John Joseph "Black Jack" Pershing. This victory ends all Huertista resistance in the state of Chihuahua.

(It is also believed that the 71-year-old American writer Ambrose Bierce, attached to Villa's retinue, may have been killed during the assault on this city, his body never being found.)

MARCH 11, 1914. Pablo González briefly occupies Tampico (Tamaulipas).

MARCH 12, 1914. Siege of Cuautla. Having been preceded a few days earlier by contingents under his subordinates Julián Blanco, Jesús Salgado, and Heliodoro Castillo, Zapata arrives to besiege Cuautla (Morelos) with 5,000 revolutionaries. Its Huertista garrison is overrun by March 23, and although Gen. Luis G. Cartón briefly escapes southward for Acapulco, he is soon run down—along with 43 staff officers—and executed at Chilpancingo.

MARCH 22, 1914. Torreón (Second Battle). This city having been reoccupied by Huertistas three months previously, Villa returns to reconquer it with 12,000 troops subdivided into nine infantry and cavalry brigades, plus two artillery regiments under the former federal general Ángeles. After overwhelming its outlying towns, Villa assaults Torreón on March 28. Its 10,000-man Huertista garrison puts up a stout resistance under Gen. José Refugio Velasco but is eventually driven out on April 2, after sustaining heavy losses. Villa estimates his own casualties at 500 dead and 1,500 wounded.

Belated relief columns of Huertistas begin to gather nearby at San Pedro de las Colonias Hacienda (Madero's former estate) under Gen. Francisco Romero, consisting of 1,700 soldiers under Gen. Javier de Maure, 250 mounted rurales under Col. Francisco Cárdenas, 1,700 conscripts under Gen. Carlos García Hidalgo, 1,300 troops under Gen. Joaquín Maas, a volunteer brigade under Rodrigo Paliza, as well as Velasco's 4,000 survivors reassembling at Viesca. Villa decides to sortie before this dis-

Villa's artillery massed outside the city under the direction of Gen. Felipe Ángeles prior to the Second Battle of Torreón. (Author's Collection) jointed force can coalesce into a stronger threat, so he dispatches the brigades of Gen. José Isabel Robles and Col. Raúl Madero in pursuit on April 3, to be followed by his main División del Norte and artillery train.

MARCH 23, 1914. Zapata captures Chilpancingo (Guerrero).

APRIL 5, 1914. San Pedro de las Colonias. Villa's subordinates Rosalio Hernández and Toribio Ortega previously engaged Romero's 6,000 Huertista troops, who are marshalling at San Pedro de las Colonias Hacienda outside Torreón (Coahuila). The main rebel army deploys and quickly advances into battle, coming within one-third mile of its railway station before being checked by federal troops entrenched behind rows of cotton bales. Long-range exchanges ensue into the next day, when the Huertista general Argumedo leads a cavalry column into San Pedro, then on April 7 attempts to fight his way back to Viesca with ammunition for Velasco's waiting army. Repulsed, Argumedo only wins free from the beleaguered town thanks to a major Huertista sally led by generals de Maure and Paliza the next day, which costs the lives of several hundred troops.

At dawn on April 9, Villa orders an all-out assault against the more than 5,000 Huertistas still defending San Pedro Hacienda, to crush them before Velasco can arrive in relief. General Maas mounts a tenacious resistance on the northwestern side of the hacienda, while the cemetery to its southeast is equally well defended by García Hidalgo, until Velasco's column fights its way inside from Buenavista that evening.

Both sides recuperate their strength, before Villa orders a second assault for dawn of April 12. The initial attack pushes close to Velasco's headquarters, who receives a wound, after which his troops are gradually worn down and flee in all directions by late afternoon, as San Pedro de las Colonias erupts in flames. That evening, the victorious Villa estimates Huertista losses at 3,500 dead, wounded, or captured, compared to 650 of his own men.

APRIL 8, 1914. Zapata's Ejército Libertador or "Liberator Army," following its victory at Cuautla, advances westward and captures Iguala (Guerrero), followed shortly thereafter by Taxco. His peasants now control all of Morelos, except the Santa Clara and Tenango haciendas—protected by Japanese mercenaries under a French officer.

APRIL 9, 1914. At Tampico—once more reoccupied by federal troops under Gen. Ignacio Morelos Zaragoza, and besieged by anti-Huertista rebels—eight unarmed U.S. seamen from the gunboat Dolphin come ashore under 23-year-old assistant paymaster Charles W. Copp during a lull in the fighting to pick up some gasoline. Instead, they are detained by 10 Tamaulipas militiamen and brought before Col. Ramón H. Hinojosa, who orders their release and apologizes along with Morelos Zaragoza for this inconvenience.

The 57-year-old rear admiral Henry Thomas Mayo—commander of the 4th Division of the U.S. Atlantic Fleet stationed off Mexico's Gulf coast to protect American interests—refuses to be mollified by this gesture and, without clearance from Washington, insists that the Mexican general punish the miscreants, issue a formal apology in writing, and hoist the American flag ashore, saluting it with a 21-gun salvo. The subsequent refusal to comply with this latter request provokes a diplomatic showdown with Huerta (whom President Woodrow Wilson has disliked ever since his brutal usurpation of power).

APRIL 14, 1914. Wilson orders the U.S. Atlantic Fleet to concentrate off Mexico, and Rear Adm. Charles J. Badger's battleship squadron sails from Hampton Roads (Virginia) this same evening.

APRIL 21, 1914. Veracruz Landing. Wishing to punish Huerta by intercepting a shipment of 200 machine guns and 15 million rounds of ammunition scheduled to arrive aboard the Hamburg-America liner Ypiranga, Wilson authorizes 58-year-old rear admiral Frank Friday Fletcher to disembark his forces and seize Veracruz (population 40,000).

The American commander first advises his British counterpart, 52-year-old rear admiral Sir Christopher G. F. M. "Kit" Craddock aboard the 680-man, 9,800-ton armored cruiser HMS Essex, plus the captain of the antique, 9,200-ton Spanish armored cruiser Emperador Carlos V—whose warships lie in the roadstead—of these impending hostilities. Mexican commodore Alejandro Cerisola, commander of the 160-man garrison on the offshore island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa, is also forewarned.

At 11:00 a.m., 800 American seamen and marines head inshore under Capt. William R. Rush of USS Florida and marine lieutenant colonel Wendell C. "Buck" Neville, while Gen. Gustavo Maas—military commander for the city of Veracruz proper—is advised not to offer any resistance with his 18th and 19th battalions (600 regulars under brigadier generals Luis B. Becerril and Francisco Figueroa, respectively). The latter withdraw 10 miles inland by train to Tejería, but civilian snipers and 90 cadets from the Mexican Naval Academy open fire around noon, as the invaders begin moving through city streets. Some 400 reinforcements are therefore rushed ashore from USS Utah, and all resistance is subdued by 3:00 p.m., 4 Americans being killed and 20 wounded.

The 8,100-ton Ypiranga is detained upon its arrival at 2:00 p.m., its armaments proving not to have originated in Germany but rather from the Remington Company in the United States. Admiral Badger's battleships Arkansas, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Vermont, and New Jersey arrive after midnight on April 21–22, setting an additional 1,500 bluejackets and marines ashore the next dawn. (Eventually, as more U.S. warships join, 3,300 sailors and 2,500 marines enter Veracruz.) Sporadic sniper fire resumes, but the city is firmly under U.S. control by 11:00 a.m. on April 23, when Col. John A. Lejeune disembarks from USS Hancock to assume temporary command over its marine occupiers. Some 126 Mexicans have died and another 195 have been injured during this operation, compared to 17 American dead and 63 wounded.

Although directed against Huerta, this invasion is resented by all Mexicans. At Tampico, crews from the neutral HMS Essex and German cruiser Dresden must evacuate American civilians under a flag of truce. Meanwhile, San Juan de Ulúa capitulates to the Americans by April 26 and is actually occupied by a marine company from the battleship North Dakota two days later. Shortly before midnight on April 27, Brig. Gen. Frederick Funston arrives from Texas City with the 5th Reinforced Brigade (4th, 7th, 19th, and 28th Infantry regiments) aboard the transports Kilpatrick, Meade, Sumner, and McClellan to garrison Veracruz.

U.S. forces will remain in possession of this city throughout most of this year, as Washington is bewildered by the rapid-fire changes in Mexican administrations: Huerta is succeeded by Carranza, who in turn is challenged by Villa and Zapata. Eventually, Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan announces on November 13 that Veracruz will be unilaterally evacuated.

MAY 4, 1914. Having advanced five days previously out of Culiacán through Modesto Station and Venadillo, Obregón and his 36-year-old subordinate Benjamín G. Hill combine and arrive to besiege the Huertista garrison inside Mazatlán (Sinaloa) with six revolutionary infantry battalions and two cavalry regiments. His opponents Diéguez and Lucio Blanco counter by capturing Acaponeta (Nayarit) on May 5, followed by Tepic nine days afterward.

MAY 12, 1914. Paredón. On Carranza's orders, Villa and his victorious forces are to be diverted eastward from Torreón to rout the remnants of Velasco's defeated Huertista army regrouping at Paredón (Coahuila). They are then to fight their way on to counter General Maas in Saltillo. General Ángeles consequently departs Torreón with Villa's three-dozen artillery pieces aboard railcars, reaching Saucedo Station by May 13 only to discover that the line into Paredón is completely destroyed and that 5,000 Huertistas are reassembling there under generals Ignacio Muñoz and Francisco Osorno. In addition, another 15,000 under Maas lie farther back at Saltillo.

Villa builds up his own huge force around his field headquarters at Hipólito before giving the order to advance through Josefa Canyon toward Paredón on May 16. The next morning, the Villista host closes in upon Muñoz's and Osorno's unprepared Huertistas, ignoring the feeble artillery counterfire, and launches a devastating cavalry charge shortly after 10:30 a.m. with 6,000 riders, an unbridled rush that panics and scatters their demoralized foes within 15 minutes. Hundreds of Huertistas are slain (many by firing squads), while 2,100 are captured along with 10 cannons and all their supply trains. Only the Huertista cavalry under Gen. Miguel Ál-varez succeeds in escaping through Mesillas and Valle Perdido toward Saltillo, closely pursued by Brig. Gen. José Isabel Robles. Maas subsequently evacuates Saltillo without a fight, which is occupied by the Villista army on May 20.

MAY 19, 1914. Having left 3,000 revolutionary troops under his subordinate Ramón F. Iturbe to maintain the siege of Mazatlán, Obregón visits Tepic (Nayarit).

JUNE 10, 1914. Zacatecas. On Carranza's orders, Brigadier General Natera pushes southward and attempts to assail the city of Zacatecas with only 6,000 revolutionaries—his so-called División del Centro or "Central Division," comprised almost exclusively of cavalymen. They are badly beaten by the city's 12,000 Huertista defenders under Medina Barrón, who furthermore enjoy the advantage of 11 field-pieces and 90 machine guns.

After Natera becomes engaged, Carranza telegraphs Villa to order him to send reinforcements from his own much larger, better-equipped División del Norte, which is lying at Torreón. Villa instead requests permission to lead his own troops personally, and when the jealous Carranza refuses, Villa mutinies

Devastation following the June 1914 assault on Zacatecas showing the ruined Palacio Federal leveled by demolition charges during the defenders' flight. (Museo de la Toma de Zacatecas) and strikes southward on June 16 to join Natera at Fresnillo. By the afternoon of June 22, Villa has 25,000 troops and 50 guns massed before Zacatecas, his revolutionary infantry and cavalry deployed to its east at Guadalupe, as well as south-southwest of

Álvaro Obregón

Álvaro Obregón was a modest and reluctant participant in the Mexican Revolution who rose to become its greatest general. He was born Álvaro Obregón Salido on February 19, 1880, at Siquisiva Ranch near Navojoa in the torrid northwestern state of Sonora. After receiving a basic education, he taught primary school at Moroncárit before turning to farming like his father. At the age of 23, Obregón married. In 1905, he bought his own small ranch on the Mayo River banks, which he named Quinta Chilla. His quiet life was saddened by his wife's death after giving birth to two sons. Obregón remarried in March 1910 and eventually sired another seven children.

The outbreak of the revolution elsewhere in Mexico that November did not at first involve him. Still, Obregón was so well liked in his district that he was elected municipal president of Huatabampo in 1911. His military career began when Pascual Orozco rebelled in neighboring Chihuahua against President Madero in March 1912. Obregón offered to serve his state government and quickly raised 300 volunteers. Named the 4th Irregular Battalion of Sonora, he became its lieutenant colonel. Obregón campaigned under Gen. Agustín Sanginés until Orozco's rebellion was crushed. He then dissolved his battalion and resigned his commission in January 1913.

The next month, Madero's murder in Mexico City by the usurper Victoriano Huerta revived the revolution. Obregón was recalled to duty, was promoted to colonel, and was made chief of staff for all Sonoran troops. A series of small victories led to his becoming brigadier general. He was then ordered in September 1913 to organize the much larger Ejército del Noroeste or "Army of the Northwest." The English professional soldier Ivor Thord-Gray, who joined Obregón's staff at that time, noted approvingly that his diminutive commander, "unlike many other generals, was very keen to learn, and he did."

The result was a disciplined army capable of defeating much larger foes. Obregón embraced the use of modern weaponry, such as machine guns and aircraft. His Ejército Invicto or "Undefeated Army" eventually ended the revolution by beating all rivals. Less flashy than Pancho Villa or Emiliano Zapata, Obregón proved deliberate in preparing for battle and calm once action was joined. And despite becoming Mexico's president, his ambitions always remained humble. He returned home often to Huatabampo, where his body lies buried today.

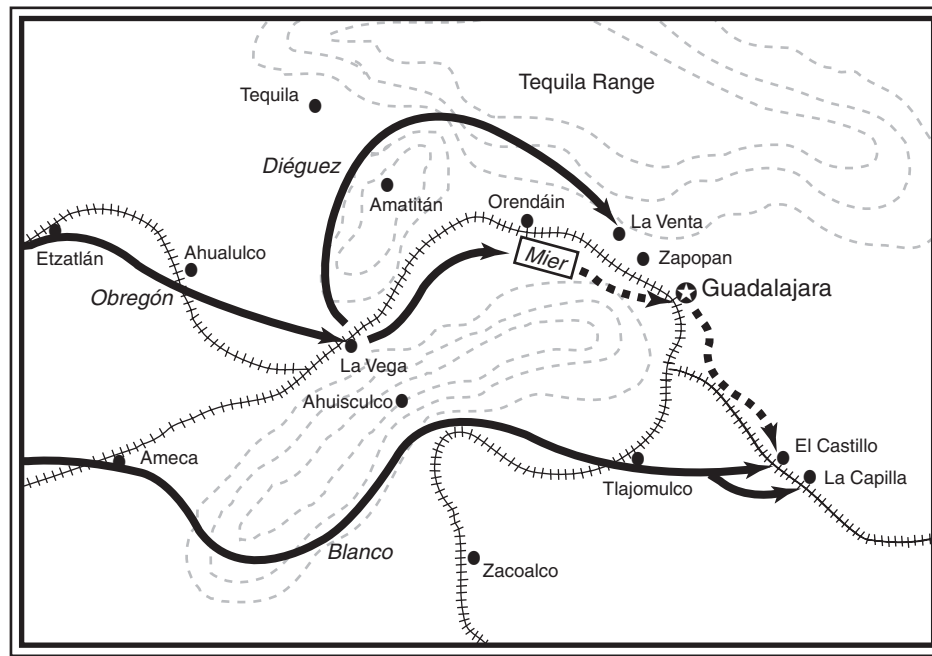

the city, driving the defenders back atop the fortified hills of El Grillo west of Zacatecas and to La Bufa to its east. Ángeles meanwhile installs his batteries to the north at Veta Grande.

At 10:00 a.m. on June 23, Villa launches a massive assault, his troops scaling El Grillo by 1:30 p.m. and overwhelming La Bufa two and a half hours later. These captures prompt a panic-stricken stampede back into Zacatecas City by defeated federales, the panic worsening when demolition charges begin leveling public buildings at 4:30 p.m. In the resultant slaughter, 5,000 Huertistas are killed, 2,500 wounded, and 3,000 taken prisoner (most of the latter two groups being subsequently executed, along with numerous civilians). Wounded in his left leg, Medina Barrón is lucky to escape southward into Soledad with 14 men. Villa's casualties total 4,000 men. Several hundred Zacatecan civilians are also killed in this ferocious exchange.

JUNE 25, 1914. Orendáin. Obregón's revolutionary "Army of the Northwest" arrives at Ahualulco, 45 miles west of the city of Guadalajara, and begins marshalling a large host of local auxiliaries to invade the Huertista army of Gen. José María Mier, which has sallied as far as La Vega railway station. Hoping to trap the federales by infiltrating his army along both sides of this railway line, Obregón's strategy is prematurely revealed when his subordinate Julián Medina blows a track in Mier's rear, prompting the Huertistas to fall back upon Orendáin.

A youthful Colonel Obregón, seated in full uniform at lower left, with some of his Sonoran officers. (Library of Congress)

Battle of Orendáin.

Yet on July 1, Obregón persists with this tactic—albeit on a grander scale—by sending Brig. Gen. Lucio Blanco due eastward on a long stealthy cavalry approach to assault the federal outposts at El Castillo and La Capilla, thus cutting off Guadalajara's rail communications to the south. Simultaneously, Brigadier General Diéguez is to take the battalions of Eulogio Martínez, Esteban B. Calderón, Pablo Quiroga, Juan José Ríos, Severiano Talamantes, and Fermín Carpio on a forced march northward through the Tequila Range, circling around to emerge at La Venta—directly in Mier's rear.

Obregón waits until Diéguez's column engages the Huertistas on July 6 before bombarding their paralyzed train convoy from the west with his own army's artillery and machine guns, starting at midnight. The federal army disintegrates into panic by dawn of June 7, individual units breaking off in hopes of regaining Guadalajara. Rather than indulge in diverse chases, Obregón continues swiftly into Zapopan, arriving this same evening and barring all access into the capital, thereby preventing the dispersed Huertistas from reinforcing its garrison.

When Mier attempts to quit Guadalajara on June 8 with his remaining 3,000 men, he finds Blanco already blocking his escape route at El Castillo and is killed while attempting to fight his way through. Over these three days, Huertista losses total 2,000 dead, 1,000 wounded, and 5,000 captured, along with 16 fieldpieces, 18 trains, and 40 locomotives. The revolutionaries enter Guadalajara this same day, July 8, and the native son Diéguez assumes office as governor.

JULY 10, 1914. Fidencio Hernández and Guillermo Meixueiro—conservative backers of the exiled Félix Díaz—raise three brigades in Oaxaca, capture Etla and Tlacolula, then compel the state's Huertista governor to resign.

JULY 14, 1914. Following the twin disasters at Zatecas and Orendáin, Huerta resigns the presidency, appointing Francisco S. Carvajal as his interim successor. Shortly thereafter, Huerta flees Mexico City for Puerto México and boards the German cruiser Dresden, eventually gaining asylum in Spain.

JULY 18, 1914. Obregón assaults the federal garrison within the state capital of Colima.

JULY 20, 1914. Pablo González's Ejército del Noreste or "Army of the Northeast" takes the city of San Luis Potosí without opposition.

JULY 21, 1914. Obregón besieges Manzanillo (Colima).

AUGUST 1, 1914. Obregón's "Army of the Northwest" unites at Querétaro with Pablo González's "Army of the Northeast," driving together toward Mexico City.

AUGUST 10, 1914. The 47-year-old governor of Sonora, José María Maytorena—angered by Carranza's reproofs—clashes at Buenavista Ranch on the Santa Cruz River with a Carrancista contingent under General Hill, leaving 18 dead.

AUGUST 13, 1914. At Teoloyucan outside Mexico City, Obregón signs a treaty with a representative from the federal government, officially dissolving the Huertista administration as well as much of the regular 30,000-man Mexican Army and 10,000 rurales. (Only those troops deployed south of the capital to contain Zapata's peasant revolutionaries are to be kept in operation.)

AUGUST 18, 1914. Obregón's 18,000-man "Army of the Northwest" enters Mexico City in triumph.

Carranza follows him in two days and, on August 21, assumes office as president.

AUGUST 22, 1914. The disgruntled governor of Sonora, José María Maytorena, approaches the border town of Nogales with 2,000 men, obliging its Carrancista garrison under General Hill and the 36-year-old colonel Plutarco Elías Calles (a future president of Mexico) to fall back into Cananea, Agua Prieta, and Naco. Maytorena enters triumphantly the next day. Villa and Obregón subsequently travel by train through El Paso (Texas), meeting with Maytorena as of August 28 in an unsuccessful bid to mediate this dispute.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1914. Carranza, who has refused to allow Zapata access to Mexico City, furthermore rejects the revolutionary leader's land claims, made in favor of his peasant followers.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1914. From his Cuernavaca headquarters, Zapata defies Carranza's self-proclaimed rule and begins distributing lands among Morelos's peasants.

Obregón—the mustachioed figure in a gray uniform seated on the left—and Villa (far right) negotiate with renegade governor Maytorena, whose back is to the tent pole. (Clendenen Papers, Hoover Institution)

SEPTEMBER 11, 1914. The Pacific port city of Mazatlán (Sinaloa) is stormed by anti-Carrancista troops and carried three days later.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1914. Villa refuses to acknowledge Carranza as president, so neither his followers nor the Zapatistas of southern Mexico attend the constitutional convention held in Mexico City on October 1.

NOVEMBER 6, 1914. The constitutional convention—now transferred out of Mexico City into neutral Aguascalientes—recognizes the 34-year-old “general” and former mine foreman Eulalio Gutiérrez as interim president of Mexico. Carranza refuses to accept this nomination, so at 6:15 p.m. on November 10 he is labeled a rebel, and Gutiérrez appoints Villa as “head of military operations” intended to drive Carranza out of Mexico.

NOVEMBER 12, 1914. Zapata also declares war against Carranza.

NOVEMBER 13, 1914. American secretary of state William Jennings Bryan announces that Veracruz will be evacuated within 10 days.

NOVEMBER 14, 1914. Carrancista general Luis Jiménez Figueroa seizes Oaxaca City, but four days later is besieged inside its El Fortín citadel by three brigades of local revolutionaries under Meixueiro. They compel Jiménez Figueroa to flee after nightfall, overtaking and killing him at Tehuacán by December 2.

NOVEMBER 18, 1914. Threatened by the simultaneous advance of Villa’s División del Norte and Zapata’s guerrillas out of the southwest, Carranza quits his temporary Orizaba encampment for Veracruz.

NOVEMBER 23, 1914. This morning, the last of Funston’s American troops depart Veracruz, and Gen. Cándido Aguilar’s division arrives at noon to reestablish Mexican control.

NOVEMBER 24, 1914. After Obregón’s depleted 4,000-man garrison abandons Mexico City for Veracruz, Zapata occupies its southern suburbs without opposition two days later. This same day, November 26, Carranza establishes his provisional government in Veracruz.

DECEMBER 1, 1914. Villa appears at Mexico City’s northern suburb of Tacuba and, three days later, meets Zapata at Xochimilco. On December 6, their combined armies—numbering perhaps as many as 50,000 men—parade through the capital.

DECEMBER 12, 1914. Carrancista general Diéguez evacuates Guadalajara for Ciudad Guzmán, allowing a Villista contingent to occupy the city uncontested five days later.

DECEMBER 17, 1914. The “Conventionalist” general Ángeles departs Mexico City at the head of 5,500 troops to reclaim the northern city of Monterrey (Nuevo León). He will be joined en route at Torreón (Coahuila) by an additional 4,500 men, eventually commanding a total of 11,000 troops, which brush aside a Carrancista formation under Gen. Antonio I. Villarreal at Ramos Arizpe and gain Monterrey by January 5, 1915.

DECEMBER 31, 1914. Gen. Jesús Carranza—younger brother of Venustiano and sent to pacify the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—is betrayed by his local subordinate, Gen. Alfonso Santibáñez, and held for ransom. When Venustiano Carranza refuses to pay and sends a column of troops in pursuit, his brother is murdered at the Xambao Inn (Oaxaca). Santibáñez and most of his followers disperse into the hills.

JANUARY 5, 1915. After defeating a depleted Zapatista garrison at Tecamachalco, Obregón—now “General-in-Chief” of Carranza’s army—takes the city of Puebla with his 12,000 troops.

JANUARY 17, 1915. Guadalajara. Having united with Murguía, Diéguez leads 9,000 Carrancistas northward through central Jalisco to assault its state capital of Guadalajara. In a two-day battle that rages over the Cuatro, Gachupín, and Santa María hills, Diéguez succeeds in defeating the city’s 10,000 Villista defenders under Julián Medina, Melitón F. Ortega, and Contreras, then reoccupies it.

JANUARY 28, 1915. With 9,000 troops, Obregón reenters Mexico City, which has earlier been abandoned by both its Villista and Zapatista occupiers—their rival national government being reconstituted at Cuernavaca (Morelos) four days later.

Junior federal officers posing in a garden in Matamoros, photograph by Robert Runyon. (Author's Collection)

JANUARY 30, 1915. Guadalajara is struck by 3,500 Villista raiders, who are ejected in turn by its Carrancista garrison, leaving behind 400 dead.

FEBRUARY 11, 1915. Because of mounting pressure from Villa, Diéguez evacuates Guadalajara for Ciudad Guzmán, but will nonetheless succeed in retaining control over Jalisco's capital through a series of minor victories at El Volcán, Tuxpan, Nextipac, and Santa Ana. These victories allow his Carrancistas to return triumphantly into Guadalajara on May 18.

MARCH 5, 1915. A Villista column under General Chao attacks the Carrancista garrison under Gen. Pablo González, who is holding the seaport of Tampico (Tamaulipas), but is repelled.

MARCH 10, 1915. Obregón abandons starving Mexico City and reaches Tula in the state of Hidalgo the next day. He masses his forces at nearby Cazadero a fortnight later to press deeper into central Mexico and challenge Villa to a pitched battle.

APRIL 1, 1915. Obregón occupies the city of Querétaro, then Celaya (Guanajuato) three days later, where he learns that Villa's approaching army is 30 miles to the west, having just entered Irapuato.

APRIL 6, 1915. Celaya. This morning, Villa departs Salamanca with 20,000 men and 22 artillery pieces in three columns, driving directly toward Obregón, who is awaiting him 20 miles farther east at Celaya. Although the latter commands only 6,000 cavalymen under brigadier generals Agustín Estrada and Abel Santos, 5,000 infantrymen under brigadier generals José Herón González and Dionisio Triana, 86 machine guns, and 13 cannon, his army is much better disciplined and organized than Villa's unwieldy horde. By 2:00 p.m. this same afternoon, advance elements of the Villista army are ar-living on the plains west of Celaya and decimating Fortunato Maycotte's brigade, which is quartered at El Guaje railway station. Obregón sends 1,500 reinforcements under Manuel Laveaga to rescue Maycotte, then sallies himself by train to supervise their withdrawal, the battle becoming fully joined two hours later as more and more units arrive on each side, while Obregón's trusted subordinate general Hill successfully defends Celaya.

Throughout the night, both armies blaze away at each other in the darkness, then on the morning of April 7, Villa sends repeated waves against Celaya itself, whose entrenched defenders succeed in pushing them back. Realizing after some 40 cavalry charges that Villa has committed his entire strength, Obregón sends Maycotte's and Novoa's cavalry brigades on a flanking movement to the south, plus González's to the north, thereby threatening Villa's rear. This threatened pincer obliges the attackers to retreat almost 10 miles by that same afternoon and reboard their trains for Salamanca and Irapuato, leaving behind 1,800 dead, 3,000 wounded, 500 prisoners, cattle, and heaps of matériel. Obregón's losses total 558 killed and 365 injured (313 and 157, respectively, from Maycotte's trapped contingent at El Guaje).

Obregón rests his victorious troops in Celaya, while Villa recalls contingents from Jalisco and Nuevo León to rebuild his battered army over the next few days into 30,000 men—and even attempts to telephone Obregón, only to be answered by an obscenity. Obregón is also reinforced from Veracruz and raises his total numbers to 15,000, his cavalry being hidden farther east in a forest. On April 13, Villa resumes his offensive, surrounding Celaya and again furiously attacking Obregón's lines throughout April 14–15 from a range of only 400 yards. The defenders once more respond by launching a massive cavalry encirclement to the north with Gen. Cesáreo Castro's division, prompting Villa's exhausted followers to break and flee westward into the night, leaving behind another 4,000 dead, 5,000 wounded, 6,000 prisoners, 1,000 horses, and their artillery.

APRIL 19, 1915. Obregón occupies Salamanca (Guanajuato), then Irapuato two days later, while Villa's shattered División del Norte retreats northwestward.

First Battle of Celaya.

APRIL 25, 1915. An Obregonista column occupies Guanajuato City.

APRIL 28, 1915. Obregón enters Silao (Guanajuato) with his main army and, the next day, contacts Villista forces again, farther to the northwest. Now leery of their opponents, the latter only skirmish against Obregón's advance outposts, buying time for Villa to regroup his army around his supply depot at León. The resting Villista line sprawls from Rodolfo Fierro's division encamped at San Juan de los Lagos to Urbina's and Natera's contingents at San Miguel de Allende. Villa hopes to lure Obregón into the Trinidad Plains between Silao and León for a climactic encounter, where his advantage in cavalry might tell.

MAY 7, 1915. Trinidad. Obregón advances northwestward from Silao (Guanajuato), reaching Trinidad Railway Station to begin entrenching his infantry into a defensive line extending between the nearby haciendas of Santa Ana del Conde and more distant Otates. The next day, he orders his cavalry to clear the Villista units from atop Capilla and La Cruz hills, so as to allow the 14,300 Obregonista infantrymen and 9,400 cavalymen to deploy fully across the Trinidad Plains into a huge square measuring 10 miles from corner to corner. Obregón's infantry holds the northwestern and southeastern lines of this square, while his cavalry covers both flanks in between.

Having massed 19,500 riders and 6,000 infantrymen of his own at Nuevo León, Villa leaves a sizeable garrison behind before bringing 8,000 cavalymen to launch his initial attacks against Obregón's lines on May 12. After 10 days of probes and exchanges, Villa adds a bold new variant by leaving his artillery commander Ángeles to maintain this pressure, while personally leading another 8,000 fresh riders through the hills via a circuitous route to surprise the main Obregonista supply base at Silao, destroying numerous trains, bridges, and telegraphs in his opponent's rear.

Obregón finds this disruption worrisome, especially after Villa returns into Duarte on the morning of June 2 to prepare for a general assault with all his forces. The Obregonistas brace to receive this onslaught. When the first Villista wave of three infantry battalions breaks cover the next morning and advances directly upon Santa Ana del Conde Hacienda behind a barrage laid down by Ángeles's batteries, Obregón is badly wounded when his right arm is shredded by a shell. His army's discipline remains intact, though, his second-in-command Hill succeeding him and decimating Villa's advancing columns with counterfire from well-emplaced machine guns and strongly entrenched troops. After exhausting their strength and ammunition in repeated yet fruitless assaults, Villa and Ángeles give the order at dawn on June 5 to retreat from Duarte toward León.

Hill immediately launches a massive pursuit by ordering brigadier generals Castro and Murguía to chase the routed Villistas along both flanks with their 7,000 troopers, while Diéguez is to lead the infantry straight up the center into Nuevo León itself. Having sustained 8,000 casualties—triple those of the Obregonistas—Villa is powerless to prevent the disintegration of his army, abandoning all his matériel while drawing off northward into Aguascalientes. (The right hand of the convalescent yet victorious Obregón, amputated by Surgeon Gen. Enrique Osornio Camarena, is today preserved as a prize exhibit in Mexico City.)

JUNE 2, 1915. American president Woodrow Wilson gives a speech, seemingly threatening renewed intervention if Mexico's warring factions cannot achieve peace.

JUNE 3, 1915. Oaxaca declares itself to be a sovereign state, refusing to acknowledge the authority of Carranza or any other federal leader.

JUNE 8, 1915. Villista general Máximo García evacuates Ciudad Victoria (Tamaulipas). His Zapata subordinator, Alberto Carrera Torres, is overtaken shortly thereafter and executed.

JUNE 24, 1915. Huerta and Orozco are arrested by U.S. authorities in El Paso (Texas) for violating American neutrality laws by plotting to rejoin the fighting in Mexico.

JUNE 30, 1915. During clashes against Villista irregulars around Lagunas de Moreno (Jalisco), Diéguez is severely wounded.

JULY 2, 1915. As Villa's defeated División del Norte limps northward, his 35-year-old henchman Rodolfo Fierro sends a false telegram from Pedrito Station—over Obregón's signature—to the Nuevo León garrison commander Novoa, ordering him to evacuate. This retirement allows Fierro to reenter that town unopposed with 4,000 riders, then to rampage southward through Silao, Irapuato, Salamanca, Celaya, Querétaro, and San Juan del Río, ripping up railroad tracks and burning bridges. At Tula (Hidalgo), he pulverizes a 1,500-man garrison, then joins forces with Roque González Garza.

Obregón's subordinate Pablo González feels so threatened by this incursion that he abandons Mexico City, although Fierro's small numbers do not permit any designs against the capital.

JULY 6, 1915. After a brief convalescence, Obregón resumes command over his army, driving northward in pursuit of Villa.

JULY 8, 1915. Obregón defeats Villa's rearguard at Calvillo Ravine, then occupies the city of Aguascalientes two days later, gaining considerable stores.

JULY 28, 1915. While retiring northward after his successful raid into central Mexico, Fierro's 4,000 riders blunder into Obregón's army in the Mariscal Hills near the city of Querétaro and are badly beaten two days later at Jerécuaro, thus rejoining Villa with only 1,000 men.

JULY 30, 1915. A Zapatista contingent under Gen. Amador Salazar is defeated near Mexico City.

AUGUST 10, 1915. Obregón's subordinate Pablo González reoccupies Mexico City.

AUGUST 11, 1915. The new U.S. secretary of state, Robert Lansing, joined by diplomatic representatives from Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Guatemala, and Uruguay, call upon Mexico's factions to make peace. Carranza rejects this proposal one month later, branding it as interference in Mexico's internal affairs.

AUGUST 30, 1915. Outside El Paso (Texas), the exiled Orozco is murdered along with four companions.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1915. Obregón wins a clash at La Angostura (site of the Battle of Buena Vista; see "February 22, 1847" entry in "Mexican-American War"). Shortly thereafter, he reoccupies Saltillo.

OCTOBER 19, 1915. The United States, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Guatemala, and Uruguay recognize Carranza as de facto president of Mexico.

NOVEMBER 2, 1915. After a lengthy retreat northward, Villa's 6,000 remaining troops make four nocturnal assaults against Calles's 6,500 fresh Carrancista defenders at Agua Prieta (Sonora). The latter win easily, killing or wounding 600 half-starved attackers, while another 400 desert Villa as he initiates yet another retirement southwest toward Hermosillo the next day.

NOVEMBER 8, 1915. Seeking to reassert federal rule over the breakaway state of Oaxaca (see "June 3, 1915" entry), Carrancista general Jesús Agustín Castro departs Chiapas with the 21st Division and seizes Salina Cruz, his vanguard soon being joined by other following contingents.

NOVEMBER 18, 1915. Hermosillo. Villa's 5,000 survivors fight an inconclusive yet costly battle against a superior Carrancista force under Diéguez at Alamito, outside Sonora's capital of Hermosillo. Four days later, Villa launches an all-out, 30-hour assault against Hermosillo's garrison, during which his remaining troops are annihilated. He thereupon retires eastward into the mountains with only 1,400 followers, eventually reaching Chihuahua City and disbanding his column.

DECEMBER 24, 1915. Villa disappears from Chihuahua City, eight days before Carrancista general Treviño arrives to reoccupy this state capital.

JANUARY 16, 1916. Villa's subordinates Pablo López and Rafael Castro attack a train at Santa Isabel bound from Chihuahua City toward the Cusi-huiríachi mining camp, in the process massacring 16 American passengers, which provokes outrage in neighboring Texas.

MARCH 2, 1916. After pushing inland from Puerto Ángel (Oaxaca), a small Carrancista army under generals Macario M. Hernández and Juan José Baños defeats a separatist force at Ocotlán, then three days later occupies deserted Oaxaca City. Castro arrives by March 15 to assume office as governor.

MARCH 9, 1916. Columbus Raid. In the pre-dawn hours, Villa crosses the border several miles west of Columbus (New Mexico), sending 500 riders to attack this town from three directions at 4:00 a.m. His followers assault the encampment of six troops—200 soldiers—of Col. H. J. Slocum's 13th U.S. Cavalry Regiment, loot numerous buildings and corrals, then set fire to Columbus's business district before withdrawing. Despite being surprised, the defenders kill about 100 Villistas. Eighteen Americans—10 of them civilians—lie dead, and another 8 are wounded.

Villa's raid not only vaults his name back into prominence, it also belies the Carrancista claim to have pacified Mexico. Any American pursuit onto Mexican soil will furthermore be resented by many Mexicans for purely patriotic reasons because of the recent Veracruz intervention (see "April 21, 1914" entry), thereby drawing new recruits into Villa's ranks while alienating Carranza from popular opinion if he should help hunt down the raiders.

MARCH 13, 1916. A Carrancista column penetrating inland from Acapulco compels Zapatista general Pacheco to evacuate Huitzilac (Morelos), for which he is subsequently executed by de la O.

MARCH 15, 1916. Pershing's "Wild Goose Chase." Two columns comprised of 3,000 troops of the 13th U.S. Cavalry, the 6th and 16th Infantry regiments, plus the 1st Artillery Battery cross the border at Palomas (Chihuahua) to pursue Villa and punish his Columbus raid. Carranza offers President Wilson very grudging cooperation while urging his own commanders to capture the renegade, thereby ending the excuse for American intervention.

Villa proves elusive, though, his troops disappearing into the hills and adopting guerrilla tactics. The local Mexican populace also views the U.S. incursion with hostility. On April 12, an American scouting party—two troops of the 13th Cavalry under Maj. Frank Tompkins—approach Parral (Chihuahua), only to be set upon by a mob shouting, "Viva Villa!" and "Viva México!" A melee ensues in which 3 American soldiers are killed and 7 wounded, compared to perhaps 40 Mexican casualties.

Still more units join Pershing, so that by late April he reaches Casas Grandes with 9,000 soldiers: eight cavalry and five infantry regiments, plus five artillery batteries and numerous auxiliaries (including eight Jenny biplanes of the 1st Provisional Aero Squadron out of San Antonio, Texas). In May, the Americans skirmish at Ojos Azules Ranch against a small Villista force, which quickly disappears. Early in June, Villa emerges from hiding to overrun the Carrancista garrison of Gen. José Cavazos at Guerrero (Chihuahua) and is wounded in his right leg. Villa thereupon orders his men to disperse once again and reassemble at San Juan Bautista on the Durango border by July 6, while he himself retires into a cave to convalesce.

Double column of Gen. John Pershing's troops marching through the stark landscape of northern Mexico. (Clendenen Papers, Hoover Institution)

Shortly thereafter, Carranza's government informs Pershing that any deeper penetrations westward, southward, or eastward into Mexico will be contested. On June 20, two troops of the 10th Cavalry—84 black troopers under Capt. Charles T. Boyd—probe east toward Villa Ahumada, believing Villa may be there. At Carrizal, they collide with a Carrancista garrison under Gen. Félix U. Gómez, who deploys his troops and forbids the Americans to advance. Boyd insists and loses his life in the ensuing exchange, during which 9 of his men are also killed, 10 wounded, and 23 captured. Mexican losses total 74 dead—among them Gómez.

This incident brings an effective halt to Pershing's operations, as Washington must placate an incensed Mexican government. Over the next seven months, the American expeditionary force—now numbering 12,000 men and sarcastically dubbed the “Perishing Expedition”—remains largely immobile, 150 miles inside Mexico. Eventually, the U.S. government announces its withdrawal on January 28, 1917, and eight days later the last American troops depart Chihuahua.

APRIL 16, 1916. The Zapatista general Salazar is killed by a stray round near Yauhtepec (Morelos).

MAY 2, 1916. Morelos Sweep. The Carrancista general Pablo González launches an offensive—complete with air support—against the Zapatistas in Morelos

General John J. Pershing

John Joseph Pershing was born on September 13, 1860, on a farm near Laclede (Missouri). His father owned a general store and supplied the 18th Missouri Volunteer Infantry Regiment during the Civil War. Raised in relative prosperity, young Pershing was given a good educational start at a “select school.” Upon graduating in 1878, he became a local teacher with African American students, a rarity in those times. After attending the First Missouri Normal School (later Truman State University) in Kirksville for two years, he applied to the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in the hope of getting a better education rather than of pursuing a military career.

Pershing enrolled in the autumn of 1882, at almost 22 years of age, and spent four notable years at the academy. Shortly before graduating, his parents died within 10 days of each other in April 1886. Pershing considered taking leave to study law, but he accepted a commission on September 30 as a second lieutenant with the 6th Cavalry Regiment at Fort Bayard (New Mexico). For five years, he served in Indian campaigns throughout California, Arizona, and North Dakota and was cited for bravery during engagements against the Apaches. He also became one of the finest marksmen in the U.S. Army.

Assigned in 1891 as a military instructor at the University of Nebraska–Lincoln, he graduated from its law school. Finally promoted to first lieutenant in October 1895, he accepted a command in the all-black 10th Cavalry Regiment at Fort Assiniboine in north central Montana. Upon joining the tactical staff at West Point two years later, cadets started calling him “Black Jack” because of his service with the 10th. Pershing was commissioned as a major of volunteers when the Spanish-American War broke out in 1898 and was cited for gallantry at the Battle of San Juan Hill. Recovering from malaria, he went to the Philippines the next summer to fight against the Moros over the next four years.

He was still a captain at 43 years old upon returning to the United States in the summer of 1903, so his friend, President Theodore Roosevelt, petitioned the Army General Staff to have him promoted. Rebuffed, Pershing was assigned as military attaché to the American Embassy in Tokyo, serving as Roosevelt's observer during the Russo-Japanese War. Upon regaining Washington in the autumn of 1905, the president had Congress move Pershing up three ranks to brigadier general, offending army protocol. Pershing also married the daughter of the powerful Republican senator Francis E. Warren of Wyoming, served briefly in Paris, then did another three-year tour in the Philippines.

In January 1914, Pershing was given command of the U.S. Army 8th Brigade at Fort Bliss (Texas). Responsible for patrolling the U.S. border with troubled Mexico, he suffered a personal calamity when his wife and three young daughters—about to vacate their home at the San Francisco Presidio to join him in Texas—were burned to death on August 27, 1915. Only his six-year-old son was saved, who joined Pershing at Fort Bliss. Six months later, the long, fruitless pursuit of Pancho Villa began.

When America entered World War I in 1917, President Woodrow Wilson appointed Pershing to command the American Expeditionary Force, which eventually swelled to over 2 million soldiers. In the euphoria after the victory, he was rewarded with a special rank—“General of the Armies”—and served as chief of staff for another three years before retiring from active duty. Noteworthy for his intellect, Pershing was the creator of the modern U.S. Army. He mentored many famous future generals, such as George C. Marshall, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Omar N. Bradley, and George S. Patton Jr.

by bringing his Ejército del Este or “Eastern Army” into the state and seizing Cuernavaca. His 30,000 troops occupy almost all major towns over the next four days—Jojutla not falling until May 25—then establish concentration camps to stifle guerrilla resistance. By the end of this same month, 1,500 captives are on their way into incarceration at Mexico City, while much of Morelos lies looted or destroyed.

MAY 8, 1916. González’s subordinate, Rafael Cepeda, executes 225 Zapatista prisoners in Jiutepec (Morelos).

MAY 15, 1916. Félix Díaz—nephew of Oaxaca’s native son, former president Porfirio Díaz—returns from exile and joins this state’s separatist movement. His grandly named Ejército Reorganizador Nacional or “National Reorganizer Army” is promptly defeated by Carrancista forces at Yucucundo in June, then at Tlalcolula in July, obliging Díaz to retreat northeast toward the Chiapas–Veracruz border.

JUNE 1916. González’s forces overrun Tlaltizapán—Zapata’s main hideaway, south of Cuernavaca (Morelos)—slaughtering 286 unarmed men, women, and children.

JULY 6, 1916. Villa rejoins his followers—now 1,000 strong—at San Juan Bautista on the Chihuahua–Durango border, then leads them northward to forage for supplies.

JULY 16, 1916. Despite being seriously weakened by González’s offensive, a Zapatista column attacks the Carrancista garrison at Tlayacapan (Morelos), retiring after six hours of heavy fighting to assault Tlaltizapán the next day.

AUGUST 1, 1916. Carranza calls out troops to put down a general strike in Mexico City.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1916. The previous night, Villa has infiltrated 1,000 riders into Chihuahua City, then at 3:00 a.m. on September 16—Mexico’s Independence Day—surprises its Carrancista garrison under Treviño. After seizing much booty, giving a speech from the municipal balcony, and recruiting an additional 1,500 men, Villa disappears as suddenly as he has materialized.

LATE SEPTEMBER 1916. To relieve his despairing followers in Morelos, Zapata advances across the mountains to threaten Mexico City, in turn prompting Carrancista colonel Jesús María Guajardo to execute 180 captives in Tlaltizapán and raze much of its surrounding district.

OCTOBER 4, 1916. Zapata seizes the Xochimilco pumping station, cutting off much of Mexico City’s water supply, then retires after destroying the railway lines at Peña Pobre.

NOVEMBER 7, 1916. Zapatista guerrillas blow up a train, killing more than 400 passengers.

NOVEMBER 23, 1916. Villa again captures Chihuahua City, occupying it for a week before emerging to confront Murguía’s approaching Carrancista army on Horcasitas Plain. In a seven-hour engagement on December 1, Villa is badly beaten and compelled to abandon a trainload of provisions while retreating toward Satevo.

DECEMBER 1, 1916. Zapata’s Resurrection. With González’s occupation forces now grown weak due to neglect, desertion, and disease—7,000 Carrancistas reportedly lying sick of malaria—Zapata’s battered forces are able to recuperate Tlaltizapán, then launch a major offensive to regain control over the state of Morelos.

DECEMBER 22, 1916. Villa, with perhaps as many as 5,000 riders, surprises the Carrancista garrison at Torreón (Coahuila), overrunning its defenses from three different directions and killing two generals while driving a third to suicide. After extorting a 1 million-peso loan from the city’s inhabitants and destroying all printing presses “so that they won’t speak ill of him,” Villa and his raiders abruptly depart on December 27.

JANUARY 7, 1917. Villa raids Santa Rosalía (Coahuila), massacring 300 Carrancista prisoners and Chinese civilians.

This same day, Zapata reoccupies Jonacatepec (Morelos), followed by Yautepec the next day, Cuautla on January 10, then numerous other towns—including Cuernavaca.

MAY 1, 1917. After holding an election on March 11 in which he received 198,000 of 250,000 votes cast—out of 3 million potential voters throughout Mexico—Carranza assumes the presidency. His top

Emiliano Zapata

Emiliano Zapata Salazar's birth date is believed to be August 8, 1879, and he was born in San Miguel Anenecuilco (Morelos) in the lush valleys south of Mexico City. As a member of an ancient family of small ranchers, he did not endure poverty or manual labor as a child. Instead, he grew up to become a successful horse trainer. However, he also showed a genuine sympathy for the poor peasants of Morelos, who were being displaced by ever-larger commercial haciendas or "estates." Fluent in the Indian language of Náhuatl, as well as Spanish, he was elected head of his village's "defense committee," and, as such, he contested many illegal land expropriations.

Frustrated by the corruption of local officials and the indifference from federal authorities in the capital, Zapata embraced the Mexican Revolution in March 1911. He quickly harnessed a torrent of ragtag rebels with his rallying cry of Tierra y Libertad or "Land and Liberty." Gathered into the so-called Ejército Libertador del Sur or "Liberation Army of the South," Zapata's movement helped drive the dictator Porfirio Díaz from office by May.

Yet Zapata also remained distrustful of the new administration created by the reformist northern landowner Francisco I. Madero. When he was unable to convince the new president of the need to grant small plots to his thousands of adherents, relations soured. Federal troops once again were deployed in Morelos, so Zapata took up arms against Madero. His rebellion grew even stronger after the hated general Victoriano Huerta seized power. Unlike other revolutionary leaders, Zapata never aspired to high office, often avoiding national alliances to concentrate on winning his agrarian goals in Morelos.

Years of fighting nonetheless eroded Zapatista strength, while federal garrisons controlled all the large towns and roads leading out of the state, preventing any significant breakthrough victory. The elusive guerrilla chieftain was finally lured into a trap and murdered, and his movement disintegrated without his charismatic leadership. Yet Zapata's romantic appeal did not end with his death. Even modern Mexican governments observe his memory by making token land distributions among the poor. And peasants still believe that he rides alone through the forests of Ajusco Mountain on a white horse.

general, Obregón, retires modestly into private life at his birthplace of Navojoa (Sonora).

MAY 7, 1917. Zapata's longtime subordinate Leonardo Vázquez is executed at Buenavista de Cuellar (Morelos) for turning against his former chief, the same fate befalling his secretary and mentor, Otilio Montaño, 11 days later.

JUNE 18, 1917. With Zapatista support melting away, Zapata's brother Eufemio is murdered by a turncoat at Cuautla (Morelos).

NOVEMBER 19, 1917. Pablo González shells and recaptures Cuautla (Morelos), then shortly thereafter overwhelms the Zapatista garrisons at Jonacatepec and Zacualpan de Amilpas.

FEBRUARY 8, 1918. After being captured at San Bernardino (Oaxaca), separatist general Alberto Córdova is executed in the state capital by a Carrancista firing squad.

OCTOBER 1918. González advances out of Cuautla (Morelos) with 11,000 Carrancista troops, sweeping through Zapatista strongholds, now laid low by starvation and disease—mostly due to the outbreak of Spanish influenza. Yautepec, Jojutla, Cuernavaca, Tetecala, and Tlaltizapán fall in quick succession, obliging Zapata to flee into the mountains with a handful of adherents.

DECEMBER 11, 1918. Ex-Porfirian general Ángeles returns from exile in the United States, attempting to organize yet another revolutionary uprising with Villa.

APRIL 6, 1919. End of Zapata. In a prearranged plot, Pablo González departs Cuautla (Morelos) for Mexico City, and this same night his supposedly disgruntled subordinate, Colonel Guajardo, mutinies with the 600-man 5th Cavalry Regiment, deserting toward the southeast. Reaching Jonacatepec by the night of April 8–9, Guajardo seemingly confirms his switched allegiance by attacking and killing a dozen Carrancista defenders, while losing seven of his own men. He then executes 59 followers of the ex-Zapatista Victoriano Bárcenas at Mancornadero before being approached—15 miles south of Jonacatepec at Pastor Railway Station—by the fugitive Zapata himself (who has been corresponding with Guajardo for several weeks about joining the revolutionary cause).

Both contingents continue together, Guajardo and his cavalrymen encamping at San Juan Chinameca Hacienda, while Zapata remains in Tepalcingo with his troops. The next morning, a false alarm prompts the rebel leader to send 140 men on patrol, so when he is invited to dine with Guajardo inside Chinameca's walls at 1:30 p.m. on April 10, he arrives with only a 10-man escort. The 5th Regiment's color guard, rather than fire a salute, blasts two volleys directly into Zapata, killing him instantly. Guajardo then carries his body back into Cuautla on a mule to display in its main square, being rewarded by González with promotion to brigadier general, plus 50,000 pesos—which he shares among his troopers.

Zapata's dead body on display in Cuautla. (Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, Mexico)

MAY 31, 1919. Separatist governor José Inés Dávila is defeated and killed at Ixtayutla (Oaxaca), and his head is displayed in the state capital.

JUNE 1919. Villa and Ángeles capture the border city of Juárez, only to be driven out by U.S. troops from adjacent El Paso (Texas)—an intervention that again provokes a downturn in relations between Mexico City and Washington.

JUNE 1, 1919. In Nogales (Sonora), Obregón announces that he will contest the presidency in Mexico's forthcoming elections, running against Carranza's handpicked successor Ignacio Bonillas. The president—already jealous of Obregón's popularity—actively obstructs his campaign.

JUNE 17, 1919. Zapatista resistance having ceased with the death of their leader, Pablo González departs Morelos for Puebla, leaving occupation duties to his subordinates.

NOVEMBER 15, 1919. Ángeles is captured in hiding near Balleza (Chihuahua) and executed 11 days later in its state capital on Carranza's orders, despite widespread pleas for clemency.

DECEMBER 27, 1919. Meixueiro, one of the last remaining separatist leaders in Oaxaca, surrenders to Pablo González.

JANUARY 1920. Pablo González announces that he, too, will run for president, on the Liga Democrática or "Democratic League" ticket.

MARCH 27, 1920. To protest the arrest of 70 prominent Obregonistas in Mexico City, de la O blows up a train heading for Cuernavaca (Morelos). Among its survivors is the U.S. Embassy's military attaché, who is held hostage. The next day, de la O's troops also sack Milpa Alta, before disappearing back into the hills.

EARLY APRIL 1920. Obregón is made to appear before a military tribunal in Mexico City, falsely accused of conspiring to overthrow the government with Col. Roberto Cejudo—one of Félix Díaz's minions, recently released from incarceration by Carranza's police.

APRIL 13, 1920. Obregón's Revolt. After being repeatedly menaced by Carranza's police, Obregón flees Mexico City in disguise and finds sanctuary at Iguala (Guerrero) with generals Rómulo Figueroa and Maycotte. One week later, he issues a proclamation from Chilpancingo, calling for an uprising to depose the Carranza regime. Supporters rally to Obregón's side—including Villa, who helps capture Chihuahua City from its Carrancista garrison on April 29.

MAY 4, 1920. In the state of Puebla, Pablo González rises up against Carranza.

MAY 7, 1920. Carranza's Demise. With Murguía attempting to stave off encroaching Obregonista armies at Otumba, 30 miles outside Mexico City, Carranza abandons the capital before dawn, departing Mexico City's Colonia railway station for Veracruz aboard a 15-mile-long train convoy bearing 10,000 adherents, plus the national treasury. At nearby Guadalupe, a dynamite-laden locomotive smashes into the lead train this same afternoon, killing 200 soldiers, after which Guajardo attacks Carranza's convoy with his cavalry troop.

The presidential column nonetheless fights its way through to Apizaco (Tlaxcala) by the next day, although only 3,000 infantrymen, 1,100 cavalrymen, and two fieldpieces remain to him. As the column proceeds eastward into the state of Puebla, another Obregonista attack descends upon the presidential cavalry vanguard under Gen. Heliodoro Pérez at San Marcos. Carranza remains at San Marcos until midnight on May 10, leaving some cadets to fight a rearguard action as his train column slips away into the night. A lengthier engagement erupts a half-mile outside Rinconada the next dawn, May 11, Carranza having a horse shot out from under him before Murguía scatters the enemy, capturing 400 prisoners.

Finally, a dwindling fuel supply obliges Carranza's train convoy to proceed by mid-afternoon of May 13 toward the next station at Aljibes (Puebla), only to run out of coal by the time their locomotives inch in that night. At mid-morning on May 14, the remnants of the stalled presidential column are attacked by Guadalupe Sánchez, while Treviño also presses in from the rear—both generals reputedly commanding 20,000 troops between them. Unable to travel any farther by rail, Carranza flees northward at noon with 100 riders, proceeding through the Puebla Range until being joined on May 20 at the village of La Unión by the guerrilla leader Rodolfo Herrero. Falsely professing loyalty, the latter leads the weary president through a drenching rainstorm to San Antonio Tlaxcalantongo, only to murder Carranza at 4:00 a.m. on Friday, May 21, by firing multiple volleys through the back of the hut where he lay sleeping.

MAY 15, 1920. Pablo González withdraws his candidacy for president and retires into private life at Monterrey (Nuevo León).

MAY 24, 1920. The 39-year-old governor of Sonora, Adolfo de la Huerta, is appointed interim president until elections can be held on September 5.

JULY 2, 1920. In Gómez Palacio (Durango), Guajardo—assigned to pursue Villa's guerrillas in northern Mexico—mutinies against the federal government. Advancing northeast toward Monterrey (Nuevo León), his rapidly dwindling force prompts Guajardo to allege that he will soon be joined by retired general Pablo González, leading to the subsequent arrest of both officers. Guajardo is almost immediately executed, but González is eventually released by President de la Huerta.

JULY 22, 1920. Villa occupies Sabinas (Coahuila) with 700 troops—after first destroying its rail lines to prevent any surprise counterattacks by federales—then telegraphs President de la Huerta requesting amnesty. The latter agrees, deeding him the 25,000-acre estate of Canutillo on the Durango-Chihuahua border and paying off all his followers, allowing Villa to retire into private life.

NOVEMBER 30, 1920. After a highly successful electoral campaign, Obregón is inaugurated as president.

JULY 20, 1923. At 7:20 a.m., while driving his Dodge touring car back toward Canutillo Hacienda from Parral (Chihuahua), Villa and five of his six bodyguards are ambushed and killed at the corner of Zaragoza and Gabino Barreda streets by eight assassins led by Melitón Lozoya—hired by the vengeful local landowner Jesús Salas Barrazas (allegedly with the connivance of Obregón's interior minister, Calles).

NOVEMBER 23, 1923. Obregón's disaffected ex-finance secretary, de la Huerta, announces his bid for the presidency, bringing him into conflict with his former fellow cabinet minister Calles—now Obregón's designated heir apparent.

NOVEMBER 30, 1923. De la Huerta Uprising. In Guerrero, Figueroa rebels against the federal government and is soon joined by more generals in other states. Four days later, de la Huerta also slips secretly out of Mexico City toward Veracruz by train.

On December 7, de la Huerta accuses Obregón and Calles of corruption, adding to the call for their overthrow. About three-fifths of Mexico's 110,000-man federal army eventually sides with these rebels, yet Obregón's control over the treasury ensures that his loyalists remain abundantly supplied with modern weapons.

Surrender of Pancho Villa at Sabinas. (Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, Mexico)

JANUARY 28, 1924. The de la Huertista general Guadalupe Sánchez is defeated at the Battle of Esperanza (Veracruz).

FEBRUARY 4, 1924. Córdoba (Veracruz) falls to Obregón's forces.

FEBRUARY 5, 1924. De la Huerta and his skeleton government quit Veracruz to reestablish their administration in Frontera (Tabasco).

MARCH 12, 1924. De la Huerta flees Mexico, enters Key West (Florida) in disguise, and eventually establishes a singing academy in Los Angeles (California).

MARCH 24, 1924. The last de la Huertista army under Sánchez is annihilated, and this general is killed. Over the next three months, surviving rebels are hunted down and exterminated, including many once-famous officers: Diéguez, Chao, Maycotte, Salvador Alvarado, Ramón Treviño, José Rentería Luviano, and Rafael Buena. In all, 7,000 people lose their lives during this abortive insurrection.

NOVEMBER 30, 1924. After winning the presidential election, Calles is sworn into office.

Minor revolts and mutinies will continue to plague Mexico for a number of years, but large-scale fighting has run its course by 1918—mostly due to exhaustion. Some measure of this country's suffering can be judged by the fact that its population shrinks from 15.1 million inhabitants in 1910 to 14.2 million by 1920.

WORLD WAR I (1914–1918)

Thanks to their physical remove from Europe, the Americas are spared much of the fighting from this conflict until three years into the war, when the United States finally throws its weight behind Britain, France, and the other Allied nations, effectively hastening Germany's collapse. Prior to this intervention, most of the hostilities in the New World consists of isolated naval encounters.

AUGUST 6, 1914. Capt. Erich Köhler's brand-new, 375-man, 4,900-ton German light cruiser Karlsruhe rendezvous 120 miles north of Watling Island in the Bahamas with the 420-man, 23,500-ton liner Kronprinz Wilhelm. The latter receives coal as well as two, 3.4-inch guns, a machine gun, and 16 sailors transferred aboard to convert the passenger liner into an armed commerce raider under Capt. Lt. Paul Thierfelder.

This operation is interrupted at 11:00 a.m. by the 680-man, 9,800-ton British heavy cruiser Suffolk, which chases both German vessels as they separate northward. Capt. Basil H. Fanshawe's 380-man, 4,800-ton light cruiser Bristol intercepts the Karlsruhe at 8:15 p.m., opening fire at a range of six miles on a moonlit night, although it is unable to cripple Köhler's warship before it makes good its escape by 10:30 p.m.

On August 9, the Karlsruhe reaches Puerto Rico with only 12 tons of coal remaining in its bunkers, restocking before setting sail for Willemstad (Curaçao).

AUGUST 13, 1914. The Karlsruhe is sighted off Curaçao, before disappearing toward Brazil.

AUGUST 15, 1914. Having been resupplied 10 days previously by a trio of colliers off the north coast of Brazil, then being sighted on August 13 off the mouth of the Amazon, the 360-man, 3,650-ton German light cruiser Dresden of Capt. Fritz Lüdecke claims its first victim by sinking the British merchantman Hyades.

AUGUST 16, 1914. The Karlsruhe unsuccessfully pursues a merchantman, then the next day recoals from the supply ship Patagonia.

AUGUST 23, 1914. British rear admiral Craddock reaches the West Indian island of Saint Lucia with the 900-man, 14,100-ton heavy cruiser Good Hope to unite with the 680-man, 9,800-ton armored cruiser Berwick and light cruiser Bristol, plus the 10,000-ton French cruisers Descartes and Condé, to hunt down the elusive German commerce raiders.

AUGUST 28, 1914. The Karlsruhe arrives at Fernando de Noronha (Brazil) to rendezvous with three supply ships. The German light cruiser also captures the collier Strathroy and sinks the Maple Bridge over the next six days.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1914. After crossing the Atlantic to visit the Azores, the German commerce raider Kronprinz Wilhelm returns across the ocean to rendezvous with the tender Asuncion near Rocas Reef, north of Cape San Roque (Brazil). The next evening, it intercepts the British steamer Indian Prince, which is stripped of goods and scuttled on the morning of September 10.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1914. After sinking a pair of freighters off the River Plate, the Dresden rendezvous with the supply ship Santa Isabel at Orange Bay in the Strait of Magellan, before striking out into the Pacific on September 18. It is sighted by the British freighter Ortega, which escapes among the uncharted rocky waters and reports the German cruiser's presence.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1914. The Karlsruhe begins sweeps off the Brazilian coast, accompanied by two colliers acting as lookouts. Four days later, the German light cruiser sinks the Highland Hope but is spotted by a Spanish steamer, which divulges its position, so the Karlsruhe flees the area.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1914. After prowling down the Pacific coast from San Francisco (California), Capt. Johann-Siegfried Haun's 290-man, 3,800-ton German light cruiser Leipzig sinks the British merchant vessel Elsinore with its cargo of sugar, then reaches the Galapagos Islands one week later, accompanied by two colliers. By September 28, the raider is hovering off Peru, vainly hoping to intercept more British shipping.

German light cruiser Leipzig coaling at Guaymas, Mexico, on September 8, 1914. (Mariners' Museum, Newport News)

SEPTEMBER 14, 1914. This morning, the 19,500-ton British Cunard liner Carmania of Capt. Noel Grant—requisitioned and converted into an armed merchant cruiser—catches the 18,700-ton German armed merchant cruiser Cap Trafalgar coaling from two vessels in the lone harbor of Trinidad Island (Brazil), sinking it after a fierce hour-and-a-half action. The German commerce raider Kronprinz Wilhelm sights the damaged Carmania after this battle, yet fails to engage, believing it to be a trap.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1914. The Karlsruhe captures the collier Indrani, only to discover that it has been chartered by the German Consul to supply raiders.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1914. Craddock quits Montevideo with the heavy cruisers Good Hope (flag) and Monmouth, light cruiser Glasgow, and armed merchant cruiser Otranto, to vainly pursue the Dresden around the Strait of Magellan.

OCTOBER 3, 1914. The Dresden contacts the Leipzig by wireless from Más Afuera Island (modern Selkirk Island, westernmost of the Juan Fernández grouping), proposing a rendezvous one week later at Easter Island.

OCTOBER 7, 1914. The Kronprinz Wilhelm intercepts the British steamer La Correntina off the Brazilian coast, in the approximate latitude of Rio de Janeiro, stripping it of two artillery pieces, coal, and provisions before scuttling it a week later.

OCTOBER 12, 1914. Vice Adm. Maximilian, Reichsgraf von Spee, arrives out of the Pacific at Easter Island with the German East Asian Cruiser Squadron, consisting of the 765-man, 11,600-ton heavy cruisers Scharnhorst (flag) and Gneisenau, the 322-man, 3,400-ton light cruiser Nürnberg, plus some supply ships. This force has been driven out of the Far East two months previously, upon the outbreak of hostilities, and now joins with the Dresden and the Leipzig. After coaling, they set sail together for the South American mainland on October 18.

OCTOBER 26, 1914. Spee's squadron arrives off Más Afuera (Selkirk Island, Chile) and is unexpectedly rejoined by the 8,800-ton, armed merchant cruiser Prinz Eitel Friedrich, which is then detached toward Valparaíso for more coal with the collier Göttingen when the rest of the force steers eastward two days later.

OCTOBER 29, 1914. Coronel. HMS Glasgow detects German wireless traffic off of Chile, prompting Craddock to sail northward from Vallenar early the next morning with the Good Hope and the Monmouth, yet without awaiting the elderly battleship Canopus, which is rounding Cape Horn, as the British expect to encounter nothing more than the lone light cruiser Dresden.

Instead, at 4:20 p.m. on November 1, Craddock meets almost all of Spee's squadron: his flagship Scharnhorst under Capt. F. Schulz and sister cruiser Gneisenau under Captain Maerker, each mounting 8 eight-inch and 6 six-inch guns; as well as the 3,650-ton, 360-man light cruisers Dresden under Lüdecke, the 3,550-ton, 320-man Nürnberg under K. von Schönberg, and the 3,250-ton, 290-man Leipzig of Haun, all of which bear 10 four-inch guns (Nürnberg being detached). They clearly outclass the older British quartet, which consist of the 14,100-ton, 900-man flagship Good Hope under Capt. P. Francklin, mounting 2 nine-inch and 16 six-inch guns; the 9,800-ton, 675-man heavy cruiser Monmouth of Capt. Frank Brandt, bearing 14 six-inch guns; the 4,800-ton, 450-man light cruiser Glasgow of J. Luce, with 2 six-inch and 10 four-inch guns; plus the 12,000-ton liner Otranto of H. M. Edwards, with only 8 five-inch guns.

Nevertheless, at 5:00 p.m. Craddock bravely decides to engage until sundown rather than lose contact. Forming a single line at 5:45 p.m., the Royal Navy vessels circle westward, only to become silhouetted against the setting sun and fired upon at long range an hour and 15 minutes later. Charging in a desperate bid to close the gap, the British suffer heavily, the Monmouth yawing ablaze out of the line by 7:45 p.m., and the Good Hope exploding five minutes later.

At this point, the Glasgow speeds away to warn the Canopus, while the Nürnberg at 9:20 p.m. overtakes the crippled Monmouth, sending it to the bottom with all hands eight minutes later. The Germans suffer only three wounded during this lopsided encounter, although consuming half their irreplaceable supply of heavy rounds. The Canopus, the Glasgow, and the Otranto meanwhile retreat slowly toward Port Stanley in the Falklands, hoping to meet up with reinforcements.

Maximilian von Spee

In mid-October 1914, a small but powerful German squadron appeared out of the Pacific wastes. It was led across from Asia by Maximilian Johannes Maria Hubert, Reichsgraf von Spee, born on June 22, 1861, at Copenhagen (Denmark). He entered the Imperial German Navy as a cadet shortly before his 17th birthday and had his first overseas experience serving in the West African colony of Cameroon from 1887 to 1888. Promoted to captain in late January 1905, Spee became chief of staff of the North Sea Command three years later and a rear admiral by 1910.

In December 1912, he was appointed to lead Kaiser Wilhelm II's East Asian Cruiser Squadron. This crack unit was based in the deep-water anchorage of Tsingtao in Jiaozhou Bay, on the south coast of the Shandong Peninsula in northern China. Fifteen years earlier, Germany's naval strategist Adm. Alfred von Tirpitz had examined and recommended the acquisition of that fishing harbor as a permanent foothold. It was seized in November 1897, after the murders of two German missionaries. Berlin then extorted a 99-year lease from the feeble Chinese monarchy, creating a 330-square-mile protectorate in March 1898.

A cruiser division was stationed there, as well as the 3rd Marine Battalion out of Cuxhaven. The next year, Germany also purchased the Carolina, Mariana, and Palau islands from Spain (after its defeat by the United States), plus Samoa in 1900.

The German Navy administered this Chinese enclave, and its deployed warships were first-rate modern vessels manned by officers and crews hand picked by Tirpitz. It has been argued that Spee probably had the finest cruiser squadron in the world. Yet when hostilities began in Europe early in August 1914, his outnumbered and isolated force had to flee before heavier British, French, Russian, and Australian warships could converge against them—and, in particular, Japan's powerful fleet after its empire joined the war on August 23.

By then, Spee had long since vanished from Asian waters. He touched at Eniwetok, Christmas Island, and Western Samoa before shelling the French fort at Papeete on Tahiti in mid-September 1914. His formation then reached Easter Island a month later, blasting an overmatched British squadron off the South American coast before rounding Cape Horn for the Falklands, where his luck finally ran out.

NOVEMBER 3, 1914. Spee enters Valparaíso with the Scharnhorst, the Gneisenau, and the Nürnberg, while the Dresden and the Leipzig return to Más Afuera (Selkirk) Island.

NOVEMBER 4, 1914. At 6:30 p.m., the Karlsruhe unexpectedly explodes east of Barbados, a detonation in its forward magazines blowing off its bow. The light cruiser sinks within a half-hour, and 129 survivors are plucked out of the water by its collier consorts Rio Negro and Indrani (renamed the Hoffnung). The survivors reach Germany the next month aboard the Rio Negro.

NOVEMBER 15, 1914. Spee quits Más Afuera (Selkirk) Island with his reunited squadron, reaching San Quintín Bay (Chile) six days later to coal.

NOVEMBER 24, 1914. The 55-year-old vice admiral Sir Doveton Sturdee reaches the Abrolhos Islands (Brazil) from England with the battle cruisers Invincible and Inflexible, and two days later joins Rear Adm. A. C. Stoddart's Defence, Cornwall, Carnarvon, Kent, Orama, and Edinburgh Castle to prepare to scour the South Pacific coastline in quest of Spee's squadron.

NOVEMBER 26, 1914. Spee quits San Quintín Bay (Chile), encountering heavy weather, which delays his rounding of Cape Horn into the South Atlantic until nightfall of December 1. The Germans then anchor off Picton Island (Argentina) until December 6, taking on coal.

DECEMBER 7, 1914. Falklands. At 10:30 a.m., Sturdee's fleet reaches Port William from Brazil in anticipation of coaling before proceeding around Cape Horn to hunt for Spee. Instead, the German squadron is sighted approaching at 7:56 a.m. the next morning, in an ill-timed attempt to destroy the Falklands' signaling stations.

Expecting to encounter only light resistance, Spee is astonished to behold within its harbor the 17,250-ton, 780-man battle cruisers Invincible of Capt. T. P. H. Beamish and Inflexible of R. F. Phillimore, each armed with 8 16-inch and 16 4-inch guns; the 10,850-ton, 650-man Carnarvon of H. L. Skipwith, with 4 7.5-inch and 6 6-inch guns; the 9,800-ton, 675-man

After replenishing in Valparaíso, Maximilian von Spee's warships steam out past anchored Chilean vessels in the foreground, November 1914. Less than a month later, all three German vessels will be destroyed. (U.S. Naval Historical Center) heavy cruisers Cornwall of W. M. Ellerton and Kent of J. D. Allen, with 14 6-inch guns apiece; the 4,800-ton, 450-man light cruisers Bristol of B. H. Fanshawe and Glasgow of J. Luce, mounting 2 6-inch and 10 4-inch guns; the beached 12,950-ton, 750-ton Canopus of H. W. Grant, with 4 12-inch and 12 6-inch guns; plus the armed merchant cruiser Macedonia. The situation at Coronel is now reversed, the Germans having blundered into a superior British force.

After receiving a long-range opening salvo from the Canopus, Spee breaks off his attack and turns eastward at 9:30 a.m., simultaneously detaching his supply ships toward Picton Island. In the meantime, the British fleet frantically gets up steam, emerging a half hour later to pursue. The Bristol and the Macedonia are diverted at 11:00 a.m. to overhaul the fleeing German colliers, sinking the Baden and the Santa Isabel after taking off their crews, while the faster Seydlitz escapes into internment at San Antonio (Argentina).

At 12:45 p.m., Sturdee surges forward with the Invincible and the Inflexible, opening fire against Spee's main body at a range of 16,500 yards. Little more than a half-hour later, the German commander courageously turns to give battle with the Scharnhorst and the Gneisenau alone, hoping to cover the escape of his three light cruisers. The Cornwall, the Glasgow, and the Kent immediately obey earlier instructions by chasing the Dresden, the Leipzig, and the Nürnberg, leaving the German heavy cruisers to the Invincible, the Inflexible, and the Carnarvon.

Despite skillful handling, the Scharnhorst finally sinks with all hands at 4:20 p.m., followed at 6:00 p.m. by the Gneisenau, from which the British rescue 190 survivors. At 6:40 p.m., the Nürnberg strikes the Kent and sinks 50 minutes later, only 7 of its men being saved from the frigid waters. The Leipzig, too, slips beneath the waves at 8:30 p.m., only 18 men being rescued by the Cornwall and the Glasgow, while the Dresden makes good its escape. After vainly searching for this single vanished opponent until December 11, the British fleet returns to the Falklands, their losses having totaled a half-dozen dead and 16 wounded seamen.

DECEMBER 12, 1914. The Dresden puts into Punta Arenas (Chile) to quickly take on coal, shifting into secluded Hewett Bay two days later.

FEBRUARY 4, 1915. Kaiser Wilhelm II of Germany announces that, within two weeks' time, the seas around the British Isles will be considered a war zone,

Lusitania Incident

As massive armies settled into the motionless attrition of trench warfare in Europe, both sides also tried to impose naval blockades to starve each other of matériel. The mighty Royal Navy swept German commercial traffic from the seas and stopped neutral vessels from carrying restricted cargoes into German ports. Americans at first objected to the diversion of U.S. merchantmen into British ports for inspection, but they soon grew sympathetic to the Allied cause—especially after English and French bulk purchases helped revive industrial demand, lifting the United States out of depression.

Unable to match the Royal Navy's surface strength, Berlin announced in February 1915 that the waters around Britain would be deemed a war zone, where vessels might be sunk without warning by their submarines. In all previous conflicts, merchant ships had been stopped and personnel allowed to disembark before the ships were destroyed. American feeling was therefore aroused by this callous new policy. Washington even warned the German government that it would be held accountable for any American lives lost.

At 2:10 p.m. on May 7, 1915, the inevitable finally occurred when the 44,000-ton British Cunard liner Lusitania was struck eight miles off the Old Head of Kinsale (Ireland) by a torpedo fired from the German submarine U-20 of Capt. Lt. Walter Schweiger. The liner went down in 18 minutes, taking 1,198 people to their deaths, including almost 100 children. The Lusitania was six days out of New York at the time, and there were 197 American passengers aboard, of whom 128 died.

A huge outpouring of wrath and grief erupted on both sides of the Atlantic, and the United States seemed ready to declare war against Germany. President Woodrow Wilson eventually satisfied himself with registering angry complaints, but the incident rankled the American public. It fueled anti-German sentiments and contributed to the country's plunge into the conflict two years later.

where even unarmed merchantmen might be sunk without warning by submarines. The United States and other neutral nations express their reservations about this unprecedented, indiscriminate threat.

MARCH 8, 1915. HMS Kent sights the Dresden 300 miles west of Coronel (Chile), losing contact at nightfall.

MARCH 14, 1915. At sunrise, HMSS Kent and Cornwall, plus the armed merchant cruiser Orama, enter Cumberland Bay on Más Afuera (Selkirk) Island, opening fire against the anchored Dresden by 8:50 a.m. His fuel bunkers empty, Captain Lüdecke sends Lt. Wilhelm Canaris—later to become head of German intelligence during World War II and executed on Hitler's orders in 1944—to negotiate surrender terms. While this parley is taking place, Lüdecke scuttles his light cruiser and escapes ashore with the crew.

MARCH 28, 1915. Having destroyed a further 15 Allied merchantmen off the Argentine and Brazilian coasts, the German commerce raider Kronprinz Wilhelm hopes to rendezvous with its supply ship Macedonia near the equator. Instead, though, the latter has been intercepted by two British cruisers.

Running low on coal, Captain Thierfelder steers for Cape Henry (Virginia), arriving early on the morning of April 11 and dropping anchor off Newport News, to be interned by the neutral American authorities. During its eight-month cruise, this raider has destroyed 56,000 tons of Allied shipping.

AUGUST 19, 1915. The 15,800-ton White Star liner Arabic, outward bound from Liverpool toward New York, is sunk 50 miles southwest of Old Head of Kinsale (Ireland) by the German submarine U-24 of Capt. Lt. Rudolph Schneider, taking down 3 more American passengers along with 41 other victims. President Woodrow Wilson once more lodges angry protests through German diplomatic channels.

AUGUST 27, 1915. In response to Washington's protests, Germany imposes severe injunctions against any more U-boat attacks against large passenger liners and on September 18 entirely halts its policy of unrestricted submarine warfare around the British Isles.

FEBRUARY 23, 1916. Germany resumes submarine attacks against merchantmen approaching England.

MARCH 24, 1916. The unarmed Anglo-French ferry Sussex is torpedoed by a U-boat while crossing the English Channel from Folkestone to Dieppe, killing 50 passengers and wounding 30, among the latter some American citizens. President Wilson formally protests in a speech before the U.S. Congress the next month, hence Berlin once again suspends its unrestricted submarine warfare as of May 4.

JANUARY 16, 1917. German foreign minister Alfred Zimmermann sends a telegram to Ambassador Eckhardt in Mexico City advising him that Berlin is about to resume unrestricted submarine warfare on February 1. If the United States should become a belligerent as a result, Germany proposes a military alliance with Mexico, whereby the latter should attack and reconquer Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. This communiqué is intercepted and deciphered by British Naval Intelligence, who reveals its contents to Washington.

FEBRUARY 1, 1917. Germany resumes unrestricted submarine warfare, consequently two days later, the United States breaks off diplomatic relations with Berlin.

FEBRUARY 26, 1917. Congress is asked to approve the arming of U.S. merchant vessels, but 11 noninterventionist senators filibuster the bill.

MARCH 1, 1917. The contents of the Zimmermann telegram are revealed to the world, embarrassing both the German and Mexican governments.

MARCH 9, 1917. Using his executive powers, Wilson authorizes the arming of American merchant vessels.

MARCH 18, 1917. Three U.S. merchantmen are sunk by German U-boats, sustaining heavy casualties. Three days later, Wilson calls Congress into special session for April 2 to consider joining the ongoing hostilities.

APRIL 6, 1917. The United States declares war against Germany.

JUNE 7, 1917. U-boats operating out of Germany, Flanders, and the Adriatic commence an offensive against the eastern seaboard of America.

SEPTEMBER 1917. The introduction of an Anglo-American convoy system in the North Atlantic effectively halts U-boat operations by October 21, 1918.

At 11:00 a.m. on November 11, 1918, Germany officially surrenders. Appalled at the monstrous loss of life incurred by modern weaponry in the trenches of Europe, the United States goes through a period of postwar isolationism, hoping to use the Atlantic and Pacific oceans as barriers against the world's problems.

ISOLATED UPHEAVALS (1921–1939)

Although overall turmoil in the Americas continues to lessen, occasional outbursts still erupt, especially as the effects of the Great Depression of October 1929 ripple through its economies.

JUNE 21, 1921. Billy Mitchell's Challenge. In Chesapeake Bay off the coast of Virginia, a series of tests commences when the anchored, 1,200-ton, former German submarine U-117—surrendered to America at the end of World War I and now earmarked to be scrapped—is sunk by twin-engined U.S. Navy Felixstowe F-5-L flying boats. Eight days later, three U.S. Army dirigibles succeed in locating the elderly battleship USS Iowa as it maneuvers evasively out in the open ocean between capes Henlopen and Hatteras. On July 13, the ex-German destroyer G-102 is sent to the bottom of the sea by twin-engined, newly redesigned U.S. Army Martin MB-2/NBS-1 bombers; five days afterward, it is the turn of the 5,100-ton light cruiser Frankfurt to be destroyed by these aircraft.

These trials have been arranged in response to a challenge issued on February 7, 1921, before the House Naval Affairs Committee by 41-year-old brigadier general William “Billy” Mitchell, assistant chief of the Army Air Service, who has repeatedly asserted that, since bombers can sink any battleship, the U.S. government—rather than appropriate even more funds for building costly dreadnoughts—should instead divert monies toward the creation of a modern air force. Locked in a bitter appropriations struggle for the dwindling amount of cash available, the U.S. Navy reluctantly agrees to a summertime series of demonstrations, but with certain restrictions: each individual bombardment is to be followed by a detailed inspection (and repairs) to the damaged target vessel, while aerial bombs cannot weigh more than 1,000 pounds.

Mitchell gathers more than 150 aircraft and 1,000 personnel into a unit called the 1st Provisional Air Brigade at Langley Field (Virginia) to begin training. Veteran foreign pilots of World War I, such as Russian major Alexander de Seversky, help convince his flyers that a bomb strike near a vessel is most devastating, for it allows water to flood in through ruptured hull plating. On the afternoon of July 20, testing culminates when the first bomber flights attack the formidable 27,000-ton battleship Ostfriesland, with its four-layered hull and scores of watertight compartments, riding at anchor 70 miles east of the Cape Charles light ship. Observers crowd the decks of the nearby flagship USS Pennsylvania: the secretaries of war and of the navy, the new army chief of staff, Gen. John Pershing, the marine commandant John Lejeune, 8 senators, 16 congressmen, plus scores of reporters and foreign dignitaries (including 3 Japanese officers).

Light 600-pound bombs breach the Ostfriesland's hull and cause some flooding, yet U.S. Navy umpires declare the battleship to be “absolutely intact and undamaged.” The next morning, the first 1,000-pound bomb strikes its forecastle, bringing an immediate halt to the bombardment for another inspection. Convinced that such interruptions are designed to save the battleship, Mitchell instructs his armorers to fit six Martin and two Handley-Page O/400 bombers with 2,000-pound bombs, which he has secretly ordered built. The first detonates beside the Ostfriesland at 12:17 p.m., followed by five more within 10 minutes. The huge ship rolls over at 12:37 p.m. and disappears beneath the waves.

Despite this spectacular vindication, Mitchell fails to persuade the authorities to create and fund a powerful new air force. Born into great wealth and privilege, the son of Sen. John L. Mitchell of Wisconsin, his egotistical self-assuredness and publicity seeking have alienated superiors from as long ago as during his heroic 1917–1918 service in France. His outspokenness will eventually get him court-martialed, yet his predictions about the importance of air power will eventually be recognized and embraced.

JANUARY 25, 1922. The 340-man, 3,200-ton light cruiser USS Galveston lands its marine detachment at Corinto (Nicaragua), to support the company-sized unit guarding the American Legation in Managua during an interlude of political unrest.

MAY 27, 1922. In Paraguay, pro-Colorado Party adherents colonels Adolfo Chirife and Pedro Mendoza lead a military revolt against the newly elected government of compromise Liberal president Dr. Eusebio Ayala, which is successfully resisted. Initially

Birth of the American Aircraft Carrier

Despite the U.S. Navy's antipathy toward army brigadier general Billy Mitchell's wish to divert scarce government funds to create a separate air force, his bombing successes convinced many officers of their need to develop aviation. As a result, 51-year-old rear admiral William A. Moffett—until December 1920 commander of the battleship USS Mississippi—was put in charge of the navy's new "Bureau of Aeronautics" in April 1921. Although Moffett believed that aircraft might play a defensive role for a fleet, he soon came to embrace their offensive potential as well.

The daredevil Eugene Ely had taken off from shipboard platforms as long ago as November 1910, yet the first "aircraft carrier" was the French seaplane tender Foudre, unveiled in December 1911. It hoisted floatplanes out of its hold to take off from the water. Within two years, the Royal Navy and U.S. Navy had similar ships. The British refined carrier design during World War I, creating the first ship with a full-length, flush flight deck—the 14,000-ton HMS Argus—by September 1918.

The first American carrier was the 11,500-ton USS Langley, converted from the collier Jupiter. It was commissioned on March 20, 1922, and began takeoffs that same October 17. Two months later, the Imperial Japanese Navy unveiled its 7,500-ton Hosho, while the British finished their 11,100-ton Hermes by July 1923, both being purpose-built vessels. American interest rose thanks to the tonnage limitations imposed by the Washington Naval Treaty. Like all other navies, that of the United States was over tonnage in terms of battleships but considerably under for carriers. Two battle cruisers already under construction were therefore changed in July 1922, emerging five years later as the 33,000-ton USS Saratoga and 41,000-ton Lexington.

Carrier operations proved so decisive during World War II that the U.S. Navy retained large battle groups even after hostilities ceased. They became a powerful means of projecting American influence throughout the Western Hemisphere and around the globe. Such formations also proved so expensive to build and maintain that few governments could afford them. In the Americas, only Canada, Argentina, and Brazil have ever owned a handful of carriers, all bought secondhand.

driven southeastward down the vital rail line into the city of Paraguari, Chirife's rebellious forces are even bombarded by hired government planes flying out of Ñu-Guazú Airfield on the Campo Grande military base outside the capital of Asunción, one of which is shot down by rebel rifle fire on July 8 near the Pirayú railway station.

Loyal columns nonetheless press eastward into the strategic city of Villarrica, and on September 5–6 their advance camp near Salitre-Cué is surprisingly bombed by rebel aircraft out of Cangó. Yet they are successfully engaged in aerial combat by the English mercenary and World War I veteran, Lt. Patrick Hassett. Chirife's increasingly ragtag army is eventually pressed deeper into the northeastern jungles and effectively finished off as a fighting force by early the next year. Chirife himself dies of pneumonia in his hideout on May 18, 1923, and his surviving movement is gradually stamped out.

JULY 5, 1922. Fort Igrejinha's garrison at Copacabana outside Rio de Janeiro (Brazil) revolts against President Epitácio Pessoa, being joined shortly thereafter by the local military academy. The 300 rebels lob a few shells against strategic targets within the capital, before being put down by advances of loyal troops, and bombardments from the battleships Minas Geraes and São Paulo, plus a destroyer. A small group of Fort Igrejinha's youngest officers fight to the very end on its beach, becoming known as the "Eighteen Lieutenants of Fort Copacabana."

JULY 17, 1922. Three and a half months after going on strike to protest a pay cut, dock workers in Curaçao's capital of Willemstad run riot at 10:45 a.m., ransacking the offices of their main employer: the Royal Dutch West Indian Mail Service (KWIM). By the time troops and police restore order, 4 people are dead and 19 injured.

NOVEMBER 15, 1922. Frightened by a mass downtown rally in support of a general strike in Guayaquil (Ecuador) protesting the collapse of cacao exports and the national currency, police and troops suddenly open fire and kill at least 300 people.

JANUARY 25, 1923. Uprisings erupt throughout Brazil's state of Rio Grande do Sul over alleged electoral fraud. They are resolved by December with the Pedras Altas Pact, which allows five-term governor Antônio Augusto Borges de Medeiros to remain in office.

A U.S. Navy Aeromarine 39-B biplane lands on the carrier Langley, ca. 1922. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

JULY 5, 1924. On the second anniversary of the Tenentes or “Lieutenants” Revolt, retired Brazilian general Isidoro Dias Lopes leads São Paulo’s garrison in a mutiny against the government of President Artur da Silva Bernardes and is supported by much of the city populace, as well as isolated pockets throughout other states.

Loyal troops soon approach, though, and compel the São Paulo rebels to retreat southwestward on July 27. After attempting to make a stand at the towns of Guáira, Foz do Iguaçu, and Catanduvas at the confluence of the Iguaçu and Paraná rivers, Lopes is eventually compelled to surrender his jungle stronghold by March 27, 1925, and melt deeper into the interior.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1924. In Chile, a prolonged period of economic decline provokes military displeasure, resulting in the appointment of Gen. Luis Altamirano as interior minister. He in turn names Col. Juan P. Bennett and Adm. Francisco Neff to the cabinet, along with three civilians. At this point, the 56-year-old beleaguered president Arturo Alessandri proffers his resignation, but Congress refuses to accept it, instead granting him a six-month leave of absence.

Determined to restore power into conservative hands, the military ministers thereupon pass a popular labor-legislation bill and, in the resultant euphoria, compel their civilian colleagues to resign on September 10. Altamirano, Bennett, and Neff subsequently annul Alessandri’s leave of absence, accept his original resignation, then dissolve Congress in a bloodless coup.

OCTOBER 1924. The young captain Luís Carlos Prestes rebels in the former Misiones Territory of Brazil’s Rio Grande do Sul Province, heading north-eastward out of Alegrete (near the Uruguayan border) in the vain hope of joining Lopes’s rebellion with more than 1,000 exiled former officers, adventurers, and soldiers. They arrive too late to support this cause, and over the next two and a half years, Prestes’s followers march more than 6,000 miles through the Brazilian jungles, avoiding loyal formations until its 800 survivors seek asylum in Bolivia.

NOVEMBER 6, 1924. The Brazilian battleship São Paulo mutinies at its anchorage in Guanabara Bay, threatening to shell Bernardes’s presidential palace in nearby Rio de Janeiro. The mutineers then change their minds, sailing out of port under fire from its batteries, before finally surrendering to the Uruguayan authorities in Montevideo.

JANUARY 23, 1925. A group of young Chilean army officers, led by majors Carlos Ibáñez del Campo and Marmaduke Grove, mounts a liberal countercoup against the conservative military junta (see “September 5, 1924” entry). Although the navy and some civilian elements at first consider resistance, threatening to plunge the nation into civil war, cooler heads prevail, and President Alessandri is restored to office by March 20.

OCTOBER 12, 1925. After several months of economic boycotts and rioting due to exorbitant rent increases by Panamanian landlords, President Rodolfo Chiari requests the intervention of a battalion of U.S. troops to restore order.

DECEMBER 21, 1926. In a publicity stunt intended to highlight the U.S. government’s growing interest in all of Latin America, five Air Corps Loening OA-1 amphibious aircraft depart Kelly Field in Texas under Maj. Herbert Dargue on a goodwill flight throughout Central and South America. After reaching as far south as Valdivia (Chile), they return to Washington by May 2, 1927, to be greeted by President Calvin Coolidge.

JUNE 8, 1929. This evening, about 40 poorly armed Venezuelan exiles led by Rafael Simón Urbina drive two buses into a Dutch military camp at Waterfort, just outside Curaçao’s capital of Willemstad. They kill 3 surprised soldiers and capture the rest, then are joined by another 200 exiled colleagues in cars, who help empty the arsenal. Urbina then compels the Dutch governor to allow his 250 adherents and 13 hostages to set sail at 2:00 a.m. the next morning aboard the commandeered steamer Maracaibo.

The Venezuelans disembark near Coro to begin using this stolen weaponry in an unsuccessful insurrection against the dictator Juan Vicente Gómez, while the Dutch return into Willemstad by evening of June 9 to declare a month-long state of siege, fearful of the 2,300 Venezuelan workers still living on their island (this distrust, however, proves to be groundless).

DECEMBER 2, 1929. Amid rising tensions brought on by the economic downturn, Perkins Johnson—director of the American-run customs house at Haiti’s capital of Port-au-Prince—strikes an employee, provoking a general walkout by most government workers two days later. The U.S. Marine “High Commissioner” for this occupied island, Col. Richard M. Cutts, proclaims martial law, resulting in a tragic confrontation at Croix-Marchaterre near

Crash of 1929

On a day remembered as “Black Thursday,” October 24, 1929, record numbers of jittery investors began selling shares on the New York Stock Exchange. Efforts by leading bankers to stem this panic through large-scale purchases failed to quell the spreading fear, so stock prices collapsed by October 29. Over these five days, the Dow Jones Industrial Average lost more than a third of its total value, and this hysteria quickly spread to other markets. Many Americans had borrowed heavily from banks to invest as speculators when share prices were soaring. Now, both they and their lending institutions suffered heavily, many going under when the bubble burst.

The economy and markets recovered shakily by early 1930. Then another crash sent the New York Stock Exchange plunging to its lowest point by July 1932, when total value stood at scarcely 10 percent of pre-crash days. Such cataclysmic losses of billions of dollars contributed significantly to the worldwide Great Depression, as virtually every major industry was adversely affected by this wholesale evaporation of investment capital. Wages contracted, construction ground to a halt, prices for farm and mineral products were reduced by more than half, while unemployment and homelessness spiraled out of control.

Such a severe drop in trade was felt especially hard by South American countries, many of which depended on one or two exports to sustain their economies. Ruled by feeble governments incapable of alleviating public suffering or correcting such problems, they were gripped by popular unrest. The global economy finally began to recuperate in the mid-1930s, thanks to the newly elected administration of U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt. Ironically, demand for goods was to be fully revived by the outbreak of World War II in September 1939. Still, the New York Stock Exchange did not regain its pre-crash levels until 1955.

Les Cayes on December 6 when 1,500 peasants—launching their own independent protest against recently imposed alcohol and tobacco taxes—are fired upon by a jittery marine contingent, suffering more than 24 dead and 50 wounded.

This incident will lead President Herbert Hoover to dispatch a five-member commission to Haiti to investigate matters under W. Cameron Forbes, former U.S. governor general of the Philippines, which reaches Port-au-Prince aboard the cruiser USS Rochester on the afternoon of February 28, 1930. After listening to numerous complaints, they defuse the crisis by proposing that the Haitian Assembly elect an interim president to replace the puppet Louis Borno, as well as recommending that the office of “High Commissioner” be abolished and the country gradually restored to local rule. A rash of arsons occurs in the capital during this tense period, the villas of both the senior marine colonel and lieutenant colonel being burned.

JANUARY 1930. Because of a collapse on international markets of the price of sugar, Cuba’s main export, President Geraldo Machado reduces the salaries of all public employees except soldiers. Public demonstrations are also banned.

MARCH 19, 1930. A plan to depose Paraguay’s liberal president José Patricio Guggiari is revealed by one of the conspirators, 31-year-old major Arturo Bray (born in Asunción of British parents); consequently, the commander of the Campo Grande army base outside the capital, Maj. Rafael de la Cruz Franco Ojeda, is obliged to resign along with the interior minister, Luis de Gasperi.

MAY 19, 1930. A political meeting at Artemisa, near Havana, is broken up by Cuban soldiers. Eight people are killed and several dozen injured, fanning unrest. When railway workers go on strike on May 28, the army takes over their duties.

JUNE 1930. Amid the economic collapse engendered by the worldwide Great Depression, the unpopular Bolivian president Dr. Hernando Siles Reyes is overthrown by student protests and temporarily replaced by a military junta headed by Gen. Carlos Blanco Galindo, before Dr. Daniel Salamanca is elected in his place.

AUGUST 1930. Peruvian Coup. At Arequipa, Lt. Col. Luis M. Sánchez Cerro leads a military uprising against the administration of dictator Augusto Leguía, which soon spreads to the garrisons of Puno and Cuzco. With opposition against his rule mounting even within the capital itself, Leguía soon flees Lima for the port of Callao and puts to sea aboard the cruiser Almirante Grau.

Sánchez Cerro meanwhile reaches the capital by airplane and receives a tumultuous reception, while quickly establishing a military junta. The Almirante Grau eventually returns into port, and the former president is put on trial, dying from medical neglect on February 6, 1932, while still incarcerated.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1930. Argentine Coup. This Saturday morning—after several weeks of growing unrest in Buenos Aires’s streets sparked by the worldwide effects of the Great Depression—Lt. Gen. José Félix Uriburu launches a well-planned military uprising against the second term of 78-year-old president Hipólito Yrigoyen, receiving support from the Campo de Mayo Military Camp, the Palomar Air Base, and the Senior Military College outside the city.

At noon, the mutinous general marches into the capital and occupies all its government buildings by 5:30 p.m., having encountered only sporadic opposition around the Congress, in which four cadets are slain. After peacefully inaugurating his provisional rule on Sunday, September 7, another round of fighting erupts overnight on September 8 when nervous sentries at the presidential palace (called the Casa Rosada or “Pink House”) mistakenly fire upon another rebel contingent in the gloom, resulting in 1 soldier and 7 civilians killed, plus 12 soldiers and 36 civilians wounded. Yrigoyen departs into exile from nearby La Plata, while Uriburu imposes martial law and sets about purging the Argentine government.

(Upon holding new provincial elections on April 5, 1931, however, Yrigoyen’s Radical Union Party still emerges victorious, much to the general’s dismay—and he promptly annuls the results. When presidential elections are held again on November 8, 1931, the Radical Unionists boycott, and Uriburu engineers the victory of his fellow conspirator, Gen. Agustín P. Justo.)

SEPTEMBER 30, 1930. Cuban soldiers prevent a planned demonstration by University of Havana students. The next day, President Machado alleges that the students “are following orders from Moscow.”

OCTOBER 3, 1930. Vargas Revolution. After months of political unrest and uncertainty in Brazil, the 47-year-old liberal reformer Getúlio Dornelles Vargas—defeated as an opposition candidate in the March 1 presidential election—leads a revolt in Rio Grande do Sul, Minas Gerais, and Paraíba provinces against the government of Washington Luís Pereira de Sousa and his handpicked successor, Júlio Prestes. Although poorly equipped, the rebels advance north-eastward out of Vargas’s headquarters at Pôrto Alegre with considerable ease under Lt. Col. Manuel César de Góis Monteiro, soon reaching the border between the provinces of Paraná and São Paulo, while many federal army units either defect to their side or refuse to fight.

A major confrontation is expected in the vicinity of Itararé, but support for President Washington Luís is by now so eroded that he is arrested in Rio de Janeiro on October 24 by a junta comprised of generals Tasso Fragoso and Mena Barreto, plus Rear Adm. Isaías de Noronha, then imprisoned in one of the Copacabana forts. This triumvirate quickly calls for a ceasefire, subsequently sending the president and Prestes into exile, while allowing Vargas to enter the capital on November 3 to a tumultuous reception. The latter immediately assumes office as head of a provisional government.

NOVEMBER 11, 1930. Cuban students lead violent protests against the Machado government in Pinar del Río, Santiago de Cuba, Santa Clara, and several other cities. The authorities close down all universities by month's end and tighten press censorship.

JANUARY 2, 1931. This night, the stepbrothers Harmodio Arias Madrid and Francisco Arias Paredes of the radical Acción Comunal movement depose Panama's President Florencio Harmodio Arosemena in a bloodless coup.

JULY 20, 1931. This morning, Lt. Col. Gregorio Pomar—second-in-command of Argentina's 9th Infantry Regiment stationed outside the northern provincial capital of Corrientes—revolts against the Uriburu regime, slaying his immediate superior, Lt. Col. Lino H. Montiel, in his office. As loyal units from Brig. Gen. Luis Bruce's 3rd Division begin to close in, Pomar's followers lose heart and return to their barracks. At 8:55 p.m. on July 22, the mutinous colonel goes aboard a barge with a few loyal supporters, then sails up the Paraná River into exile at Humaitá (Paraguay), arriving the next day.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1931. Chilean Naval Mutiny. While lying at anchor in Tongoy Bay near Puerto Aldea, 15 miles south of Coquimbo, during annual winter exercises, the bulk of Chile's navy is outraged to learn of pay reductions being enacted by the bankrupt government at Santiago, which will adversely affect their family members in home ports. Junior officers and seamen therefore detain their senior commanders, radioing an ultimatum to naval headquarters in the capital.

To underscore their demands, the rebel warships Riveros and Capitán Arturo Prat proceed to the main base of Talcahuano, north of Concepción, to persuade more than 3,000 naval and civilian personnel to join their insurrection. At dawn on September 5, though, two infantry and a cavalry regiment under Gen. Guillermo Novoa, plus a company of loyal naval officers, advance upon the base's Los Leones land gate, eventually deploying artillery to subdue this vast complex by afternoon. In the process, they secure more than 2,000 prisoners, while crippling both rebel warships and driving the Riveros's crew into Fort Rondizzoni on Quiriquina Island. Threatened the next day with aerial bombardment by float planes, these last holdouts surrender. This confrontation at Talcahuano costs the lives of nine mutineers and a dozen loyalists. The mutinous fleet at Coquimbo is also bombed by warplanes, and the insurrection collapses.

Loyal Chilean warplanes bombing mutinous warships near Coquimbo. (Armada de Chile)

SEPTEMBER 28, 1931. Amid an escalating cycle of repressive murders and terrorist reprisals, the president of Cuba's Senate—Clemente Vázquez Bello—is assassinated by a secret political group known as the ABC. President Machado's secret police retaliate with even greater ferocity.

OCTOBER 22, 1931. This evening, student and unionist demonstrators march through the streets of Asunción toward the private residence of liberal president Guggiari, protesting against the lack of governmental resolve in stemming Bolivian incursions into the Chaco Boreal. After pelting the house with rocks, the demonstrators are dispersed by bayonet-wielding troops.

The next day, the students gather again outside the home of the opposition figure, Major Franco, after which some 450 decide to approach the presidential palace. This time, 11 are shot and 29 wounded, after which martial law is declared and Franco is deported, along with numerous others. Guggiari nonetheless steps down temporarily on October 25, returning into office on January 28, 1932, after having been exonerated by Congress.

DECEMBER 1931. In El Salvador, the recently elected president Arturo Araujo is deposed by a military coup led by Gen. Maximiliano Hernández Martínez, who subsequently unleashes a bloody purge that allegedly kills 32,000 Indians and political opponents within a year.

DECEMBER 8, 1931. On the day of Sánchez Cerro's installation as newly elected Peruvian president, his radical opponent Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre of the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana or "Popular American Revolutionary Alliance" (known as APRA, its members being called Apristas) calls for a leftist reaction. Political violence escalates as a result, with the few Aprista representatives at the national constitutional assembly being arrested in January 1932. Sánchez Cerro himself is wounded in an assassination attempt on March 6.

MAY 10, 1932. Bonus March. An unemployed cannery superintendent in Portland (Oregon)—a former sergeant of the 146th Field Artillery named Walter W. Waters—calls for a pilgrimage of jobless veterans to Washington, D.C., to encourage passage of a bill introduced by Rep. Wright Patman of Texas for immediate payment of World War I ex-servicemen's adjusted compensation certificates: the so-called Soldiers' Bonuses.

Referred to derisively as the "Bonus Expeditionary Force" or BEF, 300 men depart Portland and reach the nation's capital 19 days later by hopping freight trains, followed by 20,000–30,000 more within the next few weeks from every state of the Union. They are greeted by the sympathetic police chief (and retired brigadier general) Pelham D. Glassford, who provides temporary housing and food. However, the bill itself is voted down 62–18 in the Senate on June 17, after which Congress recesses for the summer. Weary of the BEF shanties within their city, the District of Columbia commissioners eventually request that President Hoover send in federal troops to disperse the protest.

A cavalry squadron, infantry battalion, and tank platoon appear on the afternoon of July 28 under Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur, Maj. Gen. George Van Horn Moseley, and Brig. Gen. Perry Miles (Maj. Dwight David Eisenhower serving as liaison to the police). They drive the BEF out of Washington in short order, inflicting a pair of fatalities, plus numerous injuries.

JULY 7, 1932. Peruvian Uprising. At 4:00 a.m., Aprista radicals in their ideological capital of Trujillo assault its powerful government garrison, subduing the defenders after five hours of fighting, then arming the city populace to resist a counterattack. President Sánchez Cerro responds by ordering the cruiser Almirante Grau to Salaverry, plus dispatching loyal troops from Cajamarca and other nearby cities to converge upon Trujillo. By the afternoon of July 8, the rebels' defeat seems certain, and government airplanes begin dropping leaflets demanding the surrender of the city. The Aprista leaders flee at nightfall, after ordering the execution of 60 military captives. When loyal columns fight their way in and discover this massacre a few days later, they execute at least 1,000 people by way of retaliation.

JULY 9, 1932. Brazil's Constitutionalist Revolution.

Amid growing disenchantment with Vargas's dictatorial policies, Gen. Bertoldo Klinger—dismissed as commandant of the Mato Grosso military region—leads an insurrection at São Paulo against the federal government. Despite his initial surprise, the president is able to contain and throttle this rebellion by September 29 with loyal contingents under General Monteiro, amid heavy loss of life. The Paulista politicians are in turn surprised by the abrupt collapse of their army, which sends them into exile in Portugal; yet, notwithstanding their defeat, they later claim a moral victory, as their action pushes Vargas into convening an assembly that drafts a new constitution and authorizes elections by January 1934.

AUGUST 31, 1932. Aprista-inspired Peruvian adventurers occupy the Amazonian port of Leticia (population 400), ceded to Colombia four years earlier by treaty. This border incident embroils President Sánchez Cerro in an unwanted military confrontation with his Colombian neighbors.

MARCH 31, 1933. Uruguay's President Gabriel Terra, his nation in the grips of deep economic difficulties, uses the military to dissolve Congress and the Executive Council, so as to rule as a virtual dictator.

APRIL 30, 1933. After attending a military review of 25,000 troops at Lima's Santa Beatriz racetrack,

Rebel cavalry parading out of São Paulo. (O Mundo ilustrado)

President Sánchez Cerro is murdered by an Aprista assassin named Abelardo Mendoza Leiva.

JULY 25, 1933. Bus drivers in Havana go on strike against the repressive regime of President Machado, who is also viewed with disfavor by the new administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in Washington. The strike spreads over the next fortnight, until a false rumor appears on August 4 that Machado has resigned. When jubilant crowds attempt to march on the presidential palace, they are met by gunfire from troops and police, who kill about 20 people and injure many others.

On August 12, a group of army officers take over several barracks outside Havana. When Machado visits the Columbia base to assess the situation, he is informed he should resign. The president therefore abdicates and the next day flies to Nassau in the Bahamas. At least 1,000 people die and 300 residences in Havana are ransacked in the ensuing riots. Carlos M. Céspedes is temporarily appointed as president, but confusion reigns.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1933. Led by a group of eight sergeants from the Columbia army base outside Havana, a popular uprising drives the interim Cuban government of President Céspedes from office the next day.

On September 10, the populist intellectual Dr. Ramón Grau San Martín is acclaimed as president. He will annul the Platt Amendment, call for an eight-hour workday, open universities to the poor, grant tenant farmers their land, give women the vote, and reduce electricity rates. U.S. ambassador Sumner Welles denounces these reforms as “communist,” and Washington refuses to recognize the new government, which will be removed from power four months later.

OCTOBER 2, 1933. A power struggle within the Cuban army leads one faction to attack another inside the National Hotel in Havana. Fourteen officers are killed, 17 wounded, and the rest taken prisoner. Other groups also begin fighting among themselves.

NOVEMBER 3, 1933. Sgt. Fulgencio Batista, the leading figure to emerge from Cuba’s “Revolt of the Sergeants” on September 5, narrowly avoids arrest by President Grau.

NOVEMBER 8, 1933. Part of the Cuban Army and Air Force rebel against the government of President

Grau. By noon, several police stations in Havana have been taken, and two planes begin bombarding the presidential palace. But Sergeant Batista orders the remainder of the army to fight on behalf of the government, therefore the coup is crushed by the next evening. U.S. ambassador Welles is withdrawn by Washington two weeks later, believed to have encouraged this insurrection.

JANUARY 15, 1934. Fulgencio Batista, now promoted to colonel and with the connivance of the new U.S. ambassador Jefferson Caffery, forces the resignation of Cuban president Grau. Two days later, Carlos Mendieta becomes provisional president, and Washington recognizes this change of administration.

MAY 1934. After seven months of negotiations at Rio de Janeiro, Peru agrees to withdraw its forces from the disputed port of Leticia, thereby ending its conflict with Colombia.

NOVEMBER 23, 1935. As part of a Comintern-inspired strategy drafted in Moscow, a group of Brazilian noncommissioned soldiers revolts this evening against its officers at Natal in Rio Grande do Norte Province, followed by a similar uprising at Recife in Pernambuco Province. As loyal forces rush in to crush these mutinies, Communist Party leader Luís Carlos Prestes leads an attack against a federal barracks in Rio de Janeiro on November 27, during which numerous loyalists are murdered. After putting down these outbursts, President Vargas uses the communist threat as an excuse to suspend civil liberties and purge all left-wing political parties.

FEBRUARY 17, 1936. In Paraguay, simmering social discontent and economic disappointment in the wake of the victorious Chaco War explode this Monday when lieutenant colonels Federico Wenman Smith and Camildo Recalde stage a military coup against the government of President Eusebio Ayala. Police headquarters in the capital of Asunción is fired upon by mortars at 8:00 a.m., inflicting many casualties. Its loyalist defenders are driven back into the main post office, then into the naval headquarters, during day-long exchanges. Finally, the defeated Ayala goes aboard the anchored 850-ton, Italian-built gunboat Paraguay by evening, yet refuses to steam to seek help from the army’s commander in chief, Gen. José Félix Estigarribia, who went the previous day to visit troops at Capirendá. Instead, the president surrenders to Recalde at 9:00 p.m. and is incarcerated.

Communism

This ideology emerged in Europe during the late 19th century, as political philosophers tried to define the evolution of society in a postindustrial era. The German-born socialist Karl Marx imagined a transition from capitalism to “communism”—a classless, stateless utopia of the future, based on common ownership of all means of production. It was to be achieved through revolutions by the proletariat or working class. His theories became influential after the radical Bolshevik faction of the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party, headed by Vladimir Lenin, seized power in the so-called October Revolution of 1917.

This aggressive new regime beat back its enemies through ruthless one-party rule and nationalizations. These early communists also believed that upheavals would soon occur in other nations as well. So when World War I ended in November 1918, they revived an association known as the Communist International or Comintern in March 1919. Its mission was to fight “by all available means, including armed force, for the overthrow of the international bourgeoisie and for the creation of an international Soviet republic.” Support was promised to socialist revolts, whose leaders were to also attend congresses in Russia every few years, chaired by Grigory Zinoviev.

Yet given the Soviet Union’s early problems, as well as the backlash from failed uprisings abroad during the early 1920s, Joseph Stalin decided to retract such an ambitious goal. The prospect of an immediate global triumph was dismissed, along with Zinoviev. Some money and weapons were still provided for select overseas operations, until the Comintern itself was purged by Stalin in 1935. Many foreign members were shot, while Zinoviev was paraded in a show trial in Moscow before being executed in August 1936.

But although direct Russian incitement failed, communism continued to influence rebel groups around the world, especially in Latin America. The idea of an armed elite spearheading the overthrow of a corrupt regime, then replacing it with a state-run economy to benefit the masses, fitted the guerrillas’ thinking. This ideology inspired many insurgent movements, even after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

He is joined in jail two days later by Estigarribia, who voluntarily flies in to submit. Col. Rafael Franco also flies in from exile in Buenos Aires on February 19—aboard a plane hired by the newspaper Crítica—and is sworn in the next day as provisional president. Six months later, the jailed Ayala and Estigarribia are deported to Montevideo (Uruguay), while Franco struggles to redress the country’s problems.

NOVEMBER 10, 1937. Amid a heated campaign to elect a successor to Brazil’s president Vargas, the latter denounces in a radio broadcast another alleged communist conspiracy, which has been revealed on September 27 by his war minister, Gen.

Eurico Gaspar Dutra. He uses this as an excuse to impose martial law, with the backing of generals Dutra and Monteiro, and to create a totalitarian dictatorship known as the Estado Novo or “New State,” which will perpetuate his hold on power for another eight years.

MAY 11, 1938. Political opponents of Brazilian strongman Vargas attempt a nocturnal assault against Rio de Janeiro’s Guanabara Palace, only to be repelled by loyal troops under General Dutra.

MARCH 1939. Peruvian troops crush a well-planned Aprista military coup against President Oscar R. Benavides.

NICARAGUAN CIVIL WAR (1925–1927)

The 1924 elections in this turbulent country result in the installation on January 1, 1925, of the Conservative candidate Carlos Solórzano as its president, with Liberal Dr. Juan Bautista Sacasa as vice president, to head a coalition government. Gen. Emiliano Chamorro, a former president who has lost in this particular American-sponsored campaign, refuses to honor the results. After the last U.S. marine contingent is withdrawn from the capital on August 3, tensions resume.

OCTOBER 24, 1925. This morning, Chamorro leads a military coup that—at the cost of 20 lives—seizes the fortified La Loma Hill overlooking the capital of Managua, from where he demands the ouster of all Liberal elements from the government, amnesty for his own action, appointment as commander in chief of the armed forces, and $10,000 in out-of-pocket expenses. Solórzano meekly acquiesces, while Sacasa flees to Washington. By maintaining continual pressure, Chamorro will be appointed Nicaragua’s war minister by January 13, 1926, elected to a vacant senate seat, and designated as Solórzano’s heir apparent.

JANUARY 16, 1926. Solórzano officially resigns as president, to be succeeded by Chamorro. The United States refuses to recognize the legitimacy of this change of government, as do most other Central American and European countries. However, Washington also refuses to uphold Sacasa’s claim to the title, prompting the exiled vice president to travel to Mexico, where President Plutarco Calles will furnish his followers with arms and ammunition.

MAY 2, 1926. Bluefields. A force of Liberal exiles, supplied with Mexican arms, disembarks and occupies the eastern Nicaraguan port of Bluefields after a pitched battle against its Conservative garrison. The 3,200-ton light cruiser USS Cleveland subsequently arrives from Panama four days later, setting ashore 213 marines and armed sailors on May 7 to “protect American lives and property.” Meanwhile, Chamorro declares a state of war from the capital, jails his Liberal political opponents, and musters 5,000 men to march eastward and confront the invaders.

AUGUST 27, 1926. At the request of the American consul, the light cruiser USS Galveston disembarks 200 marines and sailors to maintain a “neutral zone” around Bluefields (Nicaragua).

LATE AUGUST 1926. Nicaragua’s former Liberal war minister, Gen. José María Moncada, captures the American company town of Puerto Cabezas, driving Chamorro’s government forces inland.

OCTOBER 1926. The American ambassador in Nicaragua arranges a 15-day truce between its warring Liberal and Conservative factions, plus face-to-face meetings between delegations aboard the USS Denver at the Pacific port of Corinto.

NOVEMBER 1926. Chamorro resigns the presidency, and the ex-President Adolfo Díaz is temporarily installed in his place. Numerous protests ensue, however—both within Nicaragua and from abroad—against this unpopular, American-approved choice.

DECEMBER 1, 1926. The exiled Liberal vice president Sacasa reaches Moncada’s base of Puerto Cabezas and proclaims that Nicaragua’s civil war will continue against Díaz. Landing parties from the American warships Cleveland and Denver disarm his supporters, yet otherwise do not interfere, although tensions escalate between Washington and Sacasa’s backers in Mexico.

LATE DECEMBER 1926. Laguna de Perlas. In a four-day battle at Laguna de Perlas, midway between Puerto Cabezas and Bluefields, Moncada devastates a Díaz army, killing hundreds of troops and driving the survivors back into sanctuary at the neutral port of Bluefields.

JANUARY 6, 1927. At the request of Díaz’s government, a marine contingent from the cruiser USS Galveston disembarks at Corinto and occupies the port, preempting its imminent fall to rebel forces. Alarmed at the prospective triumph of a Mexican-backed leftist regime, President Coolidge now begins to further throw his support behind Díaz by lifting the arms embargo and other material aid.

FEBRUARY 6, 1927. Chinandega. Just north of the Pacific port of Corinto, Díaz suffers a crushing reversal when the 500-man garrison of Chinandega is overrun in three days of intense fighting by 1,000–2,000 rebels, backed by a pair of aircraft. The latter do not remain in occupation, however, and government forces move to secure this town once more, along with marine assistance.

On February 9, U.S. rear admiral Julian L. Latimer—commander of the “Special Service Squadron” operating off the Nicaraguan coast—orders marine detachments from the cruisers Milwaukee, Raleigh, and Galveston to take control of the Corinto–Managua railway to prevent its service from being disrupted by the civil war.

FEBRUARY 19, 1927. A reinforced marine rifle company reaches devastated Chinandega and is joined the next day by further contingents from the U.S. cruisers Milwaukee, Raleigh, and Galveston.

Smoldering devastation left behind after the rebel withdrawal from Chinandega. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

They declare both Chinandega and the railway line running southeast into León to be neutral territory, effectively preventing their capture by rebel forces.

FEBRUARY 21, 1927. Corinto is garrisoned by 200 marines from the light cruiser USS Trenton, and La Loma Fort outside Managua is also occupied “to afford better protection to foreign lives and property.”

Augusto Sandino

Although usually identified as Augusto César Sandino, he was baptized Augusto Nicolás Calderón Sandino upon his birth on May 18, 1895, in the village of Niquinohomo, in Nicaragua’s Masaya Department. The illegitimate son of the wealthy coffee plantation owner Gregorio Sandino and Margarita Calderón, an employee on the former’s estate, Augusto was abandoned by his mother at the age of nine. He lived for a spell with his maternal grandmother before being grudgingly accepted into his father’s family. In September 1912, the teenager witnessed the U.S. intervention that crushed the Liberal insurrection led by Gen. Benjamín Zeledón.

Nine years later, Sandino shot and wounded Dagoberto Rivas, the son of a leading Conservative in Niquinohomo, allegedly over an insult to his mother. The 26-year-old therefore fled to the Pacific coast, working his way up through Honduras and Guatemala as a day laborer on plantations. He finally reached the Veracruz oil fields, finding work at the Standard Oil refinery at Tampico. There he was to be exposed to leftist, nationalistic, and anti-American ideologies.

After the five-year statute of limitations on his crime had expired, Sandino returned to Nicaragua on June 10, 1926. Yet Rivas was still so strongly entrenched at Niquinohomo that Sandino continued into the remote northeastern Segovias Mountains. Sandino took a job there as a clerk at the San Albino gold mine. When another Liberal revolt erupted shortly thereafter at the Caribbean port of Puerto Cabezas, Sandino led a group of miners in an attack against the local Conservative garrison, which failed. His subsequent trip to request arms and a commission from the Liberal leadership at Puerto Cabezas also proved fruitless, yet he was able to become a guerrilla leader after capturing some weapons from fleeing Conservative troops.

The young Sandino. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

Female Nicaraguan rebel. (U.S. Naval Historical Center)

FEBRUARY 22, 1927. Because of the inexorable rebel advance upon Managua, the British government proposes sending the cruiser HMS Colombo to Corinto to protect their nationals' interests—galvanizing Washington into even greater efforts to stabilize Nicaragua without outside intervention. Within the next few weeks, the number of marines deployed throughout this country rises to more than 2,000.

MARCH 1927. Muimuy. Moncada's 3,000 troops defeat a government army at Muimuy, midway between Matagalpa and the capital, bringing Díaz's government to the verge of collapse. Direct intervention is requested from Washington, which although officially refused, is in effect implemented by the increasing U.S. presence throughout Nicaragua.

APRIL 15, 1927. A U.S. envoy, Col. Henry L. Stimson, reaches Nicaragua aboard the light cruiser Trenton to negotiate an end to its civil war.

MAY 4, 1927. After securing Díaz's agreement to generous peace terms, Stimson persuades Liberal general Moncada to accept them as well at a conference held at Tipitapa on the southeastern shores of Lake Managua. Only one of Moncada's rebel subcommanders, 36-year-old Augusto César Sandino, subsequently refuses to ratify this arrangement. He instead retires eight days later north toward the Honduran border with 200 followers.

MAY 16, 1927. After nightfall, marine captain Richard Buchanan leads 40 men into the railway town of La Paz Centro between Corinto and Managua, expelling 200 demobilized Liberal soldiers who are looting the place. During a two-hour fire-fight, 14 Nicaraguans are killed, along with Buchanan and another marine.

MAY 19, 1927. The 11th Marine Regiment reaches Corinto and is quickly deployed on garrison duty along its rail lines.

MAY 23, 1927. Elements of the 5th Marine Regiment advance north from Matagalpa and occupy Jinotega, attempting to convince Sandino at nearby Yali to forsake his struggle. The latter instead withdraws farther north into Nueva Segovia Province and launches a stubborn guerrilla campaign.

JULY 16, 1927. Before dawn, Sandino and his military chief Rufo Marín advance out of San Fernando and infiltrate Ocotal (the capital of Nueva Segovia Province) with 300 men, attacking its 40-man marine garrison under Capt. Gilbert D. Hatfield—plus a Nicaraguan National Guard company—at first light. The defenders successfully resist, aided by strafing runs by five DeHavilland 4B biplanes out of Managua under marine major Ross “Rusty” Rowell. Sandino retires back into the jungle by this same afternoon, having lost approximately 50 men (including Marín) compared to a single man dead, 5 wounded, and 4 captured among the garrison.

JULY 25, 1927. This afternoon, a column of 50 mounted marines under Maj. Oliver Floyd surprise Sandino’s headquarters at San Fernando, killing 11 Sandinistas and driving the rest into the jungle.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1927. Before sunrise, Sandino with 200 men assaults the government garrison at Telpaneca (10 miles southeast of Ocotal), which consists of 21 marines and 25 Nicaraguan national guardsmen under marine lieutenant Herbert Keimling. The latter repel their attackers, suffering two killed and one wounded, compared to unknown enemy casualties.

For the next five years, Sandino wages a persistent guerrilla struggle against the U.S.-backed government of Nicaragua, until finally signing a peace pact with newly elected president Juan B. Sacasa on February 3, 1933. Little more than a year later, on the night of February 21, 1934, the guerrilla chief is murdered following a banquet held in his honor at the national palace—allegedly with the connivance of the country’s ruthless new war minister and national guard commander, 38-year-old Anastasio (“Tacho”) Somoza García. Two years later, in June 1936, the latter drives Sacasa out of office and becomes the country’s dictator.

CRISTERO WAR (1926–1929)

Radical new policies, drafted yet never enacted during the Mexican Revolution of 1910, are finally introduced by President Plutarco Calles in January 1926. These policies threaten the Catholic Church’s dominant position in the national economy and society. Archbishop José Mora y del Río of Mexico City responds with a pastoral letter restricting religious services. Calles increases the pressure on June 24 by ordering that all priests be native Mexicans, by decertifying religious schools, by ordering monasteries and other Church properties nationalized, plus other restrictive measures.

JULY 31, 1926. Mexican Church officials, with the backing of the Vatican, suspend all religious services and call for an economic boycott against the government.

AUGUST 15, 1926. A pro-Catholic mob overruns the municipal offices of Valparaíso (Zacatecas).

NOVEMBER 26, 1926. The Liga Nacional para la Defensa de la Libertad Religiosa or “National League for the Defense of Religious Liberty” organizes a “war committee” from exile in the United States, headed by René Capistrán Garza.

JANUARY 1927. Mexico’s reelection law is amended to allow an ex-president—such as Álvaro Obregón—to stand for a second term, although not in direct succession.

JANUARY 1, 1927. On instructions from the National League for the Defense of Religious Liberty, general hostilities commence against the federal government throughout Mexico. The mountainous back country of the state of Jalisco becomes a particular hotbed for guerrilla activity, spearheaded by the local leader Anacleto González Flores. The Catholic forces—mostly impoverished peasant soldiers—call themselves defensores or “defenders,” but because they often shout Viva Cristo Rey! or “Long Live Christ the King!” as a rallying cry, they soon become more widely known as cristeros.

MARCH 20, 1927. Cristeros waylay the Laredo–Mexico City train at San Miguel Allende (Guajuato), killing its conductor and guards, thus gaining a reputed 100,000 pesos in government funds.

APRIL 1927. The Mexico City–Guadalajara train is intercepted near La Barca (Jalisco) by 400 cristeros, who not only kill its guards and crew but set it ablaze, killing 113 innocent passengers—many of them already wounded. The government retaliates by expelling all archbishops and bishops from Mexico and sending the army on brutal sweeps throughout this state.

LATE JUNE 1927. Shortly after Obregón announces that he will seek a second term as president, an

Bodies of cristero suspects dangling from telegraph poles beside a railway as part of the Mexican Army's counterinsurgency operations in Jalisco. (Hemeroteca Nacional, Mexico)

“anti-reelectionist” party nominates Arnulfo F. Gómez as their candidate and deplores the ex-president’s participation. Gen. Francisco R. Serrano—an old crony of Obregón—also decides to run, at the head of the “National Revolutionary Party.”

OCTOBER 2, 1927. Anti-Reelectionist Mutiny. Military maneuvers scheduled for Balbuena Park east of Mexico City are cancelled by President Calles on suspicion that he and ex-President Obregón—both scheduled to be present in the reviewing stands—are to be seized in a coup. Indeed, approximately 1,000 men of the 48th and 50th Infantry battalions, plus the 25th and 26th Cavalry regiments, mutiny under Gen. Héctor Ignacio Almada and march east toward Veracruz.

Fearing a more widespread conspiracy, Calles orders General Serrano arrested in Cuernavaca (Morelos), where the latter is attending his birthday party. Detained along with 13 companions by federal troops under Gen. Claudio Fox, Serrano is driven part of the way toward Mexico City—until reaching Huitzilac, where all 14, their hands bound with barbed wire, are taken out the next dawn and shot. A wave of executions follows throughout Mexico: at Torreón, Gen. Agapito Lastra, Lt. Col. Augusto Manzanilla, and all officers of the 16th Infantry Battalion are shot; in Mexico City, generals Luis Hermosillo and José C. Morán are killed; in Zacatecas, generals Alfredo Rodríguez and Norberto Olvera; in Sonora, generals Pedro Medina and Alfonso de la Huerta (brother of the exiled ex-president Adolfo de la Huerta); in Pachuca, Arturo Lasso de la Vega; in Chiapas, Gen. Luis Vidal; and so forth.

Most of Almada’s mutinous troops surrender to loyal forces a short distance outside Mexico City, at San Juan Teotihuacán, leaving him to press on toward Veracruz with only a small contingent in the hope of joining Arnulfo Gómez. Pursued by federal columns under generals Jesús M. Aguirre and José Gonzalo Escobar, the conspirators disperse into the hills. Gómez’s hiding place is eventually betrayed by a companion, and he is shot on November 4—despite being so ill he has to be tied to the execution wall.

NOVEMBER 13, 1927. This Sunday, four pro-Catholic fanatics toss two bombs at the Cadillac of ex-President Obregón—who is now running for reelection—as he sits in Chapultepec Park in Mexico City awaiting a bullfight. He emerges unscathed, his attackers being captured and killed, along with the Jesuit priest Miguel Pro, plus other conspirators implicated in this plot.

JULY 17, 1928. Obregón, after having been re-elected president—although not yet installed into office—is assassinated while attending a political banquet at “La Bombilla” Restaurant in Mexico City’s suburb of San Ángel by the 27-year-old itinerant artist and Catholic fanatic José de León Toral.

OCTOBER 28, 1928. After González Flores is captured and executed by federal troops, he is succeeded in command of the Catholics’ Ejército Nacional Libertador or “National Liberator Army” by the military veteran Enrique Gorostieta (a West Point graduate).

NOVEMBER 30, 1928. Calles leaves office, being temporarily replaced by Emilio Portes Gil, although still retaining great power and influence.

MARCH 2, 1929. Escobar’s Revolt. This afternoon, General Aguirre rises in rebellion at Veracruz, being seconded in Sonora by Gen. Francisco R. Manzo

A cristero praying before his execution. (Hemeroteca Nacional, Mexico) and Gov. Fausto Topete. They are joined the next day by General Escobar in Coahuila and Nuevo León, and on March 4 by Gen. Francisco Urbalejo and Gov. Juan Gualberto Amaya in Durango. Other insurrections soon occur in Oaxaca and Sinaloa.

The rebels' objective is to depose Portes Gil in favor of Gilberto Valenzuela and rescind the anti-Catholic legislation of Calles. They are quickly joined by the remnants of the cristeros under Gorostieta, but loyal federal troops drive north out of Mexico City under Gen. Juan Andrew Almazán and defeat the principal concentration of insurgents under Escobar at Monterrey (Nuevo León).

JUNE 2, 1929. Gorostieta is betrayed to federal soldiers by a colleague and killed. His successor, General Degollado y Guizar, proves less intractable.

With the mediation of U.S. ambassador Dwight W. Morrow, the Mexican Church and government finally resolve their differences so that a general amnesty is declared. Still, hostilities persist in the hinterland for many years.

CHACO WAR (1932–1935)

Ever since losing access to the Pacific Ocean a half century previously due to its defeat at the hands of Chile, Bolivia has been seeking by diplomatic means to assert ownership over the Chaco Boreal—an arid, almost uninhabitable territory lying between its Andean foothills and distant Paraguay. La Paz believes that by claiming and driving roads through this no-man's land they can establish a river port on its far side, thereby gaining an outlet to the Atlantic.

However, Paraguay has regarded the Chaco as part of its adjacent hinterland ever since colonial times and, furthermore, earns much of its scarce foreign exchange from exports of mate tea and tannin into Argentina, so it bristles at these Bolivian claims. As rail lines are driven both southeastward and northwestward to service isolated outposts within this stark region, a few minor clashes erupt, before oil deposits are also discovered near the Andean foothills in 1928.

Believing vast reserves are waiting to be tapped, both impoverished countries redouble their efforts. Bolivia even receives a line of credit from Standard Oil to purchase modern weaponry from the Vickers Company of England to help re-equip its 4,000–5,000 regular servicemen, while Paraguay receives the same from Shell Oil for its slightly fewer than 3,000 troops. The latter manages its acquisitions more discreetly, the Paraguayan military engineer Gen. Manlio Schenoni L. touring France, while some additional purchases are made in Argentina.

The devastating effects of the Great Depression accelerate La Paz's policy as the price of tin—the Andean country's sole major export—plunges from $794 a ton in 1929 to a mere $385 a ton within three years. Desperate to relieve the crippling economic crisis and social unrest it is engendering, Bolivia's forces push deeper into the Chaco. Ironically, no significant oil reserves will ever be found.

JUNE 14, 1932. After an arduous three-week trek from the outpost of Camacho through the stark Chaco landscape, 4 Bolivian officers and 25 soldiers of the Lanza Cavalry Regiment under Maj. Oscar Moscoso reach the western banks of solitary Lake Pitiantuta (also called Chuquisaca), one of the region's few major bodies of water. More than a mile away on its eastern shoreline, the weary Bolivians see the tiny Carlos Antonio López outpost, manned by a Paraguayan corporal and 5 soldiers.

Moscoso consequently circles around to the south, and at 5:30 a.m. the next dawn, leads 18 of his Bolivian soldiers in a surprise charge that scatters the startled Paraguayan garrison, which flees through the brush and reports to its superiors about this dispossession three days later.

JUNE 22, 1932. Five days after assuming command over the 1st Infantry Division stationed at Puerto Casado, the 44-year-old lieutenant colonel José Félix

Chaco Boreal

The Gran Chaco is a flat, forbidding expanse. Once an ancient seabed, it runs west from the fertile Paraguay River to the well-irrigated Andean foothills, and south from the dark fringes of the Amazon Basin to the lush cattle lands of the Argentine Pampas. The portion south of the marshy Pilcomayo River is known as the Chaco Austral or “Southern Chaco,” which was claimed by Argentina as long ago as the 19th century. The remaining 250,000-square-mile, arid heartland is known as the Chaco Boreal or “Northern Chaco,” the area so fiercely contested by Bolivia and Paraguay from 1932 to 1935.

The terrain over which each side had to campaign has been described as “not exactly desert, and not exactly jungle.” It features the worst characteristics of both. During the dry season from late March through December, the Chaco’s southeastern half becomes a grassy dust-bowl interspersed with thick belts of spiny brush and occasional clusters of twisted Quebracho trees. During the rainy season, large segments become flooded, while higher parts dissolve into sodden mire. The western half is more arid still, and temperatures everywhere can soar into the 100s, or plunge below 0, especially when frigid surazo winds sweep in from Antarctica. The few thousand inhabitants of this so-called Green Hell were nomadic Guaraní herdsman, descendants from its original tribes, who tried to keep clear of the fighting.

Despite lying across the river from the Paraguayan capital of Asunción (whose population in 1930 stood at 120,000 inhabitants), few Spaniards were tempted to venture deep into the Chaco Boreal throughout the colonial or early independence eras. Bolivia’s interest in this wasteland was even more distant, until its defeat by Chilean forces during the War of the Pacific cut off its access to the sea.

Estigarribia—Paraguay’s chief of staff, inspector general, and deputy commander for its armed forces—sends 98 men forward to probe this Bolivian incursion.

JUNE 29, 1932. The Paraguayan reconnaissance unit launches a probing attack against Moscoso’s Bolivian garrison within “Carlos Antonio López,” finding that it has been reinforced. The Paraguayans therefore pull back a dozen miles and inform Estigarribia, who from Casanillos orders the 27-year-old captain Abdón Palacios to lead his 388-man battalion of the 2nd “Ytororó” Infantry Regiment across more than 110 miles of the harsh terrain and recuperate Pitiantuta at any cost. His contingent sets out on July 4.

JULY 3, 1932. Directed by La Paz to retire to the west bank of Lake Pitiantuta, Moscoso instead burns the original Paraguayan outpost, then ensconces his Bolivian troops on the northeastern corner of this lake, calling the new site Fortress “Mariscal Santa Cruz.”

JULY 6, 1932. Paraguayan diplomats, incensed by Bolivia’s provocation, walk out of the American-sponsored “Nonaggression Pact Conference” in Washington, which has been attempting to mediate the Chaco boundary disputes.

JULY 15, 1932. Pitiantuta. After resting his 388 men from the Paraguayan “Ytororó” Infantry Regiment for three days, Captain Palacios leads them in a dawn attack against Moscoso’s 170 Bolivians, who are defending the “Mariscal Santa Cruz” fortress on the northeastern shores of Lake Pitiantuta. The occupiers are broken and driven off the next day, in no small part thanks to the intimidating, long-range Paraguayan shelling by their lone, 81-mm Stokes-Brandt mortar. Palacios’s losses total two dead and nine wounded.

JULY 18, 1932. With both La Paz and Asunción boiling with tens of thousands of protesters because of the clash at Pitiantuta, the Bolivian and Paraguayan armies begin secret mobilizations for war. The Bolivian president Daniel Salamanca furthermore instructs his senior commanders to prepare retaliatory strikes against the forward Paraguayan outposts of Corrales, Toledo, and Boquerón.

JULY 27, 1932. A Bolivian contingent under Col. Enrique Peñaranda Castillo overruns the disputed Guaraní outpost of Corrales, followed the next day by Toledo, then Boquerón three days later.

AUGUST 2, 1932. Bolivian president Salamanca proposes a suspension of hostilities, with his country retaining its latest territorial acquisitions.

AUGUST 8, 1932. Bolivian forces occupy the Paraguayan outpost of Huijay, northeast of Boquerón.

AUGUST 15, 1932. The recently reelected Dr. Eusebio Ayala is officially inaugurated into office as Paraguayan president.

Paraguayan troop train heads toward the front from Puerto Casado. (Author's Collection)

SEPTEMBER 7, 1932. Boquerón. Estigarribia's 7,500-man army advances from Isla Poí to drive the Bolivian invaders from their recently won Boquerón outpost. The next day, his vanguard under the 38-year-old major Carlos J. Fernández of the 2nd Division, including elements of the 1st and 3rd Infantry divisions and the 1st "Valois Rivarola" Cavalry Regiment, push forward from Pozo Valencia and drive in the enemy outposts, coming within two miles of their main objective.

At 5:30 a.m. on the morning of September 9, batteries of the 2nd Paraguayan Artillery Group open fire, and 5,000 soldiers launch a disjointed, groping, frontal assault against the Bolivian garrison, which consists of Lt. Col. Manuel Marzana's 710 men, 5 artillery pieces, 13 machine guns, and 27 automatic rifles. The Bolivians, well dug in, easily repel these attacks, so the next day Fernández tries a flanking maneuver by having his 2nd Toledo Cavalry Regiment circle around and seize Yucra. Although this envelopment is unsuccessful, the Bolivian defenders also underestimate Paraguayan strength, sending in small units piecemeal—such as the "Lairana" Battalion of the 14th Infantry Regiment—to clear the road, only to be annihilated.

After scattered skirmishes, the Paraguayans launch a renewed drive against Boquerón at dawn of September 17, with Maj. Arturo Bray's 1,800-man 6th Infantry Regiment advancing out of the west. They fight all day, only to be hit in the rear at sunset by a Bolivian relief column advancing up the Lara road, which crumples two Paraguayan battalions and carries desperately needed refreshments into Marzana's garrison. Both armies then settle in for trench warfare, the besiegers pounding Boquerón from a distance, while the Bolivians under Peñaranda, Col. Francisco Peña, and Brig. Gen. Carlos Quintanilla Quiroga prove unable to extricate their beleaguered colleagues or to resupply them adequately with Fokker tri-motor planes.

On September 25, Peña's 4th Bolivian Division mounts a relief effort out of the west, only to blunder into the fresh 3rd Paraguayan Cavalry Regiment, which halts its advance. Four days later, Marzana finally capitulates, his garrison having suffered 320 dead, 150 wounded, and 240 prisoners—in addition to another 1,300 casualties sustained by other Bolivian units. Paraguayan casualties during this siege total 1,500 men. Estigarribia is promoted to full colonel on October 4 as a reward for his triumph.

Paraguayan troops with a captured French-made Schneider 75mm gun after the hard-fought Siege of Boquerón. (Author's Collection)

SEPTEMBER 27, 1932. Paraguayan forces recapture the outpost of Toledo.

OCTOBER 8, 1932. After a lengthy reorganization following his capture of Boquerón, Estigarribia ponderously resumes his advance south toward Arce with 9,200 Paraguayan troops—having been reinforced by the newly created 4th Division under Lt. Col. Nicolás Delgado.

OCTOBER 10, 1932. In the Bolivian government's backlash following the Boquerón debacle, Quintanilla is recalled to La Paz and temporarily replaced as commander in chief by Colonel Peña.

OCTOBER 11, 1932. Estigarribia attempts an enveloping movement against Peñaranda's 4,000-man 4th Bolivian Division, which is contesting his advance down the Yucra–Arce road. The latter withdraws his troops at nightfall, thereby escaping this encirclement.

OCTOBER 21, 1932. Peñaranda attempts a stand at Mula Muerta camp with 3,000 men and some artillery, yet his troops are so demoralized that most run away late this afternoon, after the initial Paraguayan probes. Only the “Loa,” “Campero,” and 16th Infantry battalions, plus the 5th “Lanza” Cavalry Regiment, remain firm, but they are too few for effective resistance. Peñaranda therefore sets fire to Arce, before continuing his retreat south toward Alihuatá.

OCTOBER 23, 1932. Estigarribia occupies the smoldering remains of Arce.

OCTOBER 25, 1932. Discovering that only 1,000 of his 4,000 Bolivians are still willing to fight, Peñaranda abandons Alihuatá.

OCTOBER 27, 1932. The Paraguayan 2nd Guaraní Division occupies Alihuatá.

OCTOBER 30, 1932. The Paraguayan 1st Division seizes the Fernández outpost, then one week later captures Platanillos, as Estigarribia wishes to secure his right flank.

NOVEMBER 7, 1932. Kilometer 7. The previous afternoon having driven in the Bolivian picket line 12 kilometers north of Saavedra, the 3rd Corrales Infantry mounts an attack against the 1,500 remaining members of the 4th Division, dug in 5 kilometers farther south under their inspirational new leader, air force lieutenant colonel Bernardino Bilbao Rioja. The Bolivians repel this assault from their well-chosen defensive positions, then on November 8 use their artillery to check an attempted turning of their right flank.

On November 9, the Paraguayans are reinforced by the 1st Infantry Battalion, while the next day the Bolivians receive an additional 3,500 troops and six aircraft. When Bilbao launches a counterattack against the Paraguayan right that same afternoon, he encounters the newly arrived 2nd Guaraní Infantry and draws back after suffering 317 casualties, compared to 139 Paraguayans. Estigarribia joins his own attacking forces with the Paraguayan 1st and 4th divisions, launching unsuccessful assaults against Bilbao's lines on November 16 and 19. A flanking march the night of November 30—around the Bolivian left by 3,700 Paraguayans under Fernández—is detected after becoming lost in the jungle and halted by artillery batteries stationed at Montaña.

The Paraguayans try one more assault on December 7, then a week later bring up Maj. Basiliano Caballero Irala's 1st Engineers to dig heavy fortifications and wait out the rainy season. Bilbao's tenacious stand at Kilometer 7 has effectively ended the long Bolivian retreat.

NOVEMBER 8, 1932. The 1st Paraguayan Cavalry seizes Loa, Corrales, Bolívar, and Jayucubás unopposed.

DECEMBER 6, 1932. German-born general Hans Kundt—a mercenary who has three times served as Bolivia's chief of staff—returns to La Paz from exile abroad and is given the title “General-in-Chief” of its field armies. (Kundt originally entered Bolivian service when Gen. José Manuel Pando requested that two-dozen officers be hired in Germany in 1910 to modernize its military establishment and establish a cadet school at La Paz.)

DECEMBER 13, 1932. Gen. Julio Sanjinés's newly created, 2,000-man, 8th Bolivian Division assaults Platanillos, driving its 700 defenders of the 1st Paraguayan Cavalry Regiment east-southeast toward the “Fernández” outpost.

DECEMBER 14, 1932. Lt. Col. Ángel Rodríguez's 3rd Bolivian Division expels the small Paraguayan garrison from Loa. A week later, the Bolivian 8th Division reoccupies Jayucubás and Bolívar, forcing the Paraguayans eastward into Corrales.

DECEMBER 25, 1932. Taking advantage of the Christmas truce, Paraguay's 1st Division retreats north from Kilometer 7 into prepared positions at Kilometer 12.

DECEMBER 27, 1932. The Bolivian 4th Division launches an attack with 3,135 men—backed by artillery and low-level air support—against the Paraguayans' new positions at Kilometer 12, only to suffer 700 killed before withdrawing.

DECEMBER 30, 1932. Gen. Arturo Guillén's 7th Bolivian Division captures Duarte, then nine days

German Military Advisers

In the summer of 1870, French armies—then believed to be the world's finest—were smashed by untried, yet much more effective, German forces. The wholesale surrender of Napoleon III along with 120,000 men at Sedan started a major shift in strategic thinking around the globe. Governments began overhauling their armed forces in the hope of imitating the German success. Emergent nations such as Japan patterned their new armies on the Prussian system and their navies upon Britain's Royal Navy.

This change was most obvious in Latin America. Prior to the War of the Triple Alliance, Paraguay bought steel Krupp cannon, using them to great effect before suffering its inevitable defeat. Argentina's President Julio Roca began hiring German instructors as of 1880 to upgrade his nation's military institutes. German armaments firms such as Mauser were contracted a decade later to manufacture rifles, establishing local subsidiaries. Chile's French-trained army, despite its triumphs during the War of the Pacific from 1879 to 1883, switched almost completely over to German instructors and methods before that decade was out. Ecuador, Colombia, Venezuela, Brazil, and Mexico all followed suit. By the end of the 19th century, Prussian-style pickelhaube spiked helmets were being worn by soldiers in Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Cuba, and even the United States.

The impoverished Andean nation of Bolivia was one of the last to forsake French influence. A German military delegation was finally invited to visit in 1908, however. Among its members was the 39-year-old staff officer Capt. Hans Kundt. Three years later, now a major, he was hired as head of Bolivia's Military Academy. He brought along 5 German officers and 13 non-commissioned officers to help modernize and retrain the national army. Their work was interrupted by their return to Europe in 1914 to serve in World War I. Notwithstanding Germany's defeat, Kundt was rehired as Bolivia's chief of staff in 1921. He added an air corps two years later and reorganized the army into divisions of six regiments apiece by 1924. The next year, he also became minister of war, hiring even more German instructors (including the unsavory Ernst Röhm, creator of Adolf Hitler's SA storm troopers).

Yet Bolivia's army performed poorly during the Chaco War against an outnumbered Paraguayan foe, which was ironically equipped with modest amounts of French weaponry. In the harsh environment of the Chaco, the Andean conscripts were outmaneuvered and outfought by the better-led, more committed defenders.

later overruns the “Mariscal López” outpost in anticipation of initiating a major drive farther north against Nanawa.

JANUARY 1, 1933. The 3rd Bolivian Division captures lightly held Corrales, pursuing its fleeing Paraguayan garrison toward Puesto Betty.

JANUARY 13, 1933. The Paraguayan 7th San Martín Cavalry Regiment advances westward out of Toledo and probes the new Bolivian defenses at Corrales, only to be repulsed.

JANUARY 20, 1933. Nanawa (First Battle). At dawn, Kundt launches a three-pronged attack against this stronghold with 6,000 men of the Bolivian 7th Division (10 infantry and 5 cavalry regiments, supported by the 2nd Artillery, plus 10 aircraft). Nanawa is held by 2,500 men of Lt. Col. Luis Irrazábal's 5th Paraguayan Division, well dug in behind barbed wire entanglements, with numerous machine guns.

(In a diversionary move, the 8th Bolivian Division also marches out of Platanillos farther to the northwest this same morning and storms the Fernández outpost, only to be repelled by the 2nd Guaraní Division. A second attempt on January 23 is repulsed as well, the Bolivians withdrawing after sustaining heavy casualties. The Paraguayans for their part probe the Bolivian lines at Kilometer 7, only to find Peñaranda's 1,500-man 4th Division still holding firm.)

After his initial assault is checked, Kundt makes a second try on January 24, sending the 41st Bolivian Infantry in an encircling movement against the Ayala outpost, in Irrazábal's rear. Paraguayan cavalry advancing from Puesto Florida finally halt this drive, and the beleaguered defenders are then resupplied by air and reinforced on the ground, Bray's 4th Division bringing Irrazábal's strength up to 5,000 men. Kundt persists with smaller-scale attacks before eventually calling a halt to offensive operations on January 28, having lost 2,000 men, compared to 248 Paraguayans.

JANUARY 29, 1933. Lt. Col. Juan B. Ayala's 5,000-man 6th Paraguayan Division, decimated by dysentery and typhoid, makes a feeble and uncoordinated assault against the Bolivian defenses at Corrales, and is easily repelled.

FEBRUARY 2, 1933. The 3,600-man 3rd Bolivian Division advances eastward out of Corrales, marching slowly along muddy roads to drive the Paraguayan skirmishers back from Puesto Betty one week later.

FEBRUARY 16, 1933. Toledo. The 3rd Bolivian Division arrives before this town's outer Paraguayan defenses and slowly deploys through the mud for an assault. This attack does not materialize until February 25, after a dawn raid by Bilbao's air group. Over the next two days, the Bolivians vainly drive against the defenders' trench system—designed and installed by the ex-czarist “White Russian” officers Belaieff and Ern—and suffer appalling losses.

Nocturnal attacks prove equally unsuccessful, hence the Bolivians have lost nearly 2,000 men by March 5. Six days later, the defenders launch an enveloping counterattack, prompting the 3rd Bolivian Division to retreat toward Puesto Betty. Numerous mutinies follow, and the 30th Infantry flees on the night of March 16 after shooting at its officers. The veteran 9th Warnes Infantry also rebels along the Platanillos road, streaming into Camacho to commandeer trucks for their return home.

MARCH 11, 1933. Alihuatá. At dawn, Col. Victorino Gutiérrez's 1,500-man 9th Andean Division—after circling overland from Sosa—takes Charata, driving the Paraguayan garrison out of nearby Alihuatá and cutting the road leading north toward the Paraguayan rear. A simultaneous attack is made by Peñaranda's 4th Division against the Paraguayan front lines farther south at Kilometer 12, while Capt. Germán Busch's cavalry squadron takes Campo 31.

The Paraguayans respond by extemporizing a large force under Maj. Roque Samaniego, to reopen the Alihuatá road from the north. This relief column is checked, though, and after five days of fighting on two fronts, Fernández's 1st Paraguayan Division extricates itself from Kilometer 12, retreating under cover of darkness on March 16, and reaching safety on the Gondra road two days later. Despite their victory, the Bolivians have let slip an opportunity to annihilate an entire enemy division.

MARCH 25, 1933. The weak Bolivian 8th Division launches an unsuccessful attack against the Paraguayan garrison at the Fernández outpost.

APRIL 5, 1933. Col. Gaudioso Núñez's 2nd Paraguayan Division, supported by three bombers, begins flanking maneuvers against the 8th Bolivian Division, compelling it to retreat within nine miles of Platanillos.

APRIL 7, 1933. Busch's 5th Bolivian Cavalry pushes back some Paraguayan outposts below Falcón (modern Rojas Silva), closing the road northwest toward Arce for four days. Busch is then temporarily dislodged by a strong detachment from the 7th Guaraní Division, only to return to the attack on April 13. Eventually, a new front develops at Campo Aceval, three miles west of Rancho Ocho.

MAY 10, 1933. After the collapse of U.S.-mediated attempts at achieving a truce, Paraguay officially declares war against Bolivia.

MAY 16, 1933. At Gondra, Lt. Col Rafael Franco's 1st Paraguayan Division opens a small breach in Peñaranda's left, only to be quickly contained by the redeployment of Bolivian machine guns and mortars. Both sides then settle in for trench warfare, as winter is commencing.

MAY 18, 1933. Fernández. The 2,000-man 8th Bolivian Division storms the Fernández outpost out of the west and is quickly pinned down by withering counterfire from its reinforced Paraguayan garrison. A second assault also fails on May 27, after which Lt. Col. Felipe Arrieta arrives three days later out of the east with 500 men of the Bolivian 16th and 41st Infantry, plus Busch's 5th Cavalry.

They are still unable to carry this outpost or completely encircle it. After another failed assault on June 1, all the attackers retreat northwest toward Platanillos—harassed by Paraguayan bombers—having suffered 556 killed and 314 wounded.

JULY 4, 1933. Nanawa (Second Battle). In an operation designed to coincide with a League of Nations assembly to discuss the problem of the Chaco War, Kundt launches a massive new Bolivian assault against Nanawa. At 9:05 a.m., a subterranean mine is detonated beneath a fortified strongpoint in the center of the Paraguayan line, after which nearly 7,000 troops of the 7th Bolivian Division charge across the intervening no-man's land. They are supported by aircraft, 32 heavy artillery pieces, tanks, and flame throwers.

Notwithstanding the 100-foot crater blasted in the defenders' line, the Bolivians are greeted by heavy fire, and their columns begin to lose cohesion. By noon, their artillery shuts down for lack of shells, and the offensive gradually grinds to a halt. Although Kundt persists with localized actions over the next two days, his main effort has failed, costing 2,000 Bolivian lives.

JULY 12, 1933. At Gondra, Franco's 1st Paraguayan Division turns Peñaranda's right, compelling the Bolivians to retreat northwest three days later into Campo Vía.

AUGUST 5, 1933. A Bolivian flying column briefly occupies Falcón (Rojas Silva).

Bolivian mortar teams. (Author's Collection)

AUGUST 25, 1933. Pirijayo (called Pirizal by the Paraguayans) is seized by a Bolivian task force under Col. Carlos Banzer and held for a short period.

AUGUST 30, 1933. The 27th Bolivian Infantry—sitting astride the Arce–Alihuatá road—is briefly surrounded by growing Paraguayan strength.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1933. Franco shortens his Paraguayan lines, obliging Peñaranda to recall his outposts from Rancho Ocho and Pirizal.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1933. Pozo Favorita. Estigarribia's latest Paraguayan offensive cuts the Pampa Grande–Alihuatá road behind the 2nd and 4th Bolivian Infantry regiments. This incursion is strengthened the next day and successfully repels a counterattack by the 27th Bolivian Infantry. By September 14, part of the 18th Bolivian Infantry is trapped at Pozo Grande, and Kundt tries to break through with a relief column of merely 200 soldiers but is powerless against the 3,500-man 7th Guaraní Division of Lt. Col. José A. Ortiz. This same afternoon, more than 930 Bolivians capitulate, and both armies resume trench warfare.

At Villa Militar, Estigarribia is promoted to brigadier general on September 29 for this victory, while Kundt is left at Muñoz to contemplate either flight into Argentina or suicide. On October 2, he is recalled to La Paz, and a major shuffle ensues among Bolivia's high command.

OCTOBER 23, 1933. Estigarribia launches a general offensive along all fronts, having mustered 26,500 Paraguayans in nine infantry divisions and two cavalry brigades—17,000 being destined for frontline duty—in a major effort aimed at ending the war.

OCTOBER 30, 1933. While maintaining pressure on all fronts, Estigarribia hurls his reserves against the Bolivian trenches at Pozo Favorita, only to suffer grave losses.

NOVEMBER 4, 1933. Kundt returns to Alihuatá and reassumes command over Bolivia's field armies, in the face of Estigarribia's unremitting pressure.

NOVEMBER 12, 1933. While gradually being forced back everywhere, 318 members of the 16th Bolivian Infantry are cut off in their trenches at Nanawa and captured.

NOVEMBER 16, 1933. Estigarribia's relentless offensive recaptures the Mariscal López outpost from its Bolivian occupiers, and Kundt commits his final reserves in a desperate attempt to shore up his crumbling lines.

DECEMBER 3, 1933. Campo Vía. Estigarribia replaces the hesitant Col. Juan B. Ayala on his right flank with the more aggressive Ortiz of the 7th Guaraní Division. The next day, he instructs the latter to commence a huge envelopment of the Bolivian left by leading 14 regiments from Pampa Grande to the road west of Alihuatá—despite torrential rains. Bolivian reconnaissance flights sight this movement, but Kundt dismisses the pilots as “alarmists.”

On December 6, Paraguayan units cut the Alihuatá–Saavedra and Alihuatá–Pozo Negro roads, prompting Kundt to belatedly authorize Banzer's 9th Bolivian Division to retreat toward Campo 31. Alihuatá is fired and abandoned by December 7, but Kundt's retirement is then further hampered by Franco's sudden attack out of Gondra, which mauls Col. Emilio González Quint's 4th Bolivian Division and seals the Campo Vía–Ustares road. Estigarribia follows up this gain by directing the Paraguayans' 3rd Corrales Division to continue circling southeast from Charata to link up with Franco's 1st Division.

Kundt hopes to reestablish a new defensive line from Campo Victoria to two miles west of the Saavedra road in Campo 31, but this plan fails because of his army's utter confusion and Franco's timely occupation of the woods north of Campo Vía, thereby sealing the road from Campo Victoria. A feeble Bolivian relief effort marching north from Saavedra under Peñaranda is also checked, which dooms its surrounded colleagues at Campo Vía. On the afternoon of December 11, 8,000 men of the 4th and 9th Bolivian divisions surrender to Estigarribia, who is promoted to full general two days afterward. Paraguayan booty includes 20 guns, 25 mortars, 840 Vickers machine guns and automatic rifles, and 13,000 rifles.

DECEMBER 12, 1933. Following Kundt's disastrous defeat, Peñaranda this evening scrapes together 2,500 men around the old Bolivian trench system at Kilometer 7, then is promoted to brigadier general and put in command of Bolivia's field armies. Kundt meanwhile flies back to La Paz to face a court-martial.

DECEMBER 13, 1933. At 8:15 p.m., Estigarribia's Paraguayan forces occupy Saavedra but are too exhausted to pursue Peñaranda's few survivors, now limping west toward Muñoz.

General theater map of the Chaco War.

DECEMBER 19, 1933. A truce is arranged between Bolivia and Paraguay to allow foreign diplomats to negotiate a peace in Montevideo. Estigarribia attacks Peñaranda's headquarters at Muñoz just before the midnight deadline, overrunning this outpost in an action that provokes angry Bolivian recriminations at the conference table.

JANUARY 5, 1934. Unable to agree upon a boundary, Paraguayo-Bolivian hostilities resume. Because of weariness on both sides, however, the former merely reoccupies a few small, isolated outposts—Platanillos, Loa, Jayucubás, Bolívar, and Camacho—with small units during the next few days, while the latter concentrates upon reconstructing its shattered army.

FEBRUARY 1, 1934. Estigarribia launches a flanking maneuver against Arrieta's 8th Bolivia Division at La China, compelling this contingent to retreat into Pozo Tortuga three days later.

FEBRUARY 9, 1934. Under continuous Paraguayan pressure, the II Bolivian Corps retreats into Tezen, then farther westward.

Paraguayan officer sitting atop a six-ton Bolivian Vickers tank captured at Saavedra. (Author's Collection)

MARCH 20, 1934. Cañada Tarija. After advancing 70 miles northwestward from Camacho through dense jungle, Lt. Col. Federico W. Smith's 6th Paraguayan Division contacts the 1,500-man 18th Montes Infantry at Garrapatal near Cañada Tarija, under Bolivian lieutenant colonel Ángel Bavia. Fighting erupts four days later, the Paraguayans outflanking and encircling their opponents by March 26. The next day, Bavia commits suicide, and his surviving troops either surrender or are left to die in the jungle. This defeat prompts Peñaranda to sack his subordinate Peña and order a general retreat to within seven miles of Ballivián, on the border with neutral Argentina.

APRIL 5, 1934. In La Paz, disgruntled cadets from the Colegio Militar or "Military Academy" attempt to overthrow President Salamanca, but are put down by loyal troops under General Lanza.

MAY 10, 1934. Cañada Strongest. The 2nd and 7th Paraguayan divisions come into contact with Bilbao Rioja's II Bolivian Corps, dug into a long line stretching northeastward from the Pilcomayo River. The defenders fall back before Estigarribia's attempts at encirclement, after which Peñaranda launches a ponderous counteroffensive of his own with the 14,000-man 9th Division, stationed 20 miles north of Guachalla.

On May 19, a 7,000-man 9th Division column cuts the road behind Ortiz's 7th Paraguayan Division, which is also heavily engaged in front. Col. Gaudioso Núñez manages to briefly check this incursion, and these Paraguayans then retreat on the night of May 21–22 along a jungle trail cut by the 1st Engineers. Lt. Col. José Rosa Vera's 2nd Paraguayan Division, however, becomes trapped in the meantime, and disintegrates over the next few days. By May 25, 1,500 survivors surrender to the Bolivians, many others having escaped individually through the jungle.

JUNE 1934. Franco's Paraguayan corps presses back the 3rd Bolivian Division in light fighting.

JUNE 18, 1934. Despite being outnumbered almost two to one, Delgado's 9,000-man III Paraguayan Corps thrusts a salient into the lines of Col. David Toro Ruilova's I Bolivian Corps at Ballivián, only to be ejected shortly thereafter with extremely heavy casualties.

JULY 15, 1934. Under relentless Paraguayan pressure, Peñaranda orders Toro's 16,000 Bolivian troops to retreat from Ballivián to join Bilbao Rioja's 9,000 at Guachalla, but the former refuses to withdraw, citing national honor.

AUGUST 14, 1934. Picuiba Breakout. At dawn, Franco's 6th Division launches a major new Paraguayan offensive by surprising and overrunning Lt. Hugo Pol's 600 Bolivians on the road leading into Picuiba. Pol escapes that same evening with barely 50 survivors. Without encountering any other significant resistance east of Carandaití, Franco advances unimpeded in truck columns, reaching Irendagüe by August 17, Villazón the next day, "27 de Noviembre" by August 19, and Huirapitindi the day after, and compels a Bolivian battalion to surrender at Algodonal by August 22.

On August 27, Franco reaches the Chiriguano Mountains—the natural limit of the Chaco, three miles east of Carandaití. He is soon obliged to shorten his overextended supply lines, however, to fend off Bolivian reinforcements being dispatched north from Ballivián. Estigarribia directs Franco to make a slow, fighting retirement, draining strength from Toro's concentration farther south.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1934. After cobbling six Bolivian cavalry regiments into a strike force at Carandaití,

Marshal José Estigarribia

José Félix Estigarribia Insaurrealde was born on February 21, 1888, at Caragatay in south central Paraguay. He studied agronomy at the Agricultural School of Trinidad before joining the army as a first lieutenant of infantry in 1910. That August, he was sent to train with the Buin Regiment at Santiago de Chile. Returning home, he was stationed at the jungle outpost of Concepción, on the fringes of Brazil's Mato Grosso.

Because he supported President Eusebio Ayala during the military revolt that erupted in late May 1922, Estigarribia was promoted to major on November 13. Early the next year, he was named head of the expanded military school at Asunción. He went abroad again in 1925, this time to receive advance training under the famed French general Maurice Gamelin at Paris's Ecole Supérieure de Guerre. Enrolled on November 3, 1925, he rejoined the Paraguayan high command by September 26, 1927.

Estigarribia quickly rose to chief of staff by March 1, 1928. He was promoted to lieutenant colonel on August 9 and became deputy commander of all the armed forces by December 17. As tensions escalated because of Bolivian incursions into the Chaco, Estigarribia—now regarded as Paraguay's leading military authority—added the title inspector general on December 20, 1931, to supervise the distribution of modern weaponry among his troops. He also emboldened strategic planning by convincing his superiors not to await a Bolivian offensive along the Paraguay River. Rather, his outnumbered forces penetrated into the Chaco and confronted the invaders. His view was summed up as: "Whoever strikes first, can probably strike for a second time."

Once fighting erupted in the late summer of 1932, Estigarribia avoided direct clashes, which would have favored the invaders. Bolivia enjoyed a three-to-one advantage in population. Instead, he used his small and decentralized forces to circle around Bolivian concentrations. After being isolated and weakened in the harsh terrain, they were easier to defeat. Thanks to his successes, he was made Paraguay's commander in chief on December 20, 1935, a prerogative previously reserved for presidents.

Yet after Col. Rafael Franco's coup deposed President Ayala in February 1936, Estigarribia spent six months in prison before being sent into exile at Montevideo. He returned two years later to participate in the negotiations that finally wrapped up the war with Bolivia, as well as to serve as ambassador to the United States. An acclaimed national hero, he was elected and assumed office as president on August 15, 1939, only to be killed along with his wife, Julia, in a plane crash a year later near Los Altos, on September 7, 1940. He was promoted posthumously to the rank of marshal.

Toro attempts to envelop Franco's slowly retreating column at Pozo del Burro, only to have his Paraguayan opponent slip away east under cover of darkness toward Algodonal on the night of September 8. Fourteen trucks, some spiked guns, and 78 automatic weapons are the only booty left behind.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1934. In the Bahía Negra sector, small Paraguayan contingents take Vanguardia and Vargas.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1934. Toro envelops Algodonal and seizes the road three miles east of this position, thereby cutting Franco's 6th Division off from his reserves. Nevertheless, the Paraguayan commander fights his way farther east on the night of the 23rd, killing 200 troopers of the 3rd Bolivian Cavalry, while suffering considerable casualties among his own ranks before escaping.

OCTOBER 5, 1934. Paraguayan troops capture Ingavi, threatening Bolivia's Santa Cruz Department.

NOVEMBER 6, 1934. Villazón. Toro attempts a pincer movement against this 5,000-man Paraguayan stronghold, advancing with 12,000 Bolivians in two columns: the 3rd Infantry and 2nd Cavalry divisions to the north, and the 1st Cavalry Division to the south. Heavy rains hamper his progress, so it is not until November 9 that Toro's forces can close in.

Late on November 10, however, Franco's defenders make a thrust southeast, escaping through the Bolivian siege lines toward Picuiba with help from a diversionary attack out of Irendagüe by Lieutenant Colonel Caballero Irala's 2nd Paraguayan Engineers. Toro is only able to capture 400 prisoners and 50 trucks.

NOVEMBER 11, 1934. El Carmen. Col. Carlos Fernández's I Paraguayan Corps—comprised of the 1st, 2nd, 7th, and Col. Manuel Garay's 8th divisions—begin to envelop Col. Zacharías Murillo's 1st Reserve Bolivian Division, which is lying at El Carmen. By November 13, the 2nd Division reaches the Bolivian rear and captures Murillo's headquarters, closing the road toward Oruro two days later and meeting up with the 8th Division circling down out of the north.

On the morning of November 16, Murillo and Col. Walter Méndez's 2nd Bolivian Reserve Division mount a feeble attempt to escape, then capitulate, having suffered 2,500 killed and 4,000 captured.

NOVEMBER 13, 1934. Toro's most forward units link up at El Cruce with motorized elements from Bilbao's 7th Bolivian Division, advancing southward out of Santa Fe via "27 de Noviembre."

NOVEMBER 17, 1934. With the Bolivians retreating northwest, Paraguayan forces occupy Ballivián.

NOVEMBER 20, 1934. The Paraguayans temporarily abandon Picuiba, yet only make a strategic retirement five and a half miles southward, in good order.

NOVEMBER 21, 1934. The Paraguayan III Corps reaches Guachalla, and the next day Fernández's I Corps punches through the new Bolivian lines at Cañada Oruro, pressing on toward Ibibobo.

NOVEMBER 27, 1934. Bolivia's President Salamanca visits his defeated commanders at Villa Montes, intending to replace the inept Peñaranda with Lanza. Instead, the president is arrested and deposed by 300 soldiers of the 4th Artillery Group under Peñaranda, Sanjinés, Busch, and Col. Felipe Rivera Lino. Salamanca comments wryly, "This is the only maneuver in which they have been successful." Vice President Tejada Sorzano is then elevated into his place.

DECEMBER 4, 1934. Tejada Sorzano—although prior to the war an avid Liberal pacifist—now orders a general mobilization in Bolivia.

DECEMBER 6, 1934. Irendagüe. Colonel Garay's 1,800-man 8th Paraguayan Division departs La Faye to drive on Irendagüe and seize its water wells. This is part of a much larger offensive by Franco's II Paraguayan Corps—which includes 5,500 men of the 6th and Reserve divisions, plus the 1st Division—aimed at destroying Toro's 12,000-man Bolivian Cavalry Corps, now exposed following Peñaranda's retreat westward. The Paraguayan Reserve Division begins to turn the Bolivian left, while the 14th Paraguayan Infantry advances down out of Ingavi in the north to threaten "27 de Noviembre," and the 1st Division moves out of the southwest toward Villazón.

Toro—his headquarters being at Carandaití, 85 miles away—is slow to react, not issuing orders until almost midnight of December 7. Shortly thereafter, 200 Paraguayan troops surprise the 130-man Bolivian garrison at Irendagüe, seizing this vital water supply and severing Toro's communications. The Bolivian commander attempts to communicate with his far-flung troops by flying overhead and dropping orders, but by noon of December 9, all cohesion is lost, and his contingents stream north out of the Chaco, desperately seeking water. Some 3,000 either die of thirst or surrender to the pursuing Paraguayans.

DECEMBER 11, 1934. Paraguayan cavalrymen occupy "27 de Noviembre," and Peñaranda resigns as Bolivian commander in chief.

DECEMBER 27, 1934. Ibibobo. After encountering a hastily extemporized Bolivian defense line stretching north from the Pilcomayo River at Ibibobo toward Carandaití, Delgado's 2,400-man III Paraguayan Corps pushes the 5th Cavalry through a five-mile gap, their movement hidden by gloom of night and heavy rain. The next afternoon, this contingent cuts the Palo Mercado Road, trapping 2,000 Bolivian troops. Some 200 of them drown attempting to cross the swollen Pilcomayo, while another 1,200 surrender after a feeble effort at breaking out. Paraguayan casualties total 46 wounded.

JANUARY 11, 1935. Paraguayan forces surround two Bolivian regiments at Capirendá, killing 330 and capturing 200, thus compelling the main enemy concentration to resume their retirement westward into the Andean foothills.

JANUARY 16, 1935. Paraguayan troops reach the Parapeti River, traditionally the western boundary of the Chaco.

JANUARY 23, 1935. Franco's II Paraguayan Corps enters Carandaití.

JANUARY 28, 1935. Boyuibe is occupied by Paraguayan forces, and the Villa Montes–Santa Cruz road is severed.

FEBRUARY 7, 1935. Franco's II Paraguayan Corps turns the flank of the Bolivian defenders holding Ñaincorainza Pass, only to in turn be checked by the timely arrival of the 1st Bolivian Cavalry Division, which obliges the outnumbered attackers to withdraw in defeat four days later.

FEBRUARY 13, 1935. Villa Montes. Despite being outnumbered two to one, Estigarribia sends 5,000

Paraguayans down Capirenda Road to storm Bilbao Rioja's defenses at Villa Montes. These defenders prove to be formidable, and the attackers furthermore have no shells for their siege guns. Consequently, the assault progresses slowly until February 16, when the Paraguayans succeed in creating a two-mile salient near the mountains on the Bolivian left.

Nevertheless, the defenders contain this incursion thanks to close air support and artillery barrages. Estigarribia sends in more assault waves on February 20, suffering heavy casualties, and by March this bulge is closed, with the Paraguayans stalled in trench warfare.

MARCH 8, 1935. Franco's II Paraguayan Corps strikes the 7th Bolivian Division in the narrow valley between the Aguarague and Charagua ranges, only to have these defenders surround a battalion of the 15th Infantry the next day, obliging it to surrender. This success raises Bolivian morale, and by March 12, the Paraguayans draw off after suffering heavy losses.

APRIL 5, 1935. Paraguayan colonel Eugenio Garay—detached from Franco's II Corps—crosses the Parapeti River with 2,600 men and captures Copere. Then, pushing back the 3rd Bolivian Cavalry Division, he advances to intersect the Charagua–Santa Cruz highway.

APRIL 12, 1935. Col. Eugenio Garay turns the Bolivian flank at the village of Carandaití Moza, then drives on through its pass toward Charagua.

APRIL 14, 1935. The Bolivian defenders of Villa Montes make a number of sallies to break the Paraguayan siege trenches, which stretch in a crescent northwestward from the Pilcomayo around the town toward the mountains. After three days of attempting to break through along Camatindi Road, the Bolivians give up, but on April 19—despite heavy losses—they seize Tarairi, compelling Colonel Fernández's Paraguayan contingent to withdraw from this sector.

APRIL 15, 1935. Col. Eugenio Garay's column, in cooperation with the 8th Paraguayan Division pushing up from the south, occupies Charagua.

APRIL 16, 1935. General Guillén launches a counteroffensive from Santa Cruz with 15,000 ill-equipped Bolivian troops to reverse Eugenio Garay's incursion. Driving ponderously to cut the Casa Alta–Machareti road, Guillén fails to trap the Paraguayans, who retire in good order toward Carandaití by April 17. He nonetheless recuperates Mandeyapecua on April 20.

APRIL 21, 1935. Col. Eugenio Garay's 2nd Paraguayan Division evacuates Charagua, along with Carandaití Moza, and retires southward.

APRIL 23, 1935. While retiring southward, the 8th Paraguayan Division is surrounded near Cambeiti. Five days later, it breaks through the 7th Bolivian Division's lines and escapes toward Santa Fe on the Parapeti River.

APRIL 24, 1935. Gen. Raimundo González Flor's 6th Bolivian Division envelops a Paraguayan force nine miles north of Ingavi at Pozo del Tigre, only to allow it to escape shortly thereafter.

MAY 13, 1935. Having retreated from the Parapeti River, 3,500 Paraguayans establish a new defensive line in front of Huirapitindi.

MAY 16, 1935. Estigarribia launches a surprise counteroffensive out of Carandaití with the 6th Paraguayan division, crossing the mountains to fall upon Mandeyapecua.

JUNE 1, 1935. Ingavi. With peace talks deadlocked at Buenos Aires, an 800-man Paraguayan regiment sallies from Ingavi and mauls the 6th Bolivian Division. The latter calls for reinforcements and attempts to encircle its foes, only to become enveloped itself four days later.

No Bolivian reserves are available from Roboré, so when the 14th Bolivian Infantry then attempts to fight its way out of this encirclement, they are cornered in the jungle and forced to surrender by June 8. This latest defeat prompts Bolivia's peace delegates to reduce their demands at the conference table in the Argentine capital the next day.

JUNE 12, 1935. A ceasefire, which recognizes Paraguayan ownership of almost the entire Chaco, is signed, taking effect at noon on June 14. During the preceding three years of conflict, 57,000 Bolivian and 36,000 Paraguayan soldiers have died, and both countries have been driven to the brink of bankruptcy and exhaustion. Some 30,000 Bolivian servicemen are also released from captivity by the victorious Paraguayans, 10 times the number held by Bolivia.

Modern Era (1939–Present)

Victory has a hundred fathers, but defeat is an orphan.

—President John F. Kennedy, after the Bay of Pigs fiasco (1961)

WORLD WAR II (1939–1945)

As with World War I, the Americas are almost entirely spared any fighting on their soil during this second global conflict, being separated from the major overseas theaters by both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. In addition, more than two years will elapse between Germany's invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939—which sparks Britain's and France's retaliatory declarations of war two days later—and the U.S. entry into the hostilities after the Japanese attack against Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. Nevertheless, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt will begin taking a hand in the proceedings prior to this latter date.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1939. Roosevelt orders the U.S. Navy to establish a “Neutrality Patrol”—also referred to as the “American Defense Zone”—in the mid-Atlantic to discourage overseas belligerents from conducting operations in the Americas. This line runs southward from Canadian waters along longitude 60° W, roughly parallel down the South American coast. Germany, Britain, and France will by and large respect this boundary.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1939. Having slipped out of Germany on August 21 before war was declared between London and Berlin, Capt. Hans Langsdorff's 16,200-ton “pocket battleship” Admiral Graf

Spee—armed with six 11-inch, eight 6-inch, and six 4-inch guns—claims its first victim by sinking the British merchantman Clement off Pernambuco (Brazil).

With a top speed of 26 knots, the Graf Spee has been designed as a commerce raider capable of out-gunning any Royal Navy warship that it cannot outrun. It then disappears eastward to prey upon British shipping rounding South Africa's Cape of Good Hope.

NOVEMBER 1939. Washington repeals its Neutrality Act. Henceforth, war matériel can be supplied to Britain on a “cash-and-carry” basis.

End of U.S. Isolationism

After World War I ended in November 1918, America recoiled from foreign entanglements. Horrified by the losses in men and matériel, a vocal minority reverted to isolationism, preferring the natural barriers of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. As a result of this shift, President Woodrow Wilson failed to win congressional approval for his Treaty of Versailles or for U.S. membership in the League of Nations. He even lost his own reelection. The “Open Door” policy of admitting European immigrants was also severely reduced, while trade barriers were raised to protect national industries.

The United States, of course, remained involved in international affairs during the 1920s and 1930s, but its participation relied more on “banks rather than tanks.” Republican administrations used America's financial strength to address foreign problems, such as the Naval Disarmament Treaty or Germany's reparations crisis. Even after the Great Depression swept the Democratic candidate Franklin D. Roosevelt into office in 1932, enough isolationist spirit remained in Congress to pass the three Neutrality Acts of the mid-1930s. And although American citizens viewed the rise of Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime in Germany with distaste, it seemed to pose no real threat to France's armies or Britain's Royal Navy.

Sentiment began to swing away from isolationism once the German Blitzkrieg overran France in June 1940, leaving Britain to fight on alone. U.S. defense spending increased five-fold that same year, while aid to Britain was widely endorsed. Even the Republican Convention of 1940 bypassed its top presidential contenders—senators Robert A. Taft of Ohio and Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan, as well as Gov. Thomas Dewey of New York—because of their isolationist past. Instead, the former Democrat, Wendell Wilkie, was nominated.

Wilkie was soundly beaten and the congressional elections were marked by a broad repudiation of most isolationist candidates. Their views were now discredited. Roosevelt was free to commit American resources in support of Britain. Senator Vandenberg later wrote that isolationism had died at Pearl Harbor, yet it really died during the summer and autumn of 1940.

The German pocket battleship Graf Spee sinking after being scuttled outside Montevideo. (U.S. Naval Institute)

DECEMBER 13, 1939. River Plate. At 6:00 a.m., British commodore Henry Harwood's Hunting Group "G" is stationed 150 miles east of the River Plate, consisting of the 8,300-ton heavy cruiser Exeter (flag) with six eight-inch and four four-inch guns under F. S. Bell; the 7,100-ton light cruiser Ajax with eight six-inch and eight four-inch guns under C. H. L. Woodhouse; and the 7,000-ton New Zealand light cruiser Achilles with eight six-inch and four four-inch under W. E. Parry. Eight minutes later, they sight the Graf Spee approaching out of the South Atlantic, making toward Uruguay to refuel.

Action commences at 6:14 a.m., when the Ajax and the Achilles open fire at a range of 19,000 yards, while the Exeter turns westward to divide the Graf Spee's targeting. Langsdorff concentrates his counterfire against the Exeter, believing that he has encountered only a British cruiser and two destroyers. The Exeter is struck repeatedly by accurate German salvos, and by 6:50 has a heavy list to starboard, only one of its three main turrets remaining in action. Meanwhile, the two British light cruisers steadily shell the Graf Spee, while closing the range. At 7:16, Langsdorff begins circling south toward the crippled Exeter, prompting Woodhouse and Parry to turn in this same direction and intercede, driving the German raider northwestward. At 7:25, the Ajax is struck by an 11-inch shell and loses use of both its aft turrets; 13 minutes later, its topmast is also brought down by a hit. The British thereupon make smoke and break off the action two minutes later.

The Graf Spee continues toward the River Plate, closely shadowed by the limping British cruisers, which the Graf Spee occasionally turns to bombard. Langsdorff enters Montevideo that same evening, and although technically allowed to remain in a neutral port for only 24 hours, receives a 72-hour extension to repair his damaged ship. Harwood meanwhile detaches the Exeter toward the Falklands and maintains a steady stream of false wireless traffic, suggesting that strong reinforcements—the 22,000-ton aircraft carrier Ark Royal and 32,000-ton battle-cruiser Renown—have already joined him rather than being several hundred miles distant.

Convinced that he cannot break out against such odds, Langsdorff—after consulting via wireless with Hitler and Grand Adm. Erich Raeder in Berlin—weighs anchor at 6:15 p.m. on December 17 and stands out of Montevideo, trailed by the German merchantman Tacoma and two Argentine tugs. A short distance out, he and his crew transfer aboard their consorts, then the Graf Spee is scuttled at 7:56, exploding shortly thereafter. Three days later, amid criticisms of his performance, Langsdorff commits suicide in Buenos Aires.

JUNE 22, 1940. A German Blitzkrieg or “lightning offensive” smashes through northern France, whose government collapses and signs ruinous capitulation terms with the Nazis.

That same day, the 22,100-ton aircraft carrier Béarn arrives at Fort-de-France (Martinique), having reversed course in the mid-Atlantic while bound from Halifax toward France with 107 planes purchased from the United States; two days later, the 5,900-ton light cruiser Émile Bertin also enters port, bearing 300 tons of the Bank of France’s gold reserves, which are to be secured underground in Fort Desaix for safekeeping. These vessels, along with the 6,500-ton training cruiser Jeanne d’Arc, the 2,600-ton destroyer Terrible, plus numerous lesser consorts, will comprise the 2,500-man squadron of 65-year-old vice admiral Georges Joseph Robert, already stationed at Fort-de-France as haut commissaire or “high commissioner” and military commander in chief for the entire French Antilles and Guiana.

This French naval presence takes on added significance eight days later when the British—until recently, France’s allies—destroy a large French fleet anchored at the North African port of Mers-el-Kebir near Oran on July 3; the British are fearful that these warships are about to be handed over to the victorious Germans and Italians as indemnity. Immediately upon learning of this bombardment, in which 1,300 French sailors have perished, Robert commands the visiting British cruiser HMS Fiji to depart Fort-de-France, then places all his forces upon alert against any similar attempt, even issuing orders to fire upon any approaching Royal Navy formation.

One week later, a new French regime is created at Vichy, and Adm. Jean Darlan emerges as one of its cabinet ministers. Personally loyal to his naval superior, Robert consequently aligns Martinique and other French colonies in the Americas under Vichy control.

JULY 24, 1940. Roosevelt declares “all aid [to Britain] short of war,” exemplified by his offer to exchange 50 old “four-piper” U.S. Navy destroyers for 99-year leases on British air and sea bases stretching from Canada to the Caribbean. This deal is ratified on September 2.

Vichy France

The German Blitzkrieg that cut through northern France in the spring of 1940 did not overrun that entire nation. The defeated French were left in control of the central portion of their country, plus its Mediterranean coastline, overseas colonies, and navy. When disheartened members of the National Assembly gathered at the small inland city of Vichy on July 10 to ratify this humiliating surrender, ex-Premier Pierre Laval persuaded them to create an entirely new regime. It was headed by the elderly marshal Henri Pétain as president.

Not surprisingly, this new administration was marked by weakness and an unseemly collaboration with the Germans. Conservative reactionaries gravitated around Pétain, attributing France’s collapse to its social inadequacies. Even the proud national motto of Liberté, égalité, fraternité or “Liberty, equality, fraternity” changed into the milder Travail, famille, patrie or “Work, family, homeland.” More ominously, many members would seek a place in Hitler’s brutal “new order” for Europe. Such pro-Nazi proclivities created contempt and suspicion abroad, especially in America.

When Adm. Jean Darlan accepted the position of minister of marine in this new Vichy cabinet, his naval subordinate Georges Joseph Robert at Fort-de-France ensured that Martinique and other French colonies passed under Vichy control. But when America’s entry into the war in December 1941 was accompanied by a vigorous U-boat offensive, U.S. forces quickly moved to isolate these Vichy outposts in the Antilles. Despite France’s neutrality, they were suspected of providing shelter and supplies to the Germans. And when Hitler finally sent his armies into the remainder of France and incorporated it into his Reich less than a year later, the last traces of Vichy rule were swept away. In the Americas, France’s colonies were seized in the name of the “Free French” movement led by generals Charles de Gaulle and Henri Giraud.

JULY 28, 1940. Capt. Otto Kähler's disguised German merchant-raider Thor—code-named Schiff 10 by Berlin and Raider "E" by London—engages the British armed merchant-cruiser Alcantara near Trinidad Island (Brazil), severely damaging its over-matched opponent before disappearing back out into the Atlantic.

DECEMBER 5, 1940. The Thor engages the British armed merchant-cruiser Carnarvon Castle southeast of Brazil (30°52' S, 42°53' W), mauling it without receiving any damage.

MARCH 11, 1941. The U.S. Congress passes the Lend-Lease Act, whereby the government can lend arms, munitions, and supplies to nations whose interests "the President deems vital to the defense of the United States"—namely, Britain and its satellites.

Four days later, warships of Adm. Ernest J. King's Atlantic Fleet are ordered to return into port to have their peacetime color scheme replaced by gray camouflage, and a "Support Group" is formed this same month, consisting of three destroyer flotillas and five flying boat squadrons.

APRIL 4, 1941. British warships are allowed to refit in American yards, the battleships HMSS Malaya and Resolution being among the first to avail themselves of this recourse.

APRIL 7, 1941. U.S. air bases are opened on Greenland and Bermuda.

APRIL 10, 1941. Roosevelt outlines plans for four U.S. task forces to patrol the Atlantic and broadcast the positions of any U-boats that they find.

APRIL 11, 1941. Washington decides to extend the American security zone farther out into the Atlantic, from longitude 60° to 26° W, announcing this measure one week later.

APRIL 19, 1941. In Mexico, Rear Adm. Luis Hurtado de Mendoza—on orders from President Ávila Camacho—sends marines from the 31st Battalion to impound nine Italian vessels idled at Tampico, plus another three German merchantmen at Veracruz.

MAY 15, 1941. The U.S. Navy takes over the leased British base of Argentina in southeastern Newfoundland.

MAY 27, 1941. Roosevelt announces an "unlimited national emergency."

JUNE 1, 1941. The United States agrees to help defend Iceland.

JULY 7, 1941. A U.S. marine brigade, backed by naval forces, relieves the British garrison at Reykjavik (Iceland).

JULY 19, 1941. The U.S. Navy is ordered to escort shipping of any nationality to and from Iceland.

AUGUST 10, 1941. British prime minister Winston Churchill and Roosevelt meet at Argentina, signing an understanding known as the "Atlantic Charter."

SEPTEMBER 4, 1941. Washington orders implementation of "Western Hemisphere Defense Plan Number 4," which authorizes U.S. Navy escorts to include non-American vessels in their convoys and Canadian warships to escort American vessels.

This same day, south of Iceland, the German U-652—after being tracked for three hours by the U.S. destroyer Greer—fires two torpedoes at its tormentor, which miss.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1941. The Halifax-to-England convoy HX-150 sails with a U.S. Navy escort.

OCTOBER 17, 1941. Responding to a nocturnal attack upon convoy SC-48 by a German wolf pack, the U.S. destroyer Kearny is struck amidships by a torpedo, killing 11 of its crew members.

OCTOBER 31, 1941. Just after dawn, the old, 1,200-ton, U.S. "four-piper" destroyer Reuben James (DD-245)—escorting convoy HX-156—is struck by a German torpedo, breaking in two and going down within five minutes with 115 of its 160-man crew.

NOVEMBER 7, 1941. U.S. merchantmen are authorized to arm themselves.

DECEMBER 8, 1941. The day after attacking Pearl Harbor (Hawaii), various other Japanese expeditions surprise the British protectorate of Hong Kong and invade Malaya and Thailand, while carrier-based Japanese aircraft bombard U.S. airfields in the Philippines. Over the next few weeks, these offensives will Damage sustained by the U.S. destroyer Kearny from a German torpedo in the North Atlantic prior to the United States' entry into World War II. The vessel is tied up beside its sister ship in Iceland. (U.S. Naval Institute) secure virtually all of Southeast Asia, against only token resistance.

DECEMBER 9, 1941. Germany and Italy, Japan's Axis partners in Europe, declare war against the United States.

DECEMBER 11, 1941. Cuba joins the United States and declares war on the Axis powers.

DECEMBER 20, 1941. The 3,250-ton, long-range, Free French submarine Surcouf (the largest submersible in the world) departs Halifax in company with the corvettes Mimosa, Aconit, and Alysse to wrest the islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon from Vichy control four days later.

JANUARY 12, 1942. U-Boat Offensive. Contrary to instructions from Adm. Karl Dönitz, Lt. Reinhard

Hardegen's 740-ton, Type-IXB submarine U-123—after stealthily departing Lorient in occupied France on December 23—sinks the 9,000-ton British liner Cyclops of Capt. Lesley Webber Kersley 300 miles off Cape Cod (Massachusetts), thus forewarning American and Canadian authorities of the shift of U-boat operations out of the mid-Atlantic closer to North America.

The German high command has originally hoped to unleash a surprise offensive code-named Operation PAUKENSCHLAG or "DRUMBEAT" as of January 13 by launching coordinated strikes all the way from the Saint Lawrence River mouth to Cape Hatteras, using Hardegen's craft plus four other 1,200-ton Type-IXC boats: U-66 of Cmdr. Richard Zapp, U-109 of Lt. Heinrich Bleichrodt, U-125 of Lt. Ulrich Folkers, and U-130 of Cmdr. Ernst Kals.

At 1:00 a.m. of January 13, Kals sinks the Norwegian steamer Frisco in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, followed eight hours later by the Panamanian vessel Friar Rock. Hardegen surfaces 60 miles off Long Island's Montauk Point (New York) on the morning of January 14, claiming the tanker Norness, the tanker Coimbra the next day, and the steamer San Jose on January 17. The next day, U-66 sinks the tanker Allan Jackson, while Hardegen adds another three vessels to his kills on January 19. Two days later, Kals destroys the tanker Alexander Hoegh south of Cape Breton, after which numerous other attacks ensue.

All told, these five U-boats claim 26 Allied vessels during their two-week patrol, totaling 163,000 tons of shipping. After the fierce combat conditions experienced against Royal Navy warships closer to Europe, German submariners are delighted by their North American foes' lack of preparedness: cities are fully illuminated, buoys and beacons are still in place, and merchantmen are running undarkened and alone, with only a few inexperienced escorts. Recalling their easy hunts of 1940, the U-boat crews dub this period their second "happy time."

As these first five submarines retire, another quintet of Type-IXC boats arrives—Werner Winter's U-103, Hermann Rasch's U-106, Harald Gelhaus's U-107, Klaus Scholtz's U-108, and Ulric Heyse's U-128—to claim another 19 merchantmen by February 12, totaling 127,000 tons.

JANUARY 21, 1942. Eight smaller Type-VIIC submarines—Rollman's U-82, Greger's U-85, Gysae's U-98, Reinhard Suhren's U-564, Borchert's U-566, Heinicke's U-576, Gerhard Bigalk's U-751, and Oestermann's U-754—arrive to patrol from the Newfoundland Banks to Nova Scotia. Because of harsh winter conditions, they only sink 13 Allied merchantmen, totaling 74,000 tons, before withdrawing on February 19.

FEBRUARY 10, 1942. A third wave of German submarines arrives off North America, consisting of 3 Type-IXC boats—Adolf Piening's U-155, Erich Rostin's U-158, and Poske's U-504—plus 10 VIICs: Zahn's U-69, Otto Ites's U-94, Lehmann-Willenbrock's U-96, Otto von Bulow's U-404, Heinz-Otto Schultze's U-432, Gunther Krech's U-558, Ernst Rehwinkel's U-578, Ulrich Borchardt's U-587, Gerhard Feiler's U-653, and Kröning's U-656. By March 20, they claim 34 Allied merchantmen totaling 184,000 tons, principally south of Long Island (New York). With few escort ships or aircraft, American rear admiral Adolphus Andrews—commander of the "Eastern Sea Frontier"—is powerless to halt this onslaught.

FEBRUARY 16, 1942. Caribbean Theater. At 2:01 a.m., inaugurating a new offensive into West Indian waters code-named Operation NEULAND, Lt. Werner Hartenstein's Type-IXC submarine U-156 torpedoes the 4,000-ton tanker Pedernales at anchor inside San Nicholas Harbor on the island of Aruba, followed by the Oranjestad. After reloading, he furthermore strikes the 6,400-ton American tanker Arkansas at 3:43 a.m., before unsuccessfully attempting to shell the Standard Oil refinery and some oil tanks ashore, then exiting.

At 4:35 a.m., his consort U-67 under Lt. Gunther Muller-Stockheim torpedoes three tankers outside of Willemstad on the neighboring island of Curaçao, although only the 3,100-ton Rafaela actually burns and sinks; also prior to sunup, U-502 of Jürgen von Rosenstiel destroys the tankers Tía Juana and San Nicholas inside the Gulf of Venezuela.

FEBRUARY 18, 1942. After a stealthy, daylong penetration into the main anchorage at Port-of-Spain

Type-VIIC U-Boat

First commissioned in 1940 as a slightly improved version of the successful Type-VIIB, the somewhat larger and heavier VIIC boats were to become the workhorse of the German submarine service for the remainder of World War II. A total of 568 were eventually launched, each measuring roughly 200 feet in length and 20 feet in width, while displacing 1,000 tons. Armament consisted of four torpedo tubes in the bow and one in the stern for firing the 14 torpedoes that each boat typically carried. There was also a fixed heavy deck gun and some removable machine guns. Speed on the surface was 18 knots or 20 miles an hour, less than half that while submerged. Maximum dive depth was 750 feet. Crews usually consisted of 45 to 50 men.

With an operating range of only 5,100 miles on a single load of fuel, Type-VIIC boats could not remain in American waters for as long as the larger Type-IXCs, so they tended to see more service in the West European approaches. Still, many Type-VIICs participated in the initial wave of raids off the eastern seaboard of the United States and in the Caribbean, until improved Allied defensive measures and patrols by land-based aircraft forced all German submarines to retreat back out into the North Atlantic by September 1942. Although Type-VIIC boats continued to be upgraded throughout the last two and a half years of the conflict, their basic design remained unchanged. They eventually became obsolete, being hunted into virtual extinction by sonar-equipped Allied aircraft and "hunter-killer" naval squadrons.

U-255, a Type-VIIC U-boat, approaching its berth in Bergen, Norway. (U.S. Naval Historical Center) on the British island of Trinidad, Lt. Albrecht Achilles's Type-IXC U-161 torpedoes the 7,400-ton American freighter Mokihana and the British tanker British Consul at 11:35 p.m., then escapes in the resultant confusion. The next afternoon, the 7,200-ton British freighter Scottish Star is sunk far to the east of this island by the Marconi-class Italian submarine Luigi Torelli of Captain de Giacomo; while at 10:00 p.m. that same night of February 19, U-129 of Lt. Cmdr. Nicoli Clausen destroys the small Norwegian tanker Nordvangen two miles off Galera Point.

Over the ensuing month, these five German U-boats will wreak havoc in the virtually defenseless Caribbean zone, claiming 41 Allied merchantmen totaling 222,651 tons, while heavily damaging 11 more vessels. Farther east out in its Atlantic approaches, numerous other sinkings are made by the Luigi Torelli and its Marconi-class sister submarine Leonardo da Vinci under Captain Longanes Cattani, the Pietro Calvi-class Giuseppe Finzi of Captain Guidice and the Enrico Tazzoli of Captain Fecia di Cossato, plus the Marcello-class Morsini of Captain Fraternali.

MARCH 1942. After repeated complaints about merchantmen being silhouetted at night against illuminated cities, Lt. Gen. Hugh Drum—chief of the U.S. Army's "Eastern Defense Command"—introduces blackouts.

MARCH 1, 1942. U-656 goes down with all hands 25 miles south-southeast of Cape Race (Massachusetts), destroyed by American aircraft of the 88th Squadron.

APRIL 1, 1942. The first of 10 British corvettes and two-dozen 900-ton antisubmarine trawlers reach New York to bolster American naval efforts against the U-boats. A convoy system is also inaugurated shortly thereafter between Hampton Roads (Virginia) and Key West (Florida), and although German submarines continue to claim a heavy toll, losses eventually decline.

APRIL 4, 1942. The Type-IXC U-154 of Lt. Cmdr. Walter Kolle sinks the 5,000-ton American tanker Comol Rico north of Puerto Rico, signaling the arrival of a second wave of German submarines into the Caribbean. Over the ensuing month, it is followed by U-66 under Zapp, U-130 under Kals, U-108 under Scholtz, U-125 under Folkers, U-507 of Harro Schacht, U-162 of Jurgen Wattenburg (former navigation officer of the Graf Spee), U-69 under Ulrich Graf, U-558 of Gunther Krech, U-502 under von Rosenstiel, U-103 under Winter, U-155 under Piening, U-107 under Gelhaus, U-156 under Hartenstein, U-106 under Rasch, U-68 of Cmdr. Karl Friedrich Merten, U-159 of Helmut Witte, U-172 of Carl Emmermann, U-504 under Poske, U-751 under Bigalk, U-753 of Alfred von Manstein, and U-755 of Walter Göing. By the end of May, they will have sunk 72 Allied merchantmen representing 364,000 tons; in June, they will claim another 76 vessels totaling 378,000 tons.

APRIL 20, 1942. The 1,700-ton, Type-XIV German supply submarine U-459 (nicknamed a “milch cow”) arrives off Bermuda, eventually refueling 14 boats. Such measures allow U-boats to remain on patrol somewhat longer rather than risk the lengthy return voyage into their home ports in Western Europe.

MAY 9, 1942. Rathke’s U-352 attempts to torpedo the American Coast Guard cutter Icarus off Cape Lookout (North Carolina), missing and being sunk in turn.

MAY 13, 1942. While sailing past Miami, the neutral Mexican oil-tanker Potrero del Llano is sunk by a German submarine, with the loss of 15 of its 35-man crew. The Mexican government lodges a protest with Berlin, which is ignored.

MAY 20, 1942. The Mexican merchantman Faja de Oro is sunk near Key West by a German submarine, resulting in the death of 8 of its 36-man crew.

MAY 22, 1942. Mexico declares war against the Axis powers.

MAY 25, 1942. Suspecting German submarines are receiving support from Vichy French collaborators on Martinique, the destroyers USS Blakeley and Ellis, plus a smaller patrol cutter, have been inspecting every vessel entering or departing Fort-de-France for evidence of clandestine contacts. This morning, Hartenstein’s U-156 spots the Blakeley patrolling inshore and blows off its bow with a torpedo. The heavily damaged American destroyer staggers into port, while Hartenstein requests permission by wireless from U-boat headquarters in Lorient to enter and finish it off. This is denied, and the Blakeley is rescued shortly thereafter by the destroyers USS Breckenridge, Greer, and Tarbell, plus two PBY “Catalina” flying boats of the U.S. Navy Patrol Squadron 53.

MAY 26, 1942. Vice Adm. Boshiro Hosogaya departs the port of Omimato in northern Honshu (Japan) to initiate an operation code-named “AL,” ostensibly intended to occupy the Aleutian islands of Attu and Kiska, yet actually designed as a diversion for Adm. Isoroku Yamamoto’s much larger effort against Midway. Hosogaya sets sail with his flag aboard the 15,000-ton, 775-man heavy cruiser Nachi, accompanied by the 5,500-ton, 440-man light cruiser Abukuma, the 2,000-ton destroyers Ikazuchi and Inazuma, plus two oilers and three transports. They are escorting Rear Admiral Omori’s “Attu Invasion Force,” consisting of the 1,800-ton destroyers Hatsuharu, Hatsushimo, Wakaba, and Nenohi; the transport Kinugasa Maru; and minelayer Magane Maru.

On the afternoon of May 28, Rear Adm. Kakuji Kakuta also sets sail from Omimato with the 12,750-ton, 1,000-man light carrier Ryujo bearing 37 planes and the 27,000-ton, 1,250-man carrier Junyo bearing 53 planes; the 15,000-ton heavy cruisers Maya and Takao; the 2,100-ton destroyers Akebono, Ushio, Sazanami, and Shiokaze; plus the seaplane tender Kimikawa Maru. This whole second formation is designated as the Fifth Fleet, Northern Force, Second Strike Force and is to launch covering air strikes against Dutch Harbor in the Aleutians six days later. Kakuta is also escorting Capt. Takeji Ono’s “Kiska Invasion Force,” comprising the 5,800-ton light cruiser Tama, the 2,000-ton destroyers Akatsuki and Hokaze, plus six transports.

MAY 30, 1942. This morning, Rear Adm. Raizo Tanaka sets sail from northern Japan with the 5,600-ton light cruiser Jintsu, plus the 2,500-ton destroyers Kuroshio, Oyashio, Hatsukaze, Amatsukaze, Tokitsukaze, and Shiranui, as well as the 2,400-ton Kasumi, Kagero, and Arare, plus an oil-tanker—all designated as Second Fleet–Escort Force—to convey 15 additional transports bearing 5,000 Imperial Army troops, who are actually to hold the islands of Attu and Kiska.

JUNE 3, 1942. At 3:00 a.m., Rear Admiral Kakuta—steaming 180 miles southwest of Dutch Harbor—launches 14 attack planes and 3 fighters from his light carrier Ruyjo, plus 15 bombers and 13 fighters from the Junyo. Because of bad weather, only 9 of the Ruyjo's attack planes and 3 fighters manage to find Dutch Harbor five hours later.

German prisoners from the sunken submarine U-352 being brought ashore at Charleston, South Carolina, for internment. (U.S. National Archives)

Radar aboard the anchored seaplane tender USS Gillis has given the Americans a brief advance warning, but the destroyer Talbot, submarine S-27, a Coast Guard cutter, two U.S. Army transports, and other lesser vessels are unable to exit in time. (Rear Adm. Robert A. Theobald's Task Force 8—consisting of the heavy cruisers Indianapolis and Louisville; the light cruisers Nashville (flag), St. Louis, and Honolulu; plus the destroyers Gridley, Gilmer, McCall, and Humphreys—are on patrol several hundred miles farther to the south.) The Japanese planes are met with heavy anti-aircraft fire, plus a few P-40 fighters, claiming one bomber. Nevertheless, the attackers set the American oil-tank farm ablaze, destroy several parked PBVs, and damage the army barracks at Fort Mears before retiring by 8:30 a.m.

The air-strike commander informs Kakuta that five U.S. destroyers and two submarines are also lying in Makushin Bay, prompting the Japanese admiral to launch a second wave at 9:45 a.m.: 14 attack planes, 15 bombers, 12 fighters, and 4 observation planes. They are unable to locate their target in the fog and return to their carriers by 10:50 a.m., landing over the next hour—having skirmished with some P-40s en route and lost a Zero. Kakuta thereupon turns southwestward to make a preinvasion bombardment of Adak Island, only to turn back again because of foul weather. (The Japanese invasion of Adak is later canceled.)

This same evening, Rear Adm. Takeo Kurita sets sail eastward from Paramushiro Island with the Second Fleet, Occupation Support Force—the 14,000– ton heavy cruisers Kumano, Mogami, Mikuma, and Suzuya; the 2,400-ton destroyers Arashio and Asashio, as well as the 2,500-ton Hayashio; plus the seaplane tenders Chitose and Kamikawa Maru—to help cover the forthcoming landings on Attu and Kiska.

JUNE 5, 1942. Aleutian Invasion. This morning, Tanaka's expedition arrives off Attu, his trailing troop transports arriving two days afterward to disembark their charges without resistance. The island garrison will eventually rise to almost 3,000 men.

At 4:00 this same afternoon of June 5, several hundred miles farther to the east, Kakuta's carrier force launches another strike against the American base at Dutch Harbor, dispatching 9 attack planes, 11 bombers, and 11 fighters. They complete the destruction of Dutch Harbor's oil-tank farm, plus severely damage the beached barracks-ship Northwestern. While this air raid is going on, the Japanese carriers are attacked by U.S. B-17 and B-26 bombers, which score a few near misses, although losing two of their number. The Japanese carrier planes thereupon return, having lost two fighters.

JUNE 13, 1942. The U.S. Coast Guard cutter Thetis (WPC 115) surprises U-157 of Lt. Cmdr. Wolf

Henne, which has surfaced 30 miles from Key West in the Straits of Florida, and destroys it when the German submarine belatedly attempts a crash dive.

JULY 4, 1942. The American submarine Triton torpedoes the 1,800-ton Japanese destroyer Nenohi, which is off the Aleutian island of Agattu as escort for the seaplane tender Kamikawa Maru. Only 36 of the Nenohi's 228-man crew are saved.

JULY 5, 1942. Off Kiska, the U.S. submarine Growler (SS-215) of Lt. Cmdr. Howard W. Gilmore sinks the 2,400-ton Japanese destroyer Arare, plus severely damaging its consorts Shiranui and Kasumi.

AUGUST 1, 1942. One week after laying a dozen mines 600 yards off the mouth of the Mississippi Delta, U-166 of Jr. Lt. Hans-Gunther Kuhlmann is sunk by planes of U.S. Coast Guard Squadron 212.

AUGUST 7, 1942. Rear Adm. William W. Smith's Task Group 8.6—the heavy cruisers Louisville and Indianapolis; light cruisers Nashville, Honolulu, and St. Louis; plus the destroyers Elliot, Reid, Case, Gridley, and McCall—shells the Japanese installations on Kiska.

Aleutian Invasion.

AUGUST 22, 1942. Seven months after severing diplomatic relations with the Axis powers because of merchant losses due to U-boats, Brazil declares war against Germany, Italy, and Japan when U-507 sinks five freighters directly off its coast. In addition to helping defend the South Atlantic against enemy submarines, this country will eventually send a Força Expedicionária Brasileira or “Brazilian Expeditionary Force” to fight in Italy, which distinguishes itself during the Battle of Monte Cassino.

AUGUST 30, 1942. American forces reoccupy Adak Island, constructing runways within the next couple of weeks that are capable of sending air strikes against Japanese-held Kiska and Attu, farther to the west.

SEPTEMBER 1942. Discouraged by declining results because of the implementation of regular convoys and other defensive measures, Dönitz withdraws the bulk of his U-boats from American coastal waters to instead attack shipping farther out in the Atlantic, beyond the range of land-based aircraft. Technological innovations, such as radar and asdic, plus mass production of improved vessels and weaponry, will eventually allow the Allies to hunt German submarines into virtual extinction.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1942. Cuba signs an agreement with the United States allowing a flotilla of a dozen American-manned patrol vessels to operate out of Havana under Cuban colors.

OCTOBER 16, 1942. A U.S. air raid against Kiska sinks the 2,100-ton destroyer Oboru with all 200 hands, while the 1,800-ton destroyer Hatsuharu is severely damaged.

NOVEMBER 8, 1942. American forces land in Morocco and Algeria, encountering no resistance from its French colonial garrisons. Vichy minister of marine Darlan, who happens to be in Algiers, even switches allegiance and orders the main French battle fleet to escape from Toulon and join the Allied cause, which is preempted when the Germans quickly overrun the remainder of France and incorporate this territory into their Reich.

Given these changed circumstances—France now being completely occupied by Germany and its Vichy administration openly cooperating with the Nazis—Washington grows impatient with Admiral Robert’s continuing refusal to align himself with the Free French; therefore, as of November 13, a diplomatic delegation compels him to immobilize his warships and remove propellers from his planes at Fort-de-France, after which the U.S. Navy also institutes a blockade of Martinique, Guadeloupe, and French Guiana.

JANUARY 12, 1943. American forces reoccupy Amchitka, 60 miles from Kiska, and begin building airstrips.

MARCH 19, 1943. With French Guiana’s economy stalled and unrest brewing among its populace, its governor cables Gen. Henri Giraud in North Africa, switching allegiance from the Vichy to the Free French cause. With U.S. assistance, a Giraud representative soon arrives and assumes control over this South American colony, despite a conflicting claim

Brazilian Expeditionary Force

Soon after declaring war against the Axis powers, Brazil began raising a Força Expedicionária Brasileira. This “Brazilian Expeditionary Force” or FEB was to join the Allied armies encircling Europe. Command was given in October 1943 to the diminutive 60-year-old general João Batista Mascarenhas de Moraes. The next month, he visited the Mediterranean front, while FEB training was being conducted with American help. His force adopted a cigar-smoking cobra as their crest to refute those skeptics who scoffed that “it would be easier for a cobra to smoke a cigar, than for Brazil to participate in the war.”

The first 5,000 men departed under Gen. Zenóbio da Costa in July 1944 to become part of U.S. general Mark Clark’s 5th Army in Italy. The Brazilians won their first victories in September at Massarosa, Camaione, and Monte Prano. The FEB was joined by more contingents, eventually numbering 25,300 men. Early the next year, they fought bravely while breaching the German “Gothic Line” during the bitter battle for Monte Cassino. The last Nazi forces in Italy capitulated by May 2, 1945. Some 454 fallen Brazilians were buried in the Allied graveyard at Pistoia, and another 1,000 were wounded.

The FEB returned triumphantly to Brazil in July 1945, only to be disbanded and its officers dispersed by President Getúlio Vargas. He feared the influence of this battle-hardened army in his autocratic regime. Being widely regarded as national heroes, they indeed came to exert considerable political influence, helping depose the dictator that October and becoming known as the febianos.

by the original Free French leader, Gen. Charles de Gaulle. By the end of that same month, American troops take over all of French Guiana's bases and broker an arrangement to station antisubmarine aircraft at Gallion Field.

Combat planes are further marshaled on the island of St. Lucia, and a task force is assembled around the brand-new fleet-carrier USS Essex, plus other warships, to prevent any attempted Vichy counter coup by Admiral Robert's squadron from Martinique.

MARCH 22, 1943. The United States officially gives 10 patrol vessels to Cuba, which are already operating out of Havana.

MARCH 26, 1943. Komandorski Islands. At 5:00 a.m., Vice Admiral Hosogaya is steaming north toward the Komandorski Islands with the 15,000-ton heavy cruisers Nachi and Maya; the 5,800-ton light cruisers Tama and Abukuma; the 1,800-ton destroyers Wakaba and Hatsushimo, and 2,000-ton Ikazuchi and Inazuma; plus the transports Asaka Maru and Sakito Maru, bearing reinforcements and supplies for the Attu garrison. (The 2,100-ton destroyer Usugumo is supposed to join later, with a third transport.)

Twenty miles southeast on a parallel course runs Rear Adm. Charles H. McMorris's Task Force 16.6 in two columns: the destroyer Coughlan, light cruiser Richmond, plus destroyers Bailey and Dale in the nearest one, with the heavy cruiser Salt Lake City and destroyer Monaghan five miles farther to the east. They are part of a larger American fleet intent on disrupting Japanese supply routes between Siberia's Kamchatka Peninsula and the Aleutians.

The U.S. vessels spot their opponents on radar and begin forming into a single column. A few minutes later, Japanese lookouts also sight this movement, and Hosogaya turns southeast in a double column at 5:30 a.m. to offer battle (detaching the Inazuma to escort the transports northwestward, away from danger). McMorris's two cruisers are by now screened on either side by a pair of U.S. destroyers and turn westward in hopes of overtaking the vanishing Japanese transports.

Both sides open fire at 5:42 a.m., at approximately 20,000 yards' range. The Japanese cruisers split into two pairs, the Abukuma and the Tama steering southwestward, while the Nachi and the Maya continue southeastward, exchanging salvos with the Salt Lake City. There ensues a cautious long-range bombardment until 7:15 a.m., when the American heavy cruiser—after being hit for a third time—requests a smoke screen from its destroyer escort, then breaks off the action by 9:00 a.m. Hosogaya subsequently leads his convoy back to Paramushiro by March 28, and one month later is retired from the service in disgrace for not having accomplished more against such an inferior American force during this engagement.

MAY 11, 1943. Reconquest of Attu. Leapfrogging 170 miles past the main Japanese concentration on Kiska, Rear Adm. Thomas C. Kincaid's Task Force 16 and Rear Adm. Francis W. Rockwell's Task Force 51 initiate an intense naval bombardment to cover the disembarkation of 11,000 troops of the U.S. 4th and 7th divisions under Maj. Gen. Eugene M. Landrum at three points in Holtz and Massacre bays on fog-shrouded Attu. Its 2,630 occupiers under Col. Yasuhiro Yamazaki retire into the most defensible valley on the island to make their last stand. After two and a half weeks of steady pressure, the Americans fight their way into both ends of this valley, little realizing that the Japanese—starved and desperate and having lost radio contact with Tokyo as of May 27—are intent upon resisting fanatically to the last man.

A 105mm U.S. Army howitzer firing against Japanese positions atop the fog-shrouded heights of Attu Island. (U.S. Naval Institute)

On the night of May 29, Yamazaki leads his last 1,000 men out of the old Russian sealing station of Chichagof in a banzai charge, which breaks through U.S. picket lines and overruns a field hospital and quartermaster depot, despite having half their number shot down. The 500 cornered Japanese survivors then commit suicide by pulling pins on their grenades, only 28 maimed prisoners being taken alive by the time all resistance ceases. American casualties for this campaign total 600 dead and 1,200 wounded.

MAY 24, 1943. Having lost 41 U-boats and 4 Italian submarines this month alone against superior Allied forces in the North Atlantic, Dönitz withdraws all but 4 boats and orders this quartet to maintain false wireless chatter, while redirecting 52 surviving boats toward the Caribbean and north coast of Brazil in the vain hope of finding weaker opposition.

However, forewarned by intelligence intercepts, the Allies inflict heavy casualties on these out-coming vessels and sink their mid-Atlantic U-tankers, so that only 28 German submarines actually reach the Western Hemisphere. They will destroy a mere 3 tankers, 2 freighters, and a pair of schooners by the end of July, while losing 13 of their own number to relentless Allied air and sea patrols. Another 5 submarines will be sunk on their homeward leg.

MAY 26, 1943. Because of Attu's fall, Japanese headquarters orders Kiska resupplied by 13 I-Class submarines. However, when 7 of these long-range vessels are quickly lost to U.S. forces, it is decided to instead withdraw the garrison from that island with a swift move designated as Operation KE.

LATE MAY 1943. Having at last decided to invade Martinique and remove its recalcitrant Vichy French administration, the 33rd U.S. Infantry Regiment and 135th Combat Engineers begin practicing amphibious landings on the island of Trinidad, while the 13th Marine Regiment and 501st Airborne Regiment of the 101st Airborne Division do the same on Puerto Rico. These first two units are to land on the beaches immediately south of Fort-de-France and assault Fort Desaix, while the 501st is to seize Lamentin Airport north of the town. The 13th Marines—plus the 295th Infantry Regiment and 78th Combat Engineers—are to disembark on the eastern shores of the island at Le Robert.

While this training is still in progress, U.S. emissaries advise the French of their general intent in June. Disheartened by their isolation and the prospect of resisting an American invasion on behalf of a now thoroughly discredited Vichy regime, discipline collapses, and many defenders desert to the Free French cause—including the commanders of Martinique's colonial infantry regiment and artillery regiment, plus Robert's own second-in-command, Rear Adm. Robert Marie-Joseph Battet of the light cruiser Émile Bertin.

Undermined, Robert finally requests terms on June 30 and, by July 14, cedes his office to 52-year-old Henri Hoppenot. He then sails for Puerto Rico the next day to surrender along with his remaining staff and Vichy supporters.

JULY 21–22, 1943. Evacuation of Kiska. Having been advised that foggy weather will cover their approach, the 5,800-ton Japanese light cruisers Tama and Kiso under Rear Adm. Masatomi Kimura, as well as 10 destroyers and 3 auxiliaries, slip out of Paramushiro Island overnight to steam eastward and make their second attempt to stealthily remove Kiska's isolated 5,183-man garrison. Despite a collision that obliges 4 vessels to turn back, the remainder enter Kiska's dangerous roadstead of Trout Lagoon at 5:40 p.m. of July 29 in a brilliant feat of seamanship, reemerging 55 minutes later with the entire island's contingent aboard. They safely convey the garrison back to Paramushiro by August 1, without the Americans even learning of its removal.

AUGUST 15, 1943. After a prolonged aerial and naval bombardment, some 29,000 U.S. troops, plus 5,300 soldiers of the 13th Canadian Infantry Brigade under Brig. Gen. Harry Foster, disembark on the western coast of Kiska, only to find—after two days of “sweep and search”—that the Japanese have abandoned the island altogether.

For the remaining two years of World War II, the Allies mount enormous drives against the Axis powers in both Europe and Asia, culminating in the unconditional surrender of Germany on May 8, 1945, and Japan by August 15.

LATIN AMERICAN TROUBLES (1941–1989)

The massive mobilization of World War II transforms the United States into a global superpower, whose mastery over the Americas can no longer be challenged from overseas. Nevertheless, minor localized frictions persist throughout its sphere of influence, exacerbated by entrenched dictatorships, rural guerrilla campaigns, urban terrorism, and antigovernment coups—militarily insignificant events when compared to the nuclear strength now at Washington’s disposal, yet still capable of affecting geopolitical change.

JULY 5, 1941. Ecuadorian-Peruvian Border Conflict.

Boundary disputes more than a century old prompt Ecuador to seek to assert control over Tumbes, Jaén, Maynas, and most especially the recently seized town of Zarumilla on the eastern banks of the river of this same name, thereby gaining more direct access to the Amazonian headwaters. Peru counters, and an undeclared war erupts when a 13,000-man army known as the Agrupamiento del Norte or “Northern Group” under generals Eloy G. Ureta Montehermoso and Antonio Silva Santisteban—complete with armor, artillery, and air support—invades the Amazonian province of El Oro on July 5. It easily bests the 1,800 scattered Ecuadorian defenders, who are left unsupported by the surprised government in Quito.

Zarumilla is reconquered in a three-day battle fought by Ureta on July 23–25, after which a

Fascism

The name of this militant ideology comes from the Italian word fascio, which means “union” or “league.” The original term was derived from the Latin word fascis or fasces, a bundle or bundles of sticks tied around an ax. Early Roman woodsmen carried such loads back into their city. With time, they came to embody strength through unity, for while a single rod might easily be snapped, a bundle was difficult to break. Fasces therefore became symbols of authority, carried behind Roman magistrates.

Amid Europe’s social upheavals after World War I, Benito Mussolini founded a party called the Fasci di Combattimento in 1919. He rejected liberal democracy and international socialism, the two major trends that were vying to replace the discredited monarchy. Instead, Mussolini embraced a “Third Way”: one-party rule, but without the class warfare or removal of traditions advocated by communists or anarchists. His Fascisti formed bands of war veterans to battle their opponents. By late October 1922, they grew so prominent that King Victor Emmanuel III asked Mussolini to become premier.

Once in office, Mussolini quickly placed Fascist Party members in every position of power. His “Volunteer Militia for National Security” assumed paramilitary duties as of January 1923, and electoral laws were changed that June to make the Fascist grip permanent. Party and state became one. The police and courts were co-opted, along with the bureaucracy and army. Middle- and working-class voters went along because Mussolini promised a return to order and full employment. Wealthy industrialists and landowners were won over by legislative favors. Patriotic propaganda pointed to national greatness for all.

Such a total seizure of a state inspired many imitators in other troubled nations during the Great Depression of the 1930s. Some of the more notorious variants were Adolf Hitler’s Nazi Party in Germany, António de Oliveira Salazar’s Estado Novo or “New State” in Portugal, and Generalissimo Francisco Franco’s Falange Party in Spain. Each began as a right-wing militaristic movement that took over all state functions once in office. Authoritarian rule was imposed. Militarism and traditional mores were idealized, while the popular will was supposedly expressed through a single leader or elite.

There were many strains of fascism. The Portuguese model led Brazil’s President Getúlio Vargas to seize power when his four-year elected term was about to expire in 1937. Spanish-style regimes also emerged in Argentina, Paraguay, Chile, and so on. Even after the German, Italian, Hungarian, and Romanian parties were wiped out by World War II, fascism still retained an appeal among the most conservative segments of Latin American society. The military and the rich in particular saw it as a way of imposing order on their unstable republics and reviving traditional values against the inroads being made by foreign influences, such as communism or democracy.

paratroop drop results in the capture of Puerto Bolívar two days later, and a preliminary ceasefire goes into effect as of July 31. The Ecuadorians have suffered a total of 400–500 killed, as opposed to 107 among Peruvian ranks. General Silva has meanwhile also cleared the territory between Cónдор Range and the Putumayo River of Ecuadorians, and a formal armistice is signed at Piura by October. Subsequent peace negotiations at Rio de Janeiro end with the confirmation of Peruvian sovereignty over these 120,000 square miles of disputed territory on January 29, 1942, although Ecuador does retain access to the Amazon in the region of Quijos and San Miguel de Sucumbios.

OCTOBER 9, 1941. Panama's profascist, 40-year-old president, Dr. Arnulfo "El Hombre" Arias Madrid, while absent on a visit to Cuba, is deposed in a bloodless military coup—with Washington's tacit approval.

JUNE 3, 1943. In Argentina, military resentment against the civilian government of President Ramón S. Castillo has escalated after he calls for Gen. Pedro Pablo Ramírez's resignation as minister of war; he is to be replaced by the pro-British landowner Patrón Costas. Gen. Arturo Rawson Corvalán, cavalry commander at the "Campo de Mayo" military base outside Buenos Aires, is therefore contacted on June 3 about the possibility of launching a coup by members of a clique of nationalistic, pro-Axis army officers with totalitarian leanings known as the Grupo de Oficiales Unidos or "Group of United Officers" (GOU, initials that are sometimes represented as standing for Gobierno, Orden, Unidad or "Government, Order, Unity").

Rawson, who has already been contemplating just such a scheme, quickly agrees and leads 10,000 troops into the capital the next day—his 58th birthday—to proclaim himself as president. However, his choice of cabinet ministers alienates the GOU leadership, who force him to resign by June 7 in favor of General Ramírez, who establishes a permanent new administration by June 18. It is apparent, though, that the real power behind this new regime is the GOU, dominated by the 47-year-old colonel Juan Perón, who becomes private secretary to the minister of war, Gen. Edelmiro J. Farrell.

SEPTEMBER 1943. More than 70 Argentine newspapers are forced to suspend publication in retaliation for criticizing the country's military dictatorship.

DECEMBER 20, 1943. The dictatorial Bolivian president, Gen. Enrique Peñaranda, is overthrown in a well-planned revolution organized by his fascist rivals, the Movimiento Nacional Revolucionario or "National Revolutionary Movement" (MNR). Maj. Gualberto Villarroel replaces him, although real power is wielded by the bespectacled MNR political leader Víctor Paz Estensoro, who becomes finance minister. Argentina recognizes this new regime as of January 3, 1944, although the United States and other American countries refuse to do so until June 23 on the grounds that the MNR is pro-Axis and that Argentina has aided in its seizure of power.

JANUARY 26, 1944. Under pressure from Washington because of extensive fascist activities in Argentina, President Ramírez severs diplomatic relations with Nazi Germany and Japan.

FEBRUARY 24, 1944. In a swiftly executed coup, an inner clique of GOU officers oust General Ramírez as Argentina's president, fearing that he is about to declare war against the Axis powers. He is replaced by his vice president, General Farrell, yet real power continues to be wielded by Farrell's immediate subordinate, Perón, who is appointed war minister on May 4 and vice president as of July 8.

APRIL 2, 1944. After the subservient Salvadoran National Assembly has voted in February to once more extend the 13-year rule of President Hernández Martínez, dissent grows, culminating on April 2 (Palm Sunday) with an abortive rebellion led by Arturo Romero, Adolfo Marroquín, and Gen. Tito Calvo. Three aircraft strafe the police and National Guard headquarters in San Salvador, while rebel columns carry the barracks of the Infantry and 6th Machine-Gun regiments, Ilopango Air Base, and Santa Ana outside the capital. However, Martínez is able to hold on at El Zapote barracks and begins organizing a counteroffensive, so the rebellion soon loses strength. It is defeated when a rebel column approaching from Santa Ana retreats and blunders into an ambush at San Andrés.

Numerous arrests are consequently made on April 4, and executions ensue, although without fully quelling the country's simmering unrest. A student intervention on May 2 escalates into a general strike three days later, prompting the dictator to finally resign on May 9 and go into exile—after commenting that it is impossible to "shoot everybody." He is succeeded by Gen. Andrés Ignacio Menéndez.

JUNE 25, 1944. After a student strike in Guatemala City has mushroomed into a general strike, soldiers and policemen fire into a crowd, killing at least one woman demonstrator. The 65-year-old president Jorge Ubico Castañeda subsequently ends his 13-year reign by resigning as of July 1, being succeeded by a military triumvirate that provisionally installs his crony, Gen. Federico Ponce Vaides, into office.

OCTOBER 20, 1944. Dissident young Guatemalan military officers, joined by disgruntled workers and students, overthrow the administration of President Ponce. A triumvirate comprising the army captain Francisco Javier Arana, Maj. Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, and the civilian Jorge Toriello Garrido holds elections that result in Juan José Arévalo's installation into office as of March 15, 1945.

OCTOBER 21, 1944. Salvador's interim president, General Menéndez, is overthrown in a military uprising led by Col. Osmín Aguirre y Salinas, director of the National Police, who is temporarily sworn into office before hastily summoned legislative members in the Zapote barracks. However, the country's liberal political opposition coalesces around the former chief justice of the Salvador's Supreme Court, Miguel Tomás Molina, who establishes a government-in-exile in neighboring Honduras. This group refuses to participate in the election held on March 1, 1945, when Gen. Salvador Castañeda Castro is elected amid rigged balloting.

MARCH 27, 1945. To ingratiate his government with Washington, Argentina's President Farrell belatedly declares war against the Axis powers, now virtually annihilated in both Europe and Asia.

JULY 1945. Suspicious of the potential political threat posed by his country's Força Expedicionária Brasileira or FEB (see sidebar titled "Brazilian Expeditionary Force" in "World War II"), which is returning victorious from Europe, the dictatorial president Getúlio Vargas quickly disbands this battle-hardened army and disperses its officers—who subsequently gain considerable influence and become known as febianos.

OCTOBER 9, 1945. Amid concerns about Perón's growing populist following, a military faction led by Gen. Eduardo J. Ávalos and Adm. Héctor Vernengo Lima arrests the colonel, stripping him of his titles of Argentine vice president and war minister, while

Juan Perón

Juan Domingo Perón was born on October 8, 1895, in the town of Lobos, about 60 miles south of the national capital in the Province of Buenos Aires. His father was an employee of the local courts who moved the family to a remote farm near Santa Cruz, then to northern Chubut Province. Young Juan's parents did not marry, and his father abandoned them when Juan was five years old. Five years later, Juan was sent to live with his mother's sisters in Buenos Aires. He was enrolled in Argentina's Military College in 1910 and graduated six years later as a second lieutenant of infantry. He continued his postgraduate studies, writing and lecturing until 1929. Six feet tall, he was also very athletic, excelling at skiing and fencing. He married Aurelia Eugenia "Potota" Tizón in 1928, and they adopted a baby daughter.

In 1930, he took part as a captain in the coup that toppled President Yrigoyen. Perón then served as private secretary to the minister of war until 1935. He was promoted to lieutenant colonel and named as Argentina's military attaché to Chile in 1936; however, he was recalled after apparently failing in an attempt to set up a spy ring. Two years later, after his wife's death from cancer, he was sent as a member of a military delegation to Europe. Perón traveled widely through the fascist states of Italy, Germany, Hungary, Spain, and Portugal. The ravages left by Spain's civil war left a particular impact on him. He also was most impressed with Benito Mussolini's government and returned to Argentina in 1941 convinced that the Axis powers were winning World War II.

Upon returning home, Perón delivered a series of influential lectures on the state of hostilities in Europe. He was promoted to full colonel and given command of a mountain regiment in the Province of San Juan. He also became involved with a secretive "brotherhood" of junior officers known as the Grupo de Oficiales Unidos, who intended to affect national politics. Although Perón was not present at their meeting on the evening of June 2, 1943, his plan of attack was used to topple President Castillo two days later.

In the ensuing military regime, Perón took control of the minor department of labor. Through passage of scores of favorable laws, he won support from many unions representing millions of workers. When Perón was seized by rival officers on October 9, 1945, and sent as prisoner to Martín García Island, mass protests from this powerful base won his release eight days later. He then married the charismatic actress María Eva "Evita" Duarte on October 22 and won his first presidential election the next February. Despite being elected two more times and dominating Argentine politics for decades, Perón divided the nation and ruined its economy.

leaving President Farrell in power. Eight days later, Perón engineers a successful counter coup from his prison on Martín García Island, winning freedom through massive protest marches by his supporters in organized labor.

OCTOBER 18, 1945. In Venezuela, beleaguered president Isaías Medina Angarita orders the arrest of the 31-year-old leader of the revolutionary Unión Patriótica Militar or “Patriotic Military Union” (UPM), Marcos Pérez Jiménez. Instead, the president himself is deposed by a rapid UPM coup and succeeded the next day by a junta headed by Rómulo Betancourt of the “Democratic Action” Party, who sends Pérez Jiménez abroad on an extended diplomatic mission.

OCTOBER 29, 1945. In Rio de Janeiro, Brazilian motorized troops directed by the war minister, Gen. Pedro Aurélio de Góis Monteiro, and General Dutra mutiny and occupy the capital’s streets without opposition, bringing an end to the unpopular 15-year reign of President Vargas, who retires to his ranch in Rio Grande do Sul Province.

JANUARY 7, 1946. Thirteen students go on strike against the unpopular administration of Haiti’s President Elie Lescot. Four days later, he is deposed by a “Military Executive Committee” comprising Col. Frank Lavaud and majors Antoine Lévelt and Paul Eugène Magloire. The former president is expelled into exile on January 14.

FEBRUARY 24, 1946. Perón is elected president of Argentina, backed by the army and organized labor. He launches an ultranationalistic program of reforms.

Also this same evening, some 30 soldiers on leave from the 140-man company of Tirailleurs Sénégalais, who have long garrisoned Cayenne (French Guiana), run riot through various dance halls, venting their frustration against the Creole citizenry, who openly despise them. Matters worsen on Monday, February 25, when more troops sally from their barracks after morning parade and again fall upon the populace, leaving 9 dead and more than 100 wounded amid widespread destruction. Many terrified residents flee for protection to the American air base at Rochambeau Field, but Gov. Jules Surlemont defuses the crisis this same afternoon by ordering all Senegalese troops to board the steamer Saint-Domingue and set sail for Dakar via Martinique.

JULY 21, 1946. In Bolivia, its MNR officeholders (see “December 20, 1943” entry) are swept from power by a counterrevolution, President Villarroel being hanged from a lamppost in La Paz, while Paz Estensoro flees into exile in Argentina.

DECEMBER 11, 1947. Anti-American riots erupt in Panama, the citizens being incensed by Washington’s plans to extend the lease arrangement for numerous bases used during World War II. Eleven days later, President Enrique A. Jiménez is obliged to reject this deal amid great public clamor.

FEBRUARY 8, 1948. After a heated electoral campaign marred by street fighting, charges of corruption, and a 15-day general strike, Costa Rica’s governing Partido Nacional Republicano’s (PNR) candidate, Rafael Ángel Calderón Guardia, is defeated by opposition leader Otilio Ulate Blanco. Outgoing president Teodoro Picado Michalski refuses to honor these results, having them annulled by the National Congress and calling out the 340-man Costa Rican army in his support. Ulate flees to Guatemala, but his supporters threaten rebellion.

Spectators viewing the bullet-riddled body of Bolivian president Gualberto Villarroel, dangling from a lamppost in La Paz. (Clendenen Papers, Hoover Institution)

Cold War

The United States and Soviet Union emerged triumphant from World War II in 1945, their societies and economies mobilized on a massive scale. Their mutual Axis enemies were crushed, Europe and the Far East lay devastated, and the last imperial overseas colonies were about to fall. With all external pressures removed, both superpowers moved into this global void to begin a protracted, yet bloodless, geopolitical competition. Over the next 45 years, each tried to extend its influence into every corner of the world.

This bitter rivalry started early, when President Harry S. Truman—wary of the expansionism inherent in Marxist dogma—tried to contain the Soviet Union's moves beyond its borders. One such counter was his Marshall Plan, which generously financed the rebuilding of Western Europe for humanitarian reasons, as well as to minimize the Left's political appeal among throngs of unemployed and impoverished citizens. The term "Cold War" was applied to this unique struggle as of September 1947, taken from the works of George Orwell by the American journalist Walter Lippman for a series of newspaper articles and a book that he would publish.

The contest proved to be broad and long lasting. It came to feature an arms race, trade rivalries, propaganda exchanges, military alliances, proxy wars, espionage, even athletics. Fortunately, direct armed confrontation between the two nuclear powers was avoided. The Americans championed democracy and free-market principles, while the Soviets upheld communist rule and state-run economies. Finally, the wealth and productivity of the United States could not be matched by the Soviet Union. When President Ronald Reagan initiated a large military buildup, the Soviet Union collapsed, and the Cold War ended.

MARCH 12, 1948. Costa Rican Civil War. Col. José "Don Pepe" Figueres Ferrer, leader of Costa Rica's Social Democratic Party, rises in revolt against Picado and Calderón's PNR government. In a month's time, his "Caribbean Legion" defeats the small Costa Rican Army in a campaign that claims 1,600 lives. By April 20, a truce is arranged, and Santos León Herrera is proclaimed interim president until Ulate can return from exile in Guatemala. Picado and Calderón flee into Nicaragua, and on March 28, Figueres's troops enter the capital of San José in triumph to greet Ulate upon his return.

(When a new constitution is drafted the next year, the Costa Rican Army is abolished because of its recent antidemocratic stance, being replaced by an all-volunteer Civil Guard.)

APRIL 9, 1948. "Bogotazo." At 1:05 p.m. in Bogotá, the populist Liberal leader and presidential candidate Jorge Eliécer Gaitán is killed while leaving for lunch by a lone assassin. Although decades of turmoil have inured Colombians to political violence in rural areas—La Violencia having claimed almost 14,000 lives the previous year alone—this brazen murder unleashes a torrent of pent-up wrath against the administration of Conservative president Mariano Ospina Pérez, who is inaugurating an agricultural fair as host of the Ninth Pan American Conference. (Prominent international guests include U.S. secretary of state George Marshall, U.S. secretary of commerce Averell Harriman, Venezuelan president Rómulo Betancourt, and a youthful Fidel Castro.)

The assassin is beaten to death by a mob, then his body is cast before the presidential palace as a rebuke. Shots ring out, and 80 soldiers of the Presidential Guard under Lt. Silvio Carvajal clear the street, eventually opening fire into the increasingly frenzied crowds in adjacent Plaza de Bolívar. A widespread orgy of vandalism ensues, with government ministries and churches throughout the city center being gutted and burned and many stores looted, as authorities hesitate to call out the 800-man garrison because of fears regarding their loyalty. Eventually, rain sets in and some measure of calm returns the next day, losses being calculated at 1,000 dead and 2,500 injured, with more than 100 buildings destroyed in the capital's core.

Inflamed by reports about this outburst—dubbed the Bogotazo—Conservative reactionaries subsequently escalate their campaign of violence in the countryside, claiming another 43,000 lives this same year.

OCTOBER 3, 1948. In Callao (Peru), young naval seamen and civilian adherents of the leftist Aprista Party revolt against President José Luis Bustamante y Rivero, storming the garrison in Fort Real Felipe without success. The rebels are quickly crushed by loyal units under the 48-year-old general Zenón Noriega Agüero, and the radical movement is banned.

OCTOBER 27, 1948. Peru's "Restorative Revolution." Amid widespread social discontent and economic difficulties, the garrison at Arequipa rises up against President Bustamante, proclaiming 50-year-old brigadier general Manuel A. Odría Amoretti to fill his place. When General Noriega, commander of the troops at the capital of Lima, refuses to obey the president and march upon Arequipa, Bustamante realizes that all is lost. He withdraws from the National Palace two days later, and a junta provisionally assumes power, stamping out leftist Aprista sentiment.

NOVEMBER 24, 1948. After less than a year in office, Venezuela's 64-year-old novelist president Rómulo Gallegos Freire is overthrown by a bloodless military coup engineered by 34-year-old colonel Marcos Pérez Jiménez; Freire flees first to Cuba and then on to Mexico. The ruling Acción Democrática and numerous other Venezuelan parties are subsequently banned, being replaced by a three-man junta, which Pérez Jiménez comes to control after his colleague, Lt. Col. Carlos Delgado Chalbaud, is murdered on November 13, 1950. Through manipulation or blatant fraud, Pérez Jiménez is able to rule directly as president for almost six years, from 1952 onward, during which Venezuela's oil wealth assures considerable national prosperity.

DECEMBER 13, 1948. When the Salvadoran president Castañeda Castro obtains an extension from his obeisant legislature to remain in office another two years, he is deposed the next morning by a military uprising led by moderate army officers under Col. Manuel de Jesús Córdova. Government administration passes into the hands of a junta comprising three officers and two civilians, Lt. Col. Oscar Osorio emerging as leader by January 5, 1948. The latter eventually resigns so as to be elected president himself in late March 1950.

APRIL 2, 1949. In the Costa Rican capital of San José, War Minister Edgar Cardona Quirós seizes the armory, seconded by Fernando Figuls at the Bella Vista Barracks, in an unsuccessful coup attempt.

JULY 1949. In the highly charged atmosphere immediately prior to Guatemala's presidential elections, Defense Minister Jacobo Arbenz attempts to arrest Francisco Arana—commander in chief of its army and an openly avowed rival candidate—on charges of allegedly plotting a military coup. When the latter resists, he is killed, prompting a series of uprisings by Arana supporters that are suppressed by the government. Upon the collapse of the last of these revolts, led by Col. Carlos Castillo Armas, Arbenz emerges as Guatemala's new president.

AUGUST–SEPTEMBER 1949. Bolivia is wracked by factional fighting.

NOVEMBER 20, 1949. When Panama's President Daniel Chanís attempts to remove the corrupt colonel José Antonio "Chichi" Remón as head of the National Guard, he is instead deposed and replaced in office by Remón's cousin, Roberto Chiari. Within a week, however, the latter is also pushed aside and succeeded by the nationalistic ex-president Arnulfo Arias.

JULY 28, 1950. Peruvian troops in the main square of Arequipa open fire upon a protest march against the policies of President Odría, led by striking students of the Colegio Independencia, killing many.

MAY 7, 1951. In Panama, President Arnulfo Arias dissolves the National Assembly, arrests over 120 political opponents, and assumes dictatorial powers. These actions provoke a general strike and disapproval from Washington, leaving Arias isolated. On the afternoon of May 10, Colonel Remón's police force storms the presidential palace, capturing the strongman. Before surrendering, Arias shoots the commander of his palace guard; he is subsequently stripped of office two weeks later, being succeeded by interim president Alcibiades Arosemena.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1951. Perón easily stifles a military coup planned by the retired general Benjamín Menéndez, a few months prior to Argentina's presidential election, during which Perón is reelected with a large majority. (Because of army disapproval, though, he removes his wife, Evita's, name from his vice presidential slate; she will die of cancer the next year.)

MARCH 10, 1952. Conservative elements in Cuba, disaffected with the government of leftist president Carlos Prío Socarras, throw their support behind the former army chief of staff and ex-president, Gen. Fulgencio Batista, who is running a distant third in polls for the upcoming elections. Batista therefore seizes power through a bloodless military coup, suspends the constitution, and installs a repressive regime. Washington will recognize his government 17 days later. Nonetheless, resistance to this unscrupulous dictator will quickly spring up throughout the Cuban countryside.

Korean War

When Imperial Japan was defeated in August 1945, American and Soviet officials agreed to share responsibility for the Korean Peninsula. U.S. forces were to receive the surrender of Japanese occupiers below latitude 38° N, and Soviet forces, above it. Afterward, Korea was to be left on its own. But ideological rivalry between the two superpowers spoiled this arrangement. The Soviets brought a guerrilla hero named Kim Il Sung back from exile and helped him install a communist regime over the North's 9 million people by December. The United States, in turn, gave economic and logistical support to the 16 million people of the South.

Washington tried to end this impasse by going before the United Nations (UN) in 1947. Elections in the South resulted in Syngman Rhee being named "president of Korea" on August 15, 1948. The North replied three weeks later by creating a rival "Democratic People's Republic." The Soviet Union and its satellites recognized Kim's government and withdrew their troops from the North by year's end. All but 500 American advisers also departed by June 30, 1949, having raised a 65,000-man South Korean Army. Tension simmered between both halves until the South held a second round of elections in May 1950. The North angrily demanded new elections for a joint Korean legislature.

When the South refused, a full-scale attack burst across the 38th Parallel on June 25, 1950. The 135,000 well-equipped North Koreans overran the South's capital of Seoul within four days, hoping to finish off all resistance before the United States could react. Despite being surprised, Washington that same day obtained a UN Security Council resolution that condemned the invasion. Because of the Soviet ambassador's boycott, President Harry S. Truman also won a UN vote two days later that called for military aid. Fifteen member nations eventually contributed troops to a very large American contingent, led from Japan by Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur.

The first American division to arrive in early July 1950 could not stem the North Korean onslaught. Within a month, U.S. and South Korean forces were huddled in a defensive corner around the city of Pusan. However, the North Koreans could not fight across the Nakdong River while American air strikes destroyed their supply lines. MacArthur built up his strength and then landed almost 80,000 soldiers on September 15 at Inchon, behind North Korean lines. The invaders fell apart, only 25,000–30,000 regaining North Korea.

However, when UN forces pushed past the 38th Parallel and seized the northern capital of Pyongyang by October 19, 1950, Communist China intervened. Six days later, the first clashes occurred against 270,000 Chinese troops. American forces reeled south, and Seoul again fell to the communists by January 4, 1951. Because the Chinese had outrun their supply lines, however, Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway was able to slowly press them back by mid-March. Seesaw fighting persisted around the 38th Parallel until an uneasy truce was finally signed on July 27, 1953.

APRIL 6, 1952. Bolivian Revolution. The national police commander at La Paz, Gen. Antonio Seleme Vargas, is discovered to be secretly plotting with MNR adherents—whose party has been denied victory in the 1951 presidential elections—to topple the illegal dictatorship of Gen. Hugo Ballivián Rojas and nine other junta members. Seleme is consequently dismissed, yet not detained, so that still faced with a threat, Gen. Humberto Torres Ortiz must depart the city to raise an army of troops in support of the junta.

During his absence, the moderate MNR vice presidential candidate, Hernán Siles Zuazo, orders Seleme and his subordinate police chief, Donato Millán, to seize control of La Paz on April 9 with their 2,000 men, thereby inaugurating the revolt. Upon examining the contents of the arsenal, though, the insurgents find it to be empty, so that a despondent Seleme and Millán seek sanctuary within the Chilean Embassy.

However, armed worker militias then arrive in the capital from Oruro under the radical union leader Juan Oquendo Lechín, and offer effective resistance against Torres, who is approaching with 8,000 men. Many of the raw conscripts in his hastily-raised army, though, refuse to fight against the citizenry, so switch allegiances or desert. The troops who remain loyal to the junta are therefore defeated in a two-day series of bloody street clashes that leave some 500–600 people dead.

A provisional government is subsequently formed to pave the way for Paz Estensoro's return from exile in Argentina by April 16. He and Siles will reluctantly enact many measures over the next few months demanded by their more radical followers, especially Oquendo's miner union. Bolivia's army is virtually dissolved, the tin industry is nationalized, and other reforms are attempted—notwithstanding severe economic and social dislocations.

Bolivia's restored president Paz Estenssoro posing with MNR miner militiamen. (Organization of American States)

OCTOBER 23, 1952. Bolivia's new MNR government creates four concentration camps named Corocoro, Uncía, Catavi, and Curahuara de Carangas, where political opponents are to be held without trial, often in deplorable conditions.

JUNE 13, 1953. In Colombia, the 53-year-old head of its armed forces—the well-connected general and military engineer Gustavo Rojas Pinilla—topples the regime of conservative president Laureano Gómez in a coup d'état. Initially, Rojas Pinilla receives enthusiastic popular support. When he offers a general amnesty to the nation's thousands of rural rebels, many accept, and widespread peace ensues. The hated National Police force is absorbed into the military, political prisoners are released, press censorship is eased, the tax system is reformed, and expensive public projects are undertaken.

Disillusionment soon sets in, though, so that rural violence resumes by year's end. The new president resorts to increasingly repressive methods, while his fiscal policies will prove to be ruinous and his family and cronies become embroiled in corrupt schemes, eventually resulting in his own deposal four years later.

JULY 26, 1953. At dawn, the ex-University of Havana law student and political agitator Fidel Castro Ruz enters the city of Santiago de Cuba with a disguised convoy of cars, hoping to surprise its 1,000-man garrison under Col. Alberto del Río Chaviano while it is recuperating inside Moncada Barracks from the Carnival celebrations of the previous night. This assault is defeated, however, after an hour-long firefight during which 19 troops and 3 rebels are killed. The outraged soldiery subsequently hunt down, torture, and execute approximately 80 rebels and sympathizers over the next several days, until a delegation of city notables—including Santiago's bishop, university rector, a judge, and the wealthy department-store owner Enrique Canto—appeal to Batista to halt such brutal measures.

Castro is caught on August 1 while sleeping in a hut in the woods of Gran Piedad Mountain, along with a few other rebels, and taken to the Boniato jail. He will be tried that October and sentenced to 15 years' incarceration on Isla de Pinos, but a groundswell of public sentiment allows him to be amnestied by mid-May 1955. He goes into exile in Mexico on June 24, to begin plotting another coup.

MARCH 1954. Convinced Arbenz's Guatemalan administration is a socialist front, Washington persuades the Organization of American States, meeting in Caracas, to authorize mutual defense against "Communist aggression" in the Americas—in effect, gaining free rein to topple this government.

MAY 15, 1954. Learning that a 2,000-ton shipment of Czechoslovakian arms has reached the Arbenz government at Puerto Barrios (Guatemala) aboard the Swedish ship Alfhem, Washington increases its own supplies to a CIA-backed counterrevolutionary group under the exiled Castillo Armas and Gen. Miguel Ydígoras Fuentes, operating out of neighboring Honduras. Arbenz responds by declaring a state of siege within Guatemala in early June, arresting numerous conservative sympathizers.

JUNE 18, 1954. Guatemalan Coup. The exiled counterrevolutionary leader Castillo Armas invades Guatemala from Honduras with 160 men, backed by CIA-provided aircraft. Only the border town of Esquipulas is actually occupied, yet aerial bombardments of pro-Arbenz concentrations in the capital and other Guatemalan cities sap the regime's resolve. Isolated diplomatically, and with many army officers defecting to the opposition, Arbenz resigns on June 27. Castillo Armas thereupon enters Guatemala City aboard a U.S. embassy plane and is installed as president by July 8. Some 9,000 Guatemalans subsequently flee into exile or are imprisoned, while 8,000 peasants are killed in retribution for their reformist demands.

JULY 14, 1954. To legally be able to run in Cuba's forthcoming presidential elections, the dictator Batista temporarily turns power over to the placeholder, Dr. Andrés Domingo Morales del Castillo.

AUGUST 5, 1954. On Toneleros Street in Copacabana, Brazilian newspaperman Carlos Lacerda is wounded and air force major Rubem Florentino Vaz is murdered by shots fired from a passing car. An investigation reveals that this crime has been instigated by Gregório Fortunato, chief of Getúlio Vargas's presidential guard; the public, therefore, demands this leader's resignation.

AUGUST 23, 1954. Under universal opprobrium, Brazil's President Vargas offers to temporarily step aside, but when this proposal is deemed insufficient, he commits suicide the next morning. He is succeeded in office by his vice president, João Café Filho, who schedules elections for October 1955.

JANUARY 1955. Supporters of the exiled leader Calderón Guardia (see "March 12, 1948" entry) invade the northern provinces of Costa Rica from neighboring Nicaragua, with the backing of dictators Anastasio Somoza García and Rafael Leónidas Trujillo Molina of the Dominican Republic.

At first, this invasion makes good progress, occupying Ciudad Quesada. However, President Figueres quickly mobilizes 16,000 Costa Ricans and secures the support of both Washington and the Organization of American States. Ciudad Quesada is soon retaken, and the invaders are driven back into Nicaragua.

JANUARY 2, 1955. Panama's President José Antonio Remón is assassinated by two machine gunners while attending horse races outside his capital. The killers are never convicted.

Central Intelligence Agency

Prior to World War II, the United States had no intelligence service. The U.S. Army and Navy maintained small units for tactical matters, nothing more. After the devastating surprise attack on Pearl Harbor, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed William J. "Wild Bill" Donovan to create a full-fledged organization that became known as the Office of Strategic Services (OSS). With help from Canada's William Stephenson and the head of Britain's MI6, Stewart Menzies, Donovan built up a network that eventually employed 16,000 agents and resistance fighters in occupied Europe.

After the war ended, President Harry S. Truman was persuaded to dissolve the OSS in October 1945. Some functions were turned over to the U.S. State or War departments. Yet only three months later, Donovan convinced Truman to authorize a new postwar organization to keep the U.S. government better informed about global threats. In theory, such an agency was to gather and evaluate foreign-obtained data, which could be passed on to the relevant departments. Despite opposition from the Pentagon, State Department, and FBI, this "Central Intelligence Group" was formed by January 1946.

Soviet aggression overseas greatly spurred its growth, so the CIA was formally constituted by the National Security Act of September 18, 1947. Early operations in Eastern Europe proved disappointing, although some successes were made in containing communist infiltration into France, Italy, and Greece. The agency's original intelligence-gathering role was expanded to counter Soviet funding, weaponry, and covert operations. It was later revealed that, to achieve its ends, the CIA entered into deals with ex-Nazis and other unsavory right-wing extremists.

Once the Iron Curtain descended over Europe, leaving both sides entrenched on each side, the rivalry began to shift into the developing world. Amid the CIA's other legitimate surveillance and information-gathering missions, its Directorate of Plans also was charged with carrying out covert "black operations." They included the removal of unfriendly foreign leaders by "executive action." In 1953, a CIA operation run out of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran by Brig. Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf Sr. and Kermit Roosevelt Jr. overthrew the government of Iran. The next year, the same was done in Guatemala. It was also achieved in the Congo in 1960 and was attempted against Cuba two years later.

APRIL 14, 1955. Failed Argentine Coup. With the economy sliding toward collapse because of President Perón's ruinous policies in favor of his union supporters, relations between his faltering government and the Catholic Church also worsen when all religious teaching is suspended. One month later, ecclesiastical institutions furthermore lose their tax-exempt status when a constitutional amendment officially separates church and state as of May 20. This move so antagonizes conservative sensibilities that rightist elements within the armed forces start plotting a coup. The traditional Corpus Christi procession in Buenos Aires on Saturday, June 11, turns into an anti-Perón demonstration, to which his loyal unionists respond by attacking the cathedral the next day, 19 priests and 400 communicants being arrested after a series of scuffles. Monseigneur Manuel Tato, auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires, is expelled.

Conservative elements within the navy finally move against Perón at 10:00 a.m. on Thursday, June 16, when Rear Adm. Aníbal Olivieri authorizes 22 AT-6 North American and 5 AT-11 Beechcraft warplanes to take off from Punta Indio Naval Air Base, east of the capital, to bomb the presidential palace in Buenos Aires—known as the Casa Rosada or “Pink House” because of its distinctive coloring. This bombing is to precede a direct assault by a marine contingent. However, when these planes land one and a half hour later at Ezeiza to refuel, Perón is warned by telephone so seeks refuge in the War Ministry's basement. A pair of heavy Colt machine guns are mounted atop the presidential palace at 12:10 p.m. to act as an antiaircraft battery, while the armored Grenadier Regiment moves swiftly from Palermo to his relief.

A half hour later, the first rebel warplanes roar out of the west, having circled out over the River Plate. Some of their bombs strike the Casa Rosada, but strays wreak havoc among the unwary civilian crowds enjoying their lunchtime break in adjoining Colón Park and Plaza de Mayo. At 1:00 p.m., the first tanks of the Grenadier Regiment enter the plaza along Rivadavia Avenue, exchanging gunfire and checking the 150 marines who are preparing to storm the presidential palace. The latter are slowly pressed back into the Naval Ministry, more than a block away on Madero Avenue. A second aerial bombardment and strafing occur at 3:00 p.m. by four rebel Gloucester Meteor jets and three Catalina flying boats from Espora Naval Air Base and inflict numerous casualties among union militants, who have rallied to Perón's assistance. Civilian casualties are eventually calculated at 364 dead and more than 800 wounded.

This abortive coup ends when the outgunned defenders within the Naval Ministry surrender at 5:50 p.m. to loyal general Juan José Valle. A triumphant Perón thereupon addresses a throng of his most ardent labor supporters, who set fire to the Cathedral and nine other churches overnight in retaliation, for which actions the Vatican excommunicates the Argentine president. A further 800 rebels are arrested over the next few days, and both the Marine Regiment and the Naval Air Force are dissolved, before martial law can eventually be lifted on June 29.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1955. Perón's Fall. With opposition to his rule multiplying on every side, despite repeated attempts at reconciliation and even his proffered resignation, Perón reintroduces martial law to the Federal District containing Argentina's capital. Two weeks later, early on the Friday morning of September 16, a military revolt is launched at Córdoba in the interior of the country, quickly spreading to the garrisons at Curuzú-Cuatíá, Corrientes, Río Santiago, and Puerto Belgrano. This rebellion prompts the president to resign unconditionally to his army minister, Gen. Franklin Lucero, three days later and flee into exile aboard a Paraguayan gunboat anchored at Puerto Nuevo off Buenos Aires. By September 23, the 59-year-old retired major general Eduardo Lonardi arrives to be installed into office as provisional president, with Rear Adm. Isaac Francisco Rojas as his vice president.

NOVEMBER 11, 1955. In the uncertain atmosphere following the hotly contested Brazilian electoral results and President Café Filho's mild heart attack of three days earlier, War Minister Henrique Duffles Teixeira Lott leads a dawn coup by 25,000 troops that drives Acting President Carlos Luz, the intransigent opposition colonel Jurandir Bizarria Mamede, congressman and journalist Carlos Lacerda, plus several other cabinet ministers aboard the 1,100-man, 10,000-ton light cruiser Tamandaré (former USS St. Louis) of Adm. Silvio Heck and Capt. Paulo Antônio Telles Bardy. This vessel sails out of Rio de Janeiro's harbor under fire from Forts Laje and Santa Cruz, yet emerges unscathed, its occupants hoping to gain Santos and organize a resistance with the help of that city's marine garrison under Brig. Gen. Eduardo Gomes.

However, swift action by General Lott detaches a contingent to seize control of Santos, obliging

*Brazilian troops of the 4th Quitaúna Regiment seizing control outside the city of Santos to impede support for President Luz.
(Author's Collection)*

Luz to return into Rio two days later and surrender. Lott then pressures the president of Brazil's Senate, Nereu Ramos, to declare a state of martial law until the president-elect, Juscelino Kubitshek, is installed into office on January 1, 1956.

NOVEMBER 13, 1955. Because of his tolerant attitude toward former Peronista supporters and his appointment of ultranationalistic Catholic ministers to his cabinet, Lonardi is ousted as Argentina's interim president, being replaced by the 50-year-old general Pedro Eugenio Aramburu Clivet. A purge commences of all vestiges of Perón's discredited rule, his wife, Evita's, remains even being removed from the Confederación General del Trabajo (General Confederation of Labor, CGT) union headquarters and hidden from public view at the Vatican for years.

JUNE 9, 1956. In Argentina, General Valle mounts a revolt against the government of President Aramburu, being quickly defeated without bloodshed the next day and executed on June 12 by firing squad at the National Penitentiary in Buenos Aires, along with 32 of his followers.

JULY 1956. Because of his growing unpopularity, President Julio Lozano Díaz of Honduras deports his Liberal Party opponent, the populist Tegucigalpa physician Dr. Ramón Villeda Morales. The next month, the president must also crush an uprising by 400 troops in the capital.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1956. While attending the National Liberal Convention in León to celebrate his renomination as president of Nicaragua, the dictator Somoza is shot at an evening banquet in Casa del Obrero Hall by the fanatical, 27-year-old poet Rigoberto López Pérez, dying eight days later in Panama. He is immediately succeeded in office by his eldest son Luis Somoza, head of the National Guard, while his younger son Anastasio Somoza Debayle assumes command over this latter force and inaugurates a brutal reprisal campaign against all perceived political opponents.

OCTOBER 21, 1956. Despite claiming to have won reelection in a blatantly rigged electoral process, President Lozano Díaz of Honduras is ousted in a coup led by the air force commander, Gen. Héctor Caraccioli; the commandant of the Military Academy, Gen. Roque Rodríguez; and the son of a former president, Maj. Roberto Gálvez Barnes.

NOVEMBER 30, 1956. Castro's Guerrilla Campaign. As part of the anti-Batista agitation in Cuba, some 300 uniformed rebels under Frank País—wearing the red-and-black armbands of the “26 of July Movement”—capture Santiago’s police headquarters, customs house, and other official buildings during a dawn raid, only to melt away and repeat this tactic the next day, bringing civic life for the 189,000 inhabitants to a virtual standstill. On December 2, Castro furthermore returns from exile, having sailed from Tuxpan (Mexico) aboard the yacht Granma with 82 adherents. He disembarks at Las Coloradas Beach near Belic and marches up into the Sierra Maestra to inaugurate a guerrilla campaign aimed at toppling the regime.

Batista responds by airlifting 280 soldiers under Col. Pedro Barrera into Santiago, and Castro is lucky to survive a chance encounter with an army patrol on December 5, 1956, escaping deeper into the highlands with less than 20 survivors. Despite this inauspicious start, he gradually gains 500 more adherents in the mountains and mounts effective hit-and-run raids that erode governmental control over the next several months.

MAY 1957. In Honduras, conservative Col. Armando Velásquez Cerrato attempts a coup against the reform-minded military junta, only to be defeated and driven to seek sanctuary in the Guatemalan Embassy.

EARLY 1958. Castro opens a second guerrilla front in the Escambray Mountains, in Cuba’s Las Villas Province.

JANUARY 23, 1958. In Venezuela, the corrupt and repressive dictator Pérez Jiménez is deposed amid public rioting by a coup organized by Rear Adm. Wolfgang Larrazábal and fellow military officers; Pérez Jiménez is allowed to flee into exile in Miami (Florida). Larrazábal runs for president in the subsequent elections but loses to Rómulo Betancourt, inaugurating a period of peaceful political transitions for this nation.

Five years later, Pérez Jiménez is extradited from the United States to stand trial in Caracas for having enriched himself to the tune of almost $200 million while in power, being convicted in 1968, then exiled once more—this time to Spain.

MARCH 1958. Washington suspends its aid shipments to Batista’s Cuba because of his administration’s human-rights violations.

APRIL 1958. A general strike throughout Cuba fails to topple Batista.

MAY 1958. Batista launches a military offensive against Castro’s guerrillas, which fails to defeat them, then peters out two months later.

MAY 1, 1958. A Chilean warship installs a navigational light on Snipe Islet between uninhabited Navarino and Picton islands in the bleak expanse of waters south of Tierra del Fuego at the very bottom of South America, islands that are also claimed by Argentina. Nine days later, the Argentine fleet tug Guarani—on orders from Adm. Gastón A. Clement—destroys this lantern with gunfire and replaces it with an Argentine light. When a Chilean work party restores the Chilean lantern on May 14, they are observed by a distant trio of Argentine warships, who do not intervene.

However, Clement himself appears on August 9 with the 2,000-ton, British-built destroyer San Juan, destroying the Chilean lantern once more and, furthermore, setting 80 Argentine marines ashore to hold Snipe Islet. A brisk diplomatic exchange ensues between both capitals, while Chilean patrol vessels hover nearby, until both governments agree to refrain from installing any more lights, and the Argentine garrison is withdrawn by August 19.

AUGUST 1958. Batista’s army having become thoroughly demoralized, Castro launches a two-pronged offensive into central Cuba: one guerrilla column out of the west under his subordinate Camilo Cienfuegos, while out of the east comes the column of the ex-Argentine medical doctor Ernesto (“Ché”) Guevara de la Serna.

DECEMBER 28, 1958. Guevara’s guerrilla column captures Santa Clara, capital of Cuba’s Las Villas Province.

DECEMBER 31, 1958–JANUARY 1, 1959. Overnight, Batista flees Cuba into exile, and the next morning a temporary junta offers the government to Castro.

JANUARY 8, 1959. Castro’s victorious guerrillas enter Havana, and shortly thereafter, Manuel Urrutia Lleó is proclaimed interim president.

APRIL 1959. Panama’s National Guard defeats an inept disembarkation of 80 Cuban guerrillas led by the wealthy playboy Roberto Arias (husband of British ballerina Margot Fonteyn), apparently intent upon spreading the revolutionary cause. After Arias seeks sanctuary within the Brazilian Embassy, Castro angrily denounces this unauthorized operation as an attempt to bring Cuba into conflict with the United States.

MAY 31, 1959. Sixty exiled Nicaraguan conservatives led by Pedro Joaquín Chamorro Cardenal and Dr. Enrique Lacayo Farfán land at an airstrip at Mollejones, being joined the next day by 40 more followers who disembark at nearby Olama, in the hope of fomenting a popular insurrection against the Somoza regime. Instead, a series of military blunders compels them to surrender to the National Guard two weeks later. As most spring from the privileged classes, they are amnestied within a year or so.

JULY 1959. Dominican exiles, backed by Cuban supporters, attempt to topple the dictator Trujillo, only to be easily defeated.

JULY 12, 1959. In Honduras, reactionary colonel Velásquez Cerrato launches his second coup attempt against the government, his National Police adherents inflicting many casualties in Tegucigalpa while fighting against civilian volunteers rushing to support President Villeda. Loyal troops finally intervene and allow Velásquez to escape.

Within one week, the president disbands the disloyal National Police and replaces it with a “Civil Guard,” which, unlike the army, will operate directly under his control.

JULY 16, 1959. Urrutia is deposed as Cuban president by Castro in favor of Osvaldo Dorticós Torrado, and a series of increasingly radical measures begin to be imposed: Batista loyalists are incarcerated or executed, both domestic- and foreign-owned properties are confiscated, collectives are formed, and so on. Real power still rests with Castro—now head of the armed forces—while thousands of fearful residents flee into exile.

NOVEMBER 3, 1959. During Panama’s Independence Day celebrations, 120 people are injured in anti-American riots, eventually being quelled by Panamanian National Guardsmen and U.S. troops.

MARCH 4, 1960. At 3:10 p.m., as 76 tons of Belgian munitions are being offloaded from the 4,300-ton hired French merchantman La Coubre directly at Havana’s Tallapiedra dock, an explosion occurs. A half hour later, as hundreds of rescuers tend to survivors, another blast kills even more people. The final toll is at least 75 dead and 200 injured, with some estimates ranging much higher.

The Cuban government accuses the CIA of perpetrating an act of sabotage through their agent William Alexander Morgan; the Americans, in turn, attribute this calamity to Raúl Castro, minister of the Revolutionary Armed Forces, who has overridden the usual safety procedure of unloading munition ships far out in the harbor, then lightering their cargo ashore piecemeal.

MARCH 17, 1960. Concerned by the increasingly leftist bent of Castro’s policies—nationalization of all private and public Cuban businesses, sweeping agrarian seizures, drive toward one-party rule, and so on—the administration of U.S. president Dwight D. Eisenhower authorizes a CIA plan to topple this nascent communist regime. A rival “government-in-exile” is to be created in Florida; propaganda is to be directed into Cuba to foment unrest and opposition; and a small paramilitary force of exiles is to be recruited and covertly trained in Guatemala to conduct guerrilla warfare—all “in such a manner as to avoid the appearance of U.S. intervention.”

MAY 1960. An advance party of CIA operatives and 32 Cuban exiles arrives in Guatemala to begin creating a remote training camp code-named “Trax” on the wealthy Roberto Alejos’s “La Helvetia” coffee plantation, in the jungle foothills between Quetzaltenango and Retalhuleu.

AUGUST 25, 1960. Salvadoran students go on strike against their country’s entrenched and corrupt administration under President Lemus, prompting the government to declare a state of siege 11 days later.

SEPTEMBER 1960. Almost 1,500 Cuban exile recruits begin arriving in Guatemala from southern Florida to covertly train to spearhead a full-bore invasion of their homeland; they are trucked from San José to the remote “Trax” base. Two weeks later, an airfield code-named “Madd” or “Rayo” is also opened near Retalhuleu for exile pilots to train aboard a score of World War II-vintage, B-26B Martin-Douglas Marauder medium bombers (also known as A-26B Invaders), temporarily inscribed with false Guatemalan Air Force insignia.

CIA transports line the airfield at Retalhuleu, 1960; the Cuban exiles' "Triax" training camp is in the distant foothills. (U.S. Central Intelligence Agency)

On September 7, while training high up in the mountains, a 22-year-old recruit named Carlos Rodríguez Santana falls to his death. As his serial number is 2506, the entire unit adopts the regimental name of Brigada 2506 in honor of their first fatality.

OCTOBER 26, 1960. A group of junior Salvadoran officers, backed by broad popular support, overthrows the government of Lemus and temporarily replaces it with a junta of three officers and three civilians.

OCTOBER 31, 1960. In a session before the United Nations General Assembly, Cuba's Foreign Minister Raúl Roa García complains for a second time of the U.S. government's recruitment and training of an army of "mercenaries and counter revolutionaries," providing many details as to their activities and intentions (although also overestimating their numbers at 6,000).

NOVEMBER 13, 1960. Some 120 left-wing, nationalistic young Guatemalan Army officers lead a revolt against the despotic rule of President Miguel Fuentes. Although it is quickly repressed, leaders such as Luis Turcios Lima and Marco Antonio Yon Sosa go on to establish a guerrilla force called Movimiento Revolucionario 13 de Noviembre or MR-13, which launches a protracted struggle against the regime.

JANUARY 3, 1961. In one final gesture before leaving office, President Eisenhower severs diplomatic relations with Castro's Cuba. When the new administration of President John F. Kennedy is inaugurated 17 days later, it inherits the CIA's far-advanced invasion scheme, still seeking to conceal American involvement (despite repeated security leaks). This operation is supposed to start with a fictitious uprising by the Cuban armed forces. Then, once the small invasion army disembarks and is embraced by local supporters, the government-in-exile is to follow immediately from Miami and request U.S. military assistance.

Notwithstanding the many doubts raised by military professionals and the moral objections from colleagues, Kennedy approves the plan. Late during the preinvasion buildup in February, though, the president—uneasy about maintaining his pledge of no direct involvement by American forces—makes a last-minute modification by changing the exiles' proposed daylight disembarkation near Trinidad or Casilda into a nocturnal landing farther west at Girón and Bahía de Cochinos, west of Cienfuegos. (Although commonly mistranslated as the "Bay of Pigs," in this particular instance, Cochinos refers simply to a type of fish abundantly available in this harbor.)

MARCH 13, 1961. In an apparent attempt to divert Cuban defenders away from the true disembarkation point, a small CIA-furnished boat penetrates the harbor at Santiago de Cuba in distant Oriente Province, peppering its refinery at dawn with small cannon and machine-gun fire in the hope of sparking an explosion.

APRIL 14, 1961. After three days at anchor, seven CIA-chartered ships and the former U.S. landing-ship San Marcos set sail from the isolated port of Puerto Cabezas (Nicaragua), bearing American operatives and 1,258 members of Brigade 2506, which has been subdivided into six battalions: the 1st consisting of paratroopers (to be flown out later); the 2nd, 5th, and 6th of infantrymen; the 3rd of artillery; and the 4th armored. Helping see off this expedition is the Nicaraguan dictator Luis Somoza, who jocularly asks the departing soldiers to bring him back a couple of hairs from Castro's beard.

Once at sea, the flotilla is shepherded across the Caribbean by two destroyer escorts from the task force of the 27,100-ton U.S. support carrier Essex, with a two-engine observation plane circling above to ensure that this force is not discovered before materializing off the Cuban coast.

APRIL 15, 1961. In compliance with the CIA's aim of suggesting that Cuba's armed forces are revolting against Castro, a pair of B-26B bombers with false Cuban Air Force markings departs Puerto Cabezas (Nicaragua), to strike the Antonio Maceo Airfield outside Santiago de Cuba at dawn this Saturday, destroying two parked planes. Three other pairs of exile-piloted bombers also hit the Ciudad Libertad and San José de los Baños airbases outside Havana, claiming three more victims; however, the defenders are alert, so that one B-26B is shot down by Ciudad Libertad's antiaircraft batteries, while two others are so severely damaged that they must make emergency landings at the Boca Chica Naval Air Station on Key West and on Grand Cayman Island. More importantly, five swift Cuban T-33A jets and four FB-11 Sea Fury fighters survive the attacks intact.

A ninth exile bomber with fake battle damage is flown into Miami by 8:20 a.m., pretending to be a defecting Cuban Air Force plane. However, this deception is quickly unmasked when it is proven that the real Cuban Air Force flies B-26C bombers painted olive drab and with transparent Plexiglas nose cones, not the solid-nosed, aluminum-colored B-26Bs provided to the exiles. The unwitting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Adlai Stevenson, will soon express outrage at finding himself publicly duped. Embarrassed by this early intelligence failure, President Kennedy cancels a second exile aerial strike planned for April 16.

Fidel Castro

Fidel Alejandro Castro Ruz was born on his father's sugar plantation in Birán, near Mayarí in the eastern Cuban province of Oriente (modern Holguín). His birthdate is believed to be August 13, 1927, although he later changed it to 1926 to advance a grade in school. Fidel's father, Ángel Castro Argiz, had arrived from Galicia in Spain and had prospered. He already had five children with his wife. Fidel was the third of seven children born out of wedlock with the household servant Lina Ruz González. Only nine of all of Ángel's children apparently survived into adulthood.

Because of his illegitimacy, Fidel was not baptized until he was eight. A proud and troublesome child, he was sent to the Catholic boarding schools of La Salle and Dolores in the city of Santiago de Cuba. When Fidel was 15, his father finally moved to dissolve his first marriage. After his father married Fidel's mother two years later, the teenager changed his surname to Castro. He excelled at studies with ease and grew strong and tall at six feet, three inches. In 1944, he was even voted the best high school athlete in Cuba. He was sent to Havana for his final year, graduating from the Jesuit-run Colegio de Belén in June 1945. A gifted orator, he enrolled that same September to study law at the University of Havana.

Although at first intimidated by the violent politics that gripped that institution, Castro soon plunged into the turbulence. Details remain sketchy, but he is known to have become a passionate adherent of the Ortodoxo Party, formed in 1947 by Sen. Eduardo Chibás to battle corruption. That same July, Castro also volunteered for a revolutionary expedition intended to depose the Dominican dictator Rafael Trujillo, which never left Cuba. In April 1948, he was present as a radical student delegate at a conference in Bogotá, which ended in riots after the murder of the popular Liberal Party leader Jorge Eliécer Gaitán. Threatened with arrest in its aftermath, Castro fled into the Cuban Embassy and was flown home to Havana.

Shortly after returning, he married a philosophy student named Mirta Díaz-Balart on October 12, 1948. She came from a wealthy family with close ties to the elite, and the next September 1 she bore him a son named Fidel Ángel. By now an avowed opponent of official corruption and American influence, Castro, after graduating from law school in 1950, began representing poor clients. Still immersed in politics, he was also present when his mentor Chibás shot himself during a radio broadcast on August 5, 1951. Castro ran as a candidate for the Cuban legislature the next year, but the election was cancelled by Gen. Fulgencio Batista's coup of March 10, 1952. Castro filed a protest with the Cuban Court of Constitutional Guarantees, which was ignored. Frustrated, he abandoned his legal practice and the Ortodoxo Party to begin planning an assault on the Moncada barracks the next year.

In Cuba, meanwhile, Castro—realizing that a major operation is now imminent—orders a general mobilization and the arrest of tens of thousands of potential opponents, in anticipation of repelling an invasion.

APRIL 17, 1961. Bay of Pigs. After exiled Cuban frogmen and their American instructors have slipped ashore from two rubber rafts to set up beacon lights, the chartered merchantman Barbara J. starts to pick its way deep inside the Bahía de Cochinos shortly past midnight, while the first contingent of Brigade 2506's 2nd Infantry Battalion prepares to disembark onto Playa Larga or "Long Beach." Shortly thereafter, the Braggart also arrives opposite Girón—20 miles away at the bay's eastern mouth—readying to disgorge the first elements of the 3rd, 4th, and 6th battalions. Unexpected coral reefs and other difficulties slow the operation, and the frogmen are discovered by Cuban militia sentinels around 3:00 a.m., resulting in gunfire that arouses the defense. Castro is advised by telephone that the invasion has commenced. Initial resistance proves light, though, so the landing ship San Marcos succeeds the Braggart, disgoring five M-41 Walker Bulldog tanks at Girón. Dawn also brings a half-dozen exile C-46 and C-54 transport planes, who drop 177 paratroopers in two companies about 10 miles inland to hold the beachhead's outer perimeter near the villages of Central Australia and Covadonga. All told, it is believed that slightly more than 1,400 Cuban exiles and CIA operatives are ashore by daybreak.

Around 6:45 a.m., the first serious opposition occurs when a Cuban Air Force Sea Fury piloted by Maj. Enrique Carrera Rolas appears over Playa Larga and blasts the merchantman Houston of Capt. Luis Morse Delgado with a pair of rockets, setting it ablaze so that it must be beached. Combat inland also intensifies as Castro directs tens of thousands of Cuban troops and militia units to begin converging from Cienfuegos and other regional strongpoints, while at 9:15 a.m., several more Sea Furies appear and strike the ammunition-ship Rio Escondido, off Girón, with rockets. The Rio Escondido is abandoned and explodes soon afterward with a tremendous blast. When four exile B-26s arrive overhead around 10:00 a.m. to provide a bit of air cover, they are quickly overwhelmed by the much faster and more agile Cuban T-33s and Sea Furies, while several A4D-2 Skyhawks from the distant U.S. carrier Essex observe impotently, unauthorized to intercede. As a result of these deteriorating conditions, the last exile supply ships Atlántico and Caribe refuse to off-load their cargoes, instead being ordered back out to sea by U.S. naval commanders, while exile pilots no longer wish to sortie from Nicaragua and engage in aerial combat against such clearly superior aircraft.

Cuban anti-aircraft gun overlooking the Bay of Pigs. (U.S. Department of Defense)

President Kennedy, disillusioned by the lack of popular support greeting the exiles—as well as the strength and effectiveness of Castro's countermeasures and the swelling international condemnation—decides to cut his losses by curtailing any further American involvement. The landing force is abandoned to its fate, as Castro—still under the mistaken belief that the invaders number around 6,000 men—masses some 20,000 troops and crushes Brigade 2506 through sheer weight of numbers. On April 18, the invaders' outer perimeter is pressed back into San Blas, while the 2nd Battalion is driven from Playa Larga—its battered survivors must regroup with the main body around Girón. The 5th Battalion is left isolated amid the marshes of the Zapata Peninsula. CIA instructors of the Alabama Air National Guard volunteer to fly one final sortie from Nicaragua with five B-26s on the morning of April 19 to help ease the pressure on their trapped charges, but two of their planes are shot down, and their few bombs cannot avert the outcome. San Blas falls at daybreak, and one last desperate transmission is received by 2:30 p.m. from Girón. The remnants of Brigade 2506 are broken, and almost 1,200 survivors are rounded up over the next few days, many having sought refuge in the nearby Zapata Swamp. Cuban losses total 156 dead and roughly 800 wounded; exile fatalities are listed at 114, while perhaps 150 have managed to escape aboard the departing CIA flotilla and its U.S. naval escorts.

Several months afterward, the president fires the longstanding CIA director Allen W. Dulles, as well as his deputies Charles P. Cabell and Richard M. Bissell, for this ill-conceived and poorly executed fiasco. Adm. Arleigh Burke, chief of U.S. Naval Operations, and other Pentagon officials are also forced into early retirement.

MAY 1, 1961. Castro openly announces his adherence to communist ideology and allies himself with the Soviet Union. Washington reacts bitterly to this alignment.

MAY 30, 1961. After more than 31 years of ruthless dictatorship, the corrupt Dominican ruler Trujillo is assassinated by a sniper round while traveling along the highway west of his capital to visit his mistress. However, his assassins fail to announce his death and immediately to seize power, allowing his slightly wounded chauffeur time to hitch a ride back into the capital with a warning. Consequently, the dictator's eldest son, Rafael "Ramfis" Trujillo Jr., returns from Paris and executes most of the two-dozen conspirators, thereby retaining the family stranglehold.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1961. This evening in the main square of the small Mexican city of San Luis Potosí, several followers of the upstart gubernatorial candidate, Dr. Salvador Nava Martínez, are shot dead, after which soldiers detain him and destroy the Tribuna newspaper office to maintain the Partido Revolucionario Institucional's (Institutional Revolutionary Party, PRI) stranglehold on power.

JANUARY 1962. Cuba is expelled from the U.S.-created Organization of American States.

MARCH 28, 1962. After four difficult years in office, Argentina's military leaders depose the country's beleaguered civilian president, Dr. Arturo Frondizi. The army also becomes split between two factions: the Colorados or "Reds" who wish to see all democratic institutions swept away as ineffectual and replaced by an outright dictatorship, and the Azules or "Blues" who favor military monitoring of the presidency and civilian agencies. Occasional skirmishes erupt between rival groups.

JULY 18, 1962. At 3:20 a.m., Manuel Prado y Ugar-teche is toppled as Peruvian president—10 days before his six-year term in office is scheduled to expire—by a military coup led by the 57-year-old general Ricardo Pío Pérez Godoy, head of the armed forces.

AUGUST 1962. Pentagon analysts notice a doubling in Soviet ship traffic bound into Cuba, which virtually doubles again in September. Reports also begin arriving about thousands of Eastern bloc military personnel and technicians erecting defensive emplacements and extending runways throughout the island, as well as preparing what appear to be missile launch pads. Submarines are also sighted offshore, and the harassment of American U-2 reconnaissance flights becomes more belligerent with the intervention of newly acquired MiG-17 jet fighters.

OCTOBER 1, 1962. The U.S. secretary of defense, Robert McNamara, discusses with the Joint Chiefs of Staff the possibility of taking action against Cuba in case Soviet offensive weapons are being installed on that island, which is only 90 miles from the American mainland. As a result, aerial reconnaissance efforts are redoubled two days later, and scores of U.S. Navy warships begin stealthily assembling to interdict seaborne traffic and even invade Cuba, if necessary.

OCTOBER 14, 1962. U-2 reconnaissance photographs positively identify three Soviet medium-range ballistic missile (MRBM) sites at San Cristóbal, while intermediate-range sites are also spotted the next day under construction at Guanajay. President Kennedy is informed on Monday morning, October 16, and therefore orders more low-level photo-reconnaissance flights made to obtain irrefutable evidence, while preparing his government for a showdown with the Soviet Union.

OCTOBER 22, 1962. Cuban Missile Crisis. After a week of discreet yet intense mobilization—during which almost 200 U.S. warships, thousands of aircraft, and hundreds of thousands of servicemen have been deployed—President Kennedy informs the public during a televised speech at 7:00 p.m. that Soviet nuclear missiles are being secretly installed in Cuba. A naval “quarantine” is therefore to be imposed within two days to prevent further shipments from reaching that island, while an official protest is being lodged before the United Nations (UN) calling for the immediate removal of these offensive weapons. (The term “quarantine” is deliberately chosen rather than “blockade,” which might be misconstrued as an act of war.) The world holds its breath as a confrontation looms between the two nuclear superpowers.

While evidence is being presented before the UN Security Council and tense negotiations are initiated with Soviet premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, a dozen U.S. destroyers take up station on October 24 in a line arching 500 miles out into the Atlantic from Cape Maysi, beyond range of Soviet aircraft stationed in Cuba. Scores of much more powerful American warships and submarines also patrol near the quarantine line, while reconnaissance planes crisscross overhead; consequently, two-dozen approaching Soviet freighters reverse course or slow down in the mid-Atlantic—except for the harmless tanker Bucharest, which is intercepted the next morning at 7:15 a.m. by the U.S. destroyer Gearing and cleared to proceed a couple of hours later, without being boarded. To establish a legal precedent, though, the Lebanese merchantman Marucla is boarded by naval parties from the destroyers Pierce and J.P. Kennedy on the morning of October 26 before being allowed to continue its passage.

Cuban Missile Crisis.

The next day, Khrushchev offers to remove all Soviet missiles from Cuba if the United States will withdraw its Jupiter missiles from Turkey. Kennedy refuses, and the Soviets capitulate by Sunday, October 28, when the premier sends a letter to the American president agreeing to dismantle the bases in Cuba and remove all offensive nuclear weaponry. The quarantine is nevertheless maintained as bilateral talks then continue at the UN to determine exactly how this withdrawal is to be executed and verified. After U-2 flights confirm the actual demolition of the bases on November 1, merchantmen are allowed to proceed toward Cuba again, and one week later, American warships and aircraft visually observe 42 missiles being retired on the decks of eight different Soviet ships. Tensions ease considerably by November 14, and the confrontation is defused five days later when Castro furthermore agrees to the removal of the 42 Soviet-built IL-28 bombers that Cuba has purchased in exchange for an American pledge not to invade.

DECEMBER 23, 1962. After protracted negotiations with Castro, most of the Brigade 2506 captives from the Bay of Pigs disaster are repatriated to Homestead Air Force Base near Miami (Florida), in exchange for $53 million in baby food and pharmaceutical products.

MARCH 3, 1963. Pérez Godoy is deposed as president of Peru by Gen. Nicolás Lindley López, head of the army.

MARCH 29, 1963. Guatemalan president Ydígoras is toppled in a coup led by his minister of defense, Col. Enrique Peralta Azurdia, who assumes office two days afterward.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1963. Amid the difficult transition in the Dominican Republic, after its decades of despotic misrule by Trujillo, the newly elected leftist president—Professor Juan D. Bosch—is beset by civil unrest and deposed by a military coup that replaces him with a triumvirate of conservative officeholders.

OCTOBER 3, 1963. Ten days before the populist reformer Villeda Morales is about to be convincingly reelected as president of Honduras, he is deposed in a bloody dawn coup staged by air force colonel Oswaldo López Arellano, who is backed by reactionary elements from the country's landowning oligarchy. Troops mercilessly butcher political opponents for several days, while Congress is dissolved, the constitution suspended, elections cancelled, and Villeda flown into exile.

At first, Washington angrily severs diplomatic relations when López Arellano assumes office as a signal of its disapproval; however, after the assassination of President John F. Kennedy the next month, the new administration of Lyndon B. Johnson restores relations (and military assistance payments) by December 14 to continue resisting "real or imagined Communist threats" throughout Central America.

JANUARY 9, 1964. Anti-American fighting erupts in Panama over the refusal of authorities to honor an agreement to fly the Panamanian flag in conjunction with the Stars and Stripes over the Canal Zone. As a result, President Chiari severs diplomatic relations with Washington the next day. Four U.S. soldiers and 24 Panamanians are killed, while 85 Americans and 200 Panamanians are wounded, before order can be fully restored by January 13.

MARCH 13, 1964. In the midst of a debilitating economic crisis, Brazilian president João Goulart stages a rally by 150,000 people in Rio de Janeiro announcing the nationalization of foreign-owned oil refineries and other socialist measures, plus calling for a new national constitution. Fearful that these actions might presage the establishment of a left-wing dictatorship, 500,000 counterdemonstrators take part in a "March of the Family with God for Liberty" six days later in São Paulo, followed by another 150,000-person demonstration in Santos on March 24.

Tension comes to a head a few days later when pro-Goulart sailors and marines refuse to obey their superior officers at Rio de Janeiro, and the president sides with the mutineers. The navy minister thereupon resigns in protest, while the military prepares to intervene.

MARCH 31, 1964. Brazilian Overthrow. An anti-Goulart insurrection breaks out this morning in Minas Gerais, rebel columns from Gen. Olímpio Mourão Filho's 1st Army being dispatched from there under Gen. Carlos de Meira Matos toward the capital Brasília, as well as to confront loyal forces around Rio de Janeiro. Most garrisons in the interior quickly join this uprising, and on April 1—after vainly attempting to persuade the president to break with his communist backers—intelligence chief and general Amaury Kruel leads the crucial 2nd Army into revolt at São Paulo.

Goulart flies to Brasília in a last-ditch effort to rally support, but when his garrison in Rio de Janeiro furthermore mutinies during his absence, the president instead flees into exile in Uruguay on April 2. He is succeeded by the 63-year-old general Humberto de Alencar Castello Branco, chief of the Army General Staff, who has used his febianos contacts (see “July 1945” entry) to secretly organize this coup.

APRIL 24, 1965. Dominican Intervention. Beset by continual economic problems, the Dominican Republic's triumvirate of conservative officeholders is deposed in a bloodless military coup. The next day, however, the plotters themselves are in turn surprised when a group of young army colonels takes over their rebellion by rousing thousands of civilian supporters into the streets of Santo Domingo with a call for the return of exiled president Bosch. Brig. Gen. Elías Wessín y Wessín—a member of the original cabal and commander of 1,500 troops and 30 tanks stationed at San Isidro Air Base, 20 miles outside the capital—counters by sending four of his P-51 fighters to strafe the presidential palace on the afternoon of April 25, then attempts the next day to fight his way into the city out of the east with his armored column. But his progress is unexpectedly checked at Duarte Bridge by rebel troops and armed civilians under the skillful leadership of Col. Francisco Caamaño Deñó, who, despite suffering hundreds of casualties and great material damage during fierce exchanges of gunfire, succeeds in repelling Wessín's assault. The popular uprising thus appears upon the verge of succeeding.

However, the U.S. administration of President Lyndon Baines Johnson—convinced that this insurrection enjoys stealthy communist support and might result in yet another socialist regime in the region—intervenes by ordering the 27,100-ton support carrier USS Boxer and its transport consort, bearing 1,500 marines, to materialize off the embattled city by dawn of April 27, 1965, protecting the evacuation of about 1,000 American civilians and 1,400 other nationals from Haina the next day. As combat still persists around the capital, Washington commits to a full-scale occupation by disembarking 1,700 marines on April 30, plus airlifting 2,500 paratroopers into San Isidro Air Base to impose a cease-fire within a nine-square-mile “internationalized zone” that encompasses all foreign legations within the city.

The arrival of more American troops (their numbers eventually swell to almost 23,000 throughout the entire island), along with an additional 2,000 Brazilian, Paraguayan, Honduran, Nicaraguan, and Costa Rican troops who join by May 6, known collectively as the Fuerza Interamericana de Pacificación or “Inter-American Pacification Force” (FIP), stifles all overt fighting; however, Caamaño Deñó's rebels nonetheless remain in control of the capital, while the east bank of the Ozama River is held by the military junta—now nominally headed by Col. Antonio Imbert Barrera, one of Trujillo's assassins, supposedly a more palatable figurehead than Wessín.

A tense standoff ensues, negotiations brokered by the Organization of American States being punctuated by occasional exchanges of gunfire, such as the weeklong outburst that erupts after junta planes destroy the rebel radio station on May 13, 1965, or the bloody outbreak of June 15, when 21 people are slain within the beleaguered city and its Customs House is set ablaze. An agreement is finally hammered out on August 31, whereby both Caamaño and Wessín are to go abroad to diplomatic postings so that the impasse can end and the city of Santo Domingo can begin to recuperate from an ordeal that has claimed some 3,000 lives. The interventionist forces remain until June 1966, when Joaquín Balaguer is reelected as president, after which all foreign troops withdraw by September 27.

JUNE 27, 1966. This morning, the commander in chief of the Argentine Army—Lt. Gen. Pascual Pistarini—informs his subordinate generals Juan Carlos Onganía and Julio Alsogaray of the I Army Corps that they are to initiate their plan to depose the unpopular 65-year-old civilian president Arturo Umberto Illia. Strategic points such as the telecommunications centers in Buenos Aires are seized by this same evening, and the beleaguered president agrees to resign by 9:00 p.m. rather than risk clashes involving forces from the navy and air force, which remain loyal to him.

However, Illia refuses to physically vacate his office in the Casa Rosada, so he has to be expelled at 7:25 a.m. the next morning by a federal police unit, who bring tear gas and manhandle him out of the building. A military junta thereupon temporarily replaces him, soon coming to be dominated by the 52-year-old Onganía, who abolishes all political parties and trade unions, censures the press, and tries to impose a right-wing dictatorship.

MARCH 1967. Feeling that he can best contribute to the communist cause by fomenting further insurrections in Latin America, the 39-year-old guerrilla leader Ché Guevara leaves Cuba and enters Bolivia in disguise to set up a secret base in the mountains between Santa Cruz and Camiri. He begins with only 60 followers, led by the Bolivian brothers Guido and Roberto “Coco” Peredo, who initiate their attacks by ambushing a Bolivian army patrol, during which seven soldiers are slain.

MAY 18, 1967. In the impoverished Mexican town of Atoyac de Álvarez in the state of Guerrero, a teachers’ protest led by 30-year-old Lucio Cabañas Barrientos is dispersed with gunfire, five protesters being slain. Cabañas, a former teacher and union organizer born of peasant stock, flees into the mountains to begin creating a grassroots rebel organization called the Partido de los Pobres or “Party of the Poor,” which over the next seven years will combat the repressive state regime, indifferent federal authorities, and the Mexican Army.

EARLY JULY 1967. Sweeps by 2,500 Bolivian soldiers (dubbed Operation CYNTHIA) have failed to locate Guevara, although 33 troopers have been killed—as opposed to only 6 to 8 guerrillas. President René Barrientos therefore requests military assistance in this pursuit from neighboring Argentina, which refuses.

LATE JULY 1967. The 26-year-old Marxist ideologue and French journalist Jules Régis Debray is captured by Bolivian troops while walking out of one of Guevara’s guerrilla camps. He is eventually sentenced to 30 years’ incarceration for his part in this insurgency.

AUGUST 1967. In the region of Pancasán, a ruggedly mountainous part of the Department of Matagalpa in southwestern Nicaragua, the National Guard of newly elected president Anastasio “Tachito”

Somoza Debayle crushes the main forces of the reconstituted Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional or “Sandinista Front for National Liberation” (FSLN), named in honor of Augusto Sandino (see “May 4, 1927” entry in “Nicaraguan Civil War”), prompting the rebels to go underground again for the next several years.

OCTOBER 8, 1967. In Yuro Ravine, 75 miles north of Camiri, Guevara’s jungle camp is discovered by 180 Bolivian rangers, who divide into two columns, then attack around noon. After a firefight during which four soldiers and three guerrillas are slain, Guevara—wounded in his left thigh—is captured along with three companions and executed the next day, after being carried five miles into the town of Higuera on a stretcher. His remains are displayed in nearby Valle Grande (population 7,000) for a couple of days, then cremated.

OCTOBER 2, 1968. After several months of growing political turmoil in Mexico City, which is about

Image of Che Guevara, after the iconic photograph by Cuban photographer “Alexander Korda” (Alberto Díaz Gutiérrez), in which Che attends a funeral service for the victims of the La Coubre munition-ship explosion in Havana. (Juan Barreto/AFP/Getty Images)

Ché Guevara

Ernesto Guevara de la Serna was born on June 14, 1928, in the Argentine city of Rosario, the eldest of five children of a well-to-do family. Despite suffering from asthma, he spent an active and privileged childhood. At the age of 20, he enrolled in the University of Buenos Aires medical school. He interrupted his studies in 1951 to travel through South America on a motorcycle with his friend Alberto Granado. This firsthand contact with the continent's poorest classes changed his life. After completing his medical degree in June 1953, Guevara left in search of a cause, reaching Guatemala by the end of December.

Guatemala's populist president, Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, was attempting land and social reforms, which Guevara tried to assist in a minor medical capacity. He also mixed among other foreign socialists and, because of his distinct accent, soon became known as El Che—a common Latin American nickname for anyone from Argentina. The next year, Guevara bitterly witnessed the fall of the Arbenz government in a CIA-engineered coup, so he fled to Mexico by early September 1954. There he met the Cuban exile Fidel Castro, joining his small rebel band in July 1955. After training, they departed from Veracruz a year and a half later aboard the Granma to try to topple the Batista regime.

The only non-Cuban in the group, Guevara proved a brave and resourceful guerrilla leader, well liked by rural residents. By the time the final rebel offensive moved against Santa Clara in late December 1958, he was leading the spearhead—with verve, if not great tactical skill. After Batista's flight, the 30-year-old rebel comandante was rewarded with Cuban citizenship and command of the La Cabaña fortress on the outskirts of Havana. There, he executed many of the regime's most hated officials.

Not surprisingly, the mercurial revolutionary proved much better at toppling than building a government. Despite being named to such high posts as president of the National Bank of Cuba and minister of industries, Guevara showed scant interest or aptitude. He also grew disillusioned with Castro's Soviet patrons, instead favoring the more radical Maoist policies of their Communist Chinese rivals. After giving a speech in Algiers on February 24, 1965, in which he complained about the Soviet Union's "tacit complicity" with the West, Guevara was recalled to Cuba and disappeared from public view.

An embarrassment, Guevara was returned to his "true" calling of revolutionary by traveling secretly to the Congo with 13 companions in late April 1965. After a vain attempt to help its guerrilla movement, he recovered from this African fiasco in Dar-es-Salaam and Eastern Europe. Guevara then moved on to southeastern Bolivia by early November 1966, again hoping to raise an insurrection. Instead, he was hunted down by the Bolivian Army with help from CIA operatives and U.S. Special Forces and killed on October 9, 1967. Despite his many flaws and lonely end, the charismatic Guevara remained an icon in popular culture. Even enemies expressed a grudging admiration for his spirit of self-sacrifice, which led him to forsake a comfortable existence to campaign on behalf of those less fortunate.

to become the focus of global attention by hosting the Summer Olympic Games within 10 days' time, a citywide protest march by university students ends at the Plaza de las Tres Culturas in the capital's Tlatelolco district. By evening, only 5,000 demonstrators remain, who unexpectedly find themselves surrounded by troops with armored cars and tanks emerging from the adjoining streets. Gunfire erupts, and many hapless civilians are mowed down: estimates of the dead range from 200 to 300 people, with thousands more wounded, beaten, or arrested. Government sources cite only 4 dead and 20 wounded, being widely disbelieved.

Apparently fearful of embarrassment before world-wide television audiences during the forthcoming Olympics, the government of President Gustavo Díaz Ordáz has ordered the Mexican Army to crush this student movement through an exemplary reprisal, which is remembered as the "Tlatelolco Massacre."

OCTOBER 3, 1968. Beset by political scandal and unrest, Peru's President Fernando Belaúnde Terry is deposed in a military coup led by the reform-minded 58-year-old general Juan Velasco Alvarado, head of Peru's armed forces.

OCTOBER 11, 1968. When the freshly reelected Panamanian president Arnulfo Arias attempts to strip Panama's National Guard of power and purge its officer corps, the 39-year-old lieutenant colonel Omar Torrijos Herrera and several others depose him within 11 days of assuming office. Arias must therefore go into exile in Miami (Florida). Col. José María Pinilla emerges as temporary leader of a provisional junta, which issues several popular dictates to placate the Panamanian public.

Washington refuses to recognize this new administration until November 13, after the coup leaders have arrested numerous leftist sympathizers. Minor pro-Arnulfo outbursts in Chiriquí and Coclé are easily smothered. Torrijos begins to emerge as the real power behind this new government, though, after he arranges to have his coconspirator, Maj. Boris Martínez, arrested during a visit to Miami on February 25, 1969.

NOVEMBER 14, 1968. Mexican troops begin counter guerrilla sweeps through the rugged Atoyac Range in the state of Guerrero, vainly searching for the tiny bands led by Lucio Cabañas and Genaro Vázquez. Army morale is low because of poor pay, rusting equipment, aged upper echelons, and public disapproval of the Tlatelolco Massacre (see “October 2, 1968” entry).

MAY 15, 1969. In Argentina, growing discontent with the dictatorship of General Onganía prompts a student protest in the northern city of Corrientes, which is dispersed by the police, resulting in a single death. A more violent march in Rosario two days later cannot be put down until martial law is declared on May 22 and, furthermore, sparks sympathetic outbursts in La Plata, Tucumán, and Córdoba.

At midmorning on May 29, the latter city becomes the scene of a massive protest by both striking workers and students, remembered as “El Cordobazo.” Local police are overwhelmed, and troops of the 4th Airborne Infantry Brigade of the III Army Corps have to be deployed by 5:00 p.m., fighting their way past street barricades to restore order by the next dawn. El Cordobazo is also known as the Noche de los Bastones Largos or “Night of the Long Clubs,” and it marks the beginning of the end of Onganía’s unpopular rule.

MAY 30, 1969. Some 4,000 strikers on the island of Curaçao—angered by wage disparities between Royal Shell employees and local subcontractors—rampage through the business district of its capital Willemstad, causing extensive damage before being put down by Dutch marines and police.

JUNE 27, 1969. Soccer War. Immediately after Honduras loses the third of a trio of impassioned playoff matches to El Salvador—the final qualifying games for a single remaining slot in the 1970 World Cup championship in Mexico—the already-strained relations between both nations reach a boiling point when the dictatorial Honduran president López Arellano severs diplomatic relations with his neighbor. Animosity is also running high in El Salvador, despite their win, because of retaliatory measures being meted out against the 300,000 impoverished Salvadorans living and working illegally in Honduras.

As a result, 12,000 Salvadoran troops cross the border in two columns on the afternoon of July 14, occupying the towns of El Amatillo and Nacaoné, as well as the regional capital of Nueva Ocotepeque—five miles from the frontier—by the next evening. World War II–vintage, propeller-driven airplanes are also used to drop bombs on Toncontin Air Base outside Tegucigalpa, while Honduran islands in the Gulf of Fonseca are assaulted. This offensive quickly bogs down, though, when Honduran F4U-5 Corsair fighters counterattack and severely damage El Salvador’s main oil-storage facilities at the port of Cutuco and Acajutla. The Salvadoran drive from Nueva Ocotepeque on toward Santa Rosa de Capán is then checked by Honduran warplanes, while air transports ferry 1,000 soldiers of the presidential “Guardia de Honor” Battalion from Tegucigalpa to reinforce that threatened town.

The Organization of American States arranges a cease-fire by the evening of July 18, which goes into effect two days later.

The Salvadorans subsequently demand reparations for the more than 60,000 Salvadoran citizens who have been chased out of Honduras, as well as guarantees for the safety of those left behind. The threat of economic sanctions, however, compels them to withdraw their troops by August 5. This conflict has inflicted between 2,000 and 3,000 fatalities on both sides, in addition to leaving thousands more homeless and disrupting both frail economies. A peace treaty will not be concluded until October 30, 1980.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1969. Amid the uncertain political climate in Bolivia following the death five months previously of President Barrientos in a helicopter crash, his weak vice president Luis Adolfo Siles Salinas is overthrown by Gen. Alfredo Ovando Candía. The latter surprises his conservative supporters by implementing a notably leftist policy, which fosters economic and social turmoil.

MID-DECEMBER 1969. While attending horse races in Mexico City, Panamanian strongman Torrijos is deposed by a military coup led by colonels Amado Sanjurjo Atencio, Ramiro Silvera Domínguez, and Nentzen Franco. Returning home on December 16 aboard a private plane lent by Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somoza, Torrijos lands at Chiriquí (thanks to the collaboration of its regional National Guard commander, Maj. Manuel Antonio Noriega) and quickly rallies the National Guard garrison at David and other towns as he advances upon the capital, overthrowing the conspirators and reclaiming power. All of Panama's remaining political parties are subsequently outlawed, and as many as 1,600 opponents are detained.

MAY 29, 1970. Shortly after 9:00 a.m. on this Thursday morning in Buenos Aires, the retired general and former president Aramburu is brazenly kidnapped from his apartment by disguised young Peronist members of a new urban guerrilla group, who call themselves the Montoneros. They drive him to their hideout at a semi-deserted farm near Timote and submit him to a “trial,” while the authorities vainly mount a nationwide search for the ex-president. Aramburu is shot in the farm's basement at 7:00 p.m. on June 1, creating shock waves through the country when the Montoneros announce his execution.

JUNE 8, 1970. Argentina's Joint Chiefs of Staff depose President Onganía, replacing him 10 days afterward with Brig. Gen. Roberto M. Levingstone, military attaché to Washington.

JUNE 30, 1970. Some 40 Argentine urban guerrillas of the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias or “Armed Revolutionary Forces” (FAR) movement, half of them women, seize the police station and bank in the Garín suburb of Buenos Aires, killing two people before ransacking its vault and disappearing. A similar assault at 7:30 the next morning by a group of Montoneros against the La Calera suburb of Córdoba is repelled, 11 guerrillas being left behind wounded. Among them is Emilio Maza, one of Aramburu's kidnappers, who dies of his wounds a few days later.

JULY 25, 1970. Having failed to locate the guerrilla bands operated by Lucio Cabañas and Genaro Vázquez in the Atoyac Range of the state of Guerrero, the Mexican Army launches a new “hearts and minds” campaign, dubbed Operación AMISTAD or “Operation FRIENDSHIP,” designed to gain local collaborators. Within weeks, it is abandoned as an utter failure.

Montoneros

The urban Movimiento Peronista Montonero or “Mass Peronist Movement” started with the brazen murder of Argentina's former president Aramburu in May 1970. Its young guerrillas, an equal mix of male and female, were fired by a radical blend of ultranational socialism, populist Catholicism, and anti-Americanism. Through random acts of terror, they hoped to weaken the regime to help Juan Perón return from exile. He at first welcomed their acts through a series of letters published from Madrid.

Yet the Montoneros did not make another attack for 22 more months. Instead, the Trotskyite Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo or “People's Revolutionary Army” (ERP) unleashed scores of bombings, robberies, and extortions, most directed against large businesses. The Montoneros resumed action by murdering the Federal Police commander, Gen. Pedro Agarotti, at his home on March 18, 1972. The slackening of military rule, however, and the return of Perón by June 20, 1973, dashed Montonero dreams. Rather than enact the socialist revolution they had hoped for, he embraced the unions and conservative elements that once formed his base. Pardons for imprisoned leftist guerrillas were meanwhile ignored.

As a result, two days after Perón won reelection as president on September 23, 1973, a Montonero hit squad killed his secretary general for the Confederación General del Trabajo or “General Work Confederation.” The same radical members then joined the ERP the next month in their bombings and murders, thus hoping to divert Perón from his aims. The president responded by having his ultraconservative private secretary and “Minister of Social Well-Being,” a 57-year-old former corporal in the Federal Police named José López Rega, unleash shadowy right-wing death squads. They became known as the Alianza Anticomunista Argentina or “Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance” (Triple A). With help from the military and police, they killed leftists with impunity. Finally, during a huge May Day rally in Buenos Aires on May 1, 1974, an ailing Perón denounced the Montoneros as estúpidos e imberbes (“stupid and callow”). Their sympathizers angrily left the parade.

Upon the president's death two months later, Montonero cells stepped up the savage terrorist fight that paralyzed Argentine society. They financed their campaign through robberies and kidnappings. The wealthy brothers Juan and Jorge Bosch, for example, were taken near La Lucila Bridge on September 19, 1974. They were not released until months later, after payment of more than $60 million in ransoms. Yet such criminality eventually alienated so many Argentines that, when a military junta seized power and launched its “dirty war” of torture and murder, most Montoneros were hunted down and killed.

Jorge Bosch, in a photo released with a ransom demand by his Montonero kidnappers. (Museo Histórico Nacional, Buenos Aires)

SEPTEMBER 4, 1970. In Chile, the Marxist candidate Dr. Salvador Allende Gossens is elected president with 36 percent of the vote after a heated three-way race. Opposition to his ruinous leftist policies will eventually spring up both domestically and internationally—especially out of Washington, where the CIA actively works toward his downfall.

OCTOBER 6, 1970. The right-wing Bolivian general Rogelio Miranda Valdivia launches a coup attempt to depose President Ovando, which is resisted by several left-leaning garrisons throughout the country. After several hours of bloodshed, Ovando seeks asylum in a foreign embassy in La Paz, believing that all is lost; however, the countercoup forces under his populist army commander and confederate, Gen. Juan José Torres González, eventually triumph, and the latter succeeds him in office the next day. Torres will pursue even more radical policies than his predecessor, deepening Bolivia's economic chaos and antagonizing opponents both at home and abroad.

FEBRUARY 1, 1971. Operatives of Argentina's seven-month-old Marxist urban guerrilla group—the Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo or "People's Revolutionary Army" (ERP)—raid various armories, seizing military weaponry to inaugurate a nationwide campaign of terror. Most attacks are directed against large firms such as FIAT, Chrysler, and Coca-Cola subsidiaries, but there are also assassinations and kidnappings of individuals.

MARCH 23, 1971. Amid growing political violence and economic woes, the Argentine president Levingstone attempts to fire Gen. Alejandro Agustín Lanusse, commander in chief of the army. Instead, Levingstone is removed from office and replaced by Lanusse, who begins easing political repression in anticipation of a return to civilian rule.

APRIL 21, 1971. Haiti's dictator, François "Papa Doc" Duvalier, dies in office.

MAY 1, 1971. Determined to crush the tiny guerrilla bands perpetrating kidnappings and robberies out of the Atoyac Range in the state of Guerrero, the government of newly inaugurated Mexican president Luis Echeverría Álvarez authorizes the defense secretary, Gen. Hermenegildo Cuenca Díaz, to implement Operación TELARAÑA or "Operation COBWEB." This operation entails the extralegal detention of scores of family members or associates of leaders, such as Lucio Cabañas and Genaro Vázquez, in an attempt to locate and kill the leaders. Some 24,000 troops—a third of the total Mexican Army—will be committed to Guerrero in support of these sweeps, yet they fail to produce any results beyond alienating the civilian populace.

Lucio Cabañas. (Organization of American States)

JUNE 10, 1971. To quell a wave of violent leftist street protests gripping Mexico City, President Echeverría unleashes a shadowy paramilitary group nicknamed the Halcones or "Hawks"—800 active-duty soldiers and hired thugs secretly raised and trained by Col. Manuel Díaz Escobar, a member of the capital's municipal administration. They are allowed to bypass ranks of riot police and fall upon a mob of protesters on Los Maestros Avenue, killing 23 and injuring some 200–300 in a clash that is photographed by newsmen. Embarrassed by this disclosure, Colonel Díaz's group is quickly disavowed and dissolved.

AUGUST 18, 1971. The archconservative Bolivian general Hugo Bánzer Suárez returns from exile in neighboring Argentina to initiate a revolt in his native Department of Santa Cruz de la Sierra against the faltering leftist regime of President Torres. Despite a few days of considerable resistance, Bánzer's contacts with army commanders in La Paz—as well as covert American and Brazilian support—drive Torres from office three days later, and Bánzer assumes power as of August 22.

Seeking to impose strict order upon the fractious nation, he immediately institutes a harshly repressive administration by banning all leftist parties and unions, closing all universities, and ordering the arrests of several thousand dissidents. His iron-fisted rule will eventually be bolstered by easy credit terms abroad, financing large public works, but will remain underscored by brutal severity.

OCTOBER 1971. Argentine armored units revolt at Azul and Olavarría, believing that President Lanusse's policies are paving the way for a return from exile by Perón. This rebellion is quickly squelched, and the armed forces are purged of suspect elements.

APRIL 6, 1972. Anti-government unrest erupts in the Argentine city of Mendoza, being subdued five days later.

APRIL 10, 1972. A joint assassination squad formed by Argentina's ERP and FAR urban guerrilla groups kills army lieutenant general Juan Carlos Sánchez in the city of Rosario.

JUNE 25, 1972. Lucio Cabañas and 20 guerrilla companions ambush a Mexican army convoy at Arroyo Las Piñas near San Andrés de la Cruz (Guerrero), killing 10 soldiers and wounding 18. This attack, coupled with a second ambush on August 23 at nearby Arroyo Oscuro that results in 18 more soldiers dead, 9 wounded, and 11 captured, goads the army into a series of brutal reprisals throughout the region. Convinced that Cabañas's band must number at least 150 guerrillas, the authorities deploy five fresh infantry battalions as well as thousands of state policemen to pursue him.

AUGUST 15, 1972. A combined operation by ERP, FAR, and Montonero teams frees scores of imprisoned colleagues from Rawson Penitentiary at Chubut, most guards having been intimidated by threats against their families. The bulk of the escapees flee into Chile aboard a hijacked airliner, although 19 are left behind at Chubut Airport with several hostages. The latter surrender to Argentine marines after a brief resistance, to be reincarcerated at nearby Trelew Naval Air Base.

AUGUST 22, 1972. Under cover of a riot, the same Argentine urban guerrilla teams attempt to penetrate Trelew Naval Air Base and free its captive colleagues, but are repelled when its marine guard opens fire, killing 16 of the assaulters.

DECEMBER 4, 1972. Prior to the arrival of a peasant protest march in Tegucigalpa, members of the Honduran military bloodlessly topple the ineffectual president Ramón Ernesto Cruz and replace him with López Arellano, head of the armed forces.

FEBRUARY 1973. Colonel Caamaño returns to the Dominican Republic (see "April 24, 1965" entry), disembarking with a few followers in hopes of establishing an insurrectionist guerrilla movement. Instead, he is killed in battle within a few days.

MAY 25, 1973. More than a decade of military rule in Argentina ends with the inauguration of Dr. Héctor José Cámpora as its elected president. However, despite having won a clear majority among various contending parties, simmering tensions will lead to Cámpora's resignation by July 13, eventually making way for Perón.

JUNE 20, 1973. Hundreds of thousands of Argentines gather at Ezeiza Airfield outside Buenos Aires to greet Perón upon his return from 18 years of exile in Spain. Security is assigned by the Peronist Party to the retired lieutenant colonel Jorge Manuel Osinde, a leader in its conservative wing, rather than to the leftist minister of the interior, Esteban Righi; clashes therefore erupt against bands of armed Montonero sympathizers prominent among the huge throng. Estimated fatalities range from 13 to 156, with hundreds more wounded during this "Ezeiza Massacre," although no precise figures are ever verified. Given such dangerous tumult, Perón's flight is diverted this afternoon to Morón Airfield, leaving the disappointed crowds to disperse at nightfall amid sporadic sounds of gunfire.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1973. Allende's Fall. At 11:52 a.m., after months of heightened tension and economic collapse, two Chilean Hawker-Hunter fighter jets fire salvoes of rockets into the La Moneda presidential palace, setting parts of it ablaze. From his command post in Peñalolén, a Santiago suburb in the Andean foothills, the coup leader—recently promoted general Augusto Pinochet Ugarte—orders tank and infantry columns under Gen. Javier Palacios to descend upon Allende's residence, fighting their way inside after an hour-and-a-half resistance from civilian bodyguards and nearby snipers.

Allende is found dead within one of its inner rooms, either from his own hand, from earlier exchanges of gunfire, or murdered by the triumphant soldiery. Expecting to encounter widespread leftist opposition throughout the remainder of the country, other units are surprised to easily overrun even its ideological strongholds, arresting thousands of activists with scant resistance. Pinochet quickly establishes a junta with air force general Gustavo Leigh, Adm. José Toribio Merino, and Gen. César Mendoza of the carabineros or paramilitary police, declaring martial law the next day. By December, at least 1,500 Chileans are dead, 45,000 detained, and 7,000 have fled into exile, as full-scale repression sets in.

NOVEMBER 11, 1973. Faced with increased hostility from Lucio Cabañas's growing guerrilla movement in the Atoyac Range of the state of Guerrero, the Mexican Army has begun pushing in columns to relieve its isolated garrisons when a 300-man convoy is ambushed and suffers four soldiers killed between the hamlets of Yerbasantita and Las Compuertas. The authorities consequently launch Operación LUCIÉRNAGA or "Operation FIREFLY," sending a trio of heavily armed, mobile columns in pursuit of the chieftain, who shifts from one jungle camp to another with his 100–150 followers. After a week of skirmishes, the army winds down this chase.

A helmeted President Allende with armed bodyguards inspecting bomb damage to La Moneda Presidential Palace shortly before his death. (Clendenen Papers, Hoover Institution)

MAY 30, 1974. ERP guerrillas seize the village of Acheral in Argentina's remote northwestern province of Tucumán, hoping to shift their operations out of urban settings and build up a broad rural movement in the jungles of the Andean foothills, modeled after Castro and Guevara's successful campaign in Cuba.

JUNE 2, 1974. After three days of secret, fruitless negotiations between Mexico's revolutionary leader Lucio Cabañas and the senator (soon to be elected governor) for the state of Guerrero, Rubén Figueroa Figueroa, the guerrilla leader seizes his guest and holds him for ransom. This act sparks massive military roundups and sweeps throughout the region, which fail to corner Cabañas or his 60 fighters; Gen. Salvador Rangel Medina is therefore relieved of command as of August 5 and replaced by Gen. Eliseo Jiménez Ruiz. A ransom of 50 million pesos is paid for the captive Figueroa, although 60 elite troops under Lt. Col. Juan López Ruiz intercept his guerrilla guards as they approach El Huicón to release him on September 8, killing three and scattering the rest.

JULY 1, 1974. Upon the death of Argentina's President Perón, his 43-year-old widow, María Estela "Isabelita" Martínez de Perón, succeeds him in office, but she is controlled by extreme rightists within her party. In particular, José López Rega—the "Minister of Social Well-Being"—continues to run a paramilitary war with a force dubbed the Argentine Anti-Communist Alliance or "Triple A," countering terrorist activities by leftist agitators in this economically troubled nation.

OCTOBER 11, 1974. Closely chased by 5,000 Mexican troops since the freeing of Senator Figueroa, the guerrilla leader Lucio Cabañas and 14 companions are surprised shortly after noon near Los Toronjos in the Tecpan Range of the state of Guerrero. Escaping over Achotla Mountain after nightfall, the leader is nonetheless left with only four followers; his mother, wife, and three-week-old daughter are captured two weeks later by the army at Tixtla.

DECEMBER 2, 1974. Guided by a captive, Mexican troops of the 19th Battalion under Capt. Pedro

Bravo Torres overtake Cabañas's fugitive band at 9:00 a.m. near El Ototal, 12 miles northwest of Tecpan de Galeana, killing him along with his three remaining followers. Two soldiers are slain and five wounded during this exchange, which virtually ends all revolutionary movement in the mountains of Guerrero. At least 650 civilian captives have lost their lives at the hands of the authorities during this protracted campaign, which is dubbed Mexico's "dirty war."

DECEMBER 4, 1974. Ten Argentine ERP guerrillas in three vehicles intercept the car of Capt. Humberto A. Viola in the city of Tucumán, killing him along with his three-year-old daughter and wounding his five-year-old daughter, all in front of his pregnant wife. This cruel murder turns popular opinion against the guerrillas.

DECEMBER 27, 1974. Nine Sandinista guerrillas kill four people while seizing a private home in Managua (Nicaragua), interrupting a party in honor of U.S. ambassador Turner B. Shelton. Because the American diplomat has already departed, the Sandinistas hold 25 other hostages—including Nicaragua's foreign minister and its ambassador to the United States—demanding a ransom of $5 million, the release of 14 captive comrades, and a plane to fly them to Cuba. After almost three days of negotiations, they receive $1 million and are allowed to fly off with their 14 colleagues.

LATE DECEMBER 1974. Argentina's "Dirty War." Her administration wracked by economic woes and social unrest, President "Isabelita" de Perón and her right-wing cabinet decide to authorize the military to join the fight against the growing wave of subversion, in contravention of constitutional restrictions against the armed forces' participation in internal affairs. Brig. Gen. Ricardo Muñoz of the 5th Infantry Brigade of Tucumán is consequently instructed to prepare to fully engage the ERP guerrillas operating in that northwestern province, to bolster the efforts of Tucumán's overmatched rural police force. However, while on an aerial reconnaissance, Muñoz and 10 of his senior staff are killed when his plane accidentally crashes on January 6, 1975.

He is succeeded by Brig. Gen. Acdel Edgardo Vilas. It is not until February 5, 1975, that the president actually signs the decree ordering the army to intervene, and then only in that third of Tucumán Province claimed by the ERP as their "liberated zone." Vilas's operation—code-named INDEPENDENCIA—begins four days later when more than 3,000 troops of the 5th Infantry Brigade (spearheaded by two companies of elite commandos) are deployed: the 19th Infantry Regiment, 5th Communications Company, and 5th Logistics Company from Tucumán; the 20th Mountain Infantry Regiment and 5th Artillery Group from Jujuy; the 28th Mountain Infantry Regiment from Tartagal; plus the 105th Armored Cavalry Scouts, 5th Engineering Company, and 5th Medical Company from Salta.

At first, their sweeps into the hills net only disappointing results, as the guerrillas easily elude their pursuers. A counterinsurgency center is therefore established in the Diego de Rojas School near 5th Brigade headquarters in Famaillá, where suspected collaborators are brought to be terrorized and interrogated. President de Perón visits the disputed province in May, her displeasure at the lack of any progress resulting in Lt. Gen. Leonardo Anaya's replacement as commander in chief of the Argentine Army by Gen. Alberto Numa Laplane.

However, an ERP attack is defeated at Manchalá on May 28, 1975, after which the few hundred surviving guerrillas are gradually hunted down, their support among 2,500 rural sympathizers evaporating because of general disillusionment and the harsh pressures exerted on family and friends by the army. When fugitive guerrillas begin to flee the jungle to hide among the civilian population of the small city of Tucumán, being mostly middle- and upper-class youths from Buenos Aires, they are easily detected and denounced to the authorities. The tactics employed against the ERP prove so effective that, on October 10—while President de Perón is temporarily incapacitated outside the country—the use of such military action is extended nationwide by her cabinet.

However, notwithstanding the ever-more Draconian measures applied by the armed forces in Buenos Aires and other major urban centers, the bombings and assassinations nonetheless continue. The president is finally deposed and placed under house arrest on March 24, 1976, by a junta comprised of Lt. Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, Adm. Emilio Eduardo Massera, and air force brigadier general Orlando Ramón Agosti. They thereupon unleash a wave of exceptionally brutal arrests and executions, which over the next seven years will claim the lives of some 30,000 civilians—most of whose bodies will never be found. They are thus referred to as the desaparecidos or "disappeared." This "dirty war" of torture and murder will break the back of Montonero resistance, some 1,600 of their active members being liquidated, while thousands more flee abroad.

End of the Vietnam War

At dawn on April 30, 1975, the final evacuation of the U.S. Embassy in Saigon was effected by helicopter. This retreat marked the end of a decade of failed intervention, dampening American global policy for years to come. When Vietnam had been freed from Japanese occupation in the summer of 1945, a native movement led by Ho Chi Minh tried to set up a socialist regime. But France returned to reimpose its colonial rule, resulting in nine years of warfare. When this conflict ended in French defeat, Vietnam was split in 1954 into a communist north and a pro-Western south, to prepare for general elections and reunification.

Fearful that a communist win might draw adjacent countries such as Laos and Cambodia into the socialist sphere—the “Domino Theory”—the U.S. administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower persuaded the South Vietnamese to refuse to hold elections, instead creating a separate republic under President Ngo Dinh Diem. The communists of North Vietnam countered by covertly launching a guerrilla campaign into the south by 1960, aimed at toppling the Diem regime.

At first, South Vietnamese forces were able to contain this unrest, with help from 400 U.S. Green Beret Special Forces advisors sent by President John F. Kennedy. However, a major communist offensive with Chinese-supplied weaponry inflicted such heavy casualties in January 1963 that Washington increased its personnel to 16,000 and lost faith in Diem. Perceived as corrupt and biased in favor of the Catholic minority against the Buddhist majority, Diem was murdered in early November during a military coup that destabilized South Vietnam. In the ensuing uncertainty, communist guerrillas made great inroads in rural areas.

Determined to prevent an ideological defeat, President Lyndon B. Johnson hugely increased U.S. forces, which peaked at slightly less than 560,000 troops by 1968. Heavy bombing raids struck communist supply routes in the jungles of Laos and North Vietnam. The Soviet Union and China countered by providing anti-aircraft missiles and vast amounts of arms to their allies, and fighting mushroomed. Despite besting the communists on the battlefield, however, American forces were not able to snuff out resistance, and South Vietnamese morale evaporated. American and world opinion grew weary of the endless violence, which eventually claimed 58,200 U.S. lives and 153,300 wounded, plus millions of Vietnamese. Johnson himself became so disillusioned that he refused to run for reelection.

It was left to his successor, President Richard M. Nixon, to rebuild the South Vietnamese Army so that U.S. forces might disengage. Bombing raids and cross-border offensives nonetheless continued until late 1972, by which time American forces were reduced to 27,000 individuals. The peace accord signed in Paris on January 27, 1973, finalized the withdrawal of the United States, abandoning South Vietnam to its fate. Although Washington promised support, the United States did nothing as North Vietnamese forces regrouped and refitted. They then overran outlying provinces and launched a final crushing offensive in March 1975. Floods of refugees preceded their columns, speeding the fall of one city after another, until T-54 tanks rolled into the empty U.S. Embassy compound in Saigon.

Argentina will remain in the grip of this dictatorship until the military is finally disgraced by its failed invasion attempt against the Falklands in 1982 (see “Falklands Campaign”), after which democratic elections result in President Raúl Alfonsín being voted into office by December 1983.

MARCH 31, 1975. Suspected of accepting bribes from the United Fruit Company, López Arellano is stripped of his position as head of the Honduran armed forces in favor of Col. Juan Alberto Melgar Castro, who also supplants him in the presidency three weeks later.

APRIL 19, 1975. Some 70 ERP guerrillas in five vehicles assault the 121st Argentine Army arsenal in the city of Rosario, suffering four killed before making off with a considerable amount of weaponry. The base commander, Col. Arturo Carapani Costa, is also killed, while seven of his soldiers are wounded.

MAY 27, 1975. Some 140 ERP guerrillas under their leaders Asdrubal Santucho and Hugo Irurzún seize the Sorteís Ranch, 10 miles from the 5th Argentine Infantry Brigade base at Famaillá in the province of Tucumán, resting overnight and even making a propaganda film in anticipation of taking that military outpost by surprise the next evening in an attack timed to coincide with the annual “Army Day” festivities.

Instead, as 117 guerrillas are being driven aboard four commandeered vehicles toward their target on May 28, they stumble upon two subalterns and a dozen soldiers of the 5th Engineering Battalion, who are painting the village schoolhouse of Vietnam War.

Manchalá as part of a civic “hearts-and-minds” campaign. A firefight immediately erupts, the soldiers becoming besieged inside the building until one officer escapes and runs overland to Famaillá for reinforcements. The approach of this column at nightfall causes the guerrillas to melt into the hills, abandoning their vehicles and materiel. The victorious troops find a list in one truck naming more than 400 clandestine ERP operatives in the province, whose arrests will cripple the rural movement.

JULY 25, 1975. Montonero guerrillas launch a series of coordinated attacks in the Buenos Aires suburbs of Vicente López, San Martín, General Sarmiento, and Tigre, destroying numerous police stations, two banks, 60 automobiles, and at least 400 boats when they set fire to various marinas.

AUGUST 27, 1975. Montonero divers attach a mine to the hull of the 4,100-ton Argentine destroyer Santísima Trinidad while still under construction at the Río Santiago naval yard. The resultant blast will delay its launch by several weeks.

AUGUST 29, 1975. In Peru, almost seven years of ruinous leftist policies implemented by its authoritarian Velasco Alvarado have resulted in inflation, unemployment, and food shortages, while the president himself is convalescing at Chacacayo near Lima after losing a leg to an embolism. Several prominent military commanders consequently rebel at the southern city of Tacna, being joined by virtually every regional commander, and Prime Minister Francisco Morales Bermúdez is appointed president by acclamation. Unable to resist, Velasco Alvarado addresses the nation, accepting this outcome before retiring into private life.

OCTOBER 5, 1975. A raiding party of 60 Montonero guerrillas attempts to seize the 29th Infantry Regiment headquarters in the town of Formosa, being repelled with 16 dead; a dozen Argentine soldiers and 2 policemen also lose their lives. The fleeing Montoneros hijack a Boeing 737 airliner at the local airport, compelling its pilot to land in a field near Santa Fe so that they might escape.

OCTOBER 8–9, 1975. In a series of nocturnal clashes that leaves six Argentine soldiers dead and two wounded, government forces kill four ERP leaders and wound six others near the hamlets of El Quincho and Tafi Viejo, in the remote province of Tucumán. Sixteen more guerrillas are slain at San Gabriel Creek near Acheral, on October 10, by helicopter-borne troops, after which the main ERP jungle encampment is overrun eight days later, effectively ending their rural campaign.

LATE NOVEMBER 1975. Teams of Montonero saboteurs, in a coordinated evening attack, ignite dozens of arson fires along the length of Avenida del Libertador in northern Buenos Aires, reducing scores of banks and businesses to ashes between La Lucila Bridge and Tigre.

DECEMBER 18, 1975. Brig. Gen. Jesús Orlando Capellini leads the Argentine Air Force in a brief mutiny against the ineffectual leadership of President de Perón by detaining his superiors and bombarding the presidential palace with air-dropped pamphlets. The army and navy refuse to join, though, hence these mutineers are subdued four days later when their Morón Air Base is stormed.

DECEMBER 23, 1975. Preceded by a series of diversionary attacks throughout metropolitan Buenos Aires, this evening a couple hundred ERP guerrillas attempt to carry the 601st Army Battalion’s “Domingo Viejobuena” arsenal, on the southern fringe at Monte Chingolo. Its defenders—alerted by an agent infiltrated into ERP ranks—suffer 10 dead and a dozen wounded, yet swift counterattacks by helicopter-borne troops quickly surround and rout the guerrillas, who suffer more than 60 killed and dozens wounded during their flight. Their morale already shaken prior to this bloody repulse, the ERP movement virtually ceases to exist as a viable threat.

MARCH 15, 1976. President Videla of Argentina narrowly escapes a Montonero assassination attempt in Buenos Aires, his limousine entering naval headquarters through its Edificio Libertador side entrance an instant before a parked car bomb is detonated by remote control. Four colonels on his staff, eight subalterns, five soldiers, and six civilians are nonetheless wounded, and a passing driver is killed.

JUNE 18, 1976. Gen. Cesáreo Cardozo, head of Argentina’s Federal Police, is assassinated by a bomb placed under his bed by an 18-year-old Montonera woman operative, who is a friend of his daughter.

JULY 2, 1976. A disguised Montonero operative penetrates the dining hall at Argentina’s Federal Security building, leaving behind a briefcase bomb that kills 16 and wounds 65.

OCTOBER 10, 1976. Having penetrated the Montoneros' organizational secrets, Argentine troops arrest scores of mid- and high-level operatives in a two-day sweep, followed by the seizure of various weapons caches as of October 16. Surviving cells will continue to commit assassinations and bombings over the next couple of years, but the Montonero threat is greatly diminished.

FEBRUARY 28, 1977. A remote-controlled Montonero bomb narrowly misses the plane of Argentine president Videla as it taxis to take off from the Buenos Aires airport.

MAY 2, 1977. After a six-year mediation, legal experts of Queen Elizabeth II of Great Britain reaffirm the decision given by the International Court of Justice at The Hague, which has awarded the long-disputed Picton, Lennox, and Nueva islands at the eastern mouth of Beagle Channel (lying just south of Tierra del Fuego, at the very bottom of South America) to Chilean control. Argentina refuses to accept this verdict—which can potentially affect 30,000 square miles of sea with their commensurate fishing, mineral, and oil rights—so the government of President Videla instead seeks to press its claim directly, sending Adm. Julio Tosti to Santiago three days later to propose talks with President Pinochet of Chile. However, repeated meetings and diplomatic exchanges over the next eight months will fail to resolve this issue to Argentina's satisfaction.

JANUARY 10, 1978. Pedro Joaquín Chamorro, publisher and editor of Nicaragua's main opposition newspaper La Prensa, is assassinated by three unknown machine gunners believed to be members of Somoza's National Guard. This brutal act galvanizes public indignation, resulting in 50,000 people attending his funeral, as well as massive street demonstrations and a general strike.

JULY 21, 1978. Bolivia's dictator Hugo Bánzer, dissatisfied when a rigged presidential election has failed to return his designated surrogate, 47-year-old air force general Juan Pereda Asbún, has annulled the results on grounds of massive fraud. The disappointed Pereda instead deposes Bánzer in a bloodless coup and assumes office.

AUGUST 1978. Popular uprisings occur at Matagalpa, Jinotepa, Esteli, and Masaya against the rule of Nicaraguan dictator Somoza.

AUGUST 7, 1978. In Honduras, the unpopular administration of President Melgar Castro is deposed in a bloodless coup engineered by the 45-year-old general Policarpo Paz García, head of the armed forces, who assumes leadership over a three-member junta that includes the air force commander and chief of military security. Although elections are held two years later, repression also increases throughout this period, especially the activities of a secret right-wing paramilitary death squad known as "Batallón 3-16," trained by the CIA.

AUGUST 22, 1978. Sandinista Revolt. After several months of increasing turmoil, the two-year-old Tercerista or "Third Force" guerrilla faction of brothers Daniel and Umberto Ortega Saavedra score a major propaganda triumph when 25 of its members under Edén Pastora Gómez—his nom de guerre being Comandante Cero or “Commander Zero”—infiltrate Nicaragua’s National Palace and hold 2,000 people hostage before escaping into Panama. This daring coup, coupled with growing diplomatic displeasure out of Washington, emboldens opposition against Somoza’s rule.

Augusto Pinochet. (Organization of American States)

EARLY SEPTEMBER 1978. Beagle Channel Confrontation. Concerned that Argentina’s determination to overturn the international decision awarding Picton, Lennox, and Nueva islands at the tip of South America to Chile might lead to open warfare, the Chilean Foreign Ministry at Santiago discreetly requests diplomatic intervention from the United States, Britain, Germany, Spain, or the Vatican. The Argentine junta meanwhile prepares for hostilities by spending $180 million on the acquisition of new ordinance and weaponry from abroad, which Chile cannot match as it is restricted by an embargo imposed after Pinochet’s deposal of Allende (see “September 11, 1973” entry).

By October 1978, Argentina’s I Army Corps—consisting of two full regiments of the 1st Armored Cavalry Brigade, a light-reconnaissance unit, heavy field artillery, and the 10th Infantry Brigade from Palermo—begins departing Buenos Aires to redeploy into jump-off positions near the Chilean border. Gen. Leopoldo Fortunato Galtieri also leads the like-sized II Army Corps—comprised of the 2nd Armored Cavalry Brigade and 7th Infantry Brigade—into forward positions, along with the 9th Mountain Infantry Brigade and 601st Antiaircraft Artillery Group, while the 24th Infantry Regiment is sent far to the south and sustained in that stark wasteland by a steady stream of Boeing 707 and 747 transports. The Argentine Navy and Marines conduct vigorous training exercises as well, all as part of a buildup for an operation to be code-named SOBERANÍA or “SOVEREIGNTY.” According to its strategic planners, the Argentine junta will denounce Chile’s “encroachment” into Atlantic waters before the UN Security Council, then send amphibious forces to expel them from Freycinet, Herschel, Wallaston, Deceyt, and Hornos islets. If any Chilean counteraction should occur, Punta Arenas and Puerto Williams are to be bombed by Argentine naval aircraft. In the event of a still broader response, Argentine armies will strike across the Andes from Mendoza and Jujuy—and most especially from Neuquén through Pueyhué Pass—to cut Chile in half.

The Chilean authorities cannot match the size of Argentine deployments; nevertheless, they mass 5,000 troops on Tierra del Fuego’s Isla Grande. Three full infantry regiments and an artillery regiment, all under Lt. Col. Oscar Vargas, plus another 10,000 soldiers, are scattered throughout the surrounding archipelago, while heavier naval vessels under Vice Adm. Raúl López Silva shift southward to bolster the 135-ton Jaguar torpedo-boats Guacolda, Fresia, Tegualda, and Quidora that are conducting patrols out of Puerto Williams. Eventually, López Silva will command five missile-armed Chilean warships: his cruiser Arturo Prat (flag), the 3,750-ton, British-built destroyers Almirante Riveros and Almirante Williams, as well as the frigates Almirante Lynch and Almirante Condell, supported by the fleet tanker Araucano and auxiliary Yelcho. His subordinate, Rear Adm. Sergio Sánchez Luna, leads a second squadron comprised of the less sophisticated 9,300-ton cruiser Almirante Latorre (former Swedish Göta Lejon), the destroyers Centeno and Portales, plus the 3,000-ton, World War II–vintage, Fletcher-class destroyers Almirante Blanco Encalada (former USS Wadleigh) and Almirante Cochrane (former USS Rooks).

The Argentines enjoy a considerable advantage in the modernity of their forces, while the number of their troops and marines facing the Chileans across the Tierra del Fuego archipelago soon rises to 12,000, backed by the 130-man, 1,000-ton patrol ships King and Murature under Rear Adm. Luis de los Ríos Echeverría, plus the support ships Orella, Serrano, and Uribe. Diplomatic statements emanating out of Buenos Aires become ever more menacing, and by early December, Argentine carrier and amphibious forces stand out to sea in anticipation of actually mounting the assault. The disembarkation force sails aboard the 125-man, 8,000-ton landing ship tank or LST Cabo San Antonio and the 250-man, 9,400-ton Ashland-class landing ship dock or LSD Cándido de Lasala (former USS Gunston Hall), escorted by the 1st Destroyer Division—the 13,500-ton light cruiser General Belgrano (former USS Phoenix, a Pearl Harbor survivor), the 180-man, 3,200-ton, Sumner-class destroyer Hipólito Bouchard (former USS Borie), the 230-man, 3,000-ton Almirante Domecq García (former USS Braine), and the 180-man, 3,300-ton Seguí (former USS Hank).

However, the disputed islands are mere wind-swept rocks, accessible only via a few small beaches, which are now defended by an entrenched regiment of Chilean regulars from the Caupolicán, Maipó, and Arica battalions, plus marine detachments from the warships Lynch, Aldea, and Cochrane, as well as a company of commandos from the 5th Division. Any Argentine offensive will therefore have to be preceded by an aerial bombardment by Rear Adm. Humberto J. Barbuzzi's carrier group, hovering farther east above the shallow Burdwood Bank, to minimize the danger from any Chilean submarines. The carrier group consists of the 1,200-man, 19,750-ton light fleet carrier 25 de Mayo (former British Venerable), escorted by the 2nd Destroyer Division: the 300-man, 4,100-ton, Type-42 Hércules; the 180-man, 3,200-ton Piedra Buena (former USS Collett); the 200-man, 3,500-ton Comodoro Py (ex-USS Perkins); and the 230-man, 3,000-ton Almirante Storni (former USS Cowell). They are also accompanied by the modern 95-man, 1,250-ton, Type-A69 light missile frigates or corvettes Guerrico (former French Commandant l'Herminier) and Drummond (former French Lieutenant de Vaisseau l'Henalf), as well as the 140-man, 16,300-ton fleet tanker Punta Médanos.

Realizing that a diplomatic rupture is imminent, Venezuelan president Carlos Andrés Pérez telephones U.S. president Jimmy Carter on December 9, who in turn contacts the new pontiff John Paul II, who offers to mediate the dispute two days later. Chile accepts, yet when its delegate Manuel Hernán Cubillos reaches Buenos Aires on the evening of December 12, he finds President Videla still intractable. After three days of fruitless talks, Chile braces for war, and tensions once again escalate as more than 300,000 fighting men are now mobilized along both sides of the border. On December 19, it is anticipated that Ambassador Enrique Ros will lodge Argentina's complaint before the United Nations. Admiral Barbuzzi accelerates the advance of his invasion force east of Isla de los Estados, so the Chilean admiral López Silva is informed from naval headquarters at Santiago to prepare for an outbreak of hostilities by the next dawn. He therefore leads his squadron southwestward out to sea from its O'Brien Channel anchorage (100 miles from Cape Horn) to gain room to maneuver.

Fortuitously, though, a huge storm engulfs the entire Tierra del Fuego region, preventing the 25 de Mayo from launching its aircraft on December 20; instead, it has to reverse course and run eastward by evening. The invasion force is also slowed, and the Argentine disembarkation is postponed until dawn of December 22, while none of its more than 100 warplanes can even take off from their land bases at Ushuaia, Río Gallegos, or Río Grande. This unexpected reprieve allows Videla time to reconsider, and Argentina's junta finally bows to U.S. pressure and accepts the offer of papal mediation by nightfall on December 21. Although a few units from the 10th Argentine Infantry Brigade advance into Chilean territory from Neuquén, they are quickly recalled the next day, while the storm-tossed Argentine fleet retires into its main base of Puerto Belgrano. By New Year's Day 1979, both sides have stood down the bulk of their forces.

A little more than four years later, a "Treaty of Peace and Friendship" is signed at the Vatican, whereby the Chileans retain ownership over the disputed islands, while the Argentines are assured that territorial rights will not be extended into Atlantic waters.

NOVEMBER 24, 1978. In Bolivia, a group of democratically minded officers led by the head of its army, 47-year-old general David Padilla Arancibia, deposes the illegitimate president Pereda. Padilla will subsequently authorize new elections, but these will only result in the installation of a compromise candidate nine months later, failing to resolve the country's fractured politics.

MAY 4, 1979. Armed uprisings erupt in León, Matagalpa, Masaya, and even some sections of the capital Managua, against the Nicaraguan dictator Somoza. After initially recoiling into its bases, Somoza's National Guard is able to reclaim the capital one month later.

JULY 17, 1979. After being pinned inside Managua by 5,000 Sandinista guerrillas and 15,000 militia supporters, Somoza and many of his officers flee Nicaragua, allowing Ortega's victorious columns to enter the capital two days later. This guerrilla coalition quickly splinters, having only been held together by their hatred of the now-departed dictator. Ortega's embrace of Marxist ideology, as well as Cuban and Soviet aid, produces a split internally, and internationally with Washington.

OCTOBER 15, 1979. Salvadoran Civil War. Plagued by economic collapse and a surging leftist guerrilla movement in both urban and rural settings, a group of military officers and civilian leaders unite to depose 55-year-old general Carlos Humberto Romero from the presidency of El Salvador, replacing him with a "Revolutionary Government Junta." This new government—comprised of two colonels and three civilians—enjoys American support at first, though it will prove to be fractious and ineffectual. Some moderate elements support land reform and nationalization of vital industries, while right-wing members from the oligarchy organize secret death squads out of army ranks to target opponents. Suspected guerrillas and their Marxist sympathizers, as well as other “subversives,” are murdered in orchestrated campaigns, the paramilitary perpetrators never being brought to justice.

Street celebrations in the Nicaraguan capital of Managua after Somoza's departure. (Organization of American States)

Three of the nation's largest guerrilla groups unite on December 17, 1979, through the mediation of Cuba's Fidel Castro, to more effectively oppose Salvador's new administration. On January 22, 1980, an antigovernment demonstration is put down in the capital with 200 casualties, then on March 24, the 62-year-old archbishop and Nobel Peace Prize-nominee Oscar Romero—an outspoken critic who has called upon Washington not to provide any further military assistance—is assassinated while officiating at Mass. He is killed by a sniper team sent by Maj. Roberto D'Aubuisson, head of Salvador's Military Intelligence unit.

This murder galvanizes the country into a dozen years of bloody and destructive civil war, uniting the opposition because of the patent impossibility of expecting anything but violent repression from the extreme right wing of the military.

FEBRUARY 25, 1980. The government of Henck A. E. Arron, prime minister of Suriname—a former Dutch colony granted independence by the Netherlands little more than four years previously—is overthrown by a military coup of noncommissioned officers led by Sgt. Maj. Dési Delano Bouterse. He assumes the title of “Chairman of the National Military Council,” serving as de facto ruler for the next dozen years, despite retaining a figurehead president for the country.

FEBRUARY 27, 1980. This evening, 17 M-19 guerrillas, disguised in jogging suits, storm the Dominican Embassy in a suburb of Bogotá, suffering a single individual killed before securing a party of 60 hostages, including diplomats from 15 different countries. Rosenberg Pabón, the guerrilla leader using the pseudonym “Comandante Uno,” demands the release of 311 jailed comrades from the Colombian government and a $50 million ransom. Protracted negotiations finally conclude 61 days later when the 16 guerrillas accept $2.5 million and vacate the embassy on April 27 with a dozen hostages, being cheered on their way to the airport to board a Cuban airliner and fly to asylum in Havana.

APRIL 1980. Violeta Barrios de Chamorro—widow of the slain Prensa editor (see “January 10, 1978” entry)—forms the anti-Sandinista Alianza Revolucionaria Democrática or ARDE coalition along with Alonso Robelo and the ex-guerrilla chieftain Edén Pastora.

APRIL 1, 1980. A trickle of boats begins reaching Florida out of the Cuban port of Mariel, bearing refugees from the Castro regime. Within the next couple of weeks, their numbers will swell into the hundreds, as eventually an estimated 125,000 people flee the island before Castro’s government closes this outlet by the end of September.

MAY 17, 1980. After a court in Miami acquits four white police officers accused of killing Arthur McDuffie, a black insurance executive, three days of race riots ensue.

JULY 17, 1980. In troubled Bolivia, the arch-conservative general Luis García Meza Tejada seizes power in La Paz, amid dozens of murders. He immediately outlaws all political parties, exiles his opponents, represses the unions, muzzles the press, and unleashes a brutal regime that will slay at least 1,000 civilians during the ensuing year. These acts are stage managed by his minister of the interior, Col. Luis Arce Gómez, who openly warns dissidents to “walk around with their written wills under their arms.”

Because of García Meza’s close ties to drug traffickers, his seizure of power is known as the “Cocaine Coup.” Isolated internationally because of such brazen criminality, he is obliged to resign by August 3, 1981, fleeing into exile in Brazil. Later, both he and Arce will be extradited and sentenced to long prison terms.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1980. While living in exile in Asunción (Paraguay), the former Nicaraguan dictator “Tachito” Somoza is assassinated, allegedly by a commando team led by the Argentine-born leftist Enrique Gorriarán Merlo.

OCTOBER 10, 1980. All five of Salvador’s guerrilla movements, representing some 6,500–7,500 fighters, coalesce into the Frente “Farabundo Martí” de Liberación Nacional or “Farabundo Martí Front for National Liberation,” better known as the FMLN.

DECEMBER 1980. President Jimmy Carter suspends military aid to the Salvadoran government to protest its many human-rights abuses.

JANUARY 10, 1981. Salvador’s recently united guerrilla front launches its first major offensive, knowing that government forces are hamstrung by their lack of American material support. The rebels soon establish operational control over large sections of Morazán and Chalatenango departments, which they will retain until the conclusion of hostilities; however, they are unable to advance further.

JULY 1981. The new Republican administration of President Ronald Reagan resumes military aid to the Salvadoran government, fearing a socialist takeover by leftist guerrillas.

JULY 31, 1981. Panama’s strongman, General Torrijos, is killed in a mysterious plane crash.

SEPTEMBER 1981. The Central American colony of Belize gains its independence from Britain, along with a pledge of military support from London against any projected invasion by neighboring Guatemala.

NOVEMBER 23, 1981. U.S. president Reagan signs the top-secret National Security Decision Directive-17, authorizing the CIA to recruit and support “Contra” guerrillas in an attempt to overthrow the government of Nicaragua.

JANUARY 27, 1982. Guerrillas attack Ilopango Air Force Base in central Salvador, destroying or damaging a dozen aircraft and seven helicopters—approximately half the Salvadoran Air Force's strength. These losses are immediately made up by the U.S. government.

MARCH 7, 1982. In Guatemala, President Fernando Romeo Lucas García's handpicked successor—Gen. Ángel Aníbal Guevara—is defeated at the polls, yet nonetheless claims victory. This attempted fraud provokes a military coup on March 23, with generals Efraín Ríos Montt and Horacio Egberto Maldonado Schaad briefly sharing power, along with Col. Francisco Luis Gordillo Martínez. The latter two are jettisoned from this triumvirate by June 9, Ríos Montt remaining alone as president.

JUNE 1982. FMLN guerrillas seize control of Chalatenango and Morazán provinces in central and eastern Salvador, respectively.

DECEMBER 8, 1982. Amid civilian protests against the military regime governing Suriname under its corrupt strongman Bouterse, 15 prominent political opponents are shot dead in Fort Zeelandia. The Netherlands and the United States consequently sever their foreign-aid assistance, and Bouterse must seek aid from Cuba and other socialist satellites.

JANUARY 28, 1983. FMLN guerrillas assault the 1st Brigade's headquarters near the capital city of San Salvador.

AUGUST 1983. Guatemala's President Ríos Montt is overthrown by a military coup led by Gen. Oscar Mejía Víctores.

DECEMBER 14, 1983. In Chile, the outlawed Communist Party's Frente Patriótico Manuel Rodríguez or "Manuel Rodríguez Patriotic Front" (FPMR) guerrilla group causes a national blackout, thereby inaugurating a terrorist campaign intended to destabilize the Pinochet regime. Hundreds of bombings, acts of sabotage, kidnappings, and assassinations will ensue over the next 13 years.

MAY 30, 1984. At a press conference, anti-Sandinista guerrilla chief Edén Pastora narrowly escapes assassination by a bomb hidden in a journalist's camera.

MAY 13, 1985. In a tactic intended to end a stand-off with a radical African American group called

MOVE, the members of which are barricaded in its headquarters on a Philadelphia street, an explosive device is dropped that causes a conflagration, killing all 11 members and consuming 61 homes.

NOVEMBER 6, 1985. At 11:40 a.m., 28 guerrillas under Luis Otero of the M-19 movement shoot their way into the basement of the Palace of Justice in Colombia's capital of Bogotá, a brazen attack designed to underscore their displeasure with the recent abrogation of a cease-fire by the government of President Belisario Betancur Cuartas. Soldiers and policemen quickly take up firing positions in adjacent edifices; however, when an Urutú light tank attempts to break down a palace door shortly after noon, it must retire under accurate counterfire.

Minutes past 1:00 p.m., though, troops from the Presidential Guard fight their way into the Palace of Justice basement, and a Cascabel tank flattens the main door shortly before 2:00. Meanwhile, a pair of helicopters disgorges "Special Operations" commandoes onto the rooftop, who free a number of wounded and terrified hostages. Fierce floor-to-floor fighting ensues within the vast complex. Otero's guerrillas, expecting protracted negotiations, are shaken by the vigorous counterassaults and threaten to murder their scores of remaining hostages before they themselves die fighting. Exchanges of gunfire nonetheless continue until 5:45 p.m., when a fire breaks out on the fourth floor, obliging the guerrillas and their captives to recongregate on the third floor. Flames consume a great deal of the structure overnight, as firemen are unable to enter.

Frequent volleys gradually deplete the guerrillas' ammunition, until the soldiers gain the third floor by noon of November 7, pressing their foes back until their last position is overrun; all resistance ceases two and a half hours later. It is believed that at least 115 people have been slain during this protracted bloodbath, including 11 supreme court justices. The American government, aware of the Medellín cartel's close connections with the M-19 movement, is convinced that this seizure has been orchestrated to impede the extradition of drug lords to stand trial in the United States, as most court documents—including all pending extradition requests—lie consumed amid the ashes.

FEBRUARY 7, 1986. After several months of street disturbances and mounting international pressure, the 34-year-old Haitian dictator Jean-Claude “Baby Doc” Duvalier flees overnight into exile in France, with his wife and 20 relations aboard a U.S. Air Force transport. He is temporarily replaced in office by a five-man junta headed by his army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Henri Namphy.

MAY 1986. At sea off the northern coast of Chile, FPMR guerrillas receive a secret shipment of 80 tons of Cuban weaponry and funds, smuggling them ashore at Carrizal Bajo inlet to be concealed. Most are discovered by security forces in early August, however, and confiscated.

JUNE 18, 1986. Several hundred captive Sendero Luminoso or “Shining Path” guerrillas, held in three separate Peruvian prisons, rise up in a concerted revolt, seconded by a string of bombings throughout the country by their outside supporters. The 37-year-old leftist president Alan García responds by sending troops into the prisons to restore order, who brutally quell these uprisings over the next few days by slaughtering at least 300 inmates.

LATE JUNE 1986. Sgt. Ronnie Brunswijk, a Ndjuka Maroon from the interior of Suriname, rises up in revolt against the corrupt Bouterse regime. An army assault destroys the hapless Bosneger town of Mongo Tapu, inaugurating four years of cruel warfare against Brunswijk’s elusive “Jungle Commandoes,” which will see thousands of Maroons flee into the safety of neighboring French Guiana.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1986. In Chile, a score of FPMR guerrillas ambush the convoy of President Pinochet as he is returning into its capital of Santiago from his country home at El Melocotón. Although five of his police escorts are killed and his armored Mercedes-Benz limousine is struck by a Low rocket, he survives when it fails to detonate.

OCTOBER 10, 1986. A massive earthquake strikes El Salvador, killing at least 1,500 people in its capital and leaving widespread devastation. Hostilities between the government and FMLN guerrillas go into abeyance as the country strives to recuperate.

DECEMBER 11, 1986. The Honduran Army repels a Sandinista cross-border incursion into El Paraíso in south-central Honduras, aimed at punishing Contra activities.

JANUARY 16, 1987. President León Febres Cordero of Ecuador is kidnapped by members of the air force to win release of the imprisoned coup leader, Gen. Frank Vargas.

APRIL 15, 1987. Facing indictment in civilian court for his role in Argentina’s “Dirty War” against leftist dissenters during the 1970s (see “Late December 1974” entry), Maj. Ernesto Barreiro—former interrogator at the notorious La Perla prison—takes sanctuary at an army base outside Córdoba, 400 miles northwest of Buenos Aires. He is supported by 130 officers and soldiers yet flees a few days later, after 61-year-old president Raúl Alfonsín flies back from his Easter vacation at Chascomas to implement vigorous countermeasures.

A second, more serious insurrection, however, quickly erupts at Campo de Mayo 20 miles outside the capital, where Lt. Col. Aldo Rico spearheads a revolt demanding amnesty for all remaining officers accused of human-rights violations, plus dismissal of 23 generals deemed weak in upholding the army’s honor (including the 56-year-old chief of staff Héctor Ríos Ereñu). Alfonsín has Campo de Mayo surrounded by more than 1,000 troops, then flies in by helicopter on April 19 to negotiate with Rico, returning to inform huge throngs before his presidential palace that the rebellion is ended.

Subsequent developments, though, suggest that Alfonsín has conceded much to the mutineers, for although Rico is stripped of his rank and arrested, Ríos Ereñu also resigns in favor of intelligence chief José Segundo Dante Caridi, along with another 15 generals. After further unrest at infantry garrisons in the northern provinces of Salta and Tucumán on April 21, it becomes obvious that civilian trials of military atrocities are to be indefinitely suspended.

JANUARY 1988. Another contingent of Argentine troops mutinies under Rico, this time at Monte Caseros in the Province of Corrientes, some 300 surrendering to face arrest a few days later.

FEBRUARY 1988. The U.S. Congress finally prevents all aid from reaching the CIA-backed Contras, who have failed in their eight-year campaign to topple Ortega’s Sandinista regime in Nicaragua.

MARCH 1988. A large-scale Sandinista incursion into neighboring Honduras prompts the dispatch of U.S. reinforcements, and war along the border is averted at the last minute.

MAY 11, 1988. Amid growing internal unrest, two Guatemalan army garrisons revolt and march upon its capital to depose the civilian president Vinicio Cerezo. He manages to remain in office but with diminished authority.

JUNE 19, 1988. Haitian lieutenant general Henri Namphy overthrows civilian president Leslie Manigat, who has attempted to dismiss him from his position as army chief of staff.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1988. Namphy is deposed as Haiti's president by Brig. Gen. Prosper Avril, backed by army noncommissioned officers and the "Dessalines" Battalion.

OCTOBER 5, 1988. The administration of Chile's dictator Augusto Pinochet is defeated in a national plebiscite when he seeks to renew his mandate.

DECEMBER 1988. Argentine troops of the "Albatross" Special Operations Unit under extreme right-wing colonel Mohamed Ali Seineldin—Argentine-born, but of Arab extraction—mutiny at their barracks in Villa Martelli outside Buenos Aires, soon being joined by another 1,000 members of the armed forces. They surrender a few days later, but only Seineldin and Maj. Hugo Abete are actually arrested to stand trial.

JANUARY 23, 1989. At 6:15 a.m., a band of leftist urban guerrillas from the Movimiento "Todos por la Patria" or MTP drives eight civilian vehicles into La Tablada Army Base, 12 miles southwest of Buenos Aires, surprising its 3rd Argentine Infantry Regiment. However, reinforced by 500 policemen, tanks, and artillery, the troops eventually succeed in crushing this incursion 30 hours later, killing 28 rebels and capturing another 20, while suffering 9 dead and 53 wounded among their own ranks.

FEBRUARY 3, 1989. End of Stroessner's Regime. Before sunrise in the Paraguayan capital of Asunción, two-dozen tanks and troops of the I Army Corps attack the residence of the mistress of 76-year-old dictator Alfredo Stroessner, who is known to be inside ailing from prostate cancer. After an eight-hour exchange with loyal troops that claims more than 300 lives, the despot is captured, ending his 34-year rule.

The coup has been engineered by Stroessner's second-in-command, 64-year-old general Andrés Rodríguez—whose daughter is married to Stroessner's son Freddy—but who now succeeds as the dominant Colorado Party candidate for president, while the deposed leader is allowed to fly into Brazilian exile two days later.

FEBRUARY 16, 1989. With Venezuela suffering through a prolonged economic crisis, President Carlos Andrés Pérez has decided to inaugurate his second term by implementing "free-market reforms" proposed by the International Monetary Fund, which entail harsh austerity measures. Protest riots erupt as of February 27 in the town of Guarenas in the state of Miranda, 20 miles east of Caracas, spreading into some of the capital's poorest neighborhoods—such as Caricuao, Nuevo Circo, and La Guaira—by that same afternoon. Social order disintegrates as more than a dozen cities are engulfed in looting, until martial law is declared the next day and troops are deployed to restore order. Official tallies list 276 deaths, more than 1,000 injuries, plus 2,000 arrests, yet unofficial estimates range much higher, placing the number of dead at perhaps 3,000.

AUGUST 18, 1989. With a comfortable lead in the polls, the Colombian presidential candidate Luis Carlos Galán is brazenly assassinated at a political rally near Bogotá by drug-cartel hit men. Most of the assassins are later murdered themselves to ensure their silence.

NOVEMBER 1989. Salvadoran guerrillas of the FMLN movement catch government forces off guard by launching another major offensive, which seizes control over large sections of the country and fights its way into the very capital of San Salvador, but without toppling the government. Guerrilla positions in poor neighborhoods are then subjected to aerial bombardment during a government counter-attack, while the Sheraton Hotel is reclaimed floor by floor in bloody fighting, and this FMLN offensive fails.

Nevertheless, the very strength of its showing persuades Washington that the guerrilla movement cannot be defeated militarily; the U.S. government therefore shifts its policy to seeking a negotiated peace, which will be achieved a couple of years later.

FALKLANDS CAMPAIGN (1982)

On December 20, 1981, an Argentine scrap-metal dealer named Constantino Davidoff visits the uninhabited port of Leith on South Georgia Island, a distant corner of the Falkland Archipelago, having secured a contract from the British government to strip that harbor's abandoned whaling installations. After his initial survey, Davidoff returns to Buenos Aires and is informed that he should have also reported his visit to the British Antarctic Survey Team at their lonely South Georgia outpost of Grytviken.

Davidoff apologizes and requests instructions for his next visit, yet none are provided before he sets sail again aboard the 100-man, 5,300-ton, Canadian-built, Argentine Navy icebreaker Bahía Buen Suceso and disembarks 41 laborers in Stromness Bay on March 19, 1982. They include disguised Argentine naval personnel, who raise a flag and sing their national anthem before preparing to start work. Four British scientists observe this ceremony from a distance and inform the salvage workers that their presence on South Georgia is illegal, radioing Gov. Rex Hunt at the Falklands's capital of Stanley (commonly referred to as Port Stanley), 800 miles farther to the west. The latter in turn requests that London authorize him to dispatch a small Royal Marine detachment aboard the elderly, lightly armed, 3,600-ton ice-patrol vessel HMS Endurance of Capt. Nicholas Barker to remove these Argentine visitors.

Most of the civilian salvors withdraw voluntarily when the Bahía Buen Suceso sails away from Stromness Bay on March 21, yet the new military junta that has governed Argentina since mid-December 1981 under the leadership of general and titular president Leopoldo F. Galtieri, Adm. Jorge Isaac Anaya, and Air Force brigadier general Arturo "Lami" Dozo has been secretly planning for a full-blown invasion in May 1982 to wrest what they refer to as the Malvinas Islands from Great Britain (a bone of contention between both nations ever since 1833; see sidebar titled "The Falklands" in "Minor Disputes"). Admiral Anaya has especially favored this so-called Project Azul or "Blue," believing that Argentina's recent rebuff in the Beagle Channel dispute (see "Early September 1978" entry in "Latin American Troubles") means that the seizure of the Falklands represents their best chance of controlling sea traffic around Cape Horn. The junta's efforts at easing their nation's soaring inflation and political malaise have instead sparked bloody riots in Buenos Aires on the night of March 30, resulting in 1,500 arrests, hence the military leadership decides to press the Falklands issue and move up its invasion scheme in the hope that an overseas confrontation will rally Argentina behind its rule.

An intense diplomatic exchange therefore commences with the government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in London, while the Argentine authorities stealthily counter the impending visit to Leith by the Endurance by dispatching the 125-man, 9,200-ton naval transport Bahía Paraíso from the Orcadas on March 23 to bolster their 12 operatives remaining from the scrap-metal workers with more than 100 members of the "Alfa" group of Buzo Táctico or "Tactical Diver" commandos under Lt. Cmdr. Alfredo Astiz (known as Lagartos or "Alligators," similar to U.S. Navy SEALs).

MARCH 24, 1982. Amid escalating tensions, 22 Royal Marines from Stanley under Lt. Keith Mills land at Grytviken from HMS Endurance, and shortly before midnight, they observe the Argentine Buzo Táctico commandos being disembarked at Leith from the Bahía Paraíso. Mills informs his superiors in London, who order him to refrain from any immediate counteraction.

MARCH 26, 1982. This Friday, Galtieri's government takes the final step to invade, changing the operation's codename to "Rosario" and ordering the 95-man, 1,250-ton, French-built, Type-A69 light missile frigates or corvettes Drummond and Granville out to sea from Puerto Belgrano, the main naval base on the Argentine mainland. They are to proceed south-southeast toward South Georgia as an advance unit. Two days afterward, Task Force 20 follows them under Vice Adm. Juan Lombardo, ostensibly to participate in exercises with the Uruguayan Navy, but actually to take up station 450 miles north of the Falklands and furnish air support for the impending assault. This squadron consists of the light fleet carrier 25 de Mayo; the destroyers Comodoro Py, Hipólito Bouchard, Piedra Buena, and Seguí (the latter trio being of World War II vintage, Sumner-class former U.S. Navy destroyers); the fleet tanker Punta Médanos; and a tug.

Task Force 40 also sets sail under Rear Adm. Jorge Gualter Allara, carrying the initial amphibious units aboard the more modern, Argentine-built, 300-man, 4,100-ton, Type-42 destroyers Santísima Trinidad and Hércules, plus the 80-man, 1,900-ton submarine Santa Fe (originally Catfish of the 1945 U.S. Navy Guppy-class); they are to be joined at sea by the frigates Drummond and Granville. Some 800 troops under Marine rear admiral Carlos Alberto Busser, who are to disembark behind the amphibious spearhead and actually occupy the islands, are traveling aboard the LST Cabo San Antonio; the 135-man, 15,000-ton, Finnish-built icebreaker Almirante Irizar; plus the recently purchased, Spanish-built, 4,000-ton transport Isla de los Estados, all together being designated as Task Force 40.1.

Argentina's high command has instructed its assault force to carry its objective by surprise, with minimal civilian or military casualties, so as to mute any international condemnation or British reaction. Galtieri furthermore hopes that his good standing with the Reagan administration in Washington will lead the United States to remain neutral.

Argentine marines and sailors paraded aboard the transport Cabo San Antonio en route to the Falklands. (Armada de la República de Argentina)

MARCH 27, 1982. The Bahía Paraíso departs South Georgia, leaving the Argentine commandos and salvage workers still ensconced upon that island.

MARCH 29, 1982. Task Forces 40 and 40.1 encounter heavy weather, obliging them to postpone their intended disembarkation from the night of March 31–April 1 to April 1–2. The Argentine vessels also change their heading so as to steer directly toward the Falkland Islands and appear out of their north rather than from the southwest as originally planned.

MARCH 31, 1982. British intelligence realizes that an Argentine invasion of the Falklands is now imminent, so advises Governor Hunt. With only 67 Royal Marines left under Maj. Michael J. Norman to defend the main island, this scant force—designated as Naval Party 8901—is deployed to defend the lone, 4,100-foot airfield on Cape Pembroke, then to fall back westward through a series of roadside positions to mount a last-ditch stand around Government House in the main town of Stanley (population 1,500). The 144-ton coaster Forrest is stationed out in Port William Bay to maintain a rudimentary radar watch.

Hunt's radio broadcast that same evening, warning islanders of an impending attack, is picked up by Argentine listeners. Realizing that the element of surprise is now lost, the invasion force commanders decide to secure Stanley and the Royal Marine barracks first, prior to attempting the airfield.

APRIL 1, 1982. Argentine Occupation. Task Force 40 closes upon the main East Falkland Island shortly before midnight, when the destroyer Santísima Trinidad slips into Port Harriet Bay, south of Stanley, and launches 20 inflatable rubber rafts to convey more than 80 Buzo Táctico divers inshore to secure a foothold at Mullet Creek. Another 10 divers from the submarine Santa Fe steal ashore at York Bay, northeast of Stanley, to reconnoiter the Argentines' main intended disembarkation point shortly after midnight. The British realize that enemy warships are in the offing when the Forrest records its first contact at 2:30 a.m. on April 2, yet the few dozen defenders cannot prevent Sea King helicopters from the large icebreaker Almirante Irizar from ferrying 40 more divers and equipment two hours later to the assault column gathering at Mullet Creek.

About 60 of these commandos hasten four miles northwestward under Capt. Pedro Edgardo Giachino to attack the Royal Marine barracks at Moody Brook, while another 30 split off en route, circling around Sapper Hill in the hope of surprising Hunt at Government House. When both assaults commence shortly after 6:00 a.m. on April 2, Giachino discovers that the Royal Marine barracks are empty, so he hurries to assist his smaller force, which is engaged against 43 British defenders holding Government House. Half an hour later, the first of 19 LVTP-7 Amtrak amphibious vehicles begin reaching the shores of York Bay from the LST Cabo San Antonio and slowly crest its steep beaches, each bearing a score of Argentine marines. Meanwhile, helicopters from the Almirante Irizar begin disgorging even more troops from C Company of the 25th Infantry Regiment and 2nd Marine Infantry Battalion to clear the vehicles strewn as obstacles around the Cape Pembroke airfield.

Government House remains besieged and peppered by Argentine light-arms fire, including stun grenades, in hopes of persuading its outnumbered defenders to surrender. Hunt resists until the airfield is cleared at 8:30 a.m., allowing the first of five Lockheed C-130 Hercules and two Fokker F-27 transports to begin landing 15 minutes later with the bulk of the Argentine 25th Infantry under Col. Mohamed Ali Seineldin, as well as the 9th Company of

Argentine Amtraks come ashore. (Armada de la República de Argentina)

Combat Engineers, and 9th Infantry Brigade. When the first armored Amtraks drive up to within point-blank range of Government House at 9:00 a.m., Admiral Busser warns Hunt that their 30-mm cannon will inflict heavy casualties. All resistance thus ceases half an hour later.

Without inflicting a single casualty among British military personnel or the civilian population, Argentina has seized the Falklands. The attackers are believed to have suffered 5 dead and 17 wounded, although only the deaths of Captain Giachino and another man are ever acknowledged. Maj. Gen. Osvaldo Jorge García temporarily assumes office as military governor over the Falklands's 1,800 inhabitants—known as “Kelpers” because of the abundant kelp floating offshore—with Busser as his second-in-command. Prisoners are flown out to the mainland that same evening to be repatriated to England two days later via Montevideo aboard a Royal Air Force VC-10.

This same April 2, Royal Navy warships exercising around Gibraltar under Rear Adm. John F. “Sandy” Woodward are ordered to proceed toward Ascension Island as an advance British counterattacking force. In addition to their five destroyers, three frigates, and two fleet tankers, they will be preceded by the nuclear submarines Spartan, Splendid, and Conqueror, the latter two departing from the Faslane naval base in Scotland.

APRIL 3, 1982. Lieutenant Commander Astiz officially renames South Georgia as “Isla San Pedro,” then leads the bulk of his Buzo Táctico contingent to subdue and remove the British presence from Gryt-viken. However, Lieutenant Mills and his outnumbered Royal Marines will put up a spirited resistance after the Type-A69 frigate Guerrico and Bahía Paraíso round King Edward Point at 10:30 a.m. When an Argentine Puma helicopter touches down to disgorge armed men onto the jetty, the defenders open fire, destroying the helicopter and striking the Guerrico with a couple of bazooka and hundreds of machine-gun rounds, so it retires out of range. Despite wounding five of Astiz's men, Mills is soon surrounded and compelled to capitulate. (For his gallantry against such heavy odds, he will later be awarded the Distinguished Service Cross.) Three British Antarctic Survey scientists and two visiting female television reporters nonetheless remain at large, furnishing intelligence to HMS Endurance farther out at sea, before being stealthily evacuated by helicopter a couple of weeks later.

This same day in New York City, the UN Security Council passes Resolution 502, calling upon Argentina to withdraw its troops from the Falklands.

APRIL 4, 1982. Having installed a modern Westinghouse AN/TPS-43F surveillance radar at Stanley, the first Argentine jet fighters begin to arrive, having been flown out from the mainland to bolster defenses.

APRIL 5, 1982. The first large contingents of Royal Navy warships and auxiliaries begin departing Great Britain for Ascension Island, including the older, 2,100-man, 28,700-ton aircraft carrier Hermes and the newer, 2,800-man, 20,300-ton Invincible. They will constitute the core of a task force intended to reconquer the Falklands in an operation code-named “Corporate.” The 3rd Commando Brigade comprises the bulk of this initial amphibious assault force.

Over the next few weeks, the British presence on tiny, rocky Ascension Island will blossom into a major undertaking, more than 1,000 personnel toiling away to service the scores of flights arriving and departing through its U.S.-operated Wideawake airfield, while dozens of vessels anchor off the British-owned island's two small harbors. The American government discreetly furnishes a great deal of logistical support for the forthcoming expedition.

APRIL 7, 1982. Four days after being appointed military governor of the Malvinas, Maj. Gen. Mario Benjamín Menéndez arrives to officially assume office. The British government announces a 200-mile exclusion zone around the archipelago, and the Argentine junta calls up its reservists. In Europe, meanwhile, France strongly backs its ally Britain by clamping an embargo on the shipment of nine more AM39 Exocet “Flying Fish” missiles to Argentina.

APRIL 9, 1982. The luxury liner SS Canberra and other British transports depart England with the first of the main expeditionary force, soon to be followed by more support vessels, including the requisitioned liner Queen Elizabeth II from Southampton on May 12, bearing the bulk of the 5th Infantry Brigade.

APRIL 10, 1982. Galtieri addresses a cheering throng of supporters from the balcony of the presidential palace in Buenos Aires.

APRIL 12, 1982. Prime Minister Thatcher announces that any Argentine warships found within 200 miles of the Falklands will be sunk without warning. Fearful of the Royal Navy's undetectable nuclear submarines, most Argentine surface ships consequently retire into their territorial waters.

This same day, the 6,200-ton British County-class destroyer Antrim, the 2,800-ton Type-12 Rothesay-class frigate Plymouth, and the 27,500-ton transport Tidespring depart Ascension with M Company of the 42nd Royal Marine Commando aboard to reclaim South Georgia Island in an operation codenamed "Paraquet." They are joined two days later at sea by the Endurance, bearing the 22nd Special Air Service Regiment's "D" Squadron of commandos, bringing the total landing force to some 250 men.

APRIL 17, 1982. Adm. Sir John Fieldhouse chairs a council of war aboard HMS Hermes at Ascension Island, where it is decided to first isolate the Argentine defenders on the Falklands with a naval blockade imposed by the Royal Navy's nuclear submarines, then to retake South Georgia and establish air- and sea-control around the Falklands with the carrier task forces, before finally carrying out major amphibious disembarkations to recapture the main islands. Streams of warships, support vessels, and other auxiliaries continue to arrive at Ascension, building up the expedition's strength.

APRIL 19, 1982. Argentina's foreign chancellor, Nicanor "Canoro" Costa Méndez, formally requests a meeting of the Organization of American States to invoke the Inter-American Treaty of Mutual Assistance. However, a resolution will not actually be passed until May 28.

APRIL 21, 1982. Reclamation of South Georgia. Eleven days after departing Ascension, the Royal Navy squadron led by Capt. Brian G. Young's destroyer Antrim and frigate Plymouth arrives within 30 miles of lonely South Georgia Island, reassured by the submarine Conqueror's patrols and aerial reconnaissance by a Royal Air Force Handley-Page Victor that no Argentine warships are in the vicinity. Three Wessex HAS-3 and HAS-5 helicopters therefore deposit 15 men of the Mountain Troop D Squadron 22 SAS under Capt. John Hamilton of the Green Howards as an observation team atop Fortuna Glacier at mid-day to study the Argentine defenses farther east at Leith. However, a blizzard imperils this SAS team overnight, and an attempt to fly them out the next morning ends in disaster when two of the three Wessex choppers crash in a blinding snowstorm. The Type-22, Broadsword-class, 4,900-ton frigate HMS Brilliant of Capt. John Coward is consequently ordered to join Young's force so that its two Lynx helicopters might make up for this loss.

A Royal Marine 2nd Section Special Boat Service or SBS unit steals ashore from the Endurance into Hound Bay early on the morning of April 22 to reconnoiter Grytviken, but it fares little better, its members being barred by impassable ice when they try to trudge overland. A second 15-man SAS reconnaissance team that lands just after midnight in Sirling Bay on Grass Island in Stromness Bay loses almost half its strength when two of its five Gemini inflatable assault boats break down and fail to reach the beach.

The next morning, before the main landing force can follow these scouts ashore, an Argentine submarine is detected approaching, so Young's squadron retreats back out to sea. Instead of seeking out the British vessels, though, the Santa Fe instead enters Grytviken that same evening with supplies and 40 men as reinforcements. On April 24, therefore, the Antrim, the Plymouth, and the Brilliant are instructed to leave the Tidespring 200 miles out at sea and return to deal with the Argentine submarine. Detected on the surface off Cumberland Bay while standing back out the next morning, the Santa Fe is bombed and strafed by various Royal Navy helicopters and forced back, to be abandoned by its crew alongside the King Edward Point jetty.

The British commanders now opt to make an immediate disembarkation with only a scratch force of 75 commandos under Royal Marine major J. M. Guy Sheridan rather than wait for the main force aboard the Tidespring to rejoin. Therefore, under covering fire from the Antrim and the Plymouth, they are helicoptered ashore to Hestenesletten shortly after 2:00 p.m. that same afternoon of April 25, pushing through Grytviken to accept the demoralized Argentines' surrender at King Edward Point by 5:00 p.m. Astiz's 16-man contingent at Leith refuses to capitulate until the next morning, when the Plymouth and the Endurance menace their positions from offshore. The Plymouth and the Brilliant thereupon depart on April 28 to rejoin the main British task force, and shortly thereafter the Antrim and the Tidespring carry 156 Argentine military prisoners and 38 civilians away to Montevideo for repatriation. The Endurance remains at South Georgia as a guard ship, and the recuperated island is garrisoned by M Company of the 42nd Royal Marine Commando.

Exocet Missile

The Falklands conflict introduced a new refinement to military weaponry in the Western Hemisphere: the modern guided missile. British planners and intelligence agencies were especially concerned about the French-built Exocets in the Argentine arsenal, fearful that a few might well pierce the Royal Navy's poor antimissile defenses. If one should strike a vital target, such as an aircraft carrier, it could seriously imperil the entire seaborne enterprise. A major intelligence operation therefore was undertaken to impede the delivery of any more missiles to Argentina.

The Exocet—a word derived from the Greek and signifying “flying fish” in French—was first developed during the late 1960s. The sea-launched MM38 entered service by 1974, and the air-launched AM39 version was introduced five years later, both being manufactured by the Aérospatiale Division of the European consortium MBDA. Designed to skim low across the waves and hit large warships with a 500-pound warhead, the AM39 could be launched from a range of up to 45 miles. Scarcely 15 feet in length and with a wingspan of only 3.5 feet, the tiny missile could streak beneath radar detection until—upon nearing its target—an onboard radar would activate and steer the Exocet into the actual strike.

The missile that hit HMS Sheffield on the morning of May 4, 1982, failed to explode, yet the sheer force of the 1,500-pound Exocet smashing into the destroyer's hull at 700 miles per hour knocked out all electrical systems. The unspent rocket fuel then sparked a raging conflagration that could scarcely be contained. The Argentine captain Julio Pérez later mounted MM38 sea-launched versions from the corvette Guerrico onto a truck and fired two against HMS Avenger on the night of May 27–28. Although they missed, the one that would be loosed against HMS Glamorgan on June 12 gave its bridge officers less than a minute's warning. Steering directly toward the on-rushing missile, their heeling warship fortunately deflected it upwards so that it, too, failed to detonate. Thirteen men nonetheless were killed, and a crippling fire ensued.

The Exocet's reputation was so enhanced by its performance during the Falklands War that hundreds were purchased by Iraq during their subsequent struggle against Iran. Two even were mistakenly fired against the U.S. frigate Stark on May 17, 1987, almost sinking that warship.

APRIL 22, 1982. President Galtieri visits the Argentine troops garrisoning the Falklands, announcing that Port Stanley is henceforth to be known as “Puerto Argentino,” East Falkland Island is to be renamed “Soledad,” Port Harriet will become “Enriqueta,” and so on. It is estimated that this garrison will eventually total roughly 850 officers, 2,000 noncoms and regulars, 7,400 conscript soldiers, plus 3,000–4,000 air force, naval, and technical personnel.

APRIL 26, 1982. The 44-year-old Argentine light cruiser General Belgrano puts out to sea from the mainland port of Ushuaia, escorted by the Exocet-armed destroyers Hipólito Bouchard and Piedra Buena. Three days later, this trio is ordered to patrol south of the shallow Burdwood Bank, while the carrier 25 de Mayo, plus the destroyers Hércules and Santísima Trinidad, operate much farther to the north of the Falklands.

APRIL 30, 1982. U.S. secretary of state Alexander Haig officially ends all mediation attempts, and the American government throws its support behind Great Britain, which in turn accelerates its plans to reconquer the Falklands by force.

MAY 1, 1982. At dawn, a single Royal Air Force Avro Vulcan B-2 strategic bomber—having been refueled by a dozen Victor K-2 tankers during its eight-hour, 3,900-mile flight from Ascension—drops 21 1,000-pound bombs on the Stanley airfield from a height of 10,000 feet, hoping to deny it to Argentine jets (although only one bomb actually strikes the runway). Shortly after 8:00 a.m., nine Sea Harrier jets also arrive out of the east from the Hermes to shoot up the airport installations, while three more wreck an Argentine Air Force IA-58 Pucará twin-prop, ground-support fighter-bomber and damage two others parked at Goose Green.

The 5,400-ton, County-class destroyer HMS Glamorgan and the Type-21, 3,250-ton, Amazon-class frigates Alacrity and Arrow appear southeast of Stanley and shell Argentine positions ashore throughout much of this day. Believing that a British invasion must be imminent, the Argentine high command launches 40 warplanes from their mainland airbases; two Mirage IIIEA fighters are downed over East Falkland Island in mid-afternoon by Sea Harriers. Three Argentine Air Force IAI Dagger M-5's of “Grupo 6” then surprise and strafe the trio of British warships, inflicting minor damage and obliging them to break off their shore bombardment by 5:00 p.m. A sortie directly toward the distant British carriers by Argentine Air Force B-62 Canberra bombers is abruptly checked when one is shot down. In Buenos Aires, even more reservists are called up, as Argentina realizes that a war is now fully joined.

Impact mark left by the Exocet missile that obliquely penetrated the hull of HMS Sheffield without detonating. (U.K. Ministry of Defence)

After nightfall, the three British warships return to resume their bombardment of the shore. Sea King HC-4 helicopters from the Hermes furthermore deposit small SBS and SAS scouting parties on both West and East Falkland islands to covertly observe and report on Argentine dispositions during the forthcoming weeks. Farther out at sea, the Argentine carrier 25 de Mayo and the British carrier group detect each other at extreme long range. The heavy Argentine Skyhawk bombers cannot be launched in the faint winds the next dawn, however, so the Argentine formation turns away.

MAY 2, 1982. After tracking the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano's movements all day, the 4,900-ton British nuclear submarine Conqueror of Cmdr. Christopher Wreford-Brown strikes it at 4:01 p.m. with two Mark 8 torpedoes, which blow off the Belgrano's bow and destroy its steering system aft of the engine room. (The British captain chooses these older weapons rather than the more modern, wire-guided Mark 24 Tigerfish torpedoes because of the Mark 8's larger warheads.) Within 10 minutes, such a severe list develops that the Argentine captain gives the order to abandon ship, and 70 inflatable life rafts are launched. The cruiser rolls over and settles beneath the waves less than an hour after being struck, with the loss of 323 of its 1,042 crew members.

A third torpedo apparently hits the destroyer Hipólito Bouchard as well, but does not explode. The Piedra Buena belatedly counterattacks against the Conqueror, then returns later with other vessels to rescue survivors in the cold, howling winds as darkness falls. This appalling loss of life prompts all major Argentine naval units to retreat into their territorial waters or home ports within the next couple of days, assuring the British task forces of uncontested naval supremacy around the Falklands for the duration of this war.

Falklands War.

MAY 3, 1982. Shortly past midnight, the 46-man, 835-ton Argentine patrol vessel Alferez Sobral (former USS Salish) is sighted while searching north of the Falklands for the downed Canberra's aircrew. A pair of British Lynx helicopters takes off early in the morning from HMSS Coventry and Glasgow, locates this vessel, then fires four Sea Skua missiles from eight miles away that badly damage the Alferez Sobral and kill eight of its crew members, including Capt. Sergio Gómez Roca. The patrol vessel must thus limp back into Puerto Deseado two days later.

Late on May 3, an Argentine Aermacchi MB-339A of the 1st Attack Squadron also crashes in bad weather while trying to land back at Stanley airfield after a patrol, and a twin-engine Skyvan transport is badly damaged in another overnight bombardment by HMSS Glamorgan, Alacrity, and Arrow.

MAY 4, 1982. Early on this Tuesday morning, a lone Royal Air Force Vulcan returns and unleashes another full payload of bombs from 16,000 feet above Stanley airfield, all of which miss their target.

The British carrier group is meanwhile detected again at 8:15 a.m., steaming 70–75 miles southeast of East Falkland, by radar aboard an Argentine SP-2H Neptune surveillance plane. A pair of Super Etendard aircraft of the Argentine Navy's 2nd Fighter-Attack Squadron is consequently launched 90 minutes later from Rio Grande airbase on Tierra del Fuego, each armed with an AM39 Exocet missile. After being refueled in mid-flight by a Hercules tanker, these attackers swoop in low and are guided by the Neptune, so they can approach the outer perimeter of the carrier group's defensive ring undetected. Less than 25–30 miles out, the Super Etendards pop up for a quick radar check at a height of 120 feet, then launch their missiles.

With scarcely any warning, the 3,500-ton, Type-42 destroyer HMS Sheffield of Capt. James "Sam" Salt is struck shortly after 11:00 a.m. by an Exocet, while the second missile narrowly falls short of the 2,800-ton, Type-12 "Rothesay Class" frigate HMS Yarmouth. Although the first Exocet warhead fails to detonate, the Sheffield nonetheless suffers 20 killed and

Argentine anti-aircraft crew bundled against the chill winds of the bleak scrubland above Port Stanley. (Armada de la República de Argentina)

24 wounded, while unspent rocket fuel causes it to burn fiercely over the next four hours. Guttled by these flames, its hulk is abandoned that same afternoon and drifts until May 8, when the Yarmouth is ordered to take it under tow. When the weather turns foul two days later, though, the Sheffield's remains are scuttled.

About an hour after the destroyer is hit, three Sea Harriers from the Hermes attack the Goose Green airfield, one being shot down by Argentine anti-aircraft fire. Leery of enduring any more Exocet attacks, Admiral Woodward orders the British carrier group to withdraw farther out to sea and, moreover, decides not to employ his few valuable Harriers on any more bombing runs; hence, there is less combat activity over the next few days. Additional ships nonetheless continue to join the British fleet, building up their strength for the forthcoming disembarkation.

MAY 5, 1982. Argentina's ambassador Eduardo Roca complains before the United Nations of American support for Great Britain.

MAY 6, 1982. Two Sea Harriers on patrol disappear from radar, having presumably collided in poor visibility.

MAY 8, 1982. Resuming offensive operations this evening, HMS Alacrity shells Argentine positions around Stanley with 90 rounds, while the Brilliant enters the north end of Falkland Sound to search for supply ships as targets.

MAY 9, 1982. At dawn, the Coventry and the Broadsword vainly attempt to lure Argentine aerial sorties out of Stanley, hoping to deplete the garrison's air strength. Later this morning, two supporting Sea Harriers—returning toward the Hermes after failing to attack cloud-shrouded Stanley—sight the trawler Narwhal 60 miles southeast of East Falkland. Having been commandeered by the Argentines for reconnaissance purposes, the Narwhal is strafed and bombed to a standstill by the Harriers and other aircraft, after which it is seized by a helicopter-borne SBS boarding party. While under tow the next day, though, the damaged trawler sinks.

Two of four Argentine "Grupo 4" Skyhawks are also lost late this same morning of May 9, either through collision or a long-range Sea Dart missile launched from the Coventry; the remains of one plane is subsequently found on South Jason Island. Then, an Argentine Army Puma heading out over Choiseul Sound this afternoon in search of the Narwhal is brought down by another Sea Dart fired at extreme long range by the Coventry.

MAY 10, 1982. While HMSS Glasgow and Brilliant maintain the usual pattern of nocturnal bombardments of Argentine positions around Stanley, the Alacrity under Lt. Cmdr. Christopher Craig slips into the south end of Falkland Sound just prior to midnight to steam up its entire length for the first time, shrouded in darkness and rainy mist, hunting for Argentine supply vessels. The transport Isla de los Estados of Capt. Tulio Néstor Panigadi is detected heading for Port Howard. It is illuminated by star shells, then struck with several salvos until its cargo of munitions and fuel explodes, only two of two-dozen crewmen surviving. The Alacrity continues up the sound and joins its sister ship, the Arrow, at dawn of May 11, before both stand away back out to sea.

MAY 11, 1982. This night, an eight-man SAS boat party slips undetected by helicopter onto Keppel Island, south of the western end of strategic Pebble Island (at the northern extremity of West Falkland Island), to survey Pebble's Argentine defenses in anticipation of a major raid against its airfield.

MAY 12, 1982. This afternoon, two Argentine flights of four A-4B Skyhawks apiece from "Grupo 5" attack the bombardment ships Glasgow and Brilliant, northeast of East Falkland Island. The Brilliant's Sea Wolf missiles automatically fire, bringing down two attackers of the first flight, while a third crashes, and the fourth drops its bomb prematurely before sheering off.

The second flight of four planes, however, approaches uncontested a few minutes later and strikes the Glasgow with a bomb, which pierces both sides of its hull, yet exits without detonating. The destroyer must nevertheless retreat out to sea for repairs. While the four Argentine planes are returning to their island airbase, they fly too close to the anti-aircraft batteries guarding Goose Green, which mistakenly shoot one down.

MAY 14, 1982. After nightfall and in bad weather, the Hermes, the Broadsword, and the Glamorgan stealthily approach Pebble Island. Some 48 attackers from D Squadron 22nd SAS Regiment are carried by Sea King helicopters 40 miles to be deposited ashore and led by waiting British scouts against its incomplete, 150-man Argentine airbase at midnight. Early on the morning of May 15, the surprised defenders are pinned down in their cantonments by covering fire from the Glamorgan, while SAS demolition teams destroy all 11 parked aircraft—6 Pucarás of “Grupo 6,” 4 T-34C Turbo Mentors of Naval Squadron 4, and 1 Skyvan—along with the fuel depot, ammunition dump, and radar installation. The raiders thereupon retire to their waiting helicopters at 7:45 a.m., only two SAS troopers being slightly wounded when an Argentine mine is remotely detonated. They have successfully removed an obstacle for the main force’s forthcoming penetration into San Carlos Water.

MAY 15, 1982. Overnight this Saturday, a Lynx from HMS Brilliant unsuccessfully attacks the Argentine transport Bahía Buen Suceso in Fox Bay East, but this blockade runner is rendered inoperable the next midday upon being raked by cannon fire from a pair of Sea Harriers. Also this same Sunday at noon, two Harriers bomb and strafe the 8,500-ton Río Carcarañá anchored off Port King, which catches fire, so is beached and abandoned.

MAY 16, 1982. While the Glamorgan shells and prowls the coastline between Stanley and Choiseul Sound in a noisy diversionary tactic, the Alacrity steals into Falkland Sound once more under cover of darkness and uses Gemini assault boats to deposit an SBS contingent near the Sussex Mountains to prepare for a major disembarkation near San Carlos Water.

MAY 17, 1982. Under cover of night, the carrier HMS Invincible and its escort the Brilliant speed toward the southernmost coast of Argentina and use Sea King helicopters to deposit Special Forces in an unsuccessful attempt to probe or assault the Río Grande airbase. One helicopter is destroyed, and its three-man crew surrenders to neutral Chilean authorities at Punta Arenas. The diesel submarine HMS Onyx covertly retrieves some other Special Forces stragglers.

MAY 18, 1982. Some 200 miles northeast of the Falklands, the main Amphibious Task Group begins to join the advance British carrier group in anticipation of making a major landing in San Carlos Water. Replacement Sea Harriers and helicopters are also flown over to both the Hermes and the Invincible from the transport Atlantic Conveyor.

MAY 19, 1982. In surprisingly calm weather, more than a dozen helicopters are redeployed aboard four British assault ships, as well as troops from the 40th, 42nd, and 45th Royal Marine Commando, plus the 2nd and 3rd battalions of the Parachute Regiment. Late in the day, 21 of 30 SAS commandos who are being transferred from the Hermes to the Intrepid die when their Sea King crashes into the sea.

MAY 20, 1982. Escorted by the warships Antrim, Ardent, Argonaut, Brilliant, Broadsword, Plymouth, and Yarmouth, the initial British troop convoy approaches the north side of the Falklands in daylight—fortuitously masked by poor weather—in anticipation of entering the sound that same night to disgorge its troops in San Carlos Water, on the west coast of East Falkland Island by the next dawn. Troops are crammed aboard the twin 11,600-ton assault ships Fearless and Intrepid, as well as the 5,500-ton landing ships Sir Galahad, Sir Geraint, Sir Lancelot, Sir Percivale, and Sir Tristram; the hired merchantmen Canberra, Europic Ferry, and Norland; plus the 14,000-ton Royal Fleet Auxiliaries Stromness and 17,200-ton Fort Austin.

MAY 21, 1982. British Counterinvasion. At 1:30 a.m., a pair of Wessex helicopters deposits 25 SBS commandos atop the 800-foot headland known as Fanning Head overlooking San Carlos Water’s entrance to clear it of a 20-man Argentine observation post armed with two artillery pieces and two mortars, before the main British landing force can be ferried in below. When called upon to surrender, these Argentines refuse, so they are subdued with support fire from the Antrim, most being either killed or captured. A second small SAS D Squadron detachment flies farther south aboard Sea King helicopters to land just north of the village of Darwin, pinning down its disoriented garrison with mortar rounds lobbed out of the darkness as well as salvoes fired from the 2,750-ton, Type-21 frigate HMS Ardent out in Grantham Sound.

Shortly before 5:00 a.m., the 2nd Parachute Battalion is able to disembark at the village of San Carlos and head five miles inland to take up positions in the strategic Sussex Mountains, while the 40th Royal Marine Commando digs in with four armored vehicles below the west ridge of the Verde Mountains. British planners hope to quickly secure all the high ground around San Carlos Water to create a defensible pocket against air attacks from which to build up their logistical land base. At daybreak, two Sea Harriers destroy three Argentine helicopters parked between Mount Kent and Mount Estancia, while the 16 British landing craft return into San Carlos Water with a second British assault wave: the 45th Royal Marine Commando coming ashore on the western peninsula near the disused meat-packing plant at Ajax Bay, while the 3rd Parachute Battalion lands a mile west of the hamlet of Port San Carlos, on the northeastern side of the Water.

Having thus secured three major beachheads without opposition, the 12 big British transports enter San Carlos Water in single file behind HMS Plymouth, the liner Canberra, and other larger ships anchoring in the deeper water to its north, while the smaller landing ship logistics or LSLs heave to near the village of San Carlos. Sea Kings immediately begin airlifting Rapier anti-aircraft batteries and 105-mm artillery pieces ashore to establish a defensive perimeter, while more troops and heavier equipment are being littered ashore. By 8:30 a.m., the bulk of Brig. Gen. Julian H. A. Thompson's 3rd Commando Brigade has secured a toehold on the west coast of East Falkland Island, the only major British losses being incurred a half-hour later when two Gazelle helicopters are shot down by the 41 Argentine defenders of J Company, 25th Infantry Regiment under Lt. Carlos Daniel Esteban, still holding out in the eastern portion of the Port San Carlos settlement. Shortly thereafter, these heavily outnumbered Argentine troops withdraw north-eastward into the hills.

The escorting Royal Navy warships have meanwhile redeployed into a defensive gun line out in Falkland Sound. Although a single Argentine Navy MB-339A out of Stanley makes a strafing run against the 3,200-ton, Leander-class frigate Argonaut around 10:00 a.m., wounding three crew members, concerted Argentine counterattacks do not commence until a half-hour later when the first low-flying sorties arrive from the mainland. Eight Daggers of "Grupo 6" strafe the Broadsword and the Antrim, striking the latter with a 1,000-pound Mark-17 bomb—at such short range, though, that it fails to arm in time to detonate. It does, however, oblige the destroyer to retreat into San Carlos Water to have it defused and removed. Shortly after noon, three Sea Harriers shoot down a "Grupo 3" Pucará from Goose Green, while a single A-4Q Skyhawk fighter-bomber from the Argentine Navy's 3 Attack Squadron narrowly misses the Ardent with two bombs at 1:00 p.m. A second incoming wave of four Skyhawks from "Grupo 4" is broken up over Chartres on West Falkland Island by Sea Harriers, who down two of these Argentine Air Force planes with Sidewinder missiles near Christmas Harbour.

At 2:30 p.m., however, six Skyhawks of "Grupo 5" nearly finish off the slightly damaged Argonaut, strafing and hitting it with two 1,000-pound bombs, which fail to explode yet remain lodged in its boiler room and a missile magazine, leaving the frigate temporarily adrift and perilously crippled for another week. Four Daggers of "Grupo 6" from Río Grande are intercepted over West Falkland Island by Sea Harriers, and one is brought down near Teal River Inlet, yet the remaining trio roars into Grantham Sound out of the southwest to pummel the Ardent, which must limp away in search of protection. Three more Daggers from San Julián thereupon strafe the Brilliant, inflicting minor damage and a few casualties, but a follow-up trio is intercepted over West Falkland Island and all are shot down north of Port Howard by Sea Harriers. Thirty minutes later, three Skyhawks of the Argentine Navy's 3rd Squadron hammer the Ardent once more off North West Island. The ship is now ablaze from seven bomb hits, listing, and with a total of 22 dead and 30 injured aboard, so Commander West must give the order to abandon ship, leaving the hulk to burn out and sink by the next evening. The escaping Skyhawks are all brought down near Swan Island.

By the end of this day, although the initial 3,000-man British landing force is safely ensconced ashore with 1,000 tons of supplies, the decimation suffered by its naval escorts compels the partially offloaded merchantmen Canberra, Europic Ferry, and Norland to retreat northeast overnight toward the carrier group, accompanied by the battered Antrim, leaving behind only the strained Royal Navy defenders and assault ships. Any Argentine elation is tempered by their heavy aerial losses, for 14 aircraft fail to return, an attrition rate they cannot long sustain.

MAY 22, 1982. As bad weather over the Argentine mainland temporarily grounds all flights, Thompson's landing force is able to expand two of its beachheads uncontested, the 3rd Parachute Battalion pushing west and north out of Port San Carlos to seize all its surrounding high ground, while the 42nd Royal Marine Commando follows Lieutenant Esteban's retreating two-score Argentines as far as Cerro Montevideo before digging in there. Royal Marine scouts of the Mountain and Arctic Warfare Cadre are also brought in by helicopter to observe enemy movements from atop Bull and Evelyn hills, while the 180-man, 2,750-ton, Type-21 frigate

After an unexploded bomb detonated aboard the Antelope off Ajax Bay claiming the life of Staff Sgt. James Prescott of the Royal Engineers, the abandoned frigate's missile magazines burn and flare throughout the night. (U.K. Ministry of Defence)

HMS Antelope of Cmdr. Nicholas Tobin joins the Royal Navy gun line offshore.

This same morning, the Type Z-28 Argentine patrol boat Río Iguazú is sighted in Choiseul Bay by two Sea Harriers while it is attempting to carry aircraft spares and 105-mm howitzers from Stanley into Goose Green. The Harriers strafe and drive the Río Iguazú aground in Button Bay, yet the Argentines nonetheless manage to recuperate two of its artillery pieces.

MAY 23, 1982. Early on this Sunday morning, a Lynx helicopter from the Brilliant spots the commandeered coaster Monsumen stealing from Darwin around the eastern coastline, hoping to regain the protection of the Argentine defenses near Stanley. When a heliborne SBS party cannot board, the coaster is driven aground in Lively Sound by the Brilliant and the Yarmouth. A flight of three Argentine Army Puma helicopters carrying ammunition and stores from Stanley for the 5th Infantry Regiment at Port Howard, escorted by an A-109 Augusta helicopter gunship, is also intercepted near Shag Cove House and scattered by four Harriers, only one Puma surviving.

Shortly after noon, though, four Argentine Air Force A-4B Skyhawks of "Grupo 5" attack the Antelope in San Carlos Water, hitting its starboard side with two 1,100-pound bombs that kill one crewman, yet fail to explode. Two subsequent aerial attacks fail to hit any more ships, but when demolition experts attempt to defuse the Antelope's unexploded bombs off Ajax Bay that evening, one detonates, causing the frigate to catch fire and sink the next day.

MAY 24, 1982. Before dawn, an SBS reconnaissance team slips ashore in Port Salvador to check nearby Teal Inlet in anticipation of the forthcoming British advance, while a D Squadron SAS contingent is helicoptered atop 1,500-foot-high Mount Kent, although the weather closes in before this advance position can be reinforced in strength.

Argentine air attacks continue this morning against the British naval concentration in and around San Carlos Water, four “Grupo 6” Daggers coming in low over Pebble Island, although three are shot down by Sidewinder missiles fired by a pair of Sea Harriers. However, a simultaneous descent by more Daggers and Skyhawks from “Grupo 4” and “Grupo 5” against the landing ships anchored inside succeed in striking the Sir Galahad and the Sir Lancelot—although both bombs fail to explode. Upon retiring, one damaged Skyhawk crashes in King George Bay off West Falkland Island.

MAY 25, 1982. Today being an Argentine national holiday, repeated aerial assaults are launched from the mainland. This morning, a flight of “Grupo 5” Skyhawks is repelled when a Sea Dart from the 3,500-ton, Type-42 destroyer HMS Coventry downs one at long range north of Pebble Island, causing the rest to disperse. A midday raid into San Carlos Water by four “Grupo 4” aircraft sees one blasted out of the sky, and a second destroyed northeast of Pebble Island by another Sea Dart fired from the Coventry.

Yet in mid-afternoon, two pairs of “Grupo 5” Skyhawks roar in upon the Broadsword and the Coventry, the former’s Sea Wolf defenses failing so that it is struck by a bomb, which skips through its stern without exploding. The two Argentine planes aiming for the Coventry, though, strike it with three 880-pound French SAMP bombs at 3:20 p.m., causing it to capsize within a half-hour with the loss of 19 hands and 25 others wounded.

Shortly thereafter, 90 miles farther northeast out at sea, a pair of Super Etendards of the Argentine Navy’s 2nd Fighter-Attack Squadron out of Río Gallegos, after being refueled in mid-flight by a Hercules tanker, approaches the main British task force. Just past 4:30 p.m., they launch a pair of Exocets from a range of 30 miles, one of which hits the 160-man, 15,000-ton hired Cunard container ship Atlantic Conveyor, killing a dozen crewmen (among them Capt. Ian H. North) and sparking an uncontrollable blaze. Important British supplies and eight helicopters—including five vitally needed heavy-lift Chinooks—are lost when this vessel burns out and sinks three days later.

MAY 26, 1982. As part of a continual British buildup, the destroyers Bristol and Cardiff, as well as the frigates Active, Andromeda, Avenger, Minerva, and Penelope join the carrier task force out at sea, helping to escort transports and auxiliaries as they make their runs into the San Carlos Water beachheads, as well as to bombard Argentine positions at night. SAS scouts in the Mount Kent region also report this same morning that, in the first countermove by the island’s defenders, the 12th Argentine Infantry Regiment is being redeployed to reinforce the small air force garrison holding Goose Green, the Falklands’s second largest settlement.

Unable to airlift the anticipated numbers of troops and matériel for an immediate attack against Stanley because of the sinking of the Atlantic Conveyor’s Chinook helicopters, Brigadier General Thompson decides to instead overrun Goose Green first, thereby clearing his flank before his main force marches inland. The 500-man 2nd Parachute Battalion is consequently ordered to push south out of its Sussex Mountain positions overnight, trudging eight miles across difficult terrain with 120-pound packs into a new jump-off position at Camilla Creek House. Meanwhile, other British units will shift eastward to occupy the vacated Mount Kent region, a key valley system leading directly toward Stanley.

MAY 27, 1982. Goose Green. Before daybreak, the 2nd Parachute Battalion of Lt. Col. Herbert Jones reaches Camilla Creek House, an empty building for rural work parties that stands 11 miles short of Goose Green. While the weary troopers recuperate, two patrols probe down both sides of the nearby peninsula, observing the Argentine defenses outside the nearby settlement of Darwin. Early in the afternoon, these scouts call in an air strike by two Sea Harriers, who lose one plane during a subsequent series of strafing runs against the alerted antiaircraft batteries. The British reconnaissance parties are then spotted and chased back by Argentine machine-gun fire. While retiring, however, the scouts capture some soldiers in a civilian Land Rover who reveal details about the garrison’s strength.

The original Argentine air force unit that has seized the Goose Green airfield under air commodore Wilson D. Pedroza, backed by elements of the 601st Anti-Aircraft Battalion and a single company from the regular 25th Infantry Regiment, has since been reinforced by the bulk of the 12th Infantry and three 105-mm howitzers under that regiment’s second-in-command, Lt. Col. Italo Piaggi. (Brig. Gen. Omar Parada, the 12th Infantry’s regimental commander, will still be in Stanley when fighting erupts.) The British consequently helicopter in a trio of their own 105-mm guns that same evening from the 8th

Battery, 29th Commando Royal Artillery Regiment, to bolster the 2nd Parachute Battalion's pair of mortars and light surface-to-air missiles. At 11:00 p.m., the whole battalion moves two miles forward into a starting line, while the frigate Arrow steals into adjacent Brenton Loch to provide artillery support.

When Burntside House is shelled and stormed by one paratroop company at 3:30 a.m. on May 28, the British find it undefended. Two other companies, however, encounter a series of Argentine trenches three-quarters of an hour later, and confused fighting spreads in the darkness. Slowly, the attackers work their way around Darwin Hill by midmorning. Dogged resistance from the 12th Regiment's well-entrenched conscript troops is met, however, and Colonel Jones is slain while assaulting an Argentine strongpoint at 10:00 a.m. His second-in-command, Maj. Christopher Kebble, nonetheless succeeds in outflanking the western strongpoint at Boca House shortly thereafter, so the British break through, and resistance atop Darwin Hill is finally snuffed out by noon. Two more parachute companies must then brave heavy counterfire from Argentine antiaircraft batteries while rushing the airfield and Goose Green itself from atop Darwin Ridge this same afternoon, as well as enduring strafing runs from a pair of Argentine Navy MB-339s and two Pucará's of "Grupo 3," one each being shot down around 5:00 p.m. Twenty-five minutes later, three Harriers devastate the Argentine defenses around the airfield, leading to a retreat.

By dusk, the 1,000 or so surviving defenders are pressed back inside Goose Green's buildings, encircled by exhausted paratroopers. Major Kebble sends in two prisoners with a surrender demand for Air Commodore Pedroza, who accepts after all-night negotiations, and the Argentines capitulate by 9:30 the next morning. Their fatalities total 45 men, while British casualties are 17 dead and 37 wounded. The seizure of Goose Green will furthermore isolate the two Argentine regiments and their support units garrisoning Port Howard and Fox Bay on West Falkland Island, for boats can no longer steal around the coastline from the main concentration at Stanley to sustain those 2,000 men.

MAY 28, 1982. Having traversed 20 miles in freezing weather overnight from Port San Carlos and New House, the 600-man 45th Royal Marine Commando reaches a deserted shepherd's house near Douglas Paddock around 2:00 a.m. and digs in. The 460-man 3rd Parachute Battalion of Lt. Col. Hew

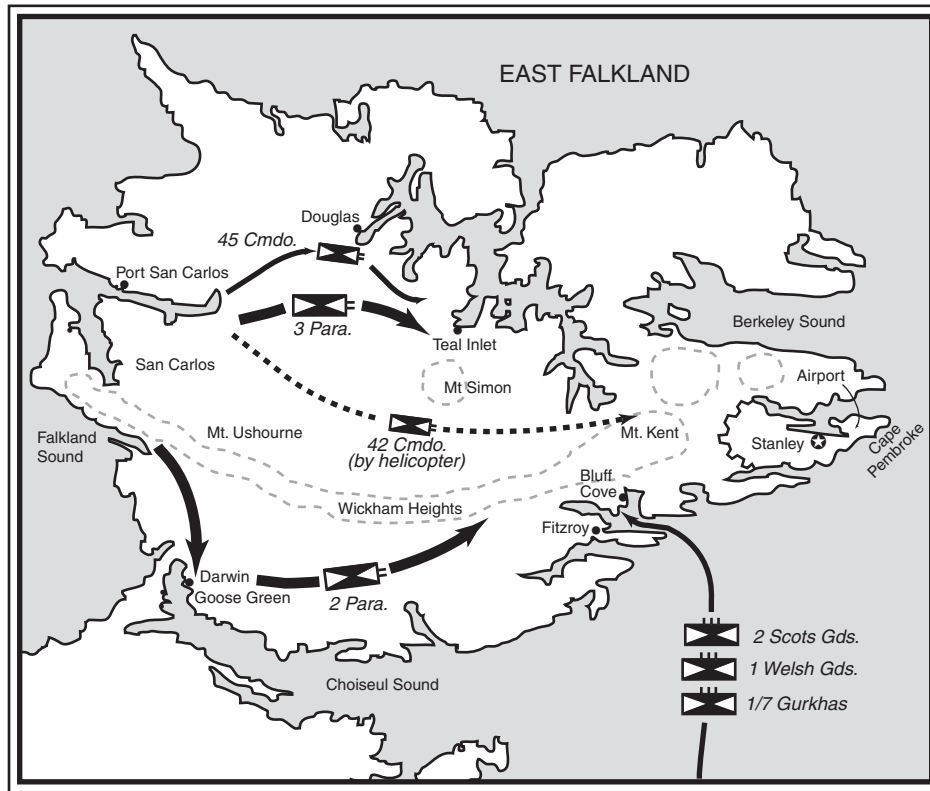

W. R. Pike passes them via another route suggested by a local guide, reaching Teal Inlet this same day after nightfall.

MAY 29, 1982. Amid a noticeable slackening in Argentine aerial sorties, Canberra bombers of "Grupo 2" make a harassing raid early this morning above San Carlos Water, followed by a midday raid by "Grupo 6" Daggers, during which one is brought down by a Rapier. Also, a lone Argentine Air Force C-130 Hercules from "Grupo 1" drops eight bombs north of South Georgia Island on the tanker British Wye, only one of which strikes and bounces harmlessly into the ocean without detonating.

MAY 30, 1982. The 3rd Parachute Battalion and some light tanks of the Blues and Royals press east toward Mount Estancia, while 45th Royal Marine Commando will later move into their vacated positions in Teal Inlet. This same afternoon, much farther east out at sea, two Super Etendards launch an Exocet against HMS Avenger, which misses. Four "Grupo 4" Skyhawks that attempt to follow up this Argentine attack suffer two losses to Sea Dart missiles.

And very late on this same Sunday evening, three Sea Kings begin the blizzard-delayed airlift of 42nd Royal Marine Commando to join SAS scouts operating two miles from the foot of Mount Kent, landing successfully despite an ongoing firefight against an Argentine patrol. This force quickly secures Mount Challenger, Mount Wall, and Bluff Cove Peak in addition to Mount Kent, while a Royal Air Force Chinook helicopter reinforces this forward position by bringing in three 105-mm howitzers from the 7th Battery, 29th Commando Royal Artillery.

MAY 31, 1982. Early on this Monday morning, a lone Vulcan bomber launches an AGM-45 Shrike missile attack against the Argentine radar installations guarding Stanley airfield, but only succeeds in slightly damaging the main TPS-43 surveillance unit. Then two hours after dawn, a 20-man Mountain and Arctic Warfare Cadre unit under Royal Marine captain Roderick Boswell helicopters in to attack a 17-man Argentine patrol from the 602nd Special Forces Commando under Lt. Luis Alberto Brown, which was deposited earlier by a pair of helicopters at a deserted shepherd's residence known as Top Malo House. In a spirited clash, 5 Argentines are killed and 7 wounded (including Brown) before the remainder surrender, while three British marines are wounded.

British advance across East Falkland Island.

The 3rd Parachute Battalion meanwhile secures Mount Estancia and is joined the next day by the six guns of the 79th Royal Artillery Battery. Also overnight on May 31–June 1, the assault ship Intrepid appears off Teal Inlet, ferrying the first supplies ashore to transform it into an advance depot.

JUNE 1, 1982. The first elements of Maj. Gen. Jeremy J. Moore's 3,000-man 5th Infantry Brigade begin arriving in San Carlos Water, and the 1st Battalion of the 7th "Duke of Edinburgh's Own" Gurkha Rifles begins disembarking from the transports Norland, Baltic Ferry, and Atlantic Causeway. Late this same morning, the frigate HMS Minerva detects an Argentine Air Force "Grupo 1" Hercules on a reconnaissance flight nearby, which is downed 50 miles north of Pebble Island by a Sea Harrier.

The next day, the Canberra will bring in the remaining 5th Brigade units: the 1st Welsh and 2nd Scots Guards battalions. By the time these three battalions and their artillery, engineering, and helicopter support groups complete their disembarkations, the British will have roughly 10,000 fighting men massed on East Falkland Island under Moore's command.

JUNE 2, 1982. The Royal Engineers complete a small airfield at Port San Carlos suitable for Harriers and helicopters. A dozen men of the 2nd Parachute Battalion under Maj. John Crosland also fly out to Swan Inlet House aboard five Army "Scout" helicopters and discover that Fitzroy and Bluff Cove have been evacuated, as all Argentine forces are redeploying into more defensible positions around Stanley. Consequently, other 2nd Parachute units are airlifted the 35 miles from Goose Green to seize these two settlements uncontested.

JUNE 3, 1982. An early morning raid by a Vulcan bomber destroys one of the Argentine anti-aircraft battery "Skyguard" radar installations atop Sapper Hill outside Stanley with a Shrike missile, although the Vulcan is subsequently obliged to land and be temporarily interned at Rio de Janeiro because of refueling problems during its return flight toward Ascension Island.

JUNE 5, 1982. To reinforce the advance 2nd Parachute footholds holding Bluff Cove and Fitzroy, General Moore takes the risk of having the 2nd Scots Guards Battalion board the assault ship Intrepid and sail out of the protected San Carlos Water anchorage, rounding Lafonia under cover of darkness to transfer onto four landing craft off Lively Island and then to steal into Bluff Cove early the next morning.

JUNE 6, 1982. The assault ship Fearless follows out of San Carlos Water with the 1st Welsh Guards Battalion but, upon reaching Lively Island, finds only two landing craft available. A single company is thus sent on to Bluff Cove by sunrise, while the Fearless brings the remaining 350 guardsmen back into its anchorage.

JUNE 7, 1982. This morning, an Argentine Air Force reconnaissance Learjet 35-A is shot down over Pebble Island by a Sea Dart from the Exeter. The Norland also steams out of San Carlos Water with 1,000 Argentine prisoners, bound for repatriation at Montevideo, while D Company of the Gurkhas is conveyed around to Fitzroy as an advance unit aboard the recuperated coaster Monsunen. Late this same afternoon, the landing ship Sir Tristram furthermore reaches Fitzroy to begin offloading 1,500 tons of ammunition and other supplies.

JUNE 8, 1982. Just past 8:00 a.m., the Sir Tristram is joined off Fitzroy by the Sir Galahad under Capt. Philip Roberts, which has brought the remaining 1st Welsh Guardsmen around from San Carlos Water. Because the disembarkation proceeds slowly and with various complications over several hours in broad daylight, Argentine observers atop Mount Harriet radio their headquarters, and two flights of Daggers and Skyhawks suddenly appear over Falkland Sound from the mainland around 2:00 p.m. The five Daggers of "Grupo 6" immediately strafe and bomb the frigate Plymouth, which is steaming toward West Falkland Island to shell Argentine positions atop Mount Rosalie. This Royal Navy warship is only slightly damaged by four bomb hits, all of which fail to detonate, nonetheless killing one crewman and injuring four.

Two patrolling Sea Harriers immediately set off in pursuit of the retiring Daggers, but during their absence, five Skyhawks of "Grupo 5" make an undetected descent out of the east upon the Sir Tristram and the Sir Galahad, still anchored and crowded with men off Fitzroy. Two of these planes put a pair of bombs into the former landing ship, one of which passes straight through and fails to explode, though the other causes extensive damage and kills 2 crew members. The other three Skyhawks hit the Sir Galahad with at least two, if not three, bombs, which deflagrate and burst into flames, sparking an inferno that inflicts heavy casualties amid its cramped confines: 32 Welsh guardsmen are killed and 46 wounded, plus another 11 Army personnel and 5 crewmen dead, with another 100 burned or injured. Both vessels are rendered inoperable for the duration of this conflict; the gutted Sir Galahad is abandoned 40 minutes afterward and eventually scuttled.

Later that same afternoon, another four "Grupo 4" Skyhawks appear above Fitzroy and attack British positions ashore, while four Skyhawks from "Grupo 5" catch the LCU Foxtrot Four from HMS Fearless in Choiseul Sound, ferrying vehicles from Goose Green toward Fitzroy. It sinks from a bomb hit, and 6 of its 7 crewmen die. A pair of Sea Harriers brings down three of these Argentine Skyhawks with Sidewinder missiles as they depart.

Defeated Argentine troops surrender their weapons. (Armada de la República de Argentina)

JUNE 11, 1982. Closing in on Stanley. After another dawn raid by a single Royal Air Force Vulcan, which drops conventional bombs on Stanley's airfield, a Wessex helicopter approaches Stanley's Town Hall covertly out of the north, flying via a circuitous route through the hills. The British know that Menéndez and his high command hold a meeting inside every morning, so two AS-12 wire-guided missiles are fired—yet miss—before the helicopter escapes through a heavy antiaircraft barrage.

Moore's main army is now prepared for a concerted nocturnal push against the outer ring of Argentine trenches in the rocky highlands west of the capital. Having moved seven of his eight infantry battalions and all five heavy artillery batteries into jump-off positions, the British commander gives the order. Around 8:15 p.m., two companies of Colonel Pike's 3rd Parachute Battalion move silently from their start line toward Mount Longdon, until one trooper accidentally steps on a mine and alerts the defenders of B Company of the 7th Argentine "Coronel Pedro Conde" Infantry Regiment under 34-year-old major Carlos Carrizo Salvadores. Ten hours of confused and bloody combat ensue, during which 17 paratroopers lose their lives and 35 more are wounded, compared to 50 dead and a like number captured among the Argentines, who finally retreat at dawn.

The 42nd Royal Marine Commando of Lt. Col. Nicholas F. Vaux meanwhile moves stealthily toward jagged Mount Harriet at 10:00 p.m., its initial approach being masked by British shelling and other diversionary gunfire. At the cost of only 2 killed and 26 wounded, they will follow "creeping" artillery barrages to clear all the bunkers and machine-gun emplacements held by contingents from the Argentine 4th "Monte Caseros" Infantry Regiment under Lt. Col. Diego Alejandro Soria, slaying 50 defenders and capturing 300. The 45th Royal Marine Commando of Lt. Col. Andrew F. Whitehead also makes a silent jump-off one hour later, gliding across open terrain toward the eminence known as Two Sisters, only to be checked less than a mile short of its peak by heavy machine-gun emplacements manned by yet other Argentine units of the 4th Infantry under Maj. Ricardo Córdón, the regiment's second-in-command. Several hours of heavy gunfire and artillery exchanges ensue until Córdón is captured in his bunker at 3:00 a.m. and the summit itself is taken at dawn by a British charge, at a cost of 3 marines and a royal engineer from the 59th Independent Commando Squadron who is shot dead, compared to 10 Argentine fatalities and 44 prisoners. (Córdón will later be court-martialed and dismissed from the service.)

All the British attack columns thereupon dig in and are subjected to heavy and accurate Argentine artillery counterfire by 105-mm Oto Melara pack howitzers.

JUNE 12, 1982. While retiring back out to sea just past 3:30 a.m. after having provided gunnery support overnight for the British land assault against Two Sisters, the destroyer Glamorgan of Capt. Michael Barrow is hit in the stern 17 miles southwest of Stanley by an Argentine MM38 Exocet missile, jury-rigged atop a truck on land—a feat thought impossible but that the defenders successfully attempted two weeks previously. Thirteen of the Glamorgan's crew members are killed and 17 wounded before a raging fire can be brought under control.

This same morning, Stanley airfield is bombed by a lone Vulcan bomber, the last such strike of the war. Argentine artillery nevertheless maintains a steady shelling of the new British positions atop Mount Longdon, Mount Harriet, and Two Sisters, inflicting a number of casualties.

JUNE 13, 1982. Capitulation. This morning, the 2nd Scots Guards Battalion of Lt. Col. Michael I. E. Scott is moved by helicopter from Bluff Cove to dig in under artillery fire at the southwestern end of Goat Ridge in anticipation of joining a coordinated assault against the last major Argentine defensive positions overnight, their specific objective being Tumbledown Mountain outside Stanley. The 2nd Parachute Battalion, now under Lt. Col. David Chaundler, also shifts out of its trenches north of Mount Longdon to prepare to attack the northern flank of Wireless Ridge, a line of hills and ridges running between the Murrell River and the north shore of Stanley harbor. The Gurkha Battalion is moreover helicoptered into a forward position just south of Two Sisters to storm Mount William.

A bit later, a flight of Argentine Air Force Skyhawks from "Grupo 5" attacks British field headquarters and other positions atop Mount Kent and Mount Longdon, damaging three helicopters but without inflicting any casualties. Two "Grupo 2" Canberras furthermore bomb Mount Kent this same Sunday evening, one being brought down by a Sea Dart missile. Neither bombardment seriously disrupts British preparations for their nocturnal assaults, which are bolstered when a pair of Royal Air Force

Harriers drop four 1,000-pound, laser-guided bombs onto the outermost Argentine emplacements.

Then at 8:30 p.m., a diversionary attack is initiated farther to the south by 30 men of a reconnaissance platoon under Maj. Richard Bethell, accompanied by four light Scorpion and Scimitar armored fighting vehicles. The lead tank hits a mine, and a Scots guardsman and Royal engineer are killed during the subsequent firefight, but the attack permits the main bulk of the Scots Guards Battalion to move silently a half-hour later through the bitterly cold night directly toward Tumbledown Mountain. The mountain's western end is clambered and secured by 10:30 p.m., but the Argentine defenders of the 5th Marine Infantry Battalion under 49-year-old lieutenant commander Carlos Hugo Robacio offer increasingly stiff resistance, so the entire craggy summit cannot be carried until after seven hours of fierce fighting, and the mountain's eastern slope does not fall until 8:15 a.m. on June 14, when the Gurkhas move around it. Scott's losses total 9 dead and 43 wounded.

The first company from the 2nd Parachute Battalion leaves its start line at 21:45 p.m. on June 13, supported by artillery fire from the British warships Ambuscade and Yarmouth offshore, plus two field batteries of the 29th Commando Royal Artillery Regiment, 16 mortars, and four light tanks from The Blues and the Royals. Although small Rough Diamond Hill west-northwest of Wireless Ridge is abandoned without a fight by the teenage conscripts of C Company of the 7th Argentine Infantry Regiment under Lt. Hugo García, defensive counterfire from the massed guns of the 4th Airborne Artillery Group farther back soon grows heavier. Subsequent British columns thus face stiffer opposition from the bulk of the 7th Regiment under Lt.

Col. Omar Giménez. D Company of the 2nd Parachute Battalion nonetheless gains the western end of Wireless Ridge and, with coordinated salvos from support units below and offshore, slowly fights its way along its entire length by dawn, until the Argentines retreat into Moody Brook and Stanley.

The 500 Gurkhas of Lt. Col. David Morgan have meanwhile marched along Goat Ridge's north face in the darkness, suffering a few casualties from Argentine shelling while waiting for the Scots Guards to secure their Tumbledown objective above so that they might then swing around that mountain and, in turn, storm Mount William. The order is eventually given at dawn of June 14, at which the Gurkhas trot single file through a minefield and Argentine shelling, detaching B Company to secure Tumbledown's eastern face before their main body charges howling toward Mount William. Its Argentine conscript defenders, already demoralized by the loss of Tumbledown and fearful of the Gurkhas' reputation as warriors, flee their posts rather than resist.

JUNE 14, 1982. Tumbledown, Mount William, and Wireless Ridge are taken in British night attacks. Argentine troops flee their final defensible positions outside Stanley, and white flags begin to be seen. The Argentine commander in chief, Brigadier General Menéndez, agrees to parley with British general Moore, and surrenders his 11,000 men at 9:00 p.m. During this brief war, 255 British lives have been lost, as opposed to more than 1,000 Argentines.

JUNE 15, 1982. Galtieri addresses a throng in Plaza de Mayo, which angrily denounces his conduct of war and has to be dispersed by force.

GRENADA INVASION (1983)

After a couple of centuries of British colonial rule, this Caribbean island gains its independence in 1974, and its first prime minister is the eccentric Sir Eric Gairy, a former trade union organizer. In March 1979, he is overthrown in a bloodless coup engineered by his longtime political rival Maurice Bishop, who heads the New JEWEL Movement Party—an acronym for “Joint Endeavor for Welfare, Education, and Liberation.” This organization actively seeks closer ties with Cuba and other communist states, culminating in an ambitious project to build a 9,000-foot runway at Point Salines on the southwestern tip of Grenada. Although ostensibly intended to bolster the island's sagging tourist trade by receiving large jets, it will also serve as a staging point for Cuban airlifts bound toward Africa, as well as for Soviet flights into Nicaragua.

By the summer of 1983, Bishop and one faction of the JEWEL Movement have grown distinctly uneasy over this heavy-handed communist connection and wishes to reestablish better relations with the West. Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard and another more radical faction, however, are determined to lead Grenada's conversion into a full-blown Marxist state. On October 13, 1983, Coard—after first obtaining the backing of Gen. Hudson Austin—places Bishop under house arrest, to stand trial for “failing to carry out orders from the Central Committee.” Several days of pro-Bishop demonstrations ensue throughout the island, plus diplomatic protests are heard from abroad.

On Wednesday, October 19, Foreign Minister Unison Whiteman harangues a crowd in the capital of St. George's, which then marches upon the official residence at Mount Royal and frees their leader against token opposition. Fired by this success, the mob subsequently liberates detained cabinet members from old Fort Ruppert, before three armored personnel carriers and a truckload of People's Revolutionary Army or PRA soldiers arrive under officer cadet Conrad Meyers, who gives the order to open fire. More than 100 Grenadians are consequently killed, and Bishop and several prominent supporters are rearrested and brutally put to death inside the fort.

News of this atrocity prompts neighboring Dominica, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent, Montserrat, Saint Kitts-Nevis, and Antigua to request military intervention from Barbados, Jamaica, and the United States. The conservative American administration of President Ronald Reagan—which has viewed developments on Grenada over the past few months with growing distaste—reacts swiftly, being especially concerned for the fate of 1,000 U.S. citizens on the island (mostly students and faculty at St. George's University Medical School).

OCTOBER 20, 1983. The Cuban government denounces the killings of Bishop and his supporters as “atrocious acts” and calls for “exemplary punishment” of their murderers.

queen's representative on Grenada, a virtual prisoner at Government House—smuggles out a request for international intervention, which the American administration chooses to honor.

OCTOBER 21, 1983. U.S. Naval Task Force 124 is diverted from a training exercise in the Caribbean to steam directly for Grenada and conduct an evacuation of American noncombatants. It is comprised of the helicopter carrier Guam and four landing ships, under the command of Capt. Carl E. Erie. Aboard are 1,700 marines of the 22nd Marine Amphibious Unit or MAU under Col. James P. Faulkner. The carrier battle group Independence of Rear Adm. Richard C. Berry is also diverted from the Atlantic to reinforce this operation—designated URGENT FURY—along with its escort screen of cruisers and destroyers.

OCTOBER 23, 1983. Vice Adm. Joseph Metcalf III arrives aboard the Guam to assume overall command of the newly activated Joint Task Force 120, with Maj. Gen. Norman H. Schwarzkopf as his deputy.

OCTOBER 24, 1983. Cuban colonel Pedro Tortolo Comas flies into Pearls Airport to assume command over the Cuban construction battalion.

OCTOBER 22, 1983. Cuba's ambassador on Grenada informs Coard and Austin that no military aid will be sent from Havana, although the 700-man construction battalion working on the Point Salines runway will be ordered to fight alongside the PRA, albeit under separate command. This same day, the governor general, Sir Paul Scoon—the

OCTOBER 25, 1983. Before dawn in a steady rain, U.S. Navy SEAL teams reconnoiter Pearls Airport and its surrounding beaches, discovering them to be heavily defended. An Air Force reconnaissance AC-130 Specter gunship also surveys the Point Salines runway, which is found to be blocked with vehicles and other obstructions. Therefore, Admiral Metcalf sends his first Marine contingent in to the attack at 5:00 a.m. aboard CH-46 helicopters rather than risk a disembarkation. Although some antiaircraft fire is drawn upon crossing the coast 20 minutes later, this is suppressed by the accompanying AH-1T Sea Cobra helicopter gunships, and the Marine companies occupy both Pearls and nearby Grenville by 6:30 a.m., with minimal casualties on both sides.

Also around 5:30 a.m., 3 AC-130 gunships and 10 MC-130 transports approach Point Salines, only to encounter heavy antiaircraft fire. Air Force colonel Hugh Hunter consequently decides to suppress it with strafing runs before allowing the 280 Army Ranger paratroopers to jump. The latter are dropped 45 minutes later and clear the runway within 15 minutes, for most Cuban defenders are down on the beach anticipating a seaborne assault. The rangers quickly overrun their camp, Colonel Tortolo being one of the few to escape into the Russian Embassy in St. George's. Heavier fighting is encountered when the Cuban companies are broken on the beaches shortly thereafter, one counterattack being spearheaded by three BTR-60 armored personnel carriers, all of which are destroyed.

SEAL raids on the Radio Free Grenada transmitter, on Richmond Hill Prison (where many prominent captives are held), and on Government House experience various degrees of difficulty, during which at least four American aircraft are downed. By 2:05 p.m., however, another wave of transports begins landing at Point Salines from Pope Air Force Base in North Carolina to disgorge the 82nd Airborne. The Cuban prisoners are corralled, and the medical school is secured by evening.

OCTOBER 26, 1983. Two hours before sunrise, marines under Lt. Col. Ray Smith disembark from the LST Manitowoc at Grand Mal Bay with five M-60A1 tanks to rescue the SEAL team pinned down within Government House by 7:00 a.m. A helicopter landing zone is then established at Queen's Park Race Course, and Fort Frederick is secured by 5:00 p.m., with little opposition.

Half an hour earlier, a heliborne Ranger-Marine force from the Guam assaults Grand Anse to rescue its 200-plus American students. A CH-46 helicopter is shot down, but the rest of this force rushes the defenses and airlifts out the students (a dozen rangers

Beirut Barracks Bombings

Amid the buildup for the Grenada invasion, U.S. forces suffered a heavy loss overseas. More than a year earlier, Israel had made a huge incursion into war-racked Lebanon to drive exiled Palestinian fighters from their bases around Beirut. After a month of Israeli shelling, a force of American, French, and Italian troops landed in mid-August 1982 to help effect a disengagement. Shortly after these peacekeepers left, President-elect Bashir Gemayel—a Maronite Catholic and leader of the "Lebanese Forces" militia—was murdered by a bomb on September 14. With Israeli backing, his vengeful followers swarmed into the Shatila and Sabra refugee camps in West Beirut, butchering 700–800 Palestinian civilians over the next four days.

Shocked by this slaughter, which the American government pledged to avert, President Reagan sent back in the multinational force. The first of 1,800 U.S. marines landed at Beirut International Airport on September 29, 1982.

Along with French and Italian units, they had orders to protect civilians from Lebanon's dozens of factions. Yet, however well meant, this mission was soon viewed as a prop for Lebanon's pro-Western Christian elite against its Muslim majority, as well as against Palestinian, Syrian, and Iranian interests. Feelings turned against the multinational presence, and a car bomb exploded at the U.S. Embassy on April 18, 1983, killing 17 American and more than 40 Lebanese employees.

As resentment hardened, the Marine base at the airport came under fire from the Shia suburbs of South Beirut, as well as from Druze fighters supplied by Syria and prowling along nearby slopes. American helicopters, planes, and warships returned fire. Clashes also worsened between Christian, Muslim, Palestinian, and Druze militias, especially in those areas of South Lebanon being evacuated by the Israeli Army. Fearful that the fractured government was about to collapse, Washington instructed the marines and their support ships to shell any moves around the capital that might threaten the Lebanese Army. Yet diplomatic efforts failed to include many key players, hence proved fruitless.

Finally, on the eve of the Grenada operation, a yellow Mercedes delivery truck drove onto the grounds of Beirut's airport around 6:20 a.m. on Sunday morning, October 23, 1983. It turned onto the access road leading to the U.S. Marine compound, and its suicide driver sped through a barbed-wire fence, past two sentry posts, then smashed through a gate into the lobby. The blast leveled the entire four-story, cinder-block building. Some 220 marines, 18 U.S. Navy personnel, and 3 soldiers died. A synchronized attack against the French headquarters a few miles away by a truck racing down a ramp into its underground garage killed 58 French paratroopers. Less than three months later, the multinational force was withdrawn from Beirut.

*An American soldier guarding prisoners on Grenada.
(U.S. Department of Defense)* remain behind to make room for the rescued and subsequently head out to sea aboard a stolen fishing boat, being picked up by the destroyer Caron). Farther south, the 82nd advances out of its base, overwhelming Cuban and Grenadian resistance.

OCTOBER 27, 1983. American units move inland, to an enthusiastic greeting from Grenada's civilian population. At Frequente, a Navy A-7 air strike is mistakenly directed against a group of 82 paratroopers, killing 1 and wounding 15. At 4:45 p.m., the Calivigny Barracks are bombarded and stormed, and its 30 defenders are subdued after a brave resistance. Three Americans are killed and a dozen injured during a multiple helicopter accident. By 10:00 that night, the capital of St. George's is entered without opposition, and the empty Richmond Hill Prison is seized (its guards have fled and the inmates have released themselves).

OCTOBER 28, 1983. The evacuation of American medical students toward Barbados continues, and mopping-up operations proceed.

The next day, the first Caribbean peacekeeping forces arrive, and General Austin and his bodyguards are arrested. Nearby Carriacou Island is overrun by October 31, but no resistance is encountered (although a large arms cache is captured). The Cuban worker battalion and other Eastern Bloc representatives are quickly deported from Grenada, and prominent JEWEL leaders are held for trial, before the U.S. invaders depart by mid-December. Nineteen American servicemen have given their lives and 116 been wounded during this operation, as opposed to 70 defenders killed (25 of them Cuban) and 409 wounded (59 Cuban). Castro's prestige suffers a serious setback throughout the region, and several Caribbean countries sever ties with Havana.

PANAMA CAMPAIGN (1989–1990)

On February 15, 1988, 51-year-old brigadier general Manuel Antonio Noriega—commander in chief of the Panamanian Defense Forces or PDF and de facto ruler of this country—is indicted on drug trafficking charges by American grand juries in Florida. Although subsequently fired by President Eric Arturo Delvalle in a live television broadcast, the general simply dismisses this civilian official and his vice president, replacing them with the more compliant Manuel Palma. Cuba and Nicaragua are the only foreign countries to recognize this irregular change of government.

Relations between Washington and Panama—already strained since July 1987 because of Noriega's corruption and flirtation with anti-American factions—now takes a decidedly downward slide. When the dictator brutally annuls the presidential elections of May 7, 1989 (which the opposition leader Guillermo Endara is poised to win), then further begins harassing American dependents in the Canal Zone, the Bush administration finally decides to act. A mixed brigade from the Army's 7th Light Infantry Division, 5th Mechanized Infantry Division, and 2nd Marine Light Armored Infantry Division are sent to protect U.S. interests, and Gen. Maxwell Thurman is appointed to command.

OCTOBER 3, 1989. Panamanian major Moisés Giroldi Vega launches an abortive coup against Noriega, his followers being crushed by the PDF's 7th Company and "2000" Battalion (so named because the Canal is to revert to Panamanian control that year).

DECEMBER 15, 1989. After weeks of escalating tension with Washington, Noriega is proclaimed "maximum leader" by Panama's rubber-stamp legislature, and a state of war is declared.

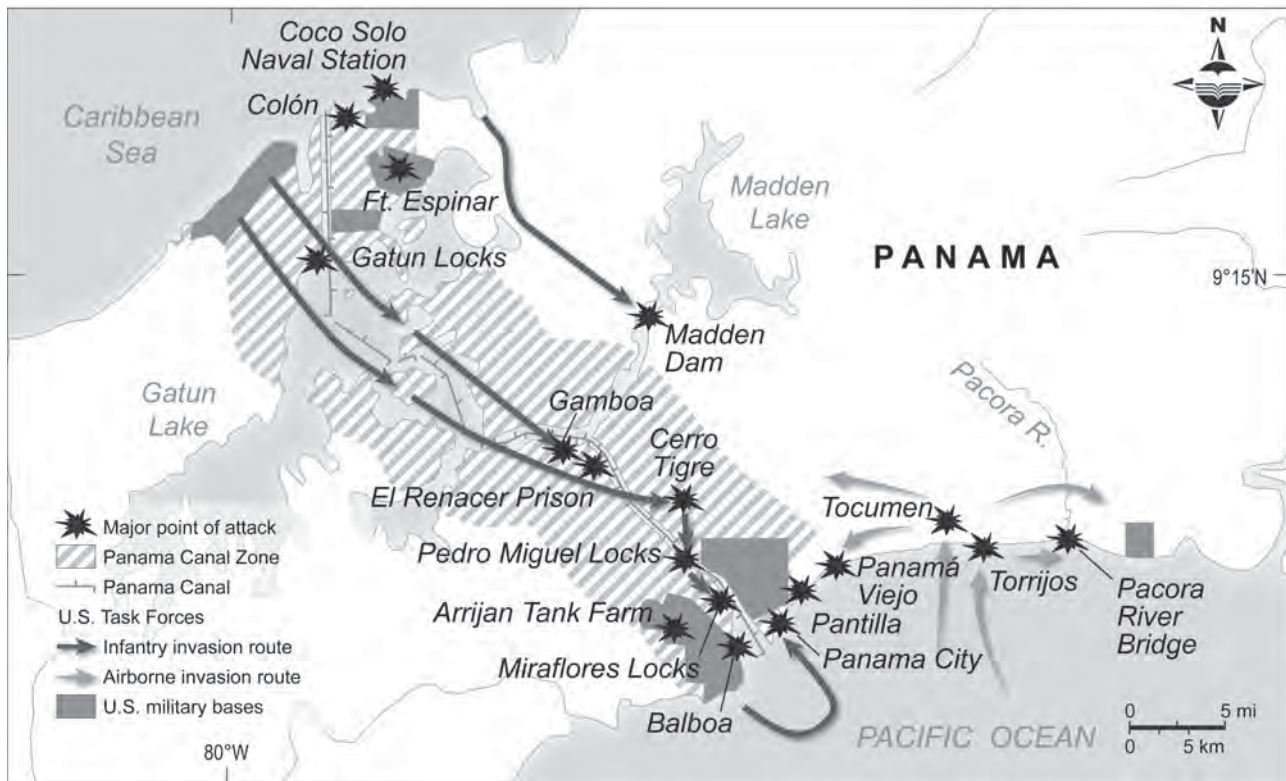

DECEMBER 16, 1989. Four unarmed marine officers are attacked at a PDF checkpoint near Noriega's headquarters or Comandancia, and Lt. Robert Paz is killed.

DECEMBER 17, 1989. This Sunday, Bush authorizes the dispatch of 11,000 troops from the XVIII Airborne Corps out of the continental United States to join the 13,000 already guarding the Canal and depose Noriega's regime in an operation code-named JUST CAUSE.

DECEMBER 20, 1989. After building up their numbers in the Canal Zone, the Americans launch their attacks at 1:00 a.m., in four task forces: Bayonet, Red, Semper Fidelis, and Atlantic. The first task force—composed of two infantry battalions, four light Sheridan tanks, and a SEAL team—advances upon the PDF base at Fort Amador, plus their headquarters in downtown Panama City. A SEAL team meanwhile disables Noriega's private Burning buildings and devastation in Panama City during Operation Just Cause. (U.S. Department of Defense)

U.S. invasion of Panama.

Lear jet at Paitilla Airport, suffering 4 dead and 11 wounded in fierce hand-to-hand combat before retiring. Task Force Pacific—a battalion of 75 rangers, plus two battalions of the 82nd's First Airborne Brigade—drops into the Torrijos-Tocumén airport, covered by AC-130 Specter gunships. (Noriega flees from this place's officer club where he had been asleep.)

The Panamanian “2000” Battalion attempts to mount a counterattack by fighting westward out of its Fort Cimarrón headquarters and across the Pacora River, only to be driven back by the awesome firepower of the American gunships. At 5:00 a.m., nearly four hours late, four C-141 Star-Lifter and three C-130 Hercules jet transports arrive over Panama City from Pope Air Force Base in North Carolina, dropping more paratroopers. Task Force Bayonet has meanwhile overrun PDF headquarters downtown, this firefight engulfing much of the Chorrillo slums in flames. Resistance will not finally cease until Thursday morning, December 21.

In the meantime, Air Force F-117A Stealth fighter-bombers out of Tonopah (Nevada) destroy the armored capabilities of the 600-man PDF concentration—6th and 7th companies—at Río Hato, 55 miles west of Panama City, followed up by a paratroop drop of a battalion of 75th Rangers under Col. Buck Kernan from 15 transports. This effectively precludes any potential Panamanian counterattack from this base, 34 PDF troops being killed and another 260 captured at a cost of 4 rangers dead, 27 wounded, and 35 jump injuries.

DECEMBER 23, 1989. Having easily routed the PDF, 2,000 additional American troops of the 7th Infantry Division are flown in to restore order in Panama City—scene of widespread looting and rioting—as well as to end sporadic sniper fire.

DECEMBER 24, 1989. After four days spent in hiding, Noriega is granted political asylum at the Papal Embassy in Panama City, along with 10 of his bodyguards. The building is immediately cordoned off by U.S. forces.

DECEMBER 29, 1989. While waiting for Noriega to surrender, American troops smash into the Nicaraguan Embassy in Panama City, uncovering a large cache of weapons and provoking a diplomatic incident.

JANUARY 3, 1990. At 8:50 p.m., Noriega exits the Papal Embassy and is seized by American troops. Flown to Howard Air Force Base aboard a Night Hawk helicopter, he is arrested there by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents, then extradited to Miami aboard a MC-130 transport to stand trial for drug trafficking. He is eventually sentenced on July 10, 1992, to 40 years of incarceration. Casualties from Operation JUST CAUSE are estimated at 23 Americans dead and 330 wounded; 297 PDF members killed and 123 wounded (several hundred more being captured); plus 500 Panamanian civilians killed, hundreds others injured, and 18,000 left homeless. Material damages are calculated at between $1 and $2 billion.

POST-COLD WAR ERA (1990–PRESENT)

Abroad, the Cold War ends when an exhausted Soviet Union simply implodes from stagnation, its once all-powerful Central Committee agreeing to relinquish political power by February 7, 1990, after which East and West Germany move toward reunification and other satellite communist states peacefully regain their independence. Already the greatest military power in the Western Hemisphere, the United States is left as the lone superpower in the world after the Soviet Union itself dissolves on Christmas Day 1991. Despite its unassailable military position, though, Washington cannot prevent isolated terrorist strikes or minor eruptions from occurring throughout the Americas.

FEBRUARY 15, 1990. Argentina and the United Kingdom agree to restore diplomatic relations, almost eight years after the conclusion of the Falklands War.

MARCH 10, 1990. Eighteen months after seizing power, Prosper Avril is ousted from office as president of Haiti, his tenure undermined by a wave of growing popular unrest.

MARCH 11, 1990. Patricio Alwyn is sworn in as Chile's first democratically elected president in 20 years.

JULY 27, 1990. Angered by unresolved land claims, 42 members of an extremist Black Muslim sect called the "Jamaat al Muslimeen"—led by Yasin Abu Bakr, a former policeman born under the name of Lennox Philip—storm the "Red House" or parliament building in Trinidad and Tobago's capital of Port of Spain. Prime Minister A. N. R. Robinson and most of his cabinet are taken hostage during this coup d'état attempt, while another 72 Muslimeen seize the island's only television station. Abu Bakr broadcasts a live message at 6:00 p.m., announcing the fall of the National Alliance for Reconstruction or NAR administration and calling for calm while he negotiates his sect's terms with the army.

Port of Spain is nonetheless gripped by widespread looting and arson, as the Trinidad and Tobago Defense Force and policemen redeploy to seal off the area around the Red House. Acting President Emmanuel Carter and a few cabinet members declare a state of emergency, and troops retake the television station overnight. After six days of negotiations, during which the Muslimeen insist upon receiving amnesty, they surrender on August 1. After two years of incarceration, they are all released.

It is believed that between 26 and 40 people were killed during this confrontation, and dozens of others wounded, including Prime Minister Robinson. Property damage ran into the millions, and the NAR government was effectively doomed. Some Jamaat al Muslimeen members subsequently become involved in even more illegal activities, such as drug smuggling and extortion.

DECEMBER 3, 1990. Argentine Army troops, followers of Colonel Seineldin, mutiny and are only put down after several deaths and 300 arrests.

DECEMBER 5, 1990. In Panama, former Noriega loyalist, Col. Eduardo Herrera Hassan, leads a revolt by 100 members of the newly created Fuerza Pública de Panamá or "Panama Public Force" (FPP) and are put down by the 193rd U.S. Infantry Brigade.

DECEMBER 24, 1990. Although forced out of office three years previously, Suriname's still-active strongman Dési Bouterse informs the Assembly

President Ramsewak Shankar over the telephone that his government must resign, an act that is known as the “Telephone Coup.”

JANUARY 7, 1991. In Port-au-Prince, the former cabinet minister Roger Lafontant seizes the presidential palace and compels Acting President Ertha Pascal-Trouillot to read a letter of resignation. Supporters of the former Roman Catholic priest Jean-Bertrand Aristide, winner of the December 16, 1990, elections—although not yet installed into office—stage such massive street protests that the Haitian Army intervenes and jails Lafondant.

SEPTEMBER 29–30, 1991. Overnight, Aristide is deposed as president of Haiti in a military coup engineered by Lt. Gen. Raoul Cédras, his army chief of staff. Aristide is expelled to Venezuela, while thousands of his supporters are subsequently killed, injured, tortured, or detained in a wave of repression. Joseph Nerette is appointed as puppet president, but most foreign governments refuse to recognize this change of administration, along with all Haitian embassies overseas.

JANUARY 16, 1992. Representatives of the government of El Salvador and rebel leaders sign a pact in Mexico City marking an end to a 12-year civil war that has claimed at least 75,000 lives.

FEBRUARY 4, 1992. At dawn, five Venezuelan Army units under the 37-year-old lieutenant colonel Hugo Rafael Chávez Frías race into Caracas to seize the Miraflores Presidential Palace, the Defense Ministry, the Francisco de Miranda Airbase at La Carlota, and La Planicie Military Historical Museum. It is Chávez’s aim to detain the unpopular President Pérez as he returns from an overseas trip, while other cities are simultaneously to be occupied by fellow conspirators.

Although Valencia, Maracaibo, and Maracay all fall into rebel hands, Chávez’s coup misfires in the capital. He soon finds himself surrounded in the museum by loyal units and compelled to surrender after exchanges of gunfire in which 14 soldiers are slain, plus another 50 troops and 80 civilians injured. When he is made to appear on national television and order the other rebel detachments to lay down their arms, he is catapulted into national prominence, quipping on air that he has only failed por ahora or “for now.”

MARCH 17, 1992. A pickup truck driven by a suicide bomber smashes into the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, the resultant detonation killing 29 people and injuring 242, as well as leveling several nearby structures. The radical Middle Eastern group known as “Islamic Jihad” claims responsibility, allegedly in revenge for the assassination on February 16 in southern Lebanon of the Hezbollah leader Sheikh Abbas al-Musawi and his family when his motorcade was destroyed by helicopter gunships.

OCTOBER 2, 1992. After prisoners have revolted in the overcrowded, diseased, and poorly managed Carandiru Penitentiary in São Paulo (Brazil), this complex is stormed by military policemen under Col. Ubiratan Guimarães, who shoot dead 102 detainees while freeing 68 captive guards. Guimarães is subsequently convicted of excessive use of force, although his sentence is later overturned.

OCTOBER 5, 1992. After enduring a generation of elections rigged in favor of the People’s National Congress or PNC, which mostly upholds the interests of Guyana’s Afro minority, 100 foreign monitors—including former U.S. president Jimmy Carter—ensure the victory of the People’s Progressive Party or PPC, predominantly sprung from the Indo-Guyanese majority, despite numerous acts of violence and riots.

NOVEMBER 27, 1992. After several delays, a second coup attempt occurs in Caracas aimed at removing Venezuelan President Pérez from office and freeing Col. Hugo Chávez from Yare Prison in the Tuy Valleys. This group of rebels is led by rear admirals Hernán Grüber Odremán and Luis Enrique Cabrera Aguirre, as well as Air Force brigadier general Francisco Visconti Osorio, with backing from certain army and civilian factions. Government television stations and transmitters are seized at 4:30 a.m., which then broadcast appeals by the mutinous soldiery for a popular uprising as well as recordings of Chávez harangues. A half-hour later, a dozen fighter bombers take off from Visconti’s Libertador Airbase to bomb the presidential palace and other installations, four being shot down by antiaircraft fire.

Although a few sympathetic outbursts do erupt in the capital, its population is generally alarmed by the threatening demeanor of the rebel troops as seen uncensored on television, hence no widespread insurrection ensues. The president counters by appearing on a private television station at 6:30 a.m., appealing for calm as loyal units attack the rebels. Sporadic clashes occur throughout the city, until armored columns compel admirals Grüber and Cabrera to surrender at the Military Historical Museum by 3:30 p.m. Libertador Airbase is also overrun around that same time, Visconti escaping with 100 followers aboard a C-130 Hercules transport to seek asylum at Iquitos (Peru).

The coup is finished by sundown, an official investigation listing 29 servicemen and 142 civilians as being killed, with hundreds more injured or arrested, as well as the destruction of 17 air force planes and untold other material damage.

FEBRUARY 26, 1993. A Ryder rental van packed by Islamist extremists with 1,300 pounds of home-made explosives detonates in the parking garage below the North Tower of New York City's World Trade Center, killing 6 people and injuring at least 1,040, yet failing in its intended goal of toppling this 110-story structure.

FEBRUARY 28, 1993. After a month of surveillance and preparations, U.S. federal agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (ATF) mount a Sunday morning raid against the Mount Carmel compound, nine miles east-northeast of Waco (Texas), to investigate complaints of child abuse and stockpiling of weapons by a decades-old apocalyptic sect—formerly part of the broader Branch Davidian movement, now headed by the schismatic David Koresh.

A violent shootout results in the death of 4 agents and 6 sect members, so the raiding party retreats, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, along with the ATF and local law enforcement agencies, isolates the compound. Unable to starve the sect into surrendering, they storm the compound again with armored vehicles on April 19. Several fires erupt, and the entire complex burns to the ground, claiming the lives of 76 sect members—including 27 children, whom the agents are purportedly striving to save. Such heavy-handed tactics horrify the nation and spawn a wave of distrust among other fringe groups.

OCTOBER 30, 1993. After only limited pressure has been exerted upon the corrupt, usurper government of Haiti by an Organization of American States-imposed embargo—including the use of U.S. naval blockaders and the freezing of suspect assets in Miami—General Cédras, de facto ruler of this island, unleashes another wave of violent repression, which prevents the return into office of the democratically elected president Aristide. As a result, U.S. president William Jefferson “Bill” Clinton authorizes the implementation of measures leading toward a full-scale American military intervention, which will be dubbed Operation UPHOLD DEMOCRACY.

DECEMBER 2, 1993. Fugitive Colombian drug lord Pablo Escobar is gunned down in Medellín when police close in to rearrest him.

JANUARY 1, 1994. Timed to embarrass the Mexican government by coinciding with that nation's entry into the North American Free Trade Agreement, guerrilla bands of the heretofore unknown Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional or “Zapatista Army for National Liberation” (EZLN) seize government offices in San Cristóbal de las Casas, Las Margaritas, and Ocosingo, all in the impoverished southern border state of Chiapas. Thousands of troops are rushed into the region by President Carlos Salinas de Gortari, yet they cannot crush the elusive 2,000 guerrillas, who disappear into jungle hideaways, despite various clashes in which several hundred people perish, while tens of thousands of peasant refugees seek to escape the fighting. Salinas de Gortari therefore calls a halt to military operations on January 12 and sends his foreign minister, Manuel Camacho Solís, to negotiate a truce with the mysterious rebel leader, Subcomandante Marcos. These talks continue until the scheduled change of federal administration at the end of that year.

The newly installed president, Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de León, on February 9, 1995, orders the army to resume its offensive against the rebel stronghold of Guadalupe Tepeyac, deep within the Lacandona jungles, and moreover identifies the rebel leader as a university graduate named Rafael Sebastián Guillén, born into a middle-class family 37 years previously at Tampico (Tamaulipas). Five days later, military operations are once again halted, and a year of more negotiations ensues, producing an accord by February 16, 1996. Upon assuming office on December 1, 2000, the new president Vicente Fox orders the army withdrawn altogether from Chiapas, even allowing Marcos to tour the country giving leftist speeches.

MAY 1994. In a move intended to deflect gathering foreign support for the restoration of the exiled Haitian president Aristide, Cédras installs the frail, 80-year-old Emile Jonassaint as puppet president and prime minister. The United States and most other countries refuse to recognize this as a legitimate change of government.

JULY 18, 1994. As part of a global spate of attacks, a suicide bomber—believed to be 21-year-old Ibrahim Hussein Berro sent by the radical Shia militant group Hezbollah of Lebanon—drives a van laden with ammonium-nitrate explosives through the front gates of the Argentine-Israeli Mutual Association in the Once District near downtown Buenos Aires, igniting a blast that kills 85 people and wounds more than 300. The subsequent investigation fails to uncover any of the bomber's coconspirators, although it is believed by both the Israeli intelligence agency Mossad and Argentina's SIDE that they have operated from Ciudad del Este, a smuggling center on the Paraguayan border populated by many traders of Middle Eastern origin.

JULY 31, 1994. The United Nations passes an American-sponsored resolution authorizing the use of force to restore Haiti's president Aristide into office.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1994. Haitian Operation. After dispatching a 23-vessel American fleet with a large landing force on the previous evening, President Clinton allows a trio of emissaries—former president Jimmy Carter, former chief of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff general Colin Powell, and Sen. Sam Nunn of Georgia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee—to fly into Haiti's capital of Port-au-Prince on Friday to conduct last-minute negotiations. To avoid bloodshed, they offer inducements to Cédras, his second-in-command brigadier general Philippe Biamby, and police chief Lt. Col. Joseph Michel François to go into exile.

When the American task force of Adm. Paul D. Miller appears offshore on September 26, it consists of overwhelming force: the nuclear aircraft carriers America and Eisenhower, bearing more than 100 helicopters and 4,000 troops between them; the helicopter carrier Wasp, conveying an additional 2,000 marines; the amphibious assault vessels Nashville and U.S. marines patrol the streets of Cap-Haïtien, guarding the parade route of Jean-Bertrand Aristide during his visit on September 30, 1994, shortly before being restored to the presidency. (U.S. Department of Defense)

Mount Whitney; the guided missile destroyer Comte de Grasse; the guided missile frigates Aubrey Fitch, Oliver Hazard Perry, and Clifton Sprague; plus 14 other transports and support vessels.

Together, they quickly throw 19,000 troops ashore, encountering no opposition from Haiti's 7,000-man army, which is ordered not to fight because of Cédras's last-minute acceptance of Washington's terms. After a three-week occupation, during which American peacekeeping forces and their UN allies fully secure the island, Aristide returns into Port-au-Prince on October 15, while Cédras flies off into exile in Panama.

JANUARY 26, 1995. Ecuadorian-Peruvian Border Skirmish. Fighting erupts between 40-man Peruvian and Ecuadorian detachments in the Cenepa River Basin of the Upper Amazon, specifically about the latter's hold on four border outposts along 48 miles of the still ill-charted frontier in the Cóndor Range between both nations. (Such outbursts usually coincide with anniversaries of the January 1942 Treaty of Rio de Janeiro, whereby Ecuador lost much of this territory; see "July 5, 1941" entry in "Latin American Troubles.")

Over the next month, some 3,000 Ecuadorian and 2,000 Peruvian troops are moved into this region, the former accurately raining mortar rounds and rockets down out of the heights upon the Peruvians below, targeted with global positioning systems. Jet fighter-bombers also make numerous flights. The most serious fighting centers around the Cueva de los Tallos, Base Sur, and Tiwintza outposts in the north, all of which are successfully defended by Ecuadorian jungle infantrymen. An estimated 31 fatalities are inflicted on both sides before a cease-fire and agreement to separate the forces is signed at Montevideo on February 28. Actual withdrawals commence by March 30, concluding on May 3, this confrontation being regarded as an Ecuadorian victory.

APRIL 19, 1995. At 9:02 a.m. on this Wednesday morning, an enormous blast destroys the Alfred P. Murrah Building, a U.S. federal government complex in downtown Oklahoma City, killing 168 people and injuring more than 800. The explosion emanates from a rented Ryder truck parked beside the building's north face, packed with 5,000 pounds of ammonium-nitrate fertilizer and nitromethane, a highly volatile fuel for race cars.

Initial suspicions focus on Middle Eastern terrorists, but 90 minutes later a car without license plates departing Oklahoma City northward on I-35 is pulled over and its driver Timothy McVeigh is arrested. A recently discharged Gulf War veteran who harbors a bitter hatred of the American government, McVeigh confesses to the bombing, which he declares is to avenge the Waco "Branch Davidian" assault of two years previously (see "February 28, 1993" entry). He is eventually executed by lethal injection, while his coconspirator Terry Nichols receives multiple life sentences for helping to construct the bomb, and Michael Fortier is given 12 years for failing to warn the authorities.

FEBRUARY 1996. As America's antinarcotics campaign becomes increasingly militarized, President Clinton nominates U.S. Army general Barry McCaffrey, a veteran of the Vietnam War and Operation DESERT STORM, as the nation's latest director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy—a position commonly referred to as the "Drug Czar."

SEPTEMBER 4, 1996. Marxist guerrillas of the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia or "Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia" (FARC) launch a surprise attack against a Colombian military base in the south central Department of Guaviare, inaugurating a three-week offensive that will claim at least 130 lives.

DECEMBER 29, 1996. Representatives of the Guatemalan government and its National Revolutionary Union sign a peace accord, ending 36 years of civil war that has claimed about 200,000 lives.

DECEMBER 30, 1996. Five years after their last known operation, a handful of FPMR guerrillas swoops into the maximum-security prison outside Santiago de Chile at 4:00 p.m. aboard a hijacked Bell "Long Ranger" helicopter of the federal Carabinero police and frees four imprisoned colleagues within less than a minute.

APRIL 22, 1997. After a 126-day occupation of the Japanese Embassy in Lima by 14 Movimiento Revolucionario Tupac Amaru or MRTA guerrillas, 140 Peruvian commandos sent by the country's president Alberto Fujimori launch a surprise attack against the building at 3:19 p.m., while the rebel leader Néstor Cerpa Cartolini and 9 of his followers are exercising inside by playing soccer. All the terrorists and 2 soldiers are killed in the resultant half-hour shootout, which is furthermore punctuated by numerous

FARC

A U.S.-assisted sweep by the Colombian Army through the Marquetalia jungles in the southern Department of Tolima in May 1964 stamped out most guerrilla resistance. But a small peasant group named the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia or “Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia” survived. Two years later, FARC was reorganized as the military wing of the Colombian Communist Party. New leadership was provided by the young Marxist intellectual “Jacobo Arenas,” born Luis Morantes, and the veteran jungle fighter Manuel Marulanda Vélez. The latter was born Pedro Antonio Marín, but he assumed the name of a murdered union leader and was better known as Tiro Fijo or “Sure-shot.”

Their 350 ragtag followers proved little challenge to the Colombian Army, until Arenas refined their strategic objectives during the so-called Seventh Guerrilla Conference of 1982. Under his guidance, FARC was changed into a “People’s Army.” Uniforms with rank insignias were given to the guerrillas, as well as better weaponry. Discipline, pay, and logistics all were improved. Through such means, Arenas hoped to create a force that could spearhead a drive to national power.

In fact, he produced what has been described as “the most capable and dangerous Marxist guerrilla organization in the world.” Any means, fair or foul, were used to advance the revolution. FARC cruelly pillaged towns, kidnapped individuals for ransom, extorted monthly payments known as “vaccines” from companies, laid highway blockades, randomly detonated terrorist bombs, and gave protection to drug traffickers harvesting coca in its territory.

Arenas, however, died on August 10, 1990, allegedly of natural causes, although rumors persist that he was shot by an angry subaltern. Without his lead, FARC lost its ideological zeal to topple the government. Instead, the movement entrenched under Tiro Fijo in the southeastern jungles and plains at the foot of the Andes. Although it maintained secret operatives in major cities, and the number of its fighters doubled to 15,000, FARC was satisfied to retain control over its third of Colombia’s interior. In recent years, the organization had to defend this territory and its lucrative drug trade against renewed government offensives, such as the “Plan Patriota” campaign of 2002–2004.

detonations. One of the 72 hostages also dies of a heart attack while the others are being freed.

JULY 13, 1997. The exhumed remains of Ché Guevara (see “October 8, 1967” entry in “Latin American Troubles”) are returned to Cuba. They are received at San Antonio de los Baños airbase outside Havana by a full military guard headed by President Castro and reinterred on October 17 in a specially built mausoleum in the city of Santa Clara, scene of his greatest revolutionary triumph.

MARCH 2, 1998. On Monday of the last week leading into Colombia’s congressional elections, FARC guerrillas ambush a column of government troops in El Billar Ravine, along the jungle banks of the Caguan River deep inside coca-producing Caquetá Province, near the Amazonian headwaters in the country’s southernmost corner. Several-score fatalities are inflicted during three days of intense combat, which the guerrillas intend to use as a warning to frighten voters away from attending the polls on Sunday.

MARCH 10, 1998. At 82 years of age, General Pinochet retires as the head of Chile’s army and is succeeded by Gen. Ricardo Izurieta. The next day, Pinochet is named a senator for life amid civilian protests against this unelected appointment, designed to shield him from prosecution.

JANUARY 15, 2000. After months of rampant inflation and economic recession, indigenous Ecuadorians begin a march upon the capital of Quito, calling for the resignation of President Jamil Mahuad Witt. Despite the deployment of thousands of troops and policemen at checkpoints all across the country, thousands of protesters nonetheless get through, storming the Parliament on January 21—as soldiers stand aside, obliging Mahuad to flee Carondelet Palace for the safety of a nearby military base. The next day, Gen. Carlos Mendoza—head of the armed forces—announces the deposition of the president and his temporary replacement by a three-man council comprised of the general, the indigenous leader Antonio Vargas, and the supreme court justice Carlos Solórzano.

MAY 18, 2000. Mutinous Paraguayan troops attempt to take over the barracks in the capital of Asunción in support of the exiled leader, General Oviedo, of one of the Colorado Party factions. Their rebellion is quickly suffocated within a few hours, and President Luis González Macchi the next day proclaims a month-long state of national emergency.

AUGUST 2000. To assist the antidrug and social stabilization efforts of Colombia’s President Andrés

Pastrana Arango, U.S. president Clinton delivers a $1.3 billion package of American aid, part of which will fund the purchase and operation of 60 combat helicopters, plus the training of their pilots and other related support troops and personnel.

SEPTEMBER 11, 2001. 9/11. At 8:46 a.m. on this Tuesday morning, American Airlines jetliner Flight 11 unexpectedly roars across New York City's Manhattan Island and slams into one of its prominent twin skyscrapers, the north face of the North Tower of the 110-story World Trade Center. As rescue teams mobilize and news crews film this apparent accident, United Airlines Flight 175 deliberately flies across the Hudson River into the South Tower at 9:03 a.m. The fact that these are coordinated terrorist attacks by suicide pilots is confirmed when yet another hijacked American Airlines jetliner, Flight 77, hurtles into the Pentagon outside Washington, D.C., at 10:03 a.m. A fourth plane, United Airlines Flight 93, is intended to hit the U.S. Capitol, yet instead plunges into a field outside Shanksville (Pennsylvania) after its passengers rise up against their hijackers.

As millions of television viewers watch in horror, each of the burning World Trade Center towers disintegrates over the next couple of hours from the combined stress of such massive impacts, plus the inextinguishable conflagrations sparked by the fully fueled jetliners. As the buildings collapse, enormous amounts of debris rain into the very heart of New York's financial district. Casualties are later tabulated at almost 3,000 dead: 265 crew members and passengers aboard the four airliners, 125 personnel in the Pentagon, plus 2,595 people in the World Trade Center (including 343 firefighters and 60 police officers). Material losses run into the billions of dollars, as more than 30 other damaged buildings will later have to be razed and four subway stations entirely rebuilt.

After an initial period of uncertainty, the 19 perpetrators are identified as members of a violent Muslim fringe group known as Al Qaeda or "The Base," whose leader Osama bin Laden is sheltered by the fundamentalist Taliban government of Afghanistan. Three years previously, bin Laden had issued a fatwa or "edict" declaring holy war against America for a litany of alleged grievances. A global

School of the Americas

This institute was created on a base near the Panama Canal by the U.S. Army in 1946 as the "Latin American Training Center—Ground Division." Its aim was to standardize the teaching of Central and South American officers. Renamed the School of the Americas (SOA) in 1963, a thousand trainees received Spanish-language instruction every year. Its graduates proved a valuable means of exerting U.S. influence in the Western Hemisphere after they returned home and were promoted up the ranks.

But a high percentage of Latin America's most undemocratic leaders also were SOA-trained: Leopoldo Galtieri and Roberto Viola of Argentina, Hugo Bánzer of Bolivia, Guillermo Rodríguez of Ecuador, Roberto D'Aubisson of El Salvador, Efraín Ríos Montt of Guatemala, Omar Torrijos and Manuel Noriega of Panama, Vladimiro Montesinos and Juan Velasco Alvarado of Peru, and Juan Manuel Sucre Figarella of Venezuela. America's reputation during the Cold War was damaged by such men. Rumors even spread that in their anticommunist zeal, U.S. instructors gave training in torture methods to crush dissent. Because of such tales, the Escuela de las Américas became nicknamed the Escuela de los Asesinos or "School of the Assassins."

The Pentagon brushed aside such charges as leftist propaganda. In 1984, it moved the SOA to Fort Benning outside Columbus (Georgia) after the United States signed a treaty to leave the Panama Canal by the end of the century. The institute was further tarnished during the Salvadoran Civil War. Six Jesuit priests, their housekeeper, and her teenage daughter were murdered in their University of Central America residence on November 16, 1989. Of the 27 soldiers implicated in this massacre, 19 were SOA graduates. Ten protesters led by a Maryknoll priest appeared as a result outside Fort Benning's gates on the first anniversary of their deaths, eventually sparking a congressional review of SOA procedures.

After many delays, the Pentagon released seven manuals on September 20, 1996. They showed that the SOA trained Latin American officers in executions, torture, blackmail, and other forms of coercion. Reforms were immediately implemented in hopes of saving the strategically valuable institute. Funding nonetheless was almost suspended in 2000 before the new administration of President George W. Bush allowed the SOA to regroup the next year as the "Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation." Yet tens of thousands of civilian protesters still gathered outside Fort Benning every November. Venezuela, Uruguay, and Argentina also refused to send any more soldiers to be taught at the institute.

groundswell of support backs the U.S. administration of President George W. Bush in assembling a coalition expedition, which one month later fights its way into Afghanistan, expels the Taliban from power, and chases bin Laden into hiding.

MAY 5, 2003. In a bid to free a dozen government officials and soldiers being held hostage in a remote jungle camp by FARC guerrillas, 75 Colombian soldiers descend from a flight of helicopters, only to find 9 captives dead and their captors fled.

MAY 27, 2003. After a month of nationwide strikes and roadblocks, Peru's embattled president Alejandro Toledo imposes a state of emergency and deploys troops to temporarily restore order.

JUNE 2003. Colombia's "Plan Patriota" Offensive. To break FARC's grip on rural districts, as well as its lucrative sideline in drug cultivation, the government of newly elected president Álvaro Uribe Vélez launches an ambitious series of offensives dubbed "Plan Patriota." Some 18,000–20,000 troops are involved, supported by heavy transport planes, helicopters, and other sophisticated weaponry provided by Washington at a cost of several hundred millions of dollars, plus the active participation on the ground of 800 U.S. military advisors and 600 private technicians.

Their first joint operation sweeps through the Department of Cundinamarca, outside the national capital of Bogotá, followed by a second offensive initiated on December 31 into the Department of Caquetá, led by the successful general Reinaldo Castellanos of Colombia's 5th Division. Early in 2004, the campaign furthermore extends into the southern departments of Guaviare, Meta, and Putumayo. By late that spring, therefore, FARC forces are being driven from their main towns and strongholds and regrouping in the jungle to resume a guerrilla-style existence, with perhaps 5,000 fighters launching hit-and-run strikes at government weak points. Numerous other followers are slain or desert. Neutral Ecuador also deploys 21,000 troops along its border with Colombia to ensure that this fighting does not spill over into its own territory.

FEBRUARY 5, 2004. An anti-Aristide rebellion begins with the capture of the Gonaïves police station and other government offices by the so-called Revolutionary Resistance Front of Artibonite, soon spreading to nearby Saint-Marc (Haiti). A contin-gent of 150 officers fails to retake Gonaïves three days later, yet Saint-Marc is subdued by February 10. Rebel forces nevertheless continue to marshal and close in upon the northern city of Cap-Haïtien, the town of Dondon just to its south changing hands several times, before the border city of Hinche is seized on February 16.

The rebel leader Buteur Metayer is supported by the former chief of police for Cap-Haïtien, Guy Philippe, so they penetrate this city with relative ease on February 22. Port-de-Paix follows a couple of days later, after which the southwestern city of Les Cayes is also taken on February 26. Foreigners begin to flee the capital Port-au-Prince, some 300 fatalities having been suffered thus far, while the American president George W. Bush refuses to back the beleaguered Aristide. On Sunday morning, February 29, the Haitian president is removed from office and flown into exile to the Central African Republic aboard a U.S. aircraft, while a UN force comprised of American, Canadian, and French troops arrive to prevent bloodshed during the ensuing governmental transition.

NOVEMBER 2004. A move to impeach Ecuador's 48-year-old president Lucio Gutiérrez on corruption charges is approved by the Ecuadorian Supreme Court, therefore the president retaliates on December 10 by convening 52 of the 100 national congressmen who then remove 27 of the 31 judges from the bench and name more pliant replacements.

Protests against Gutiérrez nevertheless gain momentum in the capital of Quito, until finally—after a massive protest march on April 15, 2005—the embattled president once more dissolves the Supreme Court and declares a national state of emergency. Although demonstrations are briefly curtailed by the authorities' show of force in the capital, they spread to Ecuador's largest city of Guayaquil by April 17, effectively dooming Gutiérrez's administration.

JANUARY 13, 2005. In the grip of a worsening fiscal plight, the People's United Party or PUP government of President Said Musa of Belize announces significant new tax increases. Two days later, angry protests start in the capital Belmopan against the administration's incompetence and corruption, persisting for a week.

MAY 1, 2006. Bolivia's 46-year-old president Juan Evo Morales, a former coca farmer elected on a socialist platform five months previously on promises to restore that impoverished nation's oil and natural gas production to its state monopoly, informs a roaring crowd in La Paz that troops will be ordered to occupy scores of foreign-owned installations the next day in anticipation of a sweeping nationalization program.

OCTOBER 29, 2006. After five months of occupying the Mexican city of Oaxaca by thousands of supporters of the state's 70,000 striking teachers, who are furthermore demanding the resignation of Gov. Ulises Ruiz on grounds of electoral fraud and political intimidation, their barricades are breached by armored cars and an estimated 4,000 federal policemen under the command of an army general. A 15-year-old protester is killed, and 50 others are arrested, while the remainder regroups on the grounds of the local university, as minor clashes ensue.

Further Reading

The following list constitutes only a partial selection of works consulted in the compilation of this book and is reproduced here merely to help flesh out particular entries or sections. Due to space considerations, a complete bibliography cannot be included.

General Works

- Ballesteros y Beretta, Antonio, ed. Historia de América y de los pueblos americanos. 26 vols. Barcelona: Salvat, 1946–1963.
- Barado, Francisco. Historia del ejército español. 3 vols. Madrid: Museo Militar, 1883–1886.
- Barreto, Anibal. Fortificações do Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: Biblioteca do Exército Editora, 1958.
- Bethell, Leslie, ed. The Cambridge History of Latin America. 11 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984–1995.
- Boucher, Philip P. Cannibal Encounters: Europeans and Island Caribs, 1492–1763. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- Buchet, Christian. La lutte pour l'espace caraïbe et la façade atlantique de l'Amérique centrale et du Sud (1672–1763). Paris: Librairie de l'Inde, 1991.
- Bueno, José María. Soldados de España: El uniforme español desde los Reyes Católicos hasta Juan Carlos I. Madrid: Almena, 1998.
- Calderón Quijano, José Ignacio. Historia de las fortificaciones en Nueva España. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1953.
- Catalog of the National Maritime Museum Library. Vol. 5: Naval History. London: H.M.S.O., 1976.
- Chartrand, René. Canadian Military Heritage. 2 vols. Montreal: Art Global, 1993.
- Chipman, Donald E. Spanish Texas, 1519–1821. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992.
- Cipolla, Carlo. Guns, Sails and Empires: Technological Innovation and the Early Phases of European Expansion, 1400–1700. New York: Pantheon, 1965.
- Clowes, Sir William Laird, et al. The Royal Navy: A History from the Earliest Times to the Present. 7 vols. London: Sampson Low, Marston, 1897–1903.
- Cobb, Hubbard, and Schuler, Stanley. American Battlefields: A Complete Guide to the Historic Conflicts in Words and Maps. New York: Macmillan, 1996.
- Davis, Robert H. Historical Dictionary of Colombia. Metuchen: Scarecrow, 1993.
- Favier, Jean, and Menier, Marie-Antoinette, comps. Guide des sources de l'histoire de l'Amérique latine et des Antilles dans les archives françaises. Paris: Archives Nationales, 1984.
- Fernández Duro, Cesáreo. Armada Española desde la unión de Castilla y de Aragón. 9 vols. Madrid: Rivadeneyra, 1895–1903.
- Fonseca, Maurélio. Arte naval. Rio de Janeiro: Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística, 1960.
- Franco, José Luciano. La batalla por el dominio del Caribe y el Golfo de México [1789–1854]. 3 vols. Reprint, Havana: Instituto de Historia, Academia de Ciencias, 1964.
- Franco, José Luciano. Las minas de Santiago del Prado y la rebelión de los cobreros, 1530–1800. Havana: Editorial de Ciencias Sociales, 1975.
- Fryer, Mary Beacock. Battlefields of Canada. Toronto: Dundurn, 1986.
- Fryer, Mary Beacock. More Battlefields of Canada. Toronto: Dundurn, 1993.
- Genovese, Eugene D. From Rebellion to Revolution: Afro-American Slave Revolts in the Making of the New World. New York: Vintage Books, 1981. First published 1979 by Louisiana State University Press.
- Gerhard, Peter. A Guide to the Historical Geography of New Spain. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1993.
- Gerhard, Peter. The North Frontier of New Spain. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1993.
- Gerhard, Peter. The Southeast Frontier of New Spain. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1993.
- Hefter, Joseph. Crónica del traje militar en México, del siglo XVI al XX. Mexico City: Artes de México (Issue No. 102), 1968.
- Kuethe, Allan J. "The Status of the Free Pardo in the Disciplined Militia of New Granada." Journal of Negro History 56, number 2 (April 1971), pp. 105–117.
- Les troupes de marine, 1622–1984*. Paris: Charles Lavauzelle, 1986.
- Lorch, Carlos. Jungle Warriors: Defenders of the Amazon. Charlottesville, VA: Howell, 1992.
- Martínez Martín, Carmen. "Los avances territoriales del Brasil en las gobernaciones del Río de la Plata, entre el tratado de Tordesillas y el tratado de límites de 1750."

- Cuadernos de Investigación Histórica* [Spain] 14 (1991), pp. 135–154.
- Morales y Eloy, Juan. Ecuador: Atlas histórico-geográfico. Quito: Ministerio de Relaciones Exteriores, 1942.
- Nickson, R. Andrew. Historical Dictionary of Paraguay. Metuchen: Scarecrow, 1993.
- Olson, James S., et al., eds. Historical Dictionary of the Spanish Empire, 1402–1975. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1992.
- Pereira, Francisco, et al., eds. Mapa: Imagens da Formação Territorial Brasileira. Rio de Janeiro: Fundação Emílio Odebrecht, 1993.
- Puertos y fortificaciones en América y Filipinas: Actas del seminario 1984*. Madrid: Cedex, 1985.
- Rodríguez del Valle, Mariana. El castillo de San Felipe del Golfo Dulce. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1960.
- Roncière, Charles Bourel de la. Histoire de la Marine Française. Vols. 4–6. Paris: Plon, 1910–1932.
- Suárez, Martín. Atlas histórico-militar argentino. Buenos Aires: Circulo Militar, 1974.
- Suárez, Santiago Gerardo. Fortificación y defensa. Vol. 131 of the series Fuentes para la Historia Colonial de Venezuela. Caracas: Academia Nacional de la Historia, 1978.
- Suárez, Santiago Gerardo. Las fuerzas armadas venezolanas en la colonia. Vol. 137 of the series Fuentes para la Historia Colonial de Venezuela. Caracas: Academia Nacional de la Historia, 1979.
- Taillémite, Étienne. Dictionnaire des Marins Français. Paris: Editions Maritimes et d'Outre-Mer, 1982.
- Tenenbaum, Barbara A., ed. Encyclopedia of Latin American History and Culture. 5 vols. New York: Scribner's, 1996.
- Utrera, Fray Cipriano de. Historia militar de Santo Domingo: Documentos y noticias. Ciudad Trujillo: N.p., 1953.
- Weber, David J. The Spanish Frontier in North America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Zapatero, Juan Manuel. La fortificación abaluartada en América. San Juan de Puerto Rico: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1978.
- Zapatero, Juan Manuel. Historia de las fortificaciones de Cartagena de Indias. Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1979.
- Zapatero, Juan Manuel. Historia de las fortalezas de Santa Marta y estudio asesor para su restauración. Bogotá: Academia Colombiana de la Historia, 1980.
- Ziegelmeier, Wagner, and Lorch, Carlos. The Brazilian Navy: Naval Power. Rio de Janeiro: Action Editora, 1997.

Independence (1775–1825)

American Revolutionary War (1775–1783)

- Alotta, Robert I. Another Part of the Field: Philadelphia's American Revolution, 1777–1778. Shippensburg, PA: White Mane, 1990.
- Anderson, Troyer S. The Command of the Howe Brothers during the American Revolution. London: Oxford University Press, 1936.

- Barton, John A. "The Battle of Valcour Island." History Today 9 (1959), pp. 791–799.
- Beerman, Eric, ed. "El diario de Bernardo de Gálvez de la batalla de Mobila, 1780." Cuadernos de Investigación Histórica [Spain] 13 (1990), pp. 125–144.
- Bennett, Charles E., and Lennon, Donald R. A Quest for Glory: Major-General Robert Howe and the American Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Bill, A. H. The Campaign of Princeton, 1776–1777. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Boatner, Mark M., III. Encyclopedia of the American Revolution. Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole, 1994.
- Bonner-Smith, David, ed. The Barrington Papers. 2 vols. London: Navy Records Society, 1937–1941.
- Bonner-Smith, David. "Byron in the Leeward Islands, 1779." Mariner's Mirror [UK] 30 (January 1944), pp. 38–48, 81–92.
- Bourne, Russell. "The Penobscot Fiasco." American Heritage 25, number 6 (October 1974), pp. 28–33, 100–101.
- Britt, Kent. "The Loyalists." National Geographic 147, number 4 (April 1975), pp. 510–539.
- Brooks, Victor. The Boston Campaign: April 1775–March 1776. Conshohocken, PA: Combined Books, 1999.
- Buchanan, John. The Road to Guilford Courthouse: The American Revolution in the Carolinas. New York: Wiley, 1997.
- Cappon, L., ed. Atlas of Early American History: The Revolutionary Era, 1760–1790. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Caughy, John Walton. Bernardo de Gálvez in Louisiana, 1776–1783. Gretna: Pelican, 1972.
- Chadwick, French Ensor. The Graves Papers and Other Documents Relating to the Naval Operations of the Yorktown Campaign, July to October 1781. New York: Naval History Society, 1916.
- Chevalier, E. Histoire de la marine française pendant la guerre de l'indépendance américaine. Paris: Hachette, 1877.
- Clark, William Bell, and Morgan, William James, eds. Naval Documents of the American Revolution. 6 vols. Washington DC: U.S. Navy Department, 1964–.
- Coker, William S., and Hazel P. The Siege of Pensacola in Maps. Pensacola, FL: Privately published, 1981.
- Contenson, Ludovic de. "La prise de Saint-Christophe en 1782." Revue historique des Antilles [France] 2 (1929), pp. 17–41.
- Davis, Kenneth S. "In the Name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" American Heritage 14, number 6 (October 1963), pp. 65–77.
- Falkner, Leonard. "Captor of the Barefoot General." American Heritage 11, number 5 (August 1960), pp. 28–31, 98–100.
- Flexner, James Thomas. George Washington (1732–1799). 4 vols. Boston: Little, Brown, 1965–1972.
- Forester, Cecil Scott. "The Battle of the Saintes." American Heritage 9, number 4 (June 1958), pp. 4–9, 108.
- Froncek, Thomas. "Kosciusko." American Heritage 26, number 4 (June 1975), pp. 4–11, 78–81.

- Gallagher, John J. The Battle of Brooklyn, 1776. New York: Sarpedon, 1994.
- Gardiner, Robert, ed. Navies and the American Revolution, 1775–1783. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1997.
- Guiot, Pierre. “Notes de campagne du comte Rigaud de Vaudreuil, 1781–1782.” Neptunia 45 (January 1957), pp. 33–40; 46 (February), pp. 34–42; 47 (March), pp. 33–40; 48 (April), pp. 32–41; 49 (May), pp. 34–41; 50 (June), pp. 29–35; 51 (July), pp. 34–41; and 52 (August), pp. 31–40.
- Hannay, David, ed. Letters Written by Sir Samuel Hood (Viscount Hood) in 1781. London: Navy Records Society, 1895.
- Harley, John B., et al. Mapping the American Revolutionary War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Hubbard, Timothy William. “Battle at Valcour Island: Benedict Arnold as Hero.” American Heritage 17, number 6 (October 1966), pp. 8–11, 87–91.
- James, Sir William Milburne. The British Navy in Adversity: A Study of the War of American Independence. London: Longmans, 1926.
- Jamieson, Alan G. “American Privateers in the Leeward Islands, 1776–1778.” American Neptune 43, number 1 (1983), pp. 20–30.
- Ketchum, Richard M. Saratoga: Turning Point of America's Revolutionary War. New York: Holt, 1997.
- Landers, H. L. The Virginia Campaign and the Blockade and Siege of Yorktown, 1781. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1931.
- Langle, Fleuriot de. “Contribution de la marine française à la victoire de Yorktown.” Revue Maritime 273 (February 1970), pp. 177–183.
- Larrabee, Harold A. Decision at the Chesapeake. New York: Potter, 1964.
- Lawrence, Alexander A. Storm over Savannah: The Story of Count d'Estaing and the Siege of the Town in 1779. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1951.
- Leckie, Robert. George Washington's War: The Saga of the American Revolution. New York: Harper, 1992.
- Lewis, Charles Lee. Admiral de Grasse and American Independence. Annapolis, MD: U.S. Naval Institute, 1945.
- Lewis, James A. The Final Campaign of the American Revolution: Rise and Fall of the Spanish Bahamas. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.
- Marie, René. “D'Estaing aux Antilles.” Revue Maritime [France] 23 (December 1921), pp. 735–758.
- May, Robin. The British Army in North America, 1775–1783. London: Osprey, 1974.
- McGuire, Thomas J. The Surprise of Germantown, or the Battle of Cliveden, October 4, 1777. Gettysburg, PA: Thomas, 1994.
- McLarty, Robert. “Jamaica Prepares for Invasion, 1779.” Caribbean Quarterly 4 (1965), pp. 62–67.
- Molina de Muñoz, Stella-Marís. “La expedición pacificadora al Río de la Plata de 1819.” Revista de Historia Militar [Spain] 21, number 42 (1977), pp. 51–75.
- Pearson, Michael. “The Siege of Quebec, 1775–1776.” American Heritage 23, number 2 (February 1972), pp. 8–15, 104–108.
- Perkins, James Breck. France in the American Revolution. Cranbury, NJ: Scholar's Bookshelf, 2004.
- Plumb, John Harold. “The French Connection.” American Heritage 26, number 1 (December 1974), pp. 26–57, 86–87.
- Pocock, Tom. The Young Nelson in the Americas. London: Collins, 1980.
- Rathbun, Frank H. “Rathbun's Raid on Nassau.” U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings 96 (1970), pp. 40–47.
- Rice, Howard C., Jr., and Brown, Anne S. K. The American Campaigns of Rochambeau's Army, 1780–1783. 2 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1973.
- Royster, Charles. A Revolutionary People at War: The Continental Army and American Character, 1775–1783. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Rutherford, G. “Admiral de Ternay and an English Convoy.” Mariner's Mirror [UK] 26 (April 1940), pp. 158–162.
- Scheer, George F. “The Elusive Swamp Fox.” American Heritage 9, number 3 (April 1958), pp. 40–47, 111.
- Scheer, George F., and Rankin, Hugh F. “Rebels and Redcoats.” American Heritage 8, number 2 (February 1957), pp. 65–89.
- Shelton, Hal F. General Richard Montgomery and the American Revolution: From Redcoat to Rebel. New York: New York University Press, 1994.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Encounter at the Brandywine.” American Heritage 24, number 2 (February 1973), pp. 12–16.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Fort Griswold.” American Heritage 24, number 6 (October 1973), pp. 69–72.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Guilford Court House.” American Heritage 24, number 4 (June 1973), pp. 17–20.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Stand-Off at White Plains.” American Heritage 24, number 3 (April 1973), pp. 41–44.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Trenton.” American Heritage 24, number 5 (August 1973), pp. 69–72.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Fort Washington.” American Heritage 25, number 4 (June 1974), pp. 57–60.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Lexington and Concord.” American Heritage 25, number 3 (April 1974), pp. 8–11.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Eutaw Springs.” American Heritage 26, number 5 (August 1975), pp. 53–56.
- Snow, Richard F., and Troiani, Don. “Saratoga.” American Heritage 27, number 1 (December 1975), pp. 29–32.
- Wood, W. J. Battles of the Revolutionary War, 1775–1781. New York: DaCapo, 1995.
- Zlatich, Marko. General Washington's Army. London: Osprey, 1994.

Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790)

- Archer, Christon I. "The Key to the Kingdom: The Defense of Veracruz, 1780–1810." Americas [American Academy of Franciscan History] 27, number 4 (1971), pp. 426–449.
- Campbell, Leon G. "Church and State in Colonial Peru: The Bishop of Cuzco and the Tupac Amaru Rebellion of 1780." Journal of Church and State 22, number 2 (1980), pp. 251–270.
- Campbell, Leon G. "Social Structure of the Tupac Amaru Army in Cuzco, 1780–1781." Hispanic American Historical Review 61, number 4 (November 1981), pp. 675–693, 715–720.
- Díez de Medina, Francisco Tadeo. Diario del alzamiento de indios conjurados contra la Ciudad de Nuestra Señora de la Paz, 1781. La Paz: Escuela de Artes Gráficas del Colegio Don Bosco, 1981.
- Dunmore, John, trans. and ed. The Journal of Jean-François de Galaup de la Pérouse, 1785–1788. 2 vols. London: Hakluyt, 1994.
- Fisher, Lillian Estelle. The Last Inca Revolt, 1780–1783. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1966.
- McFarlane, Anthony. "Rebellions in Late Colonial Spanish America: A Comparative Perspective." Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 14, number 3 (1995), pp. 313–338.
- Mond, R. E. "Indian Rebellion and Bourbon Reform in New Granada: Riots in Pasto, 1780–1800." Hispanic American Historical Review 73, number 1 (February 1993), pp. 99–124.
- O'Phelan Godoy, Scarlett. "Rebeliones andinas anticoloniales: Nueva Granada, Perú y Charcas entre el siglo XVIII y el XIX." Anuario de Estudios Americanos [Spain] 49 (1992), pp. 395–440.
- Phelan, John Leddy. The People and the King: The Comunero Revolution in Colombia, 1781. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.
- Salmón, Roberto Mario. "A Thankless Job: Mexican Soldiers in the Spanish Borderlands." Military History of the Southwest 21, number 1 (1991), pp. 1–19.
- Starnes, Gary Bertram. "Campañas de Juan de Ugalde en las Provincias Internas de Coahuila y Texas." Boletín bibliográfico de la Secretaría de Hacienda y Crédito Público [Mexico], 2nd series, numbers 492–501 (January–September 1974).

Discord in the Early American Republic and Old Northwest Indian Wars (1786–1795)

- Baldwin, Leland D. Whiskey Rebels: The Story of a Frontier Uprising. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1968.
- Cooke, Jacob E. "The Whiskey Insurrection: A Re-Evaluation." Pennsylvania History 30, number 3 (1963), pp. 316–346.

- McClure, James P. "'Let Us Be Independent': David Bradford and the Whiskey Insurrection." Pittsburgh History 74, number 2 (1991), pp. 72–86.
- Tise, Larry E. American Counter-Revolution: A Retreat from Liberty, 1783–1800. Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole, 1998.
- Van Every, Dale. "President Washington's Calculated Risk." American Heritage 9, number 4 (June 1958), pp. 56–61, 109–111.
- Vaughan, Alden T. "The 'Horrid and Unnatural Rebellion' of Daniel Shays." American Heritage 17, number 4 (June 1966), pp. 50–53, 77–81.

Haitian Revolution (1789–1803)

- Beerman, Eric. "Bicentenario de la toma del Fuerte Delfin." Revista de Historia Naval [Spain] 12, number 47 (1994), pp. 35–44.
- Buckley, Roger Norman, ed. The Haitian Journal of Lieutenant Howard, York Hussars, 1796–1798. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1985.
- Cauna, Jacques. "La révolution à Port-au-Prince (1791–1792) vue par un bordelais." Annales du Midi [France] 101, numbers 185–186 (1989), pp. 169–200.
- Césaire, Aimé. Toussaint Louverture: La révolution et le problème colonial. Paris: Club Français du Livre, 1960.
- Chartrand, René. Napoleon's Overseas Army. London: Osprey, 1989.
- Cole, Hubert. Christophe: King of Haiti. New York: Viking, 1967.
- Cooper, Anna Julia. Slavery and the French Revolutionists, 1788–1805. Trans. Frances Richardson Keller. Lampeter, Wales: Edwin Mellen Press, 1988.
- Debien, Gabriel. "Réfugiés de Saint-Domingue à Cuba, 1793–1815." Revista de Indias [Spain] 13 (1953), pp. 559–605; 14 (1954), pp. 11–36.
- Elisabeth, Lo. "Gens de couleur et révolution dans les Îles du Vent, 1789–janvier 1793." Revue française d'histoire d'Outre-mer [France] 76, numbers 1–2 (1989), pp. 75–95.
- Fick, Carolyn E. The Making of Haiti: The Saint Domingue Revolution from Below. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Franco, José Luciano, comp. Documentos para la historia de Haití en el Archivo Nacional de Cuba. Havana: Archivo Nacional de Cuba, 1954.
- Franco, José Luciano. Historia de la Revolución de Haití. Santo Domingo: Editora Nacional, 1971.
- Frostin, Charles. "L'intervention britannique à Saint-Domingue en 1793." Revue française d'histoire d'Outre-mer 49 (1962), pp. 293–365.
- Frostin, Charles. "Les 'Enfants Perdus de l'État' ou la condition militaire à Saint-Domingue aux XVIIIe siècle." Annales de Bretagne 80 (1973), pp. 317–343.
- Frostin, Charles. Les révoltes blanches à Saint-Domingue aux XVIIe et XVIIIe siècles: Haïti avant 1789. Paris: l'École, 1975.

- Geggus, David P. "Yellow Fever in the 1790s: The British Army in Occupied Saint Domingue." Medical History 23, number 1 (January 1979), pp. 38–58.
- Geggus, David P. Slavery, War and Revolution: The British Occupation of Saint-Domingue, 1793–1798. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982.
- Geggus, David P. "Unexploited Sources for the History of the Haitian Revolution." Latin American Research Review 18, number 1 (1983), pp. 95–103.
- Geggus, David P. "Racial Equality, Slavery, and Colonial Secession during the Constituent Assembly." American Historical Review 94 (1989), pp. 1290–1308.
- Geggus, David P. "Esclaves et gens de couleur libres de la Martinique pendant l'époque Révolutionnaire et Napoléonienne: Trois instants de résistance." Revue historique [France] 295, number 1 (1996), pp. 105–132.
- Hickey, Donald R. "America's Response to the Slave Revolt in Haiti, 1791–1806." Journal of the Early Republic 2, number 4 (1982), pp. 361–379.
- Hoffman, Léon François. "An American Trader in Revolutionary Haiti: Simeon Johnson's Journal of 1807." Princeton University Library Chronicle 49, number 2 (1988), pp. 182–199.
- James, Cyril L. R. The Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo Revolution. Reprint, New York: Vintage, 1963. First published in 1938.
- Korngold, Ralph. Citizen Toussaint. Reprint, Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1979. First published in 1944 by Little, Brown.
- Landers, Jane G. "The Career of Jorge Biassou, Black Caudillo." Escribano 25 (December 1988), pp. 85–100.
- Laurent, Gérard M. Trois mois aux archives d'Espagne. Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie "Les Presses Libres," 1956.
- Matthewson, Tim. "Jefferson and Haiti." Journal of Southern History 61, number 2 (1995), pp. 209–248.
- Matthewson, Tim. "Jefferson and the Nonrecognition of Haiti." Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 140, number 1 (1996), pp. 22–48.
- Munford, Clarence J., and Zeuske, Michael. "Black Slavery, Class Struggle, Fear and Revolution in St. Domingue and Cuba, 1785–1795." Journal of Negro History 73, numbers 1–4 (Winter–Autumn 1988), pp. 12–32.
- Ott, Thomas O. The Haitian Revolution, 1789–1804. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1973.
- Parham, Althea de Puech, ed. and trans. My Odyssey: Experiences of a Young Refugee from Two Revolutions. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1959.
- Parkinson, Wenda. This Gilded African: Toussaint L'Ouverture. London: Quartet, 1978.
- Rainsford, Marcus. An Historical Account of the Black Empire of Hayti; Comprehending a View of the Principal Transactions in the Revolution of Saint Domingo, with its Ancient and Modern State. Reprint, London: Cass, 1972. First published in 1805 by Cundee.
- Reid, Stuart. "Brigands and the Black Vomit: The Royal Scots on San Domingo, 1794–1797." Journal of the Society for Army Historical Research [UK] 74, number 299 (1996), pp. 155–165.
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio. Invasiones haitianas de 1801, 1805 y 1822. Ciudad Trujillo: Academia Dominicana de la Historia, 1955.
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio. La era de Francia en Santo Domingo. Ciudad Trujillo: El Caribe, 1955.
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio. Cesión de Santo Domingo a Francia: Correspondencia de Godoy, García, Roume, Hedouville, Louverture, Rigaud y otros, 1795–1802. Ciudad Trujillo: Archivo General de la Nación, 1958.
- Stein, Robert Louis. Léger Félicité Sonthonax: The Lost Sentinel of the Republic. Rutherford: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1985.
- Trouillot, Henock. "Les ouvriers de La Citadelle et de Sans-souci." Revista de Historia de América 98 (July–December 1984), pp. 49–68.

French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802)

- Adélaïde-Merlande, Jacques. La Caraïbe et la Guyane au temps de la Révolution et de l'Empire. Paris: Karthala, 1992.
- Alonso, María M., and Flores Román, Milagros. The Eighteenth Century Caribbean and the British Attack on Puerto Rico in 1797. San Juan de Puerto Rico: National Park Service, 1997.
- Bonnell, Ulane. La France, les États-Unis et la guerre de course, 1797–1815. Paris: Éditions Latines, 1961.
- Butel, Paul. "Succès et déclin du commerce colonial français, de la révolution à la restauration." Revue économique [France] 40, number 6 (1989), pp. 1079–1096.
- Conlin, Dan. "A Private War in the Caribbean: Nova Scotia Privateering, 1793–1805." Northern Mariner: Journal of the Canadian Nautical Research Society 6, number 4 (1996), pp. 29–46.
- Cooney, Jerry W. "Oceanic Commerce and Platine Merchants, 1796–1806: The Challenge of War." Americas [American Academy of Franciscan History] 45, number 4 (1989), pp. 509–524.
- Cormack, William S. "The French Navy and the Revolt of Martinique and Guadeloupe in 1792–1793." Consortium on Revolutionary Europe 1750–1850: Selected Papers (1994), pp. 237–243.
- Cormack, William S. "Legitimate Authority in Revolution and War: The French Navy in the West Indies, 1789–1793." International History Review [Canada] 18, number 1 (1996), pp. 1–27.
- Cuenca Esteban, Javier. "Statistics of Spain's Colonial Trade, 1792–1820: Consular Duties, Cargo Inventories, and Balances of Trade." Hispanic American Historical Review 61, number 3 (1981), pp. 381–428.
- Fewster, Joseph M. "The Jay Treaty and British Ship Seizures: The Martinique Cases." William and Mary Quarterly 45, number 3 (1988), pp. 426–452.

- Jenkins, H. J. K. "Martinique: The British Occupation, 1794–1802." History Today 31 (November 1981), pp. 35–39.
- Jenkins, H. J. K. "Controversial Legislation at Guadeloupe Regarding Trade and Piracy, 1797." Revue française d'histoire d'Outre-mer 76, numbers 1–2 (1989), pp. 97–106.
- Jenkins, H. J. K. "Guadeloupe, Martinique, and Commerce Raiding: Two Colonies in Conflict, 1797–1798." Revue française d'histoire d'outre-mer 78, number 4 (1991), pp. 465–475.
- Jenkins, H. J. K. "Guadeloupe's Commerce Raiding, 1796–98: Perspectives and Contexts." Mariner's Mirror [UK] 83, number 3 (1997), pp. 303–309.
- London, Joshua E. Victory in Tripoli: How America's War with the Barbary Pirates Established the U.S. Navy and Shaped a Nation. New Jersey: John Wiley & Sons, 2005.
- Meeteren, Nicolaas van. Noodlotsdagen: Grepen uit de geschiedenis van Curaçao, 1799–1800. Willemstad: De Stad, 1944.
- Meeteren, Nicolaas van. De oude vestingwerken, forten en batterijen van Curaçao en de capitulatievoorwaarden, zoals gepubliceerd in de Columbian Centinel van 19 november 1800. Willemstad: N. p., 1951.
- Moitt, Bernard. "Slave Resistance in Guadeloupe and Martinique, 1791–1848." Journal of Caribbean History [Barbados] 25, numbers 1–2 (1991), pp. 136–159.
- Nairac, Jean-Baptiste. Le commerce rochelais face à la Révolution: Correspondance de Jean-Baptiste Nairac. La Rochelle: Rumeur des Ages, 1989.
- Pérez Aparicio, Josefina. Pérdida de la isla de Trinidad. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1966.
- Pérotin, Anne. Etre patriote sous les tropiques: La Guadeloupe, la colonisation et la Révolution (1789–1794). Basse-Terre: Société d'Histoire de la Guadeloupe, 1985.
- Sanz Tapia, Ángel. "Refugiados de la Revolución Francesa en Venezuela, 1793–1795." Revista de Indias [Spain] 47, number 181 (1987), pp. 833–867.
- Stewart, Lt. Cmdr. James. "The Leeward Islands Command, 1795–1796." Mariner's Mirror [UK] 47 (November 1961), pp. 270–280.
- Vlis, D. van der. "De reis van het fregatschip 'Het Vergenoe-gen' naar Angola en Suriname, 1793–1797." Mededelingen van de Nederlandse Vereniging voor Zeegechiedenis 15 (1967), pp. 1–21.
- Zacks, Richard. The Pirate Coast: Thomas Jefferson, the First Marines, and the Secret Mission of 1805. New York: Hyperion, 2005.
- US frigate Chesapeake off Cape Henry, Virginia, on June 22, 1807—Compiled from Contemporary Newspaper Accounts, Official Documents, and Other Authoritative Sources. Portsmouth, VA: N. p., 1954.
- Gaay Fortman, B. de. "Nieuwe gegevens over de inbezitting van Curaçao op den Nieuwjaarsdag." West-Indische Gids [The Netherlands] 25 (1943), pp. 193–247.
- Gardiner, Robert, ed. The Campaign of Trafalgar, 1803–1805. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1998.
- Graham, Gerald Sanford, ed. The Navy and South America, 1807–1823: Correspondence of the Commanders-in-Chief on the South American Station. Vol. 34. London: Navy Records Society, 1962.
- Grainger, John D. "The Navy in the River Plate, 1806–1808." Mariner's Mirror [UK] 81, number 3 (August 1995), pp. 287–299.
- Naval Chronicle* (re. conquest of Danish Virgin Islands), volume 19 (1808), pp. 156–169.
- Pendle, George. "Defeat at Buenos Aires, 1806–1807." History Today 2, number 6 (June 1952), pp. 400–405.
- Roberts, Carlos. Las invasiones inglesas del Río de la Plata (1806–1807) y la influencia inglesa en la independencia y organización de las provincias del Río de la Plata. Buenos Aires: Jacobo Peuser, 1938.
- Rowbotham, Commander W. B. "The British Occupation of the Diamond Rock, 1804–1805." Naval Review 37 (1949), pp. 385–395; and 39 (1950), pp. 53–64.
- Tucker, Spencer C., and Reuter, Frank T. Injured Honor: The Chesapeake-Leopard Affair, June 22, 1807. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1996.
- Woodman, Richard. The Victory of Seapower: Winning the Napoleonic War, 1806–1814. London: Chatham, 1998.

Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826)

- Abecia Baldovieso, Valentín. Adiciones documentadas sobre Pedro Domingo Murillo. La Paz: E. Burillo, 1972.
- Almaráz, Félix D., Jr. Tragic Cavalier: Governor Manuel Salcedo of Texas, 1808–1813. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971.
- Anna, Timothy E. "Francisco Novella and the Last Stand of the Royal Army in New Spain." Hispanic American Historical Review 51, number 1 (1971), pp. 92–111.
- Anna, Timothy E. The Fall of Royal Government in Peru. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1979.
- Arnade, Charles W. The Emergence of the Republic of Bolivia. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1957.
- Brada, W. Brion, 1782–1821. Willemstad: Scherpenhevel, 1954.
- Cavaliere, Roderick. The Independence of Brazil. London: British Academic Press, 1993.
- Cervera Pery, José. La marina española en la emancipación de hispanoamérica. Madrid: MAPFRE, 1992.
- Clissold, Stephen. Bernardo O'Higgins and the Independence of Chile. London: Hart-Davis, 1968.
- Costa, Ernestina, Baroness Peers de Nieuwburgh. English Invasion of the River Plate. Buenos Aires: Guillermo Kraft, 1937.
- Dudley, C. E. S. "The Leopard Incident, 1807." History Today 19 (1969), pp. 468–474.
- Emmerson, John C. The Chesapeake Affair of 1807: An Objective Account of the Attack by HMS Leopard upon the

Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810)

- Correas, Edmundo. "Maipó." Américas [Organization of American States] 20, numbers 11–12 (November–December 1968), pp. 23–25.
- Correas, Edmundo. "San Martín: Saint of the Sword." Américas [Organization of American States] 27, number 3 (1975), pp. 1–16.
- Cruz Santos, Abel. "Padilla en Maracaibo." Boletín de Historia y Antigüedades [Colombia] 71, number 745 (1984), pp. 355–360.
- Cuervo Márquez, Luis. Independencia de las colonias hispano-americanas. Several vols. Bogotá: Selecta, 1938.
- Dam, C. F. A. van. "Bescheiden over de vrijheidstrijd van Spaans-Amerika, berustende in het Algemeen Rijksarchief te 's-Gravenhage." Nieuwe West-Indische Gids [The Netherlands] 44 (1965), pp. 168–170.
- Díaz Thomé, Hugo. "La Guerra de Independencia: Expedición de Mina." Boletín del Archivo General de la Nación (Mexico) 20, number 3 (July–September 1949), pp. 365–377.
- Díaz Venteo, Fernando. Las campañas militares del virrey Abascal. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1947.
- Encina, Francisco A. Bolívar: Emancipación de Quito y Alto y Bajo Perú. Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1954.
- Ezquerria Abadía, Ramón. La emancipación de Hispanoamérica. Barcelona and Madrid: Salvat, 1959.
- Franco, José Luciano. Política continental de España en Cuba, 1812–1830. Havana: Archivo Nacional de Cuba, 1947.
- Franco, José Luciano. Documentos para la historia de Venezuela existentes en el Archivo Nacional de Cuba. Havana: Archivo Nacional de Cuba, 1960.
- Franco, José Luciano. Documentos para la historia de México existentes en el Archivo Nacional de Cuba. Havana: Archivo Nacional de Cuba, 1961.
- Franco, José Luciano. El gobierno colonial de Cuba y la independencia de Venezuela. Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1970.
- Franco, José Luciano, comp. Las conspiraciones de 1810 y 1812. Havana: Editorial de Ciencias Sociales, 1977.
- Friede, Juan. "La expedición de MacGregor a Río Chicharra: año 1819." Boletín Cultural y Bibliográfico [Colombia] 10, number 9, 1967.
- Friede, Juan, ed. La batalla de Boyacá, 7 de agosto de 1819, a través de los archivos españoles. Bogotá: Banco de la República, 1969.
- García Godoy, Cristián, ed. The San Martín Papers. Trans. Barbara Huntley and Pilar Liria. Washington, DC: Organization of American States, 1988.
- Gleijeses, Piero. "The Limits of Sympathy: The United States and the Independence of Spanish America." Journal of Latin American Studies [UK] 24, number 3 (1992), pp. 481–505.
- Gray, William H. "Bolívar's Conquest of Guayaquil." Hispanic American Historical Review 27, number 4 (November 1947), pp. 603–622.
- Grimble, Ian. The Sea Wolf: The Life of Admiral Cochrane. Edinburgh, Scotland: Birlinn, 1978.
- Guisande, Mario. "La captura de los fuertes de Valdivia por Lord Thomas Alexander Cochrane." Derroteros de la Mar del Sur 13 (2005), pp. 55–62.
- Guzmán R., José R. "Francisco Javier Mina en la isla de Gálveston y Soto la Marina." Boletín del Archivo General de la Nación [Mexico] 7, number 4 (October–December 1966), pp. 898–1081.
- Guzmán R., José R. "La correspondencia de don Luis de Onís sobre la expedición de Javier Mina." Boletín del Archivo General de la Nación [Mexico] 9, numbers 3–4 (July–December 1968), pp. 509–544.
- Guzmán R., José R. "Actividades corsarias en el golfo de México." Boletín del Archivo General de la Nación [Mexico] 11, numbers 3–4 (July–December 1970), pp. 357–452.
- Guzmán R., José R. "Aventureros, corsarios e insurgentes en el golfo de México." Boletín del Archivo General de la Nación [Mexico] 12, numbers 1–2 (January–June 1971), pp. 175–236.
- Hamerly, Michael T. "Selva Alegre, President of the Quiteña Junta of 1809: Traitor or Patriot?" Hispanic American Historical Review 48 (November 1968), pp. 642–653.
- Hamill, Hugh M., Jr. The Hidalgo Revolt: Prelude to Mexican Independence. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1966.
- Hamnett, Brian R. "Royalist Counterinsurgency and the Continuity of Rebellion: Guanajuato and Michoacán, 1813–1820." Hispanic American Historical Review 62, number 1 (1982), pp. 19–48.
- Herreros de Tejada, Luis. El teniente general don José Manuel de Goyeneche, primer conde de Guaquí: Apuntes y datos para la historia. Barcelona: Oliva de Vilanova, 1923.
- Hooker, Terry, and Poulter, Ron. The Armies of Bolívar and San Martín. London: Osprey, 1991.
- Johnson, John J. Simón Bolívar and Spanish American Independence, 1783–1830. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.
- Kigar, Paul Donovan. "Ayacucho: The Battle." Américas [Organization of American States] 26, numbers 11–12 (November–December 1974).
- Lecuna, Vicente. Crónica razonada de las guerras de Bolívar. 3 vols. New York: Colonial Press, 1950.
- López, Carlos. Más allá de la audacia: vida de Lord Cochrane. Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1999.
- Lynch, John. The Spanish American Revolutions, 1808–1826. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973 (2nd edition, 1986).
- Lynch, John. Caudillos in Spanish America, 1800–1850. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Macaulay, Neill. Dom Pedro: The Struggle for Liberty in Brazil and Portugal, 1798–1834. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1986.
- Marchena Fernández, Juan. Oficiales y soldados en el ejército de América. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1983.
- Mijares, Augusto. The Liberator. Trans. John Fisher. Caracas: North American Association of Venezuela, 1983.

- Moral Martín, Victoriano del. "Últimos años del ejército español en el Perú." Historia y Vida [Spain] 22, number 261 (1989), pp. 63–73.
- Moreno Martín, Armando. "La expedición de Lord Cochrane a Chiloé." Revista de Historia Naval [Spain] 4, number 14 (1986), pp. 71–93.
- Moreno Yáñez, Segundo E. Sublevaciones indígenas en la Audiencia de Quito desde comienzos del siglo XVIII hasta finales de la colonia. Quito: Universidad Católica, 1978.
- Morton, F. W. O. "The Military and Society in Bahia, 1800–1821." Journal of Latin American Studies 7, number 2 (1975), pp. 249–269.
- Navarro, José Gabriel. La Revolución de Quito del 10 de agosto de 1809. Quito: Instituto Panamericano de Geografía e Historia, 1962.
- "Oficios del Consulado de Veracruz: capitulación de la ciudad el 26 de octubre de 1821." Revista de Historia Militar [Spain] 34, number 68 (1990), pp. 225–228.
- O'Leary, General Daniel Florencio. Bolívar and the War of Independence. Trans. and ed. Robert F. McNerney. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1970.
- Ortiz Escamilla, Juan. "Las elites de las capitales novohispanas ante la guerra civil de 1810." Historia Mexicana 46, number 2 (1996), pp. 325–357.
- Parallada, Huascar. "Primera batalla de India Muerta." Boletín Histórico [Uruguay] 112–115 (1967), pp. 191–236.
- Parra Pérez, Caracciolo. Mariño y la independencia de Venezuela. 5 vols. Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1954–1957.
- Pérez Tenreiro, Tomás. "La pérdida de Puerto Cabello: Año 1812." Boletín de la Academia Nacional de la Historia [Venezuela] 64, number 254 (1981), pp. 289–302.
- Pezuela, Joaquín de la. Memoria militar. Lima: Félix Denegri Luna, 1955.
- Pineiro, Armando Alonso. "When Argentina Conquered California." Américas [Organization of American States] 29, number 4 (August 1977), pp. 34–?
- Pinto, Manuel María, et al. La revolución de la intendencia de La Paz en el virreinato del Río de la Plata con la ocurrencia de Chuquisaca, 1800–1810. La Paz: "Biblioteca Paceña," Alcaldía Municipal, 1953.
- Ponce Ribadeneira, Alfredo. Quito, 1809–1812, según los documentos del Archivo Nacional de Madrid. Madrid: Privately published, 1960.
- Ponce Sanginés, Carlos, and García, Raúl Alfonso, comps. Documentos para la historia de la revolución de 1809. 4 vols. La Paz: "Biblioteca Paceña," Alcaldía Municipal, 1953–1954.
- Ramírez Flores, José. El gobierno insurgente en Guadalajara, 1810–1811. Guadalajara: Publicaciones del Ayuntamiento, 1969.
- Rodil, José Ramón. Memoria del sitio del Callao. Seville: Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, 1955.
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio. Documentos para la historia de la República Dominicana. Ciudad Trujillo: Montalbo, 1944.
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio. Relaciones históricas de Santo Domingo. Ciudad Trujillo: Montalvo, 1947.
- Rumazo González, Alfonso. Sucre, gran mariscal de Ayacucho. Madrid: Aguilar, 1963.
- Saavedra, Carlos Gonzalo de. Murillo, héroe de las pesadumbres. La Paz: Universidad Mayor de San Andrés, 1966.
- Stoan, Stephen K. Pablo Morillo and Venezuela, 1815–1820. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1974.
- Street, John. Artigas and the Emancipation of Uruguay. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1959.
- Teffeteller, Gordon L. "England and Brazil: Strangford and João IV." Consortium on Revolutionary Europe, 1750–1850: Proceedings (1990), pp. 201–209.
- Torre Reyes, Carlos de la. La revolución de Quito del 10 de agosto de 1809: Sus vicisitudes y su significación en el proceso general de la emancipación hispano-americana. Quito: Talleres Gráficas de Educación, 1961.
- Urquiza Anchorena, Víctor de. "La aventura naval de Guillermo Brown en el Pacífico." Boletín de Historia y Antigüedades [Colombia] 54, numbers 633–635 (1967), pp. 429–434.
- Uslar Pietri, Juan. Historia de la rebelión popular de 1814. Caracas and Madrid: Mediterráneo, 1972.
- Vale, Brian. "British Sailors and the Brazilian Navy, 1822–1850." Mariner's Mirror [UK] 80, number 3 (August 1994), pp. 312–325.
- Vale, Brian. Independence or Death: British Sailors and Brazilian Independence, 1822–1825. London: Tauris, 1996.
- Van Young, Eric. "The Cuautla Lazarus: Double Subjectives in Reading Texts on Popular Collective Action." Colonial Latin American Review 2, numbers 1–2 (1993), pp. 3–26.
- Vizcaya Canales, Isidro. En los albores de la independencia: Las provincias internas de oriente durante la insurrección de don Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, 1810–1811. Monterrey, Mexico: Instituto Tecnológico y de Estudios Superiores, 1976.
- Walker, Charles F. "The Patriotic Society: Discussions and Omissions about Indians in the Peruvian War of Independence." Americas: A Quarterly Review of Inter-American Cultural History 55, number 2 (1998), pp. 275–298.
- Worcester, Donald E. Sea Power and Chilean Independence. No. 15 in the Social Sciences Monographs Series. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1962.
- Zapatero, Juan Manuel. "El castillo Real Felipe del Callao." Anuario de estudios americanos [Spain] 34 (1977), pp. 703–733.
- Zapatero, Juan Manuel. El Real Felipe del Callao, primer castillo del "Mar del Sur". Madrid: Servicio Histórico Militar, 1983.

Struggles of the Young Republics (1812–1860)

General Works

- Barman, Roderick J. Brazil: The Forging of a Nation, 1798–1852. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1988.

- Basadre, Jorge. Chile, Perú y Bolivia independientes. Barcelona and Madrid: Salvat, 1948.
- Bethell, Leslie, ed. Spanish America after Independence, c. 1820–c. 1870. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Bushnell, David, and Macaulay, Neill. The Emergence of Latin America in the Nineteenth Century. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Cardozo, Efraím, and Pivel Devoto, J. E. Paraguay y Uruguay independientes. Barcelona and Madrid: Salvat, 1949.
- Greenhaugh, Juvenal. O arsenal de marinha do Rio de Janeiro na história, 1822–1889. Rio de Janeiro: Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística, 1965.
- Hernández, José M. Cuba and the United States: Intervention and Militarism, 1868–1933. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993.
- Kraay, Hendrik. “Reconsidering Recruitment in Imperial Brazil.” Americas: A Quarterly Review of Inter-American Cultural History 55, number 1 (1998), pp. 1–33.
- Pike, Frederick B. The Modern History of Peru. New York: Praeger, 1967.
- Radaelli, Sigfrido. Argentina independiente. Barcelona and Madrid: Salvat, 1959.
- Rodríguez, Admiral Horacio, and Arguindeguy, Admiral Pablo E. Buques de la Armada Argentina, 1810–1852. Buenos Aires: Instituto Browniano, 1999.
- St. John, Robert Bruce. The Foreign Policy of Peru. Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 1992.
- Vayssière, Pierre. Les révolutions de l’Amérique latine. Paris: Seuil, 1991.
- Dudley, William S., ed. The Naval War of 1812: A Documentary History. 2 vols. Washington DC: Naval Historical Center, 1985 and 1992.
- Elting, John R. Amateurs, to Arms: A Military History of the War of 1812. Chapel Hill, NC: Algonquin, 1991.
- Forester, Cecil Scott. The Naval War of 1812. London: Michael Joseph, 1957.
- Forester, Cecil Scott. “Victory at New Orleans.” American Heritage 8, number 5 (August 1957), pp. 4–9, 106–108.
- Forester, Cecil Scott. “Victory on Lake Champlain.” American Heritage 15, number 1 (December 1963), pp. 4–11, 88–90.
- Freehoff, William Francis. “Tecumseh’s Last Stand.” Military History 13, number 4 (October 1996), pp. 30–36.
- Gardiner, Robert. The Naval War of 1812. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1999.
- Graves, Donald E. Where Right and Glory Lead: The Battle of Lundy’s Lane, 1814. N.p.: Robin Brass, 1997.
- Hickey, Donald R. The War of 1812: A Forgotten Conflict. Champagne: University of Illinois Press, 1990.
- Hitsman, J. Mackay. The Incredible War of 1812: A Military History. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1965.
- Horsman, Reginald. The War of 1812. New York: Knopf, 1969.
- Katcher, Philip R. N. The American War, 1812–1814. London: Osprey, 1974.
- Lord, Walter. “Humiliation and Triumph.” American Heritage 23, number 5 (August 1972), pp. 50–73, 91–93.
- Malcolmson, Robert. Lords of the Lake: The Naval War on Lake Ontario, 1812–1814. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1999.
- McKee, Linda. “By Heaven, That Ship Is Ours!” American Heritage 16, number 1 (December 1964), pp. 4–11, 94–98.
- Padfield, Peter. Broke and the Shannon. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1968.
- Pereira Salas, Eugenio. “First Contacts: The Glorious Cruise of the Frigate Essex.” U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings 66 (1940), pp. 218–223.
- Pullen, Rear Admiral H. F. The Shannon and the Chesapeake. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1970.
- Skaggs, David Curtis, and Althoff, Gerald T. A Signal Victory: The Lake Erie Campaign, 1812–1813. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1997.
- Snow, Richard F. “The Battle of Lake Erie.” American Heritage 27, number 2 (February 1976), pp. 14–21, 88–90.
- Stacey, Charles Perry. “The Ships of the British Squadron on Lake Ontario, 1812–1814.” Canadian Historical Review 34, number 4 (December 1953), pp. 311–323.
- Stacey, Charles Perry. “Another Look at the Battle of Lake Erie.” Cambridge Historical Review 39, number 1 (March 1958), pp. 41–51.
- Stagg, J. C. A. Mr. Madison’s War: Politics, Diplomacy, and Warfare in the Early American Republic, 1783–1830. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983.
- Stanley, George Francis Gillman. The War of 1812: Land Operations. Toronto: Macmillan, 1983.

War of 1812 (1812–1815)

- Berton, Pierre. Invasion of Canada, 1812–1813. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1980.
- Berton, Pierre. Flames across the Border, 1813–1814. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1981.
- Bird, Harrison. Navies in the Mountains: The Battles on the Waters of Lake Champlain and Lake George, 1809–1814. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.
- Brannan, John, ed. Official Letters of the Military and Naval Officers of the United States, during the War with Great Britain in the Years 1812, 13, 14 and 15; with Additional Letters and Documents Elucidating the History of that Period. New York: Arno, 1971.
- Brown, Wilbur S. The Amphibious Campaign for West Florida and Louisiana, 1814–1815: A Critical Review of Strategy and Tactics at New Orleans. Birmingham: Alabama University Press, 1969.
- Carter, Samuel III. Blaze of Glory: The Fight for New Orleans, 1814–1815. New York: St. Martin’s, 1971.
- Chapelle, Howard I. “The Ships of the American Navy in the War of 1812.” Mariner’s Mirror [UK] 18 (July 1932), pp. 287–302.
- Coles, Harry L. The War of 1812. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.

- Wood, William, ed. Select British Documents of the Canadian War of 1812. 4 vols. Toronto: Champlain Society, 1920–1928.
- Zaslow, Morris. The Defended Border: Upper Canada and the War of 1812. Toronto: Macmillan, 1964.

U.S. Expansion through Eastern Tribelands (1816–1842)

- Froncek, Thomas. “‘I Was Once a Great Warrior’.” American Heritage 24, number 1 (December 1972), pp. 16–21, 97–99.
- Mahon, John K. History of the Second Seminole War, 1835–1842. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1967.
- Missall, John, and Missall, Mary Lou. Seminole Wars: America's Longest Indian Conflict. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 2004.

Mexican Turbulence (1822–1834)

- Anna, Timothy E. “Inventing Mexico: Provincehood and Nationhood after Independence.” Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 15, number 1 (1996), pp. 7–17.
- Arrom, Silvia M. “Popular Politics in Mexico City: The Parián Riot, 1828.” Hispanic American Historical Review 68, number 2 (1988), pp. 245–268.
- Benson, Nettie Lee. “Texas Viewed from Mexico, 1820–1834.” Southwestern Historical Quarterly 90, number 3 (1987), pp. 219–291.
- Brister, Louis E., and Perry, Robert C. “La derrota de Santa Anna en Tolomé, una relación crítica y personal.” Historia Mexicana 34, number 4 (1985), pp. 715–716.
- De Palo, William. The Mexican National Army, 1822–1852. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1997.
- Fowler, Will. “Valentín Gómez Farías: Perceptions of Radicalism in Independent Mexico, 1821–1847.” Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 15, number 1 (1996), pp. 39–62.
- Langrod, Witold. “The Ups and Downs of Charles Beneski: An Attempt to Reconstruct a Distant Life History.” Polish Review 26, number 2 (1981), pp. 64–75.
- Rodríguez O., Jaime E. “The Struggle for the Nation: The First Centralist–Federalist Conflict in Mexico.” Americas [Academy of American Franciscan History] 49, number 1 (1992), pp. 1–22.
- Samponaro, Frank N. “Santa Anna and the Abortive Anti-Federalist Revolt of 1833 in Mexico.” Americas [Academy of American Franciscan History] 40, number 1 (1983), pp. 95–107.
- Serrano O., José Antonio. “El ascenso de un caudillo en Guanajuato: Luis de Cortázar, 1827–1832.” Historia Mexicana 43, number 1 (1993), pp. 49–80.
- Serrano Ortega, José Antonio. El Contingente de Sangre: Los gobiernos estatales y departamentales y los métodos de reclutamiento del ejército permanente mexicano, 1822–1846. Mexico City: Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, 1993.

- Sims, Harold. La reconquista de México: La historia de los atentados españoles, 1821–1830. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984.
- Victoria Ojeda, Jorge. “Planes de reconquista del Yucatán independiente: El proyecto de Manuel de Mediavilla.” Revista Complutense de Historia de América [Spain] 22 (1996), pp. 275–285.
- Zoraida Vázquez, Josefina. “Political Plans and Collaboration between Civilians and the Military, 1821–1846.” Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 15, number 1 (1996), pp. 19–38.

Cisplatine War (1825–1828)

- Halperín Donghi, Tulio. Argentina: de la revolución de independencia a la confederación rosista. Barcelona: Paidós Ibérica, 1972.
- Queiroz Duarte, Paulo de. Lecor e a Cisplatina, 1816–1828. Rio de Janeiro: Biblioteca do Exército Editora, 1984.
- Salterain y Herrera, Eduardo de. “Lavalleja: la redención patria.” Revista Histórica [Uruguay] 25, numbers 73–75 (1956), pp. 1–191.
- Spalding, Walter. “Rivera, as Missões, a independencia do Uruguai.” Revista do Instituto Histórico e Geográfico Brasileiro 267 (1965), pp. 61–68.
- Vale, Brian. “The Brazilian Blockade of the River Plate, 1826–1828: Prizes, Politics, and International Protests.” Mariner's Mirror [UK] 87, number 1 (2001), pp. 43–52.

Minor Disputes (1830–1838)

- Canabarro Reichardt, Herbert, ed. “David Canabarro e a tomada da Laguna pelos farrapos (22 de julho de 1839).” Revista do Instituto Histórico e Geográfico Brasileiro 268 (1965), pp. 369–412.
- Chiavenato, Júlio José. Cabanagem: O povo no poder. São Paulo: Editora Brasiliense, 1984.
- Cleary, David. “‘Lost Altogether to the Civilised World’: Race and the Cabanagem in Northern Brazil, 1750 to 1850.” Comparative Studies in Society and History 40, number 1 (1998), pp. 109–135.
- Costeloe, Michael P. The Central Republic in Mexico, 1835–1846: Hombres de Bien in the Age of Santa Anna. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Fryer, Mary Beacock. Volunteers, Redcoats, Raiders, & Rebels: A Military History of the Rebellions in Upper Canada. Toronto: Dundurn, 1987.
- Greer, Allan. The Patriots and the People: The Rebellion of 1837 in Rural Lower Canada. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993.
- Kent, R. K. “African Revolt in Bahia: 24–25 January 1835.” Journal of Social History 3, number 4 (Summer 1970), pp. 334–356.
- Kraay, Hendrik. “‘As Terrifying as Unexpected’: The Bahian Sabinada, 1837–1838.” Hispanic American Historical Review 72, number 4 (1992), pp. 501–527.

- Oates, Stephen B. "Children of Darkness." American Heritage 24, number 6 (October 1973), pp. 42–47, 89–91.
- Raiol, Domingos Antonio. Motins políticos ou história dos principais acontecimentos políticos de província do Pará desde o ano 1821 até 1835. 3 vols. Reprint, Belém, Brazil: Universidade Federal do Pará, 1970. First published in 1890.
- Reis, João José. "Slave Resistance in Brasil: Bahia, 1807–1835." Luso-Brazilian Review 25, number 1 (1988), pp. 111–144.
- Reis, João José. Slave Rebellion in Brazil: The Muslim Uprising of 1835 in Bahia. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993.
- Souza, Paulo César. A Sabinada: A revolta separatista da Bahia, 1837. São Paulo: Editora Brasiliense, 1987.
- Tomich, Dale W. "'Liberté ou Mort': Republicanism and the Slave Revolt in Martinique, February 1831." History Workshop Journal [UK] 29 (1990), pp. 85–91.

Texan Independence (1835–1836)

- Davis, William C. Three Roads to the Alamo: The Saga of Davey Crockett, Jim Bowie, and William Travis. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.
- De la Peña, José Enrique. With Santa Anna in Texas: A Personal Narrative of the Revolution. Trans. Carmen Perry. College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1975.
- Gaddy, J. J. Texas in Revolt. Fort Collins: Colorado State University Press, 1973.
- Hardin, Stephen L. Texian Iliad: A Military History of the Texas Revolution. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1997.
- Haythornthwaite, Philip. The Alamo and the War of Texan Independence, 1835–1836. London: Osprey, 1986.
- Henson, Margaret Swett. "Politics and the Treatment of the Mexican Prisoners after the Battle of San Jacinto." Southwestern Historical Quarterly 94, number 2 (1990), pp. 188–230.
- Marshall, Bruce. Uniforms of the Republic of Texas and the Men That Wore Them, 1836–1846. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 1999.
- Nofi, Albert A. The Alamo and the Texas War of Independence, September 30, 1835, to April 21, 1836: Heroes, Myths, and History. Conshohocken, PA: Combined Books, 1992.
- Ramsdell, Charles. "The Storming of the Alamo." American Heritage 12, number 2 (February 1961), pp. 30–33, 90–93.
- Santos, Richard G. Santa Anna's Campaign against Texas, 1835–1836: Featuring the Field Commands Issued to Major General Vicente Filisola. Salisbury, NC: Documentary Publications, 1982.
- Todish, Tim, and Todish, Terry S. The Alamo Sourcebook, 1836: A Comprehensive Guide to the Alamo and the Texas Revolution. Austin, TX: Eakin Press, 1997.
- Tolbert, F. X. Day of San Jacinto. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1959.
- Zoraida Vázquez, Josefina. "Santa Anna y el reconocimiento de Texas." Historia Mexicana 36, number 3 (1987), pp. 553–562.

War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation (1836–1839)

- Collier, Simon. Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence, 1808–1833. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967.
- Galdames, Luis. A History of Chile. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1941.
- Parkerson, Philip. Andrés de Santa Cruz y la confederación Perú-boliviana, 1835–1839. La Paz: Juventud, 1984.
- Villalobos R., Sergio. Portales, una falsificación histórica. Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1989.

War of the Cakes or Pastry War (1838–1839)

- Blanchard, Pharamond, and Dauzats, Adrien. San Juan de Ulúa ou Relation de l'Expédition française au Mexique sous ordres de M. le Contre-Amiral Baudin. Paris: Gide, 1839.
- Hello, J. M. Relation de l'Expédition de la Corvette "La Créole" au Mexique en 1838 et 1839. Paris: N.p., 1839.
- Klier, Betje. "'Peste, Tempestad, & Patisserie': The Pastry War, France's Contribution to the Maintenance of Texas' Independence." Gulf Coast Historical Review 12, number 2 (1997), pp. 58–73.
- Maissin, Eugène. The French in Mexico and Texas, 1838–1839. Ed. and trans. James L. Shephard III. Salado, TX: Anson Jones Press, 1961.

Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852)

- Lynch, John. Argentine Dictator: Juan Manuel de Rosas, 1829–1852. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1981.
- Lynch, John. Caudillos in Spanish America, 1800–1850. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Polnay, Peter de. Garibaldi: The Man and the Legend. New York: Nelson, 1961.

Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844)

- Costeloe, Michael P. "A Pronunciamiento in Nineteenth Century Mexico: '15 de julio de 1840.'" Mexican Studies/Estudios Mexicanos 4, number 2 (1988), pp. 245–264.
- Costeloe, Michael P. "The Triangular Revolt in Mexico and the Fall of Anastasio Bustamante, August–October 1841." Journal of Latin American Studies [UK] 20, number 2 (1988), pp. 337–360.
- Costeloe, Michael P. "Generals versus Politicians: Santa Anna and the 1842 Congressional Elections in Mexico." Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 8, number 2 (1989), pp. 257–274.
- Martínez Fernández, Luis. "Caudillos, Annexationism, and the Rivalry between Empires in the Dominican Republic, 1844–1874." Diplomatic History 17, number 4 (1993), pp. 571–597.
- Stevens, Peter F. "The Black Bean Lottery." American History 32, number 4 (1997), pp. 36–40, 61, 63–64.

Mexican-American War (1846–1848)

- Bauer, Karl Jack. Surfboats and Horse Marines: U.S. Naval Operations in the Mexican War, 1846–1848. Annapolis, MD: U.S. Naval Institute Press, 1969.
- Bauer, Karl Jack. The Mexican War, 1846–1848. New York: Macmillan, 1974. Reprint, University of Nebraska Press, 1992.
- Dana, Napoleon Jackson Tecumseh. Monterrey Is Ours! The Mexican War Letters of Lieutenant Dana, 1845–1847. Lexington: University Presses of Kentucky, 1990.
- Denham, James M., and Huneycutt, Keith L. "With Scott in Mexico: Letters of Captain James W. Anderson in the Mexican War, 1846–1847." Military History of the West 28, number 1 (1998), pp. 19–48.
- Dilworth, Rankin. The March to Monterrey: The Diary of Lt. Rankin Dilworth. Ed. Lawrence R. Clayton and Joseph E. Chance. El Paso: Texas Western, 1996.
- Eisenhower, John S. D. So Far from God: The U.S. War with Mexico, 1846–1848. New York: Random House, 1989.
- Field, Ron. Mexican-American War, 1846–1848. London: Brassey's, 1997.
- Fluent, Michael. "San Jacinto." American History Illustrated 21, number 3 (1986), pp. 22–31.
- Fredriksen, John C. "Colonel Childs and His Quadrant: Reflections on the Career of a Distinguished American Soldier." Military Collector and Historian 39, number 3 (1987), pp. 122–125.
- Goetzmann, William F. "Our First Foreign War." American Heritage 17, number 4 (June 1966), pp. 18–27, 85–99.
- Harlow, Neal. California Conquered: War and Peace on the Pacific, 1846–1850. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Holt, Thaddeus. "Checkmate at Mexico City." MHQ: The Quarterly Journal of Military History 2, number 3 (1990), pp. 82–93.
- Katcher, Philip R. N. The Mexican-American War, 1846–1848. London: Osprey, 1976.
- McCaffrey, James M., and Sanders, George, eds. "America's First Day: The Veracruz Landing of 1847." Military History of the West 25, number 1 (1995), pp. 51–68.
- Michael, Steven. "A Year's Campaign: Dewitt C. Loudon's Mexican War." Timeline 9, number 2 (1992), pp. 18–33.
- Roa Bárcena, José María. Recuerdos de la invasión norteamericana (1846–1848) por un joven de entonces. 3 vols. Mexico City: Porrúa, 1967–1971.
- Salisbury, Richard V. "Kentuckians at the Battle of Buena Vista." Filson Club History Quarterly 61, number 1 (1987), pp. 34–53.
- Smith, Robert P., Jr. "Impossible Campaign Attempted." Military History 10, number 1 (1993), pp. 92–96.
- Solares Robles, Laura. "Gómez Farías y Santa Anna: Correspondencia en tiempos de crisis, 1847." Secuencia [Mexico] 19 (1991), pp. 109–122.
- Spurlin, Charles. "Texas Volunteers in the Monterrey Campaign." Military History of Texas and the Southwest 16, number 1 (1980), pp. 5–22, and number 2, pp. 137–142.

- Stokes, G. P. "Naked Sword in Hand." Military History 8, number 2 (1991), pp. 44–49.
- Watkins, T. H. "The Taking of California." American Heritage 24, number 2 (February 1973), pp. 4–7, 81–86.
- Winders, Richard B. "Puebla's Forgotten Heroes." Military History of the West 24, number 1 (1994), pp. 1–23.

Filibusterism (1852–1860)

- Madelence, Henri de la. Le compte Gaston de Raousset-Boulbon: Sa vie et ses aventures (d'après ses papiers, et sa correspondance). Paris: Poulet-Malassis, 1859.
- Walker, William. The War in Nicaragua. Reprint, Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1985. First published in 1860.

Buenos Aires versus the Argentine Confederation (1852–1863)

- Bethell, Leslie, ed. Argentina since Independence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Bosch, Beatriz. Urquiza y su tiempo. Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1971.
- Campobassi, José S. Mitre y su época. Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1980.
- Criscenti, Joseph T., ed. Sarmiento and His Argentina. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1993.
- Scobie, James R. The Struggle for Nationhood: Argentina, 1852–1862. Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1964.

War of the Reform (1858–1860)

- Bazant, Jan. "La iglesia, el estado y la sublevación conservadora de Puebla en 1856." Historia mexicana 35, number 1 (1987), pp. 93–109.
- Cambre, Manuel. La Guerra de Tres Años: Apuntes para la historia de la Reforma. Guadalajara: Biblioteca de Autores Jaliscienses, Gobierno del Estado, 1949.
- Hamnett, Brian. "The Comonfort Presidency, 1855–1857." Bulletin of Latin American Research [UK] 15, number 1 (1996), pp. 81–100.
- Hanson, Lawrence D. T. "Voluntarios extranjeros en los ejércitos liberales mexicanos, 1854–1867." Historia Mexicana 37, number 2 (1987), pp. 205–237.

Nationhood (1861–1897)

American Civil War (1861–1865)

- Arnold, James. Shiloh 1862: The Death of Innocence. London: Osprey, 1998.
- Arnold, James, and Wiener, Roberta. Gettysburg 1 July 1863: The Union Army of the Potomac. London: Osprey, 1998.
- Arnold, James, and Wiener, Roberta. Gettysburg 1 July 1863: The Confederate Army of Northern Virginia. London: Osprey, 1998.

- Catton, Bruce. This Hallowed Ground: The Story of the Union Side of the Civil War. New York: Doubleday, 1956.
- Catton, Bruce. "Crisis at the Antietam." American Heritage 9, number 5 (August 1958), pp. 54–57, 93–96.
- Davis, George B. The Official Military Atlas of the Civil War. New York: Gramercy, 1993.
- Davis, William C. The Illustrated History of the Civil War: The Soldiers, Generals, Weapons, and Battles of the Civil War. New York: Courage Books, 1997.
- Foote, Shelby. "Du Pont Storms Charleston." American Heritage 14, number 4 (June 1963), pp. 28–34, 89–92.
- Goodrich, Thomas. War to the Knife: Bleeding Kansas, 1854–1861. Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole, 1998.
- Jordan, Robert Paul. "Gettysburg and Vicksburg: The Battle Towns Today." National Geographic 124, number 1 (July 1963), pp. 4–57.
- Merli, Frank J., ed. "Caribbean Confrontation: Letters on the Alabama, November 1862." Journal of Confederate History 6 (1990), pp. 161–174.
- Redding, Saunders. "Tonight for Freedom." American Heritage 9, number 4 (June 1958), pp. 52–55, 90.
- Sims, Lydel. "The Submarine That Wouldn't Come Up." American Heritage 9, number 3 (April 1958), pp. 48–51, 107–111.
- Smith, Carl. Chancellorsville 1863: Jackson's Lightning Strike. London: Osprey, 1998.
- White, Edward. "Eyewitness at Harpers Ferry." American Heritage 26, number 2 (February 1975), pp. 56–59, 94–97.

French Intervention in Mexico (1861–1867)

- Campos, Sebastián I. Recuerdos históricos de la ciudad de Veracruz y costa de sotavento del estado durante las campañas de "Tres Años", "La Intervención" y "El Imperio." 2 vols. Mexico City: N.p., 1961.
- Dabbs, Jack Autrey. The French Army in Mexico, 1861–1867. The Hague: Mouton, 1963.
- Dunn, John. "Africa Invades the New World: Egypt's Mexican Adventure, 1863–1867." War in History [UK] 4, number 1 (1997), pp. 27–34.
- Hanna, Alfred J., and Hanna, Kathryn A. Napoleon III and Mexico: American Triumph over Monarchy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1971.
- León Toral, General Jesús de. Historia militar: La intervención francesa en México. Mexico City: Sociedad Mexicana de Geografía y Estadística, 1962.
- Ollivier, Emile. Expedición de México. Trans. from the French by Manuel Puga y Acal. Mexico City: Cámara de Diputados, 1972.
- Ryan, James W. Camerone: The French Foreign Legion's Greatest Battle. New York: Praeger, 1996.
- Taylor Hanson, Lawrence Douglas. "Voluntarios extranjeros en los ejércitos liberales mexicanos, 1854–1867." Historia Mexicana 37, number 2 (1987), pp. 205–237.
- Thomas, Lately. "The Operator and the Emperors." American Heritage 15, number 3 (April 1964), pp. 4–23, 83–88.

North American Indian Wars (1861–1890)

- Andrist, Ralph K. "Massacre!" American Heritage 13, number 3 (April 1962), pp. 8–17, 108–111.
- Andrist, Ralph K. The Long Death. New York: Macmillan, 1964.
- Chronicle of Indian Wars: From Colonial Times to Wounded Knee*. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1992.
- Goodrich, Thomas. Scalp Dance: Indian Warfare on the High Plains, 1865–1879. Mechanicsburg, PA: Stackpole, 1997.
- Greene, Jerome A. Yellowstone Command: Colonel Nelson A. Miles and the Great Sioux War, 1876–1877. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991.
- Halliday, E. M. "Geronimo!" American Heritage 17, number 4 (June 1966), pp. 56–63, 106–111.
- Hamilton, Charles. Cry of the Thunderbird: The American Indian's Own Story. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1972.
- Heinzman, George M. "'Don't Let Them Ride over Us.'" American Heritage 18, number 2 (February 1967), pp. 44–47, 86–89.
- Hook, Jason. The American Plains Indians. London: Osprey, 1985.
- Hook, Jason. The Apaches. London: Osprey, 1987.
- Johnson, Michael G. American Woodland Indians. London: Osprey, 1990.
- Joseph, Alvin M., Jr. "A Most Satisfactory Council." American Heritage 16, number 6 (October 1965), pp. 26–31, 70–76.
- Katcher, Philip R. N. The American Indian Wars, 1860–1890. London: Osprey, 1977.
- Langellier, John P. Sound the Charge: The U.S. Cavalry in the American West, 1866–1916. Mechanicsburg, PA: Greenhill, 1998.
- Rickey, Don, Jr. Forty Miles a Day on Beans and Hay. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1963.
- Secoy, Frank Raymond. Changing Military Patterns of the Great Plains Indians. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1993.
- Selby, John. U.S. Cavalry. London: Osprey, 1972.
- Standish, John. "Last Ghastly Moments at the Little Bighorn." American Heritage 17, number 3 (April 1966), pp. 14–21, 72–73.
- Tebbel, John. Compact History of the Indian Wars. New York: Hawthorn, 1966.
- Vestal, Stanley. "The Man Who Killed Custer." American Heritage 8, number 2 (February 1957), pp. 4–9, 90–91.
- Wallace, Edward S. "Border Warrior." American Heritage 9, number 4 (June 1958), pp. 22–25, 101–105.

Spain's Return to the Pacific (1863–1866)

- García Martínez, José Ramón. "El bombardeo de Valparaíso: Actitud de los mandos españoles." Revista de Marina [Chile] 107, number 797 (July–August 1990), pp. 413–418.
- García Martínez, José Ramón. "Análisis militar del combate del 2 de mayo de 1866." Revista de Historia Naval [Spain] 9, number 32 (1991), pp. 45–66.
- García Martínez, José Ramón. "El apresamiento del Paquete de Maule." Revista de Marina [Chile] 110, number 814 (May–June 1993), pp. 265–273.
- García Martínez, José Ramón. "La campaña del Pacífico (1862–1866): Algunos grabados de la época." Revista de Marina [Chile] 114, number 1 (1997), pp. 62–74.
- Marco, Miguel Ángel de. "Méndez Núñez en el Plata." Revista de Historia Naval [Spain] 2, number 5 (1984), pp. 33–63.
- Olivar Bertrand, Rafael. "La vuelta al mundo de la fragata Numancia." Anuario de Estudios Americanos [Spain] 11 (1954), pp. 197–283.
- Vigón Sánchez, Ana Maria, comp. Documentos relativos a la Campaña del Pacífico (1863–1867). 3 vols. Madrid: Museo Naval, 1966.

War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870)

- Atlas histórico da guerra do Paraguay*. Rio de Janeiro: Eduardo Rensburg, 1871.
- Bonalume Neto, Ricardo. "River Passage Sought." Military History 10, number 5 (1993), pp. 66–75, 95–98.
- Brock, Darryl E. "Naval Technology from Dixie." Américas [Organization of American States] 46, number 4 (1994), pp. 6–15.
- Cárcano, Ramón J. Guerra del Paraguay: Orígenes y causas. 3 vols. Buenos Aires: Vial, 1939–1941.
- Kolinski, Charles J. Independence or Death! The Story of the Paraguayan War. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1965.
- Warren, Harris Gaylord. Paraguay and the Triple Alliance: The Postwar Decade, 1869–1878. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1978.
- Williams, John Hoyt. The Rise and Fall of the Paraguayan Republic, 1800–1870. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1979.

Fenian Raids (1866–1870) and Red River Expedition (1870)

- Ross, David, and Tyler, Grant. Canadian Campaigns, 1860–1870. London: Osprey, 1992.

War of the Pacific (1879–1883)

- Bonilla, Heraclio. Un siglo a la deriva: Ensayos sobre el Perú, Bolivia y la guerra. Lima: Instituto de Estudios Peruanos, 1980.

- Bulnes, Gonzalo. Guerra del Pacífico. 2nd ed. 3 vols. Valparaíso, 1955.
- Elías, Julio J. Marinos peruanos en Arica. Lima: Instituto de Estudios Histórico-Marítimos del Perú, 1980.
- Guerra, Margarita. La ocupación de Lima (1881–1883): El gobierno de García Calderón. Lima: Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú, 1991.
- López, Jacinto. Historia de la guerra del guano. 2 vols. Reprint, Lima: Carlos Milla Batre, 1979. First Published in 1930.
- Mahuzier Manríquez, Marcelo, et al. "Logística naval en la Guerra del Pacífico." Revista de Marina [Chile] 98 (1981), number 1, pp. 26–66; number 2, pp. 191–208; number 3, pp. 313–352; and number 4, pp. 439–460.
- Mayo, John. "A 'Company' War? The Antofagasta Nitrate Company and the Outbreak of the War of the Pacific." Boletín de Estudios Latinoamericanos y del Caribe [The Netherlands] 28 (1980), pp. 3–11.
- Mendoza Meléndez, Eduardo. Historia de la campaña de la Breña. Lima: Carlos Milla Batre, 1981.
- Paz Soldán, Mariano Felipe. Narración histórica de la Guerra de Chile contra el Perú y Bolivia. 3 vols. Lima: Carlos Milla Batre, 1979.
- Sater, William F. Chile and the War of the Pacific. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1986.
- Stewart, Douglas W. "Unsinkable Ironclad." Military History 11, number 6 (February 1995).

Riel Rebellion (1885)

- Greensword, Leonard C. "Nasty Little Fight." Military History 9, number 5 (December 1992), pp. 42–49.

Brazilian Strife (1889–1897)

- Colson, Roger Frank. "On Expectations: Perspectives on the Crisis of 1889 in Brazil." Journal of Latin American Studies 13, number 2 (1981), pp. 265–292.
- Levine, Robert M. Vale of Tears: Revisiting the Canudos Massacre in Northeastern Brazil, 1893–1897. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.
- Love, Joseph L. Rio Grande do Sul and Brazilian Regionalism, 1882–1930. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1971.
- A Marinha por Marc Ferrez, 1880–1910*. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Index and Verolme, 1986.

German Overtures (1890–1898)

- Henderson, W. O. The German Colonial Empire, 1884–1919. London: Frank Cass, 1993.
- Herwig, Holger H. Krupp Salvoes at Fort Libertador: Germany and the International Blockade of Venezuela, 1902–03, A Study in Gunboat Diplomacy. Caracas: Ministerio de Relaciones Exteriores, 1977.
- Herwig, Holger H. Germany's Vision of Empire in Venezuela, 1871–1914. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.

- Pyenson, Lewis. Cultural Imperialism and Exact Sciences: German Expansion Overseas, 1900–1930. New York: Lang, 1985.
- Vernassa, Maurizio. Emigrazione, Diplomazia e Cannoniere: L'Intervento Italiano en Venezuela, 1902–1903. N.p.: N.p., 1980.

Chilean Civil War and Anti-American Antagonism (1891)

- Goldberg, Joyce S. "Consent to Ascent: The Baltimore Affair and the U.S. Rise to World Power Status." Americas [Academy of American Franciscan History] 41, number 1 (1984), pp. 21–35.
- Goldberg, Joyce S. The Baltimore Affair. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1986.
- MacRae, Allan J. "William Turnbull and the Brink of War." Island Magazine [Canada] 30 (1991), pp. 20–23.
- Pike, Frederick B. Chile and the United States, 1880–1962: The Emergence of Chile's Social Crisis and the Challenge to United States Diplomacy. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1963.
- Varela Münchmeyer, Eugenio. "Manejo de crisis: Situación Chile-Estados Unidos en 1891–1892." Revista de Marina [Chile] 1 (1992), pp. 56–63.
- Field, Ron. Spanish-American War 1898. London: Brassey's, 1998.
- Freidel, Frank. The Splendid Little War. Boston: Little, Brown, 1958.
- Heinl, Robert D., Jr. "How We Got Guantanamo." American Heritage 13, number 2 (February 1962), pp. 18–21, 94–97.
- Jeffers, H. Paul. Colonel Roosevelt: Theodore Roosevelt Goes to War, 1897–1898. New York: Wiley, 1996.
- Kindsvatter, Peter S. "Santiago Campaign of 1898: Joint and Combined Operations." Military Review 73, number 1 (1993), pp. 3–14.
- Konstam, Angus. San Juan Hill 1898: America's Emergence as a World Power. London: Osprey, 1998.
- Leuchtenburg, William E. "The Needless War with Spain." American Heritage 8, number 2 (February 1957), pp. 32–45, 95.
- Musicant, Ivan. Empire by Default: The Spanish-American War and the Dawn of the American Century. New York: Holt, 1997.
- Nofi, Albert A. The Spanish American War. Conshohocken, PA: Combined Books, 1995.
- O'Toole, G. J. A. The Spanish War: An American Epic, 1898. New York: Norton, 1984.
- Pérez, Louis A., Jr. Cuba: Between Reform and Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Pérez, Louis A., Jr. "The Siege of Santiago de Cuba, 1898: A View from Within." Inter-American Review of Bibliography 43, number 4 (1993), pp. 633–640.
- Rickover, Hyman G. How the Battleship Maine Was Destroyed. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1994.
- Rodríguez González, Agustín R. "Operaciones menores en Cuba, 1898." Revista de Historia Naval [Spain] 3, number 9 (1985), pp. 125–146.
- Shugg, Wallace. "The Navy's Regal Brig." Naval History 7, number 2 (1993), pp. 20–23.
- Smith, Joseph. "The Spanish-American War: Land Battles in Cuba, 1895–1898." Journal of Strategic Studies [UK] 19, number 4 (1996), pp. 37–58.
- Tebbel, John. America's Great Patriotic War with Spain: Mixed Motives, Lies, and Racism in Cuba and the Philippines, 1898–1915. Manchester Center, VT: Marshall Jones, 1996.
- Thomas, Hugh. Cuba: or, the Pursuit of Freedom. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- Ullman, Bruce L. "The War Balloon Santiago." Aerospace Historian 32, number 2 (1985), pp. 117–129.
- Ziel, Ron. Birth of the American Century: Centennial History of the Spanish American War. Mattituck, NY: Amereon, 1997.

Pax Americana (1898–1938)

General Works

- Hale, Charles R. Resistance and Contradiction: Miskitu Indians and the Nicaraguan State, 1894–1987. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1994.
- LaFrance, David G., and Jones, Errol D., comps. Latin American Military History: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Musicant, Ivan. "Intervention." American History 29, number 6 (1995), pp. 28–35, 67–70, 72.
- Nunn, Frederick M. Yesterday's Soldiers: European Military Professionalism in South America, 1890–1940. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1983.

Spanish-American War (1898)

- Allen, Thomas D. "Remember the Maine." National Geographic 193, number 2 (February 1998), pp. 92–111.
- Bradford, James C., ed. Crucible of Empire: The Spanish-American War and Its Aftermath. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1993.
- Cohen, Stan. The Spanish-American War, April–August 1898: A Pictorial History. Missoula, MT: Pictorial Histories, 1997.
- Cosmas, Graham A. An Army for Empire: The United States Army in the Spanish-American War. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1971.
- Feuer, A. B. The Santiago Campaign of 1898: A Soldier's View of the Spanish American War. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.

War of the Thousand Days (1899–1902) and Portents in Mexico (1899–1910)

- Koth, Karl B. "'Not a Mutiny but a Revolution': The Río Blanco Labour Dispute, 1906–07." Canadian Journal of Latin American and Caribbean Studies 18, number 35 (1993), pp. 39–65.

Police Actions (1901–1920)

- Challener, Richard. Admirals, Generals, and American Foreign Policy, 1898–1914. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1973.
- Gaillard, Roger. Les cent jours de Rosalvo Bobo; ou, une mise à mort politique. Port-au-Prince: Presses Nationales, 1973.
- Greathouse, R. H. “King of the Banana Wars.” Marine Corps Gazette 44, number 6 (1960), pp. 28–33.
- Healy, David. Gunboat Diplomacy in the Wilson Era: The U.S. Navy in Haiti, 1915–1916. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1976.
- Hood, Miriam. Gunboat Diplomacy, 1895–1905: Great Power Pressure in Venezuela. London: Allen and Unwin, 1975.
- Laguerre, Michel S. The Military and Society in Haiti. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Langley, Lester D. The Banana Wars: United States Intervention in the Caribbean, 1898–1934. Wilmington, DE: SR Books, 1988.
- Maclean, Frances. “‘They Didn’t Speak Our Language; We Didn’t Speak Theirs.’” Smithsonian 23, number 10 (1993), pp. 44–55.
- Major, John. Prize Possession: The United States and the Panama Canal, 1903–1979. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- McCann, Frank. “The Formative Period of Twentieth-Century Brazilian Army Thought, 1900–1922.” Hispanic American Historical Review 64, number 4 (November 1984), pp. 737–765.
- Millett, Richard, and Gaddy, G. Dale. “Administering the Protectorates: The Occupation of Haiti and the Dominican Republic.” Revista/Review Interamericana 6, number 3 (Fall 1976), pp. 383–402.
- Munro, Dana Gardner. Intervention and Dollar Diplomacy in the Caribbean, 1900–1921. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964.
- Munro, Dana Gardner. “The American Withdrawal from Haiti, 1929–1934.” Hispanic American Historical Review 49, number 1 (February 1969), pp. 1–26.
- Munro, Dana Gardner. The United States and the Caribbean Republics, 1921–1933. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1974.
- Murillo Jiménez, Hugo. Tinoco y los Estados Unidos: Génesis y caída de un régimen. San José: Editorial Universidad Estatal a Distancia, 1981.
- Musicant, Ivan. The Banana Wars: A History of United States Military Intervention in Latin America, from the Spanish-American War to the Invasion of Panama. New York: Macmillan, 1990.
- Pang, Eul-Soo. “The Revolt of the Bahian Coronéis and the Federal Intervention of 1920.” Luso-Brazilian Review 8, number 2 (December 1971), pp. 3–25.
- Pérez, Louis A., Jr. Intervention, Revolution, and Politics in Cuba, 1913–1921. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1978.
- Perkins, Whitney. Constraint of Empire: The United States and Caribbean Interventions. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981.
- Philpott, William. “‘One Had to Stiffen One’s Upper Lip’: The Royal Navy and the Battle of Puerto Plata, 1904.” Mariner’s Mirror [UK] 79, number 1 (February 1993), pp. 64–70.
- Plummer, Brenda Gayle. Haiti and the Great Powers, 1902–1915. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.
- Schmidt, Hans. The United States Occupation of Haiti, 1915–1934. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1971.
- Schmitt, John F. “Peacetime Landing Operations: Lessons from Haiti, 1915.” Marine Corps Gazette 78, number 3 (1994), pp. 70–74.
- Snyder, H. W. “Butler at Fort Rivière: An Account of One of ‘The Rare Breed’ in Action.” Marine Corps Gazette 64, number 11 (1980), pp. 83–87.
- Uhlig, Frank, Jr. “The Great White Fleet.” American Heritage 15, number 2 (February 1964), pp. 30–43, 103–106.
- Vega, Bernardo. Trujillo y las fuerzas armadas norteamericanas. Santo Domingo: Fundación Cultural Dominicana, 1992.
- Wimmel, Kenneth. Theodore Roosevelt and the Great White Fleet: American Sea Power Comes of Age. London: Brassey’s, 1997.

Mexican Revolution (1910–1924)

- Alexander, J. H. “Roots of Deployment: Vera Cruz, 1914.” Marine Corps Gazette 66, number 11 (1982), pp. 71–79.
- Blanco, Mónica. Revolución y contienda política en Guaymas, 1908–1913. Mexico City: El Colegio de México, 1995.
- Brenner, Anita. The Wind That Swept Mexico: The History of the Mexican Revolution of 1910–1942. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971.
- Clendenen, Clarence C. Blood on the Border: The United States Army and the Mexican Irregulars. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
- Foreman, Michael A. “A Storm in Veracruz.” American History Illustrated 29, number 1 (1994), pp. 28–37, 72.
- Hall, Linda B. Álvaro Obregón: Power and Revolution in Mexico, 1911–1920. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1981.
- Haverstock, Mike. “Waiting in Veracruz, 1914.” Américas [Organization of American States] 35, number 6 (1983), pp. 34–39.
- Johnson, William Weber. Heroic Mexico: The Violent Emergence of a Modern Nation. New York: Doubleday, 1968.
- Knight, Alan. The Mexican Revolution. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

- LaFrance, David G. "Germany, Revolutionary Nationalism, and the Downfall of President Francisco I. Madero: The Covadonga Killings." Mexican Studies/Estudios Mexicanos 2, number 1 (1986), pp. 53–82.
- Lieuwen, Edwin. Mexican Militarism: The Political Rise and Fall of the Revolutionary Army, 1910–1940. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1968.
- Lozoya, Jorge Alberto. El ejército mexicano, 1911–1965. Mexico City: El Colegio de México, 1970.
- McNeely, John H. "Origins of the Zapata Revolt in Morelos." Hispanic American Historical Review 46, number 2 (May 1966), pp. 153–169.
- Owsley, Frank L., Jr., and Newton, Wesley Phillip. "Eyes in the Skies." U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings (1986 Supplement), pp. 17–25.
- Sweetman, Jack. Landing at Veracruz, 1914: The First Complete Chronicle of a Strange Encounter in April 1914, When the United States Navy Captured and Occupied the City of Veracruz, Mexico. Annapolis, MD: U.S. Naval Institute Press, 1968.
- Vanderwood, Paul J. "The Picture Postcard as Historical Evidence: Veracruz, 1914." Americas [Academy of American Franciscan History] 45, number 2 (1988), pp. 201–225.
- Wolff, Leon. "Black Jack's Mexican Goose Chase." American Heritage 13, number 4 (June 1962), pp. 22–27, 100–106.
- Orona, Juan V. La revolución del 6 de septiembre. Buenos Aires: Imprenta López, 1966.
- Peltier, Norman A. "The Haitian Expedition of 1929." Marine Corps Gazette 71, number 6 (1987), pp. 25–26.
- Pereira Callado, Pedro Eloy. A revolução de 29 de outubro de 1931 em Pernambuco. Rio de Janeiro: N.p., 1944.
- Pineo, Ronn F. "Reinterpreting Labor Militancy: The Collapse of the Cacao Economy and the General Strike of 1922 in Guayaquil, Ecuador." Hispanic American Historical Review 68, number 4 (1988), pp. 707–736.
- Roland, Maria Inês. A Revolta da Chibata: Rio de Janeiro, 1910. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2000.
- Roorda, Eric Paul. "Genocide Next Door: The Good Neighbor Policy, the Trujillo Regime, and the Haitian Massacre of 1937." Diplomatic History 20, number 3 (1996), pp. 301–319.
- Rose, R. S. Beyond the Pale of Pity: Episodes of Elite Violence in Brazil to 1930. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1998.
- Skidmore, Thomas E. "Failure in Brazil: From Popular Front to Armed Revolt." Journal of Contemporary History 5 (1970), pp. 137–157.
- Weaver, John D. "Bonus March." American Heritage 14, number 4 (June 1963), pp. 18–23, 92–97.
- Young, Jordan M. The Brazilian Revolution of 1930 and the Aftermath. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1967.

World War I (1914–1918)

- Bennett, Geoffrey. Coronel and the Falklands. London: Batsford, 1962.
- Harries, Meirion, and Herries, Susan. The Last Days of Innocence: America at War, 1917–1918. New York: Random House, 1997.
- Niezychowski, Lieutenant Alfred von. The Cruise of the Kronprinz Wilhelm. New York: Doubleday, 1928.
- Simpson, Michael. Anglo-American Naval Relations, 1917–1919. London: Navy Records Society, 1991.
- Yates, Keith. Graf Spee's Raiders: Challenge to the Royal Navy, 1914–1915. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1994.

Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939)

- Dulles, John W. F. Vargas of Brazil: A Political Biography. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1967.
- Fausto, Boris. A revolução de 1930: Histografia e história. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1970.
- Hilton, Stanley E. Brazil and the Soviet Challenge, 1917–1947. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991.
- Levine, Robert M. The Vargas Regime: The Critical Years, 1934–1938. New York: Columbia University Press, 1970.
- Meyer, Jean. The Cristero Rebellion: The Mexican People between Church and State, 1926–1929. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.

Chaco War (1932–1935)

- Bejarano, Ramón César. Síntesis de la guerra del Chaco. Asunción: Toledo, 1982.
- Farcau, Bruce W. The Chaco War: Bolivia and Paraguay, 1932–1935. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1996.
- Hagedorn, Dan, and Sapienza, Antonio L. Aircraft of the Chaco War. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 1997.
- Ynsfrán, Pablo Max, ed. The Epic of the Chaco: Marshal Estigarribia's Memoirs of the Chaco War, 1932–1935. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1950.
- Zook, David H., Jr. The Conduct of the Chaco War. New Haven, CT: Bookman, 1960.

Modern Era (1939–Present)

World War II (1939–1945)

- Alexandre, Rodolphe. La Guyane sous Vichy. Paris: Éditions Caribennes, 1988.
- DeNeve, Donald. The West Coast Goes to War, 1941–1942. Missoula, MT: Pictorial Histories, 1998.
- Dull, Paul S. A Battle History of the Imperial Japanese Navy (1941–1945). Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1978.
- Hadley, Michael L. U-Boats against Canada: German Submarines in Canadian Waters. Kingston and Montreal: McGill–Queen's University Press, 1985.

- Hickam, Homer H., Jr. Torpedo Junction: U-Boat War Off America's East Coast, 1942. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1996.
- Hoyt, Edwin P. The U-Boat Wars. New York: Arbor House, 1984.
- Keegan, John, ed. Encyclopedia of World War Two. London: Hamlyn, 1977.
- Kelshall, Gaylord T. M. The U-Boat War in the Caribbean. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1994.
- Morison, Samuel Eliot. The Battle of the Atlantic, 1939–1943. Vol. 1 of History of United States Naval Operations in World War II. Boston: Little, Brown, 1947.
- Nowarra, Heinz J. German U-Boat Type VII: Grey Ghosts of the Sea. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 1992.
- Parrish, Thomas, ed. Encyclopedia of World War Two. London: Secker and Warberg, 1978.
- Queuille, Pierre. “Les diplomaties anglaise et américaine vis-à-vis de la France vaincue (1940–1942): Un schéma d’ensemble.” Revue d’histoire diplomatique [France] 94, numbers 1–3 (1980), pp. 230–250.
- Roskill, Stephen Wentworth. The War at Sea, 1939–1945. 4 vols. London: H.M.S.O., 1954–1961.
- Saldanha de Gama, Arthur Oscar. A Marinha do Brasil na Segunda Guerra Mundial. Rio de Janeiro: Grafica, 1982.
- Schoenfeld, Max. Stalking the U-Boat: USAAF Offensive Anti-Submarine Operations in World War II. Washington DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1994.
- Stern, Robert. Type VII U-Boats. Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1991.
- Wiggins, Melanie. Torpedoes in the Gulf: Galveston and the U-Boats, 1942–1943. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1995.
- Winton, John. Ultra at Sea: How Breaking the Nazi Code Affected Allied Naval Strategy during World War II. New York: Morrow, 1988.
- Bonhomme, Colbert. Révolution et contre-révolution en Haïti de 1946 à 1957. Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de l’État, 1957.
- Braun, Herbert. The Assassination of Gaitán: Public Life and Urban Violence in Colombia. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985.
- Caballero Jurado, Carlos, and Thomas, Nigel. Central American Wars, 1959–1989. London: Osprey, 1990.
- Caravedo Molinari, Baltazar. Desarrollo desigual y lucha política en el Perú, 1948–1956: La burguesía arequipeña y el estado peruano. Lima: Instituto de Estudios Peruanos, 1978.
- Constable, Pamela, and Valenzuela, Arturo. A Nation of Enemies: Chile under Pinochet. New York: Norton, 1991.
- Croizat, Victor J. “Mission to Haiti, 1958.” Marine Corps Gazette 71, number 6 (1987), pp. 23–25.
- Dix, Robert H. “Military Coups and Military Rule in Latin America.” Armed Forces and Society 20, number 3 (1994), pp. 439–456.
- Edwards, Mike. “Honduras: Eye of the Storm.” National Geographic 164, number 5 (November 1983), pp. 608–637.
- Fauriol, Georges. “The Duvaliers and Haiti.” Orbis 32, number 4 (1988), pp. 587–607.
- Ferguson, James. Papa Doc, Baby Doc: Haiti and the Duvaliers. Oxford, England: Basil Blackwell, 1987.
- Fitch, John S. The Military Coup d’État as a Political Process: Ecuador, 1948–1966. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1977.
- García, Prudencio. El drama de la autonomía militar: Argentina bajo las juntas militares. Madrid: Alianza, 1995.
- Giussani, Pablo. Montoneros, la soberbia armada. Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 2003.
- Gleijeses, Piero. Shattered Hope: The Guatemalan Revolution and the United States, 1944–1954. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Hagedorn, Dan, ed. Central American and Caribbean Air Forces. Tonbridge, UK: Air-Britain Historians, Ltd., 1993.
- Hillsman, Roger. The Cuban Missile Crisis: The Struggle over Policy. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1996.
- Hodges, Donald C. Argentina, 1943–1987: The National Revolution and Resistance. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1988.
- Holden, Robert H. “The Real Diplomacy of Violence: United States Military Power in Central America, 1950–1990.” International History Review 20, number 2 (May 1993), pp. 283–322.
- Hurtado, O. El poder político en el Ecuador. Quito: Universidad Católica, 1977.
- Immerman, Richard H. The CIA in Guatemala: The Foreign Policy of Intervention. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982.
- Izard, Miguel. El poder, la mentira y la muerte: De El Amparo al Caracazo. Caracas: Trópykos, 1991.
- Johnson, John J. The Military and Society in Latin America. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1964.

Latin American Troubles (1941–1989)

- Alexandre, Rodolphe. La révolte des tirailleurs sénégalais à Cayenne, 24–25 février 1946. Paris: L’Harmattan, 1995.
- Álvarez Restrepo, Antonio. Los golpes de estado en Colombia. Bogotá: Banco de la República, 1982.
- Anderson, William A., and Dynes, Russell R. Social Movements, Violence, and Change: The May Movement in Curaçao. Columbus, OH: Ohio State University Press, 1975.
- Ayala, Enrique. Lucha política y origen de los partidos en Ecuador. Quito: Universidad Católica, 1978.
- Baptista Gumicio, Mariano, et al. Guerrilleros y generales sobre Bolivia. Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1968.
- Benjamin, J. R. The United States and the Origins of the Cuban Revolution: An Empire of Liberty in an Age of National Liberation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Blight, James, and Kornbluh, Peter. Politics of Illusion: The Bay of Pigs Invasion Reexamined. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1998.

- Jonas, Susanne. The Battle for Guatemala: Rebels, Death Squads, and U.S. Power. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.
- Kit, Wade. "The Fall of Guatemalan Dictator, Manuel Estrada Cabrera: U.S. Pressure or National Opposition?" Canadian Journal of Latin American and Caribbean Studies 15, number 29 (1990), pp. 105–128.
- Kohl, James V. "Peasant and Revolution in Bolivia, April 9, 1952–August 2, 1953." Hispanic American Historical Review 58, number 2 (May 1978), pp. 238–259.
- Kornbluh, Peter. Bay of Pigs Declassified: The Secret CIA Report on the Invasion of Cuba. New York: New Press, 1998.
- Landau, Saul. The Guerrilla Wars of Central America: Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.
- Lanusse, Lucas. Montoneros: El mito de sus doce fundadores. Buenos Aires: Vergara, 2005.
- Levine, D. H. Conflict and Political Change in Venezuela. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1973.
- Lewis, Paul H. Guerrillas and Generals: The Dirty War in Argentina. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2001.
- Longley, Kyle. "Resistance and Accommodation: The United States and the Nationalism of José Figueres, 1953–1957." Diplomatic History 18, number 1 (1994), pp. 1–28.
- Longley, Kyle. The Sparrow and the Hawk: Costa Rica and the United States during the Rise of José Figueres. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1997.
- López Urrutia, Carlos. "The Chilean Naval Mutiny of 1931." Derroteros de la Mar del Sur [Peru] 8 (2000), pp. 51–64.
- Love, Robert. History of the U.S. Navy, 1942–1991. Harrisburg, PA: Stackpole, 1992.
- Lynch, Grayston L. Decision for Disaster: Betrayal at the Bay of Pigs. London: Brassey's, 1997.
- Masterson, Daniel M. Militarism and Politics in Latin America: Peru from Sánchez Cerro to Sendero Luminoso. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1991.
- McAuliffe, Mary S., ed. CIA Documents on the Cuban Missile Crisis, 1962. Washington DC: History Staff, Central Intelligence Agency, 1992.
- Miranda, Roger, and Ratliff, William E. The Civil War in Nicaragua: Inside the Sandinistas. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1993.
- Moss, Robert. Chile's Marxist Experiment. Newton Abbot, England: David & Charles, 1973.
- Moyano, María José. Argentina's Lost Patrol: Armed Struggle, 1969–1979. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Nunn, Frederick. The Time of the Generals: Latin American Professional Militarism in World Perspective. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.
- Orona, Juan V. La revolución del 16 de septiembre. Buenos Aires: Zlotopioro, 1971.
- Pastor, R. A. Whirlpool: U.S. Foreign Policy toward Latin America and the Caribbean. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992.
- Persons, Albert C. Bay of Pigs: A Firsthand Account of the Mission by a U.S. Pilot in Support of the Cuban Invasion Force in 1961. New York: McFarland, 1990.
- Potash, Robert A. El ejército y la política en la Argentina, 1945–1962: De Perón a Frondizi. Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1982.
- Ropp, Steve C. "The Honduran Army in the Sociopolitical Evolution of the Honduran State." Americas [American Academy of Franciscan History] 30, number 4 (April 1974), pp. 504–528.
- Sandos, James A. Rebellion in the Borderlands. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.
- Sater, William A. "The Abortive Kronstadt: The Chilean Naval Mutiny of 1931." Hispanic American Historical Review 60, number 2 (1980), pp. 239–268.
- Schultz, L. Human Rights and United States Policy toward Latin America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Schultz, L. National Security and United States Policy toward Latin America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.
- Schlesinger, Stephen, and Kinzer, Stephen. Bitter Fruit: The Untold Story of the American Coup in Guatemala. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1982.
- Sieder, Rachel. "Honduras: The Politics of Exception and Military Reformism, 1972–1978." Journal of Latin American Studies 27 (1995), pp. 99–127.
- Simon, Jean Marie. Guatemala: Eternal Spring, Eternal Tyranny. New York: Norton, 1987.
- Skidmore, Thomas E. The Politics of Military Rule in Brazil, 1964–1985. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Sowell, David. "Repertoires of Contention in Urban Colombia, 1760s–1940s: An Inquiry into Latin American Social Violence." Journal of Urban History 24, number 3 (1998), pp. 302–336.
- Spooner, Mary Helen. Soldiers in a Narrow Land: The Pinochet Regime in Chile. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.
- Stepan, Alfred. The Military in Politics: Changing Patterns in Brazil. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1971.
- Tomasek, Robert D. "Caribbean Exile Invasions: A Special Regional Type of Conflict." Orbis 17, number 4 (Winter 1974), pp. 1354–1382.
- Utz, Curtis. Cordon of Steel: The U.S. Navy and the Cuban Missile Crisis. Washington DC: Naval Historical Center, 1993.
- Walter, Knut. The Regime of Anastasio Somoza, 1936–1956. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Weathers, Bynum E., Jr. Guerrilla Warfare in Argentina and Colombia, 1974–1982. Maxwell Air Force Base, AL: Documentary Research Division, Air University Library, 1982.
- White, Mark J. The Cuban Missile Crisis. London: Macmillan, 1996.
- White, Mark J. The Kennedys and Cuba: The Declassified Documentary History. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2001.

- Wickham-Crowley, Timothy P. Guerrillas and Revolution in Latin America: A Comparative Study of Insurgents and Regimes since 1956. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Wright, Thomas C. Latin America in the Era of the Cuban Revolution. New York: Praeger, 1991.
- Wyden, Peter. Bay of Pigs: The Untold Story. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.
- Young, John M. When the Russians Blink: The U.S. Maritime Response to the Cuban Missile Crisis. Washington DC: History and Museum Division, U.S. Marine Corps, 1991.
- Zook, David H. Zarumilla-Marañón: The Ecuador-Peru Dispute. New York: Bookman Associates, 1964.

Falklands Campaign (1982)

- Bijl, Nicholas van der. Argentine Forces in the Falklands. London: Osprey, 1992.
- Bijl, Nicholas van der. Nine Battles to Stanley. London: Leo Cooper, 1999.
- Bijl, Nicholas van der. 5th Infantry Brigade in the Falklands War. London: Leo Cooper, 2003.
- Braybrook, Roy. Battle for the Falklands (3): Air Forces. London: Osprey, 1982.
- Clapp, Michael, and Southby-Taylor, Ewen. Amphibious Assault Falklands: The Battle of San Carlos Water. London: Leo Cooper, 1996.
- English, Adrian, and Watts, Anthony. Battle for the Falklands (2): Naval Forces. London: Osprey, 1982.
- Fowler, William. Battle for the Falklands (1): Land Forces. London: Osprey, 1982.
- Freedman, Lawrence, and Gamba-Stonehouse, Virginia. Signals of War: The Falklands Conflict of 1982. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Moro, Commodore Rubén Oscar. The History of the South Atlantic Conflict: The War for the Malvinas. New York: Greenwood, 1990.
- Rasor, Eugene L. The Falklands/Malvinas Campaign: A Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1991.
- Smith, Gordon. Battles of the Falklands War. London: Allan, 1994.
- Woodward, John F. "Sandy", et al. One Hundred Days: The Memoirs of the Falklands Battle Group Commander. London: HarperCollins, 1992.

Grenada Invasion (1983)

- Cobb, Charles E., Jr. "Marking Time in Grenada." National Geographic 166, number 5 (November 1984), pp. 688–710.

- Diederich, Bernard. "Interviewing George Louison: A PRG Minister Talks about the Killings." Caribbean Review 12, number 4 (1983), pp. 17–18.
- Russell, Lee E. Grenada 1983. London: Osprey, 1985.

Panama Campaign (1989–1990)

- Beluche, Olmedo. La verdad sobre la invasión. Panama City: Editorial Portobelo, 1996.
- Rottman, Gordon L. Panama, 1989–1990. London: Osprey, 1991.
- Watson, Bruce, and Tsouras, Peter, eds. Operation JUST CAUSE: The U.S. Intervention in Panama. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1991.

Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present)

- Adams, Thomas K. "Intervention in Haiti: Lessons Relearned." Military Review 76, number 5 (1996), pp. 45–56.
- Benson, Kevin C. M., and Thrash, Christopher B. "Declaring Victory: Planning Exit Strategies for Peace Operations." Parameters 26, number 3 (1996), pp. 69–80.
- Brown, Stephen D. "PsyOp in Operation Uphold Democracy." Military Review 76, number 5 (1996), pp. 57–64, 67–73.
- Hudson, Rex A. "Colombia's Palace of Justice Tragedy Revisited: A Critique of the Conspiracy Theory." Terrorism and Political Violence [UK] 7, number 2 (1995), pp. 93–142.
- Kent, Robert B. "Geographical Dimensions of the Shining Path Insurgency in Peru." Geographical Review 83, number 4 (1993), pp. 441–454.
- Leech, Garry M. Killing Peace: Colombia's Conflict and the Failure of U.S. Intervention. New York: Information Network of the Americas, 2002.
- Morley, Morris, and McGillion, Chris. "'Disobedient' Generals and the Politics of Redemocratization: The Clinton Administration and Haiti." Political Science Quarterly 112, number 3 (1997), pp. 363–384.
- Morris, Justin. "Force and Democracy: UN/US Intervention in Haiti." International Peacekeeping [UK] 2, number 3 (1995), pp. 391–412.
- Shelton, H. Hugh, and Vane, Timothy D. "Winning the Information War in Haiti." Military Review 75, number 6 (1995), pp. 3–9.

Glossary

Rank Abbreviations

1st Lt.	first lieutenant	Lt.	lieutenant
2nd Lt.	second lieutenant	Lt. Cmdr.	lieutenant commander
Adm.	admiral	Lt. Col.	lieutenant colonel
Brig. Gen.	brigadier general	Lt. Gen.	lieutenant general
Capt.	captain	Maj.	major
Col.	colonel	Maj. Gen.	major general
Cmdr.	commander	Rear Adm.	rear admiral
Commo.	commodore	Sgt.	sergeant
Cpl.	corporal	Sgt. Maj.	sergeant major
Ens.	ensign	Vice Adm.	vice admiral
Gen.	general

Terms and Definitions

abaft Further aft than; in or toward the stern.

abatis A barricade made of felled trees whose branches were turned outward toward attackers.

absolutism A system of government, common in Europe during the 16th through 18th centuries, in which total power rests with a monarch or dictator.

Acadia A territory in New France consisting of portions of present-day New England, Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces.

accoutrements A soldier's gear except for weapons or clothing.

accrocher To board and grapple an enemy vessel.

adobe Sun-dried bricks fortified with straw used as a building material in the southwestern United States and Latin America.

aft Near, toward, or at the stern of the ship.

aide-de-camp A staff officer who assists a commander on campaign.

Alta California A region of Mexico that is today the state of California.

amidships The center part of the ship. This is both between the fore and aft sections and between the port and starboard sides.

amphibious warfare Military activity that involves landing from ships, either directly or by means of landing craft or helicopters.

armada Large fleet of warships, usually used to refer to the Spanish Armada.

army Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of at least 50,000 to 60,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a general. In previous centuries, armies were much smaller in size.

astern Behind a ship.

aweigh Said of an anchor immediately after it clears the bottom and when its cable is up and down.

ballast Additional weight placed low in the hull to improve stability and enable a ship to carry more sail.

ballistics The science of projectiles, divided into interior and exterior ballistics.

bark A small, often three-masted vessel.

barrage Term for a barrier formed by artillery fire (land) or an antisubmarine net or mine barrier (sea).

battalion Military unit, usually consisting of between 300 and 1,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a lieutenant colonel.

battery Military unit corresponding to an infantry company. In modern times, usually composed of about 100 individuals and commanded by a captain.

battle bill The record of battle stations of a ship and the duties of each man assigned to its stations.

bluecoat Slang term for a Union soldier during the American Civil War.

bow chase Cannon mounted on the fore-part of the ship, used in pursuit of an enemy vessel.

breastworks A barricade usually about breast-high that shielded defenders from enemy fire.

brigade Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 3,000 and 5,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a brigadier general (premodern times) or a colonel (modern times).

broadside The firing of all guns on one side of a vessel as nearly simultaneously as possible.

buck and ball A close-range musket load having three large buckshot bound on top of a .69-caliber, smooth-bore musket ball, encased in paper.

Californio An original Spanish colonist of California, or a descendent of such a colonist.

caravel Spanish and Portuguese ship of Moorish origin. Broad beamed; usually square-rigged forward and lateen-rigged on aft masts.

cartel ship Ship used to transport prisoners.

case shot Spherical cannon round that breaks apart shortly after firing; the smaller balls devastate close-by combatants.

cashier To dismiss from military or government service.

cease-fire Partial or temporary cessation of hostilities. A cease-fire can also involve a general armistice, or a total cessation of all hostilities.

chain shot Artillery ammunition consisting of two hollow hemispheres connected by a short length of chain folded inside, with the hemispheres closed together into a ball for loading.

chasseurs Light infantry or cavalry used for quick maneuvering.

chevaux-de-frise Defensive artifact designed to protect fortifications or positions. The device has angles of six to nine feet of long, pointed stakes.

close hauled When a vessel has the wind before its beam, or is sailing as close to the wind as possible.

commerce raiding Attack on an enemy's commercial shipping to rob them of valuable supplies and to decrease morale among the civilian population.

commissioned officer An officer possessing authority over enlisted men and noncommissioned officers whose rank is conferred by a government document (commission). Traditionally, officers were usually of high socioeconomic class because commissions had to be purchased.

commutation Legalized form of avoiding military service. During the American Civil War, the "commutation fee," normally about $500, allowed one to avoid military service altogether.

company Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 70 and 250 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a captain.

conquistador Spanish explorer and conqueror in the New World during the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries.

consort A ship accompanying another, often larger, vessel.

Contras Armed resistance group in Nicaragua during the Cold War opposing the Sandinista regime and supported covertly by the United States.

corps Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 30,000 and 50,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a lieutenant general.

corregidor A Spanish magistrate, especially in the Spanish colonies of the New World.

corsair Privateer, derived from the Spanish term corsario.

coup (d'état) Sudden, decisive use of force in politics, especially in terms of a violent overthrow of an existing government by a small group often assisted by the military.

coup d'assurance The firing of a gun by a warship when it shows its national ensign to the vessel it is chasing.

coup de semonce The firing of a shot across the bow of a vessel chased by a warship.

court-martial To subject to a military trial with a court consisting of a board of commissioned officers.

corvette A flush-deck vessel usually having only a single tier of guns.

Creole In colonial times, an individual of Spanish descent born in Latin America.

dead reckoning Determining the position of a vessel based on the course steered and distance sailed, not accounting for tides and currents.

Dirty War Period of strict repression and violence during Argentina's 1976-1983 military dictatorship.

division Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 10,000 and 20,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a major general.

encomienda Labor system from the 16th to 18th centuries that was designed to reward Spanish conquistadores who had fought on behalf of the Spanish Crown with the labor services of indigenous Indians.

enfilade To fire upon the length rather than the face of an enemy position.

enquête du pavillon The demand of a warship for another vessel to show its national ensign.

envelopment To close in upon an enemy's line from several directions.

executive officer Second-in-command of a vessel, squadron, etc.

flagship Ship carrying an admiral who is in command of a fleet or squadron.

flotilla A grouping of lesser warships, distinct from a fleet by their smaller size.

fraise An obstacle formed by studding a rampart with sharpened stakes.

frigate A vessel ranked between a corvette and a ship of the line possessing both full and light batteries.

galleon A large, square-rigged vessel of the 15th to early 18th centuries. See sidebar on page 82 for additional information.

gangway Opening in a ship giving access to a brow or other ladder.

- give-way vessel The vessel that must stay clear of another vessel (the stand-on vessel) in accordance with the rules of navigation.
- gaucho A South American cowboy or herdsman, often of mixed Spanish and Indian descent.
- grape shot Artillery round; usually 9 shot placed between two iron plates.
- graycoat Slang term for a Confederate soldier during the American Civil War.
- guerrilla warfare A form of irregular warfare that is highly flexible and often decentralized. Nontraditional tactics such as raids and ambushes are employed to compensate for a numerical or technological disadvantage.
- gun deck The main deck of a frigate, which supports its battery.
- gunboat A small armed vessel.
- gunner In a navy, a commissioned officer whose duties are to take charge of artillery and ammunition of the ship and to train the crew in the use of its guns.
- heading Direction in which a vessel's head is pointing; its course.
- Hessians German mercenaries employed by the British during the American Revolutionary War.
- HMS His/Her Majesty's Ship; the designation used for vessels of Britain's Royal Navy.
- HMSS The plural of HMS.
- hull Actual body of a vessel. Excludes superstructure, rigging, masts, and rudder.
- hulled Shot below the waterline, allowing water to pour into the hull.
- in irons Condition whereby, through lack of wind, a sailing ship is unable to move while heading into the wind and attempting to tack.
- in ordinary Stripped down and laid up in reserve (said of a ship).
- intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) A ballistic missile with a range of more than 3,417 miles.
- intermediate-range ballistic missile (IRBM) A ballistic missile with a range of between 1,864 and 3,417 miles.
- invest To assault or lay siege to; to use military force to prevent entry to or escape from a location.
- ironclad A warship with a wooden hull that has been sheathed in metal for added protection.
- jibe To change from one tack to the other by turning the stern through the wind.
- junta A group of military officers that comes to national power through a military coup.
- lateen Long, triangular sail common in Mediterranean sailing ships.
- lee shore A shore toward which the wind is blowing.
- leeward Downwind, away from the wind.
- letter of marque Document authorizing the private seizure of certain ships, which enabled nations to wage war on an enemy's maritime commerce at little or no expense.
- Licentiate A person holding a degree or license from a university.
- main battery A ship's battery made up of its biggest guns or missiles.
- manifest destiny A belief common in the United States during the 19th century that held that it was the U.S. right, granted by God, to expand the country across the entire North American continent.
- martial law Temporary military governance of a civilian population when the civil government has become unable to sustain order.
- medium-range ballistic missile (MRBM) A ballistic missile with a range of between 621 and 1,864 miles.
- mestizo An individual of mixed Spanish and indigenous South American ancestry.
- mobilization The raising of the armed forces of a nation for active military service in time of war or other national emergency.
- Monroe Doctrine Political philosophy espoused by President James Monroe in 1823 that states that the entirety of the Western Hemisphere falls within the jurisdiction of the United States and should be closed to European influence.
- nautical mile Unit of measurement at sea, equal to 6,076 feet.
- noncommissioned officer (NCO) An enlisted soldier who has been promoted to a position of control or authority that is between enlisted men and commissioned officers.
- paramilitary Civilians organized after a military fashion.
- peninsular During colonial times, a Spanish individual born in Spain, thus enjoying the highest social status of any nationality or ethnic group.
- petty officer Naval rank equivalent to a noncommissioned officer.
- pink A small, usually Dutch, vessel characterized by a narrow, overhanging stern.
- piragua A type of dugout canoe, usually used in Latin America and the Caribbean.
- platoon Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 30 and 50 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a lieutenant.
- presidio Spanish fortress, especially in the southwestern United States, created to protect missions and other important areas.
- privateer An individual authorized to engage in warfare through the issuance of letters of marque.
- provost marshal Chief of military police.
- quarterdeck Part of the deck that is designated for both official and ceremonial functions. It is also where crew members board the ship by gangways.
- quartermaster A commissioned officer whose duty it is to provide clothing and subsistence for soldiers and sailors.
- regiment Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 2,000 and 3,000 individuals and commanded by a commissioned officer, usually a colonel.
- round shot A ball of iron, the size of which is expressed by its weight or the diameter of its gun's bore.

rudder Device for steering a vessel, usually fitted at the stern.

salvo The simultaneous firing of a number of guns.

scuttling The intentional letting of water into a ship's hull to sink it.

sea lines of communication Essential sea routes for military operations.

ship of the line A warship used in the line of battle, usually possessing at least 74 guns.

short-range ballistic missile (SRBM) A ballistic missile with a range of less than 621 miles.

snow A square-rigged vessel characterized by its trysail mast.

sortie A foray out of defensive position or fortified harbor.

squad Military unit, in modern times usually consisting of between 8 and 14 individuals and commanded by a noncommissioned officer.

strike To strike one's colors; to lower the flag of a vessel during battle as a token of surrender.

submarine-launched ballistic missile (SLBM) A ballistic missile delivering a nuclear weapon that is launched from a submarine.

USS United States ship; the designation used for vessels of the United States Navy.

viceroi The governor of a territory or province who administers as a representative of the home country's monarch or governing body.

West Indies The Caribbean; the series of islands located between North and South America.

windward Toward the wind.

Zapatistas In modern times, members of the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN) in Mexico. Originally used to denote followers of Emiliano Zapata during the Mexican Revolution.

Zouave Elite French regiment. See sidebar on page 826 for additional information.

Geographic Index

Note: An asterisk (*) indicates a territory.

North America

Canada

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 Spring 1629, Quebec Campaign, 211
England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 May 3, 1690, Acadian Campaign, 315
 August 19, 1690, Quebec Campaign, 318
 October 29, 1696, Newfoundland Offensive, 328
Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Late July 1709, Failed Offensive against Canada, 354
 October 4, 1710, Nicholson at Port Royal, 355
 August 24, 1711 (O.S.), Walker's Shipwreck, 357
Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Spring 1724, Dummer's War, 373
Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 May 11, 1745, Louisbourg, 403
 September 10, 1746, French Counterstrike, 406
French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 June 3, 1755, Bay of Fundy Campaign, 415
 June 2, 1758, Fall of Louisbourg, 422
 June 26, 1759, Plains of Abraham, 427
 April 28, 1760, Lévis's Countersiege, 430
 September 6, 1760, Surrender of Montreal, 431
 June 1762, Newfoundland Campaign, 440
Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 May 9, 1763, Pontiac's War, 444
American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 September 5, 1775, Invasion of Canada, 469

 November 13, 1775, Quebec, 471
 June 6, 1776, Trois Rivières, 474
Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790), 526
 Summer 1790, Britain's "Spanish Armament", 528
French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
War of 1812 (1812–1815), 665
 August 16, 1812, Detroit, 667
 October 11, 1812, Queenston Heights, 668
 November 20, 1812, Stillborn Invasion, 669
 November 28, 1812, Smyth's Offensive, 669
 April 25, 1813, Little York, 671
 May 25, 1813, Fort George, 672
 June 5, 1813, Stoney Creek, 673
 September 9, 1813, Lake Erie, 675
 October 5, 1813, Thames (or Moraviantown), 676
 October 25, 1813, Châteauguay River, 676
 November 10, 1813, Crysler's Farm, 677
 March 30, 1814, Wilkinson's Last Gasp, 680
 July 5, 1814, Chippawa River, 682
 July 25, 1814, Lundy's Lane, 682
 August 2, 1814, Fort Erie Siege, 683
 October 15, 1814, Last Ontario Invasion, 689
Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 November 10, 1837, Lower Canada Rebellion, 718
 December 4, 1837, Upper Canada Rebellion, 718
Fenian Raids (1866–1870), 865
 June 2, 1866, Ridgeway, 866
 May 25, 1870, Stanbridge, 867
Red River Expedition (1870), 868
Riel Rebellion (1885), 890
 March 26, 1885, Duck Lake, 890
 May 2, 1885, Cut Knife Creek, 891
World War I (1914–1918), 967
World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 January 12, 1942, U-Boat Offensive, 1009

United States

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 March 3, 1513, Exploration of Florida, 16

- Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 - Early March 1521, Ponce de León's Repulse, 38
 - May 19, 1539, De Soto in Florida, 44
 - February 1540, Coronado Expedition, 45
- Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 - June 11, 1559, Spain's Floridian Failure, 88
 - September 4, 1565, Ribaut's Massacre, 94
 - Early January 1566, Foundation of Santa Elena, 95
 - April 23, 1568, Gourgues's Revenge, 98
 - June 6, 1586, Annihilation of St. Augustine, 117
- Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 - April 26, 1607 (O.S.), First Anglo-Powhatan War, 152
- Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
- Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 - March 22, 1622 (O.S.), Second Anglo-Powhatan War, 209
 - July 20, 1636 (O.S.), Pequot War, 215
- England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 - April 1644, Last Anglo-Powhatan War, 223
- No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 - August 1664, Seizure of New Amsterdam, 246
- Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 - June 11, 1667, Crijnssen's Virginia Raid, 259
- Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
- Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 - August 7, 1673, Reoccupation of New York, 276
 - June 17, 1675 (O.S.), King Philip's War, 280
 - April 1676, Bacon's Rebellion, 282
- Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 - August 9, 1680, Pueblo Revolt, 295
- King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 - May 22, 1689, Leisler's Revolt, 313
 - May 3, 1690, Acadian Campaign, 315
- Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 - November 7, 1702, Repulse at St. Augustine, 343
 - January 25, 1704, Ayubale Massacre, 346
 - September 7, 1706, Defense of Charles Town, 350
 - September 22, 1711 (O.S.), Tuscarora War, 360
- Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 - April 23, 1715, Yamasee War, 363
- War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 - May 14, 1719, French Seizure of Pensacola, 368
 - September 1, 1719, Demolition of Pensacola, 369
- Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 - Spring 1724, Dummer's War, 373
- Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 - February 1728, Palmer's Raid, 376
- Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
- War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 - June 11, 1740, St. Augustine, 386
 - July 2, 1742, Spanish Invasion of Georgia, 395
- Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
- French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 - July 9, 1755, Braddock's Defeat, 417
 - September 8, 1755, Crown Point, 418
 - July 29, 1756, Oswego, 419
 - August 3, 1757, Siege of Fort William Henry, 420
 - July 5, 1758, Fort Carillon, 423
 - August 14, 1758, Fort Frontenac, 424
- Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 - May 9, 1763, Pontiac's War, 444
 - August 17, 1769, Spanish Louisiana, 447
 - May 16, 1771, Regulator Revolt, 448
 - October 10, 1774, Point Pleasant, 449
- American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 - April 19, 1775, Lexington and Concord, 467
 - June 17, 1775, Bunker Hill, 468
 - February 25, 1776, Moore's Creek, 473
 - June 28, 1776, Sullivan's Island, 475
 - August 27, 1776, Long Island, 476
 - September 15, 1776, Fall of New York, 477
 - October 28, 1776, White Plains, 478
 - November 16, 1776, Fort Washington, 478
 - December 26, 1776, Trenton, 479
 - January 3, 1777, Princeton, 479
 - April 23, 1777, Danbury Raid, 480
 - July 4, 1777, Ticonderoga, 480
 - August 2, 1777, Fort Stanwix, 481
 - August 15, 1777, Bennington, 482
 - September 11, 1777, Brandywine, 482
 - September 19, 1777, Freeman's Farm (or First Battle of Saratoga), 484
 - September 21, 1777, Paoli, 484
 - October 3, 1777, Germantown, 485
 - October 5, 1777, Fort Clinton, 485
 - October 7, 1777, Bemis Heights (or Second Battle of Saratoga), 486
 - October 22, 1777, Fort Mercer and Fort Mifflin, 486
 - December 23, 1778, Georgia Counteroffensive, 490
 - February 27, 1779, Briar Creek, 492
 - August 31, 1779, Defense of Savannah, 496
 - September 6, 1779, Spain's Mississippi Campaign, 497
 - January 11, 1780, De Gálvez at Mobile, 499
 - March 29, 1780, Charleston Siege, 500
 - August 16, 1780, Camden, 505
 - October 7, 1780, King's Mountain, 506
 - January 17, 1781, Cowpens, 509
 - March 9, 1781, Pensacola, 510
 - March 15, 1781, Guildford Courthouse, 512
 - September 5, 1781, Chesapeake Bay (Also Known as the Battle of the Virginia Capes or Cape Henry), 517
 - September 8, 1781, Eutaw Springs, 518
 - September 26, 1781, Yorktown, 519
- Discord in the Early American Republic and Old Northwest Indian Wars (1786–1795), 529
 - Early December 1786, Shays's Rebellion, 529
 - November 3, 1791, St. Clair's Defeat, 530

- July 15, 1794, Whiskey Insurrection, 530
- August 20, 1794, Fallen Timbers, 530
- French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
- May 28, 1798, Quasi-War with France, 554
- Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
- August 11, 1812, Texas Incursion, 594
- March 28, 1813, Rosillo, 598
- Early June 1813, Alazán, 600
- August 15, 1813, Atascoso, 601
- War of 1812 (1812–1815), 665
- August 16, 1812, Detroit, 667
- November 20, 1812, Stillborn Invasion, 669
- November 28, 1812, Smyth's Offensive, 669
- January 18, 1813, Frenchtown, 669
- April 28, 1813, Fort Meigs, 671
- May 27, 1813, Sackets Harbor, 672
- July 27, 1813, Creek War, 674
- July 29, 1813, Plattsburgh Raid, 674
- August 29, 1813, Fort Mims, 675
- September 9, 1813, Lake Erie, 675
- November 8, 1813, Talladega, 677
- December 19, 1813, Riall's Winter Forays, 678
- January 17, 1814, Jackson's Reverse, 678
- January 27, 1814, Calibee Creek, 679
- March 27, 1814, Horseshoe Bend, 679
- August 24, 1814, Bladensburg, 685
- September 1, 1814, Maine Offensive, 686
- September 11, 1814, Lake Champlain, 688
- September 12, 1814, Fort McHenry, 688
- November 6, 1814, Pensacola, 689
- January 8, 1815, New Orleans, 691
- February 7, 1815, Fort Bowyer, 692
- U.S. Expansion through Eastern Tribelands (1816–1842), 693
- July 1816, Fort Negro, 693
- November 20, 1817, First Seminole War, 693
- August 1823, Arikara War, 693
- Spring 1832, Black Hawk War, 694
- December 28, 1835, Second Seminole War, 694
- December 25, 1837, Lake Okeechobee, 696
- Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
- Texan Independence (1835–1836), 721
- December 4, 1835, Cós's Surrender, 722
- February 23, 1836, Alamo, 724
- April 21, 1836, San Jacinto, 726
- Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852), 731
- Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
- Autumn 1842, Texas Incursion, 745
- October 19, 1842, Jones's War, 745
- Mexican-American War (1846–1848), 747
- May 7, 1846, Palo Alto, 750
- May 9, 1846, Resaca de la Palma, 751
- December 28, 1846, Los Angeles, 761
- Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
- American Civil War (1861–1865), 797
- April 12, 1861, Fort Sumter, 797
- July 21, 1861, Bull Run (First Battle), 800
- August 10, 1861, Wilson's Creek, 800
- October 29, 1861, Port Royal, 802
- January 17, 1862, Mill Springs, 803
- February 6, 1862, Fort Henry, 803
- February 8, 1862, Roanoke Island, 803
- February 14, 1862, Fort Donelson, 803
- March 8, 1862, Hampton Roads, 804
- March 17, 1862, Peninsula Campaign, 805
- April 6, 1862, Shiloh, 805
- April 18, 1862, New Orleans, 805
- August 29, 1862, Bull Run (Second Battle), 809
- September 13, 1862, Harpers Ferry, 811
- September 16, 1862, Antietam, 811
- October 3, 1862, Corinth, 811
- October 7, 1862, Perryville, 812
- December 11, 1862, Fredericksburg, 812
- December 30, 1862, Murfreesboro, 812
- January 10, 1863, Arkansas Post, 812
- April 30, 1863, Chancellorsville, 813
- May 16, 1863, Siege of Vicksburg, 813
- May 23, 1863, Capture of Port Hudson, 814
- June 30, 1863, Gettysburg, 815
- September 19, 1863, Chickamauga, 817
- November 23, 1863, Chattanooga, 817
- May 3, 1864, The Wilderness, 818
- May 8, 1864, Spotsylvania, 819
- May 13, 1864, Drive on Atlanta, 819
- June 3, 1864, Cold Harbor, 819
- June 15, 1864, Petersburg Siege, 819
- July 5, 1864, Alarm at Washington, 821
- August 5, 1864, Mobile Bay, 821
- September 19, 1864, Winchester, 822
- November 11, 1864, March to the Sea, 822
- November 30, 1864, Franklin, 823
- December 15, 1864, Nashville, 823
- January 13, 1865, Fort Fisher, 823
- March 31, 1865, Appomattox, 824
- French Intervention in Mexico (1861–1867), 824
- November 26, 1866, Sedgwick's Intervention, 839
- Fenian Raids (1866–1870), 865
- North American Indian Wars (1861–1890), 844
- August 17, 1862, Sioux Uprising, 844
- August 1868, Beecher Island, 845
- Early March 1876, Powder River, 845
- June 17, 1876, Rosebud, 846
- June 23, 1876, Custer's Last Stand, 846
- May 1, 1883, Sierra Madre Expedition, 848
- Late December 1890, Wounded Knee, 848
- Chilean Civil War and Anti-American Antagonism (1891), 898
- May 3, 1891, Itata Incident, 901
- October 16, 1891, Baltimore Incident, 904
- Spanish-American War (1898), 907
- Police Actions (1901–1920), 923

Mexican Revolution (1910–1924), 939
 April 21, 1914, Veracruz Landing, 950
 March 9, 1916, Columbus Raid, 959
 March 15, 1916, Pershing's "Wild Goose Chase", 960
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 June 21, 1921, Billy Mitchell's Challenge, 973
 May 10, 1932, Bonus March, 979
 Nicaraguan Civil War (1925–1927), 982
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 January 12, 1942, U-Boat Offensive, 1009
 June 5, 1942, Aleutian Invasion, 1015
 March 26, 1943, Komandorski Islands, 1017
 May 11, 1943, Reconquest of Attu, 1017
 July 21–22, 1943, Evacuation of Kiska, 1018
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 October 22, 1962, Cuban Missile Crisis, 1036
 Falklands Campaign (1982), 1059
 Grenada Invasion (1983), 1078
 Panama Campaign (1989), 1081
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083
 September 23, 1994, Haitian Operation, 1086
 September 11, 2001, 9/11, 1089

Central America & the Caribbean

*Anguilla

Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546

Antigua & Barbuda

No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 November 4, 1666, Capture of Antigua, 256
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 December 26, 1689, Thornhill's Counteroffensive, 314
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 June 1712, Cassard's Campaign, 361
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577

*Aruba

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6

Bahamas

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217

Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 January 19, 1684 (O.S.), Destruction of New Providence, 301
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 October 1703, Destruction of Nassau, 345
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 February 1720, Spanish Attempt on the Bahamas, 370
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 March 3, 1776, Bahamian Raid, 473
 April 22, 1782, Fall of the Bahamas, 524
 March 30, 1783, Bahamian Reconquest, 526
 American Civil War (1861–1865), 797
 World War I (1914–1918), 967

Barbados

Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 October 25, 1651, Ayscue at Barbados, 228
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 April 29, 1665, De Ruyter at Barbados, 248
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558

Belize

Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 September 15, 1779, Belize, 497
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 August 31, 1798, Belize, 554
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019

*Bermuda

Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217

Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005

*British Virgin Islands

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 December 21, 1807, Danish Virgin Islands, 572

*Cayman Islands

England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291

Costa Rica

Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 April 8, 1666, Costa Rican Invasion, 251
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 September 26, 1835, War of the League, 717
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 March 12, 1948, Costa Rican Civil War, 1023

Cuba

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 November 1511, Conquest of Cuba, 16
 Conquest of Mexico (1517–1521), 21
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 July 1, 1554, Destruction of Santiago de Cuba, 84
 July 10, 1555, Sack of Havana, 85
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 June 23, 1591, Corrientes, 123
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 September 8, 1628, Capture of the Mexican Plate
 Fleet, 178
 August 31, 1638, Los Órganos, 196

Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 October 18, 1662, Destruction of Santiago de Cuba, 242
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 March 27, 1668, Puerto Príncipe Raid, 263
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 February 21, 1679, Repulse at Guanaja, 292
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 July 11, 1741, Guantánamo, 393
 April 8, 1748, Santiago de Cuba, 408
 October 12, 1748, Knowles's Action, 410
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 June 6, 1762, Siege of Havana, 436
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Mexican Turbulence (1822–1834), 697
 American Civil War (1861–1865), 797
 French Intervention in Mexico (1861–1867), 824
 Spanish-American War (1898), 907
 February 15, 1898, Loss of the Maine, 907
 June 7, 1898, Guantánamo, 912
 June 24, 1898, Las Guásimas, 914
 July 1, 1898, San Juan Hill, 915
 July 3, 1898, Action off Santiago, 916
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 September 12, 1906, Guerra's Revolt, 927
 May 23, 1912, Sugar Revolt, 931
 February 11, 1917, Gómez's Revolt, 937
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 November 30, 1956, Castro's Guerrilla Campaign, 1029
 April 17, 1961, Bay of Pigs, 1034
 October 22, 1962, Cuban Missile Crisis, 1036
 Grenada Invasion (1983), 1078

Dominica

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Early Summer 1652, Rupert's Counteroffensive, 229

Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 June 3, 1761, Dominica, 432
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 April 12, 1782, Les Saintes, 522
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 February 22, 1805, Assault on Dominica, 561

Dominican Republic

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 March 26, 1495, Defeat of Caonabó, 5
 Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 March 1553, Le Clerc's Sweep, 84
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 January 10, 1586, Sack of Santo Domingo, 116
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 April 23, 1655, Assault on Santo Domingo, 233
 April 9, 1659, Santiago de los Caballeros, 237
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 January 25, 1801, Santo Domingo Coup, 542
 January 29, 1802, Leclerc's Campaign, 543
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 Late February 1805, Haitian Offensive, 561
 February 6, 1806, Duckworth's Action, 564
 June 7, 1809, Santo Domingo, 575
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 September 28, 1808, Dominican Reconquest, 578
 February 8, 1822, Hispaniola Unified, 650
 Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 May 3, 1916, Dominican Intervention, 935
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 April 24, 1965, Dominican Intervention, 1038

El Salvador

Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973

Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 June 27, 1969, Soccer War, 1041
 October 15, 1979, Salvadoran Civil War, 1053

Grenada

Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 March 17, 1649, Grenada Occupation, 226
 April 14, 1654, Franco-Carib War, 230
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 July 2, 1779, Capture of Grenada, 493
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 April 26, 1796, Offensive down the Windward Islands,
 551
 Grenada Invasion (1983), 1078

*Guadeloupe

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 January 26, 1636, Conquest of Guadeloupe, 215
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 August 4, 1666, Willoughby's Shipwreck, 254
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 May 1, 1691, Defense of Guadeloupe, 320
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 March 19, 1703, Failure at Guadeloupe, 344
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 January 22, 1759, Capture of Guadeloupe, 426
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 April 12, 1782, Les Saintes, 522
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 February 5, 1794, Jervis's Sweep, 546
 June 2, 1794, Hugues's "Brigand War", 548
 May 6, 1802, Reoccupation of Guadeloupe, 557
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 April 12, 1809, The Saintes, 574
 January 22, 1810, Guadeloupe, 575
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005

Guatemala

Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 December 6, 1523, Alvarado in Guatemala, 39
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577

German Overtures (1890–1897), 897
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 June 18, 1954, Guatemalan Coup, 1026

Haiti

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 March 1553, Le Clerc's Sweep, 84
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 July 12, 1590, Cape Tiburón, 122
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 January 21, 1634, Eradication of Tortuga, 214
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 February 9, 1654, Spanish Conquest of Tortuga, 230
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 January 21, 1691, La Limonade, 319
 May 24, 1695, Invasion of Saint Domingue, 327
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 January 18, 1741, Cape Tiburón, 389
 March 22, 1748, Port Saint Louis, 408
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 October 21, 1790, Ogé's Insurrection, 532
 August 14, 1791, Bois Caïman, 532
 March 22, 1792, Croix des Bouquets, 535
 January 9, 1793, Platons, 535
 April 4, 1793, Dispute for Port-au-Prince, 536
 June 20, 1793, Le Cap Revolt, 537
 September 9, 1793, British Intervention, 537
 May 30, 1794, Port-au-Prince Assault, 538
 May 8, 1798, British Withdrawal, 542
 Mid-February 1799, War of the Knives, 542
 January 29, 1802, Leclerc's Campaign, 543
 Late November 1803, French Evacuation, 545
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 January 8, 1807, Haitian Civil War, 569
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 February 8, 1822, Hispaniola Unified, 650
 Mexican Turbulence (1822–1834), 697
 Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
 Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
 German Overtures (1890–1897), 897

Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 July 28, 1915, Haitian Occupation, 934
 March 1919, Hunt for Charlemagne, 937
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083
 September 23, 1994, Haitian Operation, 1086

Honduras

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 March 16, 1594, Langton at Puerto Caballos, 128
 May 17, 1594, Parker and Raymond's Coup, 129
 October 17, 1596 (O.S.), Sherley's Cruise, 138
 February 17, 1603, Raid on Puerto Caballos, 144
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 July 28, 1643, Capture of Trujillo, 222
 Late July 1650, Roatán Counterattack, 227
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 October 16, 1779, Omoa, 498
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 March 18, 1907, Zelaya's War, 928
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 June 27, 1969, Soccer War, 1041

Jamaica

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 October 17, 1596 (O.S.), Sherley's Cruise, 138
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 April 3, 1643, Seizure of Jamaica, 222
 May 20, 1655, Conquest of Jamaica, 233
 May 20, 1658, Spanish Landing at Río Nuevo, 235
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 June 27, 1694, Assault on Jamaica, 325
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368

Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558

*Martinique

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 September 1, 1635, Occupation of Martinique, 214
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 July 6, 1667, Harman's Martinican Bonfire, 260
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 July 19, 1674, De Ruyter and the "Victory of Rum", 277
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 April 9, 1693, Repulse at Martinique, 324
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 June 1712, Cassard's Campaign, 361
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 January 15, 1759, Defense of Martinique, 425
 January 5, 1762, Martinique Overrun, 433
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 April 17, 1780, Encounter Off Martinique, 501
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 February 5, 1794, Jervis's Sweep, 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 January 6, 1804, Diamond Rock, 559
 May 14, 1805, Villeneuve vs. Nelson, 561
 May 29, 1805, Reclamation of Diamond Rock, 562
 January 28, 1809, Martinique, 574
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005

Mexico

Conquest of Mexico (1517–1521), 21
 February 20, 1517, Discovery, 21
 Late January 1518, Reconnaissance, 21
 March 24, 1519, Initial Clashes, 24
 August 31, 1519, Tlaxcala Battles, 26
 October 18, 1519, Cholula Massacre, 27
 May 29, 1520, Narváez's Defeat, 29
 June 30–July 1, 1520, "Noche Triste" Retreat, 30
 February 15, 1521, Lakeshore Sweep, 32

 April 3, 1521, Sweep beyond the Valley, 33
 August 13, 1521, Fall of Tenochtitlán, 38
 Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 December 21, 1529, Nuño de Guzmán's Campaign, 42
 Late April 1535, Cortés in Baja California, 44
 Consolidation (1541–1572), 68
 April 10, 1541, Mixtón War, 68
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 September 15, 1568, Hawkins at San Juan de Ulúa, 99
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 September 21, 1597, Parker at Campeche, 139
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 January 1609, Yanga's Revolt, 153
 November 16, 1616, Tepehuán Revolt, 155
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 August 11, 1633, Van Hoorn's Sack of Campeche, 188
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 August 7, 1644, Tabasco Foray, 224
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 February 8, 1663, Myngs's Sack of Campeche, 243
 February 24, 1665, Tabasco Raid, 246
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 May 17, 1683, Sack of Veracruz, 299
 July 6, 1685, Sack of Campeche, 304
 September 11, 1685, Alacrán Reef, 305
 March 1686, Valladolid Raid, 306
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 May 22, 1712, Tzeltal Rebellion, 361
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 December 7, 1716, Bay of Campeche, 364
 July 15, 1717, El Carmen, 366
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790), 526
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 September 16, 1810, Hidalgo's Uprising, 582
 September 28, 1810, Alhóndiga de Granaditas, 582
 October 30, 1810, Monte de las Cruces, 584
 November 7, 1810, Aculco, 585
 January 4–5, 1811, Tres Palos, 586

- January 12, 1811, Calderón Bridge, 586
 May 26, 1811, Tixtla, 589
 January 1, 1812, Zitácuaro, 591
 February 17, 1812, Siege of Cuautla, 591
 July 22, 1812, Siege of Huajuapán, 593
 November 24, 1812, Oaxaca, 596
 April 6, 1813, Fall of Acapulco, 599
 December 22, 1813, Valladolid-Puruarán, 603
 April 15, 1817, Mina's Intervention, 617
 Mexican Turbulence (1822–1834), 697
 July 7, 1829, Spanish Invasion, 699
 December 4, 1829, Bustamante's Uprising, 700
 January 2, 1832, Santa Anna's Insurrection, 700
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 Texan Independence (1835–1836), 721
 War of the Cakes or Pastry War (1838–1839), 728
 April 16, 1838, Blockade, 729
 November 27, 1838, Bombardment, 729
 December 5, 1838, Disembarkation, 730
 Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
 August 22, 1842, Yucatán Rebellion, 745
 November 22, 1844, Santa Anna's Overthrow, 747
 Mexican-American War (1846–1848), 747
 September 19, 1846, Monterrey, 756
 November 14, 1846, Tampico, 759
 February 22, 1847, Buena Vista, 763
 February 28, 1847, Sacramento, 764
 March 9, 1847, Veracruz, 765
 April 12, 1847, Tuxpan, 766
 April 14, 1847, Cerro Gordo, 766
 June 14, 1847, Tabasco, 768
 August 19, 1847, Contreras-Churubusco, 769
 September 7, 1847, Molino del Rey, 770
 September 12, 1847, Chapultepec, 771
 November 10, 1847, Mazatlán, 773
 Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
 June 1, 1852, Raousset's Invasion, 776
 October 15, 1853, Walker's Mexican Adventure, 776
 March 1854, Raousset's Demise, 777
 Ayutla Revolution (1853–1855), 784
 March 1, 1854, Uprising, 784
 April 20, 1854, Siege of Acapulco, 785
 War of the Reform (1858–1860), 785
 March 1, 1856, Ocotlán, 786
 March 10, 1858, Salamanca, 787
 Late April 1858, First Siege of Guadalajara, 788
 July 2, 1858, Atenquique, 789
 September 21, 1858, Second Siege of Guadalajara, 789
 September 29, 1858, Ahualulco de los Pinos, 789
 December 8, 1858, Jalisco Counteroffensive, 790
 February 16, 1859, First Siege of Veracruz, 790
 March 22, 1859, Tacubaya, 790
 November 13, 1859, Estancia de Vacas, 791
 February 8, 1860, Second Siege of Veracruz, 791
 August 10, 1860, Silao, 792
 September 22, 1860, Fall of Guadalajara, 792
 December 21, 1860, Calpulalpan, 793
 French Intervention in Mexico (1861–1867), 824
 November 29, 1861, Occupation of Veracruz, 825
 May 4, 1862, Cinco de Mayo, 827
 May 18, 1862, Barranca Seca, 828
 June 13, 1862, Borrego, 829
 March 15, 1863, Siege of Puebla, 830
 April 30, 1863, Camerone, 831
 August 1, 1864, Brincourt's Offensive, 833
 January 17, 1865, Siege of Oaxaca, 834
 May 30, 1865, La Angostura, 836
 October 23, 1865, Defense of Matamoros, 836
 November 23, 1865, Monterrey, 836
 June 12, 1866, Santa Gertrudis, 837
 October 1, 1866, Miahuatlán, 838
 October 18, 1866, La Carbonera, 839
 November 26, 1866, Sedgwick's Intervention, 839
 January 31, 1867, San Jacinto, 840
 March 6, 1867, Siege of Querétaro, 840
 March 9, 1867, Reconquest of Puebla, 843
 April 8, 1867, San Lorenzo, 843
 Porfirian Dictatorship (1876–1897), 876
 January 28, 1885, Yaqui Wars, 877
 May 11, 1886, Buatachive, 878
 June 22, 1886, Guichamoco, 878
 Portents in Mexico (1899–1910), 921
 July 21, 1899, Yaqui Ultimatum, 921
 January 18, 1900, Mazocoba, 921
 June 1, 1906, Cananea, 922
 December 3, 1906, Río Blanco, 922
 Mexican Revolution (1910–1924), 939
 April 23, 1911, Ciudad Juárez, 940
 March 3, 1912, Rellano, 943
 February 9, 1913, Decena Trágica, 944
 May 9, 1913, Santa Rosa, 946
 September 29, 1913, Torreón (First Battle), 946
 November 23, 1913, Tierra Blanca, 948
 January 10, 1914, Ojinaga, 948
 March 12, 1914, Siege of Cuautla, 948
 March 22, 1914, Torreón (Second Battle), 948
 April 5, 1914, San Pedro de las Colonias, 949
 April 21, 1914, Veracruz Landing, 950
 May 12, 1914, Paredón, 951
 June 10, 1914, Zacatecas, 951
 June 25, 1914, Orendáin, 952
 January 17, 1915, Guadalajara, 955
 April 6, 1915, Celaya, 956
 May 7, 1915, Trinidad, 958
 November 18, 1915, Hermosillo, 959
 March 9, 1916, Columbus Raid, 959
 March 15, 1916, Pershing's "Wild Goose Chase", 960
 May 2, 1916, Morelos Sweep, 961
 December 1, 1916, Zapata's Resurrection, 962

Mexican Revolution (1910–1924) (continued)
 April 6, 1919, End of Zapata, 963
 April 13, 1920, Obregón's Revolt, 964
 May 7, 1920, Carranza's Demise, 965
 November 30, 1923, De la Huerta Uprising, 965
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 Cristero War (1926–1929), 986
 October 2, 1927, Anti-Reelectionist Mutiny, 988
 March 2, 1929, Escobar's Revolt, 988
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

*Montserrat

England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 February 4, 1667, Conquest of Montserrat, 256
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558

*Netherlands Antilles

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 June 24, 1633, Reconquest of Sint Maarten, 186
 July 28, 1634, Seizure of Curaçao, 189
 October 5, 1642, Bonaire Counterraid, 200
 March 20, 1644, Stuyvesant's Defeat, 202
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 July 17, 1665, Fall of Sint Eustatius, 250
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 April 3, 1689, Destruction of Sint Eustatius, 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 June 1712, Cassard's Campaign, 361
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 January 30, 1781, Sweep of the Dutch Antilles, 509
 November 16, 1781, French Reconquest of Dutch
 Antilles, 520
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 January 1, 1807, Curaçao, 568
 Spanish-American War (1898), 907
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 February 16, 1942, Caribbean Theater, 1011
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019

Nicaragua

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 January 21, 1522, González Dávila's Exploration, 38
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 June 29, 1665, Sack of Granada, 249
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 April 7, 1686, Sack of Granada, 306
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 March 24, 1780, San Juan River, 500
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
 May 4, 1855, Walker in Nicaragua, 777
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 March 18, 1907, Zelaya's War, 928
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Nicaraguan Civil War (1925–1927), 982
 May 2, 1926, Bluefields, 983
 Late December 1926, Laguna de Perlas, 983
 February 6, 1927, Chinandega, 983
 March 1927, Muimuy, 985
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 August 22, 1978, Sandinista Revolt, 1051

Panama

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 April 16, 1503, Columbus's Defeat at Veragua, 10
 September 1, 1513, Thrust toward the Pacific, 17
 Expansion beyond Mexico (1521–1540), 38
 Conquest of Peru (1524–1539), 45
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 July 29, 1572, Drake at Nombre de Dios, 101
 March 31, 1573, Drake's Seizure of the Silver Train, 103
 Late January 1577, Oxenham in the Pacific, 105
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 January 6, 1596, Defense of Panama, 136
 February 1601, Portobelo Strike, 144
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 July 10, 1668, Sack of Portobelo, 264
 January 6, 1671, Capture of Chagres, 270
 January 28, 1671, Sack of Panama, 271
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 April 15, 1680, First Pacific Incursions, 294
 June 7, 1685, Isla del Rey, 303
 Darien Disaster (1698–1699), 333
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372

Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 June 16, 1726, Hosier's Ill-Fated Campaign, 375
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 November 30, 1739, Portobelo, 383
 April 1, 1740, Chagres, 385
 April 7, 1742, Portobelo Fiasco, 394
 Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790), 526
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
 Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Panama Campaign (1989), 1081
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

*Puerto Rico

Initial Contacts (1492–1498), 3
 Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 June 15, 1508, Occupation of Puerto Rico, 12
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 March 1553, Le Clerc's Sweep, 84
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 April 14, 1592, Newport's Sweep, 124
 November 22, 1595, Drake's Defeat, 135
 June 16, 1598, Seizure of Puerto Rico, 140
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 September 24, 1625, Hendricksz's Defeat, 170
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 August 1650, Struggle for Saint Croix, 227
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 April 8, 1797, Puerto Rico, 553
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
 Spanish-American War (1898), 907
 May 12, 1898, Shelling of San Juan, 910
 July 24, 1898, Puerto Rican Invasion, 918
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005

Saint Kitts & Nevis

Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 January 28, 1624, Founding of Saint Kitts, 210
 September 16, 1629, Spanish Countersweep, 212
 Late January 1640, Anti-Carib Campaigns, 217

England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Late January 1646, Poincy's Revolt, 224
 August 1650, Struggle for Saint Croix, 227
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 April 22, 1666, Pointe de Sable, 252
 May 20, 1667, Battle Off Nevis, 258
 June 16, 1667, Repulse on Saint Kitts, 259
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 July 27, 1689, Capture of Saint Kitts, 313
 Late January 1690, Hewetson's Rescue, 314
 June 30, 1690, Reconquest of Saint Kitts, 317
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 July 14, 1702, Conquest of Saint Kitts, 339
 Late January 1706, Chavagnac's Campaign, 349
 March 7, 1706, D'Iberville Overruns Nevis, 349
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 January 5, 1782, Saint Kitts Offensive, 520
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558

Saint Lucia

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 December 11, 1778, Saint Lucia Campaign, 489
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 February 5, 1794, Jervis's Sweep, 546
 April 26, 1796, Offensive down the Windward Islands,
 551
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 June 19, 1803, Saint Lucia, 558
 World War I (1914–1918), 967

Saint Vincent & the Grenadines

Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 June 9, 1779, Seizure of Saint Vincent, 492
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 April 26, 1796, Offensive down the Windward Islands, 551

Trinidad & Tobago

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 April 1, 1595, Raleigh's Adventure, 132
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 March 3, 1677, First Battle of Tobago, 285
 December 6, 1677, Second Battle of Tobago, 288
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 May 24, 1781, French Occupation of Tobago, 515
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 February 12, 1797, Trinidad, 552
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 February 16, 1942, Caribbean Theater, 1011
 Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

*Turks & Caicos Islands

Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467

*U.S. Virgin Islands

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 December 21, 1807, Danish Virgin Islands, 572

South America

Argentina

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Late November 1519, Magellan's Circumnavigation, 20
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 September 1589, Chidley's Failure, 121
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 June 10, 1770, The Falklands, 448
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 June 8, 1806, River Plate, 565
 August 4, 1806, Argentine Reconquest, 567
 June 28, 1807, Buenos Aires, 571

Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 November 7, 1810, Suipacha, 585
 September 23, 1812, Tucumán, 595
 February 18, 1813, Salta, 597
 July 12, 1816, Santa Fe Campaign, 610
 March 25, 1818, Saucecito, 624
 November 27, 1818, Aguirre Ford, 629
 February 5, 1819, San Nicolás de los Arroyos, 630
 February 1, 1820, Cepeda, 635
 June 8, 1820, Cuesta de la Pedrera, 637
 June 28, 1820, Cañada de la Cruz, 637
 July 18, 1820, Dorrego's Offensive, 637
 May 3, 1821, Argentine Civil War, 643
 May 24, 1821, Coronda, 644
 Cisplatine War (1825–1828), 701
 October 27, 1826, El Tala, 705
 February 20, 1827, Ituzaingó, 706
 April 23, 1827, Camacuã, 708
 Unitarian-Federalist War (1828–1831), 710
 December 9, 1828, Navarro, 710
 April 22, 1829, San Roque, 710
 April 26, 1829, Puente de Márquez, 711
 June 22, 1829, La Tablada, 711
 February 24, 1830, Oncativo, 711
 March 1, 1831, Calchines, 712
 March 28, 1831, Rodeo de Chacón, 712
 November 4, 1831, Ciudadela de Tucumán, 712
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 January 10, 1832, Bulnes's Sweep, 713
 Late December 1832, Falklands Encounter, 713
 War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation (1836–1839), 726
 Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852), 731
 March 24, 1838, French Blockade, 731
 March 31, 1839, Pago Largo, 732
 September 12, 1839, Yeruá, 732
 November 5, 1839, Chascomús, 732
 April 10, 1840, Don Cristóbal, 733
 July 15, 1840, Sauce Grande, 733
 November 28, 1840, Quebracho Herrado, 734
 January 19, 1841, Sancala, 734
 August 13, 1841, Angaco, 734
 September 18, 1841, Famallá, 735
 September 24, 1841, Rodeo del Medio, 735
 November 26, 1841, Caaguazú, 735
 December 6, 1842, Arroyo Grande, 737
 November 8, 1845, Paraná River Offensive, 740
 November 27, 1847, Vences, 741
 February 3, 1852, Caseros, 743
 Buenos Aires versus the Argentine Confederation
 (1852–1863), 780
 Early Spring 1853, Siege of Buenos Aires, 780
 March 30, 1855, Indian Wars, 781
 October 22, 1859, Cepeda, 781
 September 16, 1861, Pavón, 782
 October 4, 1861, Arroyo Manantial, 782
 November 22, 1861, Cañada de Gómez, 783
 June 10, 1863, Las Playas, 783

War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870), 854
 April 13, 1865, Fall of Corrientes, 855
 May 25, 1865, Argentine Counterstroke, 856
 August 17, 1865, Yatay, 857
 April 1, 1867, San Ignacio, 861
 April 10, 1867, Pozo de Vargas, 861
 Argentine Unrest (1870–1890), 870
 May 20, 1870, Arroyo Sauce, 870
 October 12, 1870, Santa Rosa, 870
 January 26, 1871, Ñaembé, 870
 Early March 1872, Indian Wars, 871
 December 8, 1873, Don Gonzalo, 872
 September 24, 1874, Mitre's Revolution, 872
 October 29, 1874, Santa Rosa (First Battle), 873
 November 24, 1874, La Verde, 873
 December 6, 1874, Santa Rosa (Second Battle), 874
 April 2, 1879, Roca's Desert Campaign, 874
 June 20, 1880, Buenos Aires Assault, 875
 July 26, 1890, Campos's Coup, 876
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 September 6, 1930, Argentine Coup, 977
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 April 14, 1955, Failed Argentine Coup, 1028
 September 1, 1955, Perón's Fall, 1028
 Late December 1974, Argentina's "Dirty War", 1047
 Early September 1978, Beagle Channel Confrontation, 1052
 Falklands Campaign (1982), 1059
 April 1, 1982, Argentine Occupation, 1061
 April 21, 1982, Reclamation of South Georgia, 1063
 May 21, 1982, British Counterinvasion, 1069
 May 27, 1982, Goose Green, 1072
 June 11, 1982, Closing in on Stanley, 1076
 June 13, 1982, Capitulation, 1077
 Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Bolivia

Conquest of Peru (1524–1539), 45
 December 1538, Cochabamba, 56
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 October 29, 1810, Cotagaita, 584
 June 20, 1811, Huaqui, 589
 October 1, 1813, Vilcapugio, 602
 November 13, 1813, Ayohuma, 602
 November 27, 1815, Sipe Sipe, 609
 September 8, 1823, Santa Cruz's Flight, 656
 War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation (1836–1839), 726
 April 27, 1838, Failed Argentine Offensives, 728
 War of the Pacific (1879–1883), 879
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Chaco War (1932–1935), 989
 July 15, 1932, Pitiantuta, 989
 September 7, 1932, Boquerón, 991

November 7, 1932, Kilometer 7, 992
 January 20, 1933, Nanawa (First Battle), 994
 February 16, 1933, Toledo, 994
 March 11, 1933, Alihuatá, 994
 May 18, 1933, Fernández, 995
 July 4, 1933, Nanawa (Second Battle), 995
 September 12, 1933, Pozo Favorita, 996
 December 3, 1933, Campo Vía, 996
 March 20, 1934, Cañada Tarija, 998
 May 10, 1934, Cañada Strongest, 998
 August 14, 1934, Picuiba Breakout, 999
 November 6, 1934, Villazón, 1000
 November 11, 1934, El Carmen, 1000
 December 6, 1934, Irendagüe, 1000
 December 27, 1934, Ibibobo, 1001
 February 13, 1935, Villa Montes, 1001
 June 1, 1935, Ingavi, 1002
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 April 6, 1952, Bolivian Revolution, 1025
 February 3, 1989, End of Stroessner's Regime, 1058

Brazil

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Late November 1519, Magellan's Circumnavigation, 20
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 December 3, 1530, Portugal Claims Brazil, 76
 November 10, 1555, Villegagnon in Brazil, 86
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 January 16, 1560, Portuguese Counterstroke, 90
 January 22, 1565, Portuguese Stranglehold, 92
 January 18, 1567, Portuguese Reclamation of Rio, 96
 February 3, 1583, Fenton at São Vicente, 112
 March 1, 1584, French Paraíba, 114
 April 21, 1587, Salvador, 119
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 July 26, 1612, Equinoctial France, 154
 Late August 1614, Portuguese Retaliation, 155
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 May 8, 1624, Capture of São Salvador, 164
 March 29, 1625, Reconquest of São Salvador, 167
 March 1, 1627, Heyn at Salvador, 173
 February 14, 1630, Pernambuco Occupation, 179
 September 12, 1631, Los Abrolhos, 183
 Mid-March 1634, Seizure of Pontal, 189
 November 25, 1634, Conquest of Paraíba, 190
 April 19, 1635, Last Gasp of Pernambucan Resistance, 191
 January 6, 1636, Mata Redonda, 191
 January 23, 1637, Fall of Porto Calvo, 192
 Late March 1638, Maurits's Defeat, 193
 January 12, 1640, Itamaracá, 196
 November 24, 1641, Seizure of Maranhão, 200
 July 31, 1645, Tabocas, 203

Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649) (continued)
 April 16–17, 1648, First Battle of Guararapes, 206
 February 17–18, 1649, Second Battle of Guararapes, 208
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 August 16, 1710, Du Clerc at Rio de Janeiro, 355
 September 12, 1711, Duguay-Trouin at Rio, 359
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 Undeclared Hispano-Portuguese Conflict (1776–1777)
 449
 March 5, 1776, Lagoa dos Patos, 449
 February 20, 1777, Santa Catarina, 450
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 October 27, 1816, Carumbé, 612
 March 6, 1817, Pernambuco Rebellion, 616
 January 12, 1822, Luso-Brazilian Schism, 649
 July 2, 1823, Fall of Salvador, 654
 Cisplatine War (1825–1828), 701
 October 12, 1825, Sarandí, 702
 February 20, 1827, Ituzaingó, 706
 April 23, 1827, Camacua, 708
 April 15, 1828, Las Cañas, 709
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 January 6, 1835, Cabanagem Insurrection, 715
 September 20, 1835, Farroupilha Revolution, 715
 November 17, 1837, Sabinada, 718
 Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852), 731
 War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870), 854
 December 24, 1864, Offensive into Mato Grosso, 855
 September 18, 1865, Recapture of Uruguayana, 857
 Brazilian Strife (1889–1897), 892
 November 15, 1889, Collapse of Empire, 892
 February 9, 1893, Rio Grandese Revolt, 892
 September 5, 1893, Naval Rebellion, 893
 March 28, 1894, De Melo's Last Gasp, 895
 October 5, 1897, Canudos, 896
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 November 22, 1910, Brazil's "Revolt against the Lash", 930
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 October 3, 1930, Vargas Revolution, 977
 July 9, 1932, Brazil's Constitutionalist Revolution, 980
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005

Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 March 31, 1964, Brazilian Overthrow, 1037
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Chile

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Late November 1519, Magellan's Circumnavigation, 20
 Conquest of Peru (1524–1539), 45
 Conquest of Chile (1540–1553), 66
 December 1540, Foundation of Santiago, 67
 February 9, 1552, Foundation of Valdivia, 68
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 September 6, 1578, Drake in the Pacific, 108
 March 24, 1582, Sarmiento's Counterexpedition, 110
 January 11, 1587, Cavendish in the Pacific, 118
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 May 2, 1594, Hawkins in the Pacific, 129
 September 3, 1599, Pacific Penetrations by the Dutch, 142
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 April 16, 1615, Van Spilbergen Enters the Pacific, 159
 February 27, 1624, "Nassau Fleet", 164
 May 3, 1643, Brouwer's Failed Colony, 201
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 Early February 1684, Pacific Incursions (Second Wave), 301
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 January 1709, Rogers's Pacific Incursion, 353
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Spring 1723, Araucano Independence, 372
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 June 19, 1741, Anson in the Pacific, 393
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 September 20, 1814, Rancagua, 606
 February 12, 1817, Chacabuco, 615
 May 5, 1817, Gavilán, 618
 December 6, 1817, Talcahuano, 621
 March 19, 1818, Cancha Rayada, 624
 April 5, 1818, Maipú, 625
 February 3, 1820, Fall of Valdivia, 635
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 April 1830, Lircay, 712
 War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation (1836–1839), 726
 Spain's Return to the Pacific (1863–1866), 849
 March 31, 1866, Bombardment of Valparaíso, 852

War of the Pacific (1879–1883), 879
 May 21, 1879, Iquique, 881
 October 7, 1879, Angamos, 882
 October 28, 1879, Pisagua, 883
 November 18, 1879, Pozo Dolores or San Francisco, 883
 November 27, 1879, Tarapacá, 884
 March 21–22, 1880, Cuesta de los Ángeles, 885
 May 25, 1880, Tacna, 886
 June 1, 1880, Arica, 886
 Chilean Civil War and Anti-American Antagonism (1891), 898
 March 6, 1891, Pozo Almonte, 901
 May 3, 1891, Itata Incident, 901
 August 21, 1891, Concón, 902
 August 28, 1891, Placilla, 903
 October 16, 1891, Baltimore Incident, 904
 German Overtures (1890–1897), 897
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 October 29, 1914, Coronel, 969
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 September 1, 1931, Chilean Naval Mutiny, 978
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 September 11, 1973, Allende's Fall, 1045
 Early September 1978, Beagle Channel Confrontation, 1052
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Colombia

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 March 12, 1502, Ojeda's Failure, 9
 November 10, 1509, Repulse at Cartagena, 13
 Conquest of Venezuela and Colombia (1529–1541), 57
 January 13, 1533, Founding of Cartagena, 60
 October 1535, Guajira, 61
 Early March 1537, Subjugation of Colombia, 63
 Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 February 19, 1586, Drake at Cartagena, 116
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 October 17, 1596 (O.S.), Sherley's Cruise, 138
 Early June 1597, Ransom of Riohacha, 139
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 May 17, 1641, Spanish Reconquest of Providencia, 218
 November 24, 1643, Tolú Raid, 223
 August 10, 1655, Sack of Santa Marta, 234
 May 1656, Riohacha Raid, 234
 Summer 1658, Myngs's First Foray, 236
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 May 25, 1666, Seizure of Providencia, 253
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261
 Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272

Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 April 13, 1697, Siege of Cartagena, 329
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 August 30, 1702, Benbow's Last Fight, 340
 June 8, 1708, Wager versus the Spanish Galleons, 351
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Anglo-Spanish Frictions (1725–1729), 375
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 March 13, 1741, Siege of Cartagena, 390
 Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790), 526
 March 16, 1781, Comunero Revolt, 527
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 February 22, 1816, Cachirí, 610
 July 20, 1819, Pantano de Vargas, 631
 August 7, 1819, Boyacá, 633
 May 18, 1820, Laguna Salada, 636
 June 6, 1820, Pitayó, 636
 April 7, 1822, Bomboná, 650
 December 23, 1822, Fall of Pasto, 653
 Minor Disputes (1830–1838), 712
 Simmering Confrontations (1839–1844), 744
 War of the Thousand Days (1899–1902), 920
 December 15, 1899, Peralonso, 920
 May 11, 1900, Palonegro, 920
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083
 June 2003, Colombia's "Plan Patriota" Offensive, 1090

Ecuador

Conquest of Peru (1524–1539), 45
 November 14, 1524, Probes, 46
 Spring 1526, First Contact, 46
 January 31, 1531, Beachhead, 48
 February 25, 1534, Rival Spanish Expedition, 51
 May 3, 1534, Teocajas, 51
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 April 16, 1687, Sack of Guayaquil, 308
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 August 12, 1821, Yaguachi, 647
 September 12, 1821, Huachi (or Ambato), 648
 April 19, 1822, Riobamba, 650
 May 21, 1822, Pichincha, 651
 July 17, 1823, Ibarra, 655

Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 July 5, 1941, Ecuadorian–Peruvian Border Conflict, 1019
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083
 January 26, 1995, Ecuadorian–Peruvian Border Skirmish, 1087

*French Guiana

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland’s “Great Design” (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 England’s Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo–Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 September 22, 1667, Extirpation of French Cayenne, 261
 Third Anglo–Dutch War (1672–1674) and
 Franco–Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 May 3, 1676, Binckes’s Campaign, 283
 December 17, 1676, D’Estrées’s Counteroffensive, 284
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Haitian Revolution (1789–1803), 531
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019

Guyana

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Franco–Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 Holland’s “Great Design” (1613–1649), 157
 Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
 Second Anglo–Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 Boundary Disputes (1763–1774), 443
 Undeclared Hispano–Portuguese Conflict (1776–1777), 449
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Paraguay

Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 August 1724, Comunero War (Paraguay), 374
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 February 26, 1753, Guaraní War, 413
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 January 15, 1811, Paraguairí, 586
 March 9, 1811, Tacuarí, 587

War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870), 854
 April 16, 1866, Paraná Crossing, 858
 May 2, 1866, Estero Bellaco, 858
 May 24, 1866, Tuyutí (First Battle), 858
 September 3, 1866, Curuzú, 860
 September 22, 1866, Curupaytí, 860
 November 3, 1867, Tuyutí (Second Battle), 862
 July 15, 1868, Fall of Humaitá, 863
 December 6, 1868, Itororó, 863
 December 11, 1868, Avahy, 863
 December 21, 1868, Itaibaté, 864
 Late May 1869, Piribebuy, 864
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 Chaco War (1932–1935), 989
 July 15, 1932, Pitiantuta, 990
 September 7, 1932, Boquerón, 991
 November 7, 1932, Kilometer 7, 992
 January 20, 1933, Nanawa (First Battle), 994
 February 16, 1933, Toledo, 994
 March 11, 1933, Alihuatá, 994
 May 18, 1933, Fernández, 995
 July 4, 1933, Nanawa (Second Battle), 995
 September 12, 1933, Pozo Favorita, 996
 December 3, 1933, Campo Vía, 996
 March 20, 1934, Cañada Tarija, 998
 May 10, 1934, Cañada Strongest, 998
 August 14, 1934, Picuiba Breakout, 999
 November 6, 1934, Villazón, 1000
 November 11, 1934, El Carmen, 1000
 December 6, 1934, Irendagüe, 1000
 December 27, 1934, Ibibobo, 1001
 February 13, 1935, Villa Montes, 1001
 June 1, 1935, Ingavi, 1002
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Post–Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Peru

Conquest of Peru (1524–1539), 45
 September 24, 1532, Opening Campaign, 48
 July 26, 1533, Atahualpa’s Murder, 49
 November 8, 1533, Ambush at Vilcaconga, 50
 February 1534, Jauja, 50
 April 18, 1536, Manco’s Revolt, 53
 August 1536, Defense of Lima, 54
 Late July 1537, Flight of the Emperor, 55
 April 26, 1538, Almagro’s End, 55
 April 1539, Chuquillusca, 56
 Consolidation (1541–1572), 68
 June 26, 1541, Almagro’s Revolt, 69
 April 9, 1548, Jaquijahuana, 71
 November 13, 1553, Hernández Girón’s Revolt, 71
 April 14, 1572, Vilcabamba, 72
 Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 July 17, 1615, Cañete, 160
 May 7, 1624, Callao Blockade, 164
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 War of the Quadruple Alliance (1718–1720), 368
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 Lesser Hostilities (1780–1790), 526
 November 4, 1780, Tupac Amaru Rebellion, 526
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 August 2, 1814, Pumacahua Rebellion, 605
 September 7, 1820, San Martín's Peruvian Campaign, 638
 December 6, 1820, Cerro de Pasco, 641
 August 14, 1821, Siege of Callao, 648
 April 7, 1822, Macacona, 650
 January 19, 1823, Torata-Moquegua, 653
 June 18, 1823, Royalist Seizure of Lima, 654
 August 25, 1823, Zepita, 655
 February 5, 1824, Callao Mutiny, 656
 August 5, 1824, Junín, 657
 December 6, 1824, Ayacucho, 658
 War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation (1836–1839),
 726
 November 17, 1837, Paucarpata, 727
 January 20, 1839, Yungay, 728
 Spain's Return to the Pacific (1863–1866), 849
 May 2, 1866, Bombardment of Callao, 853
 War of the Pacific (1879–1883), 879
 January 12, 1881, Chorrillos-Miraflores, 887
 Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 World War I (1914–1918), 967
 Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
 August 1930, Peruvian Coup, 977
 July 7, 1932, Peruvian Uprising, 979
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 July 5, 1941, Ecuadorian-Peruvian Border Conflict,
 1019
 October 27, 1948, Peru's "Restorative Revolution",
 1023
 Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083
 January 26, 1995, Ecuadorian-Peruvian Border
 Skirmish, 1087

Suriname

Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 No Peace beyond the Line (1660–1665), 241
 Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 February 26, 1667, Reconquest of Suriname, 257
 October 13, 1667, Seizure of Suriname, 261
 Buccaneer Heyday (1668–1672), 261

Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 King William's War (1688–1697), 311
 April 14, 1689, Failure at Suriname, 312
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 June 1712, Cassard's Campaign, 361
 American Revolutionary War (1775–1783), 467
 French Revolutionary Wars (1793–1802), 546
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 August 31, 1803, Capture of Demerara, 559
 April 25, 1804, Suriname, 559
 Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Uruguay

Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
 Late November 1519, Magellan's Circumnavigation, 20
 Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
 August 7, 1680, Colônia do Sacramento, 295
 Queen Anne's War (1702–1713), 337
 October 2, 1704, Sacramento Occupation, 347
 Minor Incidents (1713–1719), 362
 Turmoil (1721–1724), 372
 Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
 October 3, 1735, Sacramento Siege, 378
 December 24, 1736, Montevideo Blockade, 380
 War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War
 (1739–1748), 381
 Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
 French and Indian War (1754–1763), 414
 October 1, 1762, Sacramento, 442
 November 2, 1762, River Plate Campaign, 442
 Undeclared Hispano-Portuguese Conflict
 (1776–1777), 449
 May 22, 1777, Sacramento, 451
 Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 October 12, 1806, Maldonado, 567
 January 16, 1807, Montevideo, 569
 Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 May 18, 1811, Las Piedras, 588
 December 31, 1812, El Cerrito, 596
 April 20, 1814, Fall of Montevideo, 604
 January 10, 1815, Guayabos, 607
 October 5, 1816, San Borja, 611
 October 27, 1816, Carumbé, 612
 November 19, 1816, India Muerta, 612
 January 4, 1817, Catalán Creek, 612
 January 22, 1820, Tacuarembó Chico, 635
 June 15, 1820, Guachas, 637
 Cisplatine War (1825–1828), 701
 October 12, 1825, Sarandí, 702
 February 20, 1827, Ituzaingó, 706
 Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852), 731
 December 29, 1839, Cagancha, 733
 February 16, 1843, Siege of Montevideo, 737

Rosas's Campaigns (1838–1852) (continued)

- Late March 1843, Santa Lucía, 737
- January 24, 1844, Arroyo Sauce, 738
- April 24, 1844, Arroyo Pantanoso, 738
- March 27, 1845, India Muerta, 738
- July 22, 1845, Anglo-French Intervention, 739
- August 31, 1845, Garibaldi's Incursion, 739
- July 26, 1851, Uruguayan Campaign, 742
- Buenos Aires versus the Argentine Confederation (1852–1863), 780
- War of the Triple Alliance (1864–1870), 854
 - December 2, 1864, Defense of Paysandú, 855
- World War I (1914–1918), 967
- Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
- World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 - December 13, 1939, River Plate, 1006

Venezuela

- Mainland Explorations (1498–1519), 6
- Conquest of Venezuela and Colombia (1529–1541), 57
 - Early August 1529, Alfínger's Opening Campaign, 57
 - July 26, 1530, González de Leiva's Incursion, 58
 - September 12, 1530, Federmann's First Venture, 58
 - June 9, 1531, Alfínger's Final Campaign, 59
 - May 15, 1535, Von Speyer's Trek, 61
 - Late December 1537, Federmann's Southern March, 63
 - August 1, 1541, Von Hutten's Campaign, 65
- Franco-Spanish Wars (1526–1559), 75
 - June 16, 1543, Antillean Sweep, 81
- Private Warfare (1559–1587), 88
- Elizabethan Wars (1588–1603), 121
 - June 6, 1595, Caracas, 134
 - June 20, 1595, Coro, 135
 - October 17, 1596 (O.S.), Sherley's Cruise, 138
- Early Footholds (1604–1619), 149
 - November 6, 1605, Araya Massacre, 150
 - November 17, 1617, Raleigh's Last Venture, 156
- Holland's "Great Design" (1613–1649), 157
 - October 15, 1641, Sack of Gibraltar, 199
- Other Colonial Struggles (1622–1640), 209
- England's Resurgence (1640–1659), 217
 - September 27, 1642 (O.S.), Jackson's Reprisal, 220
 - December 22, 1642, Laguna de Maracaibo Raid, 221
 - Early January 1659, Myngs's Second Foray, 236
- Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), 247
 - Late April 1666, Nau's Maracaibo Campaign, 253
 - March 9, 1669, Maracaibo Campaign, 253
 - April 25, 1669, Battle of the Bar, 267

- Third Anglo-Dutch War (1672–1674) and Franco-Spanish War (1673–1679), 272
 - May 11, 1678, Aves Islands Shipwreck, 289
 - June 10, 1678, Grammont's Maracaibo Campaign, 289
- Irregular Warfare (1679–1688), 291
- Interwar Years (1730–1738), 377
- War of Jenkins's Ear, Later King George's War (1739–1748), 381
 - March 2, 1743, La Guaira, 398
 - April 26, 1743, Puerto Cabello, 399
- Spanish American Disturbances (1748–1754), 412
- Undeclared Hispano-Portuguese Conflict (1776–1777), 449
- Napoleonic Wars (1803–1810), 558
 - April 27, 1806, Miranda's Landing, 565
- Latin American Insurgencies (1808–1826), 577
 - July 5, 1811, The First Republic, 589
 - March 10, 1812, Monteverde's Counteroffensive, 591
 - May 17, 1813, The "Admirable Campaign", 599
 - June 15, 1814, La Puerta (First Battle), 605
 - December 4, 1814, Urica, 606
 - Early April 1815, Royalist Resurgence, 607
 - August 10, 1816, MacGregor's March, 611
 - January 28, 1817, Mucuritas, 614
 - February 8, 1817, Siege of Barcelona, 614
 - April 8, 1817, San Félix, 617
 - July 14, 1817, Margarita Counteroffensive, 619
 - August 2, 1817, Cabrián, 619
 - December 2, 1817, La Hogaza, 621
 - February 6, 1818, Calabozo, 623
 - March 14, 1818, Maracay, 623
 - March 15, 1818, La Puerta (or Semen Valley), 624
 - March 26, 1818, Ortiz, 624
 - May 2, 1818, Cojedes, 626
 - May 19, 1818, Los Patos, 627
 - October 31, 1818, Cariaco, 628
 - June 12, 1819, Cantaura, 631
 - May 12, 1821, Guatire, 643
 - May 24, 1821, Márquez, 644
 - June 23, 1821, Calvario, 645
 - June 24, 1821, Carabobo, 645
- Filibusterism (1852–1860), 776
- German Overtures (1890–1897), 897
- Police Actions (1901–1920), 923
 - December 9, 1902, Venezuelan Blockade, 924
- Isolated Upheavals (1921–1939), 973
- World War II (1939–1945), 1005
 - February 16, 1942, Caribbean Theater, 1011
- Latin American Troubles (1941–1989), 1019
 - April 9, 1948, "Bogotazo", 1023
- Post-Cold War Era (1990–Present), 1083

Index

Note: Page numbers in italic refer to sidebar text.

9/11, 1089–1090

Abbott, Richard, 349, 350

Abercrombie, Robert, 520

Abercromby, James, 422, 423

Abercromby, Ralph, 551, 553

Abete, Hugo, 1058

Abraham, Robert, 126

Abreu, Francisco Pedro de, 717

Abreu, José de, 611–612

Abreu Prego, Luiz de, 380

Abu Bakr, Yasin, 1083

Abundio de Jesús Rosales Flores, José

Antonio, 832

Acadian campaign, 315–316

Acapulco, 599, 785

Aceituno, Mateo, 44, 79

Acha, Mariano, 734

Achilles, Albrecht, 1012

Ackland, John, 486

Acosta, Baldomero, 937

Acosta, Miguel de, 122

Acosta García, Julio, 938

Aculco, battle at, 585

Acuña, Rodrigo de, 75

Adair, John, 691

Adams, John, 553, 553, 556

Adams, John Quincy, 898

Adams, Samuel, 467, 468

Adams, William, 142

Ade, Ellen, 125

Adey, John, 142, 143

Adlercreutz, Friedrich de, 646

Admirable Campaign, 599–600

Adorno, José, 112

Adriaanszoon, Abraham, 225

Adriaanszoon, Jan, 278

Adriaensen, Hayman, 257

Adriaenszoon, Adriaen, 175

Aernouts, Jurriaen, 277, 279

Affleck, Edmond, 501

Affleck, William, 546

African American soldiers, 814

Agarotti, Pedro, 1042

Agé, Pierre, 543

Agosti, Orlando Ramón, 1047

Agreda, Pedro de, 97

Agualongo, Agustín, 654, 655

Agüeybana, Chief, 12

Aguir, Luis de, 438

Aguilar, Bartolomé de, 48

Aguilar, Cándido, 955

Aguilar, Gerónimo de, 23

Aguilar, Manuel, 720

Aguilar y Santa Cruz, Juan de, 441

Aguirre, Elías, 883

Aguirre, Francisco, 841

Aguirre, Jesús M., 988

Aguirre, José, 374

Aguirre, Juan de, 110

Aguirre Ford, battle at, 629

Aguirre y Salinas, Osmín, 1021

Ahualulco de los Pinos, battle at, 789

Aimbiré, Chief, 92

Ainza, Agustín, 779

Aircraft carriers, 974

Al-Musawi, Abbas, 1084

Alabama claims, 808

Alabama Indians, 345, 349

Alaminos, Antón de, 21

Alamo, battle at, 724, 725 (map)

Alanar, Chief, 445

Alarcón, Tomás Laureano de, 345

Alarcón y Molina, Alonso de, 184

Alazán, battle at, 600–601

Albemarle, Lord (French and Indian War), 435–440

Alberdín, Juan de, 160

Albornoz, Rodrigo de, 40

Albuquerque Coelho de Carvalho,

Antônio de, 360

Albuquerque Maranhão, Antônio de, 190, 191

Alburquerque, Francisco Fernández de la Cueva Enríquez, Duque de, 340

Alcalá, Antonio de, 346

Alcalde, Joaquín, 946

Alcántara, Francisco Martín de, 48, 69

Alcázar, Baltasar de, 374

Alcega, Diego de, 113

Aldama, Juan, 617

Aldana, José, 247

Aldao, José Félix, 641, 713

Alderete, Miguel de, 510

Aldunate, Jerónimo de, 87

Aldunate, Santiago, 638

Alejos, Roberto, 1031

Alemán, Pablo, 728

Alencastre, Joaquim Antonio, 702

Alessandri, Arturo, 975, 976

Aleutian Islands, 1015, 1015 (map), 1017–1018

Alexander, E. P., 815

Alexander, Edmund B., 765

Alexander, William, Jr., 210, 211

Alexander VI, Pope, 5

Alexis, Nord, 929

Alfaro, Baltasar de, 202

Alfinger (Talfinger, Dalfinger), Ambrosio de, 57, 58–59, 59 (map)

Alfonsín, Raúl, 1048, 1057

Alfonso, Luis, 343

Alhóndiga de Granaditas, 582, 584 (illus.)

Alihuatá (Paraguay), battle at, 994

Allemand, Zacharie Jacques Théodore, Comte, 552

Allen, Edward, 385

Allen, Ethan, 470

Allen, J. D., 971

Allen, John, 669

Allen, John Carter, 432, 434

Allen, William, 328

Allende Gossens, Salvador, 1043, 1045, 1046 (illus.)

Allende y Unzaga, José Ignacio María de, 582, 587

Allerton, Isaac, 282

Alleyne, James, 868

Allison, Robert, 292, 293–294, 333

Almada, Héctor Ignacio, 988

Almada, Lourenço de, 355

Almagro, Diego de, 18, 46–47, 49, 50, 51, 55

Almagro, Diego de (the Younger), 69–70

Almansa, Luis de, 16

- Almazán, Juan Andrew, 989
 Almeida Albuquerque, Pedro de, 186
 Almonte, Juan Nepomuceno, 744, 747, 784, 826–827, 828
 Alms, James, 434
 Alquiza, Sancho de, 154
 Alsina Maza, Adolfo, 872
 Alsogaray, Julio, 1038
 Altamirano, Luis, 975
 Altamirano–Harrison Treaty, 927
 Alvarado, Alonso de, 54–55, 70, 71
 Alvarado, Gonzalo, 39, 40
 Alvarado, Jorge, 39, 40
 Alvarado, Juan B., 746
 Alvarado, Rudecindo, 615
 Alvarado, Salvador, 966
 Alvarado Xicoténcatl, Leonor, 39
 Alvarado y Contreras, Pedro de, 39, 40 (illus.), 69; in Guatemala, 39–40; and Mexico, 22, 24–38, 37; in Peru, 50, 51–52
 Alvarado y Guzmán, Martín de, 227
 Álvares Cabral, Pedro, 7–8
 Álvares Correia, Doigo, 76
 Álvares da Costa, Manoel, 356
 Alvarez, Donato, 871
 Álvarez, Felipe, 946, 947
 Alvarez, José Justo, 789, 793, 827, 828
 Alvarez, Juan, 649, 660, 701
 Alvarez, Manuel Bernardo, 607
 Álvarez, Miguel, 951
 Alvarez Chico, Rodrigo, 25
 Alvarez de Arenales, Juan Antonio, 706
 Álvarez de Avilés, Juan, 151, 151–152
 Alvarez de Pineda, Alonso, 26
 Álvarez de Toledo, Fernando (Duque de Alva), 98, 110
 Alvarez de Toledo, José María, 601
 Alvarez del Valle, Jerónimo, 345
 Alvargonzález y Sánchez, Claudio Román, 849
 Alvear, Carlos María de, 565, 565, 605, 606, 637, 702, 709
 Alvear y Salazar, Gaspar de, 156
 Alwyn, Patricio, 1083
 Alzamora, José Canis, 352
 Alzola, Tomás de, 120
 Alzuru, Juan E., 713
 Amador, Juan Valentín, 723
 Amador, Manuel, 927
 Amaral, Bento do, 355
 Amaya, Juan Gualberto, 989
 Amazon Delta, 161, 163–164, 167, 170, 174, 178, 196, 213–214
 Amazon River, charting the, 193
 Amengual, Santiago, 886
 Amezquita, Baltasar de, 178
 Amezquita y Quijano, Juan de, 171, 190
 Amherst, Jeffery, 421, 422, 423, 431, 444
 Amherst, William, 441
 Amon, Nicolas, 289
 Ampudia, Pedro, 746
 Anacaona, 10
 Añasco, Juan de, 44
 Anaya, Atilano de, 71
 Anaya, Gómez de, 59
 Anaya, Jorge Isaac, 1059
 Anaya, Leonardo, 1047
 Anaya, Luis, 946
 Anaya, Pedro María, 765
 Ancón de Refriegas, 150–151
 Anda, Sebastián de, 212
 Andagoya, Pascual de, 18, 45
 Anderson, John, 323
 Anderson, Robert, 797
 Andonaegui y la Plaza, José de (Marqués de Valdelirios), 413, 414
 Andrade y Colmenero, Juan de, 160
 Andresito, 611–613
 Andrews, Adolphus, 1011
 Andrews, Thomas, 406, 408, 417
 Andriessen, Maerten, 273
 Andrieszoon, Michiel, 298, 300
 Andujar, Martín de, 273
 Angaco, battle at, 734–735
 Angamos, battle at, 882–883
 Ángeles, Felipe, 944, 948, 951, 952, 955, 958, 963, 964
 Angell, Henry, 434
 Anglo–Dutch War, First, 209, 248
 Anglo–Powhatan Wars, 152–153, 209–210, 223
 Ango, Jean, 75
 Anguilla, 253
 Angulo, Apolonio, 832
 Angulo, José, 605
 Angulo, Vicente, 605
 Annapolis Royal (Nova Scotia), 401
 Anne, Princess (England), 337
 Anne, Queen (France), 226
 Anson, George, 388, 390, 393–394, 395, 407
 Antequera y Castro, José de, 374
 Antietam, battle of, 811
 Antigua, 256, 361
 Antón, San Juan de, 109
 Antonelli, Batista, 132, 137
 Antonelli, Giovanni Batista (Juan Bautista), 132, 141, 150, 167, 194
 Antonio, Juan, 104
 Anza, Juan Bautista de, 381
 Anzoátegui, José Antonio, 611, 634
 Appleton, Samuel, 281
 Appling, Daniel, 681
 Appomattox Court House (Virginia), 824
 Aquino (Elguino), Andrés de, 112
 Aquino (Elguino), Pedro de, 111
 Arago, Juan, 723
 Aramberri, José Silvestre, 788
 Aramburu Clivet, Pedro Eugenio, 1029, 1042, 1042
 Arana, Diego de, 3
 Arana, Francisco Javier, 1021, 1024
 Arana, Pedro de, 127
 Arambóia, Martim Afonso, 90, 91
 Aranda, Saturnino, 841
 Aranha, German Máximo de Sousa, 706
 Aranha de Vasconcelos, Luís, 163
 Araribóia, Martim Afonso, 96, 99
 Araucano independence, 372
 Araujo, Arturo, 979
 Araujo, Leonardo Márquez, 788
 Araújo, Manoel de, 208
 Araya, 132, 163; massacre at, 150–151
 Arbenz Guzmán, Jacobo, 1021, 1024, 1026, 1027, 1040
 Arbuthnot, Marriot, 498, 507, 513
 Arce, Francisco, 841
 Arce, Manuel José de, 604
 Arce Gómez, Luis, 1055
 Archibald, Adams, 869
 Archiniega, Sancho de, 95, 96
 Arcisweski, Christoffel d'Artischa, 182, 185, 189, 190, 191, 192
 Arcos Moreno, Alonso de, 394, 409
 Arenales, Alvarez de, 581, 639–641, 643, 647, 661
 Arenas, Jacobo (Luis Morantes), 1088
 Arencibia, Sebastián de, 132, 133
 Arévalo, Eduardo G., 831, 832, 833
 Arévalo, Juan José, 1021
 Argall, Samuel, 155
 Argañaraz, Pantaleón, 705
 Argentina: Beagle Channel dispute, 1051, 1052–1053; “Dirty War,” 1047–1048; and the Falklands Campaign, 1059–1077, 1067 (map), 1074 (map); Indian Wars in, 871, 874–876; sociopolitical unrest in, 977, 978, 1020–1029 passim, 1035, 1038–1051 passim, 1057, 1058, 1083; territory dispute with Chile, 1030; terrorist attacks in, 1084, 1086; and World War II, 1020, 1021
 Argote, Diego, 438
 Argüelles, Rodrigo de, 144
 Argumedo, Benjamín, 941, 946, 947, 949
 Arias, Arnulfo, 1040
 Arias, Desiderio, 935, 936
 Arias, Joaquín, 582
 Arias, José Inocencio, 873–874, 875
 Arias, Manuel Eduardo, 616
 Arias, Roberto, 1031
 Arias de Avila, Pedro (“Pedrarias Dávila”), 17, 18–19, 19, 20, 39, 40, 46
 Arias de Sotelo, Gaspar, 72
 Arias Madrid, Arnulfo “El Hombre,” 1020, 1024
 Arias Madrid, Harmodio, 978
 Arias Montano, Benito, 162, 182, 186
 Arias Montano, Bernardo, 188, 194
 Arias Paredes, Francisco, 978

- Arica (Chile), 108, 297, 886–887, 886 (illus.)
 Arismendi, Juan Bautista, 604, 613
 Arista, Mariano, 730, 749, 751
 Aristide, Jean Bertrand, 499
 Aristide, Jean-Bertrand, 1084, 1087, 1090
 Aristizábal, Gabriel de, 537
 Arkansas Post, battle at, 812
 Armada de Barlovento, 266
 Armada del Mar Océano, 167–169
 Armendáriz, Martín Francisco de, 123
 Armiger, Robert, 425
 Armijo, Gabriel, 604
 Armijo, Manuel, 700, 755
 Armistead, George, 689
 Armstrong, James, 748
 Armstrong, John, 484
 Arnaldo de Isasi, Cristóbal, 233–234, 243
 Arnold, Benedict, 468, 474, 484, 486, 508; Danbury raid, 480; defection, 506, 508, 514; at Fort Stanwix, 482; and Quebec, 470, 472, 474; and Valcour battle, 476, 477–478
 Arnold, L. G., 807
 Arosca, Chief, 11
 Arosemena, Alcibiades, 1024
 Arosemena, Florencio Harmodio, 978
 Arraial do Bom Jesus, 190, 191
 Arrate Larraín, Miguel, 900, 901
 Arratia, José de, 380
 Arroya, Francisco de, 198
 Arredondo, José Miguel, 861, 870, 871, 873, 874
 Arredondo y Muñiz, Joaquín de, 588
 Arregui, Juan, 375
 Arrellano, Manuel Ramírez, 787
 Arrieta, Felipe, 995, 997
 Arris, Robert, 357
 Arron, Henck A. E., 1054
 Arroyo, Alejandro de, 438
 Arroyo, Gabriel, 923
 Arroyo, Juan de, 172
 Arroyo Grande, battle at, 737
 Arroyo Manantial, battle at, 782–783
 Arroyo Pantanoso, battle at, 738
 Arroyo Sauce, battle at, 738, 870
 Arteaga, Aparicio de, 123
 Arteaga, José María, 790, 827, 836
 Arteaga, Luis, 884
 Arthur, Robert, 321
 Artigas, José Gervasio, 587, 590, 637
 Arundell, James, 241
 Ashe, John, 492
Asientos, 363
 Asorio y Herreras, Antonio, 450
 Assumar, Pedro de Almeida, Conde de, 372
 Astgrad, Berón de, 731
 Astiz, Alfredo, 1059
 Atacama Desert, 880
 Atahualpa, Chief, 48–49, 53
 Ataíde, António de, 77
 Atascoso, battle at, 601
 Atenquique, battle at, 789
 Atlacatl the Elder, 40
 Atlacatl the Younger, 40
 Atlanta (Georgia), Union advance on, 819
 Attu Island, 1015, 1017–1018, 1017 (illus.)
 Aubarede y Bouyón, Serafín de, 849
 Aubert, Claude, 548
 Aubert, Trucy, 947
 Auchmuty, Samuel, 568, 569–570, 572
 Auger, Charles, 320, 324
 Auger, Sieur, 227
 Augiers, Chevalier des, 328, 329
 Augramert, Chief, 150
 Auguste, Tancred, 932
 Austin, Hudson, 1078, 1080
 Austin, Stephen F., 721
 Avahy, battle at, 863
 Ávalos, Eduardo J., 1021–1022
 Avellaneda, Nicolás, 872, 875
 Aves Islands shipwreck, 289
 Avila, Alonso de, 22, 24
 Ávila, Sebastián de, 171
 Avilez, Jorge, 649
 Avril, Prosper, 1058, 1083
 Axe, Andrew, 221
 Axe, Samuel, 220, 223
 Ayacucho, battle at, 658–659, 659 (map)
 Ayala, Eusebio, 973, 981–982, 990
 Ayala, Juan (Argentina), 872, 874
 Ayala, Juan B. (Paraguay), 994, 996
 Ayala, Ramón, 638
 Ayessa, Juan de, 500
 Aymard, Edouard Alphonse Antoine, Baron de, 833
 Aymerich, Melchor, 640, 647–648, 651
 Ayohuma, battle at, 602–603, 602 (map)
 Ayora, Juan de, 18
 Ayscue, George, 227–228
 Ayspuru, Alonso de, 178
 Ayubale, massacre at, 346
 Azevedo, Belchior de, 91
 Azevedo, Dionísio António de, 379
 Azevedo, Salvador de, 179
 Azopardo, Juan Bautista, 587
 Aztecs, 23, 24–38
 Baas, Pieter, 200
 Backer, Albertus, 550
 Bacon, Nathaniel, 282–283
 Bacon's Rebellion, 282–283
 Badajoz, Gonzalo de, 15, 19
 Badger, Charles J., 950
 Baez, Bernardino, 739, 741
 Bagnuoli, Giovanni Vincenzo de San Felice, Conde de, 182, 189, 191, 192, 193–194
 Bahamas, 367, 370, 524, 526; American raid on, 473; English colonization of, 225; Franco-Spanish attack on, 345–346
 Bahamón de Lugo, Francisco, 92
 Bahamonde, Francisco Cosío, 785
 Baía de Todos os Santos, 119, 208
 Baião de Abreu, Pedro, 213
 Baibiene, Santiago, 870
 Bailey, Theodore, 769
 Bainbridge, John, 214
 Bainbridge, William, 692
 Baird, David, 565
 Baja California, 44, 378
 Baker, Edward D., 802
 Baker, Thomas, 713
 Bakker, Pieter, 278
 Balaguer, Joaquín, 1038
 Balboa, Vasco Núñez de, 12, 14, 15; execution of, 19, 20; as governor, 16, 18–20; and the Pacific, 17, 18
 Balcarce, García, 582, 584
 Balcarce, Juan Ramón, 629, 636
 Balcarce, Marcos, 624
 Balcarres, Earl of, 486
 Baley, Henry, 333
 Ball, Thomas, 425, 427
 Ballesteros, José María, 832
 Balliván Rojas, Hugo, 1025
 Balmaceda Fernández, José Manuel, 898, 901, 902, 903–904
Baltimore incident, 904
 Bamfield, John, 248
 Bananco, General, 615
 Bandala, Abraham, 879
 Bandeira de Melo, Filipe, 206
 Bandeville de Saint Périer, Anne Henry de, 362
 Banhos, Tomaz, 379
 Bankert, Adriaan, 278
 Bankhead, James, 764
 Banks, Francis, 434, 440
 Banks, Nathaniel P., 808, 814
 Bannister, Joseph, 307, 309
 Baños, Juan José, 959
 Banzer, Carlos, 996
 Bánzer Suárez, Hugo, 1044, 1051
 Baptista de Leão, Joaquim Marques, 930
 Baptiste, Suzan Simon, 541
 Baquedano, Manuel, 885, 885, 886–888, 889, 903
 Barail, François Charles du, 832
 Barba, Antonio, 396
 Barba, Antonio Rodrigues Fernandes, 715
 Barbacena, Filisberto Caldeira Brant Pontes, Marqués de, 706
 Barbados, 227–228, 248–249
 Barbalho Bezerra, Luís, 186
 Barbary Wars: First, 556, 556; Second, 692
 Barbosa, Orozimbo, 902
 Barbudo, Antonio, 101

- Barbuzzi, Humberto J., 1053
 Barcelona, siege of, 614–615
 Bárcenas, Victoriano, 963
 Barker, Andrew, 105, 106
 Barker, Nicholas, 1059
 Barkley, Andrew, 499
 Barlow, John, 425, 426
 Barnes, William, 287
 Barnett, George, 931
 Barney, Joshua, 685
 Barnsley, Henry, 421
 Barnwell, John, 360, 363
 Barradas, Isidro, 635, 699
 Barranca Seca, battle at, 828–829
 Barras de Saint Laurent, Louis Jacques, Comte de, 488, 514, 517, 521
 Barrau du Perret, Jean, 77
 Barré, Nicolas, 91
 Barreaut, Michel-Pierre, 554
 Barreda, Rodrigo de la, 324
 Barreiro, Ernesto, 1057
 Barreiro, José María, 631
 Barrera, Antonio Imbert, 1038
 Barrera, Pedro, 1030
 Barreto, Antonio, 451
 Barreto, Joao Paulo dos Santos, 717
 Barreto, Mena, 612, 701, 978
 Barreto de Meneses, Francisco, 204–207, 208–209
 Barrett, James, 467
 Barrett, Robert, 97, 126
 Barreyro, José Luis, 374
 Barrientos, René, 1039, 1041
 Barrington, John, 426
 Barrington, Samuel, 415, 489
 Barrios, Vicente, 859
 Barrios de Chamorro, Violeta, 1055
 Barron, James, 571
 Barros, Cardoso de, 104
 Barros de San Millán, Manuel, 127
 Barros Luco, Ramón, 898–899, 901
 Barroso, Julián, 370
 Barroso Pereira, Luís, 704
 Barroto, Juan Enrique, 306, 310
 Barrow, Michael, 1076
 Barrow, Thomas, 554
 Barrutia, Ignacio, 372
 Barry, John, 488
 Barry, Samuel, 243
 Barton, Clara, 912
 Barton, Matthew, 434
 Barton, Robert, 552, 574
 Basadre, José Ignacio, 700
 Bascom, George, 844
 Basden, James, 679
 Baskerville, Thomas, 136, 137
 Bastaert, Rochus, 257
 Bastidas, Micaela, 526
 Bastidas, Rodrigo de, 65
 Batenburg, B. A., 559
 Batista, Fulgencio, 981, 1024, 1027, 1030
 Batlle, Lorenzo, 863
 Battet, Robert Marie-Joseph, 1018
 Battle of La Belle Famille, 430
 Baudin, Charles, 729, 730
 Bauffremont, Joseph de (Prince de Listenois), 420
 Baum, Friedrich, 482
 Bausá, Manuel, 625
 Bauvais, Louis-Jacques, 533
 Bauzes, José, 450
 Bavia, Ángel, 998
 Bay of Fundy campaign, 415–417
 Bay of Pigs, 1034–1035
 Bayahá, 113
 Bayne, William, 425, 434, 523
 Baynes, Edward, 672–673
 Baynes, Robert Lambert, 731
 Bayntun, William Henry, 547
 Bayona Villanueva, Pedro de, 244
 Bayona y Chacón, José, 376
 Bazaine, François Achille, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834–835
 Bazán, Álvaro de, Sr., 82, 90, 110
 Beach, Edward Latimer, 933, 936
 Beagle Channel confrontation, 1052–1053
 Beale, Thomas, 509, 691
 Beamish, T. P. H., 970
 Beanes, William, 688
 Beare, John Philip, 328
 Bearss, Hiram, 936
 Beauchesne, Jacques Gouin de, 334
 Beauclerk, Aubrey, 389, 391
 Beauharnois, Charles de, 406
 Beauharnois, François de Beaumont, Comte de, 425–426, 427
 Beaumont y Navarra, Felipe de, 141
 Beauregard, Charles François Le Vasseur de, 325, 326
 Beauregard, Pierre G. T., 765, 799, 807, 819–820; Army of the Mississippi and, 804; at Bull Run, 800; at Fort Sumter, 797; at Shiloh, 805
 Beaussier de l'Isle, Louis Joseph, 418, 419
 Beauve, Pierre de Rémy, Chevalier de, 359
 Beaver, Philip, 574, 578
 Becerra, Diego, 43
 Becerril, Luis B., 950
 Beck, Matias, 209
 Beckford, Peter, 327
 Beckman, Manuel, 302
 Beckman, Tomás, 302
 Beckwith, George, 574, 575
 Becquart, Pieter, 231
 Bedford, John, 127
 Beecher, Frederick H., 845
 Beecher Island, battle at, 845
 Beers, Richard, 281
 Beeston, William, 252, 325, 326
 Béhaugue, Jean-Pierre Antoine de, 532
 Beirut barracks bombings, 1079
 Béjar, Gabriel, 605
 Belalcázar, Sebastián de, 63, 64–65
 Belaúnde Terry, Fernando, 1040
 Belém (Brazil), 161, 162, 302
 Belfor, Álvaro, 893
 Belgrano, Manuel, 582, 586, 593, 594, 594 (illus.), 595; at Ayohuma, 602–603; at Salta, 597–598; at Tacuari, 587; at Tucumán, 595–596; at Vilcapugio, 602
 Belisle, Pablo, 876
 Belize, 376, 377, 378, 381, 409, 412, 414; battle at, 497–498; independence, 1055; O'Neill at, 554; sociopolitical unrest in, 1090
 Bell, F. S., 1006
 Bell, J. Franklin, 928
 Bell, William, 301
 Bellamy, Pierre, 553
 Bellwood, Roger, 331
 Belton, F. S., 764
 Beltrán de Guzmán, Nuño, 41
 Beluché, Renato, 691
 Bemis Heights, battle at, 486
 Benavente, José M., 638
 Benavides, Oscar R., 658, 933
 Benavides y Bazán, Juan de, 178
 Benavidez, Nazario, 734
 Benavidez, Vicente, 638
 Benazar, Rafael, 552
 Benbow, John, 334, 337, 340–341, 341
 Bendes, William, 123
 Bénech, Gilles, 544
 Beneski, Carlos, 700
 Benham, Timothy G., 755
 Benítez de Lugo, Pedro Nicolás, 343
 Bennett, John, 279
 Bennett, Juan P., 975
 Bennett, Kenneth, 935
 Bennington, battle at, 482
 Benson, Perry, 514
 Bent, Charles, 762
 Benteen, Frederick, 846–847
 Berbeo, Juan Francisco, 527
 Berbice (Guyana), 443–444
 Berderod, Luiz Antônio, 380
 Berenguer, Francisco, 618
 Beresford, John Poo, 554
 Beresford, William Carr, 566
 Bergeire, Juan B., 728
 Berkeley, George, 385
 Berkeley, John, 140, 141
 Berkeley, Velters Cornwall, 548
 Berkeley, William, 259, 282–283
 Bermejo, Juan, 71
 Bermuda, 153, 154, 154
 Bermúdez, José Francisco, 597, 606, 627–628, 644, 645
 Bermúdez, Pedro Ignacio, 436
 Bernadou, J. B., 909

- Bernal Zazueta, Heraclio, 878
 Bernáldez, Lorenzo, 91
 Bernanos, Jean, 302, 327
 Bernard, Antoine, 300
 Bernard, Joseph, 488
 Bernardes, Artur da Silva, 975
 Bernardson, Albert, 248
 Berra, Francisco, 756
 Berranger, P., 559
 Berriozábal, Felipe, 828
 Berro, Bernardo Prudencio, 854, 863
 Berry, Edward, 564
 Berry, Elbridge, 553
 Berry, John, 257, 258, 283, 285
 Berry, Richard C., 1078
 Berthelot de Beaucours, Josué, 365
 Berthier de Grandry, François, 830, 831
 Bertie, Thomas, 551
 Best, Hendrik, 172
 Best, Richard, 130
 Betancourt, Rómulo, 1022, 1023, 1030
 Betancur Cuartas, Belisario, 1056
 Bethell, Richard, 1077
 Beveren, Hubert de, 236
 Bezares, Guide de, 88
 Bezerra, Barbalho, 191, 194, 197
 Biamby, Philippe, 1086
 Bianchi, Giuseppe, 605
 Biassou, Georges, 532
 Bicknell, Thomas, 250
 Biddle, Nicholas, 487
 Bienville, Jean-Baptiste Le Moyne de, 345, 349, 351, 369
 Bierce, Ambrose, 948
 Big Bear, Chief, 891–892
 Big Foot, Chief, 849
 Bigalk, Gerhard, 1011, 1013
 Bigelow, Abraham, 767
 Bilbao, Manuel, 499
 Bilbao Rioja, Bernardino, 992–993, 994, 998, 1001
 Billingham, Guillermo, 933
 Bin Laden, Osama, 1089–1090
 Binckes, Jacob, 275, 285; campaign by, 283–284, 283 (map); at New York, 276; at Tobago, 286, 288
 Birge, John Ward, 721
 Biscayan Company, 412
 Bishop, Maurice, 1077
 Bismarck, Otto von, 897
 Bispo, Marcelino, 897
 Bissell, Daniel, 689
 Bissell, Richard M., 1035
 Bissell, William H., 763
 Bisshopp, Cecil, 669, 674
 Bittencourt, Carlos Machado, 896–897
 Black, John, 753
 Black, William, 678
 Black Hawk, 694
 Blackbird, massacre by, 667
 Bladensburg, battle at, 685–686
 Blagg, Edward, 232
 Blair, William, 523
 Blake, Benjamin, 232
 Blake, F. J., 753
 Blakeney, William, 391
 Blakiston, Nathaniel, 317, 320, 324
 Blancarte, José María, 787
 Blanco, Julián, 948
 Blanco, Lucio, 950, 953
 Blanco, Miguel, 776, 789
 Blanco Galindo, Carlos, 977
 Blanco y Arenas, Ramón, 907
 Bland, Loftus Otway, 559
 Blauvelt, Abraham, 204
 Blauvelt, Willem Albertszoon, 204
 Bleichrodt, Heinrich, 1009
 Bligh, John, 544
 Blommart, John, 514
 Blondel, Jean, 123
 Blondel, Nicolas François, 255, 256, 257
 Blondel, Robert, 84
 Bloys van Treslong, H. O., 559
 Bluefields (Nicaragua), battle at, 983
 Blunden, Robert, 243
 Bobadilla, Francisco de, 8, 9, 10
 Bobo, Rosalvo, 934, 935
 Bocquet, Vincent, 84–85
 Boermans, Cornelis, 278
 Boerstler, Charles G., 669, 673
 Boes, Nikolaas, 276
 Bogaert, Gerart, 256
 “Bogotazo,” 1023
 Böhm, Johann Heinrich, 449
 Bois Caïman, rebellion at, 532
 Bois le Compte le Meaux, Sieur de (Paris Legendre), 86
 Boisseret d’Herblay, Charles de, 231
 Bolaños Chamorro, Frutos, 930
 Boles, John, 425
 Bolívar, Simón, 565, 597, 601, 607, 610, 612, 631, 651–652, 655–656; Admirable Campaign of, 599–600, 600 (map); assassination attempt on, 626; at Barcelona, 614–615; at Bomboná, 650; at Calabozo, 623; at Junín, 657; at La Puerta, 605; at Ortiz, 625
 Bolivia: and the Chaco War, 989–1002; and Ché Guevara, 1039; concentration camps in, 1026; and nationalization, 1090–1091; revolution in, 1025; sociopolitical unrest in, 977, 979, 1020, 1022, 1024, 1027, 1041, 1043, 1044, 1051, 1053, 1055
 Bolognesi, Francisco, 884, 887
 Bolton, Robert, 97
 Bolton, Thomas, 97
 Bomboná, battle at, 650
 Bompar, Maximin de, 426
 Bonachea, Domingo, 438
 Bonaire, 172, 200, 247
 Bonaparte, Joseph, 577
 Bonaparte, Napoleon, 556, 608, 608
 Bonaparte, Pauline, 543
 Bond, William, 311
 Bonet, Juan Bautista, 499–500
 Bonillas, Ignacio, 964
 Bonnard, Jean, 246
 Bont, Jan, 284
 Bontemps, Jean, 88, 97, 101
 Bonus Expeditionary Force, 979
 Booker, Alfred, 866
 Booneter, Jan Gijbsbertszoon, 181, 182
 Boquerón (Paraguay), battle at, 991
 Borchardt, Ulrich, 1011
 Borda, Juan de, 122
 Borel, Auguste, 536
 Borges, Francisco, 870
 Borges, Juan Francisco, 611
 Borges de Medeiros, Antônio Augusto, 974
 Borgoño, José M., 625
 Borja, Francisco de, 450
 Borja, Juan de, 162
 Borland, Solon, 762
 Borno, Louis, 977
 Borrallo, Gonzalo, 290
 Borrás, Colonel, 646
 Borrego, battle at, 829
 Boscawen, Edward, 383, 384, 391; and the French and Indian War, 417, 421–422, 423, 430
 Bosch, Jorge, 1042, 1043 (illus.)
 Bosch, Juan, 1042
 Bosch, Juan D., 1037
 Boston, siege of, 469
 Bostwick, Henry, 689
 Boswell, Roderick, 1073
 Bot, Pierre, 292, 304, 305
 Boteler, Henry, 321
 Botello, Andrés, 171
 Botterell, John, 434
 Bouchard, Hipólito, 587, 609
 Boucher de Labroquerie, Pierre, 431
 Bouchot, Pierre, 431
 Boudet, Jean, 543–544
 Bougainville, Louis Antoine de, 418, 427, 428, 445, 446
 Boukman Dutty, Zamba, 532–533, 534
 Bouquet, Henri, 424, 444–445
 Bourlamaque, François Charles de, 418
 Bourman, Simon, 144
 Bourne, Sampson, 357
 Bouterse, Désiré Delano, 1054–1055, 1056, 1057, 1083–1084
 Boutrouelle, Pierre-Paul, 704
 Boves, Benito, 652
 Boves, José Tomás, 607
 Bowdoin, James, 529
 Bowen, George, 523, 551
 Bowen, James, 551

- Bowen, Richard, 549
 Bowie, James, 721, 723
 Bowles, William A., 763
 Bowyer, Henry, 572
 Boxer, Edward, 731
 Boyacá, battle at, 633
 Boyd, Charles T., 961
 Boyd, John, 432, 434, 491
 Boyd, John Parker, 672
 Boyer, Henry, 577
 Boyer, Jean-Pierre, 650, 746
 Boza y Solís, Jerónimo, 353
 Braam, Jan de, 172
 Bracamonte, Agustín de, 264–265
 Braddock, Edward, 415, 417
 Bradford, David, 530
 Bradford, George, 538
 Bradford, William, 281
 Bradley, E. D., 719
 Bradley, Joseph, 265–266, 267, 270
 Bradstreet, John, 404, 424
 Brady, Hugh, 719
 Braems, Jan, 176
 Braga, Manuel, 41
 Bragg, Braxton, 811, 812, 814, 815; at Chickamauga, 817
 Bragge, James, 124
 Brandt, Frank, 969
 Brandywine, Battle of, 482–484, 483 (map)
 Brandzen, Federico de, 707
 Brannan, Sam, 775
 Brant, John, 669, 673
 Brant, Joseph, 482
 Brasiliano, Rok, 265–266, 267
 Brataville, Benoît, 938
 Bravo, Leonardo, 588, 590, 593
 Bravo, Máximo, 588
 Bravo, Miguel, 588, 591, 603
 Bravo, Nicolás, 588, 594, 596, 609, 622, 698
 Bravo, Victor, 588
 Bravo Torres, Pedro, 1046–1047
 Bray, Arturo, 977, 991
 Bray, William, 363
 Brayne, William, 322
 Brazil: collapse of empire, 892; empire in, 652; military coup in, 1037–1038; naval rebellion, 893–894; penitentiary revolt, 1084; Portuguese claims, 76–78; “revolt against the lash,” 930; sociopolitical unrest in, 927, 974–975, 977–978, 980, 981, 982, 1022, 1027, 1028–1029; and World War II, 1016, 1016
 Breese, Samuel L., 766
 Bréhal, Captain, 292, 299
 Breitt, Percy, 394
 Brenton, Edward Pelham, 573
 Brereton, Robert, 558
 Brétigny, Charles Poncet, Seigneur de, 201
 Breugnon, Pierre-Claude Hocdenau, Comte de, 435
 Brewster, Adam, 265
 Breymann, Heinrich, 482, 486
 Brian de Foussieres-Founteneuille, Amable, 837
 Briar Creek, battle at, 492
 Brice, Robert, 434
 Briceño, Antonio Nicolás, 599
 Briceño, Francisco Corneiles, 200
 Bridgar, John, 306
 Bridge, Tobias, 257, 273
 Bridges, Timothy, 352, 353
 Brigaut, Nicolas, 304, 306
 Brincourt, Auguste Henri, 830, 833–834, 836
 Brine, James, 538
 Bringas, Juan, 723
 Brion, Philippus Ludovicus (Felipe Luis), 618, 648
 Brisbane, Charles, 568
 Brisbane, John Douglas, 521
 Brisbane, Matthew, 714
 Brisbane, Thomas, 687
 British Legion, 632
 Brito, Diogo Jorge de, 704
 Brito, Elzeário de Miranda, 717
 Brito Freire, Francisco de, 209
 Briuto, Antero Ferreira, 716
 Brock, Isaac, 666
 Broderick, Edward, 721
 Brodie, David, 408
 Broke, Philip Bowes Vere, 673
 Bromley, Henry, 140
 Brooke, Arthur, 689
 Brooke, John R., 919
 Brooks, Caesar, 352
 Broom, George, 706
 Brough, John, 123, 129
 Brouncker, Lord Henry, 258
 Brouwer, Hendrik, 201
 Brown, Charles, 382, 383–384
 Brown, George, 902
 Brown, Jacob, 667, 673, 682, 684
 Brown, John, 470, 797
 Brown, Joseph R., 844, 845
 Brown, Luis Alberto, 1073
 Brown, Marshal, 709
 Brown, Nicholas, 370
 Brown, Thomas, 504
 Brown, Thomas Storror, 718
 Brown, William “Guillermo,” 604
 Browne, Edward, 548
 Browne, Montfort, 473
 Browne, Nathaniel, 323
 Brownson, Willard H., 894
 Bruce, Luis, 978
 Bruce, Miguel, 658
 Bruno, Miguel, 768
 Brunswick, Karl Wilhelm, Duke of, 535
 Brunswick, Ronnie, 1057
 Bruyère, Joseph Bernard, 487
 Bryan, Morgan, 504
 Bryan, William Jennings, 933, 950, 954
 Bryer, Wyndham, 548
 Buatachive (Mexico), battle at, 878
 Bucareli, Antonio de, 447
 Bucareli, Francisco, 448
 Buccaneers, 215, 294 (map), 320 (map)
 Buceli, Francisco, 650
 Buchanan, Franklin, 768, 804, 821
 Buchanan, Richard, 986
 Buck, Thomas, 681
 Buckingham, George Villiers, Duke of, 210, 211
 Buckle, Matthew, 408
 Buckner, Charles, 523
 Buckner, Simon Bolivar, 803
 Buell, Don Carlos, 804, 805, 811, 812
 Buelna, Rafael, 966
 Buena Vista, battle at, 763–764, 763 (map)
 Buenaventura, Juan de, 9
 Buendía, Juan, 882, 883–884
 Bueno da Ribeira, Amador, 158
 Buenos Aires, 451; assault on, 571–572, 875; founding of, 110; French blockade of, 731; siege of, 780
 Buford, Abraham, 501–502
 Buford, John, 815
 Buitrón, Ignacio, 827
 Bule, Luis, 922
 Bulger, W. Andrew, 687
 Bulkeley, Richard, 499
 Bull Run: First Battle of, 800, 801 (map); Second Battle of, 809–811, 810 (map)
 Bullet, Jeannot, 532
 Bulloch, James D., 808
 Bullock, James W., 721
 Bulmer, Roscoe, 936
 Bulnes, Manuel, 882
 Bulnes Prieto, Manuel, 713, 728
 Bunckley, John, 256
 Bunker Hill, 468–469
 Burgess, Thomas, 367
 Burgh, John, 127
 Burgoyne, John, 468, 474, 480, 481, 484, 486
 Burgwin, J. H. K., 762
 Burke, Arleigh, 1035
 Burleson, Edward, 722
 Burn, James, 673
 Burnet, Robert, 121
 Burnett, Thomas, 425, 434
 Burnside, Ambrose E., 803, 813, 815, 821; at Antietam, 811; at Fredericksburg, 812
 Burton, Henry S., 769
 Busch, Germán, 994, 995, 1000
 Bush, George W., 1081, 1090
 Bushnell, David, 477

- Busser, Carlos Alberto, 1060, 1062
 Bustamante, Anastasio, 642, 700, 744
 Bustamante y Guerra, José de, 560
 Bustamante y Rivero, José Luis, 1023, 1024
 Bustillos, Juan, 367
 Bustos, Juan Bautista, 630
 Butler, Benjamin F., 802, 807, 814, 823, 891
 Butler, John, 482, 512
 Butler, P. M., 765
 Butler, Thomas, 326
 Butler, William O., 761
 Button, William R., 938
 Byam, William, 257
 Byron, John, 431, 445–446, 490–494

 Caaguazú, battle at, 735–736, 735 (map)
 Caamaño Deñó, Francisco, 1038, 1045
 Caballero, Bernardino, 863, 865
 Caballero Irala, Basiliano, 993, 1000
 Cabañas, 172
 Cabañas Barrientos, Lucio, 1039, 1041, 1044–1045, 1046, 1047
 Cabeliau, Abraham, 140, 141
 Cabell, Charles P., 1035
 Cabezas y Altamirano, Juan de las, 149
 Cabot, John, 6
 Cabot, Sebastian, 41, 42
 Cabral, Dionisio, 737
 Cabrera, Fernando, 526
 Cabrera, Ladislao, 880
 Cabrera Aguirre, Luis Enrique, 1084–1085
 Cabrera y Corvera, Lorenzo de, 178
 Cabreth, William, 142, 143
 Cabrián, battle at, 619–620
 Cabrito, Salvador, 447
 Cacalami, Chief, 48
 Cacama, 28
 Cáceres, Andrés Avelino, 884, 888–889
 Cáceres, João Pedro de, 196
 Cáceres Gutiérrez de Palacios, José Bernardo, 625
 Cáceres Vásquez, Ramón, 931
 Cachirí, battle at, 610
 Cadereyta, Lope Díez de Aux y Armendáriz, Marqués de, 186, 187, 214 (illus.), 266
 Cadwalader, George, 769
 Cadwallader, John, 478
 Café Filho, João, 1027, 1028
 Caffery, Jefferson, 981
 Cagancha, battle at, 733
 Cahuzac, François de Rotondy, Sieur de, 211–212
 Cajeme (José María Leyva), 877, 878
 Cajigal, Juan Manuel, 602
 Calabozo, battle at, 623
 Calatayud, Luis de, 585
 Calchines, battle at, 712
 Caldeira, Felisberto Gomes, 658
 Caldeira Castelo Branco, Francisco, 161–162
 Caldelas, Francisco, 592, 593
 Calder, Robert, 563
 Calderón, Antonio, 135
 Calderón, Balmoro, 234
 Calderón, Esteban B., 953
 Calderón, Izaías Bonifacio, 717
 Calderón, Pedro, 44
 Calderón, Ruylobo, 375
 Calderón Bridge, battle at, 586
 Calderón de Helguera, Cristóbal, 433
 Calderón Espinosa, Balmoro, 230
 Calderón Guardia, Rafael Ángel, 1022, 1023, 1027
 Caldwell, Benjamin, 523, 549
 Calendar, 111
 Calfucurá, Chief, 781, 871
 Calibee Creeks, battle at, 679
 California gold rush, 775
 Call, Richard Keith, 695
 Callado, Joao Crisótomo, 713
 Callao, 108–109, 164, 648, 656, 853–854
 Calleja del Rey, Félix María, 585 (illus.), 586, 591, 598
 Caller, James, 674
 Calles, Plutarco Elías, 954, 959, 965, 966, 983; and the Cristero War, 986, 988
 Callis, Smith, 398
 Calmady, Warwick, 403
 Calpulalpan, battle at, 793
 Calvario, battle at, 645
 Calvert, Joseph, 499
 Calvin, John, 87
 Calvo, Tito, 1020
 Calvo de Irrazábal, José, 499, 510–511
 Camacho, Ávila, 1008
 Camacho, Heliodoro, 884
 Camacho, Juan, 131
 Camacua, battle at, 708–709
 Camarão, Antônio Felipe, 191, 203, 206, 207
 Camaú (Cumahu), 213–214
 Camerone, battle at, 831
 Campa, Emilio P., 943, 946, 947
 Campbell, Archibald, 490
 Campbell, Charles, 506
 Campbell, Donald, 472
 Campbell, James, 420, 434
 Campbell, John, 473, 499, 511
 Campbell, Pedro, 630
 Campbell, Richard, 516
 Campbell, W. B., 765
 Campbell, William, 506, 512
 Campeche: attacks on, 89, 91, 139–140, 272, 290; de Graaf and Grammont's sack of, 304; Myngs's sack of, 243–244; Van Hoorn's sack of, 188
 Campero, Fernando, 612, 715, 727
 Campero, Narciso, 884, 886
 Campi, Francisco, 213
 Campillo, José, 617
 Campo, Francisco del, 143
 Campo, Juan de, 213
 Campo Elias, Vicente, 604
 Campo Via (Paraguay), battle at, 996
 Cámpora, Héctor José, 1045
 Campos, Carmelo, 870, 871, 872
 Campos, Jesús “Cheché,” 945
 Campos, Julio, 860, 861, 873
 Campos, Luis María, 871–872, 873
 Campos, Manuel J., 876
 Campos y Espinosa, Alonso de, 262, 265, 266–267
 Campuzano, Antonio, 757, 773
 Campuzano, José, 391
 Camus, Hermógenes, 900
 Cañada de Gómez, battle at, 783
 Cañada de la Cruz, battle at, 637
 Cañada Strongest (Paraguay), battle at, 998–999
 Cañada Tarija (Paraguay), battle at, 998
 Canadian rebellions, 718–719
 Canales, Colonel, 839
 Canalizo, Valentín, 747
 Cananea (Mexico), 922
 Canaris, Wilhelm, 972
 Canby, Edward R. S., 800, 824
 Cáncer, Felipe, 150
 Cancha Rayada, battle at, 624
 Cândido, João, 930
 Cañedo, Cristóbal de, 241
 Canek (“Jacinto”), 433
 Cañete, 160
 Canillas de los Torneros de Enríquez, Pedro Luis Enríquez de Sevilla, Conde de, 333–334
 Canning, George, 898
 Cano, Alonso, 84
 Cano, Juan J., 839
 Cano de Aponte, Gabriel, 372
 Canso (Nova Scotia), 401
 Cantaura, battle at, 631
 Canterac, José de, 619, 636, 642, 647, 648, 654; at Ayacucho, 659–660; at Callao, 656; at Junín, 657; at Macarona, 650; at Torata-Moquegua, 653
 Canto, Enrique, 1026
 Canudos, battle at, 896–897
 Caonabó, 3, 5, 6
 Cape Corrientes, 123
 Cape Tiburón, 122, 389
 Caperton, William B., 933, 935
 Capistrán Garza, René, 987
 Caqueray de Valmenière, Louis Gaston, 344
 Caraballo, Francisco, 863
 Carabobo, battle at, 645–646, 646 (map)
 Caracas, capture of, 134–135, 134 (map)
 Caraccioli, Héctor, 1029
 Carapani Costa, Arturo, 1048

- Carbajal, Antonio, 792
 Carbó, José Guillermo, 835, 877
 Carden, Robert, 256
 Cárdenas, Francisco, 923, 948
 Cardona Quirós, Edgar, 1024
 Cardoso de Barros, Cristóvão, 95–96
 Cardoso de Meneses y Sousa, Francisco Antônio, 445
 Cardozo, Cesáreo, 1050
 Cardross, Henry Erskine, 303
 Careta, Chief, 16, 17
 Carey, George, 123
 Carey, Isaac, 505
 Cariaco, battle at, 628
 Carib Indians, 215, 217, 218, 230–231, 235, 236, 241
 Carignan, Thomas François de Savoie, Prince de, 245
 Carignan-Salières Regiment, 245
 Carleill, Christopher, 116, 117
 Carleton, Guy, 427, 437, 438, 471–472, 475, 477
 Carlile, Charles, 300
 Carlin, William P., 802
 Carlisle, Charles, Earl of, 291
 Carloff, Hendrik, 284
 Carlota, Empress, 833, 838
 Carmichael, Hugh Lyle, 575
 Carmona, Francisco, 637
 Carmona, Jorge, 832
 Carneiro, Pedro, 208
 Carneiro da Costa, Manuel, 293
 Carneiro da Cunha, Francisco Xavier, 930
 Carneiro de Campos, Frederico, 855
 Carneiro de Figueiredo, José Manoel, 450
 Caro, Carlos, 437
 Caroon, Cornelius, 219
 Carpenter, Charles, 549
 Carpenter, Edward W., 755
 Carpenter, James, 547
 Carpenter, Louis H., 845
 Carpentier, Gervase, 208
 Carpio, Fermín, 953
 Carr, Mark, 401
 Carr, Richard, 209
 Carr, Robert, 246
 Carranza, Jesús, 955
 Carranza, Venustiano, 944, 945, 950, 951, 954, 955, 962–963; demise of, 965; and U.S. intervention, 959, 960, 961
 Carrascosa de la Torre, Alfonso, 369
 Carré, Justin, 924
 Carrera, José Miguel, 606, 637, 641, 641 (illus.), 645, 648
 Carrera, Luis, 606, 649
 Carrera Rolas, Enrique, 1034
 Carrera Torres, Alberto, 958
 Carrillo, José Antonio, 645, 757
 Carrillo, Luis, 19–20
 Carrillo, Marcos, 877–878, 879
 Carrillo Colina, Braulio, 720
 Carrión, Francisco, 835, 843
 Carrión, Ginés de, 81
 Carrizo Salvadores, Carlos, 1076
 Carroll, William, 691
 Carson, Christopher “Kit,” 757, 762
 Carta, Juan Vicente, 499
 Cartagena, 132; Drake at, 101–102, 116, 116 (map); founding of, 60, 60–61; French attacks on, 81, 88, 329–331, 330 (map); Hawkins at, 99; Indian repulse at, 13; Vernon at, 390–393, 391 (map)
 Cartagena, Juan de, 20
 Carter, Emmanuel, 1083
 Carter, Jimmy, 1053, 1055, 1084, 1086
 Carter, Thomas Wren, 731
 Cartier, Jacques, 78, 80
 Cartier, Jean-Baptiste Jacques, 548
 Cartón, Luis G., 948
 Carumbé, battle at, 612
 Carvajal, Father, 609
 Carvajal, Francisco S., 953
 Carvajal, General (Mexico), 827, 830, 838, 839
 Carvajal, Juan, 637
 Carvajal, Juan de, 66
 Carvajal, Lucas, 198
 Carvajal, Luis, 650
 Carvajal, Silvio, 1023
 Carvajal y Vargas, Diego de, 166
 Carvalho, Delfin Carlos de, 863
 Carvalho, Francisco Pires de, 701
 Carvalho, José Carlos de, 930
 Carvalho Simão, Manuel de, 379
 Casa Alegre, José Fernández de Santillán, Conde de, 351–352
 Casabianca, Manuel, 920
 Casanova, Francisco Garcia, 787
 Casanova, Hernando, 117
 Casariego, 656
 Casas, Manuel Maria, 594
 Casault, Louis Adolphe, 868
 Caseros, battle at, 743–744
 Casimir, Hans von, 59
 Cass, Lewis, 667, 676
 Cassard, Jacques, 361–362
 Castagny, Armand Alexandre de, 832, 834
 Castañeda, Antonio, 395
 Castañeda, Francisco, 722
 Castañeda, Juan de, 20
 Castañeda Castro, Salvador, 1021
 Castanho Taques, Lourenço, 158
 Castejón, Pedro, 437
 Castell, Robert, 385
 Castellano, Luis de, 412
 Castellanos, Francisco de P., 850
 Castellanos, Miguel de, 92, 97, 99
 Castellanos, Reinaldo, 1090
 Castelli, Juan José, 585, 588
 Castelli, Pedro, 732–733
 Castelnau, Henri Pierre Abdon, 839, 840
 Castilla, Ramón, 728
 Castillo, Demetrio, 918
 Castillo, Heliodoro, 948
 Castillo, Ramón S., 1020
 Castillo Armas, Carlos, 1024, 1026–1027
 Castillo de la Fuerza, 79
 Castillo Negrete, Javier, 776
 Castlereagh, Lord, 678
 Castro, Castañeda, 1024
 Castro, Cesáreo, 944, 957, 958
 Castro, Cipriano, 923, 925
 Castro, Fernando, 370
 Castro, Francisco de Paula, 553
 Castro, Jesús Agustín, 941, 959
 Castro, José María, 748, 751, 753, 755
 Castro, Julián, 779
 Castro, Manuel, 759
 Castro, Mauricio, 774
 Castro, Rafael, 959
 Castro, Ramón del, 508–509, 553, 602
 Castro, Raúl, 1031
 Castro (settlement), 143
 Castro Caldas, Sebastião de, 356
 Castro Figueroa y Salazar, Pedro de, 387
 Castro Morais, Francisco de, 355, 360
 Castro Ruz, Fidel, 1023, 1026, 1030, 1031, 1033; and the Bay of Pigs invasion, 1034, 1035; and Ché Guevara, 1040, 1088; and the Cuban Missile Crisis, 1037; and El Salvador, 1054; and Grenada, 1080
 Castro y Grijuela, José, 167
 Caswell, Richard, 473, 504–505
 Catalán, Amaro, 873
 Catalán Creek, battle at, 612–613
 Cathcart, Charles, 388
 Catholic Church: and Argentina, 1028; and the Cristero War, 986. See also Jesuits
 Catlin, Albertus W., 937
 Catriel, Chief, 873, 874
 Cattani, Longanes, 1012
 Cavazos, José, 960
 Cavendish, Thomas, 115, 117–119, 118, 118 (illus.), 120, 124
 Cawson, Richard, 126
 Caxias, Luís Alves de Lima e Silva, Marqués de, 717, 860, 863–864
 Caxigal, Juan Manuel de, 512, 524
 Caxigal de la Vega, Francisco, 393
 Caye, Jean-Baptiste, Comte de Caradeuc de la, 535
 Cayenne (French Guiana), 228, 229, 231, 245, 261, 283, 284–285
 Cayley, George William, 554
 Caylus, Charles de Tubières, Chevalier de, 403
 Caylus, Jean de Giou, Sieur de, 291
 Ceballos, José, 592–593, 602, 603, 604, 605
 Ceballos, Juan Bautista, 784

- Cédras, Raoul, 1084, 1085–1086, 1087
 Cejudo, Roberto, 964
 Celaya (Mexico), battle at, 956–957, 957 (map)
 Celestino, Pedro, 699
 Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 1027; and Cuban intervention, 1031–1035; and Nicaragua, 1055, 1057
 Cepeda, battle at, 635, 781–782
 Cepeda, José, 611
 Cepeda, Rafael, 962
 Cereti, Bartolomé, 704
 Cerezo, Vinicio, 1058
 Cérillac, Jean Faudaos, Comte de, 235
 Cerisola, Alejandro, 950
 Cerón, Jorge, 89
 Cerpa Cartolini, Néstor, 1087
 Cerralvo, Rodrigo Pacheco y Osorio, Marqués de, 210
 Cerro de Pasco, battle at, 641
 Cerro Gordo, battle at, 766–767
 Cerruti, Nicolás María, 617
 Cervantes, Julio M., 879
 Cervera y Topete, Pascual, 908, 909, 911, 912, 916–917
 César, Moreira, 896
 Céspedes, Carlos M., 981
 Céspedes, Jesús María, 926
 Ceulen, Mathijs van, 188
 Chacabuco, battle at, 615–616, 615 (map)
 Chaco War, 989–1002, 997 (map)
 Chacón, José María, 499, 510, 552, 619, 627
 Chacón, Juan Antonio, 304
 Chacón Medina Salazar, Fernando, 338
 Chadwick, Richard, 408
 Chadwick, Robert, 356
 Chagres, 270, 385
 Chalcuchima, 49, 50
 Chamberlain, Brown, 867
 Chambly, Jacques de, 277
 Chamorro Cardenal, Pedro Joaquín, 1031, 1051
 Chamorro Vargas, Emiliano, 925, 930, 982, 983
 Champlain, Samuel de, 153–154, 155, 211, 214
 Champmeslins, Gilles, Marquis de Des Nos de, 369
 Chancellorsville (Virginia), battle at, 813
 Chandler, John, 673
 Chanís, Daniel, 1024
 Chao, Manuel, 948, 966
 Chapin, Cyrenius, 673
 Chapultepec, battle at, 771
 Charco y Sanz, Antonio, 524
 Charles I (England), 210, 211, 217–218, 219
 Charles II (England), 241, 272
 Charles III (Spain), 432, 447, 451
 Charles IV (Spain), 577
 Charles V (Hapsburg emperor), 51, 75, 78, 86; New Laws of, 70; and Pizarro, 47; and Tenochtitlán, 37; Welsers and, 57
 Charles, Capitaine, 332
 Charles, Cardinal de Bourbon, 115
 Charles Edward, Prince (“Bonnie Prince Charlie”), 404, 405
 Charles of Austria, Archduke, 356
 Charlesbourg Royal, 80
 Charlesfort, 91
 Charleston (South Carolina; formerly Charles Town), 350, 500–501
 Chascomús, battle at, 732–733
 Chase, Anna McClarmonde, 758
 Chassin de Thierry, François Nicolas de, 404
 Chastenoie, Étienne Cochard de, 408
 Chatard, Frederick, 774
 Château-Renault, François Louis de Rousselet, Comte de, 337–339, 339
 Châteauguay River, battle at, 676
 Chatoyer, Joseph, 550
 Chattanooga (Tennessee), 817
 Chauncey, Isaac, 667, 671, 674, 684; at Sackett’s Harbor, 669, 672
 Chaundler, David, 1076
 Chaussegros de Léry, Gaspard Joseph, 418
 Chavagnac, Henri Louis, Marquis (Comte) de, 328, 349–350
 Chavannes, Jean Baptiste, 532
 Cháves, Antonio de, 61
 Chávez Frías, Hugo Rafael, 1084
 Cheap, David, 388
 Chenard de La Giraudais, François, 431, 445
 Chesnais Le Fer, Lefer, 359
 Chester, Peter, 511
 Chevalier, Pierre, 284
 Chiapes, Chief, 18, 19
 Chiaquitinta, 51
 Chiari, Roberto, 1024, 1037
 Chiari, Rodolfo, 976
 Chibás, Eduardo, 1033
 Chicheley, Henry, 297
 Chichimecatecutli, 31, 37
 Chickamauga (Tennessee), 817
 Chicken, George, 364
 Chidley, John, 121, 122
 Childs, C. F., 771
 Childs, Thomas, 765
 Chile, 1088; Beagle Channel dispute, 1051, 1052–1053; democracy in, 1083; native uprising in, 447–448; naval mutiny, 978–979; sociopolitical unrest in, 975–976, 1043, 1045, 1056, 1057, 1058; territory dispute with Argentina, 1030
 Chilean Nitrate Company, 879
 Chinandega (Nicaragua), 983, 984 (illus.)
 Chirife, Adolfo, 973–974
 Chirinos, Pedro Almíndes (Peralmíndez), 41, 43
 Chisholm, William, 695
 Choiseul, Comte de Beaurpré, Jean François de, 531
 Choiseul, Etienne François, Duc de, 430
 Choiseul, Jean-François de (Comte de Beaurpré), 357
 Cholula, massacre at, 27
 Chorrillos-Miraflores, battle at, 887–888, 888 (illus.)
 Chrétien, Pierre, 548
 Christian, Hugh Cloberry, 551
 Christie, Alexander, 548
 Christophe, Henry, 542, 545, 545
 Chrystie, John, 668
 Chubb, Pascoe, 328
 Chuquillusca, 56
 Church, Benjamin, 282, 346
 Churchill, Sylvester, 757
 Churchill, Winston, 1008
 Cienfuegos, Camilo, 1030
 Cihuacóatl Matlatzincáztin, 30
 Cincinnatus Leconte, Jean-Jacques Dessalines Michel, 930, 931, 932
 Cinco de Mayo, 827–828, 828
 Ciudad Juárez, battle at, 940–941
 Ciudadela de Tucumán, battle at, 712
 Claesdochter de Reus, Anneke, 173
 Claessen, Theodore, 159
 Claeszoön, Adriaen, 172
 Claeszoön van Ipendam, Jacob, 142, 143
 Claiborne, Ferdinand L., 678
 Claiborne, William, 217
 Clark, Charles E., 908
 Clark, Edward, 406
 Clark, Isaac, 676
 Clark, John, 232
 Clark, Mark, 1016
 Clark, Merriwether Lewis, 755, 764
 Clark, Robert, 353
 Clark, Thomas, 674
 Clarke, Edward, 425
 Clarke, Elijah, 491, 507
 Clarke, N. S., 764
 Clarke, Robert, 301
 Clarkson, Thomas, 532
 Clausen, Nicoli, 1012
 Clavering, John, 426–427
 Clavero, Francisco, 782, 783
 Clavijo, Sancho de, 71
 Clay, Green, 674
 Clayton, Jasper, 357
 Cleburne, Pat, 817
 Cleeve, Christopher, 145
 Clement, Gastón A., 1030
 Cleveland, Grover, 894
 Cleveland, William, 345
 Clifford, George, 119
 Clifford, Henry, 140
 Clifford, Nicolas, 136

- Clinch, Duncan L., 693
Clinton, Henry, 468–469, 475, 484, 486, 490, 508; at Charleston, 500–501
Clinton, James, 486
Clinton, William Jefferson “Bill,” 1085, 1086, 1087, 1089
Clipperton, John, 346, 371
Clive, Robert, 432
Clodoré, Robert Le Frichot des Friches, Seigneur de, 251, 255, 256, 258, 260
Closse, Lambert, 229
Cloué, Georges Charles, 833, 836
Clovell, William, 179
Coard, Bernard, 1078
Cobham, Nathaniel, 248
Cochabamba, 56
Cochado, Antônio Vicente, 161
Coche, Thomas, 126, 140
Cochise (Apache leader), 844
Cochrane, Alexander Forrester Inglis, 561, 564, 629, 635, 653, 657, 681; at Fort McHenry, 689; at Martinique, 574; at Saintes, 574
Cochrane, John, 822
Cochrane, Nathaniel Day, 564
Cochrane, Thomas Alexander, 628 (illus.), 629, 635
Cockburn, George, 684 (illus.), 685
Cocke, Abraham, 122, 123
Cocke, John, 124
Cocke, Lawrence, 127
Codrington, Christopher, 314, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320–321, 323; at Martinique, 324
Codrington, Christopher (son), 339, 344–345
Coe, John H., 708, 734
Coenraedszoon, Jan, 172
Coffee, John, 676, 691
Coffin, John, 518
Coffy (slave leader), 443
Cogollos, Beatriz de, 60
Cohuanacoxtzin, 41
Coig, Luis, 640
Coimbra, Domingo, 367
Cojedes, battle at, 626–627
Colbert, Jean Baptiste, 283
Colborne, John, 718
Colby, Charles, 417
Cold Harbor (Virginia), 819
Cold War, 1023
Cole, Eli, 934–935
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, 371
Coligny, Comte de (Gaspar de Châtillon), 86
Colla Topa, 72
Collart, François de, 311, 324, 344, 349, 361, 362
Colleton, James, 308
Collier, Edward, 261, 265, 269
Collier, Francis Augustus, 573
Collier, George, 492, 495
Collingwood, Francis, 540
Collingwood, James, 722
Collingwood, Thomas, 434
Collins, George, 380
Collins, Henry, 227
Collins, John, 499, 525
Collot, Georges Henri Victor, 546
Colmenares, Rodrigo de, 15
Colombia: antidrug campaign, 1088–1089; and FARC, 1087, 1088, 1088, 1090; sociopolitical unrest in, 1023, 1026, 1055, 1056, 1058
Colombes, Joaquín, 828
Colomo, Juan José, 394
Colón y Toledo, Cristóbal, 83
Colônia do Sacramento (Uruguay), 295, 372–373, 379 (illus.), 451; and the French and Indian War, 441–442; Spanish capture of, 347–348; Spanish siege of, 378–379, 380, 381
Colt, Henry, 214
Colt, Samuel, 891
Colthurst, Christopher, 140
Columbus (New Mexico), 959–960
Columbus, Bartholomew, 5, 6, 7, 8
Columbus, Christopher, 3–6, 7, 8, 11 (map); and European diseases, 14; and Guantánamo Bay, 931; at Veragua, 10
Columbus, Diego, 6, 7, 13
Colve, Anthony, 276
Colville, Alexander, Baron, 421, 430, 431, 441
Colwell, John, 927
Comagre, Chief, 17
Communism, 982
Comonfort, Ignacio, 785, 830
Comunero War, 374–375
Conabut, Juan Enríquez, 136
Concas y Palau, Victor María, 916
Concepción de Veragua, 104
Concón, 902–903
Concord (Massachusetts), 467
Cond, Thomas Cornelis, 172
Condé, Louis de Bourbon, Prince de, 88, 226
Conde, Pedro, 615, 638
Condell de la Haza, Carlos, 881
Confederate commerce raiders, 808
Conflans, Hubert de Brienne, Comte de, 405–406, 430
Conner, David, 755, 758, 765
Conselheiro, Antônio, 896, 897
Constable, John, 340, 341
Constant, Pieter, 258, 268, 273, 284, 286, 288
Contagion, 14
Continental Congresses, 476
Contrecoeur, Claude Pierre Pécaudy de, 415, 417
Contreras, Calixto, 940, 946, 947, 955
Contreras-Churubusco, battle at, 769–770
Conzé, Jean-Baptiste, 937–938
Cook, Francis A., 916
Cooke, John, 280, 297, 301–302
Cooke, Philip St. George, 756
Coolidge, Calvin, 976, 983
Cooper, James Fenimore, 681
Cooper, John, 357
Coote, Eyre, 432
Copp, Charles W., 949–950
Coppin, William, 232
Córcoles y Martínez, Francisco de, 350
Cordero, José, 367, 370
Cordero, Mariano, 781
Cordes, Baltasar de, 142, 143
Cordes, Simon de, 142
Córdoba, Melitón, 861
Cordón, Ricardo, 1076
Córdova, Alberto, 963
Córdova, José María, 636, 651, 658–659
Coreman, Pieter, 286
Corinth (Mississippi), 811–812
Cornejo Vallejo, Francisco Javier, 369, 370, 371, 374
Corneliszon, Jacob (“Oom”), 140
Corneliszon, Jan, 299
Corneliszon, Wybrand, 188
Corneliszon, Zeger, 278
Corneliszon Condé, Anthonius, 176
Corneliszon Oele, Cornelis, 172
Corneliszon Schouten, Jan, 161
Corneliszon Schouten, Willem, 161
Cornieles, Alonso de, 116
Cornieles, Mateo, 199
Cornish, Samuel, 442, 528
Cornstalk, Chief, 449
Cornwallis, Charles, Marquis, 476, 478, 501–502
Cornwallis, William, 484, 500, 510; at Camden, 505–506; Cowpens and, 509; at Germantown, 485; at Guildford, 512; at Yorktown, 520
Coro (Venezuela), 97, 135
Corona, Antonio, 789, 790
Corona, Ramón, 791–792, 793, 829, 834, 835, 837, 839, 876; at Querétaro, 840–842
Coronado, Francisco Vázquez de, 45
Coronda, battle at, 644
Coronel, battle at, 969
Corral, Ponciano, 777
Corral, Ramón, 878
Correa, Manuel Félix, 378
Correa, Ramón, 624
Correia Câmara, Patricio, 449
Correia da Câmara, José Antônio, 865
Correia da Gama, Pedro, 189
Correia de Sá e Benevides, Salvador, 96, 99, 203
Correoso Catalán, Gil, 327

- Corrientes, 734, 855–856
 Corro, Andrés del, 129
 Corselles, Pieter van, 192
 Corso, Felipe, 108
 Corso, Juan, 294
 Cortazar, Luis de, 642, 698
 Cortázar, Pedro, 744–745
 Cortés, Domingo, 832
 Cortés, Francisco, 41
 Cortés, Francisco (Commo.), 327
 Cortés, Hernán, 9, 25, 39; in Baja California, 44; conquest of Mexico, 22–38, 24 (map), 32, 37; in Honduras, 40–41
 Cortés, Martín, 99
 Cortés, Melchor, 158
 Cortés de Ojeda, Francisco, 87
 Corvalán, Pedro, 864
 Cós, Martín Perfecto de, 722
 Cosby, Phillips, 498
 Cosgaya, Tiburcio, 433
 Cosío, Nicolás, 587, 588, 589
 Cosío Bahamonde, Francisco, 785
 Cosío y Campo, Toribio José Miguel (Marqués de Torre Campo), 361
 Cossato, Fecia di, 1012
 Costa, Duarte da, 86
 Costa, Jerónimo, 731, 780, 781
 Costa, Zenóbio da, 1016
 Costa de Ataíde, João da, 442
 Costa Méndez, Nicanor “Canoro,” 1063
 Costa Rica: civil war in, 1023; English attack on, 251–252; sociopolitical unrest in, 937, 938, 1022, 1024, 1027
 Costas, Patrón, 1020
 Cotagaita, battle at, 584
 Côté, Cyrille H. O., 718
 Cotes, Jean Martin, 88
 Cotes, Thomas, 421
 Cotesworth, Charles, 553
 Coulon de Villiers, Louis, 415
 Coulon de Villiers, Nicolas Antoine, 407
 Courcelles, Daniel de Rémy, Sieur de, 245, 251, 254–255
 Courland, Jekab (James) Kettler, Duke of, 217, 236
 Courserac, Chevalier de, 359, 360
 Courtney, Stephen, 353
 Couto Barbosa, Cosme do, 184, 197
 Covington, Leonard, 677
 Coward, John, 1063
 Cowpens, battle at, 509
 Cowper, Thomas, 142
 Cox, William, 105, 106, 107
 Coxon, John, 280, 287, 292, 293–294, 294–295
 Crabb, Henry A., 779
 Craddock, Christopher G. F. M., 950, 967, 968, 969
 Craig, Christopher, 1068
 Cray, Archibald, 477
 Craston, William, 123
 Crates, John, 516, 517
 Crato, Antônio de, 110, 113
 Craufurd, Henry William, 731
 Craufurd, Robert, 571
 Craven, Charles, 363–364
 Craven, T. A. M., 821
 Crawford, Emmett, 848
 Crazy Horse, 846, 847
 Creasy, Edward Shepherd, 535
 Crespo y Honorato, José, 433
 Crijnsen, Abraham, 254, 257, 264
 Crispin, William, 232
 Cristóbal, Diego (“Tupac Katari”), 526–527
 Crittenden, Thomas L., 812, 817
 Crockett, Davy, 724
 Crofton, E., 572
 Croghan, George, 674, 683
 Cromwell, Oliver, 219, 232, 232, 234
 Crook, George, 845, 846, 846, 847 (illus.), 848
 Cróquer y Pavia, Enrique, 849
 Crosland, John, 1074
 Crosse, John, 138
 Crown Point (New York), 418, 480
 Crozier, Leif, 890
 Cruger, John, 496
 Crul, Willem, 510
 Crump, Byam, 425, 426, 427
 Cruz, Felipe, 839
 Cruz, Ramón Ernesto, 1045
 Cruz Aguirre, Atanasio de la, 855
 Crysler’s Farm, battle at, 677–678
 CSS Virginia, 802, 804, 804–805
 Cualpopoca, 27, 28
 Cuauhnáhuac, Chief, 36
 Cuauhtémoc, 30, 32, 33, 35, 37, 38, 40–41
 Cuautla (Mexico), 591, 948
 Cuba: and Castro, 1026, 1029–1030, 1031; and Grenada, 1077–1080; Missile Crisis, 1035–1037, 1036 (map); refugees from, 1055; sociopolitical unrest in, 927–928, 931–932, 936–937, 977, 978, 979, 981, 1024, 1027; and the Spanish–American War, 909 (map), 919; Spanish conquest of, 16; U.S. intervention in, 1031–1035; and World War II, 1009, 1016, 1017
 Cuban Missile Crisis, 1035–1037, 1036 (map)
 Cubas, Brás, 86
 Cubillas, Fernando, 776
 Cubillos, Manuel Hernán, 1053
 Cuca, Anastasio, 878
 Cuéllar, Francisco de, 111
 Cuenca Díaz, Hermenegildo, 1044
 Cuesta de la Pedrera, battle at, 637
 Cuesta de los Ángeles, battle at, 885
 Cuevas, Alonso de, 221, 222
 Cuevas, Luis G., 729
 Cuitláhuac, 29, 30
 Culliford, Richard, 357
 Culta, José, 596
 Cumaná (Venezuela), 134, 172, 186
 Cumberland, Duke of, 140–141, 140 (map)
 Cumby, William Price, 575
 Cumplido, Juan N., 751
 Cunha Andrade, Antônio da, 197
 Cunha do Amaral, Jerônimo, 203
 Cunha Souto Maior, Paulo da, 203
 Cura Ocllo, 56
 Curaçao, 189, 362, 568; sociopolitical unrest in, 974, 976, 1041
 Curiñancu, Chief, 447
 Curtis, Edmund, 228
 Curtis, Samuel R., 803, 804
 Curupaytí, battle at, 860
 Curuzú, battle at, 860
 Custer, George Armstrong, 846–847
 Custis, Martha, 388
 Cut Knife Creek, battle at, 891
 Cutter, Ammi, 403
 Cutts, Richard M., 976
 Cutubano, Chief, 10, 11
 Cuyler, Cornelius, 546

 Da Costa, Gaspar, 360
 Da Costa Favela, Pedro, 178
 Da Gama, Vasco, 4
 Da Silva, Feliciano Inácio, 293
 Da Silva, João, 189
 Da Silva, Nuño, 107, 107–108, 109
 Dacres, James Richard, 487, 538, 561, 667
 Dade, Francis Langhorn, 694
 Dahlgren, John A., 813
 D’Ailleboust, Nicolas (Sieur de Manthet), 314, 323
 D’Aillebout, Louis, 404
 Dakins, George, 232
 D’Albert de Rions, François Hector, Comte, 488, 497, 515, 522
 D’Albert Saint Hippolyte, 501
 Dale, Thomas, 155
 Dalrymple, William, 498
 Daly, Charles, 676
 D’Amblimont, Claude François Renart de Fuch Samberg, Marquis, 502, 522
 D’Amblimont, Thomas Claude Renart de Fuch Samberg, Marquis, 278, 279, 289, 502
 Dampier, William, 255, 279 (illus.), 280, 346, 353
 Danbury, raid at, 480
 Dandridge, William, 387, 388
 Dane, Jeffrey, 232
 D’Angoulême, François (François I), 78, 80
 Daniel, Anthony, 123
 Daniel, Robert, 342–343, 364

- Danjou, Jean, 831
 Dante Caridi, José Segundo, 1057
 D'Antin, Antoine François de Pardaillan de Godrin, Marquis, 388, 389
 D'Anville, Jean Baptiste Louis Frédéric de La Rochefoucauld de Roye, Duc, 406
 Dancan, Joseph, 359
 D'Arbouville, Chevalier, 313, 321
 Darby, George, 434
 Dargue, Herbert, 976
 Darien, disaster at, 333–334, 334 (illus.)
 Darlan, Jean, 1007, 1007
 D'Arros d'Argelos, Jean François d'Argelos, Baron, 522
 Dartiguenave, Philippe Sudre, 935
 Dartmouth, George Legge, Lord, 312
 D'Aubigny, Alexandre de Morell, Comte, 418
 D'Aubuisson, Roberto, 1054
 D'Aulnay, Charles de Menou, 224
 D'Austillon, Paul (Seigneur de Sauveterre), 80, 80–81
 Davenport, William, 765
 Davers, Charles Sydney, 552
 David, Joseph, 575
 Davidoff, Constantino, 1059
 Davie, William, 504, 506
 Dávila, José, 636
 Dávila, José Inés, 964
 Dávila, Miguel R., 929
 Dávila, Rafael, 944
 Dávila Orejón y Gastón, Francisco, 261
 Davis, Caleb, 399
 Davis, Charles H., 779, 807–808
 Davis, Edward, 302, 303, 304, 309, 340
 Davis, George, 927
 Davis, Jefferson, 797, 800, 819; arrest of, 824; at Buena Vista, 764; inauguration of, 804; and Lee, 799; and privateers, 797, 808
 Davis, John (1590s), 124, 125, 127
 Davis, John (1815), 692
 Dawes, William, 467
 Dawson, George, 498
 Day, Luke, 529
 Day, Thomas, 345
 Daza, Hilarión, 879, 880, 882, 883, 884
 De Acosta, Gaspar, 299, 306
 De Agüero, Benito, 292
 De Aguilar, José, 776
 De Aguirre, Francisco, 67
 De Aguirre, Francisco (Commodore), 308
 De Alberrós, Francisco, 287, 295
 De Albuquerque, Jerônimo, 155
 De Albuquerque, Matias, 162, 191
 De Albuquerque, Pedro, 200
 De Albuquerque Coelho, Matias, 179–181, 185, 189
 De Alencar, Alexandrino Faria, 894
 De Alencar Castello Branco, Humberto, 1038
 De Alzaibar, Francisco, 378
 De Andrade, Alonso Felipe, 364, 366
 De Angulo, Fernando, 354
 De Araújo, Amador, 202, 203
 De Arizmendi, José, 287
 De Armendáriz, Marqués de Castelfuerte, José, 374
 De Arriaga, Antonio, 526
 De Arriaga, Julián, 412
 De Arriola, Andrés, 353
 De Arroyo y Daza, Diego, 162–163, 167, 167, 172
 De Arteaga y Aunavidao, Gaspar, 273, 276
 De Astina, Antonio, 287, 305
 De Ávila, Julián, 586
 De Avilés y del Fierro, Gabriel, 526
 De Baas Castelmores, Jean-Charles de, 265, 269, 272, 273, 274, 285, 291
 De Baas de l'Herpinière, 278
 De Barrios, Diego, 265
 De Barros Lima, José, 617
 De Barúa, Martín, 374
 De Beaujeu, Daniel Hyacinthe Marie Liénard, 417
 De Beaulés, Joseph, 426
 De Beaurepaire, Théodore, 703, 705
 De Berrio, Antonio, 114, 119, 122, 126, 132, 136, 141
 De Berrio, Fernando, 141, 154
 De Berroa, Estéban, 343, 350, 369
 De Billie, Sébastien, 325
 De Birac, Charles, 278
 De Blanchelande, Philibert François Rouxel, 514–515
 De Blénac, Charles de Courbon, Comte, 286, 288, 291, 311–312, 313, 314, 321–322; at Martinique, 324
 De Blénac Courbon, Charles, Comte (grandson), 435, 441
 De Boades, Brun, 502
 De Bonaventure, Simon, 328
 De Borda, Jean Charles, 525
 De Borja, Enríquez, 266
 De Bouillé Du Chariol, Claude François Amour, Marquis, 488, 490, 514, 520–521
 De Brito, Febrônio, 896
 De Caen, Emery, 211
 De Campos, Félix, 652
 De Carvalho, Francisco, 200
 De Carvalho, Raphael José, 705
 De Carvalho Pais de Andrade, Manoel, 656–657
 De Casa Rul, Conde, 591
 De Casa Tilly, Francisco Javier Everardo Tilly y Paredes, Marqués, 450, 451–452
 De Castellane Majastre, Henri César, 522
 De Castilhos, Augusto, 894
 De Castilhos, Júlio Prates, 892
 De Castro, Diego, 240
 De Castro, Pedro, 294
 De Castro y de la Cueva, Beltrán, 129, 130
 De Céspedes, Vicente, 527
 De Cevallos Cortés y Calderón, Pedro Antonio, 441, 442, 443, 450–451, 451
 De Chagas Santos, Francisco, 611
 De Charitte, Charles, 522
 De Châteauguay, Antoine Le Moyne, 369
 De Chaves, Juan, 345
 De Chávez, Francisco, 76
 De Cires, Tomás, 610, 644
 De Clavel, Pierre Antoine, 522
 De Coëtlogon, Alain Emmanuel, Chevalier, 329, 330
 De Combes, Pierre, 288
 De Contreras, Alonso, 157
 De Contreras, Hernando, 71
 De Contreras, Pedro, 71
 De Córdoba, José, 584
 De Cortázar, Luis, 642, 698
 De Costebelle, Philippe, 353
 De Courcy, Michael, 745
 De Cussy, Pierre Paul Tarin, 284, 308, 317, 319
 De Delva, Charles, 934
 De Dillon, Comte, 515, 520
 De Diústegui, Agustín, 262–263, 265, 266
 De Diústegui, Felipe, 287
 De Elcano, Juan Sebastián, 75
 De Elhuyar, Patricio, 602
 De Elizalde, Rufino, 782
 De Escalona, Juan, 643
 De Escandón, José, 412
 De Eslava y Lazaga Berrio y Eguirreta, Sebastián, 384–385, 390–391, 392
 De Eulate, Julián, 214
 De Ezpeleta, José, 511
 De Faria, Agostinho António, 655
 De Figueroa, Alonso, 377
 De Figueroa y Silva, Antonio, 376, 377, 378
 De Fontenay, Timoléon Hotman, Chevalier, 229, 230, 231, 235, 255
 De Fuentes Bocanegra, Francisco, 553–554
 De Gálvez, Bernardo, 495–496, 497, 499, 506, 510
 De Gálvez, Matías, 498, 500
 De Garibay, Pedro, 578
 De Gaulle, Charles, 1007, 1017
 De Gennes, Jean-Baptiste, Comte, 339–340
 De Genouilly, Mithon, 522
 De Glandevès, Jean Baptiste, 501
 De Godoy, Francisco, 54
 De Góis da Silveira, Pêro, 78
 De Gorostiza, Manuel Eduardo, 731
 De Gorriti, José Ignacio, 643

- De Goyon Beaufort, Chevalier, 359, 360
 De Graaf, Laurens Cornelis Boudewijn, 292, 297, 298, 298, 299–301, 305, 317; at Campeche, 304; at Cartagena, 301; at Jamaica, 313, 325, 326; at Saint Domingue, 327; at Valladolid, 306
 De Graaff, Johannes, 510
 De Graffenried, Baron, 360
 De Grancey d'Argentan, Rouxel de Médavy, Marquis, 284, 288, 289
 De Grasse Briançon, Marquis, 525–526
 De Grimouard, Nicolas René Henri, Comte, 525, 532, 534
 De Güemes, Martín Miguel, 584, 585, 605, 605 (illus.), 644
 De Guevara, Joaquín, 589
 De Guichen, Luc Urbain du Bouexic, Comte, 500–503
 De Haro, Damían, 225
 De Haro, Juan, 170, 171
 De Hererea, Simón, 598
 De Herrera, José Antonio, 375
 De Hoces y Córdoba, Lope, 186, 191, 192
 De Huidobro, Mateo Alonso, 265, 266, 267, 275–276
 De Ibarra, Carlos, 157, 186, 193, 195, 196
 De Ibarra Lezcano, José, 347, 348
 De Ircio, Pedro, 26, 27
 De Iriarte, Pedro, 308
 De Iturrigaray, José, 578
 De Kersaint, Guy François de Coëtmenpren, Comte, 403, 406, 421
 De la Barca, Esteban, 372, 374
 De la Barra, Francisco León, 942
 De la Barre, François, 312
 De la Barrera y Villegas, Felipe, 293, 294
 De La Cabane, Menjouin, 83
 De la Cadena, Antonio Flon, Conde, 609
 De la Calzada, Sebastián, 609
 De la Cerda, Álvaro, 177
 De La Clocheterie, Louis Chadeau, Seigneur, 280
 De La Clochetterie, Chadeau, 522
 De la Colina, Juan Antonio, 410, 436
 De la Concha, Manuel, 609–610
 De La Corne, Louis, 406
 De la Cosa, Juan, 7, 8–9, 11, 13
 De la Cruz, José, 586
 De la Cruz, Pedro, 106
 De la Cruz, Rafael, 977
 De la Cruz Mourgeon, Juan, 649
 De la Cueva, Beatriz, 39
 De la Cueva, Francisca, 39
 De la Fuente, Felipe, 901
 De la Garza, Felipe, 698, 700
 De la Garza, Juan José, 830, 836
 De la Gasca, Pedro, 71
 De La Grandière, Charles Marie, 522
 De la Grandière, Pierre Marie, Vicomte, 513
 De la Guerra, Antonio C., 881
 De la Guerra y de la Vega, Francisco, 264
 De la Harteloire, Commodore, 337
 De la Huerta, Adolfo, 965–966
 De la Huerta, Alfonso, 988
 De la Isla, Rodrigo, 109
 De la Jonquière, Pierre Jacques Taffanel, 365, 406–407
 De la Llana, Alonso, 60
 De la Llave, Ignacio, 825, 830
 De la Maceda, Miguel Soto, 590–591
 De La Maisonfort, Alexandre de la Maisonfort du Boisdecourt, Marquis, 404
 De la Malmaison, Hémon Coinard, 344
 De la Mar, José, 658
 De la Mota Sarmiento, Iñigo, 141
 De la Motte, Toussaint Guillaume Picquet, 493, 497
 De la Motte Auger, Charles, 344
 De la O, Genovevo, 942, 960, 964
 De la Parra, José, 787
 De la Peña, José, 566
 De la Peña y Barrágan, Matias, 745, 746, 764, 765
 De la Pezuela y Sánchez, Joaquín, 602
 De la Pierria, Albert, 91
 De la Pierrière, Jérôme du Sarrat, Sieur, 225, 230–231
 De la Puente, Manuel, 354
 De la Quintana, José Ignacio, 566
 De la Rivera, Diego, 110, 113, 114, 123
 De la Rosa, Nicolás (Conde de Vega Florida), 352
 De la Serna, José, 612, 642, 644, 647, 656, 658–659
 De la Torre, Juan Bautista, 587, 588, 589
 De la Torre, Miguel, 610, 617–623 passim, 626, 627, 630, 633, 640, 642, 644; at Carabobo, 646
 De La Tour, Charles de Saint Etienne, 224
 De La Tour, Marie Jacquelin, 224
 De la Vega, Alonso, 372
 De la Vega, Juan, 592
 De la Villanueva, Juan, 497, 514
 De la War, Thomas West, 153
 De Larco, Juan, 301
 De Larraspuru, Tomás, 173, 181
 De las Alas, Alonso, 110
 De las Alas, Esteban, 95, 98, 101, 111
 De las Alas, Gregorio, 110, 113
 De las Alas, Pedro Estéban, 111
 De las Casas, Bartolomé, 9, 19, 46
 De las Casas, Francisco, 40
 De las Casas, Juan (governor), 578, 580
 De las Casas, Juan Bautista, 587
 De Laya Mújica, Juan, 295
 De Lecat, Jelles, 266, 267, 270
 De León, Francisco, 370
 De León, José, 364
 De León, Juan Francisco, 412
 De León, Tomás, 308
 De León Fandino, Juan, 381, 395
 De Lerma, García, 57
 De Leyba, Fernando, 502
 De Lézines, Chevalier, 286
 De Lezo y Olavarrieta, Blas, 365–366, 381, 385, 391, 393
 De Liefde, Evert, 278
 De Liefde, Pieter, 278
 De Liniers y Bremond, Santiago, 567, 571–572, 578, 580, 582
 De Lint, Pieter Esaiszoon, 142
 De Lira, Diego, 578, 580
 De Loarte, Gabriel, 105–106
 De Lorena, Federico, 894
 De los Reyes, Diego (black slave), 129
 De los Reyes, Diego (mulatto rover), 187, 188, 189
 De los Reyes Vargas, Juan, 592, 627, 644
 De los Reyes y Balmaceda, Diego, 374
 De los Ríos, Pedro, 47, 56
 De los Ríos Echeverría, Luis, 1052
 De los Ríos y Quesada, Diego, 330
 De Loubière, François Rolle, 236, 254, 260
 De Luján, Gabriel, 117
 De Luna, Sancho, 553
 De Luna Sarmiento, Álvaro, 198
 De Macedo, Silvino, 892
 De Maintenon, Charles François d'Angennes, Marquis de, 285, 291
 De Mancera, Antonio Sebastián de Toledo Molina y Salazar, Marqués, 275
 De Meira Matos, Carlos, 1038
 De Melo, Custódio José, 892, 893–894, 895
 De Melo, Salvador, 161
 De Melo, Teixeira, 201
 De Mena, Juan, 374
 De Monteil, François Aymar, Chevalier, 502
 De Montiano y Luyando, Manuel, 386, 395–396, 399
 De Morais e Barros, Prudente José, 896, 897
 De Munnik, Dirk, 278
 De Munnik, Philis, 278
 De Nava, Don Luis, 199
 De Navarrete, Melchor, 391
 De Neckere, Jonathan, 182
 De Noyan et de Chavoy, Pierre-Jacques Payen, 424
 De Ojeda, Jerónimo, 218
 De Oliveira, Diogo Luíz, 170, 174
 De Oliveira Alvares, Joaquim Antonio, 612
 De Oquendo, Antonio, 182–184, 183 (illus.), 184, 189, 212–213
 De Oquendo de Segura, Miguel, 184
 De Orozco, Sancho Jimeno, 329

- De Ortega Valencia, Pedro, 106
 De Otermín, Antonio, 295–296
 De Ovando, Nicolás, 9–11, 12, 13, 46
 De Oviedo, Gaspar, 297
 De Pando Estrada, Juan, 300
 De Paty, Jean-Joseph, 329
 De Paula Alcántara, Francisco, 610
 De Paula Vélez, Francisco, 646
 De Perón, María Estela “Isabelita”
 Martínez, 1046, 1047, 1050
 De Peyster, Abraham, 506
 De Pez y Malzárraga, Andrés, 300, 301,
 310, 324, 328–329; and the Darien
 disaster, 333–334
 De Piérola, Nicolás, 884, 887, 888–889, 929
 De Pierrefeu, Deidier, 512
 De Poincy, Philippe de Lonvilliers, 217,
 224–225, 229, 241
 De Porras, Diego Alberto, 212
 De Posadas, José, 588
 De Prado, Juan, 435, 436, 438, 440
 De Praille, Sieur, 257
 De Quijada, Diego, 293
 De Quintana, Antonio, 287
 De Quintanilla, Antonio, 661
 De Rame, Maurits, 261
 De Ramezay, Jean-Baptiste Nicolas Roch,
 406, 407
 De Rego, Luiz, 617
 De Renou, Jean, 268, 269
 De Rivas, Martín, 308, 314
 De Roa, Lino Oris, 876
 De Rojas y Borgia, Luis, 186, 191–192
 De Rosselan, Louis de Kerengoan, Sieur,
 227
 De Rottenburg, Francis, Baron, 677
 De Ruyter, Engel, 278, 279
 De Ruyter, Michiel Adriaenszoon, 248,
 291; at Barbados, 248–249; and the
 “Victory of Rum,” 277–279
 De Sá, Estácio, 90, 91–92, 96
 De Sá, Fernão, 87
 De Sá, Martim, 158
 De Sá, Mem, 86–90, 96
 De Sá, Salvador, 206, 208
 De Sá de Meneses, Francisco, 302
 De Saint-Armour, Henri, 324
 De Saint Castin, Jean-Vincent d’Abbadie,
 Baron, 328
 De Saint Ours Deschaillons, Jean-Baptiste, 353
 De Saint Ovide, Joseph, 353
 De Salamanca, Juan, 30
 De Salamanca, Manuel, 372
 De Salazar y Mazarredo, Eusebio, 849
 De Salcedo, Manuel María, 587, 600–601
 De Salières, Henri de Chastelard, 245
 De Salve, Jan Marius, 443, 444
 De Sarratea, Manuel, 596
 De Sarria, Carlos José, 441, 442
 De Segura Sandoval y Castilla, Francisco,
 319
 De Selva Negra, Juan Pío María de
 Montúfar y Larrea, Marqués, 580
 De Sérigny et de Loire, Joseph Le Moyne,
 Sieur, 326, 333, 368–369
 De Sitter, Pieter, 278
 De Soto, Hernando, 18, 52, 79; in Florida,
 44–45; and Peru, 48, 49–50, 51
 De Sourdis, François d’Escoubleau,
 Comte, 289, 290
 De Sousa, Diogo, 589, 593
 De Sousa, Guilherme Xavier, 864
 De Sousa, João, 78
 De Sousa, Martim Afonso, 8, 76–78, 77
 De Sousa Chichorro, Aires, 213
 De Sousa d’Eca, Manuel, 178
 De Sousa Filgueiras, Gaspar, 635
 De Tastes de Lillancourt, Jean Baptiste, 516
 De Tejada, Juan, 132
 De Thoisy, Noël, Sieur de Patrocle, 224, 225
 De Toar, Sancho, 7
 De Toledo, Pedro, 184
 De Toledo y Osorio, Fadrique, 169, 170,
 212–213
 De Tolosa, Juan (Barbalonga), 71
 De Torres, Gabriel, 648
 De Torres y Morales, Rodrigo, 375,
 387–388, 390, 393, 402
 De Tracy, Alexandre de Prouville, Marquis,
 245, 246, 247, 250, 254–255
 De Troyes, Pierre, Chevalier, 306, 307, 310
 De Ubilla, Juan, 99
 De Unzaga, Luis, 526
 De Urdanivia, Sancho, 192, 196, 198–199
 De Ursúa, Pedro, 195, 196, 198
 De Valdés Inclán, Alonso Juan, 347, 348
 De Vallecilla, Francisco, 182, 183, 184
 De Vallecilla, Martín, 153, 169, 212, 213
 De Vargas, Alonso, 129
 De Vargas, Juan, 170, 217
 De Vargas Machuca, Alonso, 140
 De Vargas Machuca, Juan, 163
 De Vea, Antonio, 303
 De Vedia, Julio, 783
 De Vedia, Nicolás, 569
 De Velasco, José Miguel, 728
 De Velasco, Juan, 143
 De Velasco, Luis Vicente, 436, 438, 439, 440
 De Velasco, Manuel, 221
 De Velasco y Huidobro, Bernardo, 581,
 582, 586, 588, 589
 De Vera, Agustín, 217
 De Vera, Cristóbal, 193
 De Vera, Gabriel, 106
 De Vera, Paulo, 112
 De Vera Múxica, Antonio, 295
 De Villalba y Toledo, Diego, 226, 227
 De Villar y Aguirre, Bartolomé, 319
 De Watteville, Louis, 676
 De Weert, Sebald, 142, 143
 De With, Witte Corneliszoon, 206, 208, 209
 De Witte, Joan, 278
 De Yermo, Gabriel, 578
 De Zabala, Bruno Mauricio, 366, 368,
 372, 374, 375
 De Zavala, Lorenzo, 699
 De Zuloaga, Gabriel José, 398, 399, 400
 De Zúñiga, José, 343
 Deacon, Sabine, 425
 Deane, Robert, 323
 Deans, Robert, 511
 Dearborn, Henry, 484, 666, 669, 671
 Deas, Edward, 756
 Debray, Jules Régis, 1039
 Debrissay, Peter, 425, 426
 Decatur, Stephen, 665
Decena Trágica, 944
 Decrès, Denis, 563
 Deerfield (Massachusetts), 346
 Defoe, Daniel, 353
 Degollado, Santos, 788, 790, 793
 Degollado y Guizar, General, 989
 Deheza, Ramón Antonio, 638
 Del Campo, José María, 782
 Del Canto, Enrique, 902
 Del Canto Arteaga, Estanislao, 899, 900,
 901
 Del Castillo, Manuel, 599, 607
 Del Castillo, Severo, 786, 792, 840, 841
 Del Corral, Francisco, 438
 Del Hoyo Solórzano, Juan, 364
 Del Manzano, Miguel, 367
 Del Pont, Francisco Casimiro Marcó, 616
 Del Riego, Rafael, 634
 Del Toro, Francisco Rodríguez, Marqués,
 581
 Del Toro, Natividad, 945–946
 Del Valle y Torres, José, 526
 Delaplace, William, 468
 Delgadillo, Antonio, 99
 Delgadillo, José, 527
 Delgadillo y Avellaneda, Bernardino, 137
 Delgado, Antonio, 598
 Delgado, José, 946
 Delgado, Luis Morse, 1034
 Delgado, Manuel, 298
 Delgado, Nicolás, 992, 999, 1001
 Delgado Chalbaud, Carlos, 1024
 Delgrès, Louis, 557
 Delvalle, Eric Arturo, 1080
 Demere, Raymond, 396
 Demont, William, 478
 Dempster, Edward, 265
 Dennis, Robert, 228
 Denonville, Jacques René de Brisay,
 Marquis de, 305, 306, 307, 309–310

- Dent, Digby, 406, 407, 408, 409
 Dent, Julia B., 818
 Deodoro da Fonseca, Manuel, 892
 D'Eragny, François d'Alesso, Marquis, 314, 320, 321
 Dering, Daniel, 425
 Derqui, Santiago, 783
 D'Erveaux, Comte, 291
 Des Ormeaux, Adam Dollard, Sieur, 241
 Des Roches, Chevalier, 435
 Des Roses, Gabriel, Sieur, 253
 Des Vaux, Charles, 130, 154–155, 161
 Des Vergers de Sanois, Dominique, 259
 Deschamps, Eugenio, 925, 926
 Deschamps de La Place, Frédéric, 237, 241
 Desgouttes, Jean-Antoine Charry, 422
 Desmarais, Mathurin, 303
 D'Esnambuc, Pierre Belin, 210–211, 213, 214–215
 Desnaux, Carlos, 392
 Desnaux, Simón, 498
 D'Espinay Beaugroult, Nicolas Hercule, Marquis, 362, 363, 389
 Dessalines, Jacques, 542
 D'Estaing, Charles Henri, Comte, 445, 487 (illus.), 488, 488, 489, 490, 491, 493; at Delaware River, 487; at Grenada, 494; at Savannah, 496–497
 D'Estourmel, Constantin Louis, 389, 406
 D'Estrées, Jean, Comte, 265, 284–287, 288–289, 290–291
 D'Ethy, Alexandre, 522
 Détrie, Paul Alexandre, 829
 Detroit, battle at, 667
 D'Eu, Louis Philippe Marie Ferdinand d'Orléans, Comte, 864–865
 Deuxponts, Guillaume, 520
 Deveaux, Andrew, 526
 D'Evereux, John, 636
 DeVillepars, René de Gousabats, Sieur, 245, 271, 272
 Dewey, George, 910, 925
 Dewey, Thomas, 1005
 D'Haussonville, Joseph-Louis-Bernard de Cléron, Comte, 440–441
 D'Henin, Joseph, François Nivard Charles, Vicomte, 544
 D'Hervault, Chevalier, 286
 D'Honon de Gallifet, Joseph, 312, 329
 D'Hurbal, Curtois Roussel, 834
 Di Spinola, Ambroglio, 158
 Diamond Rock, 559, 562–563
 Dias, Francisco, 372
 Dias, Henrique, 186, 191, 203, 206, 207
 Dias Cardoso, Antônio, 202, 203, 207
 Díaz, Adolfo, 932, 983, 985
 Díaz, Antonio, 633
 Díaz, Colonel (War of the Triple Alliance), 858, 859
 Díaz, Domingo, 127
 Díaz, Estéban, 633
 Díaz, Félix, 827, 835, 839, 944, 953, 962
 Díaz, Francisco, 580
 Díaz, José Eduvigis, 860
 Díaz, Pedro, 82
 Díaz, Rui, 51
 Díaz-Balart, Mirta, 1033
 Díaz de Mendoza, Ruy, 111, 113
 Díaz de Solís, Juan, 12, 20
 Díaz del Castillo, Bernal, 18, 21
 Díaz Escobar, Manuel, 1044
 Díaz Flores, Isidoro, 933
 Díaz Mirón, Salvador, 830
 Díaz Monroy, José de la Cruz Porfirio; and the French intervention, 831–840 passim, 843, 844; and the Mexican Revolution, 939, 941, 942; and the presidency, 876–877, 879, 923; and the rurales, 922
 Díaz Ordáz, Gustavo, 1040
 Díaz Pimienta, Francisco, 197, 218–219
 Díaz Vélez, Eustaquio, 595, 597–598, 602, 610, 737
 Díaz Vélez, Miguel, 702
 D'Iberville et d'Ardillières, Pierre Le Moyne, Sieur, 307, 307, 328; and Hudson's Bay, 311, 319, 327, 333; at Martinique, 349–350; and the Newfoundland offensive, 328; and Quebec, 322, 326
 Dickens, Francis, 891
 Dickson, Alexander, 497
 Diego Cristóbal (“Tupac Katari”), 527
 Diéguez Lara, Manuel Macario, 945, 950, 953, 955, 956, 958, 959, 966
 Diem, Ngo Dinh, 1048
 Dieskau, Jean Armand, Baron de, 417–418
 Digges, Dudley, 420
 Diguja, José, 167
 Dilkes, J., 551
 Dilkes, Thomas, 332, 333
 Dillingham, Albert C., 926
 Dillon, Arthur, 493
 Dillon, Édouard, 493
 Dillon, Théobald, 497
 Dinwiddie, Robert, 414
 Diriangén, Chief, 38
 Disease, 14, 376
 Disney, Henry, 357
 Dixon, Charles, 526
 Dixon, Edward, 140
 Dixon, George E., 818
 Dixon, M. C., 667
 Doake, James, 432, 434
 Dobbs, Alexander, 684
 Doblado, Manuel, 787, 792, 833
 Dobbie, Daniel, 551
 Dobson, Richard, 265
 Dodge, Henry, 694
 Dodsworth, Anthony, 339
 D'Ogeron, Bertrand (Sieur de la Bouère), 246, 268, 269, 273, 276
 Doheny, Michael, 866
 Doisy, Chevalier, 435
 Dombrini, Servando, 599
 Domingos, Teotônio Jorge, 618
 Dominica, 432–433
 Dominican Republic: political unrest in, 924, 925–926, 931, 933, 935–936, 1031, 1035, 1037, 1045; U.S. intervention in, 1038
 Domínguez, Cesareo, 741
 Don Cristóbal, battle at, 733
 Don Gonzalo (Argentina), battle at, 872
 Doncker, Jan, 274, 277
 Donelson, Rachel, 679
 Doniphan, Alexander William, 755, 761
 Dönitz, Karl, 1009, 1016, 1018
 Donovan, William J. “Wild Bill,” 1027
 Dooley, John, 491
 D'Orange, Guillaume, 231, 235, 260, 278, 279
 D'Orange, Pierre, 300
 Doria, Leonardo, 122
 D'Ornano, Nicolas, 93
 Dorrego, Manuel, 606, 607, 637–638, 710
 Dortal, Jerónimo, 63
 Dorticós Torrado, Osvaldo, 1031
 D'Orvilliers, Rémi Guillouet, Seigneur, 256, 257, 259
 Douay, Charles Abel, 830, 832
 Doughty, Thomas, 108
 Douglas, Archibald Lucius, 924–925
 Douglas, D., 551
 Douglas, James, 403, 404, 432, 434, 435, 439
 Douglas, John, 132
 Douglas, R. Gordon, 850
 Douglas, Stair, 434
 Dover, Thomas, 353, 354
 Dow, Thomas, 526
 Downie, George, 687
 D'Oyley, Edward, 236
 Dozo, Arturo “Lami,” 1059
 Drake, Francis, 97, 98, 99, 100, 107, 107 (illus.), 117; at Cadiz, 119; at Cartagena, 101–102, 116, 116 (map); and Nombre de Dios, 137; in the Pacific, 107–109, 108 (map); at Panama, 102–104; at San Juan de Puerto Rico, 135–136; at Santo Domingo, 116
 Drake, Francis Samuel, 432, 434, 498, 509, 515, 523
 Drake, John, 101, 102, 111, 112
 Drake, Joseph, 102
 Draper, William, 442
 Drew, Andrew, 719
 Drew, John, 546
 Drooghart, Pieter, 278

- Drucour, Augustine de Boschenry de, 422, 423
- Drum, Hugh, 1012
- Drummond, Gordon, 548, 680, 682, 684
- Drummond, Robert, 333
- Drummond, Thomas, 333
- Dryden, John, 252
- Du Boys, Jean, 94
- Du Buc, Jean, 344, 350, 357, 361
- Du Buc, Pierre, 311
- Du Clerc, Jean-François, 355, 355 (map)
- Du Fougereai, Garnier, 365
- Du Lion, Claude François, 254, 255, 256, 258
- Du Parquet, Jacques Dyel, Sieur, 218, 224–225, 226–227, 230, 231, 231, 235, 291
- Du Parquet, Jean Clair Dyel, 344, 349
- Du Pavillon, Jean François du Cheyron, 522
- Du Plessis, Chevalier, 532
- Du Pont, Jean, 215
- Du Pont, Samuel F., 747–748, 756, 802, 813
- Du Poyet, Giraud, 324
- Du Poyet, Pierre Giraud, 256, 259
- Du Prey, Louis, 361
- Du Quengo, Ferron, 494
- Du Quesnel, Jean-Baptiste Louis Le Prévost, Seigneur, 401, 402
- Du Rausset, Jérémie Deschamps de Moussac et, 237, 246
- Du Revest, Joseph-François de Noble, 420
- Du Roissey, Sieur de Chardonville, Urbain, 210–211, 213
- Du Rollon, Chevalier, 325
- Du Treil, Charles François Emmanuel Nadau, 426
- Du Verne, Abraham, 151
- Duarte, María Eva “Evita,” 1021, 1024, 1029
- Dubois de La Motte, Emmanuel Auguste de Cahideuc, Comte, 359, 407, 417, 420
- Dubois de Saligny, Alphonse, 793
- Dubouille, Vincent, 618
- Ducasse, Jean-Baptiste, 312–313, 314, 321, 325–326, 329–331, 332; at Cartagena, 340–341
- Duchaffault de Besné, Louis Charles, Comte, 418
- Duchambon de Vergor, Louis du Pont, Sieur, 402, 403–404; and the French and Indian War, 415
- Ducharme, Dominique, 673
- Ducharmey, Madame, 426
- Duck Lake, battle at, 890
- Duckworth, John Thomas, 540, 564–565
- Duclos-Guyot, Nicolas Pierre, 445
- Dudley, Robert, 131
- Dudley, William, 671
- Duff, Robert, 434
- Dufoure, Janson, 403
- Duguay, Hilarion-Josselin, Comte, 405
- Duguay-Trouin, René, 355, 358, 359–360
- Dull Knife, Chief, 847
- Dulles, Allen W., 1035
- Dumaitz de Goimpy Feiquières, François Louis, 501, 512, 522
- Dumanoir Le Pelley, Pierre Étienne René, Comte, 561
- Dumé, Nicholas Leroy, Sieur, 156
- Dummer, William, 373
- Dummer’s War, 373–374
- Dumont, Gabriel, 890, 891
- Dumouriez, Charles François, 535
- Dunbar, George, 386
- Dunbar, Thomas, 415, 417
- Duncan, James, 751
- Duncan, Silas, 713
- Duncombe, Charles, 719
- Dundas, George, 559
- Dundas, Tom, 519, 548
- Dunlop, Hugh, 826
- Dunmore, John Murray, Earl of, 449
- Duplessis, Jean, Sieur d’Ossoville, 214
- Duplessis Parfeau, 502, 512
- Dupont, Jean, 284
- Dupuy de Lôme, Enrique, 907
- Duque, Francisco, 724
- Durán, Francisco Vicente, 224, 225
- Durán, Justo L., 920
- Durán, Rodrigo de, 60
- Durand, Augusto, 929
- Durell, E. H., 934
- Durnford, Elias, 499
- Durrell, Philip, 403
- Durry, Thomas, 551
- Dutch Brazil, 165 (map)
- Dutch West India Company (WIC), 158, 162, 165, 344; and the slave trade, 363
- Dutra, Eurico Gaspar, 982, 1022
- Duvalier, François “Papa Doc,” 1044
- Duvalier, Jean Claude “Baby Doc,” 1057
- Duvivier, Joseph-François du Pont, 401, 402
- Dyer, Nicholas, 331
- Dyott, William, 549
- Early, Jubal, 815, 821, 822, 823–824
- Easton, John, 317
- Eaton, John, 302, 303
- Eaton, Pinketham, 512
- Echagüe, Pascual, 732–735, 739
- Echaurri, Martín J., 368
- Echavarría, Juan Bautista, 227
- Echazarreta, Antonio, 946
- Echegaray, Domingo, 768
- Echegaray, Miguel María, 790
- Echenique, Juan Martín, 888
- Echevarría, Juan Gualberto, 712
- Echeverría, Francisco Sales de, 620, 660
- Echeverría, Martín de, 412
- Echeverría Álvarez, Luis, 1044
- Ecuador: Peruvian border disputes, 1019–1020, 1087; sociopolitical unrest in, 974, 1057, 1088, 1090
- Edict of Nantes, 305
- Edwards, H. M., 969
- Edwards, Sampson, 548
- Eewoutsen, Cornelis, 273
- Egleston, Joseph, 518
- Ehinger, Georg, 57
- Eisenhower, Dwight David, 979, 1031, 1032, 1048
- Ekins, Charles, 555
- El Carmen (Mexico), 366, 366 (illus.)
- El Carmen (Paraguay), battle at, 1000
- El Cerrito, battle at, 596
- El Salvador: civil war in, 1053–1054, 1055–1056, 1058, 1084; earthquake in, 1057; and the Soccer War, 1041; sociopolitical unrest in, 979, 1020, 1021, 1024, 1031, 1032
- Elbert, Samuel, 490–491, 492
- Elding, Read, 337
- Elio, Francisco Javier de, 571, 578, 589, 590, 590 (illus.)
- Elliott, George, 438, 439
- Elizabeth I (England), 105, 114, 115, 119, 133; death of, 145; Treaty of Nonsuch and, 116
- Elizabeth II (Great Britain), 1051
- Elizabeth of Valois, 96
- Elizalde, Pedro de, 554
- Elizalde y Ursúa, Pedro de, 270
- Elizondo, Francisco Ignacio, 600–601
- Ellerton, W. M., 971
- Ellinger, John, 179
- Elliott, Jesse Duncan, 668
- Elliott, Matthew, 667
- Elliott, Stephen, 325, 331
- Ellis, John, 121
- Elphinstone, George Keith, 499, 501
- Elsemore, William, 126
- Elsom, George, 630
- Emancipation Proclamation, 814
- Emmanuel, Marquis de Grouchy, 608
- Emmermann, Carl, 1013
- Emparan, Vicente, 581
- Endara, Guillermo, 1080
- Endicott, John, 215–216
- Engle, Frederick, 747
- English, James T., 630
- English Civil War, 219
- Enríquez, Miguel, 367
- Enríquez de Almanza, Martín, 99–100
- Enríquez de Borja, Juan, 153
- Enríquez de Sotomayor, Enrique, 141
- Equinoctial France, 154–155
- Eraso, Cristóbal de, 104, 106

- Eraso, Miguel de, 106
 Erauso, Catalina de (Monja Alférez, Nun Ensign), 160
 Ericsson, John, 804
 Erie, Carl E., 1078
 Ernouf, Manuel Louis Jean Baptiste, 576
 Erskine, William, 480
 Escala Arriagada, Erasmo, 883–884, 885
 Escalada, Celedonio, 597
 Escalada, Remedios de, 614
 Escalante de Mendoza, Juan, 137
 Escalona, Juan, 605, 646
 Escampaba (Chief Charles), 38
 Escario, Federico, 917
 Escobar, Diego de, 11
 Escobar, José Gonzalo, 988, 989
 Escobar, Pablo, 1085
 Escobedo, Celedonio de, 225
 Escobedo, Fernando de, 272, 273
 Escobedo, Mariano, 832, 833, 836, 837, 839, 840–842
 Escobedo, Rodrigo de, 3
 Escuté, Matías, 624
 Esmít, Adolf, 300
 Espejo Caamaño, Francisco Silvestre, 604
 Esperón, Gabriel, 592
 Espinosa, Albino, 836
 Espinosa, Diego, 386
 Espinosa, Gaspar de, 19, 20, 46
 Espinosa, Juan, 835, 839
 Espinosa y Cuevas, José M., 942
 Esquivel, Juan de, 10, 11, 13
 Essex, Cornelius, 292
 Essex, Robert Devereux, Earl of, 219
 Estancia de Vacas, battle at, 791
 Esteban, Carlos Daniel, 1070
 Estenoz Coromina, Evaristo, 931, 932
 Estero Bellaco, battle at, 858
 Estigarribia, Antonio de la Cruz, 857
 Estigarribia, José Félix, 981, 982, 999; and the Chaco War, 991, 992–993, 996–997, 998, 999, 1001, 1002
 Estomba, Ramón, 656
 Estrada, Agustín, 956
 Estrada, Alonso de, 40
 Estrada, Juan José, 929–930
 Estrada Palma, Tomás, 927, 928, 931
 Estupiñán, Diego de, 229
 Etienne, Charles Oscar, 934
 Eulate, Juan de, 192
 Eulate y Pery, Antonio, 916
 Europe, revolutions in, 742
 Evans, Henry Francis, 517
 Evans, Robley D., 916, 928
 Evelyn, John, 274
 Everard, Thomas, 674
 Everitt, Michael, 432, 434
 Evertsen, Cornelis (“the Younger”), 274, 278, 279
 Evertsen, Cornelis “Kees” (“the Elder”), 274
 Evertsen Corneliszoon, Evert, 273
 Evertsen de Jongste, Cornelis (“Kees the Devil”), 273–274, 274, 275, 275 (illus.), 312; at New York, 276
 Evertszoon, Jan, 278
 Ewell, Richard S., 814, 815
 Ewing, James, 479
 Exocet missile, 1064
 Eyres, Harry, 731
 Ezcaray, Juan de, 18
 Ezcurra, Juan Antonio, 926
 Fabulé, François, 251
 Fagundes, Agostinho Domingos, 202, 203
 Fahie, William Charles, 572, 574
 Fairfax, Anne, 397
 Fairfax, Thomas, 219
 Fajardo, Luis, 150, 150–151, 152, 184
 Fajardo de Güevara, Juan, 169
 Falkingham, Edward, 420
 Falkland, Lucius Carey, Viscount, 714
 Falkland Islands, 713, 714; Argentine–British war over the, 1059–1077, 1067 (map), 1074 (map); the French and the, 445–446; the Spanish and the, 448; and World War I, 970–971
 Fallen Timbers, battle at, 530
 Famaillá, battle at, 735
 Fannin, James Walker, 722
 Fanning, Alexander C. W., 695
 Fanshaw, Charles, 387
 Fanshawe, B. H., 971
 Fanshawe, Basil H., 967
 FARC, 1088, 1088, 1090
 Farfan, Colonel, 646
 Faria, José Custódio, 445
 Farmer, George, 448
 Farragut, David Glasgow, 805–807, 813, 821
 Farrell, Edelmiro J., 1020, 1021, 1022
 Farriar, Thomas, 645
 Farrier, Edward, 130
 Farroupilha Revolt, 715–716
 Fascism, 1019
 Faulkner, James P., 1078
 Faulknor, Robert, 547, 549
 Favela, Pedro, 161
 Febres Cordero, León, 1057
 Federmann der Jüngere, Nicolaus, 57, 58, 61, 62, 64–65; southern march of, 63
 Fedon, Julien, 550
 Feilden, Randle Joseph, 868
 Feiler, Gerhard, 1011
 Felipe, Diego, 100
 Felipe V (Philip of Anjou), 337, 388
 Felipón, Miguel Angel, 129, 130
 Fellowes, Edward, 551
 Felsted, Humphrey, 232
 Femayor, Remigio, 621
 Fenians, 866
 Fenn, Henry, 232
 Fenton, Edward, 111
 Ferdinand (Spain), 5, 17
 Ferdinand II (Bohemia), 157
 Ferdinand VII (Spain), 577, 581, 604
 Ferguson, Patrick, 506
 Ferguson, William, 380
 Feringán Cortés, Felipe, 413
 Fernandes, Baltazar, 302
 Fernandes, Cosme, 76, 78
 Fernandes, Domingo (“O Calabar”), 185, 185, 186, 189, 191
 Fernandes Coutinho, Vasco, 87
 Fernandes Poderoso, Antônio, 292–293
 Fernandes Vieira, João, 202, 203
 Fernández, Carlos J., 991, 993, 994, 1000, 1001
 Fernández, Francisco, 337, 346
 Fernández, Manuel Félix, 699
 Fernández, Policarpo, 527
 Fernández (Paraguay), battle at, 995
 Fernández Castrillón, Manuel, 723
 Fernández Correa, Manuel, 122
 Fernández de Alderete, Juan, 63
 Fernández de Bustos, Pedro, 116
 Fernández de Córdoba, Diego (Marqués de Guadalcazar), 164
 Fernández de Córdoba, Luis, 186
 Fernández de Córdoba y Mondoza, Antonio, 271
 Fernández de Enciso, Martín, 14, 17
 Fernández de Fuenmayor, Ruy, 200, 214, 220, 221–222
 Fernández de Guzmán, Félix, 200
 Fernández de la Pastora, Francisco, 418
 Fernández de Lugo, Pedro, 62
 Fernández de Santana, Juan, 128
 Fernández de Zaldívar, Diego, 300
 Fernández del Pulgar, Pedro, 160
 Fernández Ladrillero, Juan, 87
 Fernández Nieto, Francisco, 352
 Fernández Núñez, Francisco, 193
 Fernández y Piedrahita, Lucas, 287, 288
 Ferrand, Jean Louis, 561, 578
 Ferraz, Valentín, 659
 Ferreira, Antonio Carlos, 705
 Ferreira, Benigno A., 926, 929
 Ferreira, Joaquim Leal, 704, 705
 Ferrer Espejo, Bernardo, 279
 Ferrero, Edward, 821
 Ferrufino, Francisco, 145
 Fery y Torres Vildosola, Luis, 850
 Fieldhouse, John, 1063
 Fierro, Antonio, 600
 Fierro, Rodolfo, 958–959
 Figueira de Mendoça, Manoel, 161
 Figueiredo, Marcelino de, 447
 Figueiredo, Simão de, 203
 Figueiredo da Costa, João “Maneta” de, 355
 Figueiroa, Francisco de, 208
 Figueredo, Fernando, 646

- Figueredo, Zenón, 920
 Figueres Ferrer, José "Don Pepe," 1023, 1027
 Figueroa, Ambrosio, 942
 Figueroa, Francisco, 950
 Figueroa, Rodrigo de, 31
 Figueroa, Rómulo, 964, 965–966
 Figueroa Figueroa, Rubén, 1046
 Figuls, Fernando, 1024
 Filisola, Vicente, 697, 723
 Finch, Charles, 573
 Finch, Richard, 323
 Fine Day, Chief, 891
 Finnis, Robert, 675
 Fischer, Victor, 680
 Fish, John, 525
 Fisher, William, 145
 Fitch, Daniel, 256
 FitzGibbon, James, 673
 Fitzherbert, Thomas, 498
 Fitzhugh, Andrew, 748
 Fitzwilliam, Richard, 379
 Flandrau, Charles, 844
 Fleet, Thomas, 232
 Fleming, William, 140
 Fletcher, Frank Friday, 950
 Fletcher, John, 333
 Fletcher, William, 405
 Fleury, Charles, 156, 157, 162, 215
 Flick, Robert, 140
 Flight of the Wild Geese, 318
 Flood, James, 220
 Florentino Vaz, Rubem, 1027
 Flores, Fortunato, 863
 Flores, José María, 737, 757, 761, 762, 781
 Flores, Juan José, 654
 Flores, Manuel Antonio, 527
 Flores, Venancio, 738, 854, 855, 857, 858, 860, 863; at Cañada de Gómez, 783
 Flores de Quiñones, Alvaro, 116
 Flores de San Pedro, Juan, 372
 Flores de Valdés, Diego, 60, 93, 110, 112–113, 114–115
 Florida: de Soto in, 44–45; early Spanish settlement attempts, 88–89, 97; Huguenot settlers in, 92; Ponce de León in, 16–17, 48
 Floyd, John, 678, 679
 Floyd, John B., 803
 Floyd, Oliver, 986
 Foccard, Jean, 298, 304
 Fogg, Christopher, 340
 Folkers, Ulrich, 1009, 1013
 Fones, Daniel, 404
 Fonrouge, Juan, 704
 Fonseca, Hermes da, 930
 Fonseca, Juan Rodríguez de, 7
 Foote, Andrew H., 803
 Forant, Job, 235, 245, 290
 Forbes, Gordon, 540
 Forbes, John, 422, 424
 Forbes, W. Cameron, 976–977
 Ford, John, 537
 Forestal, Marcos, 410
 Forey, Elie Frédéric, 830–831, 837
 Forrest, Arthur, 421, 433
 Forrest, French, 757
 Forrest, Nathan Bedford, 803, 818, 822, 823
 Forster, George, 474
 Forsyth, Benjamin, 667, 670, 671
 Forsyth, George A., 845, 848
 Fort Carillon, 423–424, 424 (map)
 Fort Caroline (Jacksonville, Florida), 92–93, 94. See also San Mateo
 Fort de Coligny, 86
 Fort de France, 291
 Fort Donelson (Tennessee), 803
 Fort Duquesne, 424
 Fort Fisher (North Carolina), 823
 Fort Frontenac, 424
 Fort Henry, 803
 Fort La Ferrière, 545
 Fort La Tour, 224
 Fort Maurits, 203
 Fort Nazaré, 190, 191
 Fort Niagara, 310
 Fort North, 213
 Fort Orange (Albany, NY), 164
 Fort Royal (Martinique), 297
 Fort Sainte Anne (Ontario), 324
 Fort San Marcos, 106, 120
 Fort Santiago de Araya, 167, 168 (illus.), 172
 Fort Schonenburgh, 209
 Fort Sumter (South Carolina), 797
 Fort Tauregue, 178, 179
 Fort Ter Hooge, 139 (illus.)
 Fort William Henry, 328, 420–421
 Forte do Bom Sucesso, 190
 Fortier, Michael, 1087
 Fortunato, Gregório, 1027
 Fortunato Galtieri, Leopoldo, 1052
 Foster, Harry, 1018
 Foulke, John, 323, 324
 Fouquet, Chevalier de, 435, 440
 Fourgeoud, Louis-Henry, 448
 Fournier, César, 705
 Fowell, William, 721
 Fowkes, Henry, 376
 Fox, Claudio, 988
 Fox, Vicente, 1085
 Fox Indians, 377
 Fradera, Esteban, 849
 Fragoso, Catarino, 840
 Fragoso, Tasso, 978
 França, Luis Paulino de Oliveira Pinto de, 642
 Francis, Josiah, 675
 Francis, Thomas, 434
 Francis, Turbott, 481, 559
 Francisco de Escobedo, Fernando, 293
 Francklin, P., 969
 Franco, Francisco, 1019
 Franco, Nentzen, 1041
 Franco, Rafael, 982, 995, 996, 999–1000, 1001
 Franco-Carib War, 230–231
 François I. See D'Angoulême, François
 François, Joseph Michel, 1086
 Franken, Leendert, 377
 Frankland, Thomas, 395
 Franklin, Benjamin, 476, 798
 Franklin (Tennessee), 823
 Franszoon, Evert Evertsen, 273
 Franszoon de Vries, Claes, 175–176
 Fraser, Edward, 486
 Fraser, Simon, 475, 480, 484, 486
 Frasquenay, Pierre de, 288
 Frederick, Thomas Lennox, 525
 Fredericksburg (Virginia), battle at, 812
 Freeman's Farm, battle at, 484
 Freire, Ramón, 635, 727
 Freire, Rómulo Gallegos, 1024
 Freire de Andrade, Gomes, 302, 412–413, 414, 441
 Freitas, Gaspar de, 161–162
 Freitas, Pedro de, 161
 Freitas da Fonseca, Manuel de, 372
 Frémont, John Charles, 748, 753, 761, 762, 800, 802, 822
 French, Domingo, 609
 French Acadia, 231, 277, 328, 333
 French Foreign Legion, 831, 835
 French Revolution, 528, 535
 Frenchtown, battle at, 669–670
 Freyre, Ramón, 618
 Frías, Pedro J., 861
 Frías Trejo, Diego de, 106
 Frobisher, Martin, 105, 116
 Fronde Revolts, 226
 Frondizi, Arturo, 1035
 Frontenac et Palluau, Louis de Buade, Comte de, 318–319, 322
 Fry, Roger, 214
 Fuentes, Alberto, 901
 Fuentes, Gerónimo de, 370
 Fuentes, Miguel, 1032
 Fuentes de Galarza, Francisco, 342
 Fujimori, Alberto, 1087
 Fulgham, Hercules, 140
 Fullam, William, 927–928
 Fulton, Robert, 851
 Fulton, William F., 697
 Funnel, William, 346
 Funston, Frederick, 928, 950
 Furtado de Mendoça, Antônio Carlos, 450
 Gabaret, Jean, 290, 344–345
 Gabaret, Louis, 269, 284, 286
 Gabaret, Mathurin, 227
 Gabilondo, Hilario, 779

- Gadsen, James, 784
 Gage, John, 398
 Gage, Thomas, 417, 445, 467, 469–470
 Gagnon, Lucien, 718
 Gago, José, 587
 Gaigneur, Pierre, 245
 Gaines, Edmund Pendleton, 684, 693
 Gaines, John P., 762
 Gaínza, Gabino, 649
 Gainza, Martín de, 872
 Gairy, Eric, 1077
 Gaitán, Jorge Eliécer, 1023
 Galán, José Antonio, 527
 Galán, José Miguel, 737, 780
 Galán, Luis Carlos, 1058
 Galarza, Juan de, 120
 Galeana, Antonio, 584
 Galeana, Hermenegildo, 596
 Galeana, José, 584
 Galiano, José, 430
 Galindo, León, 654, 659
 Gall, Chief, 847
 Gall, John, 123
 Gallardo, Antonio, 241
 Galtieri, Leopoldo E., 1059, 1060, 1063, 1064, 1077
 Galtjes, Galtje, 286
 Galván de Bastidas, Rodrigo, 8–9, 10
 Galván Romero, Domingo, 188
 Galvão de Queirós, Inocêncio, 896
 Gálvaz Egusquiza, José, 854
 Gálvez Barnes, Roberto, 1029
 Gamarra, Agustín, 636, 656
 Gambier, James, 425, 499
 Gambier, Pierre Guillaume Eugène, 827
 Gamero, Agustín, 885
 Gana, Emilio, 900
 Gana, Ignacio Luis, 882
 Gándara, Jesús, 922
 Gansevoort, Peter, 481–482
 Gant, Charles, 343
 Ganteaume, Antoine, 278
 Gaona, Antonio, 723, 729, 730
 Garay, Eugenio, 1001, 1002
 Garay, Francisco de, 26, 39
 Garay, Juan Bautista de, 212
 Garay, Juan de, 110, 112
 Garay, Manuel, 1000
 Garaycochea, Pedro José, 368
 Garaycochea, Pedro de, 410
 Garcerán, Francisco, 292
 García, Alan, 1057
 García, Alejandro, 876
 García, Alejo, 41
 García, Aurelio, 883
 García, Basilio, 642, 650
 García, Benito, 84
 García, Calixto, 912, 918
 García, Diego, 44
 García, Gregorio, 941
 García, Hugo, 1077
 García, Juan, 361
 García, Máximo, 958
 García, Osvaldo Jorge, 1062
 García, Pablo, 833
 García, Sebastián, 364
 García, Tomás, 625
 García Bustamante, Feliciano, 838
 García Calderón, Francisco, 888, 889
 García Camba, Andrés, 777
 García Conde, Alejo, 587
 García Conde, Pedro, 764
 García Cuellar, Samuel, 939
 García de León y Pizzaro, Ramón, 580
 García de Loyola, Martín, 72
 García de Melo, Luis, 106
 García del Postigo, Juan, 436
 García Hernández, Agustín, 921–922
 García Hidalgo, Carlos, 948, 949
 García Menocal, Mario, 936–937
 García Meza Tejada, Luis, 1055
 García Moreno, Joaquín, 537–538, 542
 García Mosquera, Ruy, 78
 García Osorio de Sandoval, Francisco, 95
 García Pose, Salvador, 372
 García Ros, Baltasar, 347, 374
 García y García, Aurelio, 881
 Gardiner, Lion, 216
 Gardner, Alan, 523, 546
 Gardner, Francis Farrington, 540
 Gardner, J. L., 765
 Garganta, Juan Francisco, 383, 436
 Garibaldi, Giuseppe, 737, 739, 739
 Garland, John, 756
 Garlies, Viscount, 547
 Garnier, Isidore, T., 834
 Garrat, William, 232
 Garret, John, 97, 101
 Garretson, Garret, 247
 Garrison, Cornelius K., 778
 Garstman, Joris, 188
 Garullo, Vicencio, 104
 Gascoigne, Edward, 434
 Gaspard, Gilles, 254
 Gasperi, Luis de, 977
 Gasset y Mercader, Manuel, 825
 Gates, Horatio, 434, 482, 484, 504
 Gates, Thomas, 154
 Gatling, Richard J., 891
 Gatling gun, 890 (illus.), 891
Gauchos, 703
 Gauvain, Jacques, 258
 Gavián, battle at, 618
 Gayton, Clarke, 425
 Gayton, George, 498–499
 Gaztañeta y de Iturrizbáza, Antonio, 375
 Geare, Michael, 123, 130–131, 133–134, 138, 139, 144–145
 Geary, J. W., 765
 Geffard, Nicolas, 544, 779
 Gelhaus, Harald, 1011, 1013
 Gelly y Obes, Juan Andrés, 864, 870
 Gelves, Diego Carrillo de Mendoza y Pimentel, Marqués de los, 210
 Gémosat, Louis Ancelin de, 274, 314
 Gennes, Jean-Baptiste, 327–328
 Gentry, Richard, 697
 George II (England), 381–382
 George, Rupert, 517
 George of Hesse-Darmstadt, Prince, 347
 Georgia: counteroffensive in, 490–491; establishment of, 378, 380, 381, 385; Scottish settlement in, 379; Spanish invasion of, 395–396, 395 (map)
 Geraldín, Nicolás, 381
 German military advisors, 993
 Germantown, battle at, 485
 Geronimo, 847 (illus.), 848
 Gerritz, Hendrik, 199–200
 Gerritszoon Meerman, Jan, 173
 Gerritszoon Roodt, Pieter, 172
 Gettysburg (Pennsylvania), 815, 816 (map)
 Ghilardi, Luigi, 786
 Giachino, Pedro Edgardo, 1061, 1062
 Gibraltar, 151
 Gibraltar, Strait of, 347
 Gibsone, John, 332
 Gidoin, John Lewis, 525
 Gifford, George, 132
 Gijón, Jacinto Lope, 319
 Gijón, Sebastián, 319
 Gilbert, Humphrey, 114
 Gilbert, Thomas, 315
 Gill, Michael, 347
 Gillespie, Archibald H., 756
 Gillon, Alexander, 524
 Gilmore, Howard W., 1015
 Giménez, Omar, 1077
 Ginkell, Godert de, 318
 Giradot, Atanasio, 600
 Giraud, Henri, 1007, 1016
 Girod, Amury, 718
 Giroldi Vega, Moisés, 1081
 Girón, Gerónimo, 512
 Giron, Gilbert, 149
 Girón, José María, 779
 Gitszoon, Joachim, 175
 Gladwyn, Henry, 444
 Glanfield, Elizabeth, 125
 Glanvill, Edward, 144
 Glassel, William T., 817
 Glassford, Pelham D., 979
 Glover, Alexander, 378
 Glover, Richard, 121
 Gobert, Jacques Nicolas, 557
 Godfrey, John, 317–318
 Godinez Osorio, Pedro, 104
 Goicoechea, Miguel de, 499, 510
 Goimpy, Dumaitz de, 311, 312, 313, 314
 Göing, Walter, 1013
 Góis Monteiro, Pedro Aurélio de, 1022

- Goldthwait, Benjamin, 407
 Gomes, Eduardo, 1028
 Gomes, Jorge, 41
 Gomes de Melo, João, 203
 Gomes de Sousa, João, 295
 Gómez, Arnulfo F., 988
 Gómez, Félix U., 961
 Gómez, Francisco Estéban, 618
 Gómez, Jorge, 163
 Gómez, José Miguel, 928, 931, 937
 Gómez, Juan, 649
 Gómez, Juan Vicente, 929
 Gómez, Laureano, 1026
 Gómez, Leandro, 855
 Gómez, Servando, 739, 741
 Gómez de Bedoya, Ramón, 657, 706
 Gómez de Larrondo, María Catalina, 583
 Gómez de León, Felipe, 182
 Gómez de Ocampo, Diego, 279
 Gómez de Sandoval, Gerónimo, 198, 199
 Gómez Fariás, Valentín, 701
 Gómez Pedraza, Manuel, 699, 700, 701
 Gómez Portugal, Miguel, 585
 Gómez Roca, Sergio, 1067
 Gompers, William, 934
 Gonçalves, André, 9
 Gonçalves, Jerônimo, 894, 895–896
 Gonçalves da Silva, Bento, 702, 715
 Gonçalves da Silva, Tomaz, 379
 Gondra, Manuel, 930
 Goñi Simpson, Luis Alberto, 900
 Gonneville, Binot Paulmier de, 11
 González, Abraham, 940
 González, Alonso, 84
 González, Andrés, 367
 González, Domingo, 89
 González, Francisco, 123, 640, 648, 658
 González, José Herón, 956, 957
 González, Juan, 16
 González, Juan Bautista, 160
 González, Lucas, 644
 González, Manuel, 832, 835, 839, 877
 González, Miguel, 700
 González, Pablo, 944, 948, 953, 954, 956, 959, 961–965 passim
 González, Vicente (Argentine), 732
 González, Vicente (Spanish), 122
 González, Vicente Bascourt y Bassecourt, Marqués, 436, 440
 González Balcarce, Antonio, 581, 585
 González Dávila, Gil, 38–39, 40
 González de Herrera, Pedro, 153
 González de Leiva, Luis, 58, 59, 60
 González de Mendoza, Jerónimo, 552
 González Flor, Raimundo, 1002
 González Flores, Alfredo, 937
 González Flores, Anacleto, 987, 988
 González Garza, Roque, 959
 González Hermosillo, José María, 587
 González Laval, Juan Galo, 706
 González Macchi, Luis, 1088
 González Manrique, Mateo, 690
 González Ortega, Jesús, 792, 793, 829, 830, 831
 González Quint, Emilio, 996
 González Salas, José, 943
 González Urrazo, Benito, 129
 Goodall, S. G., 523
 Goodrich, Caspar F., 911, 919, 927
 Goodson, William, 232, 233, 234–235
 Goodwin, Edward, 140
 Gordillo Martínez, Francisco Luis, 1056
 Gordon, Charles, 547
 Gordon, George, 354
 Gordon, John, 678
 Gore, Henry, 357
 Gore, Robert, 744
 Gorham, John (1675), 281
 Gorham, John (1744), 402, 403
 Gorostieta, Enrique, 988, 989
 Gorriaran Merlo, Enrique, 1055
 Gorriti, José Francisco, 706
 Gosnold, Bartholomew, 152
 Gosselin, Gerard, 686
 Gosselin, Thomas Le Marchant, 554–555
 Gouin, Pierre, 289
 Goulaine de Laudonnière, René, 92
 Goulart, João, 1037–1038
 Goumenot, Laurens de, 363
 Gourgues, Dominique de, 98–99
 Gourselas, Médéric Rolle, Sieur de, 236
 Goyeneche, José Manuel de, 580–581
 Grado, Jerónimo, 156
 Graeme, Lawrence, 513, 521
 Graf, Ulrich, 1013
 Grajales, Pedro, 554
 Grammont, Sieur de, 289, 295, 297, 298, 304, 306; at Veracruz, 299–300
 Granada, 249, 269
 Granada, Nicolás, 741
 Grandfontaine, Hubert d'Andigny, Chevalier de, 285
 Granier, Juan, 883
 Grant, H. W., 971
 Grant, James, 424, 725
 Grant, Noel, 968
 Grant, Richard, 731
 Grant, Ulysses S., 800, 802, 807 (illus.), 818, 822; as commander in chief, 818–819, 824; and the Monroe Doctrine, 898; and the western theater, 803, 805, 812, 813–814, 817
 Granville, William H., 708
 Grasse Tilly, François Joseph Paul, Comte de, 492, 502, 514, 515, 517–518; at Les Saintes, 522; at Saint Kitts, 492, 520–521
 Grau San Martín, Ramón, 981
 Grau Seminario, Miguel, 881–883
 Graves, Thomas, 441, 517, 520, 552
 Gravina, Federico Carlos, 562
 Gray, Andrew, 669
 Gray, Andrew V. F., 760
 Graydon, John, 341, 345
 Great American Brotherhood, 565
 Great Depression, 976
 Great White Fleet, 928, 929 (illus.)
 Green, Charles, 559
 Green, William, 402
 Greenaway, James, 323
 Greene, Christopher, 486
 Greene, Nathanael, 478, 506, 513, 518
 Greene, William C., 922
 Greenfield, John, 743
 Gregory, Francis H., 750
 Gregory, George, 537
 Gregory, Thomas, 398
 Gregory XIII, Pope, 111
 Grenada: Franco-Carib War, 230; and the French and Indian War, 434–435; French capture of, 493–494; French occupation of, 226–227; U.S. invasion of, 1077–1080
 Grenfell, John Pascoe, 655
 Grenville, Richard, 115, 116, 117
 Grey, Charles, 484, 546
 Grey, George, 546
 Gridley, Charles V., 910
 Griego, Juan, 108, 618
 Grierson, Benjamin H., 813
 Griffith, Edward, 686
 Griggs, John, 717
 Grijalva, Hernando de, 43
 Grijalva, Juan de, 21–22, 39
 Grillo, Diego, 275
 Grillo, Domingo, 363
 Grimbald, Paul, 307
 Grimmington, Michael, 333
 Grinfield, William, 559
 Grippe, Cuthbert, 123, 124, 127
 Groenewegen, Aert Adriaanszoon, 161, 193
 Grognet, François, 303, 304, 305–306, 308
 Grove, John, 232
 Grove, Marmaduke, 975–976
 Grüber Odremán, Hernán, 1084–1085
 Guachas, battle at, 637
 Guadalajara: battle at, 955; fall of, 792–793; siege of, 788–789
 Guadarrama, Amado, 841, 842, 843
 Guadeloupe, 231, 237, 557–558, 575–576; conquest of Indians on, 215, 217; English failed assault of, 344–345, 344 (map); and the French and Indian War, 426–427; French defense of, 320–321; revolts on, 225, 235; settlement of, 214
 Guaimiaba, Chief, 162
 Guajardo, Jesús María, 962, 963–964, 965
 Guajardo Fajardo, Diego, 202

- Guajira, 61
 Gual, Mateo, 399
 Guale, Chief, 95
 Gualter Allara, Jorge, 1060
 Guama, Chief, 38
 Guanais, Benardo Miguel de, 713
 Guanaja, 292
 Guantánamo, 931; and the
 Spanish-American War, 912–913;
 Vernon at, 393
 Guarani War, 413–414
 Guararapes: first battle of, 206–207;
 second battle of, 208–209
 Guatemala: Alvarado in, 39–40;
 sociopolitical unrest in, 1020, 1024,
 1026–1027, 1032, 1037, 1056, 1058,
 1087
 Guayaquil, 166, 308, 353–354
 Guaybana, Chief, 16
 Guazo Calderón, Gregorio, 369, 371, 372,
 375
 Guedes Souto Maior, Gregório, 190
 Güemes y Horcasitas, Juan Francisco de,
 383, 605
 Guerin, Daniel, 540
 Guerin, Duguay, 347
 Guerra, Cristóbal, 7, 9, 11
 Guerra, Donato, 876
 Guerra, Faustino “Pino,” 927, 937
 Guerra, Luis, 9
 Guerrero, José, 628
 Guerrero, Manuel Amador, 926
 Guerrero, Pedro, 393
 Guerrero de la Fuente, Tomás, 151
 Guerrero Saldaña, Vicente Ramón, 590, 609, 612, 628, 640, 641, 642, 698; as president, 699, 700
 Guest, Charles, 256
 Guevara, Ángel Aníbal, 1056
 Guevara, Hernando de, 9
 Güevara de la Serna, Ernesto “Ché,” 1030,
 1039, 1039 (illus.), 1040, 1088
 Guggiari, José Patricio, 977, 979
 Guichamoco (Mexico), 878
 Guildford Courthouse, battle at, 512–513
 Guillén, Arturo, 993–994, 1001–1002
 Guillén Ugalde, Sixto, 941
 Guillon, Etienne (Sieur de Laubiére),
 245
 Guimarães, Ubiratan, 1084
 Guise, John, 392
 Guise, Martín Jorge, 658
 Guitaud, Charles de Peychpeyrou
 Comminge de, 313, 314, 317
 Guise François, Duc de, 88
 Gunby, John, 514
 Gundelfinger, Andreas, 61, 62, 64
 Guruceta, Roque, 658
 Gutiérrez, Antonio, 448
 Gutiérrez, Celedonio, 783
 Gutiérrez, Eulalio, 944, 955
 Gutiérrez, Juan, 234
 Gutiérrez, Juan Ramón, 367
 Gutiérrez, Lorenzo, 779, 827
 Gutiérrez, Lucio, 1090
 Gutiérrez, Luis, 944
 Gutiérrez, Pedro, 3
 Gutiérrez, Pedro (alcalde mayor, Ciudad Real), 361
 Gutiérrez, Victorino, 994
 Gutiérrez Cevallos, Juan Carlos, 385
 Gutiérrez de Aguilón, Juan, 63
 Gutiérrez de Garibay, Juan, 137
 Gutiérrez de la Fuente, Antonio, 656,
 728
 Gutiérrez de Lara, José Bernardo, 585,
 588, 594, 598, 600–601
 Gutiérrez de Palomar, Juan, 110
 Gutiérrez de Rubalcava, Joaquín, 825
 Gutiérrez Flores, Francisco, 127
 Gutiérrez Zamora, Manuel, 788
 Gutmasolero, Chief, 921
 Guy, Arthur, 162
 Guyana, 1084
 Guzmán, Gaspar de (Conde-Duque de Olivares), 198
 Guzmán, Gonzalo de, 42, 79
 Guzmán, Martín de, 56
 Guzmán, Nuño de, 42
 Guzmán, Perfecto, 837
 Gwinn, John, 747

 Haas, Barent, 278
 Haig, Alexander, 1064
 Hains, Peter C., 919
 Haiti: civil war, 569; overthrow of Aristide,
 1090; revolution in, 531–545, 533
 (map), 539 (map); sociopolitical unrest in, 929–934 passim, 976–977,
 1022, 1044, 1057, 1058, 1083, 1084,
 1085–1086; U.S. intervention in,
 934–935, 937–938; U.S. invasion of,
 1086–1087
 Hale, John, 440
 Hale, Nathan, 481
 Hale, Richard, 556
 Halkett, Peter, 415
 Hall, Amos, 678
 Hall, Newt H., 935
 Halleck, Henry W., 803, 807
 Hamilton, Alexander, 520
 Hamilton, John, 491
 Hamilton, John (captain, Falklands Campaign), 1063
 Hamilton, Walter, 314, 349
 Hamlin, Jean, 300
 Hammond, Andrew Snape, 498
 Hampton, James, 96
 Hampton, John, 97
 Hampton, Thomas, 91
 Hampton, Wade, 507, 518, 675, 676
 Hampton Roads, battle at, 804–805
 Hamstead, John, 552
 Hancock, Chief, 360
 Hancock, John, 467, 468, 476, 529
 Hancock, Winfield Scott, 818–819
 Handcock, Richard B., 680
 Handy, Levin, 495
 Hankerson, Thomas, 434
 Hanks, Porter, 666
 Hannam, Willoughby, 232
 Hanneken, Herman H., 938
 Hanxleden, Johann Ludwig Wilhelm von,
 508
 Harcourt, Michael, 154
 Harcourt, Robert, 154
 Harcourt, William Richard, 575
 Hardee, William J., 823
 Hardegen, Reinhard, 1009, 1011
 Hardin, John J., 763
 Harding, Thomas, 123
 Hardy, Charles, 397, 420, 421
 Hardy, Thomas, 339, 682
 Haringman, Maarten, 443
 Harland, Robert, 357
 Harley, Nicolas de, 154
 Harman, John, 248, 257, 258, 260, 261,
 291
 Harman, William (French and Indian War), 425, 426
 Harman, William (King William’s War),
 323, 326
 Harmar, Josiah, 529
 Harmon, Johnson, 373
 Harmood, Harry, 440
 Harney, William S., 766
 Harper, William, 140
 Harpers Ferry, 811
 Harriman, Averell, 1023
 Harris, Joseph (“Master Harps”), 122
 Harris, Leonard, 232
 Harris, Peter (nephew), 302, 303
 Harris, Peter (the Elder), 294
 Harris, Thomas, 271
 Harris, William, 268, 269
 Harrison, William Henry, 665, 670, 675
 Hartenstein, Werner, 1011, 1013
 Hartwijk, Hans, 278
 Harty, Olivier, 536
 Harvey, Eliab, 547
 Harvey, Henry, 551
 Harvey, John, 552, 673
 Harvey, Thomas, 555
 Harwood, Henry, 1006–1007
 Haskell, William T., 765
 Haskett, Elias, 337
 Hassett, Patrick, 974
 Hastings, Theophilus, 359, 364
 Haswell, Robert, 434
 Hatch, Charles, 936
 Hatfield, Gilbert D., 986
 Hatuey, Chief, 16
 Hauteval, Lucien, 553

- Hautyn, Willem de, 206, 207, 208
Havana, 132; Dutch blockades of, 172, 175, 177–178, 198; English blockades of, 121, 126, 127; and Franco-Spanish Wars, 79, 81, 85; and the French and Indian War, 436–440, 437 (map)
Haviland, William, 431, 434
Hawke, Edward, 430
Hawker, James, 434
Hawkes, Samuel, 232
Hawkins, Charles, 322
Hawkins, John, 60, 91, 92–93, 97–98, 135; death, 136; at Ríoacha, 99
Hawkins, Richard, 113, 128; in Pacific, 129, 130
Hawkins, William, 97, 113
Hawkins, William, Jr., 111
Hawley, Henry, 213
Haya de la Torre, Víctor Raúl, 979
Hayes, Rutherford B., 865
Hayrie, Hubert de La, 837
Hays, John C., 756
Hayward, John, 232
Hazard, Samuel F., 757
Heady, William J., 762
Heald, Nathan, 667
Hearst, William Randolph, 907
Heath, Thomas, 227, 323
Heck, Silvio, 1028
Hédouville, Thomas, 542
Heerweer, Pieter, 206, 207
Heister, Philipp von, 476, 477
Hencelin, Pierre, 256, 320
Henderson, James, 204
Henderson, William Honyman, 501, 731
Hendricksz, Boudewijn, 141, 170–173, 171 (map)
Hendriksz, Abraham, 193
Hendrikszoon, Albert, 175
Henley, John, 691
Henne, Richard, 139
Henne, Wolf, 1015
Hennique, Agathon, 827
Henri II (France), 82, 86, 87, 88
Henri III (France), 115, 121
Henri IV (France), 130
Henri, Duc de Guise, 86, 115
Henri de Navarre, 115, 121
Henry, James D., 694
Henry, John, 538
Henry, Patrick, 467
Henson, Rev. Josiah, 719
Hérard, Charles Sr., 746
Herbert, Charles, 548
Herbert, Edward, 394
Herbert, Richard, 383
Herchmer, William, 891
Herckemans, Elias, 201
Heredia, Alejandro, 715, 728
Heredia, Felipe, 727
Heredia, Pedro de, 60, 60–61
Herkimer, Nicholas, 481, 482
Hermanszoon, Gerard, 159
Hermosillo, Luis, 988
Hermosillo (Mexico), battle at, 959
Hermoso, José María, 621
Hermsdorf, Christian, 380
Hernández, Fidencio, 953
Hernández, Francisco, 39
Hernández, Joseph M., 696
Hernández, Juan, 878
Hernández, Macario M., 959
Hernández, Nicolás, 396
Hernández, Pedro, 617
Hernández, Rosalio, 949
Hernández de Córdoba, Francisco, 21
Hernández de León, Francisco, 84
Hernández Girón, Francisco, 71
Hernández Martínez, Maximiliano, 979
Hernández Monagas, José María, 643
Hernández Pinzón y Álvarez, Luis, 849
Hernández Portocarrero, Alonso, 26
Hernández y Moreno, Francisco, 166
Heron, Patrick, 401
Herquiniño Velarrinaga, Pedro de, 241
Herrera, Benjamín, 920
Herrera, Francisco de, 201
Herrera, José Joaquín de, 747
Herrera, Juan de, 499
Herrera, Maclovio, 946, 947
Herrera, Rafaela, 441
Herrera, Tomás, 744
Herrera Hassan, Eduardo, 1083
Herrera y Cairo, Anacleto, 832
Herrerías, Juan de las, 177
Herrero, Rodolfo, 965
Herrick, Samuel, 482
Hertel de La Fresnière, Joseph-François, 315
Hertel de Rouville, Jean-Baptiste, 346, 353
Hervey, Augustus John, 434
Hesse, Emmanuel, 502
Hessians, 480
Hevia, Francisco, 643
Hewetson, John, 311, 314–315
Heyn, Piet Pieterszoon, 169, 172–174, 173, 173 (illus.); in Caribbean, 175 (map), 176, 177–178; at São Salvador, 164, 166
Heyse, Ulric, 1011
Heywood, Charles, 774
Heywood, Peter, 298
Hibernia Regiment, 513
Hidalgo, Alonso, 124
Hidalgo, Claro, 768
Hidalgo, Joaquin, 736, 736 (illus.)
Hidalgo, José Manuel, 825
Hidalgo de Cisneros y Latorre, Baltasar, 578, 581
Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel, 582, 583, 585, 586, 589
Higginson, F.J., 918
High-explosive shells, 729
Hill, Ambrose P., 809, 811, 814, 815, 824
Hill, Benjamín G., 950, 954, 957, 958
Hill, D. H., 811
Hill, John, 481
Hill, John (“Jack”), 357
Hill, Thomas, 313
Hill, William, 254
Hills, John, 539
Hillyar, James, 679
Hilton, Anthony, 211, 213, 214, 255
Hilton, John, 213
Hilton, Winthrop, 351
Hind, Thomas, 689
Hinman, Benjamin, 468
Hinman, Elisha, 487
Hinojosa, Ramón H., 950
Hippisley, Gustavus, 623
Hippon, Anthony, 138, 139, 144–145
Hislop, Thomas, 575
Hispaniola: buccaneers on, 215; and Madrid’s depopulation plan, 149–150, 151
Hitchcock, Ethan Allen, 747, 778
Hitler, Adolf, 1007, 1007, 1019
Hixon, Thomas, 213
Ho Chi Minh, 1048
Hobart, David, 482
Hobson, Richmond P., 912
Hodges, Richard, 232
Hodgson, Robert, 385
Hoek, Jakob, 278
Holata Outina, Chief, 92
Holburne, Francis, 417, 420, 421
Holguín, Garcí, 38
Holland, Edward, 356
Holley, Adolfo, 901
Hollwell, John, 434
Holmes, A. H., 679
Holmes, Charles, 410, 419, 421
Holmes, Robert, 246
Home, Roddam, 540
Homer, Isaiah, 611
Honduras: and the Soccer War, 1041; sociopolitical unrest in, 1029, 1030, 1031, 1037, 1045, 1048, 1051, 1057
Hood, John Bell, 811, 817, 819, 823, 824
Hood, Samuel, 509–517 passim, 558, 559; at Les Saintes, 523–524; at Saint Kitts, 520–521
Hood, Thomas Samuel, 741
Hoogenhoeck, Commodore, 331, 332
Hoogstraaten, Dirck, 204
Hooker, Joseph, 811, 813, 815–816, 817
Hooper, Henry, 528
Hoover, Herbert, 938, 976
Hope, James, 740
Hopkins, Esek, 473
Hoppenot, Henri, 1018
Hopson, Peregrine Thomas, 425, 426

- Hopsonn, Edward, 376
 Hopsonn, Thomas, 339
 Horbegoso, Juan, 643
 Hore, Daniel, 392
 Hore, John, 126
 Horn, Carlos, 774
 Hornigold, Benjamin, 367
 Hornos, Manuel, 781
 Horseshoe Bend, battle at, 679–680
 Horsley, Gilbert, 104
 Horton, William, 395, 396
 Hosier, Francis, 357, 375, 376
 Hosogaya, Boshiro, 1013, 1017
 Hotham, Charles, 740–741
 Hotham, Charles E., 900
 Hotham, William, 476, 489, 501
 Hottinguer, Jean Conrad, 553
 Houël, Charles, 230, 231, 231, 237, 241
 Houël, Robert, 230, 237, 241
 Houlton, John, 440, 501
 Houston, Samuel P., 722, 726
 Hout, George, 308
 Houten, Willem, 250
 Howard, Arthur, 890
 Howard, John, 509
 Howard, William A., 758
 Howe, George Augustus, 423, 471
 Howe, Richard, 417, 471, 476, 487, 528
 Howe, Robert, 490–491, 495
 Howe, William, 468–469, 471, 471, 473, 480, 482, 487; at Brandywine, 482–484; at Danbury, 480; and the French and Indian War, 428, 438; at Germantown, 485; at New York City, 476–477; at Paoli, 484; and the siege of Boston, 469; at White Plains, 478
 Howison, Neil M., 748
 Huachi, battle at, 648
 Huajuapán, siege of, 593
 Huallpa Yupanqui, 72
 Huan, Johann-Siegfried, 967, 969
 Huaqui, battle at, 589, 589 (map)
 Huáscar, Chief, 48, 49, 53
 Huatulco (Mexico), 120
 Huaypalcon, 52
 Hubbard, John, 232
 Hudson, Charles, 499
 Hudson, Thomas, 340, 341
 Hudson's Bay, 308, 311, 319, 326, 327, 333
 Hudson's Bay Company, 868
 Huerta Ortega, Victoriano, 922, 942, 943, 944, 945, 950, 953, 958
 Huertas, Esteban, 927
 Huger, Isaac, 490, 493, 497, 501, 512
 Hughes, Richard, 525
 Hughes, Robert, 425
 Hugues, Victor, 548, 573
 Huidobro, José Ruiz, 712, 713
 Huidobro, Juan Fermin, 285
 Huidobro, Pascual Ruiz, 569
 Huigen, Klaas, 278
 Hull, Cordell, 1010
 Hull, Isaac, 555–556, 666–667
 Hull, Joseph B., 748
 Hull, William, 665
 Humaitá (Paraguay), 863
 Hume, John, 721
 Hunley, Horace L., 818
 Hunt, Anthony, 446
 Hunt, H. J., 815
 Hunt, Rex, 1059, 1060, 1061, 1062
 Hunt, William E., 759
 Hunter, Benjamin F. B., 766
 Hunter, Charles G., 766
 Hunter, David, 803, 814
 Hunter, Hugh, 1079
 Hunter, Robert, 360
 Huntington, Robert W., 912, 913
 Huoni, Daniel, 381, 382
 Hurdle, Thomas, 740
 Hurtado de Arbieto, Martín, 72
 Hurtado de Mendoza, Diego, 43
 Hurtado de Mendoza, García, Marqués de Cañete, 127, 129
 Hurtado de Mendoza, Luis, 1008
 Hutchens, Stephen, 353
 Hutchinson, Edward, 280
 Hutt, John, 546
 Hutten, Philipp von, 64, 65–66
 Huydecoper, Jacob Janszoon, 142
 Huygens, Cornelis, 175
 Huygens, Jacob, 197, 199
 Ibáñez de Peralta, Francisco, 339
 Ibáñez del Campo, Carlos, 975–976
 Ibarra, battle at, 655
 Ibarra, Diego, 633, 646, 650–651
 Ibarra, Francisco de, 143
 Ibarra, Miguel de, 68
 Ibibobo (Paraguay), battle at, 1001
 Ide, William B., 753
 Igarza, Nicolás de, 309
 Iglesias, Miguel, 887, 889
 Iglesias, Rafael, 610
 Ignace, Joseph, 557–558
 Illa Tupac, 54
 Illia, Arturo Umberto, 1038–1039
 Ilo (Peru), 296
 Ilumbe, José, 347
 Imán, Santiago, 744
 Impressment, 666
 Inácio, José Joaquim, 863
 Inca, conquest of the, 48–56
 Inchauspe, Pedro Luis, 648
 Incleton, Richard, 547
 India Muerta, battle at, 612, 738
 Infante, Rodrigo, 61
 Ingavi (Paraguay), battle at, 1002
 Ingenios, Diogo, 76
 Inglefield, Edward Augustus, 740
 Ingles, James, 709
 Ingoldsby, Richard, 320
 Ingraham, Duncan N., 747
 Innes, Thomas, 408
 Inquill, 53–54
 Iquique, battle at, 881–882
 Irendagüe (Paraguay), battle at, 1000
 Iriarte, Tomás de, 734
 Iribarren, Guillermo, 623, 645
 Irish, William, 122, 123
 Ironclads, 880; and the American Civil War, 803, 804, 807–808, 813, 821, 823
 Iroquois Indians, 223, 229, 241, 310; and King William's War, 313
 Irrazábal, Luis, 994
 Irrazábal, Pablo, 784
 Irrazaga, Juan de, 186
 Irurzun, Hugo, 1048
 Irvine, Acheson, 890
 Irvine, William, 475
 Isabel, Queen (Spain), 5
 Iscas, José, 783
 Iseas, José, 783
 Isla del Rey, 303
 Isolationism, 1005
 Isseris, Louis, 557
 Ita, Pieter Adriaanszoon, 161, 163, 175, 176; in Caribbean, 175 (map), 177, 181
 Itabaté, battle at, 864
 Itamaracá, 196–197
 Itaparicá Island, 204, 206
 Itata incident, 901–902
 Iterián, Pedro de, 139–140
 Ites, Otto, 1011
 Itororó, battle at, 863
 Iturbe, José Marino, 728
 Iturbe, Manuel, 588
 Iturbe, Ramón F., 951
 Iturbide, Agustín de, 603, 641
 Iturriaga, José, 399
 Iturriaza, Agustín, 378
 Ituzaingó, battle at, 706–707, 707 (map)
 Ivonnet, Pedro, 932
 Ixtlilxóchitl, Chief, 35
 Izard, George, 676
 Izquierdo, Julián, 600
 Izurieta, Ricardo, 1088
 Jackson, Andrew, 670, 678–679, 679, 689–690, 693–694
 Jackson, Claiborne, 800
 Jackson, Thomas J. "Stonewall," 805, 808–811, 813
 Jackson, William, 220–223, 224
 Jacobs, Maxwell, 498
 Jacobszoon, Cornelis, 166
 Jacobszoon, Willem, 164
 Jacques, Louis, 488
 Jakobszoon Quast, Meindert, 278
 Jalpa (Mexico), 345

- Jamaica, 235–236, 242; earthquake, 322;
English attacks on, 222, 233–234;
French attacks on, 313, 325–326
- James I (England), 145, 217
- James II (England), 308, 337; and the Glorious Revolution, 312, 315, 318
- James, William, 243
- James Bay, 306–307
- James Edward (Stuart pretender), 337
- Jamestown, 125, 152–153, 210
- Janszoon, Hillebrandt, 164, 166
- Janszoon, Reinier, 158
- Janszoon Eisens, Gerrit, 172
- Janszoon Zuyl, Jan, 172
- Jaques, Richard, 373
- Jaquijahuana Plain, battle at, 71
- Jara Benegas, Albino, 929, 930, 931
- Jaramillo, Josefa, 762
- Jardim, Jeronimo Gomes, 701
- Jarvis, Joseph R., 747
- Jarvis, Samuel Peters, 868
- Jarvis, William Botsford, 719
- Jauja, attack on, 50–51
- Jáuregui y Aldecoa, Agustín de, 526
- Jay, John, 549
- Jay Treaty, 549
- Jeannot-Oudin, Nicolas Georges, 546
- Jeannigros, Pierre-Jean Joseph, 831, 836, 838
- Jefferson, Thomas, 508, 549, 556, 556, 898
- Jeffreys, Herbert, 283, 285
- Jekyll, Edward, 425
- Jenkins, John, 670
- Jenkins, Robert, 381
- Jennings, Henry, 364, 367–368
- Jervis, John, 441, 546–547, 548
- Jesuits, 413, 447
- Jesup, Thomas, 682, 696
- Jesús Córdova, Manuel, 1024
- Jiménez, Enrique A., 1022
- Jiménez, Fortún, 43
- Jiménez, Francisco, 619, 621, 624, 633
- Jiménez, José Mariano, 583, 589
- Jiménez, Juan Isidro, 924, 925, 935
- Jiménez, Manuel, 354
- Jiménez, Vicente, 842
- Jiménez de Quesada, Gonzalo, 62, 63,
64–65
- Jiménez Figueroa, Luis, 955
- João II (Portugal), 5
- João III (Portugal), 76, 77, 86
- João IV (Portugal), 198, 202, 204
- João VI (Portugal), 577, 609, 617, 640, 652
- João, Matias, 200
- Jobson, Thomas, 131
- Jofre de Loaysa, Juan Garci, 75
- John, Henry, 686
- John Paul II, Pope, 1053
- Johnson, Andrew, 822, 824
- Johnson, Bradley T., 821
- Johnson, Frank, 722, 724
- Johnson, Henry, 494
- Johnson, Lyndon Baines, 1037, 1038, 1048
- Johnson, Nathaniel, 350
- Johnson, Perkins, 976
- Johnson, Richard Mentor, 675
- Johnson, William, 415, 417–418, 428–430
- Johnston, Albert S., 802, 803, 805
- Johnston, Joseph E., 771, 798, 799, 800,
813, 815, 819, 823, 824; Peninsula
Campaign and, 799, 805
- Jol, Cornelis Corneliszoon (Houtebeen, “Peg-Leg”), 182, 186, 188, 193,
194–195, 197, 199; at Cuba,
190–191, 198; Los Órganos Keys,
196
- Jolliffe, Henry, 140
- Jonassaint, Emile, 1086
- Jones, Cadwallader, 321
- Jones, Catesby ap Roger, 689, 804
- Jones, Herbert, 1072, 1073
- Jones, John Paul, 474
- Jones, Sam, 697
- Jones, Thomas ap Catesby “Tac,” 745–746
- Joosten, Willem, 172
- Jordán, José, 552
- José, Amaro, 348
- Joseph I (Holy Roman emperor), 356
- Joseph, François Nivard Charles, Vicomte
d’Hénin, 544
- Joybert de Soulanges et de Marson, Pierre de, 277
- Joyner, John, 525
- Juan, Jorge, 378
- Juan y Santacilia, Jorge, 446
- Juana, Queen (Spain), 16
- Juárez, Benito, 786, 787, 788, 793; 876;
and French intervention, 824, 827,
828, 831, 832, 833, 840, 844; Leyes de Reforma and, 790–791; at Veracruz, 793
- Juárez Celman, Miguel, 876
- Júcar, Juan de, 43
- Judice y Fiesco, Nicolás de, 189
- Jugeat, Pierre, 691
- Julien, Honoré, 289
- Julius, William, 325
- Jumécourt, Hamus de, 533
- Jumonville, Joseph Coulon de Villiers de, 415
- Junín, battle at, 657, 657 (map)
- Junot, Andoche, 577
- Jurien de la Gravière, Jean-Pierre
Edmond, 826, 830
- Justo, Agustín P., 977
- Juvera, Julián, 745, 764
- Kähler, Otto, 1008
- Kakuta, Kakuji, 1013–1014, 1015
- Kalb, Johann, 504–505
- Kals, Ernst, 1009–1011, 1013
- Kane, Richard, 357
- Karamanli, Hamet, 556
- Karamanli, Pasha Yusuf, 556
- Karesboom, J. N., 576
- Karmany, Lincoln, 931
- Karstens, Heertge, 278
- Karstenszoon, Jan, 172
- Kay, George C., 709
- Kaynall, Christopher, 241
- Keane, John, 690–691
- Kearnie, James, 704
- Kearny, Stephen Watts, 755, 761–762
- Keating, James, 687
- Keats, Richard Goodwin, 564
- Kebble, Christopher, 1073
- Keble, Robert, 124
- Kedgell, Henry, 124, 127
- Keene, John, 272
- Kegwin, Richard, 317
- Keimling, Herbert, 986
- Kellerman, François Christophe, 535
- Kelly, William, 378
- Kelly, William Hancock, 547
- Kempthorne, James, 525
- Kendall, James, 316, 323
- Kendrick, John, 441
- Kennedy, John F.: and Bay of Pigs invasion, 1032, 1033, 1035; and the Cuban Missile Crisis, 1036, 1037;
and Vietnam, 1048
- Kennell, George, 123, 126
- Keppel, Augustus von, 394, 415, 437
- Keppel, William, 440
- Kerjulien, Julien Marie, Baron Cosmao,
562
- Kernan, Buck, 1082
- Kerr, William, 350
- Kerr, William Johnson, 673
- Kersaint, Armand Guy Simon de
Coëtnempren, Comte de, 521
- Kersley, Lesley Webber, 1009
- Ketcher, Bartholomew, 232
- Keuvelaer, Boudewijn, 257
- Key, Astley Cooper, 740
- Key, Francis Scott, 688
- Keymis, Lawrence, 132, 156
- Khrushchev, Nikita S., 1036, 1037
- Kidd, Daniel “Dandy,” 388
- Kidd, William, 314–315
- Kieft, Willem, 201
- Kijkoveral, 161
- Kilometer 7, 992–993
- Kim II Sung, 1025
- Kimball, George, 724
- Kimura, Masatomi, 1018
- Kina, Jean, 536
- Kincaid, Thomas C., 1017
- Kind, Michiel, 278
- King, Ernest J., 1008
- King, James, 525

- King, Richard, 425
 King, William, 123, 125, 126
 King Philip's War, 280–282, 281 (map)
 Kinghill, William, 402
 King's Mountain, battle at, 506, 507 (map)
 Kingson, Roger, 121
 Kirby, Francis, 232
 Kirk, Peircy, 357
 Kirkby, Richard, 340
 Kirke, David, 211
 Kirke, Lewis, 211
 Kirke, Thomas, 211
 Kirkland, James, 507
 Kirkwood, Robert, 512–513
 Kiska Island, 1018
 Klinger, Adolf, 651
 Klinger, Bertoldo, 980
 Knatchbull, Charles, 523
 Knight, James, 322, 324
 Knight, John, 523
 Knight, William, 303
 Knottesford, Richard, 139
 Knowles, Charles, 382, 384, 391–392, 392, 398–401, 406; at Cape Tiburón, 389; as commander at Jamaica, 408–409, 410–411
 Knowlton, Thomas, 477
 Knox, Dudley, 937
 Knox, Henry, 469
 Knox, Philander C., 930
 Köhler, Erich, 967
 Kolle, Walter, 1012
 Komandorski Islands, battle at, 1017
 Korean War, 1025
 Koresh, David, 1085
 Kosciuszko, Tadeusz Andrzej Bonawentura, 516
 Kosterlitzky, Emilio, 922
 Krech, Gunther, 1011, 1013
 Kruel, Amaury, 1038
 Kubitshek, Juscelino, 1029
 Kuhlmann, Hans-Gunther, 1015
 Kundt, Hans, 993, 993, 994, 995, 996
 Kurita, Takeo, 1014–1015
 Kurusu, Saburo, 1010
- La Carbonera (Mexico), 839
 La Charoulière, Pierre Louis François Buor de, 502
 La Condamine, Charles de, 378
 La Fayette, Marie Joseph Paul Yves Roch Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de, 510, 519
 La Force, René-Hypolite Pépin, 424, 431
 La Garde, Pierre, 287, 289
 La Guaira (Venezuela), 134, 220, 295, 398–399, 398 (illus.)
 La Hogaza, battle at, 621
 La Limonade, 319–320
 La Malue, Paul Marin, Sieur de, 377, 405
 La Morandiere, Étienne Robert de, 516
- La Paz (Bolivia), 241
 La Porte, Louis de (Sieur de Louvigny), 364
 La Puerta, Luis, 884
 La Puerta (Venezuela), battle at, 605
 La Ravardiére, Daniel de la Touche, Sieur de, 130, 149, 154, 155
 La Roche Alart, Admiral, 388
 La Salle, Robert Cavalier, Sieur de, 306
 La Serena (Chile), 296–297
 La Tablada, battle at, 711
 La Vallette, Antoine, 413
 La Vallette, Elie A. F., 773
 La Vega, Luis Laso de, 527, 561
 La Verde, battle at, 873–874
 La Vernade, Roi de Courpon, Sieur de, 217
 La Yaguana, 126
 Labaqui, Juan, 594
 Labastida y Dávalos, Pelagio Antonio de, 786
 Labatut, Pedro, 717
 Laborde y Navarro, Angel, 644, 655
 Lacayo Farfán, Enrique, 1031
 Lacerda, Carlos, 1027, 1028
 Lacey, William, 507
 Lacoste, Pierre Robin, 691
 Lacrosse, Jean Baptiste Raymond, 535, 557
 Laet, Jan Jasperz de, 171
 Lafitte, Jean, 687, 689
 Lafond de l'Espérance, Bernard, 252–253
 Lafontant, Roger, 1084
 Lafora, Nicolás, 131
 Laforey, Francis, 551
 Laforey, John, 434, 546, 551
 Lagande, Charles, 417
 Lagoa dos Patos (Brazil), 449–450
 Lagos, Hilario, 780, 875
 Lagos, Pedro, 886–887, 889
 Laguna, Carlos Frederico Lecor, Barão de, 611, 702, 709
 Laguna de Perlas (Nicaragua), battle at, 983
 Laguna de Términos, 293, 294, 314, 317, 337, 339, 346, 357, 364; El Carmen, 366, 366 (illus.)
 Laguna Salada, battle at, 636
 Lake Champlain, battle at, 688
 Lake Erie, battle at, 675
 Lake Okeechobee, battle at, 696–697
 Lally, F.T., 769
 Lally, Thomas Arthur, Baron de, 432
 Lamadrid, Bishop, 786
 Lamadrid, Gregorio Araóz de, 609, 612, 616, 630, 643, 645, 709; at Coronda, 644; at El Tala, 706; and Rosas's campaigns, 734, 735; and Unitarian-Federalist War, 703, 710, 711, 712
 Lamanon, Paul de, 578
 Lamar, Mirabeau Buonaparte, 726
- Lamare, Rodrigo, 652
 Lamartinière, Louis Daure, 543
 Lamb, John, 480
 Lambert, Henry, 533, 669
 Lambert, John, 235, 691, 692
 Lambrechtszoon, Reinier, 158
 Lamero, Hernando, 108
 Lancaster, James, 127, 128
 Landa, Antonio, 788
 Landeche, Martínez de, 308
 Landero, José Juan, 765
 Landouillette de Logivière, Pierre, 288
 Landrum, Eugene M., 1017
 Lane, James H., 763, 815
 Lane, John F., 695
 Lane, Joseph, 771
 Lane, Ralph, 115
 Lane, William, 122, 123, 126, 129, 130
 Lang, William L., 894
 Lángara, Juan de, 450
 Langdon, William, 421
 Langeron, Joseph Andrault, Marquis de, 290
 Langford, Abraham, 243
 Langsdorff, Hans, 1005, 1006–1007
 Langton, James, 127, 128
 Langton, John, 140
 Lanning, Harris, 936
 Lansing, Robert, 959
 Lanusse, Alejandro Agustín, 1043–1044
 Lanza, José Miguel, 660
 Lapérouse, Jean François de Galaup, Comte de, 497, 517, 524, 528
 Laprise, Raynald, 298
 Lara, Jacinto, 627
 Lara, Santos, 892
 Larnage, Charles Brunier, Marquis de, 390
 Larrazábal, Wolfgang, 1030
 Las Guasimas, battle at, 914
 Las Heras, Juan Gregorio de, 615, 617, 642, 644, 646; at Callao, 648; at Gavilán, 618; at Maipú, 626; at Talcahuano, 621
 Las Piedras, battle at, 588
 Las Playas, battle at, 783–784
 Lasso de la Vega, Arturo, 988
 Lastra, Agapito, 988
 Latham, Robert, 348
 Lathrop, Thomas, 281
 Latimer, Julian L., 983
 Latorre Benavente, Juan José, 881, 883
 Latouche-Tréville, Louis René Levassor, Comte de, 543
 Laurie, Walter, 467
 Lauriston, Jacques, 562
 Lausser, Johan Rudolph, 555
 Laval, Pierre, 1007
 Lavalle González, Juan Galo, 651, 706, 707, 709; and Rosas's campaign, 732–735; and the Unitarian-Federalist War, 710, 711

- Lavalleja, Juan Antonio, 701, 702, 706, 707, 709, 716; and Rosas's campaign, 733
 Lavaud, Frank, 1022
 Laveaga, Manuel, 957
 Laveaux, Étienne, 541
 Lawrence, Charles, 422
 Lawrence, Henry, 347
 Lawrence, James, 673
 Lawrence, Peter, 397, 406
 Lawrence, William, 689, 692
 Lawrence (Kansas), 815
 Lawrie, James, 499
 Laws, Joseph, 370
 Laws, William, 387, 391
 Lawson, John, 360
 Lawson, Robert, 512
 Lawton, Henry W., 915
 Lazaga, Juan Bautista, 916
 Le Basque, Michel, 253
 Le Bègue, Jean Antoine, 522
 Le Cap, revolt in, 537
 Le Cercueil, Yves (Sieur Le Fort), 227
 Le Chesnaye, Claude, 345–346
 Le Clerc, François (Jambe de Bois, Pie de Palo), 84
 Le Compte, Bois, 90
 Le Comte, Jean, 226, 230
 Le Cras, Edward, 425
 Le Febre, Cyprien (Chevalier de Lézy), 245
 Le Febvre, Joseph Antoine (Seigneur de La Barre), 245, 255, 256–257, 258, 259, 260
 Le Febvre de Lézy, Jean Hérault, 261, 264, 283, 284, 285
 Le Febvre de Méricourt, Nicolas Le, 286, 289, 324
 Le Fée, Nicolas, 289
 Le Gardeur de Tilly, Armand, 507–508, 522
 Le Gascon, Jean, 289
 Le Grand, Pierre, 189
 Le Grand de Fécamp, Nicolas, 156
 Le Long, Pierre, 255
 Le Loutre, Jean-Louis, 401
 Le Maire, Jacob, 161
 Le Marchand de Lignery, Constant, 377
 Le Moyne, Charles, 307
 Le Moyne, Jacques (Sieur de Sainte Hélène), 315
 Le Poupet de La Boularderie, Antoine, 403
 Le Roux, Etienne (Sieur de Roiville), 229
 Le Sage, François, 300
 Le Sage, Salomon, 257
 Le Testu, Guillaume, 83, 103
 Le Vasseur, François, 219–220, 229, 255
 Le Vassor, François, 311, 312, 324
 Le Vassor de La Touche, Louis Charles, 434
 Lea, William, 397
 Leake, John, 341–342, 347
 Leal, José, 659
 Lear, Tobias, 556
 Leavenworth, Henry, 694
 Lebián, Chief, 447
 Leclerc, Victor Emmanuel, 543–544
 Lecoq, Bernardo, 569
 Ledesma, Alonso Andrea de, 134
 Ledlie, James, 821
 Leduc, Armand, 575
 Lee, Charles, 475
 Lee, Ezra, 477
 Lee, Fitzroy Henry, 404, 405, 407
 Lee, Henry (“Light Horse Harry”), 495, 510, 512–513, 516, 530
 Lee, Ralph, 123
 Lee, Robert E., 798, 799, 808; Antietam, 811; and Appomattox, 824; at Chancellorsville, 813; Fredericksburg, 812; at Gettysburg, 814–815; at Harpers Ferry, 797; and the Peninsula Campaign, 805; at Second Battle of Bull Run, 809–811; the Wilderness, 818–819
 Lee, Samuel P., 768
 Lefebvre, Jacques, 350
 Legardeur de Saint Pierre, Jacques, 406
 Léger, Philippe-Rose Roume et d'Edmond de Saint, 534
 Legge, Edward, 388, 407
 Legge, Julian, 432, 434
 Legge, Thomas, 356
 Legorreta, Pedro de, 167
 Leguía, Augusto B., 929, 977
 Leigh, Gustavo, 1045
 Leisler, Jacob, 313, 320
 Leissègues, Corentin de, 564
 Leitão, Gaspar, 90
 Leitão, Jerônimo, 112
 Leitch, Andrew, 477
 Leite, Diogo, 76
 Leith, Alexander, 550
 Lejeune, John A., 926, 950, 973
 Lemos, Gaspar de, 8
 Leneuf de la Vallière de Beaubassin, Alexandre, 345
 Lenin, Vladimir, 982
 León, Manuel, 659
 León, Pedro, 943–944
 León Herrera, Santos, 1023
 León Toral, José de, 988
 León Torres, Pedro, 617, 621, 624, 627, 640, 650
 Leonard, Robert, 323
 Leoz, Juan de, 178
 Leoz y Echalar, José, 308
 Lepe, Diego, 7
 Lepelletier, Jean, 226
 Lerdo de Tejada, Sebastián, 876
 Lerma, Pedro de, 54
 Les Saintes, battle at, 522–523, 523 (map)
 Lescot, Elie, 1022
 Leslie, Alexander, 477, 479
 Leslie, Lachlin, 398, 425
 Leslie, Samuel, 472
 Lesseps, Ferdinand de, 926
 Lestock, Richard, 357, 388, 390, 391, 393, 406
 Letanduère, Henri François Desherbiers, Marquis de, 389
 Lethbridge, Robert, 667
 Letters of marque, 252
 Levalle, Nicolás, 874, 875
 Levasseur, André, 776
 Levayer de La Vallée, Philippe, 215
 Lévelt, Antoine, 1022
 Leveson-Gower, John, 571
 Levinge, Reginald Thomas Jonathan, 740
 Levingstone, Roberto M., 1042, 1043–1044
 Lévis, François Gaston, Chevalier de, 418, 423, 430, 431
 Lewis, Andrew, 449
 Lewis, William, 669
 Lexington (Massachusetts), 467
 Ley, John, 139, 140
 Leyría, Francisco, 873
 L'Heriller, Edmond-Aimable, 827, 832
 L'Hermite, Jacques (“the Younger”), 164
 L'Hermitte, Jacques, 348
 Liano, Francisco, 378
 Lichthardt, Jan Corneliszoon, 185, 188, 189, 190, 197, 204; at Maranhão, 200
 Lierno Agüero, Hernando de, 136
 Lightfoot, John, 232
 Lightwood, Ellis, 346
 Lilburne, Robert, 301
 Lilius, Aloysius, 111
 Lillingston, Luke, 326, 326–327
 Lillington, Alexander, 473
 Lima, Antonio, 181
 Lima (Peru), 54, 654; Chilean occupation of, 888–889, 889
 Limelín, Ambrosio, 363
 Limpas, Pedro de, 62, 66
 Liñán, Pascual, 619
 Linares, Arsenio, 912, 914, 916
 Lincoln, Abraham, 798, 800, 822, 824; and African American soldiers, 814
 Lincoln, Benjamin, 491, 496–497, 529
 Lindley López, Nicolás, 1037
 Lindo, Juan, 649
 Lindsay, William, 695
 Linge, Paul de, 203
 Lippman, Walter, 1023
 Lircay, battle at, 712
 Lisle, Nicolas, 123
 Lister, Christopher, 119
 Litan, Pierre, 405
 Little Big Horn, 846–847

- Little Crow, Chief, 844
 Little York, battle at, 671
 Littleton, James, 357
 Lizarazu, Cebrián de, 187
 Lizardo, Antón, 764, 766–767, 791
 Lizarza, Fernando, 620
Llaneros, 592
 Llano, Ciriaco de, 591, 594, 603, 604
 Llano, Juan de, 187
 Lloyd, Godfrey, 324
 Lobb, William Granville, 551
 Lobera, Juan de, 85
 Lobera, Pedro, 182
 Lobo, Manuel (1680s), 292–293, 295
 Lobo, Manuel (1820s), 658
 Lobo, Miguel, 854
 Lobo, Rodrigo, 617
 Lobo, Rodrigo José Ferreira de, 704
 Lobo da Silveira, Rodrigo (Conde da Sarzedas), 191
 Lobo Pinheiro, Pêro, 76
 Lock, John, 223
 Lockyer, Nicholas, 687
 Loco (Apache), 847
 Logwood, 293
 Lojero, Emiliano, 941
 L'Olive, Charles Liénard, Sieur de, 214, 215
 Lombardini, Manuel María, 784
 Lombardo, Juan, 1060
 Lombardón, Juan de, 438
 Lonardi, Eduardo, 1028, 1029
 Lonck, Simon, 257
 Loncq, Hendrick Corneliszoon, 178, 179
 Long, Henry, 352, 481
 Long, Pierce, 481
 Long Island, battle on, 476–477
 Longoria, Francisco, 511
 Longstreet, James, 809, 817, 819, 822; at Gettysburg, 814, 815
 Loño, Juan, 633
 Lonvillers, Henri de (Chevalier de Benevent), 225
 Lonvillers de Poincy, Robert, 224, 225, 252
 Loos, Willem Corneliszoon, 197
 Lopes, Isidoro Dias, 975
 Lopes de Sousa, Pêro, 76, 77–78
 López, Antonio, 449
 López, Benedicto, 587
 López, Diego, 104, 106
 López, Estanislao, 628, 630, 637; at Aguirre Ford, 629; at Coronda, 644; at Puente de Márquez, 711
 López, Francisco, 661
 López, Javier, 703, 712
 López, Juan Pablo, 736, 738, 743
 López, Martín, 31, 32, 32
 López, Miguel, 842
 López, Nicolás, 632, 633, 637, 647, 650
 López, Pablo, 959
 López, Rafael, 626
 López Arellano, Oswaldo, 1037, 1041, 1045, 1048
 López de Artunduaga, Dionisio, 309
 López de Escobar, Diego, 193
 López de Flor y Reinoso, Juan, 252
 López de Gámara, Francisco, 287, 310, 319
 López de la Cámara Alta, Agustín, 413
 López de la Flor, Felipe, 408, 409
 López de Legaspip, Miguel, 109
 López de Llergo, Sebastián, 744
 López de Morla, Lope, 189
 López Jordán, Ricardo, 870–872, 874
 López Negrete, Agustín, 940
 López Pérez, Rigoberto, 1029
 López Rayón, Ignacio, 588
 López Rega, José, 1042, 1046
 López Ruiz, Juan, 1046
 López Silva, Raúl, 1052, 1053
 López Uraga, José, 791, 832
 López y Planes, Vicente, 744, 780
 Lord Dunmore's War, 449
 Lorencez, Charles Ferdinand Latrille, Comte de, 826, 827–828, 829
 Lorenzo, Manuel, 634
 Loriga, Juan, 656
 Loring, John, 559
 Loring, Joshua, 431
 Los Abrolhos, 183–185
 Los Angeles, battle at, 761–762
 Los Organos Keys, battle at, 196
 Los Patos, battle at, 627
 Lott, Henrique Duffles Teixeira, 1028–1029
 Loudoun, James Campbell, Earl of, 419, 420, 421
 Louis XIV (France), 226, 259, 273, 305, 308; and James II, 318; and King William's War, 311, 312; and Queen Anne's War, 337
 Louis XV (France), 388, 413
 Louis XVIII (France), 608
 Louis, Thomas, 551, 564
 Louisbourg (Cape Breton Island), 365; and the French and Indian War, 422–423; and King George's War, 403–404, 404 (map)
 Louisiana, Spanish, 447
 Lovelace, Francis, 276
 Lovelace, Thomas, 276
 Lovell, John, 97
 Lovewell, John, 373–374
 Low Dog, 847
 Lowendal, Comte de, 490
 Lowther, George, 394
 Loyalists (American Revolution), 525
 Lozada, Luis de, 271
 Lozada, Manuel, 791, 876; and the French intervention, 827, 829, 831, 834, 835, 837, 838
 Lozano Díaz, Julio, 1029
 Lozoya, Melitón, 965
 Lucan, Patrick Sarfield, Earl of, 318
 Lucas, Jan, 276
 Lucas, Jean, 92
 Lucas García, Fernando Romeo, 1056
 Luce, J., 971
 Lucero, Franklin, 1028
 Lucifer, Hendrick Jacobszoon, 162, 167, 172, 174
 Lucifer, Jacob Hendrickszoon, 175
 Lüdecke, Fritz, 967, 969, 972
 Lüders, Emil, 897
 Ludyard, William, 214
 Luengo, Simón, 870
 Lugo, José Gabriel, 633
 Luján, Francisco, 99–100
 Lumbert, John, 232
 Luna y Arellano, Tristán de, 88
 Lundy's Lane, battle at, 682–683, 683 (map)
 Luque, Hernando de, 46
 Luque, Ignacio, 658
 Lushington, Franklin, 398
Lusitania incident, 971
 Luttrell, John, 498
 Luz, Carlos, 1028–1029
 Lyell, Thomas, 345
 Lynch, Elizabeth Alicia, 864, 865
 Lynch, Patricio Javier de los Dolores, 887, 888, 889
 Lynch, Thomas, 271, 272
 Lynch Saldivar, Luis, 851
 Lyncourt, Cornelis, 278
 Lynn, Thomas, 425
 Lyon, Henry W., 894
 Lyon, Nathaniel, 798, 800
 Maas, Joaquín, 948, 949, 951
 Maass, Gustavo, 950
 Macarona, battle at, 650
 MacArthur, Douglas A., 979, 1025
 Macartney, Lord, 493
 Macary, Capitaine, 332
 Macbride, John, 446
 MacCann, M. B., 902
 Macdonald, James, 499
 MacDonald, John A., 868
 Macdonell, Archibald, 339
 Macdonell, Enrique, 522
 Macdonell, John, 668
 Macdonnell, "Red George," 670
 Macdonough, Thomas, 673
 MacDouall, William Robert, 449, 450, 451
 Mace, Sanford, 385
 Mace, William, 121
 MacGregor, Gregor, 611
 Machado, Geraldo, 977, 978, 979, 981
 Machado, Pinheiro, 893, 894
 Machado de Mendoça, Félix José, 357

- Machault, Charles François de, Sieur de Bellemont, 286, 349
- Maciel Parente, Bento, 162, 163–164, 170
- MacIntosh, J. S., 764
- Mackay, Alexander, 363
- Mackay, Charles, 396
- Mackay, Hugh, 380, 385
- Mackellar, Patrick, 427, 440
- Mackenzie, Alexander Slidell, 753
- Mackenzie, George, 425
- Mackenzie, James, 425, 434
- Mackenzie, Ranald Slidell, 845, 847, 848
- Mackenzie, Thomas, 497
- Mackenzie, William Lyon, 718, 719
- Mackinnon, Lauchlan Bellingham, 741
- Mackintosh, John, 651
- MacLane, Robert H., 790–791
- Maclean, Allan, 472
- MacMahon y Santiago, Jacobo, 849
- MacNab, Allan, 719
- Macnamara, John, 442–443
- Macnemara, Jean-Baptiste, 405
- Macomb, Alexander, 687
- Macpherson, John, 492
- Madariaga, Joaquín, 737
- Madariaga, Juan, 741, 780
- Madariaga, Juan Ignacio de, 436, 448
- Madeira de Melo, Inacio Luiz, 654
- Madera, Rodrigo, 84
- Madero, Emilio, 941
- Madero, Francisco Ignacio, 922, 923; and the Mexican Revolution, 939, 940–941, 942, 944
- Madero, Gustavo, 944
- Madero, Raúl, 949
- Madison, James, 549, 665, 898
- Madriz Rodríguez, José, 930
- Madureira, Eloy, 443
- Madureira Ferreira, Jorge, 289
- Maffitt, John N., 808
- Magalhães, Pedro Jacques de, 209
- Magán, Juan de, 137
- Magaw, Robert, 478
- Magee, Augustus William, 594
- Magellan, Ferdinand, 20–21
- Magloire, Paul Eugène, 1022
- Magon de Médine, Charles René, 562–563
- Magoon, Charles, 928
- Magott, Thomas, 292
- Magruder, George H., 768
- Magruder, John, 769
- Mahan, Alfred T., 430, 926
- Mahone, William, 821
- Mahoney, James E., 931
- Mahu, Jacob, 142
- Mahuad Witt, Jamil, 1088
- Maillard, Vivien, 93–94
- Maine, offensive in, 686–687
- Maine* incident, 907–908
- Mainwaring, Jemmett, 551
- Maipú, battle at, 625–626
- Maitland, Frederick Lewis, 431, 572
- Maitland, John, 493, 496, 559, 720
- Maitland, Thomas, 541
- Ma'kawatwimesheka'ka ("Black Sparrow Hawk"), 694
- Malarka, Abraham, 248
- Malcolm, Pulteney, 690
- Maldonado, Antonio, 218
- Maldonado, battle at, 567
- Maldonado, Francisco, 99
- Maldonado, Salvador, 874
- Maldonado de Aldana, Antonio, 244, 246
- Maldonado Schaad, Horacio Egberto, 1056
- Malinali (Malinche), 24
- Mallón, Feliciano, 554
- Maltby, William, 448
- Malvinas. See Falkland Islands
- Mamede, Jurandir Bizarria, 1028
- Manaco, Chief, 281
- Manco, 50, 51, 52, 53; murder of, 70; revolt of, 53–54, 55, 56
- Mangin, Léon, 827
- Manigat, Leslie, 1058
- Manila, 109, 442, 910
- Manjarrés, Luis, 82
- Mann, Robert, 425
- Manners, Robert, 523
- Manrique de Rojas, Hernán, 117
- Mansfield, Edward, 243, 244, 251; Costa Rican invasion by, 251–252
- Mansila, Lucio Norberto, 706
- Manso de Contreras, Francisco, 134, 136
- Manuel, Bento, 716
- Manzanilla, Augusto, 988
- Manzanillo (Cuba), 107
- Manzo, Francisco R., 988
- Maracaibo (Venezuela), 199 (illus.); blockades of and attacks on, 152, 199–200; English raid on, 221, 221 (map); Grammont at, 289; Morgan at, 266–267, 267 (map); and Nau's campaign, 253
- Maracay, battle at, 623–624
- Maranhão Island, 130, 200, 201
- Marañón, Esteban, 127
- March, John, 333, 345, 351
- Marchant, Pierre, 92
- Marciano, António, 162
- Marck, Pieter, 268
- Marcos (Rafael Sebastián Guillén), 1085
- Margaret of Austria, 98
- Margarit, Pedro, 5
- Margarita Island, attacks on, 81, 127, 171–172, 220, 285
- María Bárbara of Braganza, 412
- María Victoria, Queen (Portugal), 452
- Mariath, Frederico, 704
- Marie-Galante, 283, 320, 427
- Marigny, Charles René Louis Bernard, Vicomte de, 513, 522
- Marim, André, 190
- Marin, Diego, 84
- Marín, Rufo, 986
- Marín, Tomás, 757
- Mariño, Santiago, 596, 604, 613, 628, 631
- Marion, Francis, 497, 504, 513, 516
- Marjoribanks, John, 518–519
- Markgraf, Georg, 194
- Markham, John, 299, 547
- Markle, Abraham, 681
- Maroto, Rafael, 615
- Marqueli, Miguel, 615
- Marqués, Manoel, 573
- Marqués de Valenzuela, José, 374
- Márquez, battle at, 644
- Márquez, Manuel, 841
- Márquez, Pedro, 57
- Márquez Araújo, Leonardo: and the French intervention, 827–832 passim, 840–843; and the War of the Reform, 788–793
- Marre, Louis de la, Vicomte de la Meillerie, 565
- Marroquín, Adolfo, 1020
- Marroquín, José Manuel, 920
- Marsh, John, 311, 844
- Marshall, George, 1023
- Marshall, Humphrey, 764
- Marshall, John, 553
- Marshall, Samuel, 434
- Marshall, Thomas, 764
- Marston, Ward, 762
- Martí, José, 600
- Martien, David, 246–247, 249–250
- Martín, Alonso, 18
- Martín, Francisco, 59
- Martin, George, 354, 356
- Martin, Stephan (Esteban Martín), 59, 61, 62
- Martin, Thomas Byam, 553
- Martín, Vicente, 91
- Martín García Island, 731
- Martinet, Jean Nicolas, 365
- Martínez, Ángel, 877
- Martínez, Arístides, 884
- Martínez, Boris, 1041
- Martínez, Diego, 62
- Martínez, Enrique, 625
- Martínez, Eulogio, 953
- Martínez, Francisco, 66
- Martínez, Hernández, 1020
- Martínez, Joaquín, 842
- Martínez, Juan José María (Pípila), 582
- Martínez, Leandro Valle, 787
- Martínez, Nacario, 621
- Martínez, Rosalino, 923
- Martínez, Ruperto, 837
- Martínez de Acevedo, Cristóbal, 304
- Martínez de la Vega, Dionisio, 393

- Martínez de la Vega y Retes, Francisco Javier, 384
- Martinique: battle at, 501–502, 574; English attack on, 324; fortifications, 291; and the Franco-Carib War, 231, 236; and the French and Indian War, 425, 433–434; French occupation of, 214–215; Harman's bonfire on, 260; rioting on, 225; and the "Victory of Rum," 278–279
- Martins, Domingos José, 618
- Marulanda Vélez, Manuel (Pedro Antonio Marín), 1088
- Marx, Karl, 982
- Mary I (England), 96
- Marzana, Manuel, 991
- Mascarene, Paul, 401, 402
- Mascarenhas, Fernando de (Conde da Torre), 196–197
- Mascarenhas de Moraes, João Batista, 1016
- Mason, James M., 802, 803
- Mason, John, 216
- Mason, William, 708
- Massera, Emilio Eduardo, 1047
- Massibradi, Nicolás de, 182
- Masson, Didier, 946
- Mast, Jan, 175, 185, 196
- Mata Redonda, 191–192
- Matamoros, Juan Pedro, 368, 369
- Matamoros, Mariano, 591, 599
- Matamoros (Mexico), 836
- Mather, Cotton, 309
- Mathew, Edward, 478
- Mathews, Thomas, 354
- Mato Grosso Province, 855
- Matos Monteiro, Cipriano de, 379
- Matosa, Francisco de la, 153
- Matson, Richard, 555
- Mattos, José Mariano de, 717
- Mattos Cardoso, João de, 190
- Mauduit, Thomas Aintoine, 532
- Maund, Clinton (Christopher), 321
- Maure, Javier de, 948
- Mauregnault, Pieter de, 257
- Maurice, James Wilkes, 562
- Maurits, Johan (Graaf van Nassau-Siegen), 192, 193–194, 194, 199, 200, 202
- Maurits City, 194
- Maussion, Ernst Louis-Marie de, 832
- Mawhood, Charles, 479
- Maximilian (Ferdinand), 825, 831–832, 833, 839, 840, 841–842; trial and execution, 843–844
- Maximilian, Emperor, 86
- Maxwell, John, 524
- Maxwell, Murray, 559
- Maxwell, William, 475, 482
- May, Charles A., 763–764
- Maycotte, Fortunato, 957, 964, 966
- Maynard, Francis, 325
- Maynard, Robert, 367
- Mayne, Perry, 383, 387
- Mayo, Henry Thomas, 950
- Mayo, Isaac, 766
- Mayreni, 3
- Maytorena, José María, 954
- Mayz y Alcalá, José Antonio, 635
- Maza, Emilio, 1042
- Maza, Hermógenes, 637
- Mazariegos, Diego de, 94–95
- Mazatlán, battle at, 773
- Mazocoba (Mexico), battle at, 921–922
- Mazuela, Juan de, 43
- McArthur, Archibald, 509, 689
- McArthur, Duncan, 667
- McCaffrey, Barry, 1087
- McCall, James, 509
- McCalla, Bowman H., 912
- McCauley, Charles S., 798
- McClellan, George, 798, 800, 802, 803, 812, 822; at Antietam, 811; Peninsula Campaign, 805
- McClernand, John A., 812, 813
- McCleverty, William, 432, 434
- McCluney, William J., 750
- McClure, George, 678
- McCook, Alexander McD., 812
- McCulloch, Benjamin, 763–764, 800
- McDouall, Robert, 683
- McDougall, Alexander, 478
- McDowall, Robert, 551
- McDowell, Irwin, 799, 800, 805, 809–811
- McDuffie, Arthur, 1055
- McIntosh, Lachlan, 496
- McKay, William, 682
- McKee, William R., 763
- McKinley, William, 908, 919
- McLane, Allen, 495
- McLeod, Donald, 473
- McMorris, Charles H., 1017
- McNamara, Robert, 1036
- McNeale, Neal, 671
- McPherson, James B., 520, 813, 819
- McQueen, Ann, 696
- McQueen, James, 696
- McQueen, Peter, 674
- McVeigh, Timothy, 1087
- Mead, Joseph, 434
- Meade, George Gordon, 765, 815, 824
- Meadows, William, 489
- Medina, Francisco de, 436, 440, 721
- Medina, Juan, 946
- Medina, Julián, 953, 955
- Medina, Luis de, 23
- Medina, Pedro, 988
- Medina Angarita, Isaías, 1022
- Medina Barrón, Luis, 946, 951, 952
- Medina Celi, Carlos, 661
- Meerteks, A., 559
- Mees, George, 331, 332
- Meigs, Return J., 671
- Meixueiro, Guillermo, 953, 955, 964
- Mejía, Francisco, 748
- Mejía, Rodrigo, 10
- Mejía, Tomás: and the French intervention, 827, 832, 833, 836, 838, 841, 843; and War of the Reform, 787, 789, 790, 792, 793
- Mejía, Vicente, 774
- Mejía Víctores, Oscar, 1056
- Meléndez, Antonio María, 776
- Meléndez, Jacinto, 199
- Meléndez, Manuel, 554
- Meléndez, Pedro, 144
- Meléndez, Salvador, 614
- Melgar, de Martín, 292
- Melgar Castro, Juan Alberto, 1048, 1051
- Melkenbeeke, Philips, 278
- Mellado, Juan, 633
- Mellado, Julián, 646
- Melo, Sebastião José de Carvalho e, 413
- Melo de Castro, Francisco, 650
- Melo e Castro, Francisco de, 197
- Melville, Robert, 426, 432, 433
- Mendes Gouveia, Pero, 188
- Méndez, Diego, 10, 70
- Méndez, Gregorio, 831, 832, 833
- Méndez, José Ramón, 840, 841
- Mendez, Luis López, 565, 622
- Méndez, Pedro, 836
- Méndez, Santiago, 745
- Méndez, Virgilio, 901
- Méndez, Walter, 1000
- Méndez Marques, Pedro, 123
- Méndez Núñez, Casto Secundino María, 850, 851–854
- Mendieta, Antonio de, 369, 372
- Mendieta, Carlos, 981
- Mendinueta, Gabriel de, 389
- Mendizábal, Mariano, 634
- Mendoza, Alonso de, 33
- Mendoza, Antonio de, 44, 69, 69 (illus.)
- Mendoza, Bernardino de, 114
- Mendoza, Carlos, 1088
- Mendoza, César, 1045
- Mendoza, Luis de, 20
- Mendoza, Martín, 41
- Mendoza, Martín de, 192, 197
- Mendoza, Narciso, 591
- Mendoza, Pedro, 973
- Mendoza, Rodrigo de, 160
- Mendoza Hurtado, Diego de, 165, 166
- Mendoza Leiva, Abelardo, 981
- Mendoza y Berrio, Martín, 193
- Mendoza y Luna, Juan Manuel de, 160
- Menéndez, Andrés Ignacio, 1020, 1021
- Menéndez, Bartolomé, 60, 94
- Menéndez, Benjamín, 1024
- Menéndez, Mario Benjamín, 1062, 1077
- Menéndez de Avilés, Pedro, 93, 94, 95, 96
- Menéndez Márques, Juan, 268–269
- Menéndez Márquez, Alonso, 95

- Menéndez Márquez, Pedro, 95, 97, 106, 117, 120
- Meneses, Fulgencio de, 145
- Meneses, José de, 191
- Menezes, Manoel de, 169
- Menna Barreto, João Manuel, 864, 865
- Menzies, Stewart, 1027
- Mercadillo, Vicente, 646
- Mercado, Alonso de, 141
- Mercado, Salvador R., 947, 948
- Mercedes, Vicente, 580
- Mercer, Hugh, 479
- Mercer, James, 420
- Mercer, Samuel, 747
- Merchan, Pedro, 162, 163
- Merifield, Ralph, 210
- Merino Jarpa, Vicente, 899, 900, 901
- Mermi, Guy, 85
- Merrick, Andrew, 121
- Merrick, Hugh, 124
- Merritt, Ezekial, 751
- Merritt, Wesley, 910
- Merten, Karl Friedrich, 1013
- Mervine, William, 748, 757
- Mesmin, Guillaume, 87
- Messía de la Cerda, Pedro, 407–408
- Mestivier, Esteban José Francisco, 713
- “Mestizo Mutiny,” 241
- Mestre, Vicente Sebastián, 287
- Metacomet, Chief (“King Philip”), 280, 281–282
- Metayer, Buteur, 1090
- Metcalf, Joseph, III, 1078
- Mexía, Francisco de, 193
- Mexía de Mirabal, Pedro, 116
- Mexico: Cristero War, 986–989; and the Mexican–American War, 747–775, 749 (map), 754 (map); sociopolitical unrest in, 1035, 1039–1040, 1041, 1042, 1044–1045, 1046–1047, 1091; and World War II, 1008, 1013; and the Zapatistas, 1085
- Mexico City, 769–771, 770 (map), 773
- Mey, Cornelis Jacobszoon, 164
- Meyers, Conrad, 1078
- Mezquita, Álvaro de, 21
- Miahuatlán (Mexico), 838–839
- Miantonomo, Chief, 216
- Michel, John, 865
- Michell, Stephen, 123
- Michelson, William, 121
- Michimalonco, Chief, 68
- Micoud, Claude Anne Guy de, 489
- Middleton, David, 144
- Middleton, Frederick Dobson, 890, 891
- Middleton, Henry, 139
- Mier, José María, 953
- Mier y Terán, José Manuel Rafael Simón de, 596, 613, 700
- Mier y Terán, Luis, 877
- Mijares, José Antonio, 774
- Milam, Benjamin Rush, 722
- Milán, Francisco de Paula, 831
- Milborne, Jacob, 320
- Miles, Nelson Appleton (“Bear Coat”), 848, 917, 918–919
- Miles, Perry, 979
- Mill Springs (Kentucky), 803
- Millán, Donato, 1025
- Millard, Henry, 726
- Miller, Andrew, 145
- Miller, Augustus, 890
- Miller, Paul D., 1086
- Miller, Simon, 548
- Miller, William, 642
- Mills, Keith, 1059, 1062
- Mills, Robert, 232
- Milne, Alexander, 731
- Milne, David, 551
- Milne, James, 547
- Mina, Juan Antonio, 627
- Mina y Larrea, Francisco Javier, 617–618
- Miñón, Vicente, 745, 763
- Minor, George, 758
- Miralles, Manuel, 367
- Miramón, Miguel, 786–787, 788 (illus.), 789, 789, 790, 791; and the French intervention, 832, 833, 840, 842; trial and execution of, 843–844
- Miranda, Ángel de, 346
- Miranda, Francisco de, 565, 565
- Miranda, Francisco Javier, 826, 828
- Miranda Correia, Altino de, 895
- Miranda Valdivia, Rogelio, 1043
- Mirbeck, Frédéric Ignace de, 534
- Mires, José, 636
- Mirón, Pedro A. Diaz, 755
- Miruelo, Diego, 42
- Missiessy, Edouard Thomas de Burgues, Comte de, 560
- Mitchell, Cornelius, 405, 406
- Mitchell, David, 358
- Mitchell, John, 357
- Mitchell, Matthew, 388
- Mitchell, William “Billy,” 973
- Mitre, Bartolomé, 781, 781, 782, 783, 854, 857, 861, 862, 864; revolution by, 872–874
- Mitre, Emilio, 781
- Mitrovich, John, 657
- Mixtón War, 68–69
- Mobile Bay, battle at, 499, 821
- Mochcouh, Chief, 21
- Moctezuma II, 25, 25, 27, 28, 29–30, 32
- Modyford, Thomas, 228, 246, 247, 250–251, 271; and buccaneers, 261, 265, 267, 268, 269; and Morgan, 262
- Moersby, Jacob, 175, 176
- Moffat, Thomas, 930
- Moffett, William A., 974
- Mohawk Indians, 251
- Moimoy (Nicaragua), 985
- Moinerie, Miniac de la, 359
- Moles, José, 648
- Molina, Javier, 883
- Molina, José Luis, 710
- Molina, Loreto, 877
- Molina, Miguel de, 212
- Molina, Miguel Tomás, 1021
- Molina y Herrera, Alonso de, 241
- Molineux, Thomas, 220
- Molino del Rey, battle at, 770
- Mollens, Willem, 231
- Mombeton de Brouillan, Jacques François de, 328
- Mompóx y Zayas, Fernando de, 374–375
- Monagas, José Tadeo, 611, 624
- Monasterios, Juan de, 145
- Moncada, José María, 983, 985
- Monck, Christopher (2nd Duke of Albemarle), 316
- Monck, George (1st Duke of Albemarle), 232, 316
- Monckton, Robert, 415, 427–428, 433–434
- Moncrieff, James, 501
- Mondragón, Manuel, 944
- Monet, Juan Antonio, 656
- Monro, George, 420
- Monroe, James, 693, 898
- Monroe, John, 750
- Monroe Doctrine, 898
- Monroy, Alonso, 68
- Monserrat, Luis de, 59
- Montagu, George, 546
- Montalembert, Jean-Charles, Baron de, 538
- Montalvo, Juan de, 116
- Montalvo de Lugo, Lope, 61, 65
- Montaña, Eugenio, 596
- Montaña, Manuel, 699
- Montaña, Otilio, 963
- Montbrun, Alexandre, 537, 538
- Montcalm, Louis Joseph, Marquis de, 418, 419, 419 (illus.), 424; at Fort Carillon, 423; at Fort William Henry, 420, 421; at Oswego, 419; and the Plains of Abraham, 428
- Monte, Martín, 104
- Monte Cristi, sacking of, 84
- Monte de la Cruces, battle at, 584
- Monteagudo, Bernardo de, 565, 580
- Monteclerc, Louis Augustin de, 522
- Monteil, François Aymar, Baron de, 440, 502, 512
- Monteiro, Manuel César Góis, 977, 982
- Monteiro de Vide, Sebastião, 355
- Montejo, Francisco de, 22, 25, 26
- Montenegro, J. Guadalupe, 751
- Montenegro, José, 640
- Montero, Juan, 128
- Montero, Lizardo, 854, 884, 886, 888–889
- Monterrey, battle at, 756–757

- Monterrey (Mexico), 836–837
 Montes, Domingo, 628
 Montes, Toribio, 578
 Montes de Oca, Fernando, 771
 Montes de Oca, Isidro, 648
 Monteverde, Juan Domingo de, 591–592
 Montevideo, 380, 569–570, 604–605
 Montgomerie, R. A. J., 925
 Montgomery, John B., 748, 753, 766
 Montgomery, Richard, 469, 470, 471, 472
 Montgomery, Zebulon, 671
 Monti, José, 704
 Montiel, Lino H., 978
 Montilla, Mariano, 636, 646
 Montojo y Pasarón, Patricio, 910
 Montoneros, 1042
 Montoya, Baltasar de, 39, 69
 Montoya, Melchor, 879
 Montoya, Pablo, 762, 763
 Montreal (Canada), 431
 Montreuil, Jean de, 157
 Montreuil, Pierre-André de, 418
 Montserrat, 256–257
 Montt, Manuel, 728
 Montt Álvarez, Jorge, 883, 898, 900, 904
 Moody, John, 348
 Moor, Cornelis de, 192
 Moor, Jan de, 175
 Moore, Graham, 560
 Moore, James, 342, 343, 346, 360, 369
 Moore, Jeremy J., 1074–1075, 1076, 1077
 Moore, John, 425, 426
 Moore, John W., 722
 Moore, Juan Guillermo, 881–882, 887
 Moore, Maurice, 364
 Mora y del Río, José, 986
 Moraga Suzarte, Carlos, 901
 Moral Sánchez, Francisco del, 380
 Morales, Antonio, 651
 Morales, Diego de, 387
 Morales, Francisco Javier de, 449
 Morales, Francisco Tomás, 606, 607, 608–609, 610, 611, 624, 652, 655; at Barcelona, 614–615; at Carabobo, 646; at Los Patos, 627; at Márques, 644
 Morales, Gaspar de, 19
 Morales, Juan, 724, 765
 Morales, Juan Evo, 1090–1091
 Morales, Pedro de, 243
 Morales Bermúdez, Francisco, 1050
 Morales Camacho, Francisco, 84
 Morales del Castillo, Andrés Domingo, 1027
 Morales Languasco, Carlos F., 925, 926
 Morán, José C., 988
 Morán, José Trinidad, 658
 Morazán Quesada, Francisco, 720
 Morcillo, Diego, 374
 Moreau, Etienne, 366, 368
 Morejón, Hernando, 111
 Morelos (Mexico), 961–962
 Morelos y Pavón, José María, 583–604 passim, 603, 609
 Morelos Zaragoza, Ignacio, 949, 950
 Moreno, Ignacio, 438
 Moreno, José M., 567
 Moreno, José Matías, 774
 Moreno, Marcos, 394
 Moreno, Mariano, 581
 Moreno, Pedro, 619, 621
 Moreno, Soares, 191
 Moreno, Tomás, 784, 785, 786, 787
 Moreno Bellido, Alonso, 127
 Moreno Mondragón, Blas, 345–346
 Moret, Mariano, 788
 Morgado, Antonio, 618
 Morgan, Charles, 778
 Morgan, Daniel, 472, 484, 486, 509
 Morgan, David, 1077
 Morgan, David B., 692
 Morgan, Edward, 247–248, 250, 262
 Morgan, George W., 764, 769–770
 Morgan, Henry, 242, 246, 249, 261, 262, 263–272, 263 (illus.), 267 (map); on de Graaf, 298
 Morgan, John Hunt, 808, 815, 819
 Morgan, Mary Elizabeth, 262
 Morgan, Simon, 514
 Morgan, Thomas, 245, 250, 251, 252, 262
 Morgan, William Alexander, 1031
 Morgovejo de Quiñones, Francisco, 54
 Morice, Richard, 548
 Morillo y Morillo, Pedro, 608–640 passim
 Morney, Christopher, 542
 Morón, Bruno, 648
 Morpain, Pierre, 351, 401, 403
 Morris, Charles, 686
 Morris, John, 236, 246–247, 249, 261, 265, 269, 271
 Morris, Lewis, 223, 228
 Morris, Raymond, 616
 Morris, Valentine, 493
 Morrison, Joseph W., 677, 682
 Morritz, Gideon, 202
 Morrow, Dwight W., 989
 Morton, Joseph, 307
 Moscoso, Oscar, 989, 990
 Moscoso de Alvarado, Luis, 44, 45
 Moseley, George Van Horn, 979
 Moses, Franklin J., 933
 Mosquera, Antonio de, 140
 Moss, John Ralph, 554
 Motolinía, Toribio de, 37
 Moucheron, Daniel de, 150
 Moulton, Jeremiah, 373, 403
 Moultrie, William, 475, 475 (illus.), 491, 493, 496
 Mount Vernon, 397
 Moura, Alejandro de, 155
 Moura, Felipe de, 114
 Moura, Francisco de, 167, 169
 Mourão Filho, Olímpio, 1038
 Mowat, Patrick, 445
 Moxó, Salvador, 608
 Moya, Carlos, 612
 Moya, José Luis, 939, 940, 941
 Moya Vásquez, Jorge, 920
 Moyano, Pedro, 374
 Mozo, Antonio, 744
 Mucozo, Chief, 44
 Mucuritas, battle at, 614
 Muir, Adam, 666
 Mújica Buitrón, Antonio de, 158
 Mulcaster, William Howe, 677
 Muller-Stockheim, Gunther, 1011
 Munguía, Eutiquio, 946, 947
 Muniz Barreiros, Antônio, 200, 201
 Muñoz, Ignacio, 951
 Muñoz, Juan, 366, 645
 Muñoz, Ricardo, 1047
 Murat, Joachim, 577
 Muratore, Alejandro, 781
 Muraturi, José, 855
 Murfreesboro (Tennessee), 812
 Murga, Sancho de, 61, 62, 64
 Murguía, Francisco, 944, 955, 958, 962, 965
 Murillo, Pedro Domingo, 580
 Murillo, Zacharías, 1000
 Murphy, Guillermo, 328
 Murphy, John, 214, 230
 Murray, George, 388, 427, 430, 431, 546, 571
 Murray, James, 391
 Murray, John, 467, 674
 Musa, Said, 1090
 Musgrave, Thomas, 485
 Music, 945
 Mussolini, Benito, 1019
 Muys, Jan, 278
 Myddelton, John, 126, 130
 Myers, William, 546
 Myngs, Christopher, 235, 236–237, 237 (map), 242–245, 242 (illus.), 243 (map)
 Nabeda Alvarado, Francisco de, 138
 Ñaembé (Argentina), 870
 Naguet, Georges de (Sieur de Saint-Georges), 157
 Nagumo, Chuichi, 1010
 Nahuiaatl, 31
 Nairne, Thomas, 363
 Nájera, Juan N., 756
 Namphy, Henri, 1057, 1058
 Namuncurá, Manuel, 874, 875 (illus.), 876
 Nanawa (Paraguay): first battle at, 994; second battle at, 995
 Napier, George, 866

- Napoleon III, 825, 898; Maximilian and, 833, 837
- Naranjo, Francisco, 788, 836, 837, 842
- Narborough, John, 269, 309, 310
- Narváez, Pánfilo de, 14, 16, 29, 41, 42; and European diseases, 14
- Nashville (Tennessee), 804, 823
- Nassau, Prince Maurice of, 164
- Nassau (Bahamas), 345–346
- Nassau Fleet, 164
- Nassy, David, 231
- Natal, 188
- Natera García, Pánfilo, 945, 946, 948, 951–952, 958
- National League for the Defense of Religious Liberty, 986–987
- Nau, Jean-David, 253
- Nau l'Olonnais, François, 260–261, 263
- Nava, Gil de, 58
- Nava Martínez, Salvador, 1035
- Navarrete, Felipe, 833
- Navarro, Andrés, 224
- Navarro, battle at, 710
- Navarro, Cándido, 942
- Navarro, Juan N., 939, 940–941
- Navarro, Nicolás, 64
- Navarro, Octaviano, 782, 783, 862
- Navarro de Prado, Antonio, 123, 124
- Navía Osorio, Victorio de, 451, 503, 626
- Neal, Thomas, 504
- Necochea, Mariano, 607, 638
- Necotowance, Chief, 223
- Ñeenguirú, Nicolás, 414
- Neff, Francisco, 975
- Negrete, Miguel, 832, 835, 836, 876
- Neigre, Charles Louise Camille, Baron, 832
- Neill, James C., 724
- Nelson, Horatio, 499, 500, 500 (illus.), 526, 563; Villeneuve versus, 561–563, 562 (map), 564
- Nelson, Robert, 720
- Nelson, William, 811
- Nelson, Wolfred, 718
- Nemattanew (“Jack of the Feathers”), 209–210
- Nerette, Joseph, 1084
- Nery, Isidoro, 709
- Nesham, Christopher J. W., 574
- Nesmond, André, Marquis de, 289, 290, 332, 337, 338
- Neto, Álvaro, 161
- Netto, Souza, 716
- Nevares, Francisco de, 111
- Neville, Edward, 290
- Neville, Francis, 179
- Neville, John, 331–333
- Neville, Wendell C., 950
- Nevis, 258–259; French attack on, 349–350; Spanish attack on, 212–213
- New Amsterdam, 246
- New England: King Philip’s War in, 280–282, 281 (map); and Queen Anne’s War, 345, 346, 353, 357
- New Orleans: and the Civil War, 805–807; and the War of 1812, 691–692, 691 (map)
- New Providence (Bahamas), 301
- New York City: Dutch reoccupation of, 276; fall of, 477; Leisler’s revolt, 313, 320; terrorist attacks and, 1085, 1089–1090
- Newberry, Richard, 232
- Newcombe, John, 220, 224
- Newcomen, Thomas, 851
- Newfoundland, 114, 333; and the French and Indian War, 440–441; French assault on English in, 328; and Queen Anne’s War, 341–342, 347
- Newman, James, 540
- Newman, Mary, 107
- Newmarsh, Timothy, 509
- Newnan, Daniel, 667
- Newport, Christopher, 122–123, 125, 125–126, 127, 129, 130; at Dominica, 138, 561; and Jamestown, 152; raid on Puerto Caballos, 144–145; sweep by, 124
- Newton, William, 383
- Nicaragua: and the Altamirano–Harrison Treaty, 927; civil war in, 982–986; and the Sandinistas, 1039, 1047, 1051–1052, 1053, 1056, 1057; sociopolitical unrest in, 925, 928–930, 932–933, 973, 1029, 1031, 1055
- Nicholas, Samuel, 473
- Nicholas, Simon, 220
- Nicholls, Edward, 551, 681
- Nichols, Moses, 482
- Nichols, Terry, 1087
- Nicholson, Francis, 313, 354–356, 357, 358
- Nicholson, Joseph H., 688
- Nicolls, Richard, 246
- Nicoraguamia, Chief, 38
- Nicoya, Chief, 38
- Nicuesa, Diego de, 13, 14–15
- Nieto, Francisco, 379
- Nieto, Martín, 63
- Nieto, Mateo, 591
- Nieto, Vincente, 581, 584, 585
- Nieuw Nickerie, 158
- Niño, Andrés, 38–39
- Niño, Pedro Alonso, 7
- Nixon, Richard M., 1048
- Noble, Arthur, 407
- Noble, Francis, 407
- Noble, John, 104
- Noblesia, Ignacio de, 377
- Nóbrega, Manoel da, 91–92
- Nocadelklinny, 848
- Noche Triste (Sad Night), retreat of, 30
- Nogueira, Eduardo Angelim, 715
- Noguera, Gonzalo, 254
- Nogueras, Agustín, 628
- Noguès, Jean Francois–Xavier, 558
- Noirot, Jan, 278
- Nombre de Dios, 101, 103, 136, 137, 377
- Nombre de Jesús, 118
- Nomura, Kichisaburo, 1010
- Nonnes, H. B., 757
- Norbury, Coningsby, 431
- Norfolk Navy Yard (Virginia), 798, 807
- Noriega, Luis, 785
- Noriega, Manuel, 843
- Noriega, Manuel Antonio, 1042, 1080–1083
- Noriega Agüero, Zenón, 1023, 1024
- Norman, Michael J., 1060
- Norman, Richard, 265, 270
- Normant de Kergrist, Thomas Louis Le, 832
- Noronha, Isaías de, 978
- Noronha, Jácome Raimundo de, 213
- Noronha, Manuel Henriques de, 372
- Norris, John, 332
- North, Ian H., 1072
- Norton, James, 704, 709
- Norton, William, 425
- Nott, Edward, 320
- Nott, John Neale Pleydell, 434
- Notter, Thomas, 604
- Nouel, Adolfo A., 933
- Nova Scotia, 210
- Novella, Francisco, 647, 648
- Novoa, Guillermo, 979
- Nuevo Cádiz, 81
- Nugent, Charles Edmund, 498, 546
- Numa Laplane, Alberto, 1047
- Nunes, Pedro, 77
- Nunes da Mata, João, 203
- Nunes Marinho, Francisco, 166
- Núñez, Alonso, 14
- Núñez, Diego, 61
- Núñez, Gaudioso, 994, 998
- Núñez Cabeza de Vaca, Alvaro, 41, 42
- Núñez de Guzmán, Pedro, 17
- Núñez Melián, Francisco, 182, 185
- Núñez Vela, Blasco, 70, 79
- Nunn, A. A., 561
- Nunn, Sam, 1086
- Oakley, Edward, 323
- Oaxaca (Mexico), 596, 834–835
- Obando, Antonio, 633
- O’Bannon, Presley N., 556
- Oberto, Francisco, 600
- Obligado, Erasmo, 873
- Obregón, Alvaro, 940, 952, 952 (illus.); and the Cristero War, 987, 988; and the Mexican Revolution, 944–959 passim; and the presidency, 964, 965–966; retirement of, 963

- Obregón, Pedro, 499
 O'Brien, Lucius, 434
 O'Bryen, James, 558
 Ocampo, García de, 9
 Ocampo, Melchor, 791
 Ocampo, Sebastián de, 12
 Ochiltree, James Stewart, Lord, 211
 Ochoa, Manuel, 587
 Ochoa de Castro, Sancho, 141
 Ochoa y Zárate, Andrés de, 300, 301, 305
 O'Connor, Francis Burdett, 636
 O'Donojú, Juan, 647
 Odría Amoretti, Manuel A., 1024
 Ogazón Rubio, Pedro, 788
 Ogden, S. G., 565
 Ogé, Jacques Vincente, 532
 Ogilby, William, 540
 Ogilvie, James, 509
 Ogle, Chaloner, 388, 390, 393, 394, 397, 434
 Ogletorpe, James Edward, 378, 380, 381, 383, 384, 385, 385–386, 393; raid against Spanish Florida, 399; Spanish invasion and, 395–396; at St. Augustine, 386–387, 387 (map), 397
 O'Hea, Patrick, 945
 O'Higgins, Bernardo, 565, 605, 606, 613, 623, 626, 653; at Cancha Rayada, 624; at Chacabuco, 615–616; at Gavilán, 618; at Talcahuano, 621–622
 O'Horan, Tomás, 827, 830
 Ojeda, Alonso de, 5, 7, 9, 12, 13–14
 Ojeda, Pedro, 945, 946
 Ojeda, Pedro de, 9
 Ojinaga (Mexico), battle at, 948
 Oker, John, 123
 Oklahoma City, 1087
 Olañeta, Pedro Antonio de, 656, 661
 Olano, Lope de, 13
 Olavarri, Diego de, 111
 Olavarría, Ignacio, 367
 Oldham, John, 215
 Olea, Cristóbal de, 36
 Olid, Cristóbal de, 22, 31, 34–35, 37, 38, 40
 Oliveira Salazar, António, 1019
 Oliver, Jack, 779
 Oliver, Manuel, 746
 Olivier Exquemelin, Alexandre, 293
 Olivieri, Aníbal, 1028
 Olmstead, Percy, 935
 Olney, Richard, 898
 Olvera, General, 837–838
 Olvera, Norberto, 988
 O'Mahony, John, 866
 Omoa, battle at, 498
 Oñate, Cristóbal de, 43, 69
 Oncativo, battle at, 711
 O'Neill, Arturo, 513
 O'Neill, John, 865–866, 867
 O'Neill de Tyrone, Arturo, 513, 554
 Onganía, Juan Carlos, 1038, 1039, 1041, 1042
 Ono, Takeji, 1013
 Onsiel, Jacques, 192
 Onslow, John James, 713
 Ontiveros, Fructuoso, 783, 784
 Opechancanough, Chief, 153, 209–210, 223
 Oquendo Lechín, Juan, 1025
 Ordáz, Diego de, 29, 31
 Orde, John, 499
 Ordóñez, José, 624
 Ordóñez Flores, Francisco, 136
 Ordóñez Sánchez, José, 617–618
 O'Reilly, Alejandro, 513, 641
 O'Reilly y McDowell, Alejandro, 447
 Orella, Joaquín, 883
 Orendáin (Mexico), battle at, 952–953, 953 (map)
 Oreste, Michel, 933
 Oreste Zamor, Charles, 933
 Orgóñez, Rodrigo, 55
 Oribe, Manuel, 702, 731–738 passim, 732 (illus.); Uruguayan campaign of, 742
 Orinoco River, 131, 156, 197
 Orista, Chief, 95
 Orlando Capellini, Jesús, 1050
 Ormonde, James Butler, Duke of, 339
 Oronoz, Carlos, 839
 Orozco, Pascual, 939, 940–941, 942, 943, 945, 952, 958, 959
 Orozco, Ramirez, 636
 Orpín, Juan de, 185–186, 192, 197–198
 Ortega, José María, 751
 Ortega, Melitón F., 955
 Ortega, Toribio, 946, 949
 Ortega Saavedra, Daniel, 1051–1052, 1053
 Ortega Saavedra, Umberto, 1051–1052
 Ortega y García, Francisco, 786
 Ortiz, Bartolomé, 44
 Ortiz, battle at, 624–625
 Ortiz, Encarnación, 619
 Ortiz, José A., 996
 Ortiz, Juan, 44
 Ortiz, Juan (Spanish maestre de campo), 191
 Ortiz de Ocampo, Francisco, 581, 582
 Orton, William, 323
 Ortuño de Olano, Francisco, 178
 Osborne, Roger, 241, 256–257
 Oscar, Artur, 896
 Osceola, 694, 695, 695 (illus.), 696, 696
 Osinde, Jorge Manuel, 1045
 Osollo, Luis G., 788
 Osorio, Antonio, 149–150
 Osorio, Diego, 113, 114
 Osório, General (Brazilian), 858
 Osorio, Oscar, 1024
 Osorio, Pedro, 169
 Osório, Thomáz Luíz, 441, 443
 Osorio Pardo, Mariano, 606, 622, 624, 625, 626, 628
 Osorio y Funco, Antonio, 450
 Osornio Camarena, Enrique, 958
 Osorno, Francisco, 951
 Ospina Pérez, Mariano, 1023
 Ostias, 127
 Oswego (New York), battle at, 419–420
 Otamendi, Nicanor, 781
 Otero, Luis, 1056
 Otter, William, 890, 891
 Otway, Robert Waller, 551
 Otzen, Jan Janszoon, 189
 Oudaen, Nicolas, 167
 Ouro Prêto, Affonso Celso, Visconde, 892
 Ourry, Paul Henry, 434
 Ouseley, Robert Gore, 738
 Outlaw, John, 248
 Ovalle, Cristóbal de, 116
 Ovalle, Diego de, 111
 Ovando Candía, Alfredo, 1041, 1043
 Overton, Walter H., 692
 Overly, John, 101
 Oviedo, Juan N., 591
 Oxenham, John, 101–106
 Oyster Bay (Maine), 325
 Pablos, Antón de, 110
 Pabón, Rosenberg, 1055
 Pacheco, Ángel, 710, 712, 734, 735, 737, 738
 Pacheco, Francisco, 762, 763, 764
 Pacheco Maldonado, Juan, 152
 Pacific Ocean, discovery of, 18
 Pack, Dennis, 566
 Pack, Richard, 227, 228
 Pacra, Chief, 17
 Paddon, George, 357
 Padilha, Francisco, 166, 174
 Padilla, José, 646, 655
 Padilla Arancibia, David, 1053
 Paes, Diogo, 190
 Paes Cabral, João, 203
 Páez, José Antonio, 614, 620, 626, 644, 652
 Page, Hugh N., 748
 Paget, Charles, 731
 Pago Largo, battle of, 732
 Paine, Thomas, 299, 317–318
 País, Frank, 1030
 Paita, 120, 394
 Paixhans, Henri Joseph, 729
 Pakenham, Edward Michael, 691
 Pakenham, John, 498
 Pakenham, Richard, 731
 Palacios, Abdón, 990
 Palacios, Javier, 1045
 Palacios, Nicolás, 875
 Palacios Miranda, Francisco, 756, 766, 772
 Palavacino, Tomás, 303
 Paliza, Rodrigo, 948

- Palma, José Antonio de, 412, 414
 Palma, Manuel, 1080
 Palmar de Aiz Keys, 364, 367–368
 Palmer, Henry, 140
 Palmer, John, 377, 386
 Palo Alto, battle at, 750–751
 Palomeque de Acuña, Diego, 156
 Palomino, Bartolomé, 226
 Palonegro (Colombia), battle at, 920
 Panama: and Cuban guerrillas,
 1030–1031; Isthmus of, 103;
 sociopolitical unrest in, 927, 976, 978,
 1020, 1022, 1024, 1027, 1031, 1037,
 1040–1041, 1041–1042, 1055; U.S. invasion of, 1080–1083, 1082 (map)
 Panama Canal, 926
 Panama City, 271, 272 (illus.), 294–295
 Pando, José Manuel, 993
 Pando y Patiño, Antonio, 368
 Panigadi, Tulio Néstor, 1068
 Pantano de Vargas, battle at, 631–632
 Pantoja, Cristóbal, 127
 Pantoja, Manuel, 303
 Paoli, battle at, 484
 Papin, Denis, 851
 Paracatú, 414
 Parada, Omar, 1072
 Paraguay, 586–587; and the Chaco War,
 989–1002; sociopolitical unrest in,
 926–927, 929, 930, 931, 973–974,
 977, 981–982, 1058
 Paraíba, 114–115, 190, 203
 Paraná River, offensive at, 740
 Pardo, Juan, 95, 96
 Pardo, Juan Bautista, 610
 Pardo, Manuel, 879
 Pardo y Barreda, José, 929
 Pardo y Osorio, Sancho, 133, 135
 Paredes y Arrillaga, Mariano, 744, 745
 (illus.), 749, 769
 Paredes y Chacón, José de, 916
 Paredón (Mexico), battle at, 951
 Pareja, Félix, 912
 Pareja y Rodríguez Septién, José Manuel,
 849–851
 Parente, Maciel, 200
 Parga, Juan de, 346
 Paris, Chief, 19
 Paris, Francisco, 586, 591
 París, Joaquín, 633
 Parker, Charles, 163
 Parker, Christopher, 498
 Parker, Hyde, 490, 498
 Parker, John, 547
 Parker, Peter, 425, 475–476
 Parker, Robert, 540
 Parker, William, 129–130, 134, 139–140, 144
 Parr, Thomas, 551
 Parra, Ignacio, 940
 Parras, Juan de, 95
 Parrodi, Anastasio, 758, 788
 Parry, W. E., 1006
 Parson, Edward, 361
 Pascal–Trouillot, Ertha, 1084
 Pasley, Thomas Sabine, 739
 Paso, Juan José, 596
 Pasqueira, Ignacio L., 946
 Pasto, fall of, 653
 Paston, Robert, 354
 Pastora Gómez, Edén, 1052, 1055, 1056
 Pastrana Arango, Andrés, 1088–1089
 Pater, Adriaen Janszoon, 178–179,
 181–182, 183–184
 Paterson, William, 333
 Patiño, Gómez, 117
 Patman, Wright, 979
 Patterson, Daniel Todd, 689
 Patterson, Robert, 758
 Paucar, 55
 Paucarpata, battle at, 727
 Paul IV, Pope, 86
 Paul, Antoine Pierre, 935
 Paul, Christmas, 521
 Paul, John, 124, 141
 Paulding, Hiram, 798
 Paulet, Henry, 546
 Paullu, 52, 55–56
 Paunero, Wenceslao, 856, 860, 861
 Pavón, battle at, 782
 Payen, Nicolas, 291
 Payne, Stephen, 349
 Paysandú, 855, 856 (illus.)
 Paz, Agustín de, 124
 Paz, Francisco, 841
 Paz, Gregorio: and Rosas's campaign, 734,
 735, 736, 737, 738, 741; War of
 Peru–Bolivia Confederation, 727
 Paz, José María, 630, 707; and the
 Unitarian–Federalist War, 710–712
 Paz, Manuel de, 410
 Paz, Robert, 1081
 Paz Estensoro, Víctor, 1020, 1022, 1025,
 1026 (illus.)
 Paz García, Policarpo, 1051
 Peacocke, George, 866
 Pearl Harbor, 1010, 1010 (map)
 Pearl Islands, 105
 Pearn, John, 361
 Pearce, Vincent, 386
 Pearson, George F., 502, 758
 Pechell, Samuel John, 574
 Pedernera, Juan Esteban, 711
 Pedro I (Brazil), 649–650, 652, 652, 656
 Pedro II (Brazil), 857, 892
 Pedro, Chief, 102
 Pedroza, Wilson D., 1072, 1073
 Peinado, Francisco, 879
 Peire, Henry D., 689
 Peixoto, Floriano, 892, 894, 896
 Pélage, Magloire, 557
 Pellegrini, Carlos, 876
 Pemberton, John C., 812, 813–814
 Peña, Francisco, 991, 992, 998
 Peña y Peña, Manuel de la, 771
 Peñalba, Bernardino de Meneses–
 Bracamonte Zapata, Conde de, 233
 Peñaloza, Angel Vicente, 736, 783
 Peñaranda Castillo, Enrique, 990–1001
 passim, 1020
 Pender, Francis, 521
 Pendleton, Joseph H., 932–933, 936
 Peninsula Campaign (Virginia), 805, 806
 (map)
 Penn, William, 232, 232–234
 Pennant, Jeffrey, 265
 Pennecui, Robert, 333
 Pensacola (Florida), 371, 413, 689–690;
 Anglo–Indian attack on Spanish at,
 351; battle at, 510–512, 512 (map);
 French seizure of, 368–369
 Pensacola Navy Yard, 802, 807
 Peñuela, José Chacón Medina Salazar y
 Villaseñor, Marqués de la, 338
 Pepperrell, William, 403, 404, 406
 Pequot War, 215–217, 216 (map)
 Peralonso (Colombia), battle at, 920
 Peralta Azurdia, Enrique, 1037
 Peralte, Charlemagne Masséna, 937–938,
 938
 Peralte, Stivern, 930
 Percy, George, 153
 Percy, Hugh, 467, 478
 Percy, William Henry, 681
 Perdomo, Juan, 288
 Pereda, José Manuel, 728
 Pereda Asbún, Juan, 1051, 1053
 Peredo, Guido, 1039
 Peredo, Roberto “Coco,” 1039
 Perein, Laroque, 493
 Pereira, Duarte, 381
 Pereira, Jerônimo, 190
 Pereira, José, 633, 646–647
 Pereira da Silva, Inácio, 378
 Pereira Dantas, João, 86
 Pereira de Sousa, Washington Luís,
 977–978
 Pereira dos Santos, João, 380
 Pereira Temudo, André, 179
 Perera, Jacinto, 617
 Pereyra, Orestes, 941, 946, 947
 Pérez, Carlos Andrés, 1053, 1058,
 1084–1085
 Pérez, Diego, 79
 Pérez, Francisco, 769
 Pérez, Heliodoro, 965
 Pérez, Juan, 936
 Pérez, Julio, 1064
 Pérez, León, 649
 Pérez, Máximo, 855
 Pérez, Ramón Nonato, 613
 Pérez, Santos, 712
 Pérez de Angulo, Dr., 85

- Pérez de Guzmán, Francisco, 289
 Pérez de Guzmán, Juan, 270, 271
 Pérez de la Cerna, Juan, 210
 Pérez de la Rúa, Alonso, 19
 Pérez de Maya, Alvaro, 117
 Pérez de Oporto, Juan, 172
 Pérez de Quesada, Hernán, 63, 66
 Pérez de Tolosa, Juan, 66
 Pérez Godoy, Ricardo Pío, 1035, 1037
 Pérez Jiménez, Marcos, 1022, 1024, 1030
 Perkins, John, 557
 Perkins, Joseph, 682
 Pernambuco: Dutch occupation of, 179–181, 197; rebellion at, 202–203, 204, 616–617
 Perón, Juan Domingo, 1020, 1021, 1022, 1024, 1028, 1046; and the Montoneros, 1042; return of, 1045
 Perry, Abicocke, 123
 Perry, Henry, 600
 Perry, Matthew Calbraith, 756, 766, 768
 Perry, Oliver Hazard, 632, 674
 Perryman, James, 125
 Perryville, battle at, 812
 Pershing, John Joseph, 961; and aircraft, 973; and the Mexican Revolution, 948, 960–961
 Peru: border conflicts with Ecuador, 1019–1020, 1087; “restorative revolution,” 1023–1024; “Shining Path” guerrillas, 1057; sociopolitical unrest in, 929, 933, 977, 979–980, 980–981, 982, 1035, 1037, 1040, 1050, 1087–1088, 1090
 Pessoa, Eptácio, 974
 Pétain, Henri, 1007
 Petersburg, siege, 819–821, 821
 Pétiou, Alexandre Sabès, 538, 540, 541, 542, 544, 545, 569, 570
 Petit Goâve (Haiti), 924
 Petronila de Guzmán, Francisca, 298
 Peyton, Yelverton, 387
 Pezet, Juan Antonio, 849, 850
 Philip II (Spain), 86, 95, 96; and France, 115; and the Netherlands, 98; and Portugal, 110; and the Salt War, 150; Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis and, 88
 Philip III (Spain), 141, 150, 155
 Philip, John W., 894, 916
 Philippe, Guy, 1090
 Philippine Islands, 109, 910, 919
 Phillimore, R. F., 970
 Phillip, Richard, 401
 Phillips, William, 484, 514
 Phips, David, 517
 Phips, William, 309, 315–316, 324; Quebec campaign, 318–319
 Piaggi, Italo, 1072
 Piar, Manuel, 610, 611, 613, 617, 618, 621
 Picado Michalski, Teodoro, 1022, 1023
 Picaluga, Francesco, 700
 Picard, Alexandre, 191
 Picard, Pierre le, 263, 303, 308, 310, 317–318
 Picard, Samuel Le (Sieur de Flavigny), 245
 Pichincha, battle at, 651
 Pickens, Andrew, 491, 509, 510
 Pickett, George Edward, 815, 824
 Picking, Henry F., 894
 Pickmore, Francis, 572
 Pico, Andrés, 760
 Pico, Francisco, 630
 Pico, Jesús, 761
 Pico, Pío, 753, 760
 Picquet, Lamotte, 500
 Picuiba (Nicaragua), battle at, 999
 Piening, Adolf, 1011
 Pierce, Franklin, 769, 770, 771, 778
 Pierrepont, William, 548
 Pierrot, Louis, 537
 Pieterszoon, Jan, 174, 175
 Pieterszoon, Reynier, 182
 Pieterszoon Heertjes, Cornelis, 278
 Pieterszoon Wittebaerd, Claes, 172
 Pigot, Hugh, 525, 681
 Pike, Hew W. R., 1073, 1076
 Pike, Zebulon Montgomery, 671
 Pilkington, Andrew, 682, 686
 Pillow, Gideon, 803
 Pimont, Jean, 284
 Pinart, Jean, 225
 Pincheira, José Antonio, 713
 Pinchinat, Pierre, 533
 Pineau, Jean, 536
 Pineda, José María, 713
 Pineda, Manuel, 772
 Pineda, Manuel de, 512
 Pineiro, Francisco, 498
 Pinheiro Camarão, Chief Diogo, 208
 Pinheiro dos Santos, Francisco, 379
 Pinilla, José María, 1040
 Pino, Manuel Quimper Benitez del, 638
 Pino Alpoim, Vasco Fernandes, 442
 Pino Suárez, José María, 944
 Pinochet Ugarte, Augusto, 1045, 1051, 1051 (illus.), 1057, 1058, 1088
 Pinto, Francisco Antonio, 655
 Pinto, Juan, 112
 Pinto, Manuel Guillermo, 780
 Pinto Bandeira, Francisco, 413, 445
 Pinto Bandeira, Rafael, 449
 Pinto de Miranda Montenegro, Caetano, 616, 617
 Pinto Garmendia, Aníbal, 879
 Pinto Guedes, Rodrigo, 704
 Pinzón, Martín Alonso, 3
 Pinzón, Próspero, 920
 Piraldo, Paula, 160
 Piribebuy, battle at, 864–865
 Piriz, Lucas, 855
 Pirogerie, Hérourard de la, 285, 286
 Pisagua, 883
 Pisco, 166
 Pisco, Ambrosio, 527
 Pisón, Sebastián, 308
 Pistarini, Pascual, 1038
 Pitayo, battle at, 636–637
 Pitcairn, John, 467
 Pitiantuta (Paraguay), 990
 Pitt, William, 397
 Pizarro, Diego, 54
 Pizarro, Francisco, 9, 14, 46, 47 (illus.); death of, 69; Pacific and, 18, 19; in Peru, 46–56, 50 (map)
 Pizarro, Gonzalo, 48, 51–56, 70, 71
 Pizarro, Hernando, 48, 49, 53–56
 Pizarro, José Alfonso, 381, 382, 388, 389, 389–390
 Pizarro, Juan, 48, 52–53, 54
 Plá, Antonio, 627
 Placilla, 903
 Plains of Abraham (Quebec), 427–428, 428 (map)
 Plasencia, Diego de, 66
 Platons, massacre at, 535
 Platt, Orville, 919
 Plattsburgh, raid at, 674
 Plauché, Jean Baptiste, 691
 Plaza, Ambrosio, 633, 646
 Plaza Eguiluz, Antonio de la, 219, 266
 Pleasants, Henry, 820
 Plummer, J. B., 802
 Plymton, Joseph, 765
 Pocahontas, 153
 Pocock, George, 408, 435–439
 Podio, Juan, 377
 Pognon, John, 275
 Poinsett, Joel R., 698
 Point Pleasant (Kentucky), 449
 Pointis, Bernard Jean-Louis de Saint Jean, Baron de, 329–332
 Pol, Hugo, 999
 Polk, James Knox, 738, 748
 Polk, Leonidas, 802
 Polson, John, 499–500
 Polverel, Étienne, 536, 537
 Polwhele, Thomas, 121, 122
 Pomar, Gregorio, 978
 Pomp, Dirk Gerritszoon (“Dirck China”), 142
 Ponce de León, Hernán, 53
 Ponce de León, Juan, 11, 12, 14, 18; Florida and, 16–17, 38; at Puerto Rico, 12–13
 Ponce Vaides, Federico, 1021
 Pondicherry, 432
 Pontal, 189
 Pontejos, Santiago, 303
 Pontiac’s War, 444–445, 444 (map)
 Poole, Jonas, 232
 Poole, William, 260
 Poor, Enoch, 486
 Poort, Adriaan, 278

- Popé, 296
 Pope, John, 803, 807, 808–811
 Popham, George, 131
 Popham, Home Riggs, 565
 Popham, Stephen, 681
 Porcallo de Figueroa, Vasco, 38, 41, 42, 44
 Porres, Gregorio de, 160
 Port au Prince, 536–537, 538–539
 Port Hudson, capture of, 814
 Port Royal (Nova Scotia), 155, 350–351, 355–356
 Port Royal (South Carolina), 303, 307; and the Civil War, 802
 Port Saint Louis (Haiti), 408
 Portal, Nicolás del, 881
 Portales, Diego, 712
 Portales Palazuelos, José Pedro Victor, 727
 Porter, David, 669, 684
 Porter, David Dixon, 768, 807, 813, 823; at Arkansas Post, 812; at Second Battle of Bull Run, 809
 Porter, Peter B., 682, 684
 Porter, Thomas, 364
 Porterfield, Charles, 504
 Portes Gil, Emilio, 988, 989
 Porto Calvo, 191, 192, 203
 Portobelo, 137, 138 (illus.); attacks on, 137, 144, 293–294; Morgan's sack of, 264–265; Vernon at, 383–384, 394
 Portugaal, Klaas, 278
 Portugal, Diego de, 166
 Posadas, Antonio José, 411
 Pose, Justiniano, 783
 Post, Pieter, 194
 Potengi River, 188
 Poti, Chief Pedro, 208
 Potter, Simon, 402
 Pouançay, Jacques Nepveu, Sieur de, 273, 298, 298
 Pouchot, François, 430
 Pouchot, Pierre, 431
 Poundmaker, Chief, 890, 891, 892
 Powder River, battle at, 845
 Powell, Colin, 1086
 Powell, Thomas, 221
 Powers, Manley, 687
 Powhatan, Chief, 152, 153
 Pozo Almonte, battle at, 901
 Pozo de Vargas (Argentina), 861
 Pozo Dolores (San Francisco), 883–884
 Pozo Favorita (Paraguay), battle at, 996
 Prado, Juan de, 184
 Prado, Mariano Ignacio, 849, 851, 853, 884
 Prado y Ugarteche, Manuel, 1035
 Prat Chacón, Arturo, 882
 Prates de Castilhos, Júlio, 892
 Prentiss, Benjamin, 805
 Presbere, Pablo, 354
 Presberty, Jean, 354
 Prescott, William, 468
 Prestes, Júlio, 977, 978
 Prestes, Luís Carlos, 975, 981
 Preston, Amyas, 134–135
 Preston, Charles, 469
 Preston, James P., 672
 Prevost, Augustine, 490–491, 492
 Prevost, George, 574, 670, 688
 Prevost, Mark, 492–493, 496
 Price, Sterling, 800, 804, 811
 Prieto, Guillermo, 788
 Prieto Vial, José Joaquín, 712
 Prim, Juan, 826, 827
 Primo de Rivera, Enrique, 343
 Primo de Rivera, Joaquín, 626
 Prince, John, 719
 Princeton, battle at, 479
 Pring, Daniel, 674
 Pringle, Thomas, 487
 Pringles, Juan Pascual, 712
 Prins, Laurens, 236, 247, 268, 269, 271
 Prío Socarras, Carlos, 1024
 Pro, Miguel, 988
 Procter, Henry A., 666, 671, 674
 Procter, Katherine, 125
 Proenza, Francisco de, 233
 Providencia Island, 218, 253, 254, 270
 Prowse, William, 134
 Puckle, James, 891
 Puebla, Francisco, 149
 Puebla, Juan Manuel, 783, 784
 Puebla (Mexico), 830–831, 843
 Pueblo Indians, revolt, 295–296
 Puente de Márquez, battle at, 711
 Puerto Caballos (Honduras), 88, 89, 126, 128–129, 134, 135, 139, 144–145, 263
 Puerto Cabello (Venezuela), 220, 399–400, 400 (illus.); British bombardment of, 925
 Puerto Príncipe, raid on, 263–264
 Puerto Rico: battle at, 553; English seizure of, 140–141; and the Spanish–American War, 918–919; Spanish occupation of, 12–13
 Pueyrredón, Juan Martín de, 565, 567
 Pugh, Richard, 323
 Pulaski, Casimir, 496–497
 Pulido, José Ignacio, 650
 Pulitzer, Joseph, 907
 Pumacahua, Mateo García, 606
 Puná Island (Ecuador), 120
 Purcell, James, 170, 178, 179
 Purdy, Robert, 676
 Purvis, Brett, 737–738
 Purvis, George, 353
 Putnam, Israel, 476–478
 Putnam, Perley, 682
 Pyle, John, 510
 Quantrill, William C., 815
 Quasi–War, 554
 Quebec City, 211, 318–319, 430, 471–472. See also Plains of Abraham
 Quebracho Herrado, battle at, 734
 Queenston Heights, battle at, 668–669
 Queipo, Suero, 111
 Quemuenchatocha, Chief, 63
 Querétaro (Mexico), 840–842
 Quero, Gerónimo de, 181
 Quero, José María, 623
 Quero, Juan Nepomuceno, 611
 Quesada, Gaspar de, 20
 Quiantales, Chief, 445
 Quiberon Bay, 430
 Quincedo, Juan de, 15
 Quindos, Francisco de, 59
 Quingalumba, 51–52
 Quiñones, Antonio de, 36
 Quintanilla Quiroga, Carlos, 991, 992
 Quiroga, Juan Facundo, 705, 706, 709, 711, 712
 Quiroga, Pablo, 711, 953
 Quirós, Martín de, 111
 Quisquis, 49, 50, 51, 52
 Quitman, John A., 761, 762, 765, 766, 769, 771, 773
 Quito (Ecuador), 127, 446–447
 Rábago, Antonio M., 939
 Rabelais, François, 87
 Racedo, Eduardo, 874, 875
 Rada, Rodrigo de, 122
 Raeder, Erich, 1007
 Raja, Vicente, 366
 Râle, Sébastien, 373
 Raleigh, Walter, 132, 135, 156
 Rall, Johann, 479
 Ramalho, João, 78
 Ramezay, Claude de, 354
 Ramírez, Ciriaco, 578
 Ramírez, Diego, 128–129
 Ramírez, Eleuterio, 884
 Ramírez, Francisco, 622, 624, 635, 636, 637, 641–647 passim
 Ramírez, José V., 578, 732
 Ramírez, Juan, 581
 Ramírez, Miguel, 174
 Ramírez, Pedro Pablo, 1020
 Ramírez, Silverio, 792
 Ramírez de Arellano, Juan, 233
 Ramírez de Arellano, Manuel, 841
 Ramírez y Sesma, Joaquín, 723, 725
 Ramos, Fonseca, 894
 Ramos, Gregorio, 149
 Ramos, Ismael, 939
 Ramos, Nereu, 1029
 Ramos, Remigio, 614, 627
 Rancagua, battle at, 606
 Randall, Richard, 375
 Rangel, Antonio, 631

- Rangel Medina, Salvador, 1046
 Raoul, Claude, 352
 Raousset, Comte de Boulbon, Gaston
 Raoul, 776–777
 Raposo, Estevan, 112
 Rasch, Friedrich, 651
 Rasch, Hermann, 1011, 1013
 Rasily, François, Sieur de, 154, 155
 Ratcliffe, John, 152
 Rauch, Federico, 705
 Raunce, James, 97, 101
 Ravenel, Chevalier de, 512
 Rawdon, Lord, 505, 513, 516
 Rawlins, Robert, 144
 Rawson Corvalán, Arturo, 1020
 Ray, John, 380
 Raymond, Jérémie, 129–130, 135
 Read, Thomas, 706, 709
 Reagan, Ronald, 1023, 1055, 1078, 1079
 Real, Pascual, 614, 615
 Rebelinho, Francisco, 206
 Rebelo, Francisco, 191
 Rebolledo, Juan Williams, 850
 Recabarren, Isaac, 883
 Recalde, Camildo, 981
 Recife (Brazil): domestic unrest in, 356, 357; the Dutch and, 181–182, 188, 190, 191, 194, 206–209; Portuguese and, 202, 203, 204
 Redín, Miguel de, 187
 Redín, Tiburcio, 187
 Reers, Cornelis, 297
 Rees, Barent, 278
 Reggio Branciforte Saladino y Colonna, Andrés, 409–410
 Régnier, Nicolas, 544
 Regulator Revolt, 448
 Régules, José María, 592, 593, 596
 Régules, Nicolás, 837, 841
 Rehwinkel, Ernst, 1011
 Reijndertsen, Adriaen, 140, 141
 Reinafé, Guillermo, 712
 Reinafé, José Vicente, 712
 Rellano Station, 943
 Remedios, 295
 Remón, José Antonio “Chichi,” 1024, 1027
 Remy, George C., 902
 Renau d’Elissagaray, Bernard (“Petit-Renau”), 328
 Renaud d’Aleins, Laurent Emmanuel de, 522
 Renaudot, Christophe, 324
 Rendón, Alberto José, 413
 Rengifo de Angulo, Pedro, 113
 Reno, Marcus, 846–847
 Renou, Adrian, 554
 Renovales, Tomás de, 626, 646
 Renshaw, William B., 756
 Rentería Luviano, José, 966
 Rentone, James, 408
 Repilado, José, 572
 Requena, Tomás, 723
 Resaca de la Palma, battle at, 751, 752 (map)
 Reseguín, José, 527
 Resquín, Isidoro, 856, 857, 859
 Revere, Paul, 467
 Reyes, Bernardo, 942, 944
 Reyes, Manuel, 945
 Reyes Correa, Antonio de los, 340
 Reyning, Jan Erasmus, 279, 284, 285, 286, 288
 Reynolds, Francis, 523
 Reynolds, Humphrey, 139
 Reynolds, J. J., 845
 Reynolds, John F., 809, 815
 Rhett, William, 350
 Rhoades, John, 277
 Rhode Island, 317
 Riall, Phineas, 678
 Riaño y Bárcena, Juan Antonio, 582
 Riaño y Gamboa, Francisco, 195, 217
 Ribaut, André, 287
 Ribaut, Jacques, 93
 Ribaut, Jean, 91, 91 (illus.), 93–94
 Ribeiro, Bento Manuel, 701, 706
 Ribeiro, Hipólito, 896
 Ribeiro, Marciano Araujo, 715
 Ribeiro Coutinho, André, 381
 Ribera, Juan de, 61
 Riberol, Baltasar de, 129
 Ricafort, Mariano, 640
 Ricardos, Felipe, 412
 Rich, Edward, 406
 Richards, Michael, 345
 Richards, William, 125
 Richelieu, Cardinal Armand Jean du Plessis de, 210, 211
 Richepanse, Antoine, 557
 Richery, Joseph de, 552
 Richey, John Alexander, 762
 Richthofen, Oswald, Baron von, 923–924
 Rico, Aldo, 1057
 Rico de Moya, Juan, 298
 Riddell, Walter, 354
 Ridgeway, battle at, 866
 Ridgway, Matthew, 1025
 Ridlesden, John, 131
 Riel, Louis David, 868, 869, 890, 891, 892
 Riffault, François, 130
 Riffault, Jacques de, 154
 Rigada y Leal, Manuel de la, 849
 Rigaud, André, 532, 542
 Righi, Esteban, 1045
 Rijlofszoon, Jan, 278
 Riley, Bennett, 765
 Rincón, Manuel, 729–730
 Ringgold, Samuel, 751
 Río Blanco (Mexico), 922–923
 Río Chaviano, Alberto del, 1026
 Rio de Janeiro: Du Clerc at, 355, 355 (map); Duguay-Trouin at, 359–360, 359 (illus.); Huguenot settlers in, 86; Portuguese counteroffensives at, 90, 91–92, 96, 97 (map)
 Rio Grandese revolt, 892–897
 Río Nuevo, 235–236
 Ríoacha: attacks on, 81–82, 99, 128, 136, 139, 234, 269; and the slave trade, 92, 97
 Ríos, Juan José, 953
 Ríos Ereñu, Héctor, 1057
 Ríos Montt, Efraín, 1056
 Riou, Edward, 547
 Ripley, Eleazer Wheelock, 681
 Riquelme, Alonso, 49, 51
 Ritzema, Rudolph, 469
 Riva Agüero, Carlos, 393
 Riva Agüero, Fernando de la, 225
 Riva Agüero, Francisco de la, 202, 224
 Riva Agüero, José de la, 656
 Riva Palacio, Vicente, 842
 Rivadavia, Bernardino, 701
 Rivadeneira, Juan de, 112
 Rivaguda Enciso y Luyando, Álvaro de, 346
 Rivas, Dagoberto, 984
 Rivas, Ignacio, 870, 871, 873
 Rivas, José Félix, 594, 600
 Rivas, Patricio, 777
 Rivas Rocafull, Miguel de, 395
 River Plate: British invasion of, 565–566, 566 (map); Viceroyalty of, 451; and World War II, 1006–1007
 River Plate campaign, 442–443
 Rivera, Aurelio, 830, 842
 Rivera, Bernabé, 607
 Rivera, Fructuoso, 596, 612, 627, 701, 702, 717; and Rosas’s campaign, 731–738 passim, 741
 Rivera Lino, Felipe, 1000
 Rivero Pardo, Manuel, 267–268, 269
 Riveros Cárdenas, Galvarino, 882
 Rivers, George, 287
 Rizo, Bernaldino, 88
 Roa García, Raúl, 1032
 Roanoke Island (North Carolina), 115, 117, 120; Civil War battle at, 803
 Roatán, 226, 227
 Robacio, Carlos Hugo, 1077
 Robelo, Alonso, 1055
 Robert, Georges Joseph, 1007, 1007, 1016, 1017, 1018
 Roberts, Bartholomew, 368, 371
 Roberts, Charles, 665
 Roberts, Henry, 126, 551
 Roberts, Philip, 222, 1075
 Roberts, William R., 866

- Robertson, Charles Hope, 926
 Robertson, Lewis, 548
 Roberval, Seigneur de (Jean-François de La Rocque), 80, 80
 Robinau de Villebon, Joseph, 321
 Robinson, A. N. R., 1083
 Robinson, Charles, 704
 Robinson, Frederick P., 687
 Robles, Eugenio, 900–901
 Robles, Gabino, 728
 Robles, José Isabel, 949, 951
 Robles, Juvenio, 942, 945
 Robles, Wenceslao, 856
 Robles Pezuela, Manuel, 790
 Roca, Eduardo, 1068
 Roca, Julio A., 872, 873, 873 (illus.), 874–875; and German military advisors, 993
 Rocha, Francisco José de, 451
 Rocha, Sóstenes, 838, 841, 842, 876
 Rocha Siqueira, Paulo da, 158
 Rochambeau, Donatien Marie Joseph de Vimeur de, 535
 Rochambeau, Jean Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, Comte de, 503–504, 519
 Rochechouart, Étienne Pierre, Vicomte de, 435, 523
 Rocher de la Peña, José, 366–367
 Rochfort, Thomas, 354
 Rockwell, Francis W., 1017
 Rodas, Cristóbal de, 132, 167
 Rodas, Miguel de, 41
 Roddam, Robert, 420
 Rodeo de Chacón, 712
 Rodeo del Medio, battle at, 735
 Rodgers, John, 665–666, 851, 853
 Rodil, José Ramón, 626, 656, 660
 Rodney, George Brydges, 501, 521; in Dutch Antilles, 509–510; and the French and Indian War, 433–434; at Martinique, 501–502
 Rodrigo, Francisco, 221
 Rodrigues, Antonio, 78
 Rodrigues Alves, Francisco de Paula, 927
 Rodrigues Figueira, Antônio, 380
 Rodríguez, Alfredo, 988
 Rodríguez, Andrés, 1058
 Rodríguez, Ángel, 993
 Rodríguez, Bartolomé, 89
 Rodríguez, Francisco, 129
 Rodríguez, J., 626
 Rodríguez, José, 862
 Rodríguez, Martín, 607, 609, 639, 641
 Rodríguez, Nicolás, 374
 Rodríguez, Patricio, 862
 Rodríguez, Ramón, 740
 Rodríguez, Roque, 1029
 Rodríguez Cabrillo, Juan, 70
 Rodríguez de Castellanos, Diego, 113
 Rodríguez de Francia, José Gaspar, 588
 Rodríguez de Mora, Juan, 106
 Rodríguez de Raya, Juan, 374
 Rodríguez de Santiestéban, Pedro, 169
 Rodríguez de Villegas, Andrés, 167
 Rodríguez Manzano, Juan, 306
 Rodríguez Palafox, Santana, 923
 Rodríguez Santana, Carlos, 1032
 Rodríguez Serrano, Juan, 20
 Roergas de Serviez, Manuel, 610
 Rogers, Josiah, 547
 Rogers, Woodes, 353–354, 367, 370
 Rohan Montbazon, Louis Armand Constantin, Prince de, 435
 Rojas, Antonio, 791, 835
 Rojas, Francisco de, 41
 Rojas, (Capt.) Francisco de, 127
 Rojas, Gabriel de, 51, 53, 54
 Rojas, Isaac Francisco, 1028
 Rojas, Javier, 940
 Rojas, Manuel, 640
 Rojas, Manuel de, 44
 Rojas Pinilla, Gustavo, 1026
 Rojas y Figueroa, Gabriel de, 230
 Roldán, Francisco, 6, 7, 10
 Rolfe, John, 153
 Rolles, Robert, 551
 Rollo, Andrew, Lord, 432, 433, 434
 Román, José, 554
 Roman Nose, Chief, 845
 Romarate, Jacinto de, 587, 604
 Romero, Antonio, 306
 Romero, Arturo, 1020
 Romero, Carlos Humberto, 1053
 Romero, Francisco, 948, 949
 Romero, Gregorio, 66
 Romero, José María, 724
 Romero, Oscar, 1054
 Romero, Tomás, 762, 763
 Romo de Cardenosa, Alonso, 44
 Romo de Uriza, Francisco, 339
 Rondeau, José, 588, 596, 604–605, 609, 635
 Rondón, Juan José, 632, 633
 Rooke, George, 339, 347
 Rooke, James, 630
 Roosendaal, Abraham, 195, 196
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 976, 981, 1027; and World War II, 1005, 1005, 1007, 1008, 1010
 Roosevelt, Kermit, Jr., 1027
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 898, 914, 926, 927, 928, 961
 Rooth, Richard, 232
 Roquefeuil, Jacques, Comte de, 388, 389, 522
 Ros, Enrique, 1053
 Ros, Leonardo, 918
 Rosa Vera, José, 998
 Rosado, José, 497
 Rosales, Leonard, 704–705
 Rosas, Antonio, 755
 Rosas, Juan Manuel de, 639, 710, 710, 714, 727; campaign of, 731–744; at Puente de Márquez, 711
 Rosas, Prudencio, 732, 733
 Rose, Jean, 292, 303
 Rosebud, battle at, 846
 Rosencrans, William S., 805, 811–812, 814, 815, 817
 Rosete, Francisco, 604
 Rosillo, battle at, 598
 Rosmadec, Marie Hyacinthe, Marquis de, 338
 Ross, George T., 691
 Ross, Robert, 684
 Rostin, Erich, 1011
 Rouer de Villeray, Benjamin, 415
 Rougemont de Brisson, Claude, 211
 Rough Riders, 914
 Roundhead, Chief, 670
 Rous, John, 420
 Rous, William, 217
 Rouse, Augustin, 358
 Rouse, John, 403
 Roussy, Louis de la Rouchefoucauld Roye, Chevalier de, 341
 Rout (Rutt), John, 75
 Rovira, Custodio García, 610
 Rowell, Ross “Rusty,” 986
 Rowley, Bartholomew Samuel, 537
 Rowley, Joshua, 498
 Roxo, Manuel Antonio, 442
 Roydon, Matthew, 326
 Rufane, William, 434
 Ruighaver, Arent, 278
 Ruiz, Bartolomé, 47
 Ruiz, Diego, 169
 Ruiz, Gregorio, 944
 Ruiz, Martiniano, 832
 Ruiz, Ulises, 1091
 Ruiz de Apodaca, Juan, 642
 Ruiz de Apodaca, Sebastián, 552
 Ruiz de Castilla, Conde de, 580–581
 Ruiz de Marchena, Martín, 71
 Ruiz del Pliego, Baltasar, 143
 Ruiz Huidobro, José, 712, 713, 714
 Ruiz Huidobro, Pascual, 569, 570
 Ruiz Mexía, Juan, 346
 Ruiz Puente, Felipe, 446
 Rum, 310, 382
 Rumiñahui, 51–52
 Ruminot, Manuel, 901
 Runchey, Robert, 669
 Rupert, Prince, 229, 232
Runales, 922
 Rush, William R., 950
 Russell, B. R., 924
 Russell, James, 241, 259
 Russell, Thomas Macnamara, 551–552
 Rutherford, Griffith, 492
 Rutherford, Robert, 890

- Ruyters, Dierick, 165, 181
 Ryves, G. F., 551
- Sáa, Felipe, 860, 861
 Sáa, Juan, 782, 855, 860, 861
 Saavedra, Cornelio, 888, 889
 Saavedra Cerón, Ávaro de, 41
 Saba, 192
 Sabinada, 718
 Sabino Álvares da Rocha Vieira, Francisco, 718
 Sabouilly, Jean Soulon, Sieur de, 217, 225
 Sacasa, Juan Bautista, 982, 983, 986
 Sackett's Harbor, battle at, 672–673, 672 (map)
 Sacramento, battle at, 764
 Sade, Hippolyte Augustin, Comte de, 501
 Sáenz Vázquez, Juan Francisco, 284, 297
 Sagamore John, Chief, 280
 Sagamore Sam, Chief, 281
 Saint Barthélemy, 314
 Saint Castin, Bernard Anselme d'Abbadie de, 351
 Saint Croix, 227
 Saint Denis, Louis de, 372
 Saint Domingue: English attack on, 326, 327; French evacuation of, 545–546; and the Savane de la Limonade, 319–320
 Saint John's (Newfoundland), 348, 353
 Saint Kitts, 229, 251, 252–253, 256, 272; English conquests of, 317, 339–340; founding of, 210–212; French capture of, 313; French offensive at, 520–521; French repulse of the English at, 259; and Queen Anne's War, 349; slave revolt on, 217; Spanish offensive at, 213
 Saint Laurent, Claude de Roux, Chevalier de, 256–257, 259, 260
 Saint Lawrence Seaway, 78, 80, 211
 Saint León, Chevalier de, 255, 256–257
 Saint Lucia, 150, 218, 227, 246, 434, 489–490, 558, 737–738
 Saint Martin, 225, 284, 314
 Saint Sauveur, 155
 Saint Simon, Marquis de, 517
 Saint Vincent, seizure of, 492–493
 Sainte Marthe de Lalande, Antoine André, 278
 Salaberría, Fermín de, 308
 Salaberry, Charles Michel d'Irumberry de, 669, 676
 Salamanca, battle at, 787–788
 Salamanca, Daniel, 977, 990, 1000
 Salas, José Mariano, 755
 Salas, Martín de, 99
 Salas Barrazas, Jesús, 965
 Salazar, Amador, 959, 961
 Salazar, Diego de, 16, 18
 Salazar, Gonzalo de, 41
 Salazar, José Inés, 943, 948
 Salazar, Juan Valentin, 723
 Salcedo, Miguel, 594
 Salcedo y Sierralta, Miguel, 378–379, 381
 Saldaña, Atanasildo, 855
 Saldanha da Gama, Luis Felipe de, 894, 896
 Salgado, Antonio, 386, 396
 Salgado, Jesús, 948
 Salgado, Oliveira, 893, 894–895
 Salguero, Rodrigo, 71
 Saligny, Dubois de, 826
 Salinas, Diego de, 347
 Salinas, Emilio, 944
 Salinas, Juan de, 250, 254
 Salinas de Gortari, Carlos, 1085
 Salisbury, John, 547
 Salmon, Norvell, 779
 Salmon Falls (New Hampshire), 315
 Salom, Bartolomé, 660
 Salomón, José Miguel, 601
 Salt, James "Sam," 1067
 Salt, Sampson, 420
 Salt Tortuga Island, 188, 194
 Salt War, 150
 Salta, battle at, 597–598, 598 (map)
 Saltonstall, Charles, 221
 Salvador, 173–174, 654
 Sam, Antoine, 930–931
 Sam, Tirésias Augustin Simon, 897, 924
 Sam, Vibrun Guillaume, 933–934
 Samaniego, Roque, 994
 Sámano, Juan, 633
 Sampaio, Jorge, 302
 Sampson, William Thomas, 908, 909, 910–911, 912, 913, 916; and Guantánamo Bay, 931
 San Antonio de Gibraltar, 144, 199–200, 253, 289
 San Borja, battle at, 611–612
 San Félix, battle at, 617
 San Francisco, 109
 San Gabriel Island (Uruguay), 292–293
 San Germán de Puerto Rico, 79, 81
 San Ignacio Ford (Argentina), 861
 San Jacinto (Mexico), 726, 726 (map), 840
 San Juan de los Remedios, 229
 San Juan de Puerto Rico: attacks on, 135–136, 140–141, 140 (map), 170, 171 (map); fortification of, 141; and the Spanish-American War, 910–911
 San Juan de Ulúa, 99–100, 100 (illus.)
 San Juan Hill, battle of, 915–916
 San Juan River, 269, 273, 279, 500
 San Justo, Tomás de, 410
 San Lorenzo (Mexico), 843
 San Martín, José Francisco de, 597, 603, 613, 613 (illus.), 614, 623, 638, 652; Bolívar and, 652; at Cancha Rayada, 624; at Chacabuco, 615; at Maipó, 625–626; Peruvian campaign of, 638, 639 (map), 640, 644, 649
 San Martín, Pedro de, 59
 San Mateo (Jacksonville, Florida), 94, 95, 98
 San Maxent, Gilberto Antonio de, 497
 San Miguel de Aguayo, Antonio, Marqués, 372
 San Miguel de Panzacola, 413
 San Nicolás de los Arroyos, battle at, 630
 San Pedro de las Colonias (Mexico), battle at, 949
 San Pedro Sula, 263
 San Roque, battle at, 710–711
 San Vicente, José Díaz de, 437
 Sancala, battle at, 734
 Sánchez, A. S., 660
 Sánchez, Diego, 149
 Sánchez, Epitacio, 698
 Sánchez, Francisco, 139–140
 Sánchez, Guadalupe, 965, 966
 Sánchez, Juan Carlos, 1044
 Sánchez, Sebastián, 396
 Sánchez Barcaiztegui, Victoriano, 853
 Sánchez Cerro, Luis M., 977, 979, 980–981
 Sánchez de Carranza, Gerónimo, 129
 Sánchez Lima, Vicente, 636, 637
 Sánchez Luna, Sergio, 1052
 Sánchez Magallanes, Andrés, 831, 832
 Sánchez Ramírez, Juan, 578, 580
 Sánchez Román, Joaquín, 832
 Sánchez Ximénez, José, 254
 Sancho de Hoz, Pedro, 66, 67
 Sanclemente, Manuel Antonio, 920
 Sandes, Ambrosio, 654
 Sandes, Arthur, 658
 Sandino, Augusto César, 984, 985–986, 985 (illus.)
 Sandoval, Francisco, 722
 Sandoval, Gonzalo de, 24, 29–38
 Sands, Joshua, 757, 761
 Sanjinés, Julio, 993, 1000
 Sanjur Atencio, Amado, 1041
 Santa Anna Pérez de Lebrón, Antonio López de, 642, 648, 698, 698, 699, 744, 745, 746, 753; Ayutla Revolution and, 784–785; insurrection by, 700–701; and the Mexican-American War, 757, 758, 761–771 passim; overthrow of, 747; returns from exile, 755, 756, 833; and Texas, 722–724, 726; and the War of Cakes, 729, 730
 Santa Catarina (Brazil), 450
 Santa Cruz, Andrés, 650, 654, 655; flight of, 656; and the War of the Peru-Bolivia Confederation, 726–728
 Santa Cruz, Ricardo, 884
 Santa Elena, 95, 105. See also Fort San Marcos
 Santa Fe campaign, 610–611
 Santa Gertrudis (Mexico), 837–838

- Santa Lucía, battle at, 737–738
 Santa María, Felipe de, 212
 Santa María de los Remedios de Guadianilla, 92, 100, 104
 Santa María el Real, 294
 Santa Marta (Colombia), 81, 85, 88, 99, 136, 181, 234, 287
 Santa Rosa (Argentina), 870, 873, 874, 874 (map)
 Santa Rosa (Mexico), 946
 Santamaría y Benavides, Francisco de, 81
 Santana, Pedor, 580
 Santander, Francisco de Paula, 633
 Santarén, Francisco, 330
 Santiago (Chile), 67–68
 Santiago de Cuba, 132, 244 (illus.); attacks on, 84, 88, 117, 145, 190, 242–243, 243 (map), 408–409; rebirth of, 244; and the Spanish–American War, 916–918, 917 (map), 918
 Santiago de la Vega, 138–139
 Santiago de León de Araya, 167
 Santiago de los Caballeros (Saint Domingue), 237, 317
 Santiago de Talamanca, 154
 Santibáñez, Alfonso, 955
 Santiestéban, Diego de, 107
 Santillán, Francisco, 196
 Santillana, Bartolomé de, 59, 60
 Santo Domingo, 116, 122, 128, 233, 575; coup in, 542–543
 Santo Tomé (Venezuela), 179, 193, 197
 Santo Tomé de la Guayana, 136
 Santos, 124
 Santos, Abel, 956
 Santos, Felipe dos, 372
 Santucho, Asdrubal, 1048
 Sanz, Francisco de Paula, 580
 Sanzay, Louis de Chatillon, Comte de, 435
 São Luis do Maranhão, 201
 São Paulo, 78
 São Salvador: the Dutch and, 164–166, 193–194, 197; Hispano-Portuguese reconquest of, 167–170
 São Sebastião, 193
 São Vicente, 77, 112
 Sapiáin, Miguel de, 499
 Sarabia, Diego de, 160
 Saraiva, Gumerindo, 892–893, 894–895, 896
 Saraos, Bartolomé, 287
 Saratoga, battle at, 484, 486
 Sarmiento, Domingo F., 870, 871
 Sarmiento, Luis, 57
 Sarmiento de Gamboa, Pedro, 110–115, 132
 Sarmiento de Villandrade, Juan, 127, 128
 Sarrazin, Jean, 544
 Sassacus, Chief, 216, 217
 Saturiba, Chief, 95, 98
 Sauce Grande, battle at, 733
 Saucecito, battle at, 624
 Saucedo, Francisco de, 26
 Saunders, Charles, 427, 428
 Saunders, John L., 747
 Saunders, Robert, 232
 Saunders, William, 97
 Sauni, Juan, 393
 Savannah, defense of, 496–497
 Savery, Thomas, 851
 Sawkins, Richard, 280, 294
 Sawyer, Charles, 493, 547
 Sayle, William, 225
 Schacht, Harro, 1013
 Schapenham, Gheen Huygen, 164, 166–167
 Scheder, Georg, 924–925
 Schenoni L., Manlio, 989
 Schley, Winfield Scott, 904, 912
 Schneider, Rudolph, 972
 Schoen, Dirk, 286
 Schofield, John, 823, 824
 Scholtz, Klaus, 1011, 1013
 Schomberg, Frederick, 318
 School of the Americas, 1089
 Schorer, Lucas, 311–312, 318
 Schouten, Albert, 166
 Schouten, Pieter, 164
 Schultze, Heinz-Otto, 1011
 Schulz, F., 969
 Schuyler, Peter, 321, 322
 Schuyler, Philip John, 469, 481–482
 Schwan, Theodore, 919
 Schwarzkopf, Norman, Sr., 1027
 Schwarzkopf, Norman H., 1078
 Schweiger, Walter, 971
 Scoon, Paul, 1078
 Scott, Hercules, 682–683
 Scott, James, 385
 Scott, Matthew Henry, 547
 Scott, Michael I. E., 1076
 Scott, Richard W., 693
 Scott, Thomas, 868
 Scott, Winfield, 672, 760, 765, 766, 771, 802
 Searle, Daniel, 228
 Searle, John Clarke, 551
 Searle, Robert, 236, 246, 248, 251
 Searle, Thomas, 640
 Secord, Laura Ingersoll, 673
 Sedeño, Jacinto, 220
 Sedeño, Manuel, 621
 Sedgewick, Robert, 231
 Sedgwick, John, 813, 839
 Seguí, Juan Francisco, 704, 706, 736
 Segura, José, 839
 Seguro, Jacinto de, 393
 Seineldin, Mohamed Ali, 1058, 1061, 1083
 Seissenhofer, Hans, 58
 Seleme Vargas, Antonio, 1025
 Selfridge, Thomas O., 772
 Selkirk, Alexander, 346, 353, 354
 Semen Valley, battle at, 624
 Seminole Wars, 693, 694–695, 694 (map)
 Semmes, Raphael, 758, 808
 Sena Pereira, Jacinto Roque de, 706
 Senhouse, William Wood, 555
 Sepé Tiarayu, José, 413–414
 Sequeira, João de, 191
 Sergeant, Henry, 307
 Serizat, Charles Catherin, 557
 Serna e Hinojosa, José de la, 612
 Serrano, Antonio, 374
 Serrano, Cristóbal, 16
 Serrano, Francisco R., 988
 Serrano, Ramón Freire, 712
 Serrão de Paiva, Jerônimo, 204
 Serrato, José, 510
 Sesma, Ramón, 596
 Seton, James, 550
 Seversky, Alexander de, 973
 Seward, H. C., 719
 Seymour, George F., 753
 Seymour, Hugh, 554–555
 Seymour, William, 357
 Seymour of Sudeley, Lord (Thomas), 105
 Shafter, William Rufus, 913, 914, 915–916, 917, 918
 Shakespeare, William, 153, 154
 Shaler, William, 601
 Shankar, Ramsewak, 1084
 Shannon, Viscount, 355
 Sharpe, Bartholomew, 292, 294, 296–297, 300
 Shattuck, Job, 529
 Shaw, T. Darrah, 753
 Shays, Daniel, 529
 Sheaffe, Roger Hale, 668
 Sheehan, Timothy, 844
 Shelton, Turner B., 1047
 Shelvocke, George, 370–371
 Shepard, William, 529
 Shepherd, James, 707
 Sherbrooke, John Coape, 686
 Sheridan, J. M. Guy, 1063
 Sheridan, Philip Henry, 518, 817, 818, 819, 822, 823–824
 Sherley, Anthony, 138–139
 Sherman, Sidney, 726
 Sherman, Thomas, 323
 Sherman, Thomas W., 764, 802
 Sherman, William Tecumseh, 802, 813, 815, 818, 824; at Chattanooga, 817; Chickasaw Bluffs, 812; drive on Atlanta, 819; march to the sea by, 822–823
 Sherwell, Thomas, 104
 Shields, James, 766, 770
 Shillinge, Andrew, 127
 Shiloh (Tennessee), 805

- Shipbuilding, 82, 804, 808
 Shipley, Charles, 572
 Shipping: and the Manila galleons, 109;
 the plate fleets, 90; and steam power,
 851
 Shirley, William, 402, 415, 419
 Short, Charles, 890
 Shrimpton, John, 347
 Shubrick, Thomas, 517
 Shubrick, W. Branford, 773
 Shuldham, Molyneux, 418, 425, 434,
 475
 Sibley, C. C., 798
 Sibley, Henry (colonel), 844–845
 Sibley, Henry H., 800
 Sicard, Montgomery, 907
 Sierra, Miguel, 605
 Sierra, Victor, 633
 Sierra Alta, Bernabé de, 140
 Sierra Madre expedition, 848
 Sigel, Franz, 800, 809
 Sigsbee, Charles D., 907, 914
 Sigüenza y Góngora, Carlos de, 324
 Silao, battle at, 792
 Siles Reyes, Hernando, 977
 Siles Salinas, Luis Adolfo, 1041
 Siles Zuazo, Hernán, 1025
 Silva, Antônio, 208
 Silva, Juan Manuel, 638
 Silva, Laurencio, 645, 659
 Silva, Luiz Alves de Lima e, 717
 Silva, Manoel Fonseca Lima e, 713, 716
 Silva, Mariano, 746, 753
 Silva, Pedro da, 193
 Silva, Waldo, 898
 Silva da Fonseca, Vicente da, 442
 Silva Paes, José da, 380–381
 Silva Palma, Alberto, 901
 Silva Santisteban, Antonio, 1019, 1020
 Silva Tavares, João Nunes da, 892–893,
 895, 896
 Silvera Domínguez, Ramiro, 1041
 Simcoe, John, 508, 516
 Simon, François-Antoine, 929
 Simonszoon van der Graft, Laurens, 172
 Simson, George, 125
 Sinclair, Patrick, 539
 Sint Eustatius, 192, 250, 311–312, 318
 Sint Maarten, 185, 186–187, 225, 345;
 Stuyvesant at, 202
 Sinú, Chief, 5
 Sioux uprising, 844–845
 Sipe Sipe, battle at, 609
 Siscara, Juan de, 244
 Sitting Bull, 845, 846, 847
 Skevington, Thomas, 111
 Skinner, John S., 688
 Skinner, L., 551
 Skinner, Nicholas, 214
 Skipwith, H. L., 970
 Slave insurrections, 383, 448
 Slavery: and abolitionism, 798; and asientos, 363; and the New Laws, 70;
 and sugar, 531. See also Trade, African slave
 Slidell, John, 802, 803
 Slidell, John C., 748, 753
 Slingsby, Francis, 127, 140
 Sloane, Hans, 262
 Sloat, John D., 748, 753
 Slocum, H. J., 959
 Sloughter, Henry, 320
 Smallwood, William, 505
 Smith, A. J., 818
 Smith, Edmund Kirby, 811, 824
 Smith, Edward, 395
 Smith, Edward T., 551
 Smith, Elliot, 398
 Smith, Francis, 467
 Smith, John, 152–153, 155
 Smith, John (American Revolution), 491
 Smith, Persifor F., 757, 765, 769
 Smith, Ray, 1079
 Smith, Samuel, 487
 Smith, Sidney, 577
 Smith, Thomas, 126
 Smith, W. Osborne, 867
 Smith, William F. (“Baldy”), 819
 Smith, William Sidney, 565, 573
 Smith, William W., 1015
 Smollett, Tobias George, 392
 Smyth, Alexander, 669
 Snipe Islet, 1030
 Snouck, Jan, 192
 Soanes, Joseph, 357
 Soares Canhao, Bartolomeu, 206
 Soares Coimbra, Manoel, 450
 Soares de Avelar, Paulo, 200
 Soares Moreno, Martim, 188, 203
 Sobremonte, Rafael, Marqués de, 569
 Soccer War, 1041
 Sojo, Diego de, 154
 Solá, Manuel, 728
 Solané, Gerónimo E. “Tata Dios,” 871
 Solano López, Francisco, 855, 858–859,
 862–865, 864
 Solano y Bote, José, 502, 511
 Soler, Miguel Estanislao, 615, 637, 643
 Soler, Silvestre, 308
 Solís, Gutierre de, 110
 Solís, José, 636
 Solís, Manuel Camacho, 1085
 Solloso, Lope de, 343
 Solórzano, Carlos, 982, 983
 Somers, George, 134–135, 153, 154
 Somers, Thomas, 403
 Somoza, Luis, 1033
 Somoza Debayle, Anastasio “Tachito,”
 1029, 1039, 1051, 1053, 1055
 Somoza García, Anastasio “Tacho,” 986,
 1027, 1029
 Sonthonax, Léger Félicité, 535
 Sores, Jacques de, 84, 85
 Soria, Diego Alejandro, 1076
 Sorondo, Gabriel, 552
 Sosa, Antonio, 580
 Sotaurco, 52
 Soto, José Ángel, 717
 Soto, José de la Luz, 939
 Soto, José María, 900
 Soto, Juan Francisco, 741
 Sotomayor, Cristóbal de, 13, 16
 Sotomayor, Diego, 16
 Sotomayor, Luis de, 112
 Sotomayor Baeza, Emilio, 879, 880, 883
 Sotomayor Baeza, Rafael, 885, 886
 Sotomayor y Andía, Alonso de (Marqués de Villahermosa), 111, 112, 129, 137
 Soubllette, Carlos, 610, 633
 Soule, John, 327
 Sourdeval, Sébastien Le Gouès, Sieur de,
 342, 351
 Sousa, João de, 76
 Sousa, Nicolás de, 219
 Sousa Dessa, Manuel de, 155
 South Carolina, 268–269, 369
 Southack, Cyprian, 315, 345
 Souza, Manuel Marques de, 716
 Souza Coutinho, Francisco de, 204
 Spannochi, Tiburcio, 132
 Sparke, John Frederick, 721
 Sparkes, John Hindes, 548
 Spee, Maximilian, Reichsgraf von,
 968–971, 969
 Speiridyke, Bernard Claesen, 268
 Spencer, Joseph, 478
 Sperry, Charles S., 928
 Spicer, Edward, 120, 122
 Spier, Samuel, 866
 Spilsbury, Francis B., 681
 Spinola, Ambrosio, 157
 Spínola, Benito Antonio de, 410
 Spotsylvania, battle at, 819
 Spragge, Thomas, 307, 308, 313
 Spranger, Quirijn, 231, 245, 283, 285
 Spry, Richard, 417
 Spurre, George, 290
 Squire, John, 471
 Squire, Matthew, 488
 St. Augustine, 95; Anglo-American assault on, 343, 343 (map); attacks on, 94,
 117, 264; Oglethorpe and, 386–387,
 387 (map)
 St. Clair, Arthur, 475, 480, 530
 St. George, Thomas Bligh, 665
 St. John, Nicholas, 150
 St. Leger, Barry, 481, 482
 St. Loe, Edward, 376
 St. Vrain, Ceran, 762–763
 Stafford, Toby, 124
 Stalin, Joseph, 982
 Stanbridge, battle at, 867
 Staniford, Thomas, 756

- Stanton, Oscar F., 894
 Stapels, Geleijn, 174
 Stapels, Geleyn van, 167, 175
 Stapleton, Edward, 383
 Stapleton, William, 273
 "Star-Spangled Banner, The" 688
 Stark, John, 468, 482, 507
 Steele, Samuel, 891
 Steele, Seymour G., 774
 Steen, Enoch, 764
 Steenwyck, Cornelis, 276
 Stehelin, Edward, 574
 Stel, John, 289
 Stephen, Adam, 484, 485
 Stephens, Alexander H., 804
 Stephens, James, 866
 Stephenson, William, 1027
 Steptoe, E. J., 765
 Sterrett, Isaac, 753
 Stevens, Edward, 512
 Stevens, Richard, 250
 Stevenson, Adlai, 1033
 Stevenson, J., 551
 Stevenson, John A., 804
 Stevenson, Robert Louis, 341
 Stewart, Alexander, 396
 Stewart, Henry, 395, 398
 Stewart, Keith, 731
 Stickney, Thomas, 482
 Still, Howard, 509
 Stimson, Henry L., 985
 Stirling, Charles, 568
 Stirling-Dickson, Edward, 552
 Stockton, Robert Field, 747, 755
 Stoddart, A. C., 970
 Stoffelszoon van Eyken, Pieter, 172
 Stokes, Thomas, 130–131, 133–134
 Stolwyck, Cornelis, 286
 Stolwyck, Pieter, 284, 286
 Stoney Creek, battle at, 673
 Stopford, Robert, 564, 565
 Story, Robert, 232
 Stott, John, 448, 488
 Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 719
 Stradling, Thomas, 346
 Strait of Magellan: charting, 110; colonization attempts at, 110–111,
 112, 114, 118
 Stricker, John, 689
 Stringham, Silas H., 800–802
 Stroessner, Alfredo, 1058
 Strong, John, 315, 445
 Stuart, J. E. B., 814–815
 Stuart, James, 439
 Stuart, Mary, 311, 312
 Studley, James, 331
 Sturdee, Doveton, 970, 971
 Stuyvesant, Pieter, 200, 202, 233, 234, 246
 St. Vrain, Ceran, 762, 763
 Suares, Pedro, 133
 Suárez, Diego, 200
 Suárez, Inés, 67
 Suárez, Isidoro, 657, 659
 Suárez, José Gregorio, 855
 Suárez, Melchor, 137
 Suárez, Vicente, 640
 Suárez Amaya, Diego, 150
 Suárez Coronel, Pedro, 150
 Suárez de Carvajal, Illán, 56
 Suárez de Poago, Melchor, 149
 Subercasse, Daniel D'Auger de, 348, 351,
 355–356
 Submersibles, 817, 818
 Suckling, Maurice, 421, 424
 Sucre Alcalá, Antonio José de, 596, 628,
 642, 643, 647–660 passim
 Suffren, Pierre-André de, 488
 Sugar, 531
 Sugars, Gregory, 315
 Suhren, Reinhard, 1011
 Suipacha, battle at, 585
 Sullivan, Bartholomew James, 740
 Sullivan, John, 474, 477, 479, 484
 Sullivan's Island, battle at, 475–476
 Sumner, Edwin ("Old Bull"), 811
 Sumner, Jethro, 493, 518
 Sumter, Thomas, 504, 506, 516
 Suriname, 257, 261; French failure at,
 312–313; and Queen Anne's War,
 361–362; slave revolt on, 448;
 sociopolitical unrest in, 1054–1055,
 1056, 1057, 1083–1084
 Surlemont, Jules, 1022
 Susquehannock Indians, 282
 Sutherland, William, 495
 Sutter, John, 775
 Sutton, Thomas, 326
 Sutton ("Clonard"), 440–441
 Swan, Charles, 280, 302, 303, 304
 Swanton, Robert, 434
 Swart, Jan, 286
 Swartout, Robert, 677
 Sweers, Frederik, 286
 Swift, A. J., 765
 Swiney, William, 498
 Sydenham, Elizabeth, 107
 Symonds, Thomas Matthew Charles, 731
 Syngman Rhee, 1025

 Taalman, Abraham, 278
 Tabasco, Chief, 24
 Tabasco (Mexico), 224, 246–247, 768
 Tabera, Ramón, 844
 Taboada, Antonio, 783, 827, 830, 832, 833,
 834, 861
 Taboada, Manuel, 783
 Tabocas Hill, battle of, 203
 Tabuyo, Alonso, 49
 Tacna, battle at, 886
 Tacuarembó Chico, battle at, 635
 Tacuari, battle at, 587–588
 Tacubaya, battle at, 790
 Taft, Robert A., 1005
 Taft, William Howard, 928, 933
 Tafur, Pero, 47
 Tagle, Gregorio, 653
 Tahourdin, William, 521
 Tala, battle at, 705–706
 Talamantes, Severiano, 953
 Talavera, Bernardino de, 14
 Talbot, Charles, 307
 Talcahuano, siege of, 621–622, 622 (map)
 Talcott, G. H., 764
 Talladega, battle at, 677
 Talleyrand Périgord, Charles Maurice de,
 553
 Talon de Boulay, Angélique, 419
 Tamandaré, Joaquim Marques Lisboa,
 Visconde de, 855, 860
 Tamariz, Antonio Haro y, 786
 Tampico, 758
 Tanaka, Raizo, 1013
 Tangaxoan II, 43
 Tapia, Andrés de, 31, 36
 Tapia, Cristóbal de, 37
 Tapia, Diego de, 52
 Tapia, Gonzalo de, 54
 Tapia, Mariano de, 591
 Tapia, Santiago, 828–829, 839
 Tarapacá, battle at, 884
 Tarleton, Banastre, 501, 502, 506, 509;
 at Cowpens, 509; at Guildford, 512;
 at Yorktown, 519
 Tatham, Sandford, 547
 Tato, Manuel, 1028
 Tattnall, Josiah, 758, 765
 Tavares, Joao da Silva, 716
 Taylor, Francis, 765
 Taylor, John, 654
 Taylor, Polycarpus, 408
 Taylor, Thomas, 505, 517, 614, 617
 Taylor, Zachary, 667, 747, 748 (illus.), 751;
 at Buena Vista, 763; at Lake
 Okeechobee, 697; at Monterrey, 757;
 at Resaca, 751
 Teach, Edward ("Blackbeard"), 367
 Tecto, Juan de, 41
 Tecuilhuitzin, 39
 Tecumseh, 665, 671, 675, 676
 Tecún Umán, 39
 Teesdale, Charles, 426
 Teixeira, Marcos, 166
 Teixeira, Pedro, 161–162, 163, 170, 179,
 193
 Teixeira de Melo, Antônio, 200
 Teixeira Lott, Henrique Duffles, 1028
 Teixeira Nunes, Joaquim, 717
 Tejada Sorzano, José Luis, 1000
 Tejedor, Carlos, 875
 Tejera, Luis, 931
 Teles, Carlos, 895
 Teles da Silva, Antônio, 203, 204

- Teles de Meneses, Antônio (Conde de Vila Pouca de Aguiar), 206
- Telez da Silva Caminha e Meneses, Luiz, 612
- Telles, Rafael, 773
- Telles Bardy, Paulo Antônio, 1028
- Téllez de Guzmán, Juan Bruno, 304
- Tello, Juan, 647
- Tello de Guzmán, Pedro, 135
- Tenamaxtle (Diego el Zacateco), 68, 69
- Tenochtitlán, 37, 38
- Tenorio, José, 287
- Tepehuán revolt, 155–156
- Ternay, Charles Henri Louis d’Arsac, Chevalier de, 440–441, 503–504
- Terra, Gabriel, 980
- Terrazas, Félix, 946
- Terry, Alfred H., 823, 846, 847
- Terry, Silas, 894
- Testard de La Forest, Gabriel, 327
- Testard de Montigny, Jacques, 328, 348
- Teobiate (Juan Maldonado), 878, 878 (illus.), 879, 921, 922
- Teunissoon van Anten, Issaak, 278
- Teutliltzin, 25, 25
- Tezanos Pinto, Jorge, 887
- Thames, battle at, 676
- Tharltton, Robert, 125, 128
- Thatcher, Margaret, 1059, 1062–1063
- Theller, Edward, 719
- Theobald, Robert A., 1014
- Théodore, Davilmar, 933, 934
- Theyanoguin, Chief (“Hendrick”), 406, 417, 418
- Thiebaut, Jean, 737
- Thierfelder, Paul, 967, 972
- Thijssen, Maarten, 179, 181, 183, 184, 185
- Thirty Years’ War, 157, 214
- Thomas, George Henry, 803, 812, 817, 819, 823
- Thomas, John, 469, 469
- Thomas, Martin, 225
- Thompson, Charles (Revolutionary War), 523, 546
- Thompson, Charles (War of 1812), 691
- Thompson, Edward, 227
- Thompson, George H., 864
- Thompson, Isaac, 625
- Thompson, James, 654
- Thompson, Julian H. A., 1070, 1072
- Thompson, Meriwether Jeff, 802, 808, 824
- Thompson, Pablo, 586
- Thompson, Ramsey, 697
- Thompson, Robert, 345
- Thompson, Samuel, 523
- Thompson, Thomas, 232
- Thompson, Wiley, 694, 695, 696
- Thompson, William (brigadier), 474–475
- Thompson, William (privateer captain), 396, 399
- Thord-Gray, Ivor, 952
- Thorn, Thomas, 220
- Thornburgh, Thomas T., 848
- Thornburn, Robert D., 774
- Thornhill, Timothy, 313, 314, 317, 318
- Thornton, Seth, 692, 769
- Thornton, William, 685
- Thorpe, George, 210
- Thread, Robert, 124
- Thurman, Maxwell, 1081
- Thury, Louis Pierre, 325
- Tickell, William, 232
- Ticonderoga, battle at, 480–481
- Tierra Blanca, battle at, 948
- Tingey, Thomas, 685
- Tinoco, Arias, 44
- Tinoco Granados, Federico, 937, 938
- Tiquispe, Francisco, 198
- Tirpitz, Alfred von, 897
- Tiso Yupanqui, 56
- Tisquesusa, Chief, 63
- Tixtla, battle at, 589
- Tizcar, Antonio, 599
- Tizón, Aurelia Eugenia “Potota,” 1021
- Tlapaneatl, Chief, 36
- Tlaxcala, battles at, 26–27
- Tobago, 284; attacks on, 251, 285–287, 286 (map), 288; Dutch discovery/settlement of, 175, 176, 231; French occupation of, 254, 515–516; settlement by Courlanders, 217, 219, 231; Spanish recapture of, 192; terrorism in, 1083
- Tobiassoon, Thomas, 278
- Tobin, Nicholas, 1071
- Toledo, Alejandro, 1090
- Toledo, Francisco de, 72, 110
- Toledo (Paraguay), battle at, 994
- Toledo Pimentel, Luis de, 72
- Toll, Edmund, 408
- Tollet, Anthony, 331
- Tolrá, Carlos, 649, 651
- Tolrá, Juan, 633
- Tolú (Colombia), 223
- Tomasa, Mercedes, 614
- Tomlyn, John, 126
- Tompkins, Frank, 960
- Toonahowi, Chief, 401
- Topete, Bonifacio, 877
- Topete, Fausto, 989
- Topete y Carballo, Juan Bautista, 849
- Toral, José, 916, 917–918, 918
- Torata-Moquegua, battle at, 653
- Tordoya, Gómez de, 54
- Torecha, Chief, 17
- Toribio Merino, José, 1045
- Toriello Garrido, Jorge, 1021
- Torinaseo, 56
- Tornel y Mendivil, José María, 749
- Toro, Francisco de Paula, 714
- Toro, Miguel del, 16
- Toro, Tomás de, 60
- Toro Ruilova, David, 999–1001
- Torrealva, Hilario, 628
- Torrejón, Anastasio, 749, 750, 751
- Torrens, Anastasio, 744
- Torreón: first battle at, 946–947; second battle at, 948
- Torres, Antonio (1820s), 585, 593
- Torres, Antonio de, 3–5, 9, 10
- Torres, Francisco de, 20
- Torres, Gabriel, 637, 648
- Torres, Gabriel de, 141
- Torres, Lorenzo, 878, 921–922
- Torres, Luis E., 879
- Torres Burgos, Pablo, 940
- Torres González, Juan José, 1043, 1044
- Torres Ortiz, Humberto, 1025
- Torres Tenorio, Camilo, 597
- Torres y Ayala, Laureano de, 324
- Torrice, Rufino, 888, 889
- Torrijos Herrera, Omar, 1040, 1041–1042, 1055
- Torrington, Arthur Herbert, Earl of, 341
- Torti, Julio, 1051
- Tortolo Comas, Pedro, 1078
- Tortuga Island (Haiti), 213, 214, 219–220, 229, 231, 241–242, 255, 268; Franco-English occupation of, 234; Spanish conquest of, 230
- Tortuga Island (Venezuela), 182
- Totty, Thomas, 553
- Toulouse, Louis Alexandre de Bourbon, Comte de, 347
- Toussaint Louverture, François Dominique, 538–541, 540 (illus.), 541; in Santo Domingo, 543; War of the Knives and, 542
- Tovar, Nuño de, 44
- Townley, Francis, 303, 306, 307, 308
- Townsend, Isaac, 405
- Townshend, George, 387, 427, 428
- Townshend, Henry Dive, 719
- Traconis, Juan Bautista, 758
- Trade: and abolitionism, 798; African slave, 91, 92–93, 97–98, 125, 143, 363; factory, 4; and the Isthmus of Panama, 103; New World settlements and, 209. See also Dutch West India Company (WIC)
- Trafalgar, 563
- Trapaud, Cyrus, 425
- Trappen, Joost van, 178
- Tratado de Permuta* (Treaty of Exchange), 412, 413, 432
- Travis, William Barret, 472, 724
- Treat, Robert, 281
- Treaty of Alfonza, 337
- Treaty of Breda, 260
- Treaty of Cambrai, 76
- Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis, 88
- Treaty of Crêpy, 81

- Treaty of Joinville, 115
Treaty of la Suze, 211
Treaty of London, 145
Treaty of Nemours, 115
Treaty of Nijmegen, 290
Treaty of Nonsuch, 116
Treaty of Rijswijk, 333
Treaty of Saint Germain en Laye, 211
Treaty of Seville, 377
Treaty of the Pyrenees, 214
Treaty of Tordesillas (1494), 5
Treaty of Utrecht (1713), 362, 365
Treaty of Vaucelles, 86
Treaty of Westminster, 231; second, 276–277
Treaty of Westphalia, 206
Trehouart, François Thomas, 740, 741
Trelawney, William, 425
Trenton (New Jersey), 479
Tres Palos, 586
Treviño, Jacinto B., 944, 959, 962, 965
Treviño, Jerónimo, 836, 837, 840, 841
Treviño, Ramón, 966
Trevor, Thomas, 383
Triana, Dionisio, 956
Triana, Martín, 940
Trigge, Thomas, 555
Trinidad, 126, 131, 132, 192, 214, 552–553, 896; terrorism in, 1083
Trinidad Railway Station (Mexico), battle at, 958
Tristán, Diego, 10
Tristán, Domingo Pío, 589, 594, 595, 597–598, 650
Trois Rivières, battle at, 474–475
Trolong Du Romain, Charles Marie, Chevalier de, 492–493
Tromp, Maarten, 173, 248
Trouwens, Abraham, 257
Trucy Aubert, Fernando, 941
Trujano, Valerio, 592
Trujillo, Rafael “Ramfis,” Jr., 1035
Trujillo, Torcuato, 584
Trujillo (Honduras), 89, 104, 126, 187, 289; English capture of, 222–223
Trujillo Molina, Rafael Leónidas, 1027, 1035
Truman, Harry S., 1023, 1025, 1027
Truxtun, Thomas, 554
Tryon, William, 448, 480
Tuce, Louis Adrien de, 837, 838
Tucker, J. G. P., 682
Tucker, Tudor, 679
Tucker, William, 434
Tucumango, 51
Tucumán, battle at, 595–596
Tumaco, Chief, 17, 19
Tumbalá, Chief, 48
Tupac Amaru, 71, 72
Tupac Amaru (José Gabriel de Condorcanqui), 526
Tupac Huallpa, 49
Turcios Lima, Luis, 1032
Turenne, Henri, Vicomte de, 226
Turnbull, George, 504
Turner, Nat, 713, 791
Turner, Thomas, 126
Turner, William, 215
Turrillo de Yelva (Yebra), Francisco, 214
Tuscaloosa, Chief, 44
Tuscarora War, 360
Tuxpan, battle at, 766
Tuyuti: first battle of, 858–859, 858 (illus.), 859 (map); second battle of, 862
Twiggs, David E., 693, 747, 765, 766, 769
Tyng, Edward, 401
Tyrrell, Richard, 398, 424–425
Tyrrell, Warren, 387
Tzeltal rebellion, 361
Tzerclaes, Johann (Graf von Tilly), 158
U-boats, 1011; offensive by, 1009–1011
Ubico Castañeda, Jorge, 1021
Ugartecha, Domingo de, 722
Ulate Blanco, Otilio, 1022, 1023
Ulloa, Antonio de, 378, 405, 446, 447
Ulloa, Fernando de, 446
Ulloa, Francisco de, 44, 45
Ulloa, Juan de, 374
Ulloa, Pedro de, 267
Unare River, 197–198
Unare salt pans, 188
Uncas, Chief, 216
Underhill, John, 215, 216
Unzaga y Amézaga, Luis de, 447
Upton, Arthur, 420, 421
Uraburru, Tomás, 299
Uranga, Fernando de, 84
Urayóan, Chief, 16
Urbalejo, Francisco, 989
Urbina, Rafael Simón, 976
Urbina R., Tomás, 946–947, 958
Urdaneta, Andrés de, 109
Urdaneta, Luis, 654
Urdaneta, Rafael, 602, 631–632
Urdanivia Ginés, José, 933
Urdinzu, Bartolomé de, 365
Ureta Montehermoso, Eloy G., 1019
Uribe Apallua, Juan de, 123
Uribe Uribe, Rafael, 920
Uribe Vélez, Álvaro, 1090
Uriburu, José Félix, 977
Uriburu, Napoleón, 874
Urica, battle at, 606–607
Uriñaquicha, Felipe de, 393
Urquiza, Justo José, 780–782, 870; and Rosas’s campaign, 732–744
Urrea, Juan José, 724, 744
Urrunaga, Bartolomé, 394
Urrutia, Gregorio, 898, 900
Urrutia, José, 498
Urrutia Lleó, Manuel, 1030, 1031
Urtizabal, Manuel, 552
Uruguay, sociopolitical unrest in, 980
Uruguayana, 857
USS Merrimack (CSS Virginia), 798, 802
USS Monitor, 804, 804–805
Uvedale, Samuel, 425, 431
Vaca de Castro, Cristóbal, 70
Valcarce, Joaquín, 526
Valderrama, Andrés, 499
Valdés, Agustín, 939
Valdés, Flores de, 94
Valdés, Manuel, 636–637, 642, 650
Valdéz, Jerónimo, 640, 643, 644, 650–659 passim
Valdéz, José María, 636
Valdivia, 68, 142, 635–636
Valdivia, Pedro de, 66–68
Valdonoci, Carlo, 938
Valencia, Gabriel, 605, 744, 769
Valente, Custódio, 162
Valente, Joaquim Thomaz, 709
Valenzuela, Gilberto, 989
Valier, Nicolas, 97
Valladolid, raid at, 306, 603–604
Valle, Juan José, 1028, 1029
Valle, Leandro, 788
Vallejo, Mariano Guadalupe, 751
Valley Forge, 485
Valley of Mexico, 33 (map)
Valmy, 535
Valparaíso, 108, 852–853
Van Almonde, Philips, 339
Van Beek, Nicolaas, 344
Van Beuningen, Gerard, 142
Van Bockholt, Jurien, 142
Van Brunt, Gershom J., 768
Van Bueren, Pieter, 182
Van Campen, Jan Claesoon, 185, 187, 199
Van Collen, Jeremias, 362
Van de Brinck, Johan, 206, 207, 208–209
Van den Brande, Cornelis, 206, 207, 208
Van den Brande, Joost Gilliszoon, 278
Van den Rijn, Jan Danielszoon, 278
Van der Dussen, Alexander, 386, 387
Van der Hoeven, Cornelis, 278
Van der Ley, Gaspar, 190
Van der Putten, Karel, 278
Van der Schuren, Margaret, 232
Van der Zaan, Cornelis, 278
Van Domburgh, Pieter Jansoon, 191
Van Dorn, Earl, 798, 804, 811–812
Van Dorth, Johan, 165, 166
Van Elst, Adolph, 179, 206, 207, 208
Van Ewyk, Willem, 278
Van Haus, Hendrik, 202–203, 206, 207
Van Heemskerck, Jacob, 151
Van Hoogenheim, Simon, 443–444

- Van Hoorn, Jan Janszoon, 178, 186, 187, 188
- Van Hoorn, Nikolaas, 298, 299–300
- Van Kampen, Jan, 278
- Van Klijn, Mozes, 263
- Van Leijen, Jan Corneliszoon, 140, 141
- Van Middelend, Pieter, 278
- Van Nes, Aert, 249
- Van Noort, Olivier, 142, 143
- Van Nydek, Frans, 278
- Van Orden, George, 934
- Van Rembach, Laurens, 186
- Van Rensselaer, Henry, 481
- Van Rensselaar, Solomon, 668
- Van Ryen, Jan, 174
- Van Scharphuysen, Johan, 313
- Van Sommelsdijk, Cornelis Aerssen, 310
- Van Spilbergen, Joris, 151, 158–161
- Van Stierum, Graaf, 278
- Van Uytgeest, Cornelis Janszoon, 190–191
- Van Uyttenhove, Jan, 278, 279
- Van Walbeeck, Johannes, 189
- Vandenberg, Arthur H., 1005
- Vanderbilt, Cornelius, 778
- Vane, Charles, 367
- Varela, Felipe, 860–861, 862, 864
- Varela, Fernando, 410
- Varela, Servulo, 757
- Varela, Tomás, 375
- Vargas, Alonso, 136
- Vargas, Antonio, 1088
- Vargas, Frank, 1057
- Vargas, Getúlio Dornelles: and the Brazilian Expeditionary Force, 1016, 1021; and fascism, 1019; and sociopolitical unrest in Brazil, 977, 978, 980, 981, 982, 1022, 1027
- Vargas, Oscar, 1052
- Vargas, Pedro de, 113–114
- Vargas, Pedro Pablo, 883
- Vargas, Rafael, 887
- Vargas Santos, Gabriel, 920
- Varilla, Philippe Bunau, 926
- Varlo, Weston, 425
- Varwell, Thomas, 227
- Vasconcellos Sousa, Juan Rodríguez de (Conde de Castel Melhor), 218–219
- Vasconcelos, Andrés de, 44
- Vasconcelos, Antonio Pedro de, 378, 379, 381
- Vasconcelos, José de, 380
- Vasconcelos da Cunha, Bartolomeu, 89
- Vasconcelos da Cunha, Francisco de, 188
- Vasconcelos de Sousa, Pedro de, 355
- Vasculña, Iñigo de, 58, 59
- Vásquez, Horacio, 925
- Vásquez, Pedro, 136
- Vásquez Lajara, Horacio, 924
- Vasseur, Michel, 92
- Vaudreuil, François Pierre de Rigaud de, 420
- Vaudreuil, Louis Philippe Rigaud de, 492, 501, 522, 524
- Vaudreuil, Pierre de Rigaud de, 354, 418, 421, 424
- Vaugalan, Sieur de, 227
- Vaughan, John, 509
- Vaughan, John, Lord, 279, 287–288
- Vaughan, William, 404, 450
- Vaux, Nicholas F., 1076
- Vavasour, Richard, 126
- Vázquez, Antonio, 224
- Vázquez, Genaro, 1041, 1044
- Vázquez, Leonardo, 963
- Vázquez Bello, Clemente, 979
- Vázquez Botello de Carrera, Andrés, 171
- Vázquez de Ayllón, Lucas, 29
- Vázquez de Córdoba, Francisco, 18
- Vázquez de Hinestrosa, Diego, 175, 177
- Vázquez de Montiel, Martín, 162
- Vázquez de Rojas, Domingo, 186
- Vázquez de Tapia, Bernardino, 27
- Vázquez Gómez, Emilio, 942
- Vega, Félix, 841
- Vega, Plácido, 791
- Vega y Bazán, Juan de la, 197, 198
- Veiga Cabral, Sebastião da, 348
- Velalcázar, Sebastián de, 18, 48, 51–52
- Velasco, Felipe (Tupac Inca Yupanqui), 527
- Velasco, José Refugio, 948, 949, 951
- Velasco, Luis de, 143
- Velasco, Luis de (“the Younger”), 153
- Velasco Alvarado, Juan, 1040, 1050
- Velasco y Tejada, Luis Manuel de, 338, 339
- Velásquez Cerrato, Armando, 1030, 1031
- Velázquez, Diego, 10
- Velázquez, Juan, 79
- Velázquez de Cuellar, Diego, 16, 21, 22–23, 26, 29, 39
- Velázquez de León, Juan, 29
- Vélez, Diego, 602
- Vélez, Francisco, 786, 789
- Vélez, Francisco A., 842
- Vélez, Pedro, 599
- Vélez de Medrano, Pedro, 227
- Velgara, Joaquín de, 201
- Velho, Domingos Jorge, 325
- Venables, Robert, 232, 233
- Vences, battle at, 741–742
- Venegas, Francisco, 59, 61
- Venegas, Francisco Javier, 588
- Venezuela: Anglo-German blockade of, 924–925; sociopolitical unrest in, 929, 1022, 1024, 1030, 1058, 1084–1085
- Venturate, Juan, 139, 140
- Vera, Mariano, 733
- Vera, Ricardo, 784
- Vera Ibargüen, Domingo de, 126
- Vera y Aragón, Alonso Francisco de, 112
- Veracruz: Mexican-American War and battle at, 765, 765 (map); palisades around, 299 (illus.); sack of, 299–300, 299 (map); siege of, 790; Spanish occupation of, 825–826; U.S. occupation of, 950
- Veragua, 10
- Vergara, Juan de, 9
- Vernengo Lima, Héctor, 1021–1022
- Vernet, Louis, 713
- Vernon, Edward, 357, 382, 382–388 passim, 394–395, 397; at Cartagena, 390–393, 391 (map); at Guantánamo, 393
- Veron, Andries, 170
- Verón, Juan, 741
- Verrazano, Giovanni da, 75
- Verrier, Étienne, 365
- Vértiz y Salcedo, Juan José, 449, 451
- Verville, Jean-François du Verger de, 365
- Vespucci, Amerigo, 7, 9
- Vessey, William, 232
- Vetch, Samuel, 354, 355–356, 357
- Viaça, Joao Pereira, 641
- Viana, José Joaquín de, 414, 445
- Viaña, Vicente, 199
- Vicario, Juan, 827
- Vichy France, 1007
- Vickars, William, 323
- Vicksburg, siege of, 813–814
- Victoria, Alfredo M., 931
- Victoria, Eladio, 931, 933
- Victoria, Guadalupe, 699, 731
- Victorio (Apache), 847–848
- Victory of Rum, 277–279
- Vidal, Luis, 988
- Vidal de Negreiros, André, 202, 203, 206, 207, 208
- Vidaurre, Santiago, 833, 842, 844
- Videla, Jorge Rafael, 1047, 1050, 1051, 1053
- Videla, Juan de Dios, 783, 860, 861
- Videla, Luis, 711, 733
- Vides, Francisco de, 126
- Vieira, Fernandes, 206, 207, 208
- Vieira de Mello, Bernardo, 325
- Vieques Island, 367
- Vietnam War, 1048, 1949 (map)
- Viger, Bonaventure, 718
- Vigo Bay, 339
- Vigodet, Gaspar, 596
- Vilas, Acdel Edgardo, 1047
- Vilcabamba, invasion of, 72
- Vilcacongá, ambush at, 50
- Vilcapugio, battle at, 602
- Villa, Francisco “Pancho,” 939–965 passim, 940, 941 (illus.), 943 (illus.)
- Villa Montes (Paraguay), battle at, 1001
- Villac Umu, 53, 56
- Villadarias, Francisco Castillo Fajardo, Marqués de, 347

- Villafañe, Angel, 89
 Villafañe, Benito, 711
 Villagarcía, Marqués de, 378
 Villagra, Francisco de, 67
 Villagrán, José A., 887
 Villahermosa de Alovera, Juan José de
 Andía y Vivero, Marqués de, 375
 Villalba, Faustino, 785
 Villalobos, Alejandro, 659
 Villalobos, Juan de, 110
 Villalta, Manuel, 526
 Villamán, Martín, 10
 Villamil, Fernando, 916
 Villamil, Pedro, 883
 Villanueva Soberal, Alfonso de, 201
 Villar, Lauro, 944
 Villar, Manuel, 851, 888
 Villareal, Florencio, 784
 Villareal, Francisco, 97
 Villaret de Joyeuse, Louis Thomas, Comte,
 532, 559, 574
 Villarreal, Antonio I., 955
 Villarroel, Gonzalo de, 94, 98
 Villarroel, Gualberto, 1020, 1022
 Villavicencio, Francisco, 394
 Villazón (Paraguay), battle at, 1000
 Villeda Morales, Ramón, 1029, 1031, 1037
 Villegagnon, Chevalier de (Nicolas
 Durand), 86, 86 (illus.), 87, 90
 Villegas, Conrado, 874, 875, 876
 Villegas, Juan de, 65
 Villeneuve, Pierre Charles Silvestre de,
 561–564, 563
 Villers de l'Isle-Adam, Philippe, 87
 Vilumilla, Chief, 372
 Vinagre, Antonio, 715
 Vincent, John, 672
 Vincent, Nicholas, 487
 Vincent, Samuel, 340
 Vincent, Stênio, 938
 Viola, Humberto A., 1047
 Vique Manrique, Pedro, 116
 Virasoro, Benjamín, 742
 Virasoro, José Antonio, 782
 Virgin Islands, 225, 250
 Virginia, 152 (map), 282–283; Crijnsen's raid on, 259; "Plant Cutter riots," 297
 Virto, Manuel, 728
 Vischer, Richard, 482
 Visconti Osorio, Francisco, 1084–1085
 Vital Fernández, Francisco, 700
 Vivaldo, Agustín de, 213
 Vivanco, Manuel Ignacio de, 849
 Vlacq, Roemer, 286
 Vlak, Roemer, 278
 Von Bulow, Otto, 1011
 Von Donop, Carl, 486
 Von Knorr, Eduard, 897
 Von Knyphausen, Wilhelm, Baron, 478,
 484, 498
 Von Manstein, Alfred, 1013
 Von Riedesel, Friedrich, Baron, 486
 Von Rosenstiel, Jurgen, 1011
 Von Scholten, W., 572
 Von Schönberg, K., 969
 Von Schoppe, Sigmund, 182, 185, 186,
 189, 190, 191–192, 193; and Guararapes, 206–207, 208; and
 Itaparicá Island, 204, 206
 Von Schoultz, Nils, 721
 Von Speyer, Georg Hohermuth, 58 (map),
 60–65, 64
 Von Steuben, Friedrich Wilhelm Augustus
 Heinrich Ferdinand, Baron, 485,
 510, 514, 517, 519
 Von Tirpitz, Alfred, 969
 Von Uslar, Johann, 646
 Voorhees, Philip F., 738
 Vuelta de Obligado, battle at, 740 (map)
 Waco (Texas), 1085
 Waddell, James I., 808
 Wade, Cooper, 340, 341
 Waerdenburgh, Diedrick van, 179
 Wager, Charles, 351–353
 Wainwright, Francis, 351
 Waite, C. A., 764
 Wakelin, William, 332
 Waldo, Samuel, 403
 Wale, Charles, 576
 Walker, Hovenden, 344–345, 357, 408
 Walker, James, 512, 778
 Walker, Samuel, 750
 Walker, Thomas, 380
 Walker, William S., 767, 777 (illus.), 778;
 Mexican adventure of, 776–777; in Nicaragua, 777–778
 Wallace, James, 488, 546
 Wallace, Lew, 805
 Waller, Littleton W.T., 935
 Walley, John, 319
 Wallis, Provo William Perry, 731
 Wally, Thomas, 127
 Walop, Hendrik, 278
 Walsh, Frederick, 721
 Walsh, Huntington, 434–435
 Walsh, Joseph C., 757
 Walsh, Thomas, 319, 326
 Walsingham, Robert Boyle, 434
 Walton, George, 340, 357, 490
 Wandenkolk, Eduardo, 893
 Wandering Spirit, Chief, 890, 892
 War of the Thousand Days, 924
 Ward, James, 323
 Ward, Luke, 111, 112
 Warne, Thomas, 127
 Warner, Edward, 211–212
 Warner, Samuel, 363
 Warner, Seth, 468, 481–482
 Warner, Thomas, 210, 211, 213
 Warner, Thomas (son), 246
 Warnes, Ignacio, 586
 Warre, Henry, 551
 Warren, George, 323
 Warren, Peter, 387, 401, 402, 403, 404,
 405, 406
 Warren, S. G., 551
 Warren, William, 301
 Warwick, Robert, Earl of, 220
 Washington, D.C.: British capture and burning of, 685, 685–686, 686
 (map); Civil War and, 821
 Washington, George, 414, 469, 469,
 477–478, 509, 514, 692; at Brandywine, 484; French and Indian War and, 415, 417, 424; at Germantown, 485; and Mount
 Vernon, 397; at Trenton, 479; and Valley Forge, 485; at Yorktown, 519
 Washington, John, 282
 Washington, John M., 764
 Washington, Lawrence, 388, 391, 397
 Washington, William, 504, 512, 518
 Waterhouse, Thomas, 383
 Waterloo, 608
 Waters, Walter W., 979
 Watkins, Frederick, 556
 Watkins, Richard, 398
 Watling, John, 297
 Watson, James M., 748
 Watson, Thomas, 383, 391
 Watt, James, 851
 Wattenburg, Jurgen, 1013
 Watts, Elias, 234
 Watts, John, Jr., 139, 140
 Watts, Stephen, 482
 Watts, William, 237, 252, 253
 Wayne, Anthony, 475, 492, 494, 516; at Germantown, 485; at Paoli, 484; at Yorktown, 519
 Wayne, T., 565
 Weatherford, William, 675
 Webb, Daniel, 421
 Webster, James, 505
 Weedon, George, 484
 Welch, Thomas, 359
 Wellard, Robert, 424
 Welles, Sumner, 981
 Wellington, Arthur, Duke of, 603, 608,
 680
 Wells, Samuel, 670
 Wells, William, 548
 Welsler, Bartholomäus, 66
 Wemyss, James, 506, 507
 Wenman Smith, Federico, 981, 998
 Wentworth, Captain, 131, 134
 Wentworth, John, 250, 252
 Wentworth, Thomas, 388, 390, 394, 397;
 at Cape Tiburón, 389; at Cartagena,
 391, 392; at Guantánamo, 393
 Wessín y Wessín, Elías, 1038
 West, Thomas, 131

- West Virginia, 799
 Westbeach, Joseph, 552
 Western, Thomas, 554
 “Westo War,” 295
 Wetherall, George Augustus, 718
 Weyler, Valeriano, 907
 Wheeler, Charles, 272
 Wheeler, Daniel, 526
 Wheeler, Thomas, 280
 Wheler, Francis, 291, 323, 324, 325
 Whetstone, Thomas, 242
 Whetstone, William, 341, 345, 348–349, 350
 Whiddon, James, 132
 White, Anthony, 501, 504
 White, James, 678
 White, John (captain), 232
 White, John (Roanoke governor), 120
 White Plains, battle at, 478
 Whitehead, Andrew F., 1076
 Whitelocke, John, 537–538, 571, 572
 Whiteman, Unison, 1078
 Whitmore, Edward, 421–422, 423
 Whyte, John, 538, 551
 Wiapoco (Oyapock), 174
 Wichmans, Moises, 278
 Wickham, Henry, 321, 325
 Wilderness, The, 818–819
 Wildes, John, 125
 Wilhelm II (Germany), 897, 971
 Wilhelm, Karl, 535
 Wilkes, Charles, 803
 Wilkie, Wendell, 1005
 Wilkinson, James, 670, 676, 679–680
 Willekens, Jacob, 164, 166
 Willem II (the Netherlands), 273
 Willem, Prince of Orange, 98, 312
 Willems, Jan, 298, 299–300
 Willemszoon, Jan, 166
 Willemszoon, Willem, 278
 William III (William of Orange), 311, 318, 337
 Williams, Ephraim, 418
 Williams, Ernest, 936
 Williams, John, 670
 Williams, Maurice, 247
 Williams, Oscar F., 910
 Williams, Otho, 512
 Williams, Rowland, 320, 324
 Williams Rebolledo, Juan, 879, 880, 881, 882
 Williamson, George, 431
 Williard, Simon, 281
 Willis, Moses, 134
 Willoughby, Francis, 228, 245, 251, 253–254, 260, 261
 Willoughby, Henry, 254, 259
 Willoughby, Thomas, 261
 Willoughby, William, 257
 Wills, Thomas, 232
 Wilmot, Robert, 326, 326–327
 Wilson, George, 549, 552
 Wilson, Henry Lane, 944
 Wilson, James H., 823, 824
 Wilson, James H. (Spanish–American War), 919
 Wilson, Thomas Henry, 548
 Wilson, Woodrow, 937, 1005; and the Mexican Revolution, 950, 958, 960; and World War I, 971, 972
 Wilson’s Creek (Missouri), 800
 Wilschut, David Adam, 201
 Winchester, James, 667
 Winchester (Virginia), 822
 Winder, William Henry, 669, 685
 Windress, William, 357
 Windsor, Edward, 352, 353
 Windsor de Stanswell, Thomas
 Hickman–Windsor, Baron, 242, 243
 Winn, Richard, 507
 Winslow, John, 415
 Winslow, Josiah, 281
 Winter, Christopher, 370
 Winter, Werner, 1011, 1013
 Wintter, Lorenzo, 874
 Wise, Frederic, 935, 936
 Withall, John, 111–112
 Witheridge, Edmund, 227
 Withrington, Robert, 119–120
 Witte, Helmut, 1013
 Witte, Passchier de, 273
 Wolcott, Roger, 403
 Wolfe, James, 422, 427–428
 Woll, Adrián, 594, 745, 791, 792 (illus.)
 Wolley, Thomas, 537, 551–552
 Wollstonecraft, Charles, 692
 Wolsley, Garnet Joseph, Jr., 868–869, 868 (illus.), 869
 Wood, Benjamin, 121, 122, 126, 131, 134
 Wood, James Atholl, 552
 Wood, Leonard E., 914, 918, 918
 Woodford, Stewart L., 908
 Woodford, William, 471
 Woodhouse, C. H. L., 1006
 Woodward, John F. “Sandy,” 1062, 1068
 Wool, John E., 668, 756, 800
 Wooley, Conway, 299
 Woolsey, Melancthon T., 681
 Wooster, David, 480
 Worden, John L., 804
 Wormeley, Christopher, 213, 214
 Worsley, Miller, 683, 687
 Worst, Hendrik, 164
 Worth, William Jenkins, 697, 755, 757, 761, 764–770
 Woss y Gil, Alejandro, 925
 Wounded Knee, 848–849
 Wouters, Bartel, 197
 Wovoka (shaman), 848
 Wovinchopunch, Chief, 153
 Wray, Henry, 548
 Wreford–Brown, Christopher, 1065
 Wrenn, Ralph, 321–322
 Wright, George, 770
 Wright, Horatio G., 821
 Wright, Lawrence, 316, 316, 319, 320, 321
 Wright, Thomas, 232
 Wroth, Peter, 274–275
 Wyatt, Francis, 210
 Wyatt, Richard, 321
 Wyke, Charles Lennox, 826, 827
 Wyke, George, 361
 Wyman, Seth, 374
 Wyndham, Charles, 385
 Wynkoop, F. M., 765
 Xicomecoatl, Chief, 26
 Xicotencatl, Santiago, 751
 Xicoténcatl the Younger, 27, 39
 XYZ Affair, 553
 Yaguachi, battle at, 647–648
 Yamamoto, Isoroku, 1013
 Yamasee War, 363–364
 Yamazaki, Yasuhiro, 1017–1018
 Yáñez, José, 603
 Yáñez, José María, 751, 777
 Yáñez, Pinzón, Vicente, 7, 11–12
 Yanga, Gaspar, 153
 Yaperi, Esteban, 251–252
 Yaqui Wars, 877–879, 921–922
 Yard, Edward M., 774
 Yatay, battle at, 858
 Yawland, William, 221
 Ydígoras Fuentes, Miguel, 1026, 1037
 Yell, Archibald, 763, 764
 Yellow fever, 376
 Yellow journalism, 907
 Yeo, James Lucas, 573, 672, 674, 680–681
 Yeruá, battle at, 732
 Yon Sosa, Marco Antonio, 1032
 York, James, Duke of, 246, 274
 Yorktown, battle at, 519–520
 You, Dominique, 691
 Young, Brian G., 1063
 Yrigoyen, Hipólito, 977
 Yucatán Rebellion, 745
 Yucra Hualpa, 49
 Yungay, battle at, 728
 Yupanqui, Quizo, 54
 Yupanqui, Rimachi, 70
 Yuriar, Benjamín, 947
 Zacatecas (Mexico), battle at, 951–952
 Zalarriga, Ramón de, 234
 Zamora, Andrés, 81
 Zamora, Manuel de, 393–394
 Zapata, Emiliano, 963; and the Mexican Revolution, 940–964 passim
 Zapata, Eufemio, 963
 Zapata, Vicente, 732
 Zapiáin, José N., 451

- Zapiola, José Matias, 565, 625
 Zapp, Richard, 1009
 Zaragoza, Ignacio, 791, 827, 828, 828,
 829, 829, 829 (illus.), 830; at Silao,
 792
 Zárate, Francisco de, 109
 Zaraza, Pedro, 611, 621
 Zea, Francisco Antonio, 632
 Zedillo Ponce de León, Ernesto, 1085
 Zegers, Jan, 192
 Zelaya, Antonio de, 447
 Zelaya, José Santos, 602, 925, 928–930
 Zelaya, Juan Bernardo, 347, 348
 Zeledón, Benjamín F., 930, 933
 Zenón Fernández, Juan José, 698
 Zenteno, Benigno N., 942
 Zepita, battle at, 655
 Zevallos, Juan Valeriano de, 588
 Zimmermann, Alfred, 972
 Zinoviev, Grigory, 982
 Zitácuaro, 591
 Zöller, Hugo, 889
 Zollicoffer, Felix, 803
 Zopahua, Zope, 52
 Zouaves, 826
 Zuazo, Alonso de, 40
 Zuazua, Juan, 788
 Zubieta, Martín de, 111
 Zuloaga, Félix María, 785, 791
 Zuloaga, Gabriel José de, 787
 Zumbi, 325
 Zúñiga y la Cerda, José de, 339
 Zuyl, Jan, 173

About the Author

DAVID F. MARLEY is a naval historian who has lived and traveled extensively in Latin America and Europe and currently resides in Canada. His published works include ABC-CLIO's Historic Cities of the Americas, Pirates and Privateers of the Americas, and the first edition of Wars of the Americas.